NAARAH (תְּנָאָרָה, nāʿārāh; B, אֵקָוָא אֲטָאָן, hāʾ kōnāʾ aʿtān, A, Naʿarah, Naarah; AV Nacharh): A town in the territory of Ephraim (Josh 16:7). It appears as "Naaran" in 1 Ch 7:28 (B, Naṣarāʾ, Naaranān, A, Naʾarāʾ, Naaranān). Ḫonem (s.v. "Noorath") places it 5 Roman miles from Jericho. The name has not been recovered, and no identification is certain. The position would agree with that of el-Dhejeh, about 5 miles N.E. of Jericho.

NAARAI, nāʾā-rī (תְּנָאָרֵי, nāʿā-rīy): Son of Ezbi, one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11:37). In the 2d passage (2 S 23:35), he is called "Paarai the Arbite." The true forms of the name and description are uncertain (see Budd, Richter u. Samuel, and Curtis, Chronicles).

NAARAN, nāʾā-rān, NAARATH, nāʾā-rāth (תְּנָאָרָן, nāʿā-rān; AV Gr form of "Naarah") (s.v. Nachar). See Naharayim.

NAASHERON, nāʾā-she-rōn, NAASÖN, nāʾā-sōn (Naasōn, Naasōn): AV Gr form of "Naashon." See Nahashon.

NAATHUS, nāʾā-thūs (Nāthos, Naathos): One of the sons of Addi who put away his foreign wife (1 Esd 9:31). It apparently corresponds to "Anda" of Ezr 10:30, of which it is a transposition. B reads Ἄθεος, Láthos, probably confusing A and A.

NABAL, nāḇāl (נַבַּל, nāḇāl, "foolish" or "wicked"); Naḇāḏ, Nabāl): A wealthy man of Maon in the highlands of Judah, not far from Hebron, owner of many sheep and goats which he pastured around Carmel in the same district. He was a churlish and wicked man (1 S 25:2 ff). When David was a fugitive from Saul, he and his followers sought refuge in the wilderness of Paran, near the possessions of Nabal, and protected the latter's flocks and herds from the marauding Bedouin. David felt that some compensation was due him for such services (vs 15 and 25), so, at the time of sheep-shearings—an occasion of great festivities among sheep masters—he sent 10 of his young men to Nabal to solicit gifts of food for himself and his small band of warriors. Nabal not only refused any assistance to David, but sent back insulting words to David, whereupon the latter, becoming very angry, determined upon the extermination of Nabal and his household and dispatched 400 men to execute his purpose. Abigail, Nabal's wife, a woman of wonderful sagacity and prudence as well as of great beauty, having learned of her husband's conduct and of David's intentions, hurriedly proceeded, with a large supply of provisions, dainties and wine, to meet David and to apologize for her husband's unkind words and niggardliness, and thus succeeded in thwarting the bloody and revengeful plans of Israel's future king. On her return home she found her husband in the midst of a great celebration ("like the feast of a king"), drunken with wine, too intoxicated to realize his narrow escape from the sword of David. On the following morning, when sober, having heard the report of his wife, he was so overcome with fear that he never recovered from the shock, but died 10 days later (vs 36-39). When David heard of his death, he sent for Abigail, who soon afterward became one of his wives. W. W. Davies

NABARIAS, nab-a-riʾas (Naβαριας, Nabarias, B, Naβαρειας, Naβarēlas): One of those who stood upon Ezra's left hand as he expounded the Law (1 Esd 9:44). According to the bulk of critics, it gives 6 names whereas Nehemiah (8:4) gives 7. It is probably that the last (Meshullam) of Nehemiah's list is simply dropped and that Naborias = Hashbaddanah; or it may possibly be a corruption of Zechariah in Nehemiah's list.

NABATAEANS, nab-a-ˈtæ-ən, NABATHAEANS, nab-a-ˈthæ-ən (Naβαταῖος, Nabatæos; in 1 Mac 5:25 it reads Ναβαταῖος): AV Nabathaioi, Naabhathioi; AV Nabathæioi, more correctly "Nabataeans"). A Sem (Arabian rather than Syrian) tribe whose home in early Hellenistic times was S.E. of Pal, where they had either supplanted or been mingled with the Edomites (cf Mal and Early 1 1-5). In Josephus' day they were History so numerous that the territory between the Red Sea and the Euphrates was called Nabatene (Ant, I, xii, 4). They extended themselves along the E. of the Jordan with Petra as their capital (Strabo xvi.779; Jos, Ant, XIV, i, 4; XVII, iii, 2; BJ, I, vi, 2, etc). Their earlier history is shrouded in obscurity. Jerome, Quoest in Gen 25:13, following the hint of Jos (Ant, I, xii, 4), asserts they were of the same family that were summoned by Naboth, which is possible, though Nabeo is spelled with 7 and Nabataeans with 2. They were apparently the first allies of the Assyrians in their invasions of Edom (cf Mal 1 1 ff). They were later subjugated by Amanchérib (Sayce, New Light from the Ancient Monuments, II, 430), but before long regained their independence and resisted Arshurbanipal (Rawlinson, note, ad loc.). According to Alexander Polybiator (Fr. 18), they were included in the formidable army led by David. Their history is more detailed from 312 BC (Diod. Sic. xix), when Antigonus I (Cyklops) sent his general Athenaeus with a force against them in Petra. After an initial advantage, the army of Atenaues was almost annihilated. Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, was sent against them a few years later, with little success, though he arranged a friendship with them. The first prince mentioned is Aretas I, to whom the high priest Jason fled in 169 BC. They were friendly to the early Macedonians in the anti-Hellenistic struggle, to Judas Maccabees in 164 BC (1 Macc 5 25) and to Jonathan in 160 BC (9 35).

Toward the end of the 2d cent. BC on the fall of the Ptolemaic and Seleucid empires, but soon back insulating the Nabataeans under King Eutropius founded two 2. A Strong a strong kingdom extending E. of the Kingdom Jordan (in 110 BC). Conscious now of their own strength, they resented the ambition of the Hasmonean Dynasty—their former allies—and opposed Alexander Jannaeus (96 BC) at the siege of Gaza (Jos, Ant, XIII, iii, 3). A few years later (90 BC) Alexander retaliated by attacking Obedas I, king of the Nabataeans, but suffered a severe defeat E. of the Jordan (Jos, Ant, XIII, iv, 5-7; BJ, I, iv, 4). Antiochus of Coele-Syria next led an expedition against the Nabataeans, but was defeated and slain in the battle of Kana (Jos, Ant, XIII, xv, 1-2; BJ, I, iv, 7-8). Consequently, Aretas III seized Coele-Syria and Damascus and gained another victory over Alexander Jannaeus at Adida (in 85 BC). The Nabataeans, led by Aretas (III ?), espoused the cause of Hyrcanus against Aristobulus, be.

3. Conflicts sieged the latter in Jerusalem and provoked a difference between the Romans, by whom under Scarrus they were defeated (Jos, Ant, XIV, i, 4; 4f; BJ, I, vi, 2f). After the capture of Jerusalem, Pompey attacked Aretas, but was satisfied with a payment (Jos, ib), and Damascus was added to Syria, though later it appears to have been ceded into the hands of Antioch (2 Cor 11 32). In 55 BC Gabinus led another force against the Nabataeans (Jos, 1b). In 47 BC Malchus assisted Caesar, but in 40 BC refused to assist Herod against the Parthians, thus provoking both the Idumaean Dynasty and the Romans. Antony made a present of part of Malchus' territory to Cleopatra, and the Nabataeans were divided. In 40 BC Sesticus was defeated by Herod and the Romans, and the Nabataeans were again an independent nation.

4. End of the Nation: Nabataeans, who had divided his daughter to marry Herodians. Under King Abias an expedition against Adiabene came to grief. Malchus 11 (48–71 AD) assisted the Romans in the conquest of Jerus (Jos, B. J., III, iv, 2). Rabel (71–106 AD) was the last king of the Nabataeans as a nation. In 106 AD their nationality was broken up by the wise policy of Trajan, and Arabia, of which Petra was the capital, was made a Roman province by Cornelius Palma, governor of Syria. Otherwise they might have at least contributed to protecting the West against the East. Dio. Dur. (loc. cit.) represents the Nabataeans as a wild nomadic folk, with no agriculture, but with flocks and herds and engaged in considerable trading. Later, however, they seem to have imbued considerable Aramaean culture, and became at least the language of their commerce and diplomacy. They were also known as pirates on the Red Sea; they secured the harbor of Elah and the Gulf of 'Akhob. They traded between Egypt and Mesopotamia and carried on a lucrative commerce in myrrh, frankincense and costly wares (KGF, 4th ed [1901], 1, 726–44, with full bibliography).

NABATHITES, nab'a-thîthès: AV = RV "Nabataeans."

NABOTH, nab'ôth (נָבֹ֫וֹת, nabôbôth, from נָבָה, nab, "a sprout"); Nabouâlî, Nabouâlî): The owner of a vineyard contiguous to the palace of King Ahab. The king desired, by purchase or exchange, to add the vineyard to his own grounds. Naboth, however, refused to part on any terms with his paternal inheritance. This refusal made Ahab "heavy and displeased" (1 K 21:4). Jezebel, the king's wife, took the matter to hand, and, by false accusation on an irrelevant charge procured the death of Naboth by stoning (1 K 21:7–14). As Ahab was on his way to take possession of the vineyard he met Elijah the prophet, who denounced the vile act and pronounced judgment on king and royal house. A temporary respite was given to Ahab because of a repentant mood (1 K 21:27–29); but later the blow fell, first upon himself in a conflict with Syria (1 K 22:34–40); then upon his house through a conspiracy of Jehu, in which Jehoram, Ahab's son, and Jezebel, his wife, were slain (2 K 9:25–26.30 if). In both cases the circumstances recalled the foul treatment of Naboth.

NABUCHODONOSOR, nab'û-kû-dôn-ôr (נַבְעָכֹדדָוֹנָוֹר, Nabuchodonosor): LXX and Vulg form of "Nebuchadnezzar" ("Nebuchadrezzar") found in AV of the Apocalypse in 1 Esd 1:40. 41.45.48; 2 10; 5 7; 6 20; Ad Est 11 4; Bar 9 11.12. It is the form used in AV of the Apocalypse throughout. RV of 4th and Tob 14 15, the form "Nebuchadnezzar" is given.

NACON, nā'kon, THE THRESHING FLOOR OF (נַ֑אָכִ֖ון, nākôn; AV Nachon): The place where Uzzah was smitten for putting forth his hand to steady the ark, hence called afterward "Perez-uzzaah" (2 S 6 8); in the passage (1 Ch 13 9) we have נַמְזָר, nachon, and in Jos (Ant, VII, iv, 2) נַאֲכֵל, Cheledon. In 1 S 23 23 the word "nakhôn" occurs, and is tr4 of a certainty, m. "with the certainty" or "to a set place"; also in 1 S 25 4 it is tr4 of a certainty, m. "to a set place." It is uncertain whether "nakhôn" is a place-name at all, and no successful attempt has been made to identify either Nacoon or Chidon; possibly they are both personal names. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

NACHOR, nák'ôr (נַאֲכּוּר, Nachor) AV; Gr form of "Nahor" (thus RV). Grandfather of Abraham (Lk 3 34).

NADAB, na'dâb (נַאֲדָב, nadjâb): "noble"; Naâbâth, Nadâb,

(1) Aaron's first-born son (Ex 6 23; Nu 3 2; 26 60; 1 Ch 6 3 [Heb 6 29]; 24 1). He was permitted with Moses, Aaron, the 70 elders, and his brother Abihu to ascend Mt. Sinai and behold the God of Israel (Ex 24 1 9). He was associated with his father and brothers in the priestly office (Ex 28 1). Along with Abihu he was guilty of offering "strange fire," and both "died before Jehovah" (Lev 10 1 2; Nu 3 4; 26 61). The nature of their offence is far from clear. The word rendered "strange" seems in this connection to mean no more than "unauthorized by the Law" (see "nêr, zîr, in DDB, and of Ex 30 9). The proximity of the prohibition of the use of officiating priests (Lev 10 8 9) has given rise to the erroneous suggestion of the Midr. that the offence of the brothers was drunkenness.

(2) A descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2 28 30).

(3) A Gibeonite (1 Ch 8 30).

(4) Son of Jeroboam II after him for two years king of Israel (1 K 14 20; 16 23). While Nadab was investing Gibbethon, a Philistine stronghold, Baasha, who probably was an officer in the army, as throne-robbers were usually, conspired against him, slew him and seized the throne (1 K 15 27 31). With the assassination of Nadab the dynasty of Jeroboam was extinguished, as foretold by the prophet Ahijah (1 K 14). This event is typical of the entire history of the Northern Kingdom, characterized by revolutions and counter-revolutions.

NADABATH, na'da-bath (Na'dâbâth, Nadâbath; AV Nadabatha, na-dâb'a-thâ): A city of E. of the Jordan from which the wedding party of Jambri were coming, and Jonathan and Simon attacked them and slew very many, designing to avenge the murder of their brother John (1 Mac 9 37 ff). Nebo and Nabathaeans have been suggested as identical with Nadabath. Clermont-Ganneau would read rabathâ, and identify it with Rabbath-ammon. There is no certainty.

NAGGAI, nag'î, nag'â-î (Nagayy, Nagayy; AV Nagge): In Lk 3 25, the Gr form of the Heb name Noah (q.v.).

NAHALAL, na'halal (נַ֓אֱחַלָל, nahalâl; B, Baal- pâr, Baalthonia, A, Nâhâlâl, Nahal, and other forms): A city in the territory of Zebulun assigned with its suburbs to the Merarite Levites, out of which the Canaanite inhabitants were not driven (Josh 19 15; AV [incorrectly] "Nahallal"); 21 35; Jos 18 30, "Nabalot"). In the Tahm Jerus (Meg. 1) it is identified with Mahlu. This name might correspond either with 'Âšî Mâhîl, or with Maâlîl. The former lies about 3 miles N.E. of Nazareth on a hill near the eastern boundary of Zebulun. The latter is situated about 8 1/2 miles W. of Nazareth, NAHAM, nā'ham (נָהָם), naham, "comfort!": A Judahite chieftain, father of Keilah the Garmite (1 Ch 4 19); the passage is obscure.

NAHAMANI, nā-ha-mānī, naha'ma'-ni (נָהָמָן, naham’ānān, "compassionate"): One of the twelve heroes who numbered with Shiloh (Neh 7 7). The name is wanting in the list (Ezr 2 2). In 1 Esd 5 8 he is called "Enenum" (RvM "Enenius").

NAHARAI, nā-ha-ra (נָהָרַא), Naharai, nā-ha-ra (נָהָרַא), Naharai: One of David’s heroes, Joshua’s armor-bearer (2 S 23 37, AV "Nahari"); 1 Ch 11 39).

NAHASH, nā-haʃ (נָחָשׁ), nāhash, "serpent"); Naḥaš, Naḥaš): (1) The father of Abigail and Zeruiah, the sisters of David (2 S 17 25; cf 1 Ch 2 16). The text in 2 S, where this reference is made, is hopelessly corrupt; for that reason there are various explanations. The rabbis maintain that Nahash is another name for Jesse, David’s father. Others think that Nahash was the name of Jesse’s wife; but it is not probable that Nahash could have been the name of a woman. Others explain the passage by making Nahash the first husband of Jesse’s wife, so that Abigail and Zeruiah were half-sisters to King David.

(2) A king of Ammon, who, at the very beginning of Saul’s reign, attacked Jabesh-gilead so successfully, that the inhabitants sued for peace at almost any cost, for they were willing to pay tribute and serve the Ammonites (1 S 11 15). The heathen king, not satisfied with tribute and slavery, demanded in addition that the right eye of every man should be put out, as "a reproach upon Israel." They were given seven days to comply with these cruel terms. Before the expiration of this time, Saul, the newly anointed king, appeared on the scene with an army which utterly routed the Ammonites (1 S 11 1 ff), and, according to Jos, killed King Nahash (1 K 2, vi. 3).

If the Nahash of 1 S 20 2 be the same as the king mentioned in 1 S 11, this statement of Jos cannot be true, for he lived till the early part of David’s reign. 40 or more years later. It is, of course, possible that Nahash, the father of Hanan, was a son or grandson of the king defeated at Jabesh-gilead by Saul. There is but little agreement among commentators in regard to this matter. Some writer so far so as to claim that "all passages in which this name [Nahash] is found refer to the same individual.

(3) A resident of Rabbath-ammon, the capital of Ammon (2 S 17 27). Perhaps the same as Nahash (2), which see. His son Shobi, with other trans-Jordain chieftains, welcomed David at Mahanaim with sympathy and substantial gifts when the old king was fleeing before his rebel son Absalom. Some believe that Shobi was a brother of Hanun, king of Ammon (2 S 10 1).

W. W. Davies

NAHATH, nā'hath (נָחָהַת, nahath): (1) A grandson of Esau (Gen 36 13; 1 Ch 1 37). (2) A descendant of Levi and ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6 26); also called "Toah" (1 Ch 6 34) and "Tohu" (1 S 1 1). (3) A Levite who, in the time of Hezekiah, assisted in the oversight of "the oblations and the tithes and the dedicated things" (2 Ch 31 15).

NAHBI, nā'bi (נָבִי, nabḥi; in the NT Naβέξ, Nachôr): The representative of Nahphati among the 12 spies (Nu 13 14).

NAHOR, nā'hor (נָהָר, nahôr; in the NT Naβέξ, Nachôr): (1) Son of Serug and grandfather of Abraham (Gen 11 22 25; 1 Ch 1 26). (2) Son of Terah and brother of Abraham (Gen 11 20 27 29; 22 20 25; 24 15 24 47; 29 5; Jos 24 2). A city of Nahor is mentioned in Gen 24 10; the God of Nahor in Gen 31 53. In AV Jos 24 2; Lk 3 34, the name is spelled "Nachor."

NAHSHON, nā'shon (נָשִּׁן), nahšōn; LXX and NT Naασσών, Naασσών: A descendant of Judah; brother-in-law of Aaron and ancestor of David and of Jesus Christ (Ex 6 23; Nu 1 7; 1 Ch 2 10 11; Ruth 4 20; Mt 1 4; Lk 3 32).

NAHUM, nā'hum (נָעָם), Naum; AV Naum): An ancestor of Jesus in Lk’s genealogy, the 9th before Joseph, the husband of Mary (Lk 3 25).

NAHUM, nā'hum, THE BOOK OF:

I. Authorship and Date—The name Nahum (נָעָם, nahām; LXX and NT Ναοῦμ, Naoum; Jos, Naoumos) occurs nowhere else in the OT; in the NT it is found in Lk 3 25. It is not uncommon in the Mish, and it has been discovered in Phoen inscriptions. It means "consolation," or "consoler," and is therefore, in a sense, symbolical of the message of the book, which is intended to comfort the oppressed and afflicted people of Judah.

Of the personal life of Nahum, practically nothing is known. In 1 1 he is called "the Elkoshite," that is, an inhabitant of Elkosh. Unfortuntately, the location of this place and home is not known. One tradition, which cannot be traced beyond the 16th century, AD, identifies the home of Nahum with a modern village Elkosh, or Arabosh, not far from the left bank of the Tigris, two days’ journey N. of the site of ancient Nineveh. A second tradition, which is at least as old as the days of Jerome, the latter part of the 4th century, locates Elkosh in Galilee, at a place identified by many with the modern El-Khuzar, near Ramleh. Others identify the home of the prophet with Capernaum, the name of which means "Village of Nahum." A fourth tradition, which is first found in a collection of traditions entitled "Lives of the Prophets," says "Nahum was from Elkosh, beyond Bet Gabre, of the tribe of Simeon." A place in the S. is more in harmony with the interest the prophet takes in the Southern tribes, so that the last-mentioned tradition seems to have received its favor, but absolute certainty is not attainable.
Nahum, Book of

The Book of Nahum centers around the fall and destruction of Nineveh. Since the capture of the city is represented as still in the future, it seems evident that the prophecies were delivered some time before 607–606 BC, the year in which the city was destroyed. Thus the latest possible date of Nahum's activity is fixed. The earliest possible date also is indicated by internal evidence. In 3:8 ff. the prophet speaks of the capture and destruction of No-aunom, the Egyp Thebes, as an accomplished fact. The expedition of Ashurbanipal, king of Assyria, against Egyp, which resulted in the fall of Thebes, occurred about 606 BC. Hence the activity of Nahum must be placed somewhere between 663 and 607.

As to the exact period between the two dates there is disagreement among scholars. One thing is made quite clear by the prophecy itself, namely, that at the time the prophecies were written or written Nineveh was passing through some grave crisis. Now we know that during the second half of the 7th cent. BC Assyria was threatened three times: (1) the revolt of Shamash-shumukin of Babylon against his king, the king of Assyria, 660-635 BC; (2) the invasion of Assyria and threatened attack upon Nineveh by some unknown foe, perhaps the Scythians, about 625 BC; (3) the final attack, which resulted in the fall and destruction of Nineveh in 607–606 BC.

The first crisis does not offer a suitable occasion for Nahum's prophecy, because at that time the city of Nineveh was not in any danger. Little is known concerning the second crisis, and it is not possible either to prove or to disprove that it gave rise to the book. On the other hand, the years immediately preceding the downfall of Nineveh offer a most suitable occasion. The struggle continued for about 2 years. The united forces of the Chaldaeans and other enemies met determined resistance; at last a breach was made in the northeast corner of the wall, the city was taken, pillaged and burned. Judah had suffered much from the proud Assyrian, and it is not difficult to understand how, with the threat of the cruel foe before them, the prophet-patriot might burst into shouts of exultation and triumph over the distress of the cruel foe.

"If," says A. B. Davidson, "the distress of Nineveh referred to were the final one, the descriptions of the prophecy would acquire a reality and naturalness which they otherwise want, and the general characteristics of Heb prophecy would be more truly conserved." There seems to be good reason, therefore, for assigning Nahum's activity to a date between 610 and 607 BC.

II. The Book.—Nahum is the prophet of Nineveh's doom. Ch 1 (+1) contains the decree of Nineveh's destruction. Jeh is a God of 1. Contents of vengeance and of mercy (vs 2-3); while he may at times appear sleek in punishing iniquity, He will surely punish the sinner. No one can stand before Him in the day of judgment (vs 4-6). Jeh, faithful to those who rely upon Him (ver 7), will be terrible toward His enemies and toward the enemies of His people (vs 8). The Lord will not forget His covenant; His enemies are doomed (vs 9-14), which will mean the exaltation of Judah (1 15; 2 2). The army appointed to execute the decree:—approaching, ready for battle (2 1-4). All efforts to save the city are in vain; it falls (vs 5-8), the queen and her attendants are captured (ver 7), the inhabitants flee (ver 8), the city is sacked and left a desolation (vs 9-13). The destruction of the bloody city is imminent (3 1-3); the fate is well deserved and no one will bewail her (vs 4-7); natural strength and resources will avail nothing (vs 8-11); the city will be utterly cut off (vs 12-18); the whole earth will rejoice over the downfall of the cruel oppressor (ver 19).

Opinions concerning the religious significance of the Book of Nahum differ. The point of view of Nahum's language and style all students assign to Nahum an exalted place among the prophet-poets of the ancient Hebrews; for all are impressed with the intense force and picturesque quality of his language and style. "Each prophet," says Kirkpatrick, "has his special gift for his particular work. Nahum bears the palm for poetic power. His short book is a Pindaric ode of triumph over the oppressor's fall." So says A. Smith: "His language is strong and brilliant; his rhythm, rumbles and rolls, leaps and flashes, like the horsemen and chariots he describes."

Until recently no doubts were expressed concerning the integrity of the book, but within recent years there have been many who have, with various arguments, denied the certainty that in 1-2 traces of alphabetic arrangement may be found, but even here their method of arrangement is not carried through consistently; in the rest of the chapter the evidence is slight.

The artificial character of acrostic poetry is generally supposed to point to a late date. Hence those who believe that ch 1 was originally an alphabetic poem consider it an exilic or post-exilic production, which was at a still later date prefixed to the genuine prophecies of Nahum.

In support of this view it is pointed out further that the prophecy in ch 1 is vague, while the utterances in chs 2 and 3 are definite. Hence some support for a late date also from the language and style of the poem.

That difficulties exist in ch 1, that in some respects it differs from chs 2 and 3, even the students of the Eng. text can see; and that the Heb text has suffered in transmission, in the presence of all the conjectural emendations. Of the presence of an acrostic poem in ch 1 is not beyond doubt. The apparent evidence of arrangement forms the starting point for a discussion of the whole prophecy, this has been preserved as a general introduction to the more specific denunciation in chs 2 and 3. And a detailed examination shows that in this, as in other cases, the linguistic and stylistic data are decisive. In view of these facts it may safely be asserted that no convincing argument has been presented against the genuineness of 1 2—2 2. "Therefore," says O. A. Smith, "while it is possible that a later poet has prefixed to the genuine prophecies of Nahum, and the first ch supplies many provocations to belief in such a theory, this has been preserved, and the able essays of proof have much against them. The question is open.

III. Teaching.—The utterances of Nahum center around a single theme, the destruction of Nineveh.

The purpose is to point out the hand of God in the imperial power in judgment; and what there is of it is confined very largely to the opening verses of ch 1. These emphasize the twofold manifestation of the Divine holiness, the Divine vengeance and the Divine mercy (1 2-3). The manifestation of the one results in the destruction of the wicked (1 2), the other in the salvation of the oppressed (1 15; 2 2). Faith in Jeh will secure the Divine favor and protection (1 7).

Nahum, Book of

NAHUM, ná'əm (Naín, Nain): This town is mentioned in Scripture only in connection with the visit of Jesus and the miracle of raising the widow's son from the dead (Lk 7 11). The name persists to this day, and is the form of Naín, the town on the northwestern slope of Jebel ed-Duhur ("Hill of Moreh"), the mountain which, since the Middle Ages, has been known as Little Hermon.

The modern name of the mountain is derived from Nebi Duhur, "the wise one of the village. There are many ancient remains, proving that the place was once of considerable size. It was never inclosed by a wall, as some have thought from the mention of "the gate." This was probably the opening between the houses by which the road entered the town. Tristram thought he had found traces of an ancient city wall, but this proved to be incorrect. The ancient town perhaps stood somewhat higher on the hill than the present village. In the past, the E. are many tombs of antiquity. The site commands a beautiful and extensive view across the plain to Carmel, over the Nazareth hills, and away past Tabor to where the white peak of Hermon glints in the sun. To the S. are the heights and plains of Samaria. The village, once prosperous, has fallen on evil days. It is said that the villagers received such good prices for ingleton that they cultivated it on a large scale. A sudden drop in the price brought them to ruin, from which, after many years, they have not yet fully recovered.

NAIOTH, ná'-o-th (ná'oth, ná'oth; B, Ahd, Ádáth, A, Nawá', Nawáth): This is the name given to a place in Ramah to which David went with Samuel when he fled and escaped from Saul (1 S 19 18, etc.). The term has often been taken as meaning "houses" or "habitations"; but this cannot be justified. There is no certainty as to exactly what the word signified. Clearly, however, it attached to a particular locality in Ramah; and whatever its etymological significance, it denoted a place where the prophets dwelt together. On approaching it in pursuit of David, Saul was overcome by the Spirit of God, and conducted himself like one "possessed," giving rise to the proverb, "Is Saul also among the prophets?"

NADAK, ná'dák, NAKEDNESS, ná-ked'-nes: "Naked" in the OT represents various derivatives of נָקָד, nákád, or נָקָר, nákér, chiefly נָקָד, nákad (adj.), נָקָר, nákér (n.); in the NT the adj. is ἄκατος, ákataós, the noun ἄκατος, ákatoς, with vb. ἀκατωθήσονται, akatowthésontai, in Cor 4 11. In Ex 32 25; 2 Ch 28 19, AV adds πάνερ, pāne,' "break loose," "cast away restraint." Both the Gr and Heb forms mean "without clothing," but in both languages they are used frequently in a metaphorical sense. So the adj. is "without outer garment;" so, probably, is the meaning in Jn 21 7—Peter was wearing only the ἀλίθον (see Dress); and so perhaps in Mk 14 51.52 and Mic 1 8. In Isa 20 2—4, however, the meaning is lit. (for the "three years" of ver 3 see the context). So in Gen 2 25; 3 7, where the act of sin is immediately followed by the sense of shame (see Delitzsch, Bib. Psychology, and Gunkel, ad loc.). A very common use of "naked" is also "without proper clothing" (Job 22 6; 4 11, etc., etc.), and hence, of course, "in which the naked." "Nakedness," in addition, is used as a euphemism in 1 S 20 30. A slightly different euphemistic usage is that of λευκα 18 19, which in Ezek 16 36.37 is played off against the literal sense

In a figurative sense the word is used of the hard or engraving tool: "the sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron, and with the point (lit. "claw," "nail") of a diamond: it is graven upon the tablet of their heart, and upon the horns of your altars" (Jer 17 1). JAMES ORR

2. Nahum's enemy'; but it should be borne in mind that it is not personal hatred that prompts the prophet; he is stirred by a righteous indignation over the outrages committed by Assyria. He considers the sin and overthrow of Nineveh, not merely in their bearing upon the fortunes of Judah, but in their relation to the moral government of the whole world; hence his voice gives utterance to the outraged conscience of humanity.

While Nahum's message, in its direct teaching, appears to be less spiritual and ethical than that of his predecessors, it sets in a clear light Jch's sway over the whole universe, and emphasizes the duty of nations as well as of individuals to own His sway and obey His will. This attitude alone will assure permanent peace and prosperity; on the other hand, disobedience to His purpose and disregard of His rule will surely bring calamity and distress. The emphasis of these ethical principles gives to the message of Nahum a unique significance for the present day and generation. Assyria in his hands, says Ewald, "may be regarded as an object lesson to the empires of the modern world, teaching, as an eternal principle of the Divine government of the world, the absolute necessity, for a nation's continued vitality, of that righteousness, personal, civic, and national, which alone salthe a nation's way in the broad sense. In a broad sense, 1 15 is of Messianic import. The downfall of Nineveh and Assyria prepares the way for the permanent redemption and exaltation of Zion: "the wicked one shall no more pass through thee."

NADUS, ná'dús (A, Náús, Nááds, B, Nááds, Nánáds): One of those who had taken "northwestern wives" (Ecd 9 31, apparently = "Be-nááh") of Ezra 10 30, of which it is probably a corruption or the latter part.

NAIL, nál: (1) As denoting the finger-nail, the Heb word is אָ֣ש, asip̂ re (Dt 21 12), the captiv- woman "shall shave her head, and pare her nails." The latter word was probably intended to prevent her from marring her beauty by scratching her face, an act of self-mutilation oriental women are repeatedly reported to have committed in the agony of their grief. Aram. אֲש, tpher (Dnl 4 33, "his nails like birds' claws"); (2) As "peg" (for tent, or driving into the wall on which something is to be hung (ver 24); cf Ecd 12 11, where the word is mas'irás, cognate with mas'ísér below). For nails of iron (1 Ch 22 3) and gold (2 Ch 3 9), and in Is 41 7 and Jer 10 4, the word is קָ֣ש, qass, magmeér. (4) In the NT the word is ἄκατος, ákatoς, used of the nails in Christ's hands (Jn 20 25), and "to nail" in Col 2 14 ("nailing it to the cross") is πυγμέαν, pygmenā. In a figurative sense the word is used of the hard or engraving tool: "the sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron, and with the point (lit. "claw," "nail") of a diamond: it is graven upon the tablet of their heart, and upon the horns of your altars" (Jer 17 1). JAMES ORR

The fierceness of Nahum, and his gle in the thought of Nineveh's ruin, may not be in accord with the injunction, "Love one another"; but it should be borne in mind that it is not personal hatred that prompts the prophet; he is stirred by a righteous indignation over the outrages committed by Assyria. He considers the sin and overthrow of Nineveh, not merely in their bearing upon the fortunes of Judah, but in their relation to the moral government of the whole world; hence his voice gives utterance to the outraged conscience of humanity.
The point of Gen 9 22.23 is a little hard to grasp, but apparently there is here again a euphemism—this time for a particularly horrible act (see the comments of Hlotz 10.5). The name of those who are due to the Massoretic (see OT Texts). The Jews objected vigorously to exposure of the body (even athletes insisting on a loin-loin [cf 2 Mac 4 12.13]), and compulsory nudity was the extreme of shame and degradation (Ps 89 37; Lam 3 19; Hosea 2 3; Nah 3 5 etc). The relation of this attitude to Israel's high sexual morality needs no explanation. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

NAME, nām (נָ֫אָם, šhmn; ὄνομα, ónuma; Lat nomen [2 Esd 4 1]; vgs šnāpetu, anōmaíze; Lot nomino [2 Esd 5 26]). A “name” is that by which a person, place or thing is marked and known. In Scripture, names were generally descriptive of the person, of his position, of some circumstance affecting him, hope entertained concerning him, etc, so that “the name” often came to stand for the person. In Acts 1 15; Rev 3 4, ónuma stands for “person”; cf Nu 26 53, 55.

I. OT Word and Use.—The word for “name” in the OT is also the name of one of the sons of Noah. The etymology is uncertain.

1. General, although it may be from shāmāh (obs.), “to mark a”’; shām is the Aram. form. For the name as descriptive of the person see Names. Besides designating persons, the name also stands for fame, renown, reputation, character gained or expressed, etc (Gen 6 4; 2 S 7 9.23, etc); it might be an “evil name” (Dt 22 14.19); the “name” is also equivalent to a “people” or “nation” that must be “hated and cursed.” (Isa 21 27); to speak or write “in the name” signified authority (Ex 5 23; 1 K 21 8, etc); to “call one’s name” over a place or people indicated possession or ownership (2 S 12 28; Am 9 12, etc); to “act in the name” was to represent (Dt 26 6); to be called or known “by name” indicated special individual notice (Ex 31 2; Isa 43 1; 46 3.4). Gen 2 19.20 even displays a conception of identity between the name and the thing. “To name” is sometimes ʿamar, “to say” (1 S 16 3); dāḥar, “to speak” (Gen 23 16); nāḥab, “to mark out” (Nu 1 17); šādāh, “to call” (Gen 48 16; Isa 61 6). Of a special interest is the usage with respect to the name of God. (For the various Divine names and their significance see GOD. NAMES OF.) He revealed himself to Israel through Moses in a new name (which was at the same time the Divine manifestation, the character of God as revealed in His relations to His people and in His dealings with them (Ex 3 13-16; 15 2). The “name of God” was therefore not a mere word, but the whole of the Divine manifestation, the character of God as revealed in His relations to His people and in His dealings with them (Ex 3 16; 15 2). The “name of Jeh” was pronounced to Moses on Mt Sinai. “Jeh, Jeh, a name meritorious and gracious, slow to anger, and abundant in lovingkindness and truth” (Ex 3 14-6); the name Yehoh (so rendered) was (Ex 3 15) His “memorial name” (so, often, in ARV, see MEMORIAL). He was also known as God of the universe or name in the name that Dt 6 4 f was termed the “Shema” (from shēma, “hearken,” the first word in ver 4), the first article of Israel’s faith, taught to all the children, written on the phylacteries, and still recited as the first act in public and private occasions by every adult Jew. Where Jeh is said to record His name, or to put His name in a place (or person), some special Divine manifestation or significant heavenly person or place is sacred to Him (Ex 20 24; 1 K 8 16). His “name” was also in the angel of His Presence (Ex 25 21); what He does is “for His great name sake” in fire, to that by and vindication of His revealed character and covenant relationship to His people. He should do what He would do “for a name” (Isa 55 13); He would give His people a new name, “an everlasting name” (Isa 56 5); to be called “by the name” of Jeh is “to be his people” (2 Ch 7 14; Isa 43 7); it implies “protection,” etc (Isa 63 10; Jer 14 8.9); to call upon the name of Jeh was “as it was” as God (Gen 21 33; 26 25, etc); “to confess” His name, to “acknowledge” (1 K 8 19, etc); the act in, etc, “the name,” was to love, trust, etc. Jeh Himself (Ps 51 9; 77 17). Very frequently, esp. in the Ps and prophecies of Is and Jer, “the name” of God is used for “God himself”: “to forget his name” was “to depart from him” (Gen 22 18); to name a thing “in the name” of Jeh in His name signified Divine appointment, inspiration, authority (Jer 11 21; 14 14,15, etc); we have “swearing by” or “in the name of Jeh (Dt 16 13); to take His name “in vain” was to swear falsely (Ex 20 7; Lev 19 12); to have “blasphemed the name” (Ps 144 7); cursing (2 K 22 4). In Lev 24 11, we have the case of one who “blasphemed the Name,” and cursed, “the penalty on which was death by fire” (2 K 22 4). In later Jewish usage (of Wisd 14 21) the sacred name Jeh was not pronounced in reference to the name, Āḥānāy (my lord) being substituted for it (the vowels belonging to Āḥānāy were written with the consonants of the hieroglyph, hence the frequent term “the Lord” in ARV, for which ARV substitutes “Jeh.”

II. NT Word and Use.—In the NT ónuma has frequently also the significance of denoting the “character,” or “work” of the person, 1. Character e.g. Mt 1 21, “Thou shalt call his and Work name Jesus, for it is he that shall son of the (Lk 1 31). Person His name is John; of the new names give to Simon, James and John; Saul’s new name of “Paul’). The “name” of God has the same relation to the character of God as in the OT (Mt 16:16; cf Heb 1:18; 12:28); it is manifested by Christ (Jn 17 26; of ver 3); the name of Jesus, as manifesting God, takes the place of the name of Jeh in the OT (cf Jas 2 7 with Jcr 14 9, and see below); to Him is given the name which is above every name; the difference is that in the name of Jesus very knee should bow, that and every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father, Phil 2 10.9.10 (cf Is 45 23). It is not the name Jesus, but the name of Jesus (Lightfoot), i.e. the name (“Lord”) received by Jesus; we have with reference to Jesus simply “the Name” (Acts 6 41, “worthy to suffer dishonor for the Name”); Jas 5 14 [probable text, WH], “in the Name”;

3 Jo ver 7, “for the sake of the Name”); the “name of Christ” is equivalent to “Christ himself” (Mt 10 22; 19 29); it is the same thing as “his manifestation” (Jn 20 31); “to believe on his name” is to believe in Him as manifested in His “name and work” (2 Cor 1 20); again, the “name of God” means sent by God, as representing Him, with Divine authority (Mt 21 9; 23 39); in like manner, we have “prophesying” or “preaching” in the name of Jesus (Acts 4 18; 5 25). The name of Jesus represented His authority and power, e.g. working miracles in His name (Mt 7 22; Mk 9 39; Acts 4 7, “by what name [or ‘power’] have ye done this?”), and it is contrasted with casting out evil spirits by some other name which is above every name (Acts 19 17). The gospel of salvation was to be preached “in his name,” by His authority and as making it effectual (Lk 24 47); sinners were justified “through his name” (Acts 10 43; 1 Cor 6 11); sins were forgiven “for his name’s sake” (1 Jn 2 12); men “called upon the name” of Jesus, as they had done on that of Jeh (Acts 9 14.21 [cf 7 59]; Rom 10 13 14).

The name of Christ was to belong to Him (2 Tim 2 19); the calling of His name on the Gentiles probably signified their meeting their “expected one” (quoted from Am 9 12); cf Rom 1 5); to “hold fast his name” is to be true to Him as made known (Rev 2 10; 3 11); to be “called together in his name” is as “acknowledging him” (Mt 16 20; Col 3 17); all great things that kindred things (Acts 2 38; 25 26, “calling on his name,” contrasted with baptizing into one’s own name in 1 Cor 1 13, 14) is “to call over them his name” (in the rite of, as claiming them for Christ and as their acknowledgment of Him or of faith in Him—becoming His disciples; similarly, baptism into (on) the name of the Father, and of the Holy Ghost, represents "dedication to" God as He has been revealed in Christ.

"In the name of" means "as representing" (or as being), e.g. "in the name of a prophet," of "a righteous man," or of "a disciple" (Mt 10:41; 42); to receive a little child "in Christ's name," i.e. as belonging to Him, is to receive Himself (Mt 18:5; Mk 9:37; ver 41 to disciples, RV "because ye are Christ's!" "my children, ye are Christ's!""); Lk 9:48; cf Mt 18:20; Mk 13:6, "Many shall come in my name"; Lk 21:8). The significance of the name of Jesus in relation to prayer deserves special notice. To pray in the name of Jesus, to ask anything of the Father, is not to be interpreted as a substitution for prayer, or to supplant the necessity of prayer. It is a continual reminder to the believer that Jesus is the Christ, the One Who was and is the Son of God, and Who has made it possible for believers to come directly to the Father on the basis of that relationship. When Jesus said, "Ye shall ask in my name," He did not mean that one may ask anything in the name of Jesus. Rather, "in my name" was a qualifying phrase or a condition that the one asking must meet in order to enjoy the privilege of praying to the Father in Christ's name. It designates the person of Jesus Christ as the Mediator of the prayer, and as the One who will intercede for the petitioner. The significance of the name of Jesus in relation to prayer might also be that the prayer should be made in the name of Jesus, i.e., the petitioner should be asking for the things that Jesus would ask for, and for the things that Jesus would desire for the petitioner. In this way, the petitioner is aligning their prayer with the will and purpose of Jesus Christ. The name of Jesus is a powerful name, and it is significant in the context of prayer because it is a name that represents the presence and power of God in the lives of believers. The inclusion of the name of Jesus in prayer is a means by which believers can draw closer to God and access His power and provision. It is a reminder that Jesus is the One who has the authority to present prayers to the Father on behalf of believers, and that He is the One who understands their needs and desires. In summary, the name of Jesus is significant in the context of prayer because it represents the presence and power of God in the lives of believers, and it is a means by which believers can draw closer to God and access His power and provision.
When the name was a sentence in Heb, its constituent parts could be transposed without changing the meaning. Thus the father of Bathsheba was called Ammiel, "a sinner of God," and Elhanan, "God is my father," from "God is my strength." Ch Jeconiah transferred also his right to the throne and was called Jeohoshaphat (2 Chr 36:16, 32, 17; 2 K 24:16); 1), a legitimate transposition of the vb. and subject, and meaning in each case, "Jeh hath laid hold.

Not only did transposition take place, but the substitution of a cognate root and even the use of a different part of the vb. also occurred. Thus King Jehoiachin (2 K 24:16; Jer 52:31) was known also as Jeconiah (Jer 24:1; 28:4) and Coniah (22:24, 37:1). The two names Jehoiachin and Jeconiah have exactly the same meaning, i.e., "the establishing of Jehovah." The Divine name which begins Jeconiah is transferred to the end in Jeconiah and Coniah; and the Hipil imperfect of the vb. 1is, which is seen in Jehoiachin, has been replaced by the Qal imperfect form of the vb. 1is, in Jeconiah, and by the construct infinitive of the same species in Coniah. Parallel cases occur in Assyry and Bab lit., among which the same form is used: (1) Assur, Jehovah, and Zimma-sham-shum, exhibit both the transposition of constituent parts and an interchange of prepositions and participles.

Twin forms like Abiner and Abner, Abishalom and Absalom, Elizaphan and Eliphasan, are not the full name and its abbreviation by 4. Methods of abbreviation, but are merely two or three of the variants, equally legitimate, modes of abbreviation combining the constituent parts. The common methods of shortening were:

1. (1) contraction by the rejection of a weak consonant of the formation of a final unaccented vowel, notably by the omission of the Divine name (ps 60:2); or the verb yap at the beginning and yap at the end of proper names: hence Jehoah became Joash (2 K 12:1,9,19), and Amaziah became Azariah (2 K 14:1 HEB text, and S); (2) abbreviation of composite geographical names by the omission of the generic noun or its equivalent: Jerusalem, which to the Hebrews meant "foundation of peace," was shortened to Salem, "peace" (Ps 76:2); Kirjath-baal, "city of Baal" (Gen 16:5), Baal or Baasha (Josh 15:19; 2 S 6:2), Besorah, "house of the temple of Ashtaroth," to Ashoroth; Beth-leboath, "house of fountains," to Leboath; Beth-tezaveth to Azmaveth; Beth-rehab to Rehob; Beth-banath to Banoth (M S I, 27, with Nu 21:19); Beth-haanan to Beth-anan (M S II, 39; 13:17); the same custom existed among the Moshibites who spoke of this town indiscriminately as Beth-baal-meon and Baal-meon (M S II, 9, 30); (3) abbreviation by the omission of the Divine name: thus the name of the idolater Micah, which means, "who is like Jeh?" (Jgs 17:14 [Heb]), was shortened to Micah, "who is like?" (vs 5,8), and similarly in the case of three other men, namely the prophet (Micah, Jer 26:18 ERV, and Mic, Mic 1:1), the Levite musician, with 11:25 and the father of Abdon (2 K 22:12 with 2 Ch 34:20).

The king of Judah, Yauhazai, as he was known to the Assyrians, i.e., Jehoahaz, "Jeh hath laid hold," is called simply Abdon. The king of Judah, Jeconiah, is called Joshua (2 K 23:31). The town of Jachin, "God doth cause to be built," was shortened to Jachin, "he doth cause to be built" (JOSH 15:11; see also 2 Mac 3:45). The name of Solomon, "the glory of God," was curtailed to Pol, "glory" (I K 2:21). Jehoiakim, "Jehovah is a name," was shortened to Kojh, or to Je (2 Ch 38:1 with 2 K 23:21) and Bamoath-baal, "high places of Baal," to Banzo (Josh 13:17 with Nu 21:19). Abergot, "high places," the name of a few other similar names, probably represent curtailment of this sort. The omission of the Divine name has parallels in Assyry and Bab lit.; thus Nebaioth and Nabu-shum-ukin respectively (Dinastical Tablet no. 2, col. iv. 4, 5, with Bab Chron., col. 13, 16).

(1) Abbreviation by the elision of the initial consonant, yet so that the remainder is a synonymous name of complete grammatical form. The name of King Hezekiah was written by the Hebrews both 'hezykijah, and 'hezykijah, and 'hezykijah, and 'hezykijah, and 'hezykijah, and 'hezykijah. Thus the name Hezekiah occurred many times in 2 Ch 29:33. Similarly, Jeconiah was shortened to Coniah, as has already been noticed; the name of the town Jekabzez, "God bringeth together," to Abah, another name, "hill of God together" (Neh 11:25 with Josh 15:21; 2 S 23:20); Meshelemiah, "Jeh is compensating," to Shelumleh, "Jeh's compensating" (1 Ch 26:12 with ver 14); Mshummah, "recompensed," to Shallom, "recompensed" (1 Ch 9:11; Neh 11:11 with 1 Ch 6:12; Ezr 7:2).

II. The Range of Proper Names.—(1) Not exclusively descriptive.—Simenon in his Onomasticon, published in 1741, and Gesenius in his 1. Personal Theaurus, issued during the years from 1835 to 1853, endeavored to interpret the proper names as though they were ordinarily intended to characterize the person who bore them. Embarrassed by the theory, Gesenius's Malechiel by "re Dei, i.e. a Deo conscriptus," and "the king of the bonds of stranger," and "the bonds of stranger" of the same species in Coniah. Parallel cases occur in Assyry and Bab lit., among which the same form is used: (1) Assur, Jehovah, and Zimma-sham-shum, exhibit both the transposition of constituent parts and an interchange of prepositions and participles. The twin forms like Abiner and Abner, Abishalom and Absalom, Elizaphan and Eliphasan, are not the full name and its abbreviation by 4. 22). Sometimes the name of the tribe or race to which a man belonged became his popular designation, as Cushi, "Cushite." All of these examples have been cited from the records of one period of Israel's history, the times of Samuel and David.

23). In leading to choice. The people in general gathered names for their children freely from all parts of this wide field, but in certain circles influences were at work which tended to restrict the choice to a smaller area. These influences were religious: (a) In the same of piety conscious nearness to God on the part of the parents naturally prompted them to bestow religious names upon their children. The name may be without distinct religious mark in its form and meaning, as Ephraim, "double fruitfulness," Manasseh, "making to forget," and yet have been given in acknowledgment of God's grace and be a constant reminder of His goodness (Gen 41.51,52); or the name may be religious in form, as Shemaiah, "Jeh hath heard," and publicly testify to the parents' gratitude to God. (b) The covenant relation, which Jeh entered into with Israel, made the name Jehovah, and that aspect of God's character which is denoted by this name, peculiarly precious to the people of God, and thenceforth the word Jehovah became a favorite element in the names of the Israelites, though not of course, to the exclusion of the great name El, "God." (c) Among the kings in the line of David, the consciousness of their formal adoption by Jehovah to be His vice-regents on the throne of Israel (2 Sm 7:14,22) found expression in the royal names that the God of Israel was acknowledged in the personal name Abijah, borne by the son and successor of Rehoboam. But his was an isolated case, unless the name Asa is an abbreviated form. But with Jerobeam, Abijah's grandson, this idea was in the 9th cent., the custom became established. Henceforth it was conventional for the king of Judah to have for his name a sentence with Jehovah as its subject. The only exceptions among the 16 successors of Asa on the throne were Manasseh and his son Amaziah, both of whom were notoriously apostate from Jehovah. The full name of Ahaz was Jehovah. Josiah's son Shallum as king was known as Jehovah; and his brother Eliakim, when placed on the throne by Jehovah, bore the name Jehovah. (d) Akin to the influence exerted by the relation of the kings to the God of Israel, and manifesting almost equal power contemporaneously with it, was the influence of official connection with the sanctuary, pious priests, or ecclesiastics, and it frequently led to the choice of an ecclesiastical name containing the word God or Jehovah. During the five centuries and a half, beginning near the close of Solomon's reign and extending to the end of Nehemiah's administration, 22 high priests held office, so far as their names have been preserved in the records. Of these pontiffs 17 bear names which are sentences with Jehovah as subject, and another is a sentence with El as subject. The materials for investigation in this last are not complete, as they are in the case of the kings, and ratios derived from them are apt to be erroneous; but evidently the priests of Jehovah's temple at Jerusalem not only recognized the appropriateness for themselves and their families of names possessing a general religious character, but came to favor such as expressly mentioned God, esp. those which mentioned God by His name of Jehovah.

(4). Popularity of names: hard to determine.—Until abundant data come to light for all periods of the Hebrew nation, it is not possible to determine the relative popularity of the various kinds and types of names in any one generation, or to compare period with period with respect to the use or neglect of a particular class of names. For, first, in no period are the names which have been transmitted by the Heb records many as compared with the thousands in use at the time; and, secondly, the records deal with the historical event which was conspicuous at the moment, and rarely mention persons other than the actors in this event.

At one time men and women from the middle class of society are associations themselves, and the personal names current in the families of farmers, shopkeepers, and soldiers obtained prominence whenever another time, when the activities of the court are of paramount importance, it is mainly names that were current in other circles that are recorded. In another period, when matters of the national worship engrossed the attention of the state, ecclesiastics as men from plious families, whose names were quite likely to have a religious meaning, receive mention. Very few names outside of the particular circle concerned are preserved in the records. It is unwarranted, therefore, to draw inferences regarding the relative use of particular names, secular names, for instance, at different periods of the history of Israel, by comparing the number of these names found in a record of political movements in the army with the number of similar names in the narrative of an episode which occurred at a later date and in which only priests took part. It is comparing things that differ. It is comparing the number of certain names current in many circles with the personal names among ecclesiastics, in order to learn whether these names were more common among the people as a whole in the one period than in that other.

The brine of its waters led the ancient Hebrews to call the Dead Sea the Salt Sea, Bethsaida, "house of mercy," received its name from the belief in the healing virtue of its waters; Lebanon, "white," from the height of the mountain; Tyre, from the great rock in the sea on which it was built; the valley of Elah, from the terebinth tree; Lus, from the almond tree; of these the acacia groves on the eastern terrace of the Jordan valley; Jericho, from the fragrance of its palms and balsams. The "crags of the wild goats" and En-gedi, "kidd spring" (I S 24:12), were in a desolate, rocky region where the wild goats had their home; Aijalon signifies "place of harts," and Etam denotes a "place of beasts and birds of prey." The hopes of a people and pride in their town were expressed in names like Joppa, "beauty," Tirzah, "pleasantness," Beth-el, "house of God," Zophim, "satisfaction," and Salem, "peace." The resemblance of the Sea of Galilee in shape to a harp secured for it its ancient name of Chinnereth. Poetic imagination saw in majestic Mt. Hermon likeness to a soldier's breastplate fitted for conflict. At the summit was called Serion and Senir. The sanctuary of a deity might give name to a town, hence Beth-dagon, Beth-shan, and Ashtaroth. Sometimes the name of a place commemorated a victory, as rock Oreb, rock Zeb, and Eben-ezer (Jgs 7:25; 1 S 7:12); or enshrined a religious transaction or experience, Beth-el and Berachah (Gen 28:17-19; 2 Ch 20:26); or told of a migration, as when colonists gave the name of their native town to their new settlement (Jgs 1:23-25). Names are not confined to the other famous inhabitant became attached to a town, and that for various reasons. It was often necessary to distinguish places of the same name from each other by this method; thus certain of the towns called Gilgal, Benjamin, came Gibeon Gilgal, and Gibeon, Gilpinus. The Jehovah stronghold captured by David was named by him the city of David, and was known by this name, as a quarter of Jerusalem, for many generations (2 S 5:9; 2 K 16:20). The practice was common among the names of the semites contemporaries of Israel, as is also the custom by Dur-sharrukin, "Sargonsburg," and Kish-shalmanasharadu, "Shalmaneser's fortress." A town might also be named after the tribe which inhabited it or after the ancestor of the tribe, as Dan (Jgs 18:29), and possibly under not a few geographical designations a tribal name is hidden, even when the fact has escaped recognition. There are several instances where in an inquiry after the origin of a geographical designation the first consideration is due to the names known to be ordinarily at work in giving rise to names of the same aspect as the one under scrutiny; and only when they fail to yield a suitable explanation are less obvious causes worthy of serious attention.

III. Characteristics of Biblical References.—As a rule, Sem words clearly reveal their origin and structure. The case of Samuel is, indeed, an exception. 1. Derivation of Names current in several significations. This is the case with the vale of békdr, mentioned in Ps 84 (Eng. 6), is open to two interpretations: namely, “valley of Baca,” so called from the balsam trees in it, and “valley of weeping,” as the VSS render the unusual form, regarding it as equivalent to a similar word meaning “weeping.” The pl. békdrm, “mulberry or balsam trees” (2 S 5 23, 24), was understood by Jos to denote a grove known by the name Weepers (Ant, VII, iv, 1; cf. LXX). In those rare cases where several derivations were possible, the Israelite may not always have known which was intended to be embodied in the name which he heard. But he discerned the alternative possibilities; and a parent, in bestowing a name ambiguous in its derivation, might be deliberately taking advantage of its power to be the vehicle for the transmission and expression of opposite thought (Gen 30 23-24; Joseph being derivable from both yṣeph and yṣaph).

That the object of the Bib. writer was not to make the known derivation of the proper names is clearly shown by the burden of the Hebrew text and the contentions of the name, e.g., derived from the Heb vb. ṣaph, and that the name “God doth hear,” yish-ma'ēl, signifies God doth hear, yishma'ēl. These derivations and meanings were plain. The purpose was to make men with which no allusion could be made to the name by the choice of the name. There are instances also where no part of the name reappears in the words that state the reason for the use of the name. For example, the name Maher-shalal-hash-baz is not explained by citing the words which compose it. One noun of the composite name appears, indeed, in the exposition of the meaning, but accidentally as it were, and without prominence or significance of position (Isa 8 3-4). Samuel is a notable example of this method. Hannah called his name Samuel, saying, “Because of Jehovah I asked him.” (1 S 1 20). Simonis, Ewald and Nestle derive the name from šīrhmā'ēl, “heard of God.” This etymology would fully satisfy the reason given for the mother’s choice of the name; but the suggested derivation is far-fetched, for it is not customary for a Heb word to lose the strong guttural w.” The guttural was not lost, but was distinctly heard, in Ishmael, where there is the same concurrence of sounds as in the name. On the other hand, suggested that Samuel is a contraction of šēm mā'ēl, “asked of God”; and Ewald asserts that this origin is the theme of the narrator (Lehrbuch der hebräischen Sprache, 275, n. 3). This is incredible. Such a contraction is “alien to the genius of the Heb language” (Driver, Text of Samuel, 13), and the absence of the root w in the midst of the name Samuel would of itself prevent the Semite from imagining such an etymology. The derivation and meaning of Samuel were not obscure. The type was common, and was especially signified by the formula, “asked of God” (Gen 32 30). Samuel means “name of God” (Gesenius). As Jacob, upon his return from Paddan-aram, in fulfillment of his vow erected an altar at Beth-el as a memorial of God’s bestowal of the promise and personal protection, he consecrated “The God of Beth-el” (Gen 35 1.3.7), so Hannah having by vow dedicated to Jehovah the son for whose birth she was praying, now that her prayer has been answered and the son given, calls him “The Lord has given.” The Bib. narrator states the motive which led the mother to choose the name Samuel for her child. In this explanation no part of the name is used. Moreover, the slight assent between šēm mā'ēl and šēm dērlī in 1 S 1 20 was unsought, for these words were not intended in the termination, wrote Rubeol: and later the Syr version have the name Kristēl, and the Scholiast’s version as Köbel and Köbbel. The late variations are reasonably explained as a softening of the pronunciation, which had come into vogue? in the Reboboth (Gen, 36 15). Without the etymology furnished by the literature, preference has been given to Reubel as the original form on the ground that “the only plausible explanation of the etymology,” given in Gen 32 32 “is that it is based on the form ro'ebel—ro'ē bēl (Skinner, Gen, 36). An exhibition of the etymology was needless, however, and was not the end which the writer had in view. His purpose was to establish not only the particular name upon the child; and in stating it he does so with all justice to the dear name, and in his choice of the name Reuben. The name signifies either “vision of a son” or “child of God,” yel ‘āḇ. In either case the emphatic word is “son.” As Hannah, pointed out, the son was her own, and her barrenness, besought God to look on her affliction and give her that which would be a crown of beauty, and be the grace of God, yel ‘āḇ, yel ‘āḇ. A male child was to be her a proof of God’s regard for her many, and a guaranty of the future love of her husband for her. Moreover, the name kept the thought constantly before the mind of her husband. Gesenius remarks that Hebrew means properly, “Spoken of” but the sacred writer in Gen 32 explains it as ro’ē bēl (staph qām) bēl, “provided in my affliction” (Leritzon, Thesaurus). This is a serious criticism of etymology may be regarded as the reduction ad absurdum of the hypothesis that the Hebr writers intended to give the derivation of the proper names. The result of endeavoring to force the etymology into an intentional etymology compels the abandonment of the idea that the Heb writer misunderstood one of the simplest phrases of his own language and proposed a construction impossible to himself and utterly foreign to the principles which underlie Heb speech.

Allusions to proper names are made for the purpose of stating the reason for the bestowal of the name, of pointing out a coincidence. 3. Allusions between the name and the character linked with it. His experience of its bearer, or of attaching prophecy to a name. An allusion to link the allusion with the name by employing the root that underlies the name, or a cognate root, or some other word that resembles the name in sound: (1) Statement of the reason for the choice of the name: In the case of Simeon, the root of the name is used (Gen 29 33). Words of this type are related to Romance form nouns and vb.s, and have the force of adjs, diminutives, or abstract nouns, and are sometimes used as concrete nouns (Stade, Lehrbuch der hebräischen Grammatik, § 296). The Israelite at once recognized a form corresponding to the root of the name Simeon, which was a favorite with the Hebrews, and he knew that it could express the abstract idea of hearing. In Gen 29 33 the narrator is not seeking to impart etymological information; but it is clear that the name the root of the name in the form is of an abstract noun meaning “laughing,” or a concrete noun, “laughing one,” or a vb. in the imperfect, “he laughs” or "one who laughs." (cf. Simeon, transl in RE, § 259a). Whichever specific meaning may have been in the mind of Abraham when he gave the name to his son, yet by reason of its ever speaking of laughter the name was a constant reminder to the parents of the laughter of belief with which they had listened to the promise of his birth (Gen 17 17; 18 12). But in due time the child of promise has been born. His name, as determined upon, is Isaac. This Sarah knows (17 19; 21 3). Accordingly, the theme with which she greets his advent is laid in her mouth. She plays upon the name Isaac, using the root of the word in various forms, first as a noun and then as a vb., and giving to the vb. a new subject and to the thought a new turn. Instead of the laughter, unsincere, with which the promise was voiced, "gu'dah, he says, 'hath prepared for me laughter [of joy], everyone that heareth [of the event] will laugh [with joy] for me' (21 6; cf Ps 136 2). (2) The indication of a coincidence between the character or experience of a person and his name: Now returning to her home bereaved and in poverty, saw the contrast between her present condition and her name; and she played upon her name by using a word of opposite meaning, saying: 'Call me not Pleasant, call me Sorrow; for the Lord hath made me very bitter with me' (Ruth 1 20). In whatever sense Nabal's name may have been bestowed upon him originally, at any rate his wife saw the correspondence between his name in its ordinary meaning and his conduct toward David, and she played upon it, saying: 'Fool is his name, and folly is with him' (1 S 25 25). Likewise the agreement between Jacob's character and a meaning that his name has in Heb was seen, and called forth the bitter word-play: 'Is he not rightly named? He is the father of strife, and the root of strife these two times' (Gen 27 36). Isaac, so far as the formation is concerned, may be an abstract noun meaning "laughing," or a concrete noun, "laughing one," or a vb. in the imperfect, "he laughs" or "one who laughs." (cf. Simeon transl in RE, § 259a). Whichever specific meaning may have been in the mind of Abraham when he gave the name to his son, yet by reason of its ever speaking of laughter the name was a constant reminder to the parents of the laughter of belief with which they had listened to the promise of his birth (Gen 17 17; 18 12). But in due time the child of promise has been born. His name, as determined upon, is Isaac. This Sarah knows (17 19; 21 3). Accordingly, the theme with which she greets his advent is laid in her mouth. She plays upon the name Isaac, using the root of the word in various forms, first as a noun and then as a vb., and giving to the vb. a new subject and to the thought a new turn. Instead of the laughter, unsincere, with which the promise was voiced, "gu'dah, he says, 'hath prepared for me laughter [of joy], everyone that heareth [of the event] will laugh [with joy] for me' (21 6; cf Ps 136 2).
undieded," and probably represented originally the productive powers of Nature (genetrix), and as such was the companion of the sun-god. She was identified with Ishtar in Assyria and Ashoreth in Phoenicia by the Greeks as Aphrodite (Clem. Alex. Protr., 19), but sometimes as Artemis the huntress (Paus. iii. 16.8; Plut. Artax. xxvii). Strabo (xv. 733) identifies her with Anatiss (=Anahita), the Asian Artemis. She was the Venus, but sometimes the Diana, of the Romans. There are many variants of the name: Anaca (Strabo xvi. 738), Anetias (Plut. Artax. xxviii), Tanais (Clem. Alex. loc. cit.), also Tanath, sometimes in Phoen inscriptions, Tanata, Anta (Egypt). In 2 Macc 1 13 ff, a fictitious account is given of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, in a temple of Nanaea in Persia, by the treachery of Nanaea’s priests. The public treasury was often placed in Nanaea’s temple; this, Epiphanes was anxious to secure under the pretext of marrying the goddess and receiving the money as a dowry. The priests threw down her reat so she “like thunderbolts” from above, killed the king and his suite and then cut off their heads. But 1 Macc 6 1 ff, which is more reliable, gives a different account of the death of Epiphanes after an attempt to rob a rich temple in Elymais (Strabo xvi. 1.18; Diod. Sic. 573; Justin, xxxii.2). The temple of Nanaea referred to in 2 Macc 1 13 ff may be identified with that of Artemis (Polyb. xxxi.11; Jos. Ant. XII, ix, 1) or Aphrodite (Appian, Syr. 66; Rawlinson, Specker’s Comm.). S. ANOUS

NAOMI, נָוָם, נָוָם, נָוָם (nā‘ām, no‘ām), probably = “pleasantness”; LXX B, Ναομή, Nōōmēn, A, Ναομή[i], Νοομή[n]: Wife of Elimelech and mother-in-law of Ruth (Ruth 1 2–4 17). She went with her husband to the land of Moab, and after his death returned to Bethlehem. When greeted on her return, she told the women of the town to call her, not no‘āmī (“pleasantness”), but mārah (“bitterness”), “for,” she said, “the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me.” She advised Ruth in her dealings with Boaz, and helped her to nurse their child. The name may mean “my joy,” “my bliss,” but is perhaps better explained according to the traditional interpretation as “the pleasant one.”

NAPHTALI, נָפַתָלי (naph‘ālī, naphtālī; Naphthali; Naph’tah, Naphtali): A son of Ishmael (Gen 25 15; 1 Ch 1 31). Naphish, along with other Hagarite clans, was overwhelmingly defeated by the Israelitish tribes on the E. of the Jordan (1 Ch 6 19, AV “Naphish”). Their descendants are mentioned among the Nethinim by the name “Naphishim,” AV and RV “Nephshim” (Ezr 2 50); “Nepheshim,” AV and RV “Nepheshim” ( Neh 7 52); “Naphish” (1 Esd 5 31).

I. The Patriarch.—The 5th son of Jacob, and the 2d born to him by Rachel’s handmaid, Bilhah. He was full brother of Dan (Gen 30 1). Name 7 of the sons.

At his birth Rachel is said to have exclaimed, naphţālī elōkim naphthālī, “wrestlings of God”—i.e. “mighty wrestlings”—“have I wrestled.” Her sister’s fruitfulness was a sure trial to the barren Rachel. The name is sometimes of her artifice she had obtained children, the offspring of her maid nursing as her own; and thus her reproach of childlessness was removed. The name N. given to this son was a monument of her victory. She herself had won the blessing and blessing of God as made manifest in the way yearned for by the oriental heart, the birth of sons.

Personal details regarding the patriarch N. are entirely wanting in Scripture; and the traditions have not much to say about him.

II. Tribe of Naphthali.—When the first census was taken in the wilderness, the tribe numbered 53,400 fighting men (Nu 1 43; 2 30).

1. Relative At the second census, the numbers had shrunk to 45,400 (Nu 26 48 ff); See NRMX.

II. Tribe of Naphthali in the desert was on the N. of the tabernacle with the standard of the camp of Dan, along with the tribe of Asher (Nu 2 25 ff). The standard, according to Tg Pseudojon, was a serpent, or basilisk, with the legend, “Return of Jehovah to the many thousands of Israel” (Tg Pseudojon on Nu 2 25). When the host was on the march, this camp came in the rear (Nu 2 31). The prince of the tribe at Sinai was Ahira ben Enan (2 29).

Among the spies the tribe was represented by Nahbi ben Vophsi (13 14). Prince Pedahel ben Annihud was chosen from N. to assist in the division of the land (34 28). Toward the end of David’s reign the ruler of the tribe was Jeremoth ben Azriel (1 Ch 27 19). Hiram the Tyrian artificer is described as “the son of a widow of the tribe of N.” (1 K 7 14). But in 2 Ch 2 14 he is called “the son of a woman of the daughters of Dan.” Jgs 6 15 does not definitely associate Barak with the tribe of Issachar; his residence was at Kedesh (Jgs 4 6); it is therefore possible that he belonged to the tribe of N.

In the allocation of the land, the lot of N. was the last but one to be drawn (Josh 19 32–39). The 3rd boundaries are stated with great fulness. While it is yet impossible to in Palestine trace them with certainty, the identification of sites in recent years, for which we are mainly indebted to the late Col. Conder, makes possible an approximation. The territory was bounded on the E. by the Sea of Galilee and the upper reaches of the Jordan. Jos makes it extend to Damascus (Ant, V, i, 22); but there is nothing to support this. The southern boundary probably ran from the point where Wady el-Birch enters the Jordan, westward along the northern side of the valley to Mt. Tabor. The western border may have gone up by way of Hamath (Ziddim) and Yaḥbāk (Hukkok) to Kefr 'Anān (Hamathon), bending there to the W., including the land of er-Rameh (Ramah) until it reached the territory of Asher. Running northward again until nearly opposite Tyre, it bent eastward, and once more northward to the Litāny (Leontes), taking in the larger part of what is called by the Arabs Belad Beḥṣarāh and Belad es-Shaḵīf. Nineteen cities in N. are named in Josh 19: 22 ff. Among them was the famous city of refuge, Kedeš-naph茶tālī (q.v.), on the heights to the W. of the Waters of Merom, where extensive ruins are still to be seen (20 7). It, along with Hammoth-šor and Kartan, was assigned to the Gershonite Levites (21: 23; 1 Ch 6: 76).

The land lying around the springs of the Jordan was included in the lot of N. It is clear that from this part, as well as from the cities named in Jgs 1 33, N. did not drive out the Canaanites. These the Danites found in possession at the time of their raid. There is no indication that N. resented in any way this encroachment of their kindred tribe into their territory (Jgs 18).

The district thus indicated includes much excellent land, both pastoral and arable. There are the broad, rich terraces that rise away to the N. and N.W. of the Sea of Galilee, the mountains immediately N. of the sea are rocky and barren; but when this tract is passed, we enter the lofty and spacious lands of upper Galilee, which from time immemorial have been the joy of the peasant farmer. Great breadths there are which in season yield golden harvests. The richly diversified scenery, mountain, hill and valley, is marked by a finer growth of trees than is common in Pal. The terebinth and pine, the olive, mulberry, apricot, fig, pomegranate, orange, lemon and vine are cultivated, to good purpose, as the soil is comparatively plentiful, supplied by many copious springs. It was one of the districts from which Solomon drew provisions, the officer in charge being the king’s son-in-law, Ahimaz (1 K 4: 15).

The free life of these spacious uplands, which yielded so liberally to the touch of the hand of industry, developed a robust manhood and a wholesome spirit of independence among its inhabitants. According to Jos, who knew them well (Jud, III, iii, 2), the country never lacked multitudes of men of courage ready to give a good account of themselves on all occasions of war. Its history, as far as we know it, afforded ample opportunities for the development of warlike qualities. In the struggle with Sisera, N. was found on the high places of the field (Jgs 5: 18). To David’s forces at Hebron, N. contributed a thousand captives “and with them with shield and spear thirty and seven thousand” (1 Ch 12: 34). Their position exposed them to the first brunt of attack by enemies from the N.; and in the wars of the kings they bore an important part (1 K 15: 20; 2 K 12: 18; 13: 22); and they were the first on the W. of the Jordan to be carried away captive (2 K 15: 29). See GALEL.

The largest town in Mt. Naphthal today is Safed, on the heights due N. of the Sea of Galilee, often spoken of as the “city set on a hill.” It is built in the form of a horsehoe, open to the N., round the Castle Hill, on which are the ruins of the old fortress of the Templars. This is a position of great strength, which could hardly fail 5. Sites and to be occupied in ancient times.

Wādī Leimān, rises Jebel Jerimūk, the highest mountain in Pal proper (c. 4,000 ft.) which may be the scene of the Transfiguration (q.v.). The inhabitants of Safed were massacred by Sultan Bihara in 1296. The city suffered severely from earthquake in 1759; and it shared with Tiberias, also a city of N., the disaster wrought by the earthquake of 1857. It is one of the holy cities of the Jews.

In the land of N. Jesus spent a great part of his public life, the land of Jesus Gennesaret, Bethsaida, Capernaum and Chorazin all lying within its boundaries (cf Mt 4: 15).

NAPHTALI MOUNT (נהפּתָלִי, har naphatālī; ἱπ η το ν εφαλαί, en το orei tο naphthalai): This was the most northerly of the three divisions of the Western Range, which derived their names from those of the tribes holding chief sway over them—Mt. Judah, Mt. Ephraim, and Mt. Naphthali (Josh 20: 7 AV, RV replaces “Mount” by “the hill country of”).

NAPHTHAR, naṭṭār (AV): RV “Nephthar.”

NAPHTH CIM, naf-ṭhim (נהפּתּוּ ה, naphthūhim; LXX Ναπτηθον, Naphthethon): A son of Miriam (Gen 10: 13; 1 Ch 1: 11); but, according to most modern authorities, a district or a dependency of Egypt. Among the many efforts at identification the following deserve notice: Naphthūhim = (1) Nēphēthu (Nēpēthu, Nēphēthu) in the N.E. of Egypt; (2) Na-phath, i.e., the people of Phath, the dwellers in the neighborhood of Memphis; (3) Nithu (according to Herodotus, Nāthā, Nāthō), which occurs in Assurbanipal’s Annals as the name of a part of Lower Egypt; (4) Erman (ZATW, X, 118), by the change of a letter, reads Petimuth, which signifies “The Northland”; (5) Spiegelberg sees in the word an old designation of the Delta, and would therefore render the name, “the people of the Delta” (cf Johns, HDB; Skinner and Holzinger on Gen).

NAPKIN, nap’kin (ῥωμαῖον, rhōmaion; Lat sudarium): In Lk 19: 20, the cloth in which the “unprofitable servant” wrapped the money of his lord; cf Jn 11: 44; 20: 7; see Dress, 7; Hand-kerchief.

Narcissus

THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

NARCISSUS, nār-sis'us (Na·kri̇sōs, Narcissus): In Rom 15 11 St. Paul sends greetings to “them of the household of Narcissus, that are in the Lord.” “The last words may suggest that, though only the Christians in this household have a greeting sent to them, there were other members of it with whom he had relations?” (Dean.)

Narcissus is a common name, esp. among freedmen and slaves. But, as in the case of Aristobulus, some famous person of this name must be meant. Conybeare and Howson mention two, one the well-known favorite of Claudius, the other a favorite of Nero. The latter was put to death by Galba (Dio Cass. lxxiv.3), they think to be the Narcissus meant here (St. Paul, ch xix). On the other hand, Bishop Lightfoot (Phil., 175) holds that “the powerful freedman Narcissus, whose wealth was proverbial (Juv. Sat. xiv.329), whose influence with Claudius was unbounded, and who bore a chief part in the intrigues of this reign, alone satisfies this condition.” Shortly after the accession of Nero, he had been put to death by Agrippina (Tac. Ann. xiv.41, 39, Dio Cass. lxxv.4) in 64 A.D. As this occurred three or four years before the Ep. to the Rom was written, some think another Narcissus is meant. However, as usual in such cases, his property would be confiscated, and his slaves, becoming the property of the emperor, would swell “Caesars’ household” as Narcissus.

NASBAS, nas'bas (Na·bas, Nasbas, Nαβας, Nαβαδ, Nabəd, read by Fritzsche): A name otherwise unknown. It occurs only in Tob 11 18, “And Achicharach, and Nasbas his brother’s son,” came to Tobit’s wedding. Opinions are divided as to whether he was “brother’s son” of Tobit or Achicharach. AV reads the suggestion of Junius, “Achicharach who is also called Nasbas,” thus identifying Nasbas with Achicharach, which might gain support from 1 22 where Achicharach is mentioned as “brother’s son” of Tobit. See ACHICHARACH; AMAN. Nasbas is a person with whom Josephus identically identifies Nasbas, also as 2 12 where Achicharach is mentioned as “brother’s son” of Tobit. See ACHICHARACH; AMAN. The Itala gives “Nabal avunculus [‘maternal uncle’] Illus; the Vulg “Nabal consobrin [‘cousin’] Tobiae; Syr “Laban has no brothers” and this person is possibly identical with the “Aman of Tob 1 10 (see variety of readings under AMAN) and the nephew in Harris’ Story of Ahikar and His Nephew.

NASI, na'si (B. Nasi, Nasi, Nασί, Naśi(: AV Nasit): The head of one of the families which went up with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 32) = “Neziah” of Ezr 2 54; Neh 7 56.

NASOR, nās'or. See HAZOR.

NATHAN, nāthan (נתָּハン, nōthān, “gift”; Naḥōn, Naḥən, Naḥān): A court prophet in David’s reign and a supporter of Solomon at his accession. There are three main incidents in his career as depicted in the OT.

The two | narratives, 2 S 7 1-17 = 1 Ch 17 1-15, of which the former is the original, relate how David confided to Nathan his intention to build a house for Jeh’s ark and Temple-Plans

1. Nathan and David’s Nathan at first blesses the project, but that same night is given a Divine message, and returns to tell the king that instead of David building a house for Jeh, Jeh will build a house for David: “I will set up thy seed after thee, . . . and I will establish his kingdom. . . . I will be his father, and he shall be my son: if he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men” (2 S 7 12-14). Ver 13 says that “He shall build a house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever,” but this disturbs the one great thought of the passage, which is that God will build a house for David, and which is also the thought in David’s prayer (vs 18-29).

The word “seed” in vs 12 is collective and so throughout the passage, so that the prophecy does not refer to one individual, but, like Dt 17 18, belongs to the group of generic prophecies. Nor is it Messianic, for ver 14 could not be reconciled with the messianic expectations of the general setting of the ever-merciful providence of God in dealing with David’s family. See, however, W. A. Briggs, Messianic Prophecy, p. 126.) Buddha, who says that the section belongs to the 7th cent. and is certainly prehistoric in the prophetic speech of the idealism of Amos and Hosea, for the prophet teaches that Jeh dwells, not in “a holy place made with hands” (Re 9 11, 34), but rather in the life of the nation as represented by the direct succession of Davids kings. This presents an extension of the teaching of Paul that the very body itself is a sanctuary unto God (1 Cor 6 19).

2 S 12 1-25 narrates Nathan’s rebuke of David for his adultery, and for causing the death of Bathsheba’s child; and David’s va 1-15a, we have Nathan’s parable of Sin of the rich man and the poor man’s ewe lamb, and the application of it to David’s conduct. But several difficulties arise when we ask exactly what Nathan’s message to David was: va 13 f represent the prophet as saying that God has forgiven David but that the child will die, while vs 10-12 speak of a heavy punishment that is to come upon David and his family, and ver 16 does not show any indication of a prophecy as to the child’s death. Commentators regard vs 1-15a as later in origin than chap. 11, 12 in the main, and hold vs 10-12 to be still later than the rest of chap 11-15b, but regards even the rest of the story as interrupting the connection between 11 27b and 12 15b, and therefore of later date.

1 K 1 is a part of “one of the best pieces of Heb narrative in the possession” (H. F. Smith, OT Hist, 153, n. 2). It narrates the part that

3. Nathan Nathan played in the events that led to Solomon’s accession. David was getting old and feeble, and the succession of Adonijah had not been settled. When Adonijah, who was probably thinking of his son living, gave a banquet to some of his father’s state officials, Nathan, who was one of those that had not been invited, inquired Bathsheba, Solomon’s mother, to remind David of his promise to her that Solomon should succeed to the throne. This she did, and in the middle of her audience with David, Nathan appears with the news of Adonijah’s feast and proclamation as king. Solomon is then appointed king by David’s command, Nathan being one of his chief supporters. It has been argued that it is only Nathan who interprets Adonijah’s feast as a claim to the throne, but this contradicts ver 5. Yet, whereas in the two sections treated above Nathan is the prophet of Jeh, he is represented in 1 K as an intriguing court politician, planning very cleverly an opportune entrance into David’s presence at the very time that Bathsheba has an audience with the king. The | narrative of 1 Ch 29 makes no mention of Nathan, Solomon being there represented as Divinely elected to succeed David.

1 K 4 5 mentions a Nathan as father of Azariah and Zahad, two of the chief officers of Solomon. He is probably the same.

1 Ch 29 20; 2 Ch 9 29 refer to “the words” or rather “the acts of Nathan the prophet” as well as those of Samuel and Gad. “There can be no doubt that these are not references to the narrative Jesus which Samuel, Nathan and Gad are mentioned in our Books of Samuel” (Curris on 1 Ch 29:29). In 2 Ch 29:29, however, a single-machine being commanded by God through Nathan and Gad. Curtis observes that Nathan and Gad is always called nabbî ("prophet") in S and K and not râ'eh or bâchez, "seer."

NATHAN:
(1) A prophet (2 S 7; Ps 61, title). See preceding article.
(2) A son of King David (2 S 5 14; 1 Ch 3 5; 1 Ch 11:2).
(3) Father of Igael, one of David’s heroes (2 S 23 36). In 1 Ch 11 38, we have “Joel the brother of Nathan;” LXX B has “son” in this ver, but it is impossible to say whether Igael or Joel is the correct name.
(4) A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 3 36), whose son is called Zabad, whom some suppose to be the same as Zabud (1 K 4 5). On this view Nathan is the same as the prophet (see 1,above).
(5) A companion of Ezra from Babylon (Ezr 8 10 and 1 Esd 8 44).
(6) Nathans (1 Esd 9 34), one of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 39).
(7) Name of a family (Zec 12 12).

NATHANIEL (ΝΑΣΟΥ, nathan’el, “God has given”): Nathânâ`l, Nathanael: Nathanael, who was probably a fisherman, belonged to Cana in Galilee (Jn 21 2). According to the “Genealogies of the Twelve Apostles” (cf Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 50), N. was the same as Simon, the son of Cleopas, and was one of the Twelve. He was among those who met and conversed with Jesus during the preaching of John the Baptist at Bethany beyond Jordan (Jn 1 29). From the account of his conversation extended by him by Philip (Jn 1 45), it is evident that N. was well versed in ancient Scripture, and that in him also the preaching of John had aroused a certain expectancy. His reply to Philip, “Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?” (Jn 1 46), was prompted, not by any ill-repute of the place, but by its petty insincer-ificance and familiarity in N.’s eyes. To this question Philip made no direct answer, but replied, “Come and see.” It was the answer best fitted to the man and the occasion; it appealed to N.’s fair-mindedness and sincerity of purpose. He responded nobly to the call, and on approaching Jesus was received with the words: “Beloved, an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile” (Jn 1 47). It was a tribute to that singleness of heart which enabled him to overcome his initial prejudice. The same candor and openness distinguished the after-interview of N. with Jesus, as is evident by his question, “Whence knowest thou me?” (Jn 1 48). The reply of Jesus was addressed to the time he had spent under the fig tree, kneeling, no doubt, in silent prayer and communion with God, and brought to mind all the sacred hopes and aspirations of that hour. It taught him that here was One who read on the instant the innermost secrets of his heart, and was Himself the ideal for whom he was seeking; and it drew from him the confession, “Rabbi, thou art the Son of God; thou art King of Israel” (Jn 1 49).

Although N. is mentioned by name only once again in the NT [he is one of the seven who witnessed the appearance of the risen Jesus (Jn 20 21)], it is evident that the connection and companionship of N. with Jesus must be seen as closer than those two incidents would lead us to suppose. Accordingly, attempts have been made to identify him with other NT characters, the most commonly accepted being Bartholomew (of Bartholomew). The principal arguments in support of this identification are: (1) N. is never mentioned by the synoptists, and Bartholomew is never mentioned by John, who further implies that N. was one of the twelve disciples (24 30, 26 24); (2) in the Synoptists, Philip is closely connected with Bartholomew (events of the apostles), and in John with N. (of Jn 1 45 f); (3) the fact that most of the other apostles bear two names. Arguments are also adduced to identify him with Simon the Cananese (of Stox). N. has also been identified with Matthew the tax-gatherer (based on the similarity of its name) and Simon the Zealote, with Stephen, and even with Paul.

NATIONAL FEATURES, ἑαυτῷ. As has been pointed out by various authors (cf Ἡγίλ), the principal physical features of Pal run in N. and S. lines, or rather about from S.S.W. to N.N.E.

The lowland or Shephelah (AV "vale, valley, plain, or low country") includes the maritime plain and the western foothills.

The hill country consists of the mountains of Judaea, and its features are continued northward to the plain of Esdraelon and southward to the Sinaite peninsula. It is rocky and has very little water. Except for the few fountains, the scanty population depends upon rain water collected during the winter months.

The Arabah (RV) includes the Jordan valley from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea, as well as the depression running from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Akaba. It is to the latter depression that the name Wādī-ut'Arabah is now applied by the Arabs. It is bounded on the E. by Mt. Seir or Edom, and on the W. by the mountains of the Sinaite peninsula. Its highest point, about half-way between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akaba, is a few hundred ft. higher than the level of the Mediterranean, but nearly 2,000 ft. above the level of the Dead Sea. From this point the valley slopes southward to the Gulf of Akaba, and northward to the Dead Sea. The lower Jordan valley slopes from about 600 ft. below ocean-level at the Sea of Galilee to about 1,300 ft. below ocean-level at the Dead Sea.

To the E. are the highlands of Gilead and Moab rising abruptly from the valley, as does the hill country of Judaea on the W. The country to the level of the table-land. The small annual rainfall on the heights near the Ghaur diminishes eastward, and the desert begins within from 20 to 40 miles.

Another term much used by OT writers is South or Négéb, which embraces the southernmost portion of the promised land, and was never effectively occupied by the Israelites. Its uttermost boundary was the "river of Egypt" (al-'Arish), and coincides roughly with the present boundary between the Ottoman territory on the E. and the Anglo-Egypt territory of Sinai on the W.

The term slopes, ḥāshāhā, AV "springs," occurs in Josh 10 40, "so Joshua smote all the land, the hill-country . . . and the lowland, and the slopes, and all their kings"; and again in Josh 12 7, 8. "And Joshua gave it . . . for a possession according to their divisions; in the hill-country, and in the lowland, and in the Arabah, and in the slopes, and in the wilderness, and in the South." In the former passage, it seems to refer to the foothills which form the eastern or higher part of the lowland or Shephelah. In the latter passage, it might mean the same, or it might mean the descent from the Judaean hills to the Ghaur. In Dt 4 17, 4: 40; Josh 12 3, 12 20, we have "the slopes of Pīqah" (ḥāshāhā- kā-pīqāh, "springs of Pīqah"), which denotes the descent from the heights of Moab to the Ghaur. The same word occurs in the sing. in Nu 21 15, referring to the descent to the Arnon. "Slopes," therefore, does not seem to be a term applied to any particular region.

The wilderness is usually the desert of the wandering, including the central part of the Sinaite peninsula, but it is by no means always used in this sense, e.g. Josh 15 20, 24, where it clearly refers to a region near Ai. "The wilderness" of Mt 4 1 is thought to be the barren portion of Judæa between the Arnon and the Jordan. See CHAMPAIGN; COUNTRY; DESERT; EAST; HILL; LOWLAND; SOUTH.

replaced by “body.” There remain two passages of RV where "naveel" is retained as the tr of ṣhor. Thus we find it used, ṣhor pro toto, for the whole being: “It [the form of] Jesus was full of grace and of theavour to thy navel, and marrow to thy bones” (Prov 3 8). The uttermost neglect which a new-born babe can experience is expressed by Ezekeil: “In the day thou wast born thy navel [i.e. umbilical cord] was not cut, neither wast thou washed in water to cleanse thee; thou wast not salted at all, nor swaddled at all” (Ezek 16 4).

NAZAREN, nāz-a-rēn', nāz'a-rēn (Naẓarēnēs, Nazarēnēs; Naẓorāiōs in Mt, Jn, Acts and Lk): A derivative of Nazareth, the birthplace of Christ. In the NT it has a double meaning: it may be friendly and it may be inimical.

On the lips of Christ's friends and followers, it is an honorable name. Thus Matthew sees in it a fulliment of the old Israelite prophecy (Isa 11 1 [Heb]): “That it might be permissible Title in颏ted which was spoken through the prophets, that he should be called a Nazarene” (Mt 2 23). According to an overwhelming array of testimony (see Meyer, Comm., in loc.), the name Nazareth is derived from the same root, meaning "nipple" or the navel; the term is a term of endearment. We have here undoubtedly to do with a permissible accommodation.

It is not quite certain that Matthew did not intend, by the use of this word, to refer to the picture of the Messiah in Isa 11, on account of the low estimate in which this place was held (Jn 1 46). Nor is it permissible, has been done by Tertullian and Jerome, to substitute the word "Nazarite" for "Nazarene," which in every view of the case is contrary to the patent facts of the life and Saviour.

Says Meyer, “In giving this prophetic title to the Messiah he entirely disregards the historical meaning of the same (LXX Isa 11 1, ἄνθρωπος), keeps by the relationship of the name Nazarene to the word nāsār, and recognizes by virtue of the same, in that prophetic Messianic name ἄνθρωπος, the typical reference to this—that Jesus through His settlement in Nazareth was to become a ‘Naẓorāiōs, a ‘Nazaerene,'” This name clung to Jesus throughout His entire life. It became His name among the masses: “The Nazarene” (Acts 10 47; Jn 1 46; 24 19). Perhaps Matthew, who wrote after the event, may have been influenced in his application of the Isian prophecy by the very fact that Jesus was popularly thus known. Even in the realm of spirit He was known by this appellation. Evil spirits knew and feared Him, under this name (Mk 1 24; Lk 4 34), and the angels of the resurrection morning called Him thus (Mk 16 6), while Jesus applied the title to Himself (Acts 22 8). In the light of these facts we do not wonder that the disciples, in their later lives and work, persistently used it (Acts 2 22; 3 6; 10 38).

If His friends knew Him by this name, much more His enemies, and to them it was a title of scorn and derision. Their whole attidude was compressed in that one word of Nathanael, by which He voiced his doubt, “Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?” (Jn 1 46). In the name "Nazarene," the Jews, who opposed and rejected Christ, poured out all the vials of their antagonism, and the word became a Jewish heritage of bitterness. It is hard to tell whether the appellation, on the lips of evil spirits, signifies dread or hatred (Mk 1 24; Lk 4 34). With the gatekeepers of the house of the high priest is cleaved up the adulterated scorn (Mt 26 71; Mk 14 67). Even in His death the bitter hatred of the priests caused this name to accompany Jesus, for it was at their dictation written above His cross by Pilate (Jn 19 19). The entire Christian community was called by the leader of the Nazoraeans; this, however, is based upon a tempt of the Nazoraeans” (Acts 24 5). If, on the one hand, therefore, the name stands for devotion and love, it is equally certain that on the other side it represented the bitter and undying hatred of His enemies.

NAZARETH, nā-zā-reth (Naṭaprē, Nazārtē, Naẓazōth, Nazārēth, and other forms): A town in Galilee, the home of Joseph and the

1. Notice Virgin Mary, and for about 30 years

Confined to the scene of the Saviour's life (Mt 2 the NT 23; Mk 1 9; Lk 2 39:51; 1 16, etc.). He was therefore called Jesus of Nazareth, although His birthplace was Bethlehem; and those who became His disciples were known as Nazoraeans. This is the name, with slight modification, used to this day by Moelmeans for Christians, Naṣarrā— the sing. being Naṣārīn.

The town is not named in the OT, although the presence of a spring and the convenience of the site make it probable that there was a town in old times. Quaresimius learned that the ancient name was Medina Abiat, in which we may recognize the Arab. el-Medina el-batshah, "the white city." Built of the white stone supplied by the limestone rock around, the description is quite accurate. There is a reference in Mish (Mn'a-hāth, viii.6) to the "white house of the hill" whence wine for the drink offering was brought. An elegy for the 9th of Ab speaks of a "course of priests settled in Nazareth of the Jewish people at Jerus, the ancient midhirsch now lost (Neubauer, Gloege. du Tulm, 82, 85, 190; Delitzsch, Ein Tag in Capernaum, 142). But all this leaves us still in a state of uncertainty.

The ancient town is represented by the modern en-Nāṣīrā, which is built mainly on the western and northwestern slopes of a hollow among the lower hills of Galilee, just before they sink into the plain of Esdraelon. It lies about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Mediterranean at Haifa. The road to the plain and the coast goes over the southwest lip of the hollow; that to Tiberias and Damascus goes on the heights to the N. The W. gorge breaks down southward, issuing on the plain between two craggy hills. That to the W. is the traditional Hill of Precipitation (Lk 4 29). This, however, is too far from the city and must have been in the days of Christ. It is probable that the present town occupies pretty nearly the ancient site; and the scene of that attempt on Jesus' life may have been the cliff, many feet in height, not far from the old synagogue, traces of which are still seen in the western part of town. Thus they tell us, he town was built under the Greek Orthodox church at the foot of the hill on the N. The water is led in a conduit to the fountain, whither the women and their children go as in old times, to carry home in their jars supplies for domestic use. There is also a tiny spring in the face of the western hill. To the N.W. rises the height on which stands the sanctuary, now in ruins, of Neby Sa'in. From this point a most beautiful and extensive view is obtained, ranging on a clear day from the Mediterranean, the W. to the Mountain of Bashan on the E.; from Upper Galilee and Mt. Hermon on the N., to the uplands of Gilead and Samaria on the S. The whole extent of Esdraelon is seen, that great battle- field, associated with many historic events in Israel's history, from Carmel and Megiddo to Tabor and Mt. Gilboa.

There are now some 7,000 inhabitants, mainly Christian, of whom the Greek Orthodox church claims about 3,000. Moslem number about 1,600. There are no Jews. It is much the chief market town for the pastoral and agricultural district that lies around it.

In Nazareth, Jesus preached His first recorded sermon (Lk 4:16 ff.), when His plainness of speech aroused the homicidal fury of His hearers. "He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief." (Mt 13:58.) Finding no rest or security in Nazareth, He made His home in Capernaum. The reproach implied in Nathanael's question, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (Jn 1:46), has led to much speculation.

By ingenious emendation of the text Cheyne would read, "Can the Holy One proceed from Nazareth?" (Eh, a.v.). Perhaps, however, we should see no more in this than the acquiescence of Nathanael's humble spirit in the lowly estimate of his native province entertained by the leaders of his people in Judaea.

Christians are said to have first settled here in the time of Constantine (Ephiphanus), whose mother Helena built the Church of the Annunciation. In crusading times it was the seat of the bishop of Bethsean. It passed into Moslem hands after the disaster to the Crusaders at Hattin (1183). It was destroyed by Sultan Bibras in 1263. In 1620 the Franciscans rebuilt the Church of the Annunciation, and the town rose again from its ruins. Here in 1799 the French general Junot was assailed by the Turks. After his brilliant victory over the Turks at Tabor, Napoleon visited Nazareth. The place suffered some damage in the earthquake of 1857.

Protestant Missions are now represented in Nazareth by agents of the Church Missionary Society, and of the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society.

NAZIRITE, nāzi-rit (ναζήρ, nāzēr), connected with θήρ, nādhar, "to vow"; ἀσχεπ, nāzeir, ναζε-
of Israel's ancient and simpler way of living, and as a protection against luxury in settling nomads. It is worthy of note that with the Scythians the wine growing and wine-drinking have ever been considered foreign to their traditional nomadic mode of life. It was in this same protest that the Rechabites, who were at least akin to the Nazirites, went still further in refusing even in Canaan to abandon the non-alcoholic state. See Rechabites.

The Pent, then, makes provision for the Nazirite vow being taken by either men or women, though the OT does not record a single instance of a female Nazirite. Further, it provides that this Nazirite vow for a limited time, that is, for the case of the "Nazirite of days." No period of duration is mentioned in the OT, but the Mish, in dealing with the subject, prescribes a period of 30 days, while a double period of 60 or even a triple one of 100 days might be entered on. The conditions of Nazirism entailed: (1) the strictest abstinence from wine and from every product of the vine; (2) the keeping of the hair unshorn and the beard untouched by a razor; (3) the prohibition to touch a dead body; and (4) prohibition of unclean food (Jgs 13 5-7; Nu 6).

The ceremonial of initiation is not recorded, the Pent treating it as well known. The Talm tells us that it was only for one to express the wish that he might be a Nazirite. A formal vow was, however, taken; and from the form of renewal of the vow, when by any means it was accidentally broken, we may judge that the hair had been shorn and the hair allowed to grow during the whole period of the vow.

The accidental violation of the vow just mentioned entailed upon the devotee the beginning of the whole matter anew and the serving of the whole period. This was entered on by the ceremonial of re-consecration, in the undergoing of which the Nazirite shaved his head, presented two turtledoves or two young pigeons for sin and burnt offerings, and re-consecrated himself before the priest, further presenting a lamb for a trespass offering (Nu 6 9-12).

When the period of separation was complete, the ceremonial of release had to be gone through, the presentation of burnt, sin and peace offerings with their accompaniments as detailed in Nu 6 13-21, the shaving of the head and the burning of the hair of the head of separation, after which the Nazirite returned to ordinary life.

The consecration of the Nazirite in some ways resembled that of the priests, and similar words are used of both in Lev 21 12 and Nu 6. The priest's vow being even designated nazar. It opened up the way for any Israelite to do special service on something like semi-sacerdotal lines. The priest, like the Nazirite, dared not come into contact with the dead (Lev 21 1), dared not touch wine during the period of service (Lev 10 9), and, further, long hair was an ancient priestly custom (Ezk 44 20).

The only "Nazirites for life" that we know by name are Samson, Samuel and John the Baptist, but to the Jewish tradition adds:

7. Nazirites Absalom in virtue of his long hair for Life We know of no one voluntarily taking the vow for life, all the cases recorded being those of parents dedicating their children. In rabbinical antecedents, the father might vow for the child, and an interesting case of this kind is mentioned in the dedication of Rabbi Chanena by his father in the presence of Rabban Gamaliel (Nazar, 28b).

Samson is distinctly named a Nazirite in Jgs 13 7 and 13 17, but it has been objected that his case does not conform to the regulations in the Pent. It is said that he must have taken the first year's grace that does not follow and would not be so understood, say, in a Moslem country today. It is further urged that in connection with his fighting he must have come into contact with many dead men, and that he took honey from the carcass of a dead lion. To this objection the case of the Nazirite is hypercritical. Fighting was specially implied in his vow (Jgs 13 5), and the remains of the lion would be but a dry skeleton and not so even a lupine as the ass's jawbone, to which the critic do not object.

Samuel is nowhere in the OT called a Nazirite, the name being first applied to him in Sir 46 13 (Heb), but the restrictions of his dedication seem to imply that he was. Wellhausen denies that it is implied in 1 S 1 11 that he was either a Nazirite. "A gift, [one] 'given' unto Job"; cf Nu 3 9; 18 6) or a Nazirite. In the Heb text the mother's vow mentions only the uncut hair, and first in LXX is there added that he should not drink wine or strong drink, but there is no case where we should not regard silence as final evidence. Rather it is to be regarded that the visible sign only is mentioned, the whole contents of the vow being implied.

It is very likely that Nazirites became numerous in Israel in distinctly great religious or political excitement, and in Jgs 6 2 we may paraphrase, 'For the long-haired champions in Israel.' That they should be raised up was considered a special token of God's favor to Israel, and the tempting of them to break their vow by drinking wine was considered an aggravated sin (Am 2 11.12). At the time of the captivity they were looked upon as a vanished glory in Israel (Lam 4 7m), but they reappeared in later history.

So far as we can discover, there is no indication that they formed guilds or settled communities like the "Sons of the Prophets." In a sense the Essenes may have conformed to the form of the consecration of burnt, sin and peace offerings with their accompaniments as detailed in Lev 21 12 and Nu 6. The priest's vow being even designated nazar. It opened up the way for any Israelite to do special service on something like semi-sacerdotal lines. To this objection the case of the Nazirite is hypercritical. The only "Nazirites for life" that we know by name are Samson, Samuel and John the Baptist, but to the Jewish tradition adds:
NEAH, nê'áv (עָנָא, han-é'áv, "the neah"; 'Av-vó', Annoa): A town in the lot of Zebulun (Josh 19 13), mentioned along with Gath-hepher and Rimmon. It is possibly identical with “Neiel” (ver 27). No name resembling either of these has yet been recovered, although the district in which the place must be sought is pretty definitely located. It may probably have lain to the N. of Rimmon (Rummanah), about 4 miles N.E. of Safaritjah.

NEAPOLIS, nê-apôlîs (Νεαπόλις, Neapolis; WH, Néo Polis): A town on the northern shore of the Aegean, originally belonging to Thrace but later falling within the Rom province of Macedonia. It was the seaport of Philippi, and was the first point in Europe at which Paul and his companions landed; from Troas they sailed direct to Samothrace, and on the next day reached Neapolis (Acts 16 11). Paul probably passed through the town again on his second visit to Macedonia (Acts 20 1), and he must have again visited it on his last journey from Philippi to Troas, which occupied 5 days (Acts 20 6). The position of Neapolis is a matter of dispute. Some writers have maintained that it lay on the site known as Esaki (i.e. “Old”?) Kavalla (Countryside, Macedonie, 11, 109 ff), and that upon its destruction in the 6th or 7th cent. AD the inhabitants migrated to the place, about 10 miles to the E., called Christopolis in mediaeval and Kavalla in modern times. But the general view, and that which is most consonant with the evidence, both literary and archaeological, places Neapolis at Kavalla, which lies on a rocky headland with a spacious harbor on its western side, in which the fleet of Brutus and Cassius was maintained at the time the battle of Philippi (42 BC; Appian Bell. Civ. iv.106). The town lay some 10 Rom miles from Philippi, with which it was connected by a road leading over the mountain ridge named Symbolum, which separates the plain of Philippi from the sea.

The date of its foundation is uncertain, but it seems to have been a colony from the island of Thassos, which lay opposite to it (Dio Cassius xvii.35). It appears (under the name Naŭpolis, which is also borne on its coins) as a member both of the first and of the second Athenian confederacy, and was highly commended by the Athenians in an extant decree for its loyalty during the Thasian revolt of 411-408 BC (Inact. Gracce, 1, Suppl. 81). The chief cult of the day was that of “The Virgin”; usually identified with the Gr Artemis. (See Leake, Travels in Northern Greece; 1818. Countryside, Voyage dans la Macedonie, 11, 69 ff, 109 ff; Heusey and Daumetz, Mission archéol. de Macedonie, 11 ff.)

NEEAR, nêr, NIGH, ní (chiefly נֵזָר, korób; ëyys, eggiā): Used of proximity in place (Gen 19 20; 46 10; Ex 13 17; Ps 22 11; Jn 3 23, etc), time (Jer 48 16; Ezek 7 7; 30 3; Mk 13 28), or kinship (Lev 21 2; Ruth 3 12), but also employed of moral nearness. It is “nigh” to them that are of a broken heart (Ps 34 18). God draws nigh to His people, and they to Him (Jas 4 8). The antithesis is God’s “farness” from the wicked.

NEARIAH, nê-á-ri'a (נֵרַיָה, n'ryāh): (1) A descendant of David (1 Ch 3 22 f). (2) A descendant of Simeon (1 Ch 4 42).

In both instances LXX reads “Noadish.”

NEBAIOTH, nê-bâ'îoth, nê-bâ-lîth (נֵבָיוֹת, n'hbayoth; LXX Ναβαΐθ, Nabaiôth): Firstborn of Ishmael (Gen 25 13; 28 9; 36 3; 1 Ch 1 29). Isa 60 7 mentions the tribe Nebaioth with Kedar, with an allusion to its pastoral nature: “the rams of Nebaioth” are to serve the ideal Zion as sacrificial victims. Again associated with Kedar, the name occurs frequently in Assyrs inscriptions. The tribe must have had a conspicuous place among the northern Arabs. Jos, followed by Jerome, regarded Nebaioth as identical with the Nabataeans, the great trading community and capital and stronghold was Petra. This view is widely accepted, but the name “Nabataean” is spelled with a t, and the interchange of t and d, although not unparalleled, is unusual. If the name is Arab, it is probably a foment that could have no connection with the Nabataeans.

NEBAILAT, nê-bâ'âlît (n'hba'llîh), nâbâ'âlît; Na-šâkkâr, (Naballat): A town occupied by the Benja-vites after the exile, named along with Lod and Ono ( Neh 11 34). It is represented by the modern Beit Nebala, 4 miles N.E. of Lydda.

NEBAT, nê-bâ'ât (נֶבַּת, n'hbat): Father of Jeroboam I (1 K 11 26, and frequently elsewhere). The name occurs only in the phrase “Jeroboam the son of Nebat,” and is evidently intended to distinguish Jeroboam I from the later son of Joash. See JEROBOAM.

NEBO, nê-bô (נְבֹא, n'hba; Assyr Nabû): The Bab god of literature and science. In the Bab mythology he is represented as the son and interpreter of Bel-merodach (cf Isa 46 1; Bel and Nebō there represent Babylon). His own special abode was at Borsippa. His planet was Mercury. His name enters into Bib. names, as “Nebuchadnezzar,” and perhaps “Abed-nego” (Dnl 1 7, for “Abed-nebo, servant of Nebo”). See BABYLONIA and ASSYRIA, RELIGION OF.

NEBO (נְבֹא, n'hba; Ναβα, Nabai): (1) This town is named in Nu 33 3 between Sebam and Beon (which latter evidently represents Baal-meon of ver 38), after Heshbon and Elealeh, as among the cities assigned by Moses to Reuben. It was occupied by the Reubenite clan Bela (1 Ch 5 8). Here it is named between Abero and Baalmeon. In their denunciations of wrath against Moab, Isaiah names it along with Medeba (Isa 16 2) and Jeremiah with Kiriathaim (Jer 48 1), and it is again (ver 23) between Dibon and Beth-diblathaim. Mesheh (N M) says that by command of Chemosh he went by night against the city, captured it after an assault that lasted from dawn till noon, and put all the inhabitants to death. He dedicated the place to Ashtar-chemosh. Jerome (on Isa 15 2) tells us that at Nebō was the idol of Chemosh, the site which seems best to meet the requirements of the passages indicated is on the ridge of Jebel Nebâ to the S.W. of Heshbôn, where ruins of an ancient town bearing the name of en-Nebâ are found (Buhl, GAP, 266).

Then we are familiar with the Hierodouloi of the Greeks, and the Vestal Virgins of the Romans. The word נֵזָר also appears in Syr and was applied to the maidens devoted to the service of Belthas. In the East, too, the same name has always been applied to individuals and societies of ascetics who were practically Nazarites, and the modern dervish in nearly every way resembles him, although it is worthy of record in this connection that the Moslem (an abstainer by creed) while under the vow of pilgrimage neither cuts his hair nor parcs his nails till the completion of his vow in Mecca.

W. M. CHRISTIE
(2) (ר"ח, וּנְבַה; ב, נָבָא, נָבֹא, א, נָבָה, נַבֹּה, and other forms): Fifty-two descendants of the inhabitants of Nebo returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:29; Neh 7:35). The place was in Judah and is named after Bethel and Ai. There is nothing, however, to guide us as to its exact position. It may be represented by either Beit Nabá, 12 miles N.W. of Jerusalem, or Neba, which lies about 4 miles S.S.E. of 'Id el-Mád (Adullam).

NEBO, MOUNT (נֵבֹא, נבע; נָבָא, נבָא): A mountain in the land of Moab which Moses ascended at the command of God in order that he might see the Land of Promise which he was never to enter. There also he was to die. From the following passages (viz. Nu 33:47; Dt 32:49; 34:1), we gather that it was not far from the plain of Moab in which Israel was encamped; that it was a height standing out to the W. of the mountains of Abarim; that it lay to the E. of Jericho; and that it was a spot from which a wide and comprehensive view of Pal could be obtained. None of these conditions are met by Jebel 'Affarías, which is too far to the E., and is fully 15 miles S. of a line drawn eastward from Jericho. Jebel O'sha, again, in Mt. Gilead, commands, indeed, an extensive view; but it lies too far to the N., being at least 15 miles N. of a line drawn eastward from Jericho. Both of these sites have had their advocates as claimants for the honor of representing the Bib. Nebo.

The "head" or "top" of Pisgah is evidently identical with Mt. Nebo (Dt 34:1). After Moses' death he was buried "in the valley in the land of Moab," over against Beth-peor.

The name Nebá is found on a ridge which, some 5 miles S.W. of Hebron and opposite the northern end of the Dead Sea, runs out to the W. from the known, but the discovery of Zophim [cf Nu 23:14] confirms the view now generally held, that it is but another title of the Nebo range.

Neither Mt. Hermon nor Dan (Tell el-Kudîy) is visible from that point; neither is Zorah to be seen; and if the Mediterranean is the hinder sea, it also is invisible. But, as Driver says ("Dt," 1 ICC, 419), the terms in Dt 34:1.3 are hyperbolic, and must be taken as including points filled in by the imagination as well as the actual visible to the Eye of God. Mr. Birch argues in favor of Tal'at el-Benâd, whence he believes Dan and Zorah to be visible, while he identifies "the hinder sea" with the Dead Sea (PEFS, 1898, 110 f). W. Ewing

NEBUCHADREZZAR, neb-á-kad-né'zar, NEBUCHADREZZAR, -rez'ar: Nebuchadnezzar, the second king of Babylon of that name, is best known as the king who conquered Judah, destroyed Jerusalem, and carried the people of the Jews captive to Babylon. Of all the heathen monarchs mentioned by name in the Scriptures, N. is the most prominent and the most important. The prophecies of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, and the last chs of K and Ch centered about his life, and he stands pre-eminently, along with oppression and the exodus, among the foes of the kingdom of God. The documents which have been discovered in Babylon and elsewhere within the last 75 years have added much to our knowledge of this monarch, and have in general confirmed the Bib. accounts concerning him.

His name is found in two forms in the Bible, Nebuchadnezzar and Nebuchadrezzar. In the LXX he is called Ναβουκδωναζαρ, and in the Vulg Ναβουκδωναζαρ. This latter form is found also in the AV Apoc (viz. Ezr, Neh, Est), and in the Dead Sea and Bar, but not Jth or Tob. This change from r to r, which is found in the two writings of the name in the Heb and the Aram. of the Scriptures is a not uncommon one in the Sem languages, as in Burañburjis and Burañburjus, Ben-hadad and Bar-hadad (see Brockelmann's Comparative Grammar, 156, 175, 220). It is possible, however, that the form Nebuchadnezzar is the Aram. tr of the Bab Nebuchadrezzar. If we take the name to be compounded of Nabu-kudurri-usur in the sense 'O Nebo, protect thy servant' the combination usurur would be the best tr possible in Aramaic. Such tr's of proper names are common in the old Verbs and Scriptures and elsewhere. For example, in WAF, V. 4, we find 4 columns of proper names of persons giving the Sumerian forms and the Sem trs of the names. We find Bar-hadad in Aram. for Bar-badad. In early Aram. the s had not yet become ; (see Cooke, Text-Book of North-Semitic Inscriptions, 188 f; so that for any s who thought that kudurri meant "servant" N. would be a perfect tr into Aram. of Nebuchadrezzar.

The father of N. was Nabopolassar, probably a Chaldaean prince. His mother is not known by name. The classical historians mention two wives: Amyitis, the daughter of Astyages, and Nitocris, the mother of Nabonaid. The monuments mention three sons: Evil-merodach who succeeded him, Nabonidus, his son, and Marduk-nadin-ah. A younger brother of N., called Nabu-shum-lisîrî, is mentioned on a building-inscription tablet from the time of Nabopolassar.

The sources of our information as to the life of N. are about 500 contract tablets dated according to the days, months and years of his reign of 43 years; about 30 building and honorific inscriptions; one historical inscription; and in the books of Jer, Est, Dan, and 1 Esdras. The fragments of Ch, Ezr, and the fragments of Berosus, Menander, Megasthenes, Abdyenus, and Alexander Polyhistor, largely as cited by Jos and Eusebias.

From these sources we learn that N. succeeded his father on the throne of Babylon in 604 BC, and reigned till 561 BC. He probably commanded... the armies of Babylon from 609 BC. At any rate, he was at the head of the army which defeated Pharaoh-nechoh at Carchemish on the Euphrates in 605 BC (see 2 K 23 31; 2 Ch 35 20 ff.). After having driven Necoh out of Asia and settled the affairs of Syria and Pal, he was suddenly recalled to Babylon by the death of his father. There he seems quietly to have ascended the throne. In the 4th year of Jehoiakim (or 3rd according to the Bablyonian reckoning) he captured Jer, put Jehoiakim, its king, into chains, and probably killed him. His successor, Jehoiachin, after a three months’ reign, was besieged in Jer, captured, deposed, and carried captive to Babylon, where he remained in captivity 37 years until he was set free by Evil-merodach. In the 9th year of Zedekiah, N. made a 4th expedition against Jer which he besieged, captured, and destroyed (see Jer 52). In addition to these wars with Judah, N. carried on a long siege of Tyre, lasting 13 years, from his 7th to his 20th year. He had at least three wars with Egypt. The first culminated in the defeat of Necoh at Carchemish; the second in the withdrawal of Hophra (Apries) from Pal in the 1st year of the siege of Jerus under Zedekiah; and the third saw the armies of N. entering Egypt in triumph and defeating Amasis in N.’s 37th year. In the numerous building and honorific inscriptions of N. he makes no mention by name of his father or of his battles; but he frequently speaks of foes that he had conquered and of many peoples whom he ruled. Of these peoples he mentions by name the Hittites and others (see Langdon, 148–51). In the W. 3rd year inscriptions he speaks of a special conquest of Lebanon from some foreign foe who had seized it; but the name of the enemy is not given.

The monuments justify the boast of N.: “Is not this great Babylon that I have built?” (Dnl 4 30). Among these buildings special emphasis is placed by N. upon his temples and shrines to the gods, particularly to Marduk, Nebu and Zarapu, but also to Shamash, Sin, Guia, Ramman, Mah, and others. He constructed, also, a great new palace and rebuilt an old one of his father’s. Besides, he laid out and paved with bricks a great street for the procession of Marduk, and built a number of great walls with moats and moat-walls and gates. He dug several broad, deep canals, and made dams for flooding the country to the N. and S. of Babylon, so as to protect it against the attack of its enemies. He made, also, great bronze bulls and serpents, and adorned his temples and palaces with cedars and gold. Not merely in Babylon itself, but in many of the cities of Babylonia as well, his building operations were carried on, esp. in the line of temples to the gods.

The inscriptions of N. show that he was a very religious man, probably excelling all who had preceded him in the building of temples.

6. Religion, in the institution of offerings, and the observance of all the ceremonies connected with the worship of the gods. His larger inscriptions usually contain two hymns and always close with a prayer. Mention is frequently made of the offerings of precious metals, stones and woods, of game, fish, wine, fruit, grain, and other objects acceptable to the gods. It is noteworthy of these offerings differ in character and apparently in purpose from those in use among the Jews. For example, no mention is made in any one of N.’s inscriptions of the pouring out or sprinkling of blood, nor is any reference made to atonement, or to sin.

No reference is made in any of these inscriptions to N.’s insanity or fit aside from the fact that we could scarcely expect a man to publish his own calamity, esp. madness, it should be noted according to Langdon we have but three inscriptions of his written in the period from 580 to 567 BC. If his madness lasted for 7 years, it may have occurred between 580 and 567 BC, or it may have occurred between the Egyptian campaign of 567 BC and his death in 561 BC. But, as it is more likely that the “7 times” mentioned in Dnl may have been months, the illness may have been in any year after 580 BC, or even before that for all we know.

No mention is made on the monuments (1) of the dream of N. recorded in Dnl 2, 3, 4; (2) the image of gold that he set up, or (3) of the fiery furnace. These events are said to be the 3 miracles from which the three children were delivered (Dnl 3). As Langdon (id. col. 465) quite correctly said, however, that a belief in dreams was so universal among all the ancient peoples, that a single instance of this kind may not have been considered as worthy of special mention. The annals of Ashur-bani-pal and Nebuchadnezzar and Xerxes give a number of instances of the importance attached to dreams and their interpretations, and it is almost a commonplace of the ancient peoples believed in them. That the dream recorded in Dnl is not mentioned on the monuments seems less remarkable than that no mention of his is recorded. As to (2), we know that N. made an image of his royal person (salas isharratun). Langdon, XIX, B, col. x, 6; of the image of the royal person of Nabopolassar, id. p. 31), and it is certain that the images of Nebuchadnezzar were venerated in a bark in the New Year’s procession (id. pp. 137, 159, 163, 165) and that there were images of the god in all the temples (id. col. 465). The stone also shipped before these images. That N. should have made an image of gold and put it up in the Plain of Dura is exemplified by what we know of his other works, "plous deeds." (2) As to the fiery furnace, it is known that Nebuchadnezzar, when asked of his brother, Shamash-shumukin, was burned in a similar furnace. The failure of N. to mention any of the particular persons or events recorded in DnL does not disprove their historicity, any more than his failure to mention the battle of Carchemish, or the siege of Tyre and Jesus, disproves them. The fact is, we have no real historic information except one fragment of a few broken lines found in Egypt.

NEBUZHADBAN, neb-uh-shah’ban (נבעודב Дан), n’bhourad’ohn = Assyq Nabu’seba’anni, “Nebu delivers me”; AV Nebuzaradon: An important officer (the Rab-saris, “chief captain” or “chief eunuch”) of the Babylonian court, and one of those who were appointed to see to the safety of Jeremiah after the taking of Jerusalem (Jer 39 13).

NEBUZARADON, neb-uh-zar’a-don. -ar’a-don (נבעודדון), n’bhourad’ohn = Assyq Nabu’zara’dôn: Nebuchadnezzar’s general at the siege of Jerusalem (2 K 25 8.11.20) | Jer 52 12 15.26; 39 9. 10.11.13. Under the title of “captain of the guard,” he commanded the army, and, after the fall of the city, carried out his master’s policy with regard to the safety of Jeremiah, the transport of the emblem, and the government of those who were left in the land.

NECK, n’kë (ג’, גואו, נק, גואו', גואו', גואודרן, גואודרן, גואודר, גואודר,ARAM. ג”, גואו [DnL 5 7.16.29], ג^ג, ^ארמ, ^ארמ, ^ארמ, ^ארמ [TENODRA], “loose neck,” “eunuch,” “stairstep,” “mephibesh” [1 S 4 18]; מ’דד, מ’דד, back” [Bar 2 38]; occasionally the words ג’, גדרון [Isa 3 16; Ekk 16 11]; and ג’, גדרון, pl. גדרון, lit. “throat” [BnL 1 3.32.22; 6 21], are tr “neck”): The neck is compared with a tower for beauty (Cant 4 4; 7 4) and is decorated with necklaces and chains (Prov 1 9; 3 32.22; 6 21), Heb garyykh: Ezek 11 12, Heb garykh, “throat”; DnL 5 7.16.29, Heb garyykh. It is also the part of the body where a rich yoke, emblem of labor and hard service, dependence and subjection, is borne (Dn 28 48; Jer 27 8.11. 12; 28 14; Acts 16 10). “To shake off the yoke,” “to break the yoke,” or “to take it off” is expressive of the regaining of independence and liberty, either by one’s own endeavors or through help from outside (Gen 27 40; Isa 10 27; Jer 28 11; 30 8). Certain animals which were not allowed as food (like the firstborn which were not redeemed) were to be killed by having their necks (“eunuch”) broken (Ex 13 13; 34 20); the turtle-doves and young pigeons, which were sacrificed as sin offerings or as burnt offerings, had their heads wrung or pinched off from their necks (Lev 5 8). In 1 S 4 18 the Heb word mephibesh signifies a fracture of the upper part of the spinal column, caused by a fall.

It was a military custom of antiquity for the conqueror to place his foot upon the vanquished. This custom, frequently represented in sculpture on many an Egyptian temple wall, is referred to in Josh 10 24; Bar 25 Camea 13 and probably in Rom 16 24 and Phm 10.13. St. Paul praises the devotion of Aquila and Priscilla, “who for my life laid down their own necks” (Rom 16 4). See Footstool.

To “fall on the neck” of a person is a very usual mode of salutation in the East (Gen 33 4; 46 11; 46 29; Tob 16 20 37). In moments of great emotion such salutation is apt to end in weeping on each other’s neck.

Readiness for work is expressed by “putting one’s neck to the work” (Neh 3 5). Soverign punishment and calamity are said to “reach to the neck” (Isa 4 21; 11 28). The Lord Jesus speaks of certain persons for whom it were better to have had a millstone put around the neck and to have been drowned in the sea. The meaning is that even the most disgraceful death is still preferable to a life of evil influence upon even the little ones of God’s household (Mt 18 6; Mk 9 42; Lk 17 2).

To “make the neck stiff,” to “harden the neck” indicates obstinacy often mingled with rebellion (Ex 32 39; 33 5; 34 9; 2 Ch 30 8; 36 13; Neh 9 16.17.29; Ps 75 5 RV “insolently with a haughty neck!” Prov 29 1; Jer 7 26. Of σηλευταρχείας, σηλευταρχείας, “stiffnecked” (Acts 7 51). Similarly Isaiah (48 4) speaks of the neck of the obstinate sinner as resembling an iron snare. H. E. Luxenburg.

NECKLACE, n’kës (נכשת, נכשת), “chain”:

A neck-chain ornament, worn either separately (Ezk 16 11), or with pendants (Isa 3 19), such as crescents (Isa 3 18) or rings (Gen 38 25); sometimes made of gold (Gen 41 42; DnL 5 29), or of strings of jewels (Cant 1 10). Even beasts of burden were sometimes so adorned by royalty (Jgs 8 26). It was considered suggestive of pride (Ps 73 6) or of filial loyalty (Prov 1 9). The word does not occur in Av, but such adornments have always been popular in all the Bible lands.

NEDABIAH, nê’d-a-b’ô (נדהביה), n’hadab’îgh: A descendant of David (1 Ch 3 18).

NEEDLE, nê’d’l (נאל, נהל): The word “needle” occurs only 3 t, viz. in the reference to Christ’s use of the proverb: “It is easier for a camel to go through a needle’s eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God” (Mt 19 24; Mk 10 25; Lk 18 25). This saying ought to be accepted in the same sense as Mt 23 24, “Ye blind guides, that strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel!” Christ used them to illustrate absurdities. A rabbinical idiom is cited, “an elephant through a needle’s eye.” Some writers have attempted to show that rhaphis referred to a small gate of a walled oriental city. No evidence of such a use of the word exists in the terms applied today in Biblical lands to this opening. “Rich man” here has the connotation of a man bound up in his riches. If a man continues to trust in his earthly possessions to save him, it would be absurd for him to expect to share in the spiritual kingdom where dependence upon the King is a first requisite.

The fact that needles are not mentioned elsewhere in the Bible should not be taken to indicate that this instrument was not used. Specimens of bone and metal needles of ancient origin show that they were common household objects. See Needlework. James A. Patch

NEESING, nē'zing (Job 41 18, AV, ERV "by his neckings a light doth shine," ARV "sneezings"): "Neesse" in Elizabethan Eng. (through two distinct derivations) could mean either "sneeze" or "snort" in the impossible to portray, which sense was intended by the AV editors. The Heb is נֱסִיקָה, 'atābāh, a word found only here, but connected with a Sem √ "sneeze," or, perhaps, "snort." Job 41 18 is part of the description of the "leviathan" or crocodile. This animal has a habit of inflating himself, and after this he discharges through his nostrils a cloud of heated vapor, which sparkles in the sunlight. The act is neither a "sneeze" nor a "snort," but the latter word is sufficiently descriptive. There is no allusion to legendary "fire-spouting" monsters. Cf Job 39 20; Jer 8 16.

In the elder edd of AV "neeced" is found in 2 K 4 35: "and the child neesed seven times" (later edd and RV "sneezed"). BURTON SCOTT EASTON

NEGB, negèb (נָגב, ha-neghēb, "the negeb," or simply, נָגֶב, negèb, from a √ "to be dry," and therefore in the first instance meaning the "dry," "parished" region, generally, in LXX it is usually τὸ ἄφημος, εἴρημος, "desert," also νῆβη, nēgēb): As the Negeb lay to the S. of Judah, the word came to be used in the sense of "the South," and is so used in a few passages (e.g. Gen 13 14) and in such is τὸ ἀφημα, lips (see GEOGRAPHY).

The Eng. τὰ ἄφημα is unsuitable in several passages, and likely to lead to confusion. For example, in Gen 13 1 Abraham is represented as going "into the South," when journeying northward from Egypt toward Bethel; in Nu 13 23 the spies coming from the "wilderness of Zin" are described as coming "from the South" although they were going north. The difficulty in these and many other passages is at once obviated if it is recognized that the Negeb was a geographical term for a definite geographical region, just as Shephelah, lit. "lowland," was the name of another district of Pal. In RV "Negeb" is given in m, but it would make for clearness if it were restored to the text.

This "parished" land is generally considered as beginning S. of ed Dababat—probably the site of Deir (q.v.)—and as stretching S.

2. Description: in a series of rolling hills running in a general direction of E. to W. until the actual wilderness begins, a distance of perhaps 70 m. from the Mediterranean to the E. it is bounded by the Dead Sea and the southern Ghor, and to the W. there is no defined boundary before the Mediterranean. It is a land of sparse and scanty springs and small rainfall; in the character of its soil it is a transition from the fertility of Canaan to the wildness of the desert; it is essentially a pastoral land, where grazing is plentiful in the early months and where camels and goats can sustain life, even through the long summer drought. Today, as through most periods of history, it is a land for the nomad rather than the settled inhabitant, although abundant ruins in many spots testify to better physical conditions at some periods (see I, 5, below). The direction of the valleys E. or W., the general dryness, and the character of the inhabitants have always made it a more or less isolated region without thoroughfare.

The great routes pass along the coast to the W. or up the Arabah to the E. It formed an additional barrier to the wilderness beyond it; against all who would lead an army from the S., this southern frontier of Judah was always secure. Israel could not reach the promised land by this route, through the land of the Amalekites (Nu 13 29; 14 43-45).

The Negeb was the scene of much of Abram's wanderings (Gen 12 9; 13 13; 20 1); it was in this district that Hagar met with the angel (Gen 16 7,14); Issac (Gen 24 62) and Jacob (Gen 37 1; 46 5) both dwelt there. Moses

3. OT references to the hill country (Nu 13 17,22): the Amalekites then dwelt there (ver 20) and apparently, too, in some parts of it, the Avvim (Josh 13 3,4). The inheritance of the children of Simeon, as given in Josh 19 1-9, was in the Negeb, but in Josh 15 21-32 these cities are credited to Judah (see SIMEON). Achish allotted to David, in response to his request, the cities of ZIKLAG (Gen 15 37 5); the exploits of David were against various parts of this district described as the Negeb of Judah, the Negeb of the Jerahmeelites, and the Negeb of the Kenites, while in 1 S 30 14 we have mention of the Negeb of the Cherethites and the Negeb of Caleb. To this we may add the districts of the various clans (see separate arts. under these names). The Negeb, together with the hill country and the Shephelah, was according to the Hebrews (17 26; 32 44; 33 13) to have renewed prosperity after the captivity of Judah was ended.

When Nebuchadnezzar took Judah to the East with wild captives (see LAM 4 21; Ezek 36 3-15; Ob 14 9) history, and after that the Jews in the Roman and Byzantine times until Judah had been lost to them from Southern Judaea (164 BC) and John Hyrcanus conquered their country and compelled them to become Jews (109 BC). It was to one of the cities here—Malathia—that Herod Agrippa withdrew himself (Jos, Ant., XVIII, vi, 2).

The palm days of this district appear to have been during the Byzantine period: the existing ruins, so far as they can be dated at all, belong to this time. Beer-sheba was an important city with a bishop, and Elusa (mentioned by Ptolemy in the 3d cent.) was the seat of a bishop in the 4th, 5th and 6th cents. After the rise of Mohammedanism the land appears to have lapsed into primitive conditions. Although lawlessness and want of any central control may account for much progress, yet it is probable that Professor Ellsworth Huntington (q.v.) is right in the opinion that a change of climate has had much to do with the rise and fall of civilization and settled habitation in this district. The district has long been given over to the nomad, and it is only quite recently that the Turkish policy of planting vineyards in off-White (q.v.). At Beer-sheba and at oveh has produced some slight change in the direction of a settled population and agricultural pursuits.

It is clear that in at least two historic periods the Negeb enjoyed a very considerable prosperity.

What it may have been in the days of the

5. Its prosperity it is difficult to judge; all we Ancient read of them suggests a purely nomadic read of them suggests a purely nomadic prosperity life similar to the Bedouin of today but with better pasturage. In the division of the land among the tribes mention is made of many cities—the Hebronite 29 (Josh 15 21; 32; 19 1-9; 1 Ch 4 28-33)—and the wealth of the cattle evidently was great (of 1 S 15 9; 27 9; 30 16; 2 Ch 14 14). The condition of things must have been far different from that of recent times.

The extensive ruins at Bir es Seba' (Beer-sheba) Khalsa (Elusa), Ruhebeh (Rehoboth, q.v.), oveh and other cities, together with the signs of orchards, vineyards and gardens scattered widely throughout these and other sites, show how comparatively well preserved this area was in Byzantine times in particular. Professor Huntington (loc. cit.) concludes from these ruins that the population of the large towns of the Negeb alone at this period must have amounted to between 45,000 and 50,000.

LITERATURE

Nehemiah, the son of Hananiah, or Hanun, was born near the time of the return from exile (Ezra 6:15) and was a Levite, and therefore a son of Iddo (Neh 11:11). He is a leading figure in the narrative of Ezra 7:7-10 and Nehemiah 1-13, which probably belong to the 6th century B.C. Nehemiah was a priestly scribe, which means that he was a Levite and a member of the family of Iddo (Neh 11:11). He was a contemporary of Ezra, and his name appears in the list of the latter's companions (Ezra 8:7), which suggests that he was also a contemporary of Ezra. Nehemiah was a wise and just ruler, who was able to restore the city of Jerusalem after the return from exile, and he was also a successful administrator and a statesman. He was a man of integrity, who was able to resist the temptations of wealth and power, and he was a man of courage, who was able to stand up to the opposition of the Persian officials, and he was also a man of faith, who was able to trust in the promises of God, and he was also a man of love, who was able to show compassion to the poor and the needy.

The mention of the sons of Sanballat, governor of Samaria, in a letter written to the priests of Jerus in 407 BC, among whom Johanan is esp. named, proves that Sanballat must have ruled in the time of Artaxerxes I rather than in that of Artaxerxes II.

The office of cupbearer was "one of no trifling honor" (Herod. iii.34). It was one of his chief duties to taste the wine for the king to see that it was not poisoned, and he was even admitted to the king while the queen was present (Neh 2:6). It was on account of this position of close intimacy with the king that Nehemiah was able to obtain his commission as governor of Judæa and the letters and edicts which enabled him to restore the walls of Jerusalem.

The occasion of this commission was as follows: Hanani, the brother of Nehemiah, and other men of Judah came to visit Nehemiah 4. Governor while he was in Susa in the 9th month of Judæa of the 20th year of Artaxerxes. They reported that the Jews in Judæa were in great affliction and that the wall thereof was broken down and its gates burned with fire. Thereupon he grieved and fasted and prayed to God that he might be granted favor by the king. Having appeared before the latter in the 1st month of the 21st year of Artaxerxes, 444 BC, he was granted permission to go to Jerus to build the city of his fathers' sepulchers, and was given letters to the governors of Syria and Pail and esp. to Asaph, the keeper of the king's forest, ordering him to supply timber for the wall, the fortress, and the temple. He was also appointed governor of the province of which Jerus was the capital.

Armed with these credentials and powers he repaired to Jerus and immediately set about the restoration of the walls, a work in which he was hindered and harassed by Sanballat, the governor of Samaria, and others, some of them Jews dwelling in Jerus. Notwithstanding, he succeeded in his attempt and eventually also in providing gates for the various entrances to the city.

Hearing accomplished these external renovations, he instituted a number of social reforms. He appointed the heads of the fathers' sepulchers as judges, which caused the people to be instructed in the Law by public readings, and expositions; celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles; and observed a national fast, at which the sins of the people were confessed and a new covenant solemnly confirmed. The people agreed to avoid marriages with the heathen, to keep the Sabbath, and to contribute to the support of the temple. To provide for the safety and prosperity of the city, one out of every ten of the people living outside Jerus was compelled to settle in the city. In all of these reforms he was assisted by Ezra, who had gone up to Jerus in the 7th year of Artaxerxes.

Once, or perhaps oftener, during his gubernatorialship Nehemiah returned to the king. Nothing is known as to when or where he died. It is stated that he was no longer governor in 407 BC; for at that time according to the Aram. letter written from Elephantine to the priests of Jerus, Bagohi was occupying the position of governor over Judæa. One of the last acts of Nehemiah's government was the charging away of one of the sons of Joiada, the son of Elahash, because he had become the son-in-law to Sanballat, the governor. This Joiada was the father of Johanan (Neh 12:22) who, according to the Aram. papyrus, was high priest in 407 BC, and according to Jos (Ant. X, viii.1) was high priest while Bagohi (Bogos) was general of Artaxerxes' army, it is certain that Nehemiah was at this time no longer in power.

From the fact that Nehemiah was so grieved at the desolation of the city and the people of Judah and his fathers and that he was so jealous for the laws and the welfare of Judah, we can infer that he was brought up by pious parents, who instructed him in the history and law of the Jewish people.

Doubtless because of his probity and ability, he was apparently at an early age appointed by Artaxerxes, king of Persia, to the responsible position of cupbearer to the king.

3. Cupbearer of the King

There is now no possible doubt that this king was Artaxerxes, the first of that name, commonly called Longimanus, who ruled over Persia from 464 to 424 BC.

him, defraud him, frame malicious devices or harbor evil thoughts against him (Ex 20 17; Lev 6 2; 19 13; Dt 23 24 f.; Ps 16 3; 101 5; Prov 24 28; Jer 22 13; Zec 8 17), or to lead him into larger conduct (Hab 2 12) or to wage war on him by lying carnally with his wife (Lev 18 20). But the supreme law that underlies these negative injunctions is stated positively, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Lev 19 18). In this verse, the term "neighbor" is defined by the expression, "the children of thy people." Here, and generally in the OT, the term implies more than mere proximity; it means one related by the bond of nationality, a fellow-countryman, compatriot. Jeh being regarded as a national God, there was no religious bond regulating the conduct of the Hebrews with other nations. Conduct which was prohibited between fellow-Jews was permitted toward a foreigner, e.g. the exactness of interest (Dt 23 19,20).

In the NT, this limitation of moral obligation to fellow-countrymen is abolished. Christ gives a wider interpretation of the commandment in Lev 19 18, so as to include in it those outside the tie of nation or kinship. This is definitely done in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10 25-37), where, in answer to the question, "Who is my neighbor?" Jesus shows that the relationship is a moral, not a physical one, based not on kinship but on opportunity, need and capacity for mutual help. The word represents, not so much a rigid fact, but an ideal which one may or may not realize (ver 36, "Which of these three, thinkest thou, proved [lit. became, not was] neighbor," etc). This com connotation follows naturally as a corollary to the doctrine of the universal Fatherhood of God. The commandment to love one's neighbor as one's self must not be interpreted as if it implied that we are to hate our enemy (an inference which the Jews were apt to make); human love should be like the Divine, impartial, having all men for its object (Mt 5 44 f). Love to one's fellow-men in the broad sense is to be placed side by side with love to God as the essence and sum of human duty (Mt 22 37-40 || Mk 12 28-31). Christ's apostles follow His example in giving a central position to the injunction to love one's neighbor as one's self (Jan 2 8, where the term is called "the royal law," i.e. the supreme or governing law; Rom 13 9; Gal 5 14).

NEKEB, nē'keb: This name occurs only in combination with "Adami" (בֵּדֹאָמִי, 'abāmi) and "ha-nekēb, "Adami of the passa"); LXX reads the names of two places: καὶ Ἀδαμ καὶ Ἀδαιμ, καὶ Ἀρμαὶ καὶ Ἀξιάβ (B); καὶ Ἀρμαὶ καὶ Ἀξιαβ, καὶ Ἀρμαὶ καὶ Ὀνταη (Josh 19 33), so we should possibly read "Adami and Nekēb." Neubauer says (Géog. du Talm, 225) that later the name of Nekēb was Cydadatha. It may therefore be represented by the modern Sëydâdel, not far from ed-Dâmîeh to the E. of Tabor, about 4 miles S.W. of Tiberias. The name of Nekēb, a town in Galilee, appears in the list of Towns III of the NEKODA, nē'kō'da (נְכֹּדָא, někō'dā): (1) Head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 48; Neh 7 50; cf 1 Esd 5 31). (2) Head of a family which failed to prove its Levitical origin (Ezr 2 60; Neh 7 62; cf 1 Esd 5 31). In the || vs of 1 Esd the names are given thus: NEBKA and NEKODAN (q.v.).

The name occurs also in the form "Jemuel" (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15). According to Gray (HPN), either form is etymologically obscure; but Nemuel is probably correct, for it is easier to account for its corruption into Jemuel than vice versa. The patronymic Nemuelites occurs once (Nu 26 12).

NEPHILIM, nē'fil-im (נְפֶהִי, nēphilim): This word, used "giants" in AV, but retained in RV, is found in passages of the OT—one in Gen 6 4, relating to the antediluvians; the other in Nu 13 33, relating to the sons of Anak in Canaan. In the former place the Nephiim are not necessarily to be identified with the children said to be born by "the daughters of men" to "the sons of God" (vs 24); indeed, they seem to be distinguished from the latter as upon the earth before this unholy commingling took place (see Sons of God). But it is not easy to be certain as to the interpretation of this strange passage. In the second case they clearly represent men of gigantic stature, in comparison with whom the Israelites felt as if they were "grasshoppers." This agrees with Gen 6 4, "the mighty men that were of old, the men of renown." LXX, therefore, was warranted in translating by gigantes.

NEPHIS, nē'fis. See Nephis.

NEPHISH, nē'fis, NEPHISIM, nē'f-sim, NEPHISHEIM, nē'f-s-him, NEPHISHIM, nē'f-s-him (נְפֶהִישִם, nēphishim, נְפֶהִישָּה, nēphishāh): The former is the Ktibh (Heb "written") form of the name adopted in RV; the latter the Qere (Heb "read") form, adopted in AV and RVm (Ezr 2 50). See NAPHI; NEPHISHIM.

NEPHITHAI, nē'fith, nēfith-al. See Nepi.

NEPHITHALIM, nēf-tha-lim (Mt 4 13): The Gr form of NAPHTALI (q.v.).

NEPTHAR, nēf-thār (נֶפְתָר, Naphthār; A and Swete, Nephthār, AV and Vulg Naphthār), NEPHTHALI (Nēphā, Naphthāl, al. Nephā, Naphthāl, Naphthāl, AV, Nephēl, Naphēl, AV and Vulg, following Old Lat., Nephī; Swete, following A, gives Nephtar twice): According to 2 Macc 1 19-36, at the time of the captivity the godly priests took of the altar fire of the temple and concealed it "privily in the hollow of a well that was without water," unknown to all. "After many years"
NEPHTOAH, neʔt-oʔ, neʔt-oʔ (יִתְפָּא, nephthoah), occurs only in the expression יִתְפָּא צְיָרָה, ma’yan ma net, “the fountain of the waters of Nephtoah”; LXX πηγὴ ὑδάτος νεφθοα, πηγὴ ὑδάτος Νεφθοᾶ (Nephthoah): This spring was on the border line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 15 9; 18 15). The place is usually identified with Līfāṭ, a village about 2 miles N.W. of Jerusalem, on the east bank of the Wady Beit Hanina. It is a village very conspicuous to the traveler along the high road from Jaffa as he approaches Jerusalem. There are ancient foundations, cut-out tombs, and a copious spring which empties itself into a large masonry reservoir. The situation of Līfāṭ seems to agree well with the most probable line of boundary between the two tribes; the spring as it is today does not appear to be so abundant as to warrant such an expression as “spring of the waters,” but it was, like many such sources, probably considerably more abundant in OT times.

Condor would identify Līfāṭ with the ancient Eleph (q.v.) of Benjamin, and, on the ground that the Talm (see Talm Bah, Yoma 31a) identifies Nephtoah with Etam (q.v.), he would find the site of Nephtoah at ’Ātin ’Ālān, S. of Bethlehem. The Talm is not a sufficiently trustworthy guide when unsupported by other evidence, and the identification creates great difficulty with the boundary line. See PEF, Ill, 18, 43, Sh XVII.

NEPHUSHESIM, nē-fish’ē-sim, NEPHUSHE-SIM, nē-fish’ē-sim (נְפּוֹשֵׁשֶּם, nephushesim, נְפּוֹשֵׁשְׁם; nē-fish’ē-sim): The former is the K’thibh (Heb “written”) name adopted in RV; the latter the Kēb (Heb “read”) form adopted in AV and RVm (Neh 7 52). See Naphsh; Nephusim.

NER, nēr (“2, nēr, “lamp”): Father of Abner (1 S 14 50 f; 26 5.14, etc); grandfather of Saul (1 Ch 8 35). Other references, though adding further information are 2 S 2 8.12; 3 22.5; 28.37; 1 K 2 5.32, etc.

NEREUS, nēr’ūs, nēr’ē-us (Νερος, Nereus): The name of a Rom Christian to whom with his sister St. Paula he dedicated the sacrifices. Nehemiah then commanded them to pour (καταψηληνθει, καταψηληθει, καταψηληθει, καταψηληθει) the rest of the liquid upon great stones. Another flame sprang up which soon spent itself; “whereas the light from the altar still” (RVm, the exact meaning being doubtful). When the king of Persia investigated it, he inclosed the spot as sacred. Nehemiah and his friends called the thick liquid “Nephthar,” which is by interpretation “cleaning” (καθαρισμός). “but most men call it Nepthai”.

No satisfactory explanation is to hand of either name, one of which is probably a corruption of the other. And no word exists in the Heb like either of them with the meaning of “cleaning,” “purification,” or the name to the spot (hunc locum), not the story. The thing probably originated in Persia, where naphtha was abundant. The ignition of the liquid by the hot rays of the sun and the appearance of the words render it highly probable that it was the inflammable rock-oil of naphtha, the combustible properties of which were quite familiar to the ancients (Pliny, NH, ii. 100; Plutarch, Alex, 35; Diodor, i.101; Strabo, Geogr. xvi.1, 15); the words then are probably corruptions of what the Greeks termed καθαρόν, naphtha. Ewald (Hist., V, 163) says: “This is but one of the many stories which sought in later times to enhance the very sanctity of the Temple, with reference even to its origin.” S. Angus NERGAL, nār’gäl ([נָרְגַל], nērgal): A Bab. deity, identified with the planet Mars, and worshiped at Cutha (cf 2 K 17 30). See BABYLONIA AND ASSIA, RELIGION OF.

NERGAL-SHARERER, nēr-gal-shar-e’zer (נֶרְגַל-שָׁרָאָר, nērgal-shar’erē), Heb form of Assyr Nergal-sar-uaš, “O Nergal, defend the prince!”; A Bab officer, the “Ban-mag,” associated with Nebushazban in the care of Jeremiah after the fall of Jerusalem (39 3.13). According to Hommel (art. “Babylon,” HDB) and Sayce (HDB, s.v.), Nergal-sharerer is to be identified with Neriglissar who succeeded Evil-merodach on the throne of Babylon (cf Cheyne and Johns, EB, s.v.).

NERI, nē’ri (Νερί, Nērī [Tisch., Treg., WH], TR, Nēp, Nēri; for Heb נֶרְיָד, nēryād): The name of an ancestor of Jesus, the grandfather of Jerubbabel (Lk 3 27). See NERIAH.

NERIAH, nē’rā (נֶרְיָה, nēryāh, “whose lamp is Jehovah”): The father of Seraiah and of Baruch, Jeremiah’s friend and secretary (Jer 32 12.16; 46 4.8.32; 43 3). In Bar 1 1 the Gr form of the name, Nēp(e)ias, Nēr(e)ias, is given, and this shortened, Ner, occurs in the genealogy of Jesus Christ.

NERIAS, nē’rē-ās (Nēp(e)ias, Nēr(e)ias): The Gr form of Heb Neriah found only in Bar 1 1 as the father of Baruch = “Neriah” of Jer 32 12; 36 4; 43 3. To Baruch’s brother, Seraih, the same genealogy is ascribed in Jer 51 59.

The fifth Rom emperor, b. at Antium December 15, 37 AD, began to reign October 13, 54, d. June 9, 68.

I. Name, Parentage and Early Training.—His name was originally Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus.
but after his adoption into the Claudian gens by the emperor Claudius, he became Nero Claudius Caesar. His father was Emperor Domitian Ahenobarbus ("Brazen-beard"), a man sprung from an illustrious family and of vicious character. His mother was Agrippina the younger, the daughter of Germanicus and the elder Agrippina, sister of the emperor Caius (Caligula) and niece of the emperor Claudius. On the birth of the child, his father predicted, amid the congratulations of his friends, that any offspring of himself and Agrippina could only prove abominable and disastrous for the public (Suet. Nero vi: detestabule et malo publico). At the age of three the young Domitian lost his father and was robbed of his estates by the rapacity of Caius. In 39 his mother was banished for supposed complicity in a plot against Caius. N. was thus deprived of his mother and at the same time left almost penniless. His aunt, Domitia Lepida, new undertook the care of the boy and placed him with two tutors, a dancer and a barber (Suet. vi). On the accession of Claudius, Agrippina was recalled, and N. was restored to his mother and his patrimony. (43 AD).

II. Agrippina's Ambition for Nero.—She cared little for her son's moral education, but began immediately to train him for high position. She aimed at nothing less than securing the empire for N. With a view to this she must gain influence over her uncle, the emperor Claudius, who was very susceptible to female charms. At first the path was by no means easy, while the licentious empress, Messalina, was in power. But on the fall and death of Messalina (48 AD)—for which Agrippina may have intrigued—the way seemed opened. With the assistance of the emperor's freedman, Pallus, Agrippina proved the successful candidate for Claudius' affections. She now felt secure to carry out the plans for the elevation of her son: (1) to betroth him to Octavia, the daughter of Claudius, having previously, by the villainy of Vitellius, broken off the engagement between Octavia and Lucius Silanus (ib. xlvii). Later, N. married this unfortunate lady. (2) Vitellius again obliged by securing a modification of Rom law so as to permit a marriage with a brother's (not sister's) daughter, and in 49 Agrippina became empress. (3) In the meantime she had caused Seneca to be recalled from banishment and had entrusted to him the education of N. for imperial purposes. (4) The adoption of her son by Claudius (50 AD). (5) She next secured early honors and titles for N. in order to mark him out as Claudius' successor. (6) She caused Britannicus, Claudius' son, to be kept in the background and treated as a mere child, removing by exile or death suspected supporters of Britannicus. (7) Agrippina was far-sighted and anticipated a later secret of Rom imperialism—the influence of the armies in the nomination of the emperor. For this cause she took an active interest in military affairs and gave her name to a new colony on the Rhine (modern Cologne). But she did not forget the importance of securing the praetorian guard and Burrus the prefect. (8) She persuaded Claudius to remove his friends. All was now ready. But Claudius did not like the idea of excluding his son Britannicus from power, and murmurs were heard among the senate and people. Delay might prove fatal to Agrippina's plans, so (9) Claudius must die. The notorious Lucusta administered poison in a dish of mushrooms, and Xenophon, Agrippina's physician, thrust a poisoned feather down Claudius' throat on the pretence of helping him to vomit. Burrus then took N. forth and caused him to be proclaimed emperor by the praetorians.

III. Nero's Reign.—Nero's reign falls into three periods, the first of which is the celebrated quinquennium, or first 5 years, characterized by good government at home and increase of the provinces and popularity with both senate and people. Agrippina, having seated her son on the throne, did not purpose to relinquish power herself; she intended to rule along with him. And at first N. was very devoted to her and had given as watchword to the guard, "the best of mothers" (Tac. Ann. xii.2; Suet. ix). This caused a sharp conflict with Seneca and Burrus, who could not tolerate Agrippina's arrogance and unbounded influence over her son. In order to do him honor, his mother they encouraged him in an amour with a Gr. freedwoman, Acte (Tac. Ann. xiii.12). This first blow to Agrippina's influence was soon followed by the dismissal from court of her chief protector Pallus. She esteemed his influence for the benefit of her grandson, Germanicus, and present him as the rightful heir to the throne. This cost Britannicus his life, for N., feeling insecure while a son of Claudius lived, compassed his death at a banquet. A hot wine cup was offered Britannicus, and to cool it it was added which had been adulterated with a virulent poison. The victim succumbed immediately. All eyes fastened on N. in suspicion, but he boldly asserted that the death was due to a bit of epilepsy—a disease to which Britannicus had been subject from childhood. Such was the fate of Agrippina's first protégé. She next took up the cause of the despised and ill-treated Octavia, which so incensed her son that he deprived her of her guards and caused her to remove from the palace. Agrippina now disappears for the next few years to come into brief and tragic prominence later. Seneca and Burrus undertook the management of affairs, with results that justified the favorable impression which the first 5 years of N.'s reign made upon the Roman people. Many reforms were initiated, financial, social and legislative. These ministers treated N. to counsels of moderation and justice, dictating a policy which left considerable liberty to the senate. But perceiving in the height of his evil nature, they allowed him to indulge in low pleasures and excesses with the most profligate companions, thinking, perhaps, that this excess would end the republic at once. He grew more and more with the most dissolute companions, conspicuous among whom were Salvidius Otho and Claudius Seneceo.

The former had a wife as ambitious as she was unprincipled, and endowed, according to Tacitus, with every gift of nature except an "honorable mind." Already divorced before marrying Otho, she was minded to employ Otho merely as a tool to enable her to become N.'s consort. With the appearance of Poppea, Sabina (58 AD), whose name opens the second period of N.'s reign. She proved his evil star. Under her influence he shook off all restraints, turned a deaf ear to his best advisers and plunged deeper into immorality and crime. She allowed, if not persuaded, N. to give her husband a commission in the distant province of Lusitania. Her jealousy could tolerate no possible rival. She plotted the death of Agrippina to which she easily persuaded N. to consent. This was carried on with the greatest cunning. Anicetus, admiral of the fleet, undertook to construct a vessel that would sink to order. N. invited his mother to his villa at Baiae at the Quinquagenarian celebration. After the banquet he showed her his "secret garden" by the vessel prepared. But the plan did not succeed, and Agrippina saved herself by swimming ashore. She pretended to treat the matter as an accident, sending a freedman to N. to inform him of her escape. Anicetus, however, relieved N. of the awkward position by pretending that Agrippina's freedman had dropped a dagger which was considered proof enough of her guilt. Deserted by her friends and slaves except one freedman, she was quickly dispatched by her murderers. N. gave out that she had killed herself by suicide (Suet. xxxiv; Tac. Ann. exi–cxviii).

N., no longer made any secret of taking Poppaea as his mistress, and, under her influence, led defiance to the best Rom traditions and the professed principles of paganism. He was 62 AD matters grew much worse by the death of the praetorian prefect, Burrus. Seneca lost in him a powerful ally, and Poppaea gained in one of the new prefects, Sosonius Tigellinus, a powerful ally. She succeeded in causing Seneca to retire from the court. Next she determined to remove Octavia. A charge of adultery was first tried, but as the evidence proved too weak, N. simply divorced her because of barrenness. Then Anicetus was persuaded to confess adultery with her, and the innocent Octavia was banished to the island of Pandateria, where a little later she was executed at Poppaea's orders and her head brought to her rival (62 AD). Poppaea was now empress, and the next year bore a daughter to N., but the child died when only three months old. Two years later Poppaea herself died during pregnancy, of a cruel kick inflicted by N. in a fit of rage (65 AD). He pronounced a eulogy over her and took as her wife, Statilia Messalina, of whom he had no issue.

N., having by his extravagance exhausted the well-filled treasury of Claudius (as Catus did that of Tiberius), was driven to fill his coffers by confiscations of the property of rich nobles and his对策 Tigellinus could trump the slightest plausible charge. But even this did not prevent a financial crisis—the beginning of the bankruptcy of the later Roman empire. The provinces which at first enjoyed good government were now plundered; new and heavy taxes were imposed. Worst of all, the gold and silver coinage was deprecat ed, and the senate was deprived of the right of copper coinage.

This difficulty was much increased by the great fire which was not only destructive to both private and state property, but also necessitated the providing thousands of homeless with shelter, and lowering the price of corn. On July 18, 64, this great conflagration broke out in Circus Maximus. A high wind caused it to spread rapidly over a large portion of the city, sweeping before it ill-built streets of wooden houses. At the end of six days it was extinguished. It was extensively for lack of material when another conflagration started in a different quarter of the city. Various exaggerated accounts of the destruction are found in Roman historians: of the 14 city regions 7 were said to have been totally destroyed and 4 partially. N. was at Antium at the time. He hastened back to the city and apparently took every means of arresting the spread of the flames. He superintended in person the work of the fire brigades, often exposing himself to danger. After the fire he threw open his own gardens to the homeless and ordered the public property caused great consternation, and, for whatever reasons, suspicion seemed to fix upon N. Rumor had it that on hearing the Greek verse, "When I am dead let the earth be wrapped in fire," he interrupted, "Nay rather, when will it be put out?" (Suet. xxvii) and had often deplored the ugliness of the city. This led to N.'s offering an opportunity to rebuild it; that he purposefully set fire in order to find room for his magnificent Domus Aurea ("Golden House"); that when the city was burning he gazed upon it from the tower of Maecenas delighted with what he termed "the beauty of the conflagration"; that he recited in actor's costume the sack of Troy (Suet. xxviii; Tac. Ann. xv.38 ff.). In spite of all these reports N. must be absolved of the guilt of incendiaryism.

Such pardoned indulgences were attributed to the wrath of the gods. In the present case everything was done to appease the offended deity. Yet, in spite of all, suspicion still clung to N. "Wherefore in order to explain his incendiaryism he was guilty (subsiditi reos), and afflicted with the most exquisite punishments those who were hated for their abominations [flagitia] and called Christians' by the populace. Christians, from whom the name was derived, was named by the tribune of the Flavian people Pontius Pilatus in the reign of Tiberius. This noxious form of religion [zitiobilia superstitionis], checked for a time, broke out again not only in Judaea its original home, but also throughout the empire (Tac. Hist. v). who among its abominations met and find devotees. Therefore first of all those who confessed [i.e. to being Christians] were arrested, and then as a result of their information a large number [multitudo ingens] were implicated [reading conjuncti, not convicti], not so much on the charge of incendiaryism as for hatred of the human race. They died by methods of mockery; some were covered with the skins of wild beasts and then torn by dogs, some were crucified, some were burned as torches to give light at night . . . . whence [after scenes of extreme cruelty] consummation was required for them, although guilty and deserving the worst penalties, for men felt that their destruction was not on account of the public welfare but to gratify the cruelty of one who was a [Nero]" (Tac. Ann. xxv.44). Such is the earliest account of the first heathen persecution (as well as the first record of the crucifixion by a heathen writer). Tacitus here clearly implies that the Christians were innocent (subsiditi reos), and that N. employed them simply as scapegoats. Some regard the conclusion of the paragraph as a contradiction to this—"though guilty and deserving the severest punishment" (adversus santes et novissima exempla meritis). But Tacitus means by so few that the Christians were 'guilty' from the point of view of the populace, and that they merited extreme punishment also from his own standpoint for other causes, but not for arson. Fatebantur does not mean that they confessed to incendiaryism, but to being Christians, and qui fatebantur means there were some who boldly confessed, while others tried to conceal or perhaps even denied their faith.

But why were the Christians selected as scapegoats? Why not the Jews, who were both numerous and had already offended the Rom people of which the great fire had been in great numbers? Or why not the most notorious (1 Peter) and who bore a name derogatory to Judaism and had certainly enough influence over N.
to protect the Jews; she was regarded by them as a proselyte and is termed by Jos (Ant. XX, VIII, 11) ἐθνοῦσα, "god-fearing." When the populace and the Jews were discussing retiring for the night, the Jews were not allowed to depart; they have been glad of the opportunity of putting forward their cause. The Jews have been embroiled in the Thirty Years' War.

Farrar (Early Days of Christianity, 1, ch iv)

sees, "In the proselytism of Poppaea, guided by Jewish microbes, and the attacks of the first Christian persecution." (2) Closely connected with this was the theme of the reaction by the Roman government that Christianity was the "enemy of the state." This may have been the first rebuff to the proselytism of Poppaea, guided by Jewish microbes, and the attacks of the first Christian persecution.

(3) As Christianity formed a society apart from Roman society, all kinds of crimes were attributed to its followers. Thys-tean feasts, nightly orgies, hostility to temples and images. These feasts seemed summed up in "adum humani generis," "hatred for the human race." (4) They were easily selected as being so numerous and making most progress in a line opposed to Roman spirit: of magna multitudem (Tac. Ann. xx. 44; Clemens Rom. Cor. 1: 6, 8, εν τοις παραμετρεσιν, of other "great multitude" of Rev 7: 9; 18: 1). (5) No doubt, too, early Christian enthusiasm was unequivocal in its expressions, esp. in its belief in the sovereignty of Christ and his world and the divine faith amidst the despair of others.

In the meantime Tigellinus' tyranny and confisca-tions to meet N.'s expenses caused deep discontent among the nobles, which culminated in the famous conspiracy at Cilicia. Calpurnius Piso (65 AD) was murdered. The plot was prematurely betrayed by Milichius. An insurrection followed in which the most illustrious victims who perished were Seneca the philosopher, Lucan the poet, Lucretia, the beautiful and famous sister of Seneca and father of Lucan, T. Petronius Arbiter, "the glass of fashion." Finally, "N. having butchered so many illustrious men, at last desired to extirpate virtue itself by the death of Thraseas, Paetus and Barca Soranus" (Tac. Ann. xvi. 21f).

Having cleared every suspected person out of the way, he abandoned the government in Rome to a freedman Helius, and started on a long visit to Greece (65-66 AD), where he had to oust the local contests and games, himself winning prizes from the obsequious Greeks, in return for which N. bestowed upon them "freedom." N. was so un-Roman that he was perfectly at home in Greece, whereas he had been unappreciated by cultured people. In the meantime the revolt of Vindex in Gaul commenced (66 AD), but it was soon quelled by Verginius Rufus on account of its national Gaulic character. Galba of Hither Spain next declared himself legatus of the senate and the Roman people. N. was persuaded to return to Rome by Helius; he confiscated Galba's property, but his weakness and hesitancy greatly helped the cause of the latter.

lute emperor to withdraw from Rome and then told the praetorians that N. had deserted them. N. was a coward, both in life and in death. While he had the means of escape, even from Galba, he was revolving plans of despair in his Servilian gardens, whether he should surrender himself to the mercies of the Partisans or to those of Galba; whether Galba would allow him the province of Egypt; whether he would forgive him, and, if not, if he would show penitence enough. In his distraction a comforter asked him in the words of Virgil, "Is it then so wretched to die?" He could not summon the courage for suicide, nor could he find one to inflame the blow for him: "Have I then neither friend nor foe?" Phan a freedman offered him the shelter of his villa a few miles from Rome. Here he prepared for suicide, but with great cowardice. He kept exclaiming, "What an artist I am to perish!" (Quaest. art. p. 6, Stuet. xlix). On learning that he was condemned to a cruel death by the senate, he put the execution of his plans to the test in the fatal blow by Epaphroditus his secretary. A centurion entered pretending he had come to help: "Too late—this is fidelity," were Nero's last words.

His remains were laid in the family vault of the Domitii by the money of Vindex and his comrade Acte (Suet. I). Thus perished on July 9, 68 AD the last of the line of Julius Caesar in his 31st year and in the 14th of his reign.

IV. Downfall and Character. — The causes of his down-tum were, N., like his three predecessors, being very burdensome taxation and financial insecurity; (2) tyranny and cruelty of his favoritism. His cruelty both bred dissatisfaction to fasten suspicion on N. and to secure the disposal of his wealth. (3) The immediate cause of his downfall was the secession of "god-fearing." (4) The unpopular measure of the extension of Christianity, especially, and the security engendered by the success with which the conspiracy of Piso was crushed; (5) the "secret of empire," that an emperor could be created elsewhere than at Rome, that the succession of emperors was not hereditary, but rested with the people; (6) the cowardice and weakness which N. displayed in the revolt which threatened to destroy his reign.

His reign is memorable for the activity of Seneca, the great fire, the persecution of Christians, the beginning of the bankruptcy of the later República, the Christian disaster of Pacetus (62 AD) corrected by Corbulo and the humiliation of Paphia, the outbreak of the insurrection in Judaea (66 AD), which ended in the destruction of Jews.

Nero ranks with Galba for folly and vice, while his cruelties recall the worst years of Tiberius. Very offem-inate in his tastes, particular about the arrangement of his palace, from the carvings on his voice, his greatest fault was inordinate vanity which courted applause for performances on non-Rom lines. He neglected his high office and deserted Rom standards by zeal for secondary pursuits. N., like his three predecessors, was very susceptible to female charms. He was licentious in the extreme, often to guilt of that nameless vice of antiquity — love of a man's favor. He was, however, so un-Roman and his virtues clearly recall the worst years of Tiberius. Very offem-

and the smitten head whose “deathstroke was hoarded” as N., and some scholars take Rev 17 10 f as referring to N. The “scarlet-colored beast” of 17 3 may be intended either for N.’s personal or for Rome’s general rule. The latter seems more likely, N. in particular. That the number 666 (Rev 13:18) represents N.’s name seems probable, for 666 is equivalent to Neron Kesar is significant, for the Jewish Christians would be familiar with simooms of the numerical equivalent and would have been told to “make no account of it.”

Neron was a former senator of Rome. He was a politician, a poet, and a statesman. He was also a deeply religious man, and his government was marked by a number of religious policies. He was a proponent of the philosophy of Stoicism, which emphasized the importance of reason and virtue. He was also a supporter of the cult of Isis, which was a popular religious movement in Rome at the time.

The book of Revelation is a complex and symbolic text, and the interpretation of its symbols has been a matter of dispute among scholars. Some scholars believe that the beast of the Apocalypse represents Neron, while others believe that it represents a political or economic entity.

VI. Neron and Christianity. — The name Neron does not occur in the NT; but he was the Caesar to whom Paul appealed (Ac 25 11).

1. Neron and the tribunum Paulus tried the NT after his first imprisonment. It was quite likely that N. heard Paul’s case in person, for the emperor showed much interest in the trial of the Christians. The case was either an Antiochian or a Jewish one, for the Gentiles; cf. esp. Commodian, Carm. Apol. (926): “To us N. became Antichrist, to the Jews the other Antichrist, to the Romans.”

There was an alternate theory that N. had really been killed and that the persecutions would rise again (8th B 516 f; Augustine, De Civ. Dei, xi.19: under the name of Neron rex resurrectionem et Juturn Antichristi suspicantur).

2. Neronian Policy and Christianity. — Any disturbance of society or was con- founded by the Romans with Judaism (sub umbra Tyri beina Judaeorum religiosi: Pert. Apol., xxi.). Paul, writing to the Christians of the capital, urged them to be subject to subjection for the welfare of their country as “ordained of God” (Rom 13 1 f), and his high estimate of the Roman government as a favorite with the emperor was enhanced by his mild captivity at Rome which permitted him to carry on his defense there. He was at home again on the first trial (accepting the view of a first acquittal and subsequent activity before condemnation). But soon after, he was transferred to the trial of Paul, a Roman citizen, at Rome (about 60), and was again acquittal. During this time and on the progress of the new religion, the distinction between Christianity and Judaism became apparent to the Roman authorities. If it had not been proscribed as a religio illicita (“unlicensed religion”), neither had it been admitted as a religio licita. Christianity was not in itself a crime: its adherents were not liable to persecution “for the name.”

According to one view the Neronian persecution was a spas-modic act and an isolated incident in imperial policy: the Christians were on this occasion put forward merely to remove suspicion from N. They were not persecuted either as Christians or as incendiaries, but on account of flagellum. According to another hypothesis, Oedipus incest and nightly orgies were attributed to them, and their withdrawal from society and exclusive manners were assumed to be charges of the sect for society. The evidence of Tacitus (Ann. xv.44) would bear out this view of the Neronian persecution as accidental, isolated, to satisfy the revenge of the mob, confined to Rome and of brief duration. The other view is, how- ever, supported by Church history (Acts 21; the Rom. Empire, ch xi.) and E. G. Hardy (Studies in Paul’s apostolic speeches, p. 31). The persecution of Christians as a permanent police regulation in a list of other seemingly permanent measures (Neron xiii.40; cf. Paul’s criticism of the legionaries in 1 Thess, ii.20), which is inconsistent with the account in Acts, has been the result of the initial state of things and inveterate the permanent result. The Christians by these trials, though not convicted of incendiarism, were brought into honorable prominence; their social and exclusive manners, their withdrawal from the duties of the state, their active proselytism, together with the charges of immorality, thus established them in Rome as the enemies of society. Christianity thus became a crime and was banned by the police authorities. Suetonius gives a summary of the general principle of the Neronian laws: “It was necessary that the sects should be put down by force, and that the name of Christian should be witches, malefactors, and vagabonds.”

The charge of witchcraft was made against the Christians by the Jewish sect of the Gnostics, and was used as a convenient term for all who opposed the official religion of the state. The charge of malefactors was made against the Christians by the Roman authorities, who disliked their opposition to the state religion.

demanded their use, at least in the case of pigeons and doves, for sacrifice. In 29:18, Job cries, "Then I said, I shall die in my nest, And I shall multiply my days as the sand." That is, he hoped in his days of prosperity to die in the house he had built for his wife and children. In Ps 84:3 David sings, "Yea, the sparrow hath found her a house, And the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young. Even shine altars, O Jeh of hosts, My King, and my God."

These lines are rich and ripe with meaning, for in those days all the world protected a temple nest, even to the infliction of the death penalty on anyone interfering with it. This was because the bird was supposed to be claiming the protection of the gods. Hebrew, Arab and Egyptian guarded all nests on places of worship. Pagan Rome executed the shoemaker who killed a raven that built on a temple, and Athens took the same revenge on the man who destroyed the nest of a swallow. Isaiah compared the destruction of Assyria to the robbing of a bird's nest: "And my hand hath found as a nest the riches of the peoples; and as one gathereth eggs that are forsaken, have I gathered all the earth: and there was none that moved the wing, or that opened the mouth, or chirped" (Isa 10:14; cf 16:2). Matthew quotes Jesus as having said, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the heaven have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." (Mt 8:20=Lk 9:58).

NETAIM, nē-ta-im, nē-ta-im, nē-tā-im (νηταίμ, nē’tāim; B, ἄστις, ἀστιαί, A, ἀστια, ἀστιαί). In 1 Ch 4:23 AV reads "those that dwell among plants and hedges," RV "the inhabitants of Netaim and Gederah." The latter may be taken as correct. Gedera or was in the Judaean Shephelah. Here also we should seek for Netaim; but no likely identification has yet been suggested.

NEATHANEL, nē-than’el, ne’tha-nel (νηθαναήλ, nēthanēl; God has given); Ἀναθάναλ, Nathanahal; NA, Nethanæel, nēthan’el). See also Medan (nēthan’el). (1) A chief or prince of Issachar (Nu 1:8; 2:5; 7:18; 23:10; 15). (2) The 4th son of Jesse (1 Ch 2:14). (3) One of the trumpet-blowers before the ark when it was brought up from the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch 15:24). (4) A Levite scribe, the father of Shemiah (1 Ch 24:6). (5) The 8th son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26:4). (6) One of the princes whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17:7). (7) A Levite who gave cattle for Josiah's Passover (2 Ch 35:19). (8) One of the priests who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10:22; cf 1 Esd 9:22). (9) A priest registered under the high priest Joakim (Neh 12:21). NETHINIM, nēth’i-nim (νηθινίμ, nēthiṇim, "given"); Ναθινεὶμ, Nathineim; AV Nethinims). A group of temple-servants (1 Ch 9:2). The word has always the article, and does not occur in the singular. The LXX translators usually transliterate, but in one passage (1 Ch 9:2) they render, "the given ones" (hoi dedemonioi). The Syr (Pesh) also, in Ezr, Neh, transliterates the word, but in 1 Ch 9:2 renders it by a word meaning "sojourners." The meaning is uncertain, of a state of servitude, and Jeos seems to confirm the suggestion by calling the N. "temple-slaves" (hierōdoulou) (Ant, XI, 1, 1). It should, however, be noted that another form of this word is employed in the directions regarding the Levites: "Thou shalt give the Levites unto Aaron and to his sons: they are wholly given unto him on behalf of the children of Israel" (Nu 3:9; cf also 8:16-19).

Of the history of the N. in earlier times there are but few and uncertain traces. When Joshua discovered that he had been beguiled by the Gibeonites into a covenant to let them live, he reduced their tribe to servitude, and declared, "Now therefore ye are cursed, and there shall never be numbering of your children, both of trees of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God" (Josh 9:23-27). It is no doubt tempting to see in the Gibeonites the earliest N., but another tradition traces their origin to a god of Davi for the service of the Levites (Ezr 8:20). Their names, too, indicate diversity of origin; for besides being mostly un-Hebrew in aspect, some of them are found elsewhere in the OT as names of non-Israelitish tribes. The Neumim, for example (Ezr 2:50—Neh 7:52), are in all likelihood descended from the Moabites or Moanites who are mentioned as harassing Israel (Jgs 10:12), as in conflict with the Simeonites (1 Ch 4:41), and as finally overcome by Uzziah (2 Ch 26:7). The next name in the lists is that of the children of NePam. These may be traced to the Hagrite clan of Naphsh (Gen 25:15; 1 Ch 5:19). In both Ezr and Neh, the list is immediately followed by that of the servants of Solomon, whose duties were similar to, and may be even humbler than, those of the N. These servants of Solomon appear to be descendants of the Canaanites whom Solomon employed in the building of his temple (1 K 5:15). All these indications are perhaps slight; but they point in the same direction, and warrant the assumption that the N. were originally foreign slaves, mostly prisoners of war, who had from time to time been given to the temple by the kings and princes of the nation, and that to them were assigned the lower menial duties of the house of God. At the time of the return from the exile the N. had come to be regarded as important. Their number was considerable: 392 accompanied Ezra after the first Return in 538 BC (Ezr 2:57—Neh 7:60). 3. Post-exilic History When Ezra, some 50 years later, organized the second Return, he secured a contingent of N. numbering 220 (Ezr 8:20). In Jerus they enjoyed the same privileges and immunities as the other religious orders, being included by the scribes' letters among those who should be exempt from toll, custom and tribute (Ezr 7:24). A part of the city in Ophel, opposite the Water-gate, was assigned them as an official residence (Neh 3:31), and the situation is certainly appropriate if their duties at all resembled those of the Gibeonites (see Ryle, "Ezra and Nehemia, " in Cambridge Bible, Intro, 57). They were also organized into a kind of guild under their own leaders of the profession.

The N. are not again mentioned in Scripture. It is probable that they, with the singers and porters, became gradually incorporated in the general body of Levites; their name passed ere long into a tradition, and became at later times a butt for the scorn and bitterness of the Talmudic writers against everything that they regarded as un-Jewish.

Netophah, nē-te'fā (_NETOPH), nē'tophāh; LXX Nerōphā, Netophā, Nepōrhā, Nepōthō, and other variants: The birthplace of two of David's heroes, Manases and Helez (2 Sam 23, 22; 1 Chron 11, 22); and so of Seraph, the son of Tanhumeth the Netophathite, one of the captains who came to offer allegiance to Gedaliah (2 K 25 23; Jer 40 8). "The villages of the Netophathites" are mentioned (1 Ch 9 16) as the dwellings of certain Levites (and Neh 12 18; AV "Netophathi") of certain "sons of the singers."

The first mention of the place itself is in Ezr 2 22; Neh 7 26; 1 Esd 8 18 (RV "Netophai"); where we have lists of the exiles returning from Babylon under Zerubbabel; the place is mentioned between the Bethlehem and Anathoth and in literary association with other cities in the mountains of Judah, e.g. Gibea, Kiriat-jeerom, Chepherhe and Beeroth. In this respect it is most plausible to identify it with Netophai, although the disappearance of the terminal guttural in the latter creates a difficulty. Conder has suggested a site known as Kh. Umm-Tuba, N.E. of Bethlehem, an ancient site, but not apparently of great importance. Beit Netāfim, an important village on a lofty siting in the Shephelah near the "Vale of Elah," also appears to have an echo of the name, and indeed may well be the Beth Netophah of the Mish (שְׁבֹאָד, ix; 5; Neubauer, Geogr., 128), but the position does not seem to agree at all with that of the OT Netophai. For Kh. Umm-Tuba see PEF, III, 128; for Beit Netāfim, PEF, III, 24; RBR, II, 17f; both Sh XVII.

Netophai, nē-te'fās (B. Netōphās, Netōbas, A. Netophai, Netōpah): A town named in 1 Esd 8 18, identical with "Netophai of" Ezr 2 22; Neh 7 26.

Netophath, nē-tof'āthi, Netophathites, nē-tof'ā-thites. See Netophai.

Netties, net'ls: (1) הָרָעל, hā'rel (Job 30 7; Prov. 24 31; Zeph 2 9 m, in all, "wild vetches"); the tr. "nettles" is due to the supposed derivations of הָרָעל from an (obs.) הָרָע, hā'rel, meaning "to be sharp" or "stinging," but a tr. "thorn" (as in Vulg) would in that case do as well. LXX has φλογάρα ἄμφα, phlogará ampha, "wild bushwood," in Job, and certainly the association with the "salt-wort" and the "broom," in the passage would best be met by the supposition that it means the low thorny bushes plentiful in association with these plants. "Vetch" is suggested by the Aram., but is very uncertain. (2) בְּנֵי נֶטֶפָּה, b'nē'ne-te'fāh (Isa 34 13; Hos 9 6), and pl. בְּנֵי נֶטֶפָּה בְּנֵי נֶטֶפָּה (Prov 24 31), " NETAI (RV) "thorns" because of the tr. of הָרָעל as "nettles" in the same ver. From Isa 34 13 b'nē-ne-te'fāh is apparently distinct from thorns, and the tr. "nettle" is very probable, as such neglected or deserted places as described in the three references really become overgrown with nettles in Pal. The common and characteristic Pal nettle is the Urtica pilulifera, so called from the globular heads of its flowers.

Network, net'wark (NETAI, s'bakhāhāh): RV in 2 K 26 17; 2 Ch 4 13 (also in pl., vs 12,13), for "wreathe work" and "wreath" in AV (of the adornment of the capitals of the pillars of Solomon's temple; see Jachin and Boaz). "Networks" in Isa 19 9 is in RV correctly rendered "white cloth."

In ARV "network" is substituted for "pictures" in AV (Prov 25 11), "baskets" in ERV, "filigree work."

New, nō, NEWNESS, nōnes (!=-, ḫādāhāh; kainōs, kainōs, νέος, νέος): The word commonly tr. "new" in the OT in ḫādāhāh, "bright," "fresh," "new" (special interest was shown in, and importance attached to, fresh and new things and events); Ex 1 8; Dt 20 5; 25 8; 24 5; 1 S 6 7; 2 S 21 16; Ps 33 3, "a new song"; Jer 31 31, "new covenant"; Ezk 11 19, "a new spirit"; 18 31, "new heart"; 36 26, etc; ḫādāhāh is "the new moon," "the new-moon day" in the first of the lunar month, a festival, then "month" (Gen 29 14, "a month of days"); it occurs frequently, oft tr. "month"; we have "new moon" (1 S 20 5 19 24, etc); trōth is "new [sweet] wine" (Neh 10 9; in Jer 1 5; 3 18, it is ḫādāhāh, RV "sweet wine"); in Jer 2 13, "a new heart and a new spirit".

Other words in the OT for "new" are ḫādāhāh, Aram. (Ezr 6 4): ḫāl, "fresh" (Jgs 15 15, RV, "fresh jawbone of an ass"); ḫāl, "a creation" (Nu 16 30, if ḫāl make a distinction in the things of earth and heaven, so does ḫāl, "first fruits," "first fruit," "firstfruits." Ezk 47 12; so RV); ḫāl, "setting," is tr. newly" (Gen 1 10; also mi-kāšāh, "recently" (Dt 32 17, RV "of late"); news is shērāmēth, "report," "tidings"; Prov 25 25, "good news from a far country."

In the NT the "new" (mostly kainōs, "new," "fresh," "newly made") is an important word. We have the title of the "New Testament" 2. In the NT, the itself, rightly given by ARV as "New Covenant," the designation of the "new dispensation" ushered in through Christ, the words relating to which the volume contains. We have "new covenant" (kainōs) in Lk 22 20, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood!" (ERV "treaty"); in Mt 26 28; Mk 14 24, "new" is omitted in RV, but in Mt m "many ancient authorities insert new," and in Mk "many ancient authorities: 1) Cor 11 25, ERV "or covenant"; 2 Cor 3 6, ERV "or covenant"; He 8 8, ERV "or covenant"; in ver 13, "covenant" is supplied (cf He 12 24, neos).

Corresponding to this, we have (2 Cor 5 17, AV and RV): "The old things have passed away; behold, they are become new"; ib. "If any man is in Christ, he is a new creation." RV, "there is a new creation"; Gal 6 15, "or creation," "new man" (Eph 2 15); 4 24; Col 3 10 (neos): "new commandment" (Jn 13 34) "new doctrine" (Acts 17 19); "new thing" (17 21); "newness of life" (kainōtēs) (Rom 6 4): "newness of the spirit" (7 6; cf 2 Cor 5 17); "a new name" (Rev 2 17; 12 12): "new heavens and a new earth" (2 Pet 3 13); "new Jerusalem" (Rev 3 12; 21 2); "new song" (Rev 5 9; cf "new friend" and "new wine" (Sib 9 106); "newly anointed," "newborn" (1 Pet 2 2); "prosphoriānos, newly slain" (He 10 20, RV, "new and living way, through the blood that is to give, through the door that is to be slain") in Mk "new" (Jh 4 3): "new is the tr. of neos, "new," "young" (1 Cor 5 7; Col 3 10, "new man": He 12 24, "new covenant").

The difference in meaning between kainōs and neos, is, in the main, that kainōs denotes new in respect of quality, "the new as such; new age that which has seen service, the outworn, the effete; or marred through age"); neos, "new in [respect of time, that which has recently come into existence," e.g. kainōn mnēmeōn, the "new tomb" in which Jesus was laid, was one specially made, but one in which no other dead had ever lain; the "new covenant," the "new man," etc, may be contemplated under both aspects of quality and of time (Trench, Synonyms of the NT, 209 f).

In Mt 9 16; Mk 2 21; aγναπόθος, "unsoothed,"
“unfinished,” is tr. “new,” “new cloth,” RV “undressed.” For “new bottles” (Lk 5 38 and |s), RV has “fresh wine-asks.” W. L. Walker

NEZIHAH, nê-zî'â (נֶזְיָה, nêzyâb): The head of a family of Nethinim (Exz 2 54; Neh 7 56), called in 1 Esd 5 32, “Nazi” (AV and RVm “Naisith”).

NEZIB, nê-zîb (נֶזְיָב, nêzyib; B, Naezûb, Nascb, A, Nezzûb, Nezûb): A town in the Judaean Shephelah, mentioned along with Keilah and Marshesh (Josh 15 43). Onom places it 7 miles from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrîn), on the road to Hebron. It is represented today by Beit Nasib, a village with ancient remains some 2 miles S.W. of Kharbet Kila (Keilah).

NIBHAZ, nib'haz (ניבazaar, nibhaz): Given as the name of an idol of the Avrites, introduced by them into Samaria (2 K 17 31), but otherwise unknown. The text is supposed to be corrupt.

NIBSHAN, nib'shan (ניבשון, nibshon): ha-nibshôn, B, Naösîn, Nabshôn, Nophshôn, A, Naosien, Nebshôn): A city in the Judaean wilderness named between Seccach and the City of Salt (Josh 15 62). Onom knows the place but gives no clue to its identification. The site has not been recovered. Wellhausen suggests the emendation of nibshôn to kibshôn, “furnace” (Proelg 3, 344).

NICANOR, ni-kâ'nôr, ni-kâ-nôr (Νικάνωρ, Nîkânôr): The son of Patroclus and one of the king’s “chief friends” (2 Macc 8 9), a Syrian general under Antiochus Epiphanes and Demetrius Soter, after the defeat of Saron by Judas, Epiphanes instigated his chancellor Lysias with the reduction of Judaea (1 Macc 3 34 ff). Nicanaus was one of the three generals commissioned by Lysias—the others being Ptolemy, son of Dorymenes, and Gorgias (3 38). The campaign began in 166 BC; the Syrians were defeated at Emmaus (3 57 ff), while Gorgias at a later stage gained a victory at Jamnia over a body of Jews who disobeyed Judas (5 58). The account given in 2 Macc differs considerably, both in omissions and in additions (2 Macc 8 9 ff). There Nicanaus, not Gorgias, is the chief in command. The battle of Emmaus is not mentioned, but “the thrice-acursed Nicanaus,” having in overweening pride invited a thousand small dealers to accompany him to buy the Jewish captives, was humiliated, and his host was destroyed, he himself escaping “like a fugitive slave” to Antioch (2 Macc 8 34 ff). After the death of Epiphanes, Eupator and Lyons (the last two at the hands of Demetrius and Judas Maccæus), Nicanaus appears again under King Demetrius in the struggle between Alcimus and Judas. Alcimus, having been seated in the priesthood by Demetrius’ officer Bacchides, could not hold it against Judas and the patriots. He appealed again to Demetrius, who this time selected Nicanaus, now governor of Cyprus (2 Macc 12 2) and known for his deadly hatred of the Jews, to settle the dispute and slay Judas (14 12 ff; 1 Macc 7 26 ff). Nicanaus was appointed governor of Judaea on this occasion. Again 1 and 2 Macc differ. According to 1 Macc, Nicanaus sought in vain to seize Judas by treachery. Then followed the battle of Capharsalama (‘village of peace’), in which the Syrians were defeated, though Jos (Ant, XII, x, 5) says Judas was defeated. Nicanaus retired to Jerusalem, insulted the patriots and threatened the destruction of the temple unless they delivered up Judas. He then retired to Beth-horon to find Judas posted opposite him at Adasa (1 Macc 7 39 ff), 3/4 miles distant. Here on the 15th of the 12th month Adar (March), 160 BC, the Syrians sustained a crushing defeat, Nicanaus himself being the first to fall. The Jews cut off his head and proud right hand and hanged him up beside Jerus. For a little while Adasa gave the land of Judah rest. The people ordained to keep this “day of great gladness” year by year—the 13th of Adar, “the day before the day of Mordecai” (Feast of Purim). 2 Macc mentions that Simon, Judas’ brother, was worsted in a first engagement (14 17), omits the battle of Capharsalama, and represents Nicanaus, struck with the manliness of the Jews, as entering into friendly relations with Judas, urging him to marry and lead a quiet life, forgetful of the king’s command until Alcimus accused him to Demetrius. The latter peremptorily ordered Nicanaus to bring Judas in haste as prisoner to Antioch (14 27). The scene of the final conflict (Adasa) is given only as “in the region of Samaria” (15 1). According to this account, it was Judas who ordered the mutilation of Nicanaus and in a more gruesome fashion (15 20 ff). It is possible that the Nicanaus, the Cyriarch or governor of Cyprus of 2 Macc 12 2, is a different person from Nicanaus, the son of Patroclus—a view not accepted in the above account. S. Axvus NICANOR (Νικάνωρ, Nikànôr): One of the “seven” chosen to superintend “the daily ministration” of the poor of the Christian community at Jerusalem (Acts 6 5). The name is Gr.

NICODEMUS, nik-ô-de'mus (Νικόδημος, Nikôdêmos): A Pharisee and a “ruler of the Jews,” mentioned only by St. John. He (1) interviewed Christ at Jerusalem and was taught by Him the doctrine of the New Birth (Jn 3 1-15); (2) desired Him before the Sanhedrin (Jn 7 50-52); (3) witnessed at His burial (Jn 19 39-42). This meeting, which it has been surmised took place in the house of St. John (Jn 3 1-15), was one of the results of Our Lord’s ministry at Jerusalem during the last Passover (Jn 11 5; 12 1). Although N. had been thus won to believe in the Divine nature of Christ’s mission, his faith was yet very incomplete in that he believed Him to be inspired only after the fashion of the OT prophets. To this faint-hearted faith corresponded his timidity of action, which displayed itself in his coming to him at night, lest he should offend his colleagues in the Sandhedrin and the other hostile Jews (ver 2). In answer to the veiled question which the words of N. implied, and to convince him of the inadequacy of mere intellectual belief, Christ proclaimed to him the necessity for a spiritual regeneration: “Except one be born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God” (ver 3). This was interpreted by N. only in its materialistic sense, and therefore caused him bewilderment and confusion (ver 4). But Christ, as on another occasion when dealing with His questioners on a similar point of doctrine (cf Jn 6 52,53), answered his perplexity only by repeating His previous statement (ver 5). He then proceeded to give further explanation. The rebirth is not outward but inward, it is not of the body but of the soul (ver 6). Just as God is the real agent in the birth of the body, so also is He the Creator of the New Spirit; and just as no one knoweth whose womb hath brought forth “the Spirit’s birth,” yet all can feel its effects who come under its influence, so is it with the rebirth. Only those who have experienced it as a change in themselves, wrought by the Divine Power, are qualified to judge either of its reality or of its effects (ver 7,8). But N., since such experience had not yet been his, remained still unenlightened (ver 9). Christ therefore condemned such blindness in one who yet professed to be a teacher of spiritual things (ver 10), and emphasized the reality in His own life of these truths which He had been proclaiming (ver 11). With this, Christ returned to the problem underlying the first statement of N. If N. cannot believe in “earthly things,” i.e. in the New Birth, which, though coming from above, is yet realized in this world, how can he hope to understand “heavenly things,” i.e. the deeper mysteries of God’s purpose in sending Christ into the world (ver 12), of Christ’s Divine sonship (ver 13), of His relationship to the abomination and the salvation of man (ver 14), and of the living water which He had been offering (ver 11). And whether N. will accept this, Christ is in itself Divine life (ver 15; cf Jn 6 25–65).

The above interview, though apparently fruitless at the time, was not without its effect upon N. At the Feast of Tabernacles, when the Prophet said, “If anyone thirst, let him ask of Me, and I will give him living water” (Jn 7 37,38), N. was emboldened to stand up in His defence. Yet here also he showed his natural timidity. He made no personal testimony of his faith in Christ, but sought rather to defend Him on a point of Jewish law (Jn 7 50–52; cf Ex 23 1; Dt 1 16,17; 17 6; 19 15). By this open act of reverence N. at last made public profession of his being of the following of Christ. His wealth enabled him to partake of the “meat indeed and not merely alms, about a hundred pounds,” with which the body of Jesus was embalmed (Jn 19 39 ff).

The Gospel of Nicodemos and other apocryphal works narrate that N. gave evidence in favor of Christ at the trial before Pilate, that he was deprived of office and banished from Jesus by the hostile Jews, and that he was the last to follow and to worship Christ. His remains were said to have been found in a common grave along with those of Gamaliel and st. Stephen. Nicodemos is a type of the “well-instructed and thoughtful Jew who looked for the consummation of national hope to follow in the line along which he had himself gone, as being a continuation and not a new beginning” (Westcott). The manner in which the Gospel narrative traces the overcoming of his natural timidity and reluctant faith is in itself a beautiful illustration of the working of the Spirit, of how belief in the Son of Man is in truth a new birth, and the entrance into eternal life.

NICOLAITANS, nik-6-lai-tans (Nicotiai, Nikolaitai). A sect or party of evil influence in early Christianity, esp. in the 7.

1. The Sect of churches of Asia. Their doctrine was similar to that of Balaam, “who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed to idols, and to commit fornication” (Rev 2 14.15). Their practices were strongly condemned by St. John, who praised the church in Ephesus for “hating their works” (Rev 2 6), and blamed the church in Pergamum for accepting in some measure their teaching (Rev 2 15). Except that reference is probably made to their influence in the church at Thyatira also, where their leader was “the woman Jezebel, who calleth herself a prophetess” (Rev 2 20), cf ver 14, no further direct information regarding them is given in Scripture.

Reference to them is frequent in post-apostolic literature. According to Irenaeus (Adv. Haer., i. 26,3; iii.10,7), followed by Hippolytus (Philos., vi.86), they were founded by Nicocles, the proselyte of Antioch, who was one of the seven chosen to serve at the tables (Acts 6 5). Irenaeus, as also Clement of Alexandria (Strom., ii.20), Tertullian and others, unite in condemning their practices in terms similar to those of St. John; and reference is also made to their gnostic tendencies. In explanation of the apparent incongruity of such an immoral sect being founded by one of “good report, full of the Spirit and of wisdom” (cf Acts 6 3), Simcox argues that their lapse may have been due to re-action from original principles of a too rigid asceticism. A theory, started in comparatively modern times, and based in part on the similarity of meaning of the Greek term “Nicoclane” by which the word puts forward the view that the two sects referred to under these names were in reality identical. Yet if this were so, it would not have been necessary for St. John to designate them separately.

The problem underlying the Nicolaitan controversy, though so little direct mention is made of it in Scripture, was in reality most important, and concerned the whole relation of Christianity to paganism and its usages. The Nicolaitans disobeyed the command issued to the gentle churches, by the apostolic council held at Jerusalem in 49–50 AD, that they should refrain from the eating of “things sacrificed to idols” (Acts 15 29). Such a restriction, though seemingly hard, in that it prevented the Christians from mingling in public festivities and so brought upon them suspicion and dislike, was yet necessary to prevent a return to a pagan laxity of morals. To this danger the Nicolaitans were themselves a glaring witness, and therefore God was justified in condemning them. In writing to the Corinthian church St. Paul gives warning against the same evil practices, basing his arguments on consideration for the weaker brethren (cf I Cor 8).

NICOLÁUS, nik-ó-nás (EV), NICOLAS, nik-ó-las (Nikolaos, Nikolaos): One of the ‘seven’ chosen to have the oversight of the daily distribution’ to the poor of the church in Jerusalem (Acts 6.5). He is called ‘a proselyte of Antioch’; the other 6 were therefore probably Jews by birth. This is the first recorded case of the admission of a proselyte into office in the Christian church. Some of the church Fathers (Irenaeus, Hippolytus, Pseudo-Tertullian) state that he was the founder of the sect called Nicolaitans (q.v.) (Rev 2.15). Other Fathers seem to suggest that this was a vain claim made by this sect in seeking apostolic authority for its opinions. It may be that the opinions of this sect were an antimonic exaggeration of the preaching of Nicolás.

NICOPOLIS, nik-ó-pó-lis (Nikopolis, Nikópolis): A city in Peloponnesus, between Jaffa and Jerusalem, now called Amman, mentioned in 1 Mace 3.40.57 and 9.50. The earlier city (Emmaus) was burnt by Quintilius Varus, but was rebuilt in 223 AD as Nicopolis. The Nicopolis, however, to which Paul urges Titus to come (2 Tim 1.14), was in Illyricum, and to which the statement made by some writers that from Eastern Greece (Athens, Thessalonica, Philippi, Corinth) Paul’s labours extended to Italy, that he never visited Western Greece, requires modification. It is true that we do not hear of his preaching at Patras, Zacynthus, Sophœlia, Corcyra (the modern Corfu), which, as a way-station to and from Sicily, always held preeminence among the Ionian islands; but there can be little doubt that, if his plan of going to Nicopolis was carried out, he desired to evangelize the province of Epirus (as well as Acaarnia) in Western Greece. Indeed, it was in this very city of Nicopolis, probably, that he was arrested and taken to Rome for trial—during one of the winters between 64–67 AD.

Nicopolis was situated only a few miles N. of the modern Preveza, the chief city of Epirus today, the city which the Greeks bombarded in 1912 in the hope of wresting it from the Turks. The ancient city was founded by Augustus, whose camp happened to be the scene of the battle before the famous fight with Antony (31 BC). The gulf, called Ambracia in ancient times, is now known as Arta. On the southern side was Actium, where the battle was fought. Directly across, only half a mile distant, on the northern promontory, was the encampment of Augustus. To commemorate the victory over his antagonist, the Roman emperor built a city on the exact spot where his army had encamped (‘Victory City’). On the hill now called Michalitsi, on the site of his own tent, he built a temple to Neptune and instituted games in honor of Apollo, who was supposed to have helped him in the sea-fight. Nicopolis soon became the metropolis of Epirus, with an autonomous constitution, according to Greek custom. But in the time of the emperor Julian (362) the city had fallen into decay, at least in part. It was plundered by the Gothic, Justinian, and finally disappeared entirely in the Middle Ages, so far as the records of history show. One document has Νικόπολις ἡ νῦν Πρέβεζα, Nikopolis hē nýn Přeběza, “N., which is now Preba.” In the time of Augustus, however, Nicopolis was a flourishing town. The emperor concentrated his troops in Epirus and Acaarnia, and made the city a leading member of the Amphictyonic Council. There are considerable ruins of the ancient city, including two theaters, a stadium, an aqueduct, etc.

NIGER, ni-jer (Nyger, Nijer). See Simeon (5).

NIGH, n. See NEAR.

NIGHT, n. (for the natural usage and the various terms, see DAY AND NIGHT):

Figurative uses: The word ‘night’ (γητή, λαγ-θή, ους) is sometimes used fig. in the OT. Thus Hosea compares the coming of God to a “watch in the night” (Hos 2.20, 3.5). Adversity is depicted by it in such places as Job 30.15; cf Isa 8.20; Jer 16.9. Disappointment and despair are apparently depicted by it in the ‘burden of Dumah’ (Isa 21.11); and spiritual blindness, coming upon the false prophets (Mic 3.6); again sudden and overwhelming confusion (Am 5.8; Isa 59.10 AV, νυσθή, “twilight” as in RV).

On the lips of Jesus (Jn 9–4) it signifies the end of opportunity to labor; repeated in that touching little allegory spoken to His disciples when He was called to the grave of Lazarus (Jn 11.910). Paul also uses the figure in reference to the Parousia (Rom 13.12), where ‘night’ seems to refer to the present aeon and ‘day’ to the aeon to come. He also uses it in 1 Thess 5.5.7 where the status of the redeemed is depicted by ‘day,’ that of the unregenerate by ‘night,’ again as the context shows, in reference to the Parousia. In Rev 21.25 and 22.5, the passing of the ‘night’ indicates the realization of that to which the Parousia looked forward, the establishment of the kingdom of God forever. NIGHT-HAWK, ni-thok (Nighthawk), tahmâs, "tach-mas"; γαλακτης, gleæx, but sometimes streulhabës, and seiréthos; Lat caprimulgus): The Heb tahmâs means “to tear and scratch the face,” so that it is very difficult to select the bird intended by its use. Any member of the eagle, vulture, owl or hawk families driven to desperation would “tear and scratch” with the claws and bite in self-defence. The bird is mentioned only in the lists of abominations (see Lev 11.15; De 14.15). There are three supposed reasons why the hawk, vulture, eagle, etc. were more properly, was intended. The lists were sweeping and included almost every common bird unfit for food. Because of its peculiar characteristics it had been made the object of fable and superstition. It fed on wing at night and constantly uttered weird cries. Lastly, it was a fierce fighter when disturbed in brooding or raising its young. Its habitat was to lie on its back and fight with beak and claw with such ferocity that it seemed very possible that it would “tear and scratch the face.” Some commentators insist that the bird intended was an owl, but for the above reasons the night-jar seems most probable; also several members of the owl family were clearly indicated in the list. See Hawk.

II. FOLKLORE IN THE OT
1. Peculiarity of References
2. Reference here and in Acts of Poetical Passages
3. The References Allusive
4. Possibility of Non-mythological Interpretation
5. The Term myths.
I. The Accepted Translation.—The term "night-monster" is a hypothetical transliteration of the Heb term לילה, used only once, in Isa 34:14. The word is "night-owl," RV "night-monster," in the "night-monster" is also an interpretation, inasmuch as it implies that the Heb word is a Loan-Hebrew, and that the reference indicates a survival of primitive folklore.

Concerning this weird superstition, and its strange, single appearance in the Book of Isa, Professor Rogers has this to say: "The lil was only to cast out with many incantations. The lil was attended by a serving maid, the aralil ("maid of night"), which in the Semitic development was transferred into the fem. liltu. It is most curious and interesting to observe that this ghost-demon lived on through the history of the Heb religion, and was carried over into the Heb religion, there to found at least one single mention in the words of one of the Heb prophets (cf. "Lilith, the Youth of the Sea," Isa. 34:14).

Exception is to be taken to this statement, admitting the etymological assumption upon which it rests, that "lilith" is a word in a new translation of the night-ghost. In the religion of the Hebrews as found in the Scriptures, it is certainly worthwhile of more than passing notice that a conception which is so prominent in the Heb mythology, and is worked out with great fulness of doctrinal and ritualistic detail, has, among the Hebrews, so far receded into the background as to receive but one mention in the Bible, and that a bald citation without detail in a highly poetic passage.

The most that can possibly be said, with safety, is that if the passage in Isa is to be taken as a survival of folklore, it is analogous to those survivals of obsolete ideas still to be found in current speech, and in the lit. of the modern world (see LUTAT). The problem is to decide whether the starting of the night-ghost in this belief is a survival of a folk-tale, or of interest in it as such, on the part of the prophetic writer. On the contrary, the nature of the reference implies that the word was used simply to add a picturesque detail into a vivid, imaginative description. In the former case, there is no evidence of active participation in this belief, or even of interest in it as such, on the part of the prophetic writer. On the contrary, the nature of the reference implies that the word was used simply to add a picturesque detail into a vivid, imaginative description. In this kind of folklore, the emphasis is on the possibilities of active participation, and on the part of the prophetic writer. II. Folklore in the OT.—Attention has been called elsewhere to the meagerness, in the matter of detail, of OT demonology (see DEMON, DEMONOLOGY; Compare Demonology). A kindred fact of great importance should be briefly noticed here, namely, that the traces of mythology and popular folklore in the Bible are surprisingly faint and indistinct. We have the following list of items in which such traces have been discovered: "Lilith" (כֶּלֶת), mentioned in Job 9:13, 26:12; Isa 51:9; "Tanin" (תַּנִּין), Isa 27:1; "Leviathan" (לֵיטָהְּן), mentioned in Job 34, 27:3; Job 41:23; Job 51:9; "Tanin" (תַּנִּין, תַּנִּין), Isa 27:1; "Leviathan" (לֵיטָהְּן, לֵיטָהְּן), Job 3:8; Ps 74:14; Isa 27:1; Ezek 29:3; Job 41:23; the "serpent in the sea," in Am 9:3; "Scirin" (כֶּרֶת, כֶּרֶת), 2 Ch 11:5; Lev 17:7; 2 K 22:3; Isa 13:21, 34:14; "Alkah" (גּוֹלָה, גּוֹלָה), Prov 30:15; "Azazel" (אֶזֶר, אֶזֶר), Lev 16:8, 10, 26; "Lilith" (from sup.), Isa 34:15.

A review of these passages brings certain very interesting facts to light.

The references are few in number. "Rahab" is mentioned 3 times; Tanin (in this connection), once; Leviathan, 5 times; the serpent in the sea, once; Seirim, 5 times (twice with reference to idols); and Azazel, also.

1. Paucity of sea, once; Seirim, 5 times (twice with reference to idols); and Azazel, also.

2. References to sea, once; Seirim, 5 times (twice with reference to idols); and Azazel, also.

3. The References to sea, one ch and in the same connection; Lilith, one.

These references, with the single exception of Azazel to which we shall return a little later, are all in highly poetical passages. On general grounds of demonology alone, we should not ascribe conscious and deliberate mythology to writers or speakers of the Bible in passages marked by imaginative description and poetic imagery, any more than we should ascribe such beliefs to modern writers under like circumstances.

3. The References to sea, one ch and in the same connection; Lilith, one.

All these references are in the highest degree allusive. They exhibit no exercise of the mythological fancy and have received no particular elaboration or embellishment, but no longer interesting in itself.

Every one of these words is sufficiently obscure in origin and uncertain in meaning to admit the possibility of a non-mythological interpretation; indeed, in several of the cases we have reached to the point of a complete parallelism a non-mythological use is evident. Bible-Dictionary writers are apt to say (e.g. concerning "lilith") that there is no doubt concerning the mythological reference. The reader may discover for himself that the lexicographers are more cautious (see BDB, in loc.). The use of "Rahab" in Job 26:12 is not mythological for the simple reason that it is figurative; the use of "Leviathan" in Isa 27:1 and Ezek 29:3 comes under the same category. In Job 40 and 41, if the identification of beasts of burden is made, the existence of a nummus and crocodile be allowed to stand and the mythical significance of the two be admitted, we have the stage where mythology has become a fixed and universal symbolism which can be used to convey truths derived from the one (see LEVIATHAN; "Job," New Ext. Bible, 1965; Meth. Rev., May, 1913, 429 ff.). The sea serpent of Am 9:3 is not necessarily the dragon or Tiamat, and the use of the term is merely suggestive. The term is used in literal use for "he-goat" (Nu 15:24, et al.) and is doubtless throughout. Ewald translates it "he-goat" in Isa 34:14 and "Satyr" in Is 13:21. It means lit. "shaggy monster" (Vulg. pilosus). We do not hesitate on the basis of the evidence to assign the term "Alkah" (Prov 30:15, RV "vampire," by some tr "vampire") and "Azazel" (Lev 16:8, et al.) as interpreted as a "demon of the desert," from the list of mythological words altogether. As ripe a scholar as Perowne ("Prov., Cambridge Bible") combats the idea of vampire, and Kellogg ("Lev., Expositor's Bible, in loc.") has simply put to rout the mythological-demonic interpretation of Azazel. Even in the case of lilith the derivation is obscure, and the objections urged against the demonic idea by Alexander have not altogether lost their force (see Conn, in loc. Theology). The problem is one of balance of probabilities in one direction or the other.

One further fact with regard to lilith must be considered. The term occurs in a list of creatures, the greater part of which are matter-of-fact animals.
or birds. A comparative glance at a half-dozen trs of the passage Isa 34:11-14 will convince any reader that there are a great many obscure and difficult words to be found in the list. Following Delitzsch's tr we have: "pelican," "hedge-hog," "horned-owl," "raven," "wild-dog," "ostrich," "forest-demon" (e'tfr), "night-monster." This is a curious mixture of real and imaginary creatures. Alexander acutely observes that there is too much or too little mythology in the passage. One of two conclusions would seem to follow from a list so constructed: Either all these creatures are looked upon as more or less demonic (see Whitehouse, HDB, art. black or blue. This name does not occur in the Heb of the OT or in the Eng. tr):

"Demon," with which cf W. M. Alexander, Demonic Possession in the NT, 16), or, as seems to the present writer far more probable, none in the list is considered otherwise than as supposed literal inhabitants of the wilderness. The writer of Isa 34:14, who was not constructing a scientific treatise, but using his imagination, has constructed a list in which are combined real and imaginary creatures popularly supposed to inhabit unpeopled solitudes. There still remains a by no means untenable supposition that none of the terms necessarily are mythological in this particular passage.

NILE, nI (Ne'elos, Neilos, meaning not certainly known; perhaps refers to the color of the water, as

A river of North Africa, the great river of Egypt. The name employed in the OT to designate the Nile is in the Heb nn, y'ôr, Egypt dâr, earlier, dôtir, usually trd 'river,' also occasionally 'canals' (Ps 78:44; Ezk 29:3f). In a general way it means all the water of Egypt. The Nile is also the principal river included in the phrase לנהר הים, naḥar ha-yâma, "rivers of Ethiopia" (Isa 18:1). Poetically the Nile is called דרך ים, 'yam, 'sea' (Job 41:31; Nah 3:8; probably Isa 18:2), but this is not a name of the river. שִׁיבֹר, shêbôr, not always written fully, has also been interpreted in a mistaken way of the Nile (see Simon). Likewise דרך ים, naḥar me-yâma, "brook of Egypt," a border stream in no way connected with the Nile, has sometimes been mistaken for that river. See River of Egypt.

1. Description
N.W. 500 miles to its junction with the White N. The White N., the upper branch of the Blue N., rises in Victoria Nyanza, a great lake in Central Africa, a few miles N. of the equator, long. 33° E. (more exactly the N. may be said to rise at the headwaters of the Ruzegga River, a small stream on the other side of the lake, 3° S. of the equator), and flows N. in a tortuous channel, 1,400 miles to its junction with the Blue N. From this junction-point the N. flows N. through Nubia and Egypt, 1,900 miles and empties into the Mediterranean Sea, in lat. 32° N., through 2 mouths, the Rosetta, E. of Alexandria, and the Damietta, W. of Port Said. There were formerly 7 mouths scattered along a coast-line of 140 miles.

The Nile originated in the Tertiary period and has continued from that time to this, though by the subsidence of the land 220 ft. along the Mediterranean shore in the Pluvial times, the river was much shortened. Later in the Pluvial times the land rose again and is still rising slowly.

Cultivable Egypt is altogether the product of the N., every particle of the soil having been brought down by the river from the heart of the continent and deposited along the banks and sps. in the delta at the mouth of the river. The banks have risen higher and higher and extended farther and farther back by the deposit of the sediment, until the valley of arable land varies in width in most parts from 3 or 4 miles to 9 or 10 miles. The mouth of the river, however, after the time of elevation of the land in Pluvial times, was at first not far from the lat. of Cairo. From this point northward the river has built up a delta of 140 miles on each side, over which it spreads itself and empties into the sea through its many mouths.

The watering of Egypt by the inundation from the N. is the most striking feature of the physical character of that land, and one of the most interesting and remarkable physical phenomena in the world. The inundation is produced by the combination of an indirect and a direct cause. The indirect cause is the rain and melting snow on the equatorial mountains in Central Africa, which maintains in the White N. a great volume of water in the month of July. The direct cause is torrential rains in the highlands of Abyssinia which send down the Blue N. a sudden great increase in the volume of water. The inundation has two periods each year. The first begins about July 15 and continues until nearly the end of September. After a slight recession, the river again rises early in October in the great inundation. High Nile is in October, 25 to 30 ft., low Nile in June, about 125 ft. The Nilometer for recording the height of the water of inundation dates from very early times. Old Nilometers are found still in situ at Edfu and Assuan. The watering and fertilizing of the land is the immediate effect of the inundation; its ultimate result is that making of Egypt which is still in progress. The settling of the sediment from the water upon the land has raised the surface of the valley about 1 ft. in 300 to 400 years, about 9 to 10 ft. near Cairo since the beginning of the early great temples. The deposit varies greatly at other places. As the deposit of sediment has been upon the bottom of the river, as well as upon the surface of the land, though more slowly, on account of the swiftness of the current, the river also has been lifted up, and thus the inundation has extended farther and farther to the E., and the W., as the level of the valley would permit, depositing the sediment and thus making the cultivable land wider, as well as the soil deeper, year by year. At Heliopolis, a little N. of Cairo, this extension to the E. has been 3 to 4 miles since the building of the great temple there.

5. The N. percolating through the porous Infiltration soil. This percolation is called the infiltration of the N. It always extends as far as possible away from the river and the level of the water in the river at the time will permit. This infiltration, next to the inundation, is the most important physical phenomenon in Egypt. By means of it much of the irrigation of the land during the dry season is carried on from wells. It has had its influence also in the political and religious changes of the country (cf. below).

II. The Nile in History.—Some of the early temples were located near the N., probably because of the delification of the river. The rising of the surface of the land, and at the same time the bed of the river, from the inundation, lifted both the old and its great river, but left the temples down at the old level. In time the infiltration of the river from its new higher level reached farther and farther and rose to a higher level until the floor of these old temples was under water even at the time of lowest N., and then gods and goddesses, priests and ceremonial all were driven out. At least two of the greatest temples and most sacred places, Heliopolis and Memphis, had to be abandoned. Probably this fact had as much to do with the downfall of Egypt's religion, as political disasters and the actual destruction of its temples by eastern invaders. Nature's God had driven out the gods of Nature.

Some prehistoric burials are found on the higher ground, as at Kef Amur. A thousand years of history would be quite sufficient to teach Egyptians that the N. was still making Egypt. Thenceforth, cemeteries were located at the mountains on the eastern and the western boundaries of the valley. Here they continue to this day: for the most part still entirely above the waters of the inundation—and usually above the reach of the infiltration.
III. The Nile in Religion.—One of the gods of the Egyptian pantheon was Hapi, the Nile. In early times it divided the honors with Ra, the Sun-god. No wonder it was so. If the Egyptians set out to worship Nature-gods at all, surely then the sun and the Nile first.

The origin of the Osirian myth is still much discussed. Very much evidence, perhaps conclusive evidence, can be adduced to prove that:

1. The Nile sungod. No wonder it was so. If the Egyptians set out to worship Nature-gods at all, surely then the sun and the Nile first.

2. The Nile it rose originally from the Nile; that in Osirian Myth Osiris was first of all the N., then the water of the N., then the soil, the product of the waters of the N., and then Egypt, the product of the soil.

Egypt was the Egyptian's little world, and Egypt was the Nile. It was thus quite natural for the Egyptians in considering the celestial world to image it in likeness of their own little world, with a celestial Nile flowing through it. It is so represented in the mythology, but the conception of the heavens is vague.

M. G. KYLE

NIMROD, nim'rod (נִרְוָד, nî'rôd; B, נִמְרֹד, Nîmrôd, Nebîrîd; Nehbîrîd): A descendant of Ham, mentioned in the “generations of the sons of Noah” (Gen 10: 1 1 Ch 1 10) as a son of Cush. He established his kingdom “in the land of Shinar,” including the cities “Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh” (ver 10), of which only Babel, or Babylon, and Erech, or Urrik, have been identified with certainty. “The land of Shinar” is the old name for Southern Babylon, afterward called Chaldæa (erech kassim), and was probably more extensive in territory than the Sumer of the inscriptions in the ancient royal title, “King of Shumer and Accad,” since Accad is included here in Shinar. Nimrod, like other great kings of Mesopotamian lands, was a mighty hunter, possibly the mightiest and the prototype of them all, since to his name had attached itself the proverb: “Like Nimrod a mighty hunter before Jeh,” (ver 9). In the primitive days of Mesopotamia, as also in Pal, wild animals were so numerous that they became a menace to life and property (Ex 33 30; Lev 26 22); therefore the king as benefactor and protector of his people hunted these wild beasts. The early conquest of the cities of Babylon, or their federation into one great kingdom, is here ascribed to Nimrod. Whether the founding and colonization of Assyria (ver 11) are to be ascribed to N. will be determined by the exegesis of the text. EV reads: “Out of that land 3e [i.e. Nimrod] went forth into Assyria, and built Nineveh,” etc, this tr assigning the rise of Assyria to N., and apparently being sustained by Mic 5 6 (ef J. M. F. Smith, “Nimrod,” ICC, in loc.); but ARVm renders: “Out of that land went forth Asshur, and built Nineveh,” which tr is more accurate exegetically and not in conflict with Mic 5 6, if in the latter “land of Nimrod” be understood, not as parallel with, but as supplemental to, Assyria, and therefore as Babylon (cf comm. of Cheyne, Pusey, S. Clark, in loc.).

N. has not been identified with any mythical hero or historic king of the inscriptions. Some have sought identification with Gilgamesh, the flood hero of Babylon (Sinimer, Skinner, Cheyne, W. J. Pal, others with a later Kassite king (Haupt, Hilprecht), which is quite unlikely; but the most admissible correspondence is with Marduk, chief god of Babylon, probably his historic founder, just as Asshur, the god of Asshur, appears in ver 11 as the founder of the Assyrian empire (Wellhausen, Price, Sayce). Lack of identification, however, does not necessarily indicate mythical origin of the name. See Astronomy, II, 11; Babylonia and Assyria, Religion of, IV, 7; Merodach, Orion, Edward Mack NIMSHI, nim'shi (נִמשי, nimshē): The grand-father of Jehu (2 K 9 2). Jehu's usual designation is "son of Nimshi" (1 K 19 16).

V. LAST DAYS AND FALL OF NINEVEH

I. Beginnings, Name, Position.—The first Biblical mention of Nineveh is in Gen 10:11, where it is stated that Nimnóq (q.v.) or Assur went out into Assyria, and built N. Biblical and Rel. Ir, and Calah, and Mention Resen between N. and Calah, with the addition, "the same is the great city."
Everything indicates that these statements are correct, for N. was certainly at one time under Bab.
rule, and was at first not governed by Assyrian kings, but by petty or viceroyes of Assur, the old capital.
To all appearance N. took its name from the Bab Nair near LAGÁS in South Babylonia, on the Euphrates, from which early foundation it was probably colonized. The native name appears as Ḍáiná or Šín (q.v.), written with the character for "water enclosure" with that for "fish."
2. Etymology of the Name Bab Nair was a place where fish were very abundant. Ištar or Šin, the goddess of the city, was associated with Nin-máh, Merodach's spouse, as goddess of reproduction. Fish are also plentiful in the Tigris at Mosul, the modern town on the other side of the river, and this may have influenced the choice of the name by the Bab settlers, and the foundation there of the great temple of Ištar or Šín. The date of this foundation is unknown, but it may have taken place about 3000 BC.

N. lay on the eastern bank of the Tigris, at the point where the Khor falls into that stream. The outline of the wall is rectangular on the E., but of an irregular shape on the W., and of an irregular shape on the W., but of an irregular shape on the E. E. The western fortifications run from N.H. to S.E., following roughly, the course of the river, which now flows about 1,500 yards from the walls, instead of close to them, as anciently.

II. NINEVEH AND ITS SURROUNDINGS.—According to the late G. Smith, the southwestern wall has a length of about 2½ mi., and is joined at its 1. Its Walls its western corner by the southwestern wall, which runs in a northeasterly direction for about ½ mi. The northeastern wall, starting here, runs at first in a southeasterly direction, but turns southward, gradually approaching the southwestern wall, to which, at the end of about 3½ mi. it is joined by a short wall, facing nearly S., rather more than half a mile long.

The principal mounds are Kouyunjik, a little N.E. of the village of Amusiyeh, and Nebi-Yunas, about 1½ mi. to the S.E. Both of these lie just within the S.W. wall.

2. Principal Mounds Extensive remains of buildings occupy and gate-ways the fortified area. Numerous openings occur in the walls, many of them ancient. Though some seem to have been made after the abandonment of the site. The principal gate on the N.W. was guarded by winged bulls (see Layard, Monuments of Nineveh, 2d series, pl. 3; Nineveh and Babylon, 120). Other gates gave access to the principal roads of the country, such as the E. passing through the curved outlooks and the double line of fortifications which protected the northeastern wall from attack on that side, where the Ninevites evidently considered that they had most to fear.

According to G. Smith, the circuit of the inner wall is about 8½ mi., and Captain Jones, who made a trigonometrical survey in 1854, estimated that, allotting to each inhabitant 50 sq. yards, the city may have contained 174,000 inhabitants.

In the statement of Jon 4:11, that the city contained 120,000 persons who could not discern between their right hand and their left, be intended to give the number of the city's children only, then the population must have numbered about 600,000. Now, however, the three cities of the same extent would have been needed to contain them. It has therefore been supposed—and that with great probability—that there was a large extension of the city outside its walls. This Wall is not only indicated by Jon 3:3, where it is described as "an exceedingly great city of three days' journey" to traverse, but also by the extant ruins, which stretch S.E. along the banks of the Tigris as far as Resen (Koioûri, Coioûri), while its northern extension may have been regarded as including Khorsabad.

Concerning the positions of two of the cities mentioned with N., namely, Calah and Resen, there can be no doubt, notwithstanding that Resen has not yet been identified with a modern city. The Ashur-ban-apli, Rehoboth-Ir, is the modern Nimroud, and Resen lay between that site and N. The name Rehoboth-Ir has not yet been found in the inscriptions, but Fried. Deltzsch has suggested that it may be the rébab Nínus of the inscriptions, N.E. of N. If this be the case, the N. of Jonah contained within it all the places in Gen 10:11-12, and Khorsabad besides.

Taking the outlying ruins from N. to S., we begin with Khorsabad (Dur-Sarru-İňa or Dur-Sargina), 12 miles N.E. of Kouyunjik, the great palace mound of N. proper. Khorsabad is a great inclosure about 2,000 yards square, with the remains of towers and gateways. The palace mound lies on its northwest side, and consists of a large inclosure, uniform with the remains of Sargon's palace and its temple, with a ziggurat or temple-tower similar to those at Babylon, Borsippa, Calah and elsewhere. This last still shows traces of the tints symbolic of the 7 planets of which its stonework is, to some, emblematic. The palace ruins show numerous halls, rooms and passages, many of which were faced with slabs of coarse alabaster, sculptured in relief with military operations, hunting-scenes, mythological figures, etc., while the principal entrances were flanked with the finest winged human-headed bulls which Assyrian art has so far revealed. The palace was built about 712 BC, and was probably destroyed by fire when N. fell in 606 BC, sharing the same fate. Some of the slabs and winged bulls are in the Louvre and the British Museum, but most of the antiquarian spoils were lost in the Tigris by the sinking of the rafts upon which they were loaded after being discovered.

Another outlying suburb was probably Tarbiš, now represented by the ruins at Khedâvîn, about 3 miles N. of Kouyunjik. In this latter case palace, Sennacheri calls it—dedicated to Nergal. Anciently it must have been a place of some importance, as Esar- haq claims to have built a palace there, as well as the "seat of the gods of Assur, Assur-bani-apli. The site of Resen, "between N. and Calah," is the northern road of the Tigris, 8 mi. S. of N., and 3 miles N. of Nimroud (Calah). It is in the form of an irregular inclosure on a high mound over- looking the Tigris, with a surface of about 400 acres.
No remains of buildings, sculptures or inscriptions have, however, been found there.

After N. itself (Kouyunjik), the ruins known as Ninrrood, 14 or 15 miles S.E., are the most important. They mark the site of the ancient Calah, and have already been described under that heading (see p. 539). As there stated, the stone-faced temple-tower seems to be referred to by Ovid, and is apparently also mentioned by Xenophon (see Resen). The general tendency of the accumulated references to these sites supports the theory that they were regarded as belonging to N., if not by the Assyrians themselves (who knew well the various municipal districts), at least by the foreigners who had either visited the city or had heard or read descriptions of it.

III. The Palaces at Nineveh Proper.—The palaces at N. were built upon extensive artificial platforms between 30 and 50 ft. high, either of sun-dried brick, as at Ninrrood, or of earth and rubbish, as at Kouyunjik. It is thought that they were faced with masonry, and that access was gained to them by means of flights of deep steps, or sloping pathways. Naturally it is the plan of the basement floor alone that can at present be traced, any upper stories that may have existed having disappeared. The halls and rooms discovered were faced with slabs of alabaster or other stone, often sculptured with bas-reliefs depicting warlike expeditions, the chase, religious ceremonies and divine figures. The depth of the accumulations over these varies from a few inches to about 30 ft., and if the amount in some cases would seem to be excessive, it is thought that this may have been due either to the existence of upper chambers, or to the extra height of the room. The chambers, which are grouped around courtyards, are long and narrow, with small square rooms at the ends. The partition walls vary from 6 to 15 ft. in thickness, and are of sun-dried brick, against which the stone paneling was fixed. As in the case of the Bab temples and palaces, the rooms and halls open into each other, so that, to gain access to those farthest from the courtyard entrance, one or more halls or chambers had to be traversed. No traces of windows have been discovered, and little can therefore be said as to the method of lighting, but the windows were either high up, or light was admitted through openings in the roof.

The palace of Sennacherib lay in the southeast corner of the platform, and consisted of a courtyard surrounded on all four sides by numerous long halls, and rooms, of which the innermost were capable of being rendered private. It was in this palace that were found the reliefs depicting the siege of Lachish, with the representation of Sennacherib seated on his “standing” throne, while the captives and the spoil of the city passed before him. The grand entrance was flanked by winged bulls facing toward the spectator as he entered. They were in couples, back to back, on each side of the doorway, and between each pair the ancient Bab hero-giant, carrying in one hand the “boomerang,” and holding tightly with his left arm a struggling lion (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, 157) was represented, just as at his father Sargon’s palace at Khorsabad. The upper part of these imposing figures had been destroyed, but they were so massive, that the distinguished explorer attributed their overthrow not to the act of man, but to some convulsion of Nature.

In the north of the mound are the ruins of the palace of Assur-bani-apli or Assur-bani-pal, discovered by Hormuzd Rassam. His latest plan (Assur and the Land of Nineveh, 1897, plate facing p. 30) does not give apli the whole of the structure, much of the building having been destroyed; but the general arrangement of the rooms was upon the traditional lines. The slabs with which they were paneled showed bas-reliefs illustrating the Assyrian campaigns against Babylonia, certain Arab tribes, and Elam. As far as they are preserved, the sculptures are wonderfully good, and the whole decorative scheme of the paneled walls, of which, probably, the greater part is forever lost, may be characterized, notwithstanding their defects of perspective and their mannerisms, as nothing less than magnificent. The lion-hunts of the great king, despite the curious treatment of the animals’ manes (due to the sculptors’ ignorance of the right way to represent hair) are admirable. It would be difficult to improve upon the expressions of fear, rage and suffering on the part of the animals there delineated. The small sculptures showing Assur-bani-apli hunting the goat and the wild ass are not less noteworthy, and are executed with great delicacy.

IV. Sennacherib’s Description of Nineveh.—In all probability the best description of the city is that given by Sennacherib on the cylinder recording his expedition to Tarsus in Cilicia. From ancient times, he says, the circuit of the city had measured 9,300 cubits, and he makes the rather surprising statement that his predecessors had not built either the inner or the outer wall, which, if true, shows how confident they were of their security from attack. He claims to have enlarged the city by 12,515 cubits. The great defensive wall which he built was called by the Sumerian name of Bad-kimgallitu-la-bala, which he translates as “the wall whose glory overthrows the enemy.” He made the brickwork 40 cubits thick, which would probably not greatly exceed the estimate of G. Smith, who reckoned it to have measured about 50 ft. The height of the wall he raised to 180 tipki, which, admitting the estimate of Diodorus, should amount to about 100 ft.

In this inclosing wall were 15 gates, which he enumerates in full. Three of these were situated in the short northern wall—the gate of Hadad; the gate of Urg or Hadad of Tarbihun (Sherif-Khan), and the gate of the moon-god Nannar, Sennacherib's own deity. The plans show five openings on the side, any of which may have been the gate used when going to Tarbihun, but they adorned with winged bulls probably furnished the shortest route.

The gates looking toward the S. and the E. were the Asur-gate (leading to the old capital); Sennacherib's Halai-gate, the gate of Sunin at Carchal, the gate of the god Enil of Kar-Ninili, and the "covered gate," which seems to have had the reputation of letting forth the fever-demon. After this are mentioned the Shemita-gate, and the gate of Halaih in Mesopotamia. This last must have been the extreme northeastern opening, now communicating with the road to Khorsabad, implying that Halaih lay in that direction.

The gates on the w. or river-side of the city were "the gate of Ea, director of my water-springs"; the quay-gate, "bringer of the tribute of my peoples"; the gate of the land of Bari, within which the presents of the Sumerians entered (brought down by the Tigris from Babylonia, in all probability), the gate of the tribute-people armony; and the gate of the god Sar-ur—
"altogether 5 gates in the direction of the W."
There are about 9 wide openings in the wall on this side, 2 being on each side of the Kourynik mound, and 3 on each side of that called Nebi-Yunus. As openings at these points would have endangered the city's safety, these 3 have probably to be eliminated, leaving 2 in N. of Nebi-Yunus, 2 between that and Kourynik, and one in Kourynik. Minor means of exit probably existed at all points where they were regarded as needful.

To the outer wall of the city Sennacherib gave a Sumerian name meaning, "the wall which terrifies the enemy." At a depth of 54 gar, the underground water-level, its foundations were laid upon blocks of stone, the object of this great depth being to frustrate undermining.
The wall was made "high like a mountain."

Above and beyond the city he laid out plantations, wherein all the sweet-smelling herbs of Heth (Pal and Phoenicia) grew, fruitful beyond those of their homeland. Among them were to be found every kind of mountain-vine, and the plants of all the nations around.

In connection with this, in all probability, he arranged the water-supply, conducting a distant water-course to N. by means of conducts. Being a successful venture, he seems to have watered therewith all the people's orchards, and in winter 1,000 corn fields above and below the city. The force of the increased current in the river Khosar was retarded by the creation of a swamp, and among the reeds which grew there were placed wild fowl, wild swine, and deer(?). Here he repeated his exotic plantations, including trees for wood, cotton (apparently) and seemingly the olive.

Sennacherib's bas-reliefs show some of the phases of the work which his cylinder inscriptions describe.

We see the winged bulls, which are of colossal dimensions, sometimes lying bas-reliefs on their sledge (shaped like boats or Illustrate Assyrian ships), and sometimes standing the King's and supported by scaffolding.

Description

bridges rest upon rollers, and are dragged by armies of captives urged action by taskmasters with whips. Others force the sledges forward from behind by means of enormous levers whose upper ends are held in position by guy-ropes. Each side has to pull with great force, for if the higher end of the great lever fell, the side which had pulled too hard suffered in killed and crushed, or at least in bruised, workmen of the number. In the background are the soldiers of the guard, and behind them extensive wooded hills.
In other bas-reliefs it is apparently the pleasure-grounds of the palace which are seen. In these the background is an avenue of trees, alternately tall and short, and on the banks of a river, whereon are boats, and men riding astride inflated skins, which are much used in these days, as now. On another slab, the great king himself, in his hand-chariot drawn by eunuchs, superintends the work.

How long N. had been the capital of Assyria is unknown. The original capital was Assur, about 50 miles to the S., and probably this continued to be regarded as the religious and official capital of the country. Assur-naṣir-apli seems to have had a greater liking for Calah (Nimroud), and Sargon for Khorsabad, where he had founded a splendid palace. These latter, however, probably never had the importance of N., and attained their position merely on account of the reigning king building a palace and residing there. The period of N.'s supremacy seems to have been from the beginning of the reign of Sennacherib to the end of that of Assur-naṣir-apli, including, probably, the reigns of his successors likewise—a period of about 95 years (704-606 BC).

V. Last Days and Fall of Nineveh.—N., during the centuries of her existence, must have seen many stirring historical events; but the most noteworthy were probably Sennacherib's triumphal entries, including that following the capture of Lachish, the murder of that city's constable by his son (recent theory that he was killed at Babylon needs confirmation), and the coronial triumphs of Assur-bani-apli—the great and noble Osmappid (Ezr 4 10). After the reign of Assur-bani-apli came his son Assur-erbil-lani, who was succeeded by Sin-sarr-isikun (Saracoe), but the history of the country, and also of the city, is practically non-existent during these last two reigns. The Assyrian and Bab records are silent with regard to the fall of the city, but Alexander Polykar, Abylenus and Synecellus all speak of it. The best account, however, is that of Diodorus Siculus, who refers to a legend that the city could not be taken until the river became its enemy. Arbaces, the Scythian, besieged it, but could not make any impression on it for 2 years. In the 3rd year, however, the river (according to Commander Jones, not the Tigris, but the Khoes), being swollen by rains, and very rapid in its current, carried away a portion of the wall, and by this opening the besiegers gained an entrance. The king, recognizing in this the fulfilment of the oracle, gathered together his concubines and eunuchs, and, mounting a funeral pyre which he had caused to be constructed, perished in the flames. This catastrophe is supposed to be referred to in Nah 1 8: "With an over-running flood he [the Lord] will make a full end of her place [i.e. of N.]," and 2 6: "The gates of the rivers are opened, and the palace is dissolved." The destruction of the city by fire is probably referred to in 3 13:15. The picture of the scenes in her streets—the noise of the whip, the rattling wheels, the prancing horses, the bounding chariots (3 2 ff), followed by a vivid description of the carnage of the battlefield—is exceedingly striking, and true to their records and their sculptures.

Literature.—The standard books on the discovery and exploration of N. are Layard, Nineveh and Its Remains (two vols, 1849); Nineveh and Babylon (1853); Monuments of Nineveh, 1st and 2d series (plates) (1849 and 1853); and Hormuzd Rassam, Assyri and the Land of Nimrod (Cincinnati and New York, 1857).

T. G. Pinches

I. The Discovery.—In the spring of 1850, the workmen of Sir A. H. Layard at Nineveh made an important discovery. In the ruins of the palace of Assur-bani-pal they found a passage which opened into two small chambers leading one into the other. The doorway was guarded on either side by figures of Ea, the god of culture and the inventor of letters, in his robe of fishskin. The walls of the chambers had once been paneled with bas-reliefs, one of which represented a city standing on the shore of a sea that was covered with galleys. Up to the height of a foot or more the floor was paved with clay tablets that had fallen from the shelves on which they had been arranged in order, and the larger number of them was consequently broken. Similar tablets, but in lesser number, were found in the adjoining chambers. After Layard's departure, other tablets were discovered by Mr. Hormuzd Rassam, and then the excavations ceased for many years. The discovery of the Bab version of the account of the Deluge, however, by Mr. George Smith in 1873 led the proprietors of the Daily Telegraph to send him to Nineveh in the hope that the missing portions of the story might be found. He had not been excavating there long before he came across a fragment of another version of the story, and then once more the excavations came to an end. Since then expeditions have been sent by the British Museum which have resulted in the recovery of further remains of the ancient library of Nineveh.

II. The Library.—The tablets formed a library in the true sense of the word. Libraries had existed in the cities of Babylonia from a remote date, and the Assyrian kings, whose civilization was derived from Babylonia, imitated the example of Babylonia in this as in other respects. The only true booklover among them, however, was Assur-bani-pal. He was one of the most munificent royal patrons of learning the world has ever seen, and it was to him that the great library of Nineveh owed its existence. New editions were made of older works, and the public and private libraries of Babylonia were rammed in search of literary treasures.

III. Writing-Materials.—Fortunately for us the ordinary writing-material of the Babylonians and Assyrians was clay. It was more easily procurable than papyrus or parchment, and was specially adapted for the reception of the cuneiform characters. Hence, while the greater part of the old Egypt lit., which was upon papyrus, has perished that of Babylonia and Assyria has been preserved. In Babylonia the tablets after being inscribed were often merely dried in the sun; in the damper climate of Assyria they were baked in a kiln. As a large amount of text had frequently to be compressed into a small space, the writing is sometimes so minute as to need the assistance of a magnifying glass before it can be read. It is not surprising, therefore, that in the library-chambers of Nineveh Layard found a magnifying lens of crystal, which had been turned on the lathe.
IV. Contents.—The subject-matter of the tablets included all the known branches of knowledge.

1. Philology logical works. The inventors of the cuneiform system of writing had spoken an agglutinative language, called Sumerian, similar to that of the Turks or Finns today, and a considerable part of the early lit. had been written in this language, which to the later Sem Babylonians and Assyrians was akin to the European nations in the Middle Ages. The student was therefore provided with grammars and dictionaries of the two languages, as well as with reading-books and interlinear tr into Assyry of the chief Sumerian texts. Besides this long list of the cuneiform characters were drawn up with their phonetic and ideographic values, together with lists of Assyrian verbs, by which, for example, all the equivalents are given of the word "to go." The Assyry lexicographers at times attempted etymologies which are as wide of the mark as similar etymologies given by English lexicographers of a past generation. Sabattu, "Sabath," for instance, is derived from the two Sumerian words, sa, "heart," and bot, "to end," and so is explained to mean "day of rest for the heart." It is obvious that all this implies an advanced literary culture. People do not begin to compile grammars and dictionaries or to speculate on the origin of words until books and libraries abound and education is widespread.

Astronomy occupied a prominent place in Assyry lit., but it was largely mingled with astrology. The Babylonians were the founders of scientific astronomy; they were the first to calculate the dates of lunar and solar eclipses, and to give names to the signs of the Zodiac. Among these contents of the library of Nineveh are reports from the Royal Observatory, relating to the observation of eclipses and the like.

A knowledge of astronomy was needed for the regulation of the calendar, and the calendar was the special care of the priests, as the priest was, first of all, a mathematician.

3. Religious festivals of the gods and the payment of tithes were dependent upon it. Most of the religious texts went back to the Sumer period and were accordingly provided with Assyry tr. Some of these were hymns to the gods, others were the rituals used in different temples. There was, moreover, a collection of psalms, as well as numerous mythological texts.

The legal law books were in Sumerian, but the great code compiled by Khammurabi, the contemporaneous of Abraham, was in Sem Babylonian (see Hammurabi). Like English laws, the Assyro-Babylonian law was case-made, and records of the cases decided from time to time by the judges are numerous.

Among scientific works we may class the long lists of animals, birds, fishes, plants and stones, together with geographical treatises, and the determination of the Babylonian stars. Starting from the belief that where two events followed one another, the first was the cause of the second, an elaborate pseudo-science of augury had been built up, and an enormous lit. arose on the interpretation of dreams, the observation of the liver of animals, etc. Unfortunately Assur-bani-pal had a special predilection for the subject, and the consequence is that his library was filled with works which the Assyriologist would gladly exchange for documents of a more valuable character. Among the scientific works we may also include those on medicine, as well as numerous mathematical tables.

Literature was largely represented, mainly in the form of poems on mythological, religious, or historical subjects. Among these the most famous is the epic of the hero Gilgamesh in twelve books, the Bab account of the Deluge being introduced as an episode in the eleventh book. Another epic was the story of the great battle between the god Merodach and Tiamat, the dragon of chaos and evil, which includes the story of the creation.

Historical records are very numerous, the Assyrians being distinguished among the nations of antiquity by their historical sense. A Chronicle and place of the Bab or Egypt temple; and where the Babylonian or the Assyrian would be told from a religious record, the Assyrian adorned his halls with accounts of campaigns and the victories of their royal builders. The dates which are attached to each portion of the narrative, and the care with which the names of petty princes and states are transcribed, give a high idea of the historical precision at which the Assyrians aimed. The Assyrian monuments are alone sufficient to show that the historical sense was by no means unknown to the ancient peoples of the East, and when we remember how closely related the Assyrians were to the Hebrews in both race and language, the fact becomes important to the Bib. student. Besides historical texts the library contained also chronological tables and long lists of kings and dynasties with the number of years they reigned. In Babylonia time was marked by officially naming each year after some event that had occurred in the course of it; the more historically-minded Assyrian named the year after a particular battle, and a day was appointed on each New Year's Day. In Babylonia the chronological system went back to a very remote date. The Babylonians were a commercial people, and for commercial purposes it was necessary to have an exact register of the time.

The library contained trading documents of various sorts, more esp. contracts, deeds of sale of property and the like. Now and then we meet with the plan of a building. Commerce There were also legal documents relating to the taxes paid by the cities and provinces of the empire to the imperial treasury.

One department of the library consisted of letters, some of them private, others addressed to the king or to the high officials. Nearly a thousand of these have already been published by Professor Harper.

The clay books, if need hardly be added, were all carefully numbered and catalogued, the Assyry system of docketing and arranging the tablets being at once ingenious and simple. The librarians, consequently, had no difficulty in finding any tablet or series of tablets that might be asked for. We may gather from the inscription attached to the larger works, as well as to other collections of tablets that the library was open to all "readers."
NINEVITES, nīn'ē-vītēs (Nu. 24 2; 42 7, 8; 2 Ki 14 25, 26; 17 36): Only in Lk 11 30. The passage (Mt 12 41, with Lk 11 32, has the fuller form, "men of Nineveh," which gives the meaning.

NIPHIS, nī'fēs (Ne. 5 10, 11; Ph. 4 3; Ap. Nephis; AV Nephis; Gen 11 27): Given in 1 Esd 6 21 m as = "Magbish" of Ezr 2 30, whose sons are the same in number (106) as those of Niphis, but it would seem rather to be the equivalent of Nebor in ver 20.

NISAN, nī'sān (נִסַּן, nīṣān): The first month of the Jewish year in which occurred the Passover and which corresponds to April. The month is the same also called, which occurs in the Pent. Nisan occurs in Neh 2 1 and Est 3 7. It denotes "the month of flowers." See Calendar.

NISROCH, nī'srōkh (עֵשֶׂר, nēṣrōk): The Assyr god in whose temple Semmacherib was worshipping when put to death by his sons (2 K 19 37; Isa 37 38). The name is not found elsewhere. Some identify him with Asshur, the national deity. See BABYLONIA and ASSYRIA, Religion of.

NITRE, nī'tēr (ניטר, nēṭēr; firvōn, nīṭōn): Nitre as used in AV does not correspond to the present use of that term. Nitre or niter is now applied to sodium or potassium nitrate. The writer has in his collection a specimen of sodium carbonate, called in Arab. natrān, which was taken from the extensive deposits in Lower Egypt where it is found as a deposit underneath a layer of common salt. Similar deposits are found in Syria and Asia Minor. This is probably the "nitre" of the Bible. AV has rendered nitre "lye" in Jer 2 22, and "soda" in Prov 25 20. Soda or lye has been used as a cleansing agent from earliest times. It renders energetically, when treated with an acid; hence the comparison in Prov 25 20 of the heavy-hearted man ruled by the sound of singing to the sizzling of soda on which vinegar has been poured. See Vinegar.

NOADIAH, nō-ad'ē-ā (נואדיה, nō'ādēyāh): "trust of Jeh"; Noadiah, Noadis). 1. (Son of Binnui, one of the Levites to whom Ezra intrusted the gold and silver and sacred vessels which he brought up from Babylon (Ezr 8 28); also called Mozri (q.v.), son of Sabanus (1 Esd 8 63).

2. (A prophetess associated with Tobiah and Sanballat in opposition to Nehemiah (Neh 6 14).

NOAH, nō', nō'a (נֹהַם, nō'ām): "rest"; LXX Nōς, Nōs; Jos, Nōxēs, Nōchos). The 10th in descent from Adam in the line of Seth (Gen 5 25). Lamech here seems to derive the word from the root נוח, "to comfort," but this is probably a mere play upon the name by Noah's father. The times in which Noah was born were degenerate, and this finds pathetic expression in Lamech's saying at the birth of Noah, "This same shall comfort us in our work and in the toil of our hands, which cometh because of the ground which Jeh hath cursed." Concerning the theory that Noah is the name of a dynasty, like Pharaoh or Caesar, rather than of a single individual, see Antediluvians. In his 600th year the degenerate races of mankind were cut off by the Deluge. But 120 years previously (Gen 6 3) he had been warned of the catastrophe, and according to 1 Pet 3 20 had been preparing for the event by building the ark (see Ark; Deluge). In the cuneiform inscriptions Noah corresponds to "Hasisadru" (Xisuthrus). After the flood Noah celebrated his deliverance by building an altar and offering sacrifices to Jeh (Gen 8 20), and was sent forth with God's blessing to be "fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Gen 9 1), as Adam had been sent forth at the beginning (Gen 1 28). In token of the certainty of God's covenant not to destroy the race again by flood, a rainbow spanned the sky whose reappearance was ever after to be a token of peace. But Noah was not above temptation. In the prosperity which followed, he became drunken from the fruit of the vineyard he had planted. His son Ham irreverently exposed the nakedness of his father, while Shem and Japheth covered it from view (Gen 9 22-23). The curse upon Canaan the son of Ham was literally fulfilled in subsequent history when Israel took possession of Pal, when the Pyre fell burnt and the walls of Jerusalem, Rome, and Carthage surrendered to Rome.

NO-AMON, nō-ā-mon (נוא-amon, Nō-ā'mōn, Egypt nut, "a city," with the feminine ending ; and Amon, proper name of a god, City Amon, i.e. the "City, i.e. par excellence, of the god Amon; th m AV "populous No," following the Vulg in a misunderstanding of the word 'amon'; RV "No-amon"): Occurs in this form only in Neh 3 8, and nō-ā'nom, "Amon of No"); occurs in Jer 48 25. Or also Ezk 30 14–16, where nō', nā', is undoubtedly the same city.

The description of No-amon in Neh 3 8 seems to be that of a delta city, but Ṗ, yām, "sea," in that passage is used poetically for the Nile, as in Job 41 31 and in Isa 18 2. With this difficulty removed, the Egypt etymology of the name leaves no doubt as to the correct identification of the place. The "City Amon" in the days of Nahum, Jeremiah and Ezekiel was Thebes (cf. art. "Thebes" in any general encyclopaedia).

NOB, nob (נוב, nōb; B, Nōḇā, Nōmīṯ, A, Nōḇā, Nōḇād, and other forms): An ancient priestly town to which David came on his way 8, when he fled from Saul at Gibeah (1 S 21 1). Here he found refuge and succor with Ahimelech. This was observed by Doeg the Edomite, who informed the king, and afterward became the instrument of Saul's savage vengeance on the priests, and on all the inhabitants of the city (ch 22). The name occurs in Neh 11 32 in a list of cities, immediately after Anathoth. In Isaiah's ideal account of the Assyrians' march against Jerus, Nob is clearly placed S. of Anathoth. Here, says the prophet, the Assyrian shall shake his hand at the mount of the daughter of Zion, the hill of Jerus. It was a place, therefore, from which the Holy City and the temple were clearly visible.

The district in which the site must be sought is thus very definitely indicated; but within this district no name at all resembling Nob has been discovered, and so no sure identification is yet possible. 'Anāḵa (Anathoth) is 2 miles N.E. of Jerus. Nob therefore lay between that and the city, at a point where the city could be seen, apparently on the ancient road from the ancient N. Rather more than a mile N. of Jerus rises the ridge Rās el-Meshārīf (2,065 ft.), over which the road from the N. passes; and here the traveler approaching from that direction of Gaza, his home of the city. It is fittingly named "the look-out." Col. cite with the case for identifying this height with Mt. Scopus where Titus established his camp at the siege of Jerusalem (PEFS, 1874, 111 ff). Immediately S. of the ridge, to the E. of the road, there is a small plateau, S. of which there is a lower ridge, whence the slopes dip into Wady el-Faz. This plateau, on which Titus may have sat, is a very probable site for Nob. It quite suits the requirements of Isaiah's narrative, and not those of David's flight. Junius suggests the N., and this lay in the most likely path to the S.

NOBACH, nō'ba (נובא, nōḇāh; B, נבשא, Naḇašā, Naḇoš, Naḇaš, Naḇās, Naḇoš, Naḇāš, Naḇoš).

1) Nobah the Manassite, we are told, "went and took Kenath, and the villages thereof, and called it Nobah, after his own name" (Nu 32 42). There can be little doubt that the ancient Kenath is represented by the modern Qana'awat, on the western slope of Jebel Druze, the ancient name having survived that of Nobah.

2) A city which marked the course of Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites (Jgs 8 11). It is possible that this may be identical with (1). Cheyne argues in favor of this (BD, s.v., "Gideon"). But its mention along with Jophbah points to a more southerly location. This may have been the original home of the clan Nobah. Some would read, following the Syr in Nu 31 30, "Nobah which is on the desert," instead of "Nophah which reacheth unto Medeba." No site with a name resembling this has yet been recovered. If it is to be distinguished from Kenath, then probably it will have to be sought somewhere to the N.E. of Rabbath-Amon (Anmcdn). W. Ewing

NOBAI, nō'ba (נובה, nōḇāh, or nōḇ‘ah, nōḇ‘āh): One of those who took part in sealing the covenant (Neh 10 19).

NOBLE, nōbl', NOBLES, nōb'ls, NOBLEMAN, nōbl'mn (נובל, 'nōḇîl, kōrîm, 'nōḇîn, addâr; τέγνης, κόριμος, κρεττίς, Bassetos, basileia): "Noble" is the tr of the Heb kōrîm (occuring only in the pl.), "free-born," "noble" (1 K 21 811; Neh 2 16; 6 17, etc); of addâr, "begirded," "mighty," "illustrious" or "noble" (Jgs 6 13; 2 Ch 25 20, etc); of kōrîm, "liberal," "a noble" (Nu 21 18, Prov 16 16, etc).

Other words are gâdîl, "great" (Jon 3 7); yâkîr, Aram, "precious" (Ezr 4 10); nāhîd, a "lender" (Job 29 10); parâmîl, "foremost ones" (Est 1 3; 6 6); ṣûḵâr, "those near," "nobles" (Ex 24 11); bârî, "fugitives" (Isa 43 14); ṭâkkêb, "weighty," "honored" (Ps 149 8); egesâh, "well-born" (Acts 17 11; 1 Cor 2 26); krodâne, "strongest," "most powerful" (Acts 24 23, 26 25).

The Apoc. AV and RV, still further enlarges the list. In Ps 8 5 we have nāqebn, "great ones" (1 Est 1 38; § 26, with ṣûkîma, "in honor"; Wisd 18 12). Otherwise RV's use of noble and 'noblesse' are for words containing the n-gn, and referring to birth (cf Wisd 3 3; 2 Macc 5 273; 12 42; 14 42 bis). AV's uses are wider (Job 20 7, etc).

Noblemen is, in Lk 19 12, the tr of egeâsâh antîrûsas, "a man well born," and in Jn 4 46 49 of basileios, "kingly," "belonging to a king," a designation extended to the officers, courtiers, etc, of a king, RvM "king's officer"; he was probably an official, military or legal, of the Herod Antipas, who was styled "king" (basileioi).

For "nobles" (Isa 43 14), AV "have brought down all their nobles." RV has "I will bring down all them as fugitives," etc, or, as otherwise read, "their nobles even;" etc, for "nobles" (Jer 30 21). "Prince": ERV has "worthies" for "nobles" (Nah 3 18); RV has "the noble" for "princes" (Prov 17 26); "noble" for "princes" (Job 54 18; Dan 1 3); for "Nazarites" (Lam 4 7; m, Nazrītēs); "her nobles" for "his fugitives," RV, as other wise read, "fugitives" (Isa 15 5); AV has "noble" for "liberal" (Isa 35 2); "the nobles that held their peace," RV; "The voice of the nobles was hushed," m, Heb hid;" for "most noble" (Acts 24 3; 25 23), "most excellent." W. L. Walker

NOD, nōd (נוד, nōḏ): The land of Eden, to which Cain migrated after the murder of his brother and his banishment by Jehovah (Gen 4 16). Conjecture as to the region in which it was is uncertain. The ideas of China, India, etc, which some have entertained, are groundless. The territory was evidently at some distance, but where is now undiscoverable.

NODAB, nōḍāb (נֹדָב, nōḏāḇ; Nōdâbaω, Nōdâbaω): A Hagrite clan which, along with Jetur and Naphtash, suffered complete defeat at the hands of the trans-Jordanic Israelites (1 Ch 5 19). It has been suggested that Nodab is a corruption of Kedemah, another Hebrew name which is associated with Jetur and Naphtash in the lists of Isha'el's sons (Gen 25 15; 1 Ch 1 31), but it is difficult to see how even the most careless copyist could so blunder. There is a possible reminiscence of the name in Ndêbê, a village in the Hauran.

NOE, nō’ē (Nô, Nôb): AV of Mt 24 37 38; Lk 3 36; 17 26 27; Tob 4 12. Gr form of Noah (q.v.) (thus RV).

NOEBA, nō’ē-ba (Nôbâ, Nōeboh): Head of one of the families of temple-servants (1 Est 6 31) = "Nekoda of Ezra 2 48.

NOGAH, nō'ga (נגא, nôghāh, "splender"): Son of David born at Jerus (1 Ch 3 7; 14 6). In the list (2 S 5 14 16) this name is wanting. In its Gr form (Naγας, Naγας) it occurs in the genealogy of Jesus (Lk 3 25).

NOHABA, nō’ba (נובה, nōḇah, "rest"): The fourth son of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 2). It is probable that in Jgs 20 43, instead of "a resting-place" we should read "Nobah," which may have been the settlement of the family.

NOISE, noiz (ניאה, nô‘în, nô‘în, hâmôn, nîn, šâlān, ﷲإمكانية, khoân): "Noise" is most frequently the tr of kol, "voice," "sound," in AV (Ex 20 18, "the noise of the trumpet," RV "voice"; 32 17 18; Jgs 5 11, "[they that are delivered] from the noise of the archers," RV "far from the noise," etc, m "because of the voice of": 1 S 4 6, etc); hâmôn, "noise," "sound" (1 S 14 19); rōghez, "anger," "rage" (Job 37 2); rēs, "outcry" (Job 36 33); shôn, "desolation," "noise" (Isa 24 8; 26 9); rōṣ, "cry," "cry," "crying" (Job 36 29); rōṣ, "to break forth" (Ps 89 4); šômē, "to hear," etc (Josh 6 10; 1 Ch 15 28); khoân, "sound," "voice," is tr "noise" (Rev 6 1, "I heard as it were the noise of thunder," RV "saying as with a voice of thunder"); rōṣēlēm, "with a hissing or rushing sound" (2 Pet 3 10, "with a great noise"); tinētāt khoân (Acts 6 2, AV "when this was noise abroad," m "when this voice was made," RV "when this sound was heard"); akōû, "to hear," "to talk or speak" throughout, are also tr "noise" (Mk 2 1; Lk 1 65). So RV of Jch 10 16, "noised among the tents," "to talk," "to break forth" (Ps 89 4), "to be heard," etc (Josh 10 16, 18; Apoc, thrôs, "confused noise" (Wisd 1 10); boē, "outcry" (Jch 14 19); echōs, "sound" (Wisd 17 18; Sir 40 13); Lat nox, "voice" (2 Est 5 7).

The INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA 2154
For "noise" (Ps 65 7 bvs), RV has "roaring"; for "make a noise like the noise of the sea" (Isa 17 12), "the uproar [in "multitude"] of many peoples, that roar like the roaring of the sea": for "a voice of noise from the city" (Isa 66 6), "a voice of tumult from the city"; for "a noise" (Jer 10 22), "voice"; for "a noise" (1 Ch 15 28), "voice"; (Ezek 3 9), "voices"; for "every battle of the warrior is with confused noise" (Hab 3 6), "the voice of the warrior in the tumult," "every boot of the booted warrior": for "make a noise," "noan" (Ps 3 2), "roar" (Isa 17 12); for "make a loud noise" (Ps 85 4), "break forth"; for "maketh a noise" (Jer 4 19), "is disregulated"; for "the noise of his tabernacle" (Job 38 29), "the thunderings of his pavilion," for "make any noise with your voice" (Josh 6 10), "let your voice be heard": "joyful noise in the courts of the LORD." (Isa 16 8). "The noise on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than all the mighty waves of the sea" (Ps 93 4; 46 6). Above the voices of many waters, the mighty-breakers of the sea, Jehovah is mighty.

NOISE, noise, nōn, nōn: 1 Ch 7 27 AV and RVm. See NUN.

NOOMA, nō'ō-ma (Nōomā, Noomā, B, 'Oouā, Oomt; AV Ethma); 1 Esd 9 35 = "Nebo" of Ezra 10 43, of which it is a corruption.

NOON, nōn, NOONDAY, nōn'dā (גּוֹרָתָי, gōratay, μεμυρμεία, memimēria): The word means light, splendor, brightness, and hence the brightest part of the day (Gen 43 16 25; Acts 22 6). See also MIDDAY; DAY AND NIGHT; TIME.

NOPH, nōf (נוף, nōph; in Hos 9 6 môph): A name for the Egyptian city Memphis (so LXX), hence rendered in RV (Isa 19 13; Jer 2 16; 44 1; Ezek 30 13 16). See MEMPHIS.

NOPHAI, nōfā (נופָהִי, nōphāhī; LXX does not transliterate): A city mentioned only in Nu 21 30 (see NOAH). LXX reads kai hai gunaikes ei pros ezekiasan pin epi Modo, "and the women besides [yet] kindled a fire at [against] Moab." The text has evidently suffered corruption.

NORTH, north, NORTH COUNTRY (נְפִּיא, nophē, כָּנָה, from נָפֶשׁ, ἐνίο, "to hide," i.e. "the hidden," "the dark" [Ges.]; ἐνφασ, ἄνφας, ἐνφασ, ἄνφας, ἄνφας, ἄνφας [Ith 16 4]; septuagint [2 Esd 15 45]): In addition to the many places where "north" occurs merely as a point of the compass, there are several passages in Jer, Ezek and Zeph, where it refers to a particular country, usually Assyria or Babylonia: Jer 3 18, "They shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I gave for an inheritance unto your fathers"; Jer 46 6, "In the north by the river Euphrates they have stumbled and fallen"; Ezek 26 7, "I will bring upon Tyre Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, king of kings, from the north"; Zeph 2 13, "He will stretch out his hand against the north, and destroy Assyria, and will make Nineveh a desolation."

While the site of Nineveh was N.E. of Jerus, and that of Babylon almost due E., it was not unnatural for them to be referred to as "the north," because the direct desert routes were impracticable, and the roads led first into Northern Syria and then eastward (cf however Gen 29 1, "Then Jacob went on his journey, and came to the land of the children of the east").

In Ezek 38 6, we have, "General and all his host, the house of Togarmah in the uttermost parts of the north." It is uncertain what country is here referred to. Some have supposed Armenia (cf Gen 10 3; 1 Ch 1 6; Ezek 27 14).

The north border of the promised land, as outlined in Nu 34 7-9 and Ezek 47 15-17, cannot be determined with certainty, even in the light of the evidence that is named cannot be identified, but it was approximately the latitude of Mt. Hermon, not including Lebanon or Damascus. For north (מְשֹׁר, see Astronomy.

NORTHEAST, SOUTHEAST: These words occur in Acts 27 12, "if by any means they could reach Phoenix, and winter there; which is a haven of Crete, looking north-east and south-east." RV has: "Gr, direct from the south-west and down the north-west wind," which is a lit. tr. of the Gr: eis Phthivika . . . E. (Acts 27 12)." "The northeast wind is stronger than the northwest wind." Chôraos does not appear to occur except here, and is therefore the corresponding Lat. "choras" is found in Caesar, Vergil, and other classical authors. AV has "lieth toward the south west and north west." kórd, kóta, with a wind or stream, means, "down the wind or stream," i.e. in the direction that is blowing or flowing, and this interpretation would indicate a harbor open to the E. If νῦν, lips, and χρόνος, chôraos, are used here as names of directions rather than of winds, we should expect a harbor open to the W. There is good reason for identifying Phoenix (AV "Phenice") with Loutro on the south shore of Crete (EB, s.v. "Phenice"), whose harbor is open to the E. See PHOENIX.

ALFRED ELY DAY

NOSE, nose, NOSTRILS, nos'trils, nos'trils (נָזָה, eph; "nose," נָזָה, "nose," נָזָה, dual of נָזָה, נָזָה, "nose"): The former expression (eph from "amph, like Arab. أنف, 'onf) is often tr. "face" (which see s.v.) in EV. It is frequently referred to as the organ of breathing, in other words, as the receptacle of the breath or spirit of God: "Jeh . . . breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul" (Gen 2 7). "My life is yet whole in me, and the spirit of God is in my nostrils" (Job 27 3). Therefore a life which depends on so slight a thing as a breath is considered as utterly frail and of no great consequence: "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils; for wherein is he to be accounted of?" (Isa 2 22; cf Wisd 2 2).

In poetical language such a breath of life is ascribed even to God, esp. with regard to the mighty storm which is thought to proceed from His nostrils (Ex 16 8; Ps 30 14; Ezek 37 9; Ps 48 8):

The phrase, "a smoke in my nose, a fire that burneth all the day" (Isa 65 5), is equivalent to a perpetual annoyance and cause of irritation. A cruel custom of war, in which the vanquished had their noses and ears cut off by their remorseless conquerors, is described to in Ezek 23 25. As a wild animal is held in check by having his nose pierced and a hook or ring inserted in it (Job 40 24; 41 2 [Heb 40 26]), so this expression is used to indicate the humbling and taming of an obstinate person (2 K 19 20; Isa 37 29; cf Ezek 23 25). But men, and esp. women, had their noses pierced for the wearing of jewelry (Gen 24 47; Isa 3 21; Ezek 16 12). In one passage the meaning is not quite clear, viz. in the enumeration of blemishes which disable a "son of Aaron" from the execution of the priest's office (Lev 21:18), where EV translates "flat (in 'slit') nose." The Heb word is הבמה, baram, which is a hapax legomenon. It corresponds, however, to the Arab. √ حَرَمَة, حَرَم, حَرَمُ (kharām, khararnā), which means "to open," "to pierce the nose," cap. the bridge of the nose. We may accept this meaning as the one intended in the passage.

The text is dark and much discussed passage must still be referred to: "And, lo, they put the branch to their nose" (Ezek 17:2). The usual explanation (whereof the context gives some valuable hints) is that a rite connected with the worship of Baal (the sun) is here alluded to (see Smend and A. B. Davidson's comm. on the passage). A similar custom is known from Pers sun-worship, where a bunch (barebeh) of dates, pomegranates or tamarisks was held to the nose by the worshipper, probably as an attempt to keep the Holy One (sun) from being contaminated by sinful breath (Spiegel, Eranische Altertümer, I, 571). Among modern Jews posies of myrtle and other fragrant herbs are held to the nose by the persons attending on the ceremony of circumcision, for the alleged reason of purifying the nose. Another interpretation of the above passage would understand נ.which, in the sense of "male sexual member" (see Gesenius-Buhl, s.v.; Levy, 116, 1, 544), and the whole passage as a reference to a sensuous Canaanite rite, such as is perhaps alluded to in Isa 57:8. In that case the פס, app'dam, "their nose," of the MT would have to be considered as tškōn 100 (a correction of the scribes) for EN, (appt, "my face." Or read "They cause their stench (z'mordhthim) to come up to my face." (Kraetschmar, ad loc.) See Branch.

NOSE-JEWELS, nōz-jūdz, -jōdz (נַשׁ-יֵילָ֑ד, nēzā'ēdz [probably from נַשָּׁה, nēzā, "muzzle"], a "nose-ring," or "nose-jewel," so rendered in Isa 3:21; "jewel in a swine's snout," Prov 11:22, AVm "ring," "jewel on thy forehead," Ezek 16:12, "ring upon thy nose"); in Gen 34:22, AV rendered incorrectly "earring" of ver 47. Indeed, the word had also a more generic meaning of "ring" or "jewelry," whether worn in the nose or not. See Gen 35:4; Ex 32:2, where the ornament was worn in the ear. There are several cases without specification, uniformly rendered, without good reason, however, "earing" in AV (Ex 35:25; Jgs 8:24, 25; Job 42:11 ["ring"]); Prov 26:12; Hos 2:13 [15].

The nose-jewel was made of gold or of silver, usually and worn by many women of the East. It was a ring of from an inch to about three inches (in extreme cases) in diameter, and was passed through the right nostril. Usually there were pendant from the metal ring jewels, beads or coral. Such ornaments are still worn in some parts of the East. See also Amulet; Jewel.

NOTABLE, nōtā'bāl (נְתַנְתָּל, nōtā'tāl; γνωστός, gnōtos); "Notable" is the tr of ḥēzāth, "conspicuous" (חֹזָאת, "to see," e.g. Dnl 8:5, "a notable horn," i.e. "conspicuous," AVm "a horn of sight," ver 45, "notable" [horn]; "knowledge," "knowledge" (Acts 4:16); of epimēnos, "noted," "marked" (Mt 27:16; Rom 16:17, "of note"); of epiphanēs, "very manifest," "illustrious" (cf. "Antiochus Epiphanes"); Acts 2:20, "that great and notable day," quoted from Joel 2:31; LXX, for γάρ, "to be feared," AV and RV "terrific,"

(of Mal 4:5); "notable" occurs also in 2 Mac 3:26 (expres,); 14:33, RV "for all to see"; 6:28 (genoivos), "a notable example," RV "noble;" notably, only in 2 Mac 14:31 (genoivos), "notably prevented," RV "bravely," m "notable").

NOTO, nōtō (נָתוֹ, nōto, nōth, nōth, nōthmān, etc.; μνηστική, μνηστικος, μνηστήμας, μνηστώματα); "Note" (vb.) is the tr of ḥēzāth, "to grave," "to inscribe," etc (Isa 30:8, note it in a book, RV "inscribe"); of ḥēzēma, "to note down, etc (Dnl 10:21, RV "inscribed"); of sēmētō, "to put a sign on" (2 Thess 3:14, "note that man"). "Note" (noun) is the tr of epimēnos, "marked upon," "distinguished" (Rom 16:7, "who are of note among the apostles").

"Notes" (musical) occurs in Wisd 19:18, "notes of a portly" (πιθήκης).

NOTHING, nōth'ing (nōt'ing, lō', lē'ning, lē'ning, lē'mān, etc.; πνεύμα, μνημέδες, νοόδες, νοοδες); "Nothing" is represented by various words and phrases, often with lō', which is properly a subject, with the meaning of "nothing." Most frequently we have lō' "marked," "not anything" (Gen 40:15; Jgs 14:6).

Other forms are lō' ḥēzē"khā, "not anything" (Gen 19:18); lē' "known," "not known" (Dnl 12:7, 8); lē'mān, "nothing" (Dnl 14:35, RSV, "nothing"); ḥēzēm, "nothing" (Isa 34:12); lē'mān, "nothing" (Isa 41:22); lē'mān, "nothing" (Am 3:1); ḥēzēm, "nothing" (Dnl 3:4); ḥēzēm, "nothing" (Dnl 21:4); once lō'ā; "emptiness" (Job 6:18); ḥēzēm, "nothing" (Prov 9:13); lē'mān, "empty"); "nothing" (2 S 24:24); nē' "not," "to make small," "bring to nothing" (Jer 10:24); ḥēzēm, "nothing" (Job 24:25).

In 2 Mac 7:12, we have "nothing," adverbially (en oudeis), "he nothing regarded the pains" (cf. K K 16:21); 9:7 (oudomēs), RV "in no wise"; Wisd 11:11, "noteworthy" (ἀξιόροο), RV "of no service"; Bar 16:7,26.

For "nothing" RV has "none" (Ex 23:26; Joel 2:3, "never" (Neh 5:8), "not wherewith" (Prov 22:27), "vanity and nought" (Isa 41:29); for "answerless anything" (Mk 16:1), "no more answered anything."); "answered nothing" (ver 3 omitted); "anything" for "nothing" (1 Tim 6:7), "not anything" (Acts 20:20), "not" (1 Cor 8:2), "no word" (Lk 1:37), "not wherewith" (7:42); for "nothing" (Job 4:4), "not" (1 Cor 12:27); for "it is nothing" (2 Ch 14:11), "there is none besides" a "like"); for "lacked nothing," for "nothing lacking" (Acts 11:22), "nothing doubting" (Acts 12:12), "making no distinction"; for "hoping for nothing again" (Lk 6:35), "never despairing"; for "are nothing" (Acts 21:24), "no truth in"; for "nothing shall offend them" (Ps 119:165), "no occasion of stumbling"; for "bring to nothing" (1 Cor 1:19), "ERV reject," ARV "bring to nought;" "nothing better for "no good" (Eccel 3:12), for "not" (Mt 13:34, different text); "for nothing" (Acts 9:8), "for nothing," "for" (Ex 21:11), "nothing for "for sin" (Job 6:24), m "shalt not err"; and "shall have nothing" for "and not for himself" (Dnl 9:26, m "there shall be none belonging to him").

NOUGHT, nōt (nōt, bīnān; πρόποπα, katarpe; katarpe; "Naught" is to be distinguished from "naught" implying "badness" (see Naught).

"Naught" in the sense of "nothing," etc. is the tr of bīnān, "forbidden" (Gen 39:15), and of various other words occurring once only, e.g. "good," "vanity" (Am 5:5); tōhā, "vacancy," "ruin" (Isa 49:4); "cpha," "nothing" (Isa 14:21); nōbēl, "to fade" (Job 14:18, m "faded away"); pārē, "to make void" (Ps 33:10); katarpe, "to make without effect" (1 Cor 1:28; 2:6); oudeis, not even one" (Acts 5:30); apeleugemōn, "refutation" (Acts 19:27, RV "come into disrepute"); dōrōn, "without payment" (2 Thess. 3:8, RV "for nought"); erēmō, "to desolate" (Rev. 18:17, RV "made desolate"); katalō, "to loose down" (Acts 5:38, RV "be overthrown"). In Apoc we have "set at nought" and "come to nought," etc. (1 Pet. 3:15; 2 Pet. 3:5; 2:5).

For "nought" RV has "perish" (Dt. 28:63); for "come to nought" (Job 8:22), "he no more"; "nought" for "not (ex)" (Ex. 5:11), for "no (28:32); for "nought" Isa. (Isa. 19:1), "brought to nought": ARV "bring to nought" (1 Cor. 19:19) for "nought" (KJV) (ARV "ex Profecto"); "nought but terror" (Isa. 28:19) for "a vexation only": "brought to nought" (Isa. 16:4) for "is at an end": "come to nought for" (Rom 9:5; non: effect) "set at nought for" (despise) (Rom 14:3).

NOURISH, nourish ( γαστερίζειν, giddēl, γείνω, hēgyē, ἔµιπερ, καλέλ, ἑπαβάν, ἀναπόφιλον, ἀπόθίμω, ἐκπληθοῦν, ἐντρηπόθην): While the word "nourish" was ordinarily an appropriate rendering in the time of the AV, the word has since become much less frequent, and some senses have largely passed out of ordinary use, so that the meaning in most cases he better expressed by some other word. Giddēl means "to bring up," "rear [children]" (Isa. 1:2, m "made great"); ἑπαβάν; "keep alive" (with a sense of care) (2 S. 12:3; Isa. 7:21, ARV "keep alive"). Kallēl means "to support," "maintain," "provide for" (esp. with food) (Gen. 45:11; 47:12; 50:21). Ribbān means "to bring up," "rear [whelps]" in a figurative use (Exk 19:2). Trepō "to feed" (transitive, Acts 12:20, RV "feed"); Rev. 15:14; "to fatten" (Jas. 5:5, the context indicating an unfavorable meaning). Ananthropē in "to bring up," "rear," like giddēl (Acts 7:20.21); ekthrephō is "to take care of" (Eph. 5:29); ἐντρηπόθην means "to bring in up," "train in" (1 Tim. 4:6).

NOVICE, nov'is (νεοφτός, νεοφρός, "newly planted"): In this sense it is found in LXX of Job 14:9 and Isa. 5:7. In the NT it occurs only once (1 Tim. 3:6), where it means a person newly planted in the Christian faith, a neophyte, a new convert, one who has recently become a Christian. This term occurs in the list which Paul gives of the qualifications of one a Christian bishop must possess. The apostle instructs Timothy, that if any man desires the office of a bishop, he must not be a "novice," must not be newly converted, or recently brought to the faith of Christ "lest he be lifted up with pride, and fall into the condemnation of the devil.

This means that a recent convert runs the very serious risk of being wise in his own eyes, of despising those who are still on the level from which by his conversion, he has been lifted; and so he becomes puffed up with high ideas of his own importance. He has not yet had time to discover his limitations, he is newly planted, he does not fully understand his true position in the Christian community, he overestimates himself, and for these reasons he is peculiarly liable to instability, and to the other weaknesses and sins connected with an inflamed opinion of himself. His pride is a kind of indication of a coming fall. A novice, therefore, must on no account be appointed to the office in question, for he would be sure to bring disgrace upon it.

LITERATURE

1. Number and Arithmetic.—The system of counting followed by the Hebrews and the Semites generally was the decimal system, which seems to have been suggested by the use of the ten fingers. Hebrews had several words of different forms for the first nine numbers and for ten and its multiples. Of the sexagesimal system, which seems to have been introduced into Babylonia by the Sumerians and which, through its development there, has influenced the measurement of time and space in the western civilized world even to the present day, there is no direct trace in the Bible, although, as will be shown later, there are some possible echoes. The highest number in the Bible described by a single word is 10,000 (ribbā or ribbō or mārūdā). The Egyptians, on the other hand, had separate words for 100,000, 1,000, 100,000, 10,000,000. The highest numbers referred to in any way in the Bible are: "a thousand thousand" (1 Ch. 22:14; 2 Ch. 14:9) "thousands of thousands" (Dan. 12:3; Rev. 5:11); "thousands of ten thousand" (Gen. 24:60); "ten thousands ten thousand" (Dnl. 7:10; Rev. 5:11); and twice that figure (Rev. 9:16). The excessively high numbers met with in some oriental systems (cf. Lhabeb System of the Decalogue, v. 37), have no parallels in Heb. Fractions were not unknown. We find 1/2 (2 S. 18:2, etc.); 1/3 (Ex. 25:10.17.etc.); 1/4 (Gen. 37:9.8.1/2); 1/10 (Dnl. 9.46); 1/36 (Ex. 18:36); 1/13 (Lev. 23:13); 1/14 (Lev. 14:10), and 1/11 (Lev. 19:29). These numbers are less definitely expressed: 1/3 by "a double portion," lit. "a double mouthful" (Dt. 21:17; 2 K. 2:9; Zee. 13:8); 1/4 by "four parts" (Gen. 24:7); and 1/10 by "nine parts" (Neh. 11:1). Only the simplest rules of arithmetic can be illustrated from the OT. There are examples of addition (Gen. 5:3-31; Nu. 1:20-46); subtraction (Gen. 18:28 ff.); multiplication (Lev. 25:8; Nu. 36:46), and division (Nu. 31:27 ff.). In Lev. 25:50 ff. is what has been said to imply a kind of rule-of-three sum. The old Babylonians had tables of squares and cubes intended no doubt to facilitate the measurement of land (Sayce, Assyria, Is. 26, Priests and People, 118; Besold, Ninive and Babylon, 90, 92), and it can only be doubted that the same need led to similar results among the Israelites, but at present there is no evidence. Old Heb arithmetic and mathematics as known to us are of the most elementary kind (Nowack, HA. 1, 285).

II. Notation of Numbers.—No special signs for the expression of numbers in writing can be proved to have been in use among the Hebrews before the exile. The Sibam Words Inscription, which is probably the oldest Monument of Heb writing extant (with the exception of the ostraca of Samaria, and perhaps a seal or two and the obscure Gezer tablet), has the numbers written in full. The words used there for 3,200, 1,000 are written as words without any abbreviation. The earlier text of the M S which practically illustrates Heb usage has the numbers 30, 40, 50, 100, 200, 7,000 written out in the same way.

After the exile some of the Jews at any rate employed signs such as were current among the Egyptians, the Phoenicians—an upright line for 1, two such lines for 2, three for 3, and so on, and special signs for 10, 20, 100. It had been conjectured that these or similar signs were known to the Jews, but actual proof was not forthcoming until the discovery of Jewish papyri at Assuan and Elephantine in 1904 and 1907. In these texts, ranging from 494 to c. 400 BC, the dates and names, e.g., Solomon, and so forth, are described. We have therefore clear evidence that numerical signs were used by members of a Jewish colony in Upper Egypt in the 5th cent. BC. Now, as the existence of this colony can be traced before 525 BC, it is probable that they used this method of notation also in the preceding century. Conjecture indeed may go as far as its beginning, for it is known that there were Jews in Pathros, that is Upper Egypt, in the last days of Jeremiah (Jer 44:15). Some of the first Jewish settlers in Elephantine may have known the prophet and some of them may have come from Jesus, bringing these signs with them. At present, however, that is pure hypothesis.

In the notation of the chapters and verses of the Heb Bible and in the expression of dates in Heb books the consonants of the Heb alphabet are employed for figures, i.e., the first ten letters for 1–10, combinations of these for 11–99, the following eight for 20–99, and the remainder of the alphabet, at any rate. The letters of the Gr alphabet were used in the same way.

The antiquity of this kind of numerical notation cannot at present be ascertained. It is found on Jewish coins which have been dated in the reign of the Macabean Simon (143–135 BC), but some scholars refer them to a much later period. All students of the Talm are familiar with this way of numbering the pages, or rather the leaves, but its use there is no proof of early date. The numerical use of the Gr alphabet is abundantly illustrated. It is met with in many Gr papyris, some of them from the 3rd cent. BC (Hibeh Papyri, nos. 40–43, etc.): on several coins of Herod the Great, and in some MSS of the NT, for instance, a papyrus fragment of Mt (Oxyrhynchus Pap., 2) where 14 is three times represented by iota delta with a line above the letters, and some codices of Rev at 13:18 where 666 is given by the three letters chi xi sau (or digamma). It is possible that two of these methods may have been employed by scholars in the Punic Sacrificial Tablet of Marseilles, where (l. 6) is expressed first in words, and then by figures.

III. Numbers in OT History.—Students of the historical books of the OT have long been perplexed by the high numbers which are made with in memory and which are set down as a number ascribed to the Israelites at the exodus (Ex 12:37; Nu 11:21), and on two occasions during the sojourn in the wilderness (Nu 1:26)—more than 600,000 adult males, which means a total of two or three millions; the result of David's census 1,300,000 men (2 S 24:9) or 1,570,000 (1 Ch 21:5), and the slaughter of half a million in a battle between Judah and Israel (2 Ch 13:17). There are many other illustrations in the Books of Ch and elsewhere. That ancient figures were used and that they are not beyond reason can, beyond any reasonable doubt, and is not in the least surprising, for there is ample evidence that the numbers in ancient documents were exceptionally liable to corruption. One of the best known instances is the variation of 4,646 years between the Heb text and the LXX (text of B) as to the interval from the creation of Adam to the birth of Abram. Other striking cases are 1 S 6:19, where 50,070 ought probably to be 70 (Jos, Ant. VI, i, 4); 2 S 15:7, where 400,300 is probably 400,300; 117 of 76 and 276 in the MSS of Acts 27:37, and of 616 and 666 in those of Rev 13:18. Heb MSS furnish some instructive variations. One of them, no. 109 of Kennicott, reads (Nu 1:23) 1,050 for 50,000; 50 for 50,000 (2:6), and 100 for 100,000, (ver 16).

It is easy to see how mistakes may have originated in many cases. The Heb numerals for 30, etc., are the plurals of the units, so that the former, as written, differ from the latter only by the addition of the two last letters, and much more so of the vowel doublé -im. Now as the means was often omitted, 3 and 30, 4 and 40, etc., could readily be confused. If signs or letters of the alphabet were made use of, instead of abbreviated words, there would be quite as much room for misconception on the part of copyists. The high numbers above referred to as found in Ex and Nu have been ingeniously accounted for by Professor Findlers Petrie (Researches in Sinai) in a wholly different way. By understanding 'thousands' not as "thousand," but as "family" or "tent," he reduces the number to 5,550 for the first census, and 5,730 for the second. This figure, however, seems too low, and the method of interpretation, though not impossible, is open to criticism. It is generally admitted that the number as usually read is too high, but the original number has not yet been certainly discovered. When, however, full allowance has been made for the intrusion of numerical errors into the Heb text, it is difficult to resist the belief that, in the Books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, etc., there is a marked tendency to exaggeration in this respect. The huge armies again and again ascribed to the little kingdoms of Judah and Israel cannot be reconciled with some of the facts revealed by recent research; with the following, for instance: The army which met the Assyrians at Karkar in 854 BC and which represented 11 states and tribes inclusive of Israel and the kingdom of Damascus, cannot have numbered at the most more than about 75,000 or 80,000 men (HDB, p. 4900, 630), and is represented. By the latter reckons the whole levy of his country at only 102,000 (Dem. Allo orient. XI, l, 14, note). In view of these figures it is not conceivable that the armies of Israel or Judah could number a million, or even half a million. The contingent from the larger kingdom contributed on the occasion mentioned above consisted of only 10,000 men and 2,000 chariots (HDB, Ib). The safest conclusion, therefore, seems to be that, while many of the questionable numbers in the present text may be the result of corruption, there is a residuum which cannot be so accounted for.

IV. Round Numbers.—The use of definite numerical expressions in an indefinite sense, that is, as round numbers, which is met with in many languages, seems to have been very prevalent in Western Asia from early times to the present day. W. Ramsay (Thousand and One Churches, 6) remarks that the modern Turks have 4 typical numbers which are often used in proper names with little or no reference to their exact numerical force—3, 7, 40, 1,001. The Lycaonian district which gives the book its name is called Bin Bir Kilise, "The Thousand and One Churches," although the actual number in the valley is only 25. The modern Persians use 40 in just the same way. "Forty years" with them often means a long time (Brugsh, cited by König, Städtistik, 55). This lax use of numbers, as we think, was probably very frequent among the Israelites and their neighbors. The inscription on the M S supplies a very instructive example. The Israelites occupied Mount Medeba by Omri and his son for half the reign of the latter is there reckoned (II. 7 f) at 40 years. As, according to 1 K 18:23-29, the period extended to only 23 years at the most, the number 40 must have been used with the idea of a prophet's scribe as a round number. It is probably often used in that way in the Bible where it is remarkably frequent, esp. in reference to periods of days or years. The 40 days of the Flood (Gen 7:4,17), the arrangement of the life of Moses in three periods of 40 years each (Acts 7:23; Ex 7:7; Dt 34:7), the 40 years' rule or ministry of Moses (Ex 3:1, 21, 23; Jos, Ant. VI, xiv, 9), of David (1 K 2:11), of Solomon (1 K 11:42) and of Jeboam (2 K 13:1), the 40 or 80 years of rest (Jgs 3:11.30; 5:31; 8:28), the 40 years of Phili oppression (Jgs 13:1), the 40 days' challenge of Goliath (1 S 17:16), the 40 days' fast of Moses (Ex 34:28), Elijah (1 K 19:8), and Jesus (Mt 4:2 and 1), the 40 days before the destruction of Nineveh (Jon 3:4), and the 40 days before the Ascension (Acts 1:3), all suggest conventional use, or the influence of that use, for it can hardly be denied that in each of the cases, and in others which might be mentioned, was exactly 40. How it came to be so used is not quite certain, but it may have originated, partly at any rate, in the idea that 40 years constituted a generation or the period at the end of which a man attains maturity, an idea common, it would seem, to the Greeks, the Israelites, and the Arabs. The period of 40 years in the wilderness in the course of which the old Israel died out and a new Israel took its place was a generation (Nu 32:18, ete.). The rabbis long afterward regarded 40 years as the age of understanding, the age when a man reaches his intellectual prime (Ab, v, addendum). In the Koran (Sura 49) a man is said to attain his strength when 40 years old, and at that age, according to tradition, that Muhammad came forward as a prophet. In this way perhaps 40 came to be used as a round number for an indefinite period with a suggestion of completeness, and then was extended in course of time to things as well as seasons.

Other round numbers are: (1) some of the higher numbers; (2) several numerical phrases. Under (1) come the following numbers. One hundred, often of course to be understood literally, but evidently a round number in Gen 26:12; Lev 26:8; 2 S 24:3; Ecl 8:12; Mt 19:29 and ||. A thousand (thousands), very often a literal number, but in not few cases indefinite, e.g., Ex 20:6 ||; Dt 5:10; 7:9; 1 S 15:7; Ps 50:10; 90:4; 106:8; Isa 60:22, etc. Ten thousand (Heb ribbó, ribbóth, "ribbóh"); Gr μῦρος, μῦριοι) is also used as a round number as in Lev 26:8; Dt 32:30; Cant 5:10; Mic 6:7. The yet higher figures, thousands of thousands, etc., are, in almost all cases, distinct from the purely alphabetical numbers, there being remarkable examples occurring in the apocryphal books (Dn 7:10; Rev 6:11; 9:16; Ethiopic En 40:1). (2) The second group, numerical phrases, consists of a number of expressions in which numbers are used roundly, in some cases to express the idea of a fewness. One or two, etc.: "a day or two" (Ex 21:21), "an heap, two heaps" (Jgs 15:16 RVm), "one of a city, and two of a family" (Jer 3:14), "not one, nor twice," that is, several times" (2 K 16:10). Two or three: "Two or three hberries in the [topmost] hough" (Isa 17:6; cf Hos 6:2), "Where two or three are gathered together in my name," etc (Mt 18:20). König refers to Assyrian, Spts, and Arab. parallels. Three or four: the most noteworthy example is the formula which occurs 8 in Am (1:3f.6:11.16, 2:1,4.6), "for three transgressions . . . yeas for four". That the numbers here are round numbers is evident from the fact that the sins enumerated are in most cases neither 3 nor 4. In Prov 30:15. 18:29, on the other hand, the speaker, using the same rhetorical device, clmex ad majus, 4 is followed by four statements and is therefore to be taken literally. Again, König (ib) points to classical and Arab. parallels. Four or five: "Four or five in the outmost branches of a fruitful tree" (Job 32:18), and they should have smitten [Syria] five or six times" (2 K 13:19), an idiom met with also in Am 7 (König, ib). Six and seven: "He will deliver thee in six troubles; yea, in seven there shall he give thee health" (Am 3:9). "Seven shepherds, and eight principal men" (Mie 5:5), that is, "enough and more than enough" (Cheyne); "Give a portion to seven, yea, even unto eight" (Ecc 11:2). In one remarkable phrase which occurs (with slight variations of form) 24 t in the OT, two Hebrew words, meaning respectively "yesterday" and "third," are mostly used so as together to express the idea of vague reference to the past. RV renders in a variety of ways: "beforetime" (Gen 31:2, etc), "aftertime" (Josh 4:18), "henceforth" (Ex 25:1), etc in each of these cases, and in others which might be mentioned, was exactly 40. How it came to be so used is not quite certain, but it may have originated, partly at any rate, in the idea that 40 years constituted a generation or the period at the end of which a man attains maturity, an idea common, it would seem, to the Greeks, the Israelites, and the Arabs. The period of 40 years in the wilderness in the course of which the old Israel died out and a new Israel took its place was a generation (Nu 32:18, ete.). The rabbis long afterward regarded 40 years as the age of understanding, the age when a man reaches his intellectual prime (Ab, v, addendum). In the Koran (Sura 49) a man is said to attain his strength when 40 years old, and at that age, according to tradition, that Muhammad came forward as a prophet. In this way perhaps 40 came to be used as a round number for an indefinite period with a suggestion of completeness, and then was extended in course of time to things as well as seasons. By far the most prominent of these is the number 7, which is referred to in one way or another in nearly 600 passages in the Bible, as well as in many passages in the Apec and its and the Pseudepigrapha, and later Multiples Jewish literature. Of course the number has its usual numerical force in many of these places, but even there not seldom with a glance at its symbolic significance. For the determination of the latter we are not assigned to conjecture. There is clear evidence in the cuneiform texts, which are our earliest authorities, that the Babylonians regarded 7 as the number of totality, of completeness. The Sumerians, from whom the Spts have descended, are sometimes said to have been "seven-yea, the idea, equated 7 and "all." The 7-storied towers of Babylonia represented the universe. Seven was the expression of the highest power, the greatest conceivable fulness of force, and therefore was early pressed into the service of religion. It is found in reference to ritual in the age of Gudea, that is perhaps about the middle of the 3d millennium BC. "Seven gods" at the end of an enumeration meant "all the gods" (for these facts and the cuneiform evidence of Hehn, Siebenzahl und Sabbath bei den Babyloniers und im AT', 4 ff.) How 7 came to be used in this way can only be glanced at here. The view connecting it with the gods of the 7 planets, which used to be in great favor and still has its advocates, seems to lack ancient proof. Hehn (op. cit., 44 ff) has shown that the number acquired its symbolic meaning long before the earliest time for which that reference can be demonstrated. As this sacred or symbolic use of 7 was not peculiar to the Babylonians and their teachers and neighbors, but was by this time a large institution in Egypt and China, in classical lands, and among the Celts and the Germans, it probably originated in some fact of common observation, perhaps in the four lunar phases each of which comprises 7 days and a fraction. Consider Con 17:6: "the moon has not yet ceased to deepen the impression, and the fact that 7 is made up of two significant numbers, each, as will be shown, also suggestive of completeness—3 and 4—may have been early noticed and taken into account. The Bib. use of 7 may be conveniently considered under 4 heads: (1) ritual use; (2) historical use; (3) didactic or literary use; (4) apocalyptic use.

(1) Ritual use of seven.—The number 7 plays a conspicuous part in a multitude of passages giving rules for worship or purification, or recording ritual actions. The 7th day of the Biblical week (Gen 1:7; Gen 2:3; Ex 31:17) was holy to the Lord (Ex 31:13). There were 7 days of unleavened bread (Ex 34:31, etc), and 7 days of the Feast of Tabernacles (Num 29:12-41). The 7th year was the sabbatical year (Ex 21:2, etc). The Moabite Balak built Balaam on three occasions 7 altars and offered 7 oxen and 7 rams (2 Sam 24:13-25) and 7 lambs (Num 16:24). The 7th sprinkling of blood is entered in the ritual of Atoneon (Lev 16:19, etc.) and elsewhere. "Seven" sprinkling is also repeatedly mentioned in the rules for the purification of the leper and the leprous house (Lev 14:49). The leper had to order his house, "all that comes to the house of the leprous" (7 times) in the Jordan (2 K 5:10). In Jos. of report or suspected uncleanness through leprosy, or the presence of a corpse, or for other reasons, 7 days' seclusion was necessary (Lev 12:2, etc.). Circumcision took place after 7 days (Gen 17:11). The 7th day (Ex 31:17) was the "day before" it could be offered in sacrifice (Ex 22:30). Three periods of 7 days each are mentioned in the rules for the consecration and purification of the Levites (Lev 16:30). Seven words have been in the first instance by 7 holy things (Gen 21:29 ff and Gen 37:18). The 7th day was not only considered entered into the structure of sacred objects, for instance the candlestick or lamp-stand in the tabernacle and the sanctuary (Lev 24:3, etc.). The 7th day was contained in the heptateuch (Gen 1:1-2:8; cf Gen 2:12, etc). Many other instances of the ritual use of 7 in the O.T. and many instructive parallels from Bab texts can be cited.

(2) Historical use of seven.—The number 7 also figures prominently in a large number of passages which occur in historical narrative, in a way which reminds us of its symbolic significance. The following are some of the most remarkable: (a) 7; the head of the 7 horns of the Babylonian beast was one of the visions of Daniel (Dan 7:7). A similar idea is found in Revelation (Rev 12:3). The bowing down 7 times to Esau (Gen 33:3) and to Laban (Gen 31:22, etc.) is another. (b) The 7 chosen men from among the 70 sons of Israel, mentioned in Gen 41:53, was the subject of a prophetic saying (ивр. כֶּהִי נַעֲלָם כַּעַל אֵין לַעֲלָם יֹנַדְנוּ בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל), and there were 7 princes of Israel, with 7 sons of Saul (2 S 1:1, etc.) and 7 sons of Job (Job 12:2). There are 7 orders of angels (cf Rev 5:11), 7 seals (Rev 6:1), and 7 eyes (Rev 1:17), and 7 angels with 7 trumpets (Rev 8:2), 7 thunders (Rev 10:3), 7 golden candlesticks (Rev 1:20, etc.), 7 golden bowls of incense (4:9), 7 spirits of God (4:1, 3:14, 5:6), and 7 seals (Rev 5:1). For the full number, see also the 7 days of creation (Gen 1:1-28); the 7 days' rain (Gen 8:2), the 7 days' march of the priests blowing 7 trumpets round the walls of Jericho, and the 7-fold march on the 7th day (Num 10:10); the 7 sons of Eli, the sons of Elihu, the sons of Caleb (Num 10:29); the 7 horns of the Nebuchadnezzar's furnace 7 times more than it was heated (Dan 3:19), and the king is dressed in fine linen and wears golden crowns (Anna's 7 years of weilded life (Lk 2:36); the leaves of the tree of life in the new Jerusalem (Rev 22:19); the 7 harshest of the seven hills (Mt 5:29); the 7 last plagues (Rev 15:1), and 7 golden bowls of wrath (of God 15:7) and scattered by the 7 heads (15:8) which are 7 mountains (ver 9) and 7 kings (ver 10). The writer, whoever he was, must have had his imagination fired by the numerical symbolism which had been cultivated in Western Asia for millenniums. There cannot be a shadow of doubt that 7 is a symbol of completeness, as is the infinitive number 1. But the selection of the number, esp. in view of the fact that 7 and 7 occur repeatedly in cuneiform literature—in magical and liturgical texts, and in the formula so often used in the Am Tab: "7 and 7 times at the foot of the king my lord, I prostrate myself." The arrangement of the generations from Abraham to Christ in three groups of 14 each (Mt 17:1) is probably intentional, so far as the number in each group is concerned. It is doubtful whether the number has any symbolical sense. The doctrine of the 7 days of creation (Gen 1:1-2:3) is pure fiction, for there has been no influence of the application of its double, at least in some cases.

Forte-nine, or 7X7, occurs in two regulations of the Law. The second of the three great festivals took place on the 50th day after one of the days of unleavened bread (Lev 23:15 ff), that is, after an interval of 7X7 days. This custom may not have been separated by 7X7 years (Lev 25:8 ff). The combination is met with also in one of the so-called Pentitential Psalms of Babylon: "Although my sins are 7 times 7, forgive me my sins."

Seven multiplied by ten, or 70, was a very strong...
expression of multitude which is met with in a large number of passages in the OT. It occurs of persons: the 70 descendants of Jacob (Ex 1:5; Dt 10:22); the 70 of Samuel (1Sm 29:23); the 70 kings ill treated by Adonibezek (Jgs 1:7); the 70 sons of Gideon (Jgs 8:30; 9:2); the 70 descendants of Abdon who rode on 70 ass-cots (Jgs 12:14); the 70 sons of Abah (2 K 10:1; 6:1); and the 70 idolatrous elders seen by Ezekiel (Ezk 8:11). It is also used of periods: 70 days of Egypt mourning for Jacob (Gen 50:3); 70 years of trial (Isa 23:15;17; Jer 26:11; Dnl 9:2; Zec 11:1;75); the 70 weeks of Daniel (Dnl 9:24); and the 70 years of human life (Ps 90:10). Other noticeable uses of 70 are in Jer 2:10 and in the prophets (Ex 15:11; Nu 33:9); the offering of 70 bullocks in the time of Hezekiah (2Ch 29:32), and the offering by the heads of the tribes of 12 silver bowls each of 70 shekels (Nu 7:13ff). In the NT we have the 70 apostles (Lk 10:1;17), but the number is uncertain B, D and some VSS reading 72, which is the product, not of 7 and 10, but of 6 and 12. Significant seventies are also met with outside of the Bible. The most noteworthy are the Jewish belief that there are 70 nations or tongues 70 languages, under the care of 70 angels, based perhaps on the list in Gen 10; the Sanhedrin of about 70 members; the tr of the Pent to Gr by LXX (more exactly 72), and the 70 members of a family in one of the writings of Josephus (Jos 8:18). The abundant use of 70 must have been largely due to the fact that it was regarded as an intensified 7.

Seventy and seven, or 77, a combination found in the words of Lamech (Gen 4:24); the number of the first and elders of the 3rd of Sanhedrin (2Sm 24:8); and the number of lambs in a memorable sacrifice (Eer 8:35), would appeal in the same way to the oriental fancy.

The product of seven and seventy (Gr habadamokontidakia hepet) is met with once in the NT (Mt 15:22), and in the LXX of the above-quoted Gen 4:24. Moulton, however (Gram. of Gr NT Protopraema, 98), renders in both passages 70+7; contra, Allen, "Mt," ICC, 199. The number is clearly a forceful equivalent of "always." Seven thousand in 1 K 19 18 is Rom 11 4 may be a round number chosen on account of its embodiment of the number 7. In the M S the number of Israelites slain at the capture of the city of Nebo by Hezekiah is reckoned.

The half of seven seems sometimes to have been regarded as significant. In Dnl 7:25; 9:27; 12:7; Lk 4:25; Jas 5:17; Rev 11:2; 13:5 a period of distress is calculated at 3½ years, that is, half the period of sacred completeness.

The number three seems early to have attracted attention as the number in which beginning, middle and end are most distinctly marked, and to have been therefore regarded as symbolic of a complete and ordered whole. Abundant illustration of its use in this way in Bab theology, ritual and magic is given from the cuneiform texts by Hohn (op. cit., 63 ff), and the hundreds of passages in the Bible in which the number occurs include many where his special significance either lies on the surface or not far beneath it. This is owing in some degree perhaps to Bab influence, but will have been largely due to independent observation of common phenomena—thearithmetical fact more wars, 70 national calamities, 70 years to marriage, etc. as being an exact period of time, 70, the number of the earth, and sea, or "the abyss"; morning, noon and night; right, middle, and left, etc. In other words, 3 readily suggested completeness, and was often used with a glance at that meaning in daily life and daily speech. Only a few of the most memorable examples of Bib. examples can be given here. (1) Three is often found of persons and things sacred or secular, e.g. Noah's 3 sons (Gen 6:10); Job's 3 daughters (Job 1:2; 42:13) and 3 friends (Job 2:11); Abraham's 3 sons (Gen 17:19; 22:18); and the 3 measures of meal (ver 6; cf Mt 13:33); 3 in military tactics (Jgs 7:16,20; 9:43; 1 Sm 11:13, 17; Job 1:17); 3 great feasts (Ex 23:14); the 3 daily prayers (Ps 55:17; Dnl 6:10); the 3 might watches (Jgs 7:19); God's 3-fold call of Samuel (1 Sm 3:8); the 3 keepers of the temple threshold (Jr 52:24); the 3 presidents appointed by Darius (Dnl 6:2); the 3 temptations (Mt 4:3, 5, 8); the 3 prayers in Gethsemane (Mt 26:39, 42, 44); Peter's 3 denials (Mt 26:54,75); the Lord's 3-fold question and 3-fold charge (Jn 21:15 ff); and the 3-fold vision of the sheet (Acts 10:16). (2) In a very large number of passages 3 is used of periods of time: 3 days; 3 weeks; 3 months and 3 years. So in Gen 40:12,13,18; Ex 2:2; 10:22; 2 S 24:13; Isa 30: 3; Jon 1:17; Mt 16:12; Lk 2:46; 13:7; Acts 9:9; 2 Cor 12:8. The frequent reference to the resurrection "on the 3d day" or "after 3 days" (Mt 16:21; 27:63, etc) may at the same time have glanced at the symbolic use of the number 3. We must therefore begin to the Jews and the Zoroastrians that a corpse was not recognizable after 3 days (for Jewish testi mony of Jr 11:39; Yô'hâmâh, xvi, 3; Midr. Gen, ch c; Smôkhôth, viii; for Pers ideas cf Esp 7, XVIII, 589). The number 3 has in the OT & NT a most abundant use of 70 must have been largely due to the fact that it was regarded as an intensified 7.

3. The Number of completeness of range, of Four comprehensive extent. As early as the beginning of the millennium the 11 Bab rulers (followed long afterward by the Assyrians) assumed the title "king of the 4 quarters," meaning that their rule reached in all directions, and an early conqueror claimed to have subdued the 4 quarters. There are not a few illustrations of the use of 4 in some such way in the Bible. The 4 winds (referred to also in the cuneiform texts and the Book of the Dead) are mentioned again and again (Jer 49:30; Ezk 37:9, and the 4 quarters or corners of Gen 1:12; Ezk 47:12). We read also of the 4 heads of the river of Eden (Gen 2:10 ff), of 4 horns, 4 smiths, 4 chariots, and horses of 4 colors in the visions of Zechariah (1Sm 18, 15; 2Sm 5; 1K 14:9, 11; 2Sm 5:11, 12). As a parallel, the 4 kingdoms in Nebuchadnezzar's dream as interpreted (Dn 2 37 ff) and Daniel's vision (7 3 ff); the 4 living creatures in Ezek (1 5 ff; cf 10), each with 4 faces and 4 wings, and the 4 modeled after them (Rev 4 6, etc). In most of these cases 4 is clearly symbolic, as in a number of passages in Apoc and Pseudepigrapha. Whether the frequent use of it in the description of the tabernacle, Solomon's temple, and Ezekiel's temple has anything to do with the symbolic meaning is not clear, but the latter can probably be traced in proverbs and prophetic speech (Prov 30 15,18,21. 22; 31 10,12,15,16,25; Am 5 5ff). The latter represent full-summed insignity, and the 4-folding in the former suggested the wide sweep of the classification. Perhaps it is fanciful to find the idea in the 4 sets of ministers in the temple of the Sover (Mt 13 19–23 ). The rabbis almost certainly had it in mind in their 4-folding of characters in six successive paragraphs (Ab, v.16–21) which, however, is of considerably later date.

4. The Number patriarchy (Gen 5; of the 10 Bab kings of Berosus, and 10 in early Iranian texts; Dn 7 10; 12; 11 32; 6 12,14,18; 26; etc). Ten of the 36 citizens of Sodom (Gen 18 22); the 10 plagues of Egypt; the 10 commandments (Ex 20 1–17) Dt 5 1–21; the 10 commandments found by some in Ex 34 14–26 are not clearly made out); the 10 servants of Gideon (Jgs 6 27); the 10 elders who accompanied Boaz (Ruth 4 2); the 10 virgins of the parable (Mt 25 1); the 10 pieces of silver (Lk 15 8); the 10 servants intrusted with 10 pounds (Lk 15 11 ff), the most capable of whom was placed over 10 cities (Lk 12 17); the 10 days' tribulation predicted for the church of Smyrna (Rev 2 10); the use of "10 times" in the sense of "many times" (Gen 51 7; Neh 4 12; Dn 1 20, etc; an idiom met with repeatedly in Am and Tob); and the use of 10 in sacred measurements and in the widely diffused custom of tithe, and many other examples show plainly that 10 was a favorite symbolic number suggestive of a rounded total, large or small, according to circumstances. The decemvirate was a prominent idea in the early Jewish life and thought. Ten times was the Tetragrammaton uttered by the high priest on the Day of Atonement; 10 persons must be present at a nuptial benediction; 10 constituted a congregation in Israel; the number was ascribed to the company at the paschal meal, and of a row of conquerors of the bereaved. The world was created, said the rabbis, by ten words, and Abraham was visited with 10 temptations (Ab, v.1 and 4; several other numbers are found in the contexts).

The 12 months and the 12 signs of the zodiac probably suggested to the old Babylonians the use of 12 as a symbolic or semi-sacred number, but its frequent employment by the Hebrews with special meaning cannot at present be proved to have originated in that way, although the idea was favored by both Jos and Philo. So far as we know, Israellite predilection for 12 was entirely due to the traditional belief that the nation consisted of 12 tribes, a belief, it is true, entertained also by the Arabs or some of them, but with much less intensity and persistence. In Israel the belief was universal and ineradicable. Hence the 12 pillars set up by Moses (Ex 24 4), the 12 jewels of Aaron's breastplate (Ex 28 18ff), the 12 cakes of shewbread (Lev 21 5); the 12 rods (Nu 17 2); the 12 spies (Nu 13); the 12 stones placed by Joshua in the bed of Jordan (Josh 4 9); the 12 officers of Solomon (1 K 4 7); the 12 stones of Eliah's altar (1 K 18 31); the 12 disciples or apostles (26 t), and several details of apocalyptic imagery (Rev 7 5 ff; 12 1, 21, 12.14.16.21; 22 2, cf also Mt 14 20; 19 25; 26 33; Acts 26 7). The number points to a certain completeness which had been sanctioned by Divine election, and it retained this significance when applied to the spiritual Israel. Philo indeed calls it a perfect number. Its double in Rev 4 4, etc, is probably also significant.

Five came into prominence into the mind as the half of 10. Hence perhaps its use in the parable of the Virgins (Mt 25 2). It was often employed in the apocalyptic, especially in Jewish apocalyptic, for the number of the multitude in judgment, and is particularly suggested in Daniel's vision (7 10). It seems to have been occasionally suggestive of relative smallness, as in Lev 26 8, the 5 loaves (Mt 14 17), 1 Cor 14 10, and perhaps in A. a text-marked (Skr; "Gen."

6. Other Significant Numbers the Hagiographa known as the Ethnographic Numbers (Mt 7 28; 11 13; 19 16; 26 1; cf Sir J. Hawkins, Horae Synopticae, 1683). It seems to have been occasionally suggestive of relative smallness, as in Lev 26 8, the 5 loaves (Mt 14 17), 1 Cor 14 10, and perhaps in A. a text-marked (Skr; "Gen."

7; 10; 13 ff). It is used as a base of time (Ex 12 31; 20 10) in the calculations of the ages of the patriarchs, and other figures which may be expected, many are found in the Bible, however, the special use of the number is relatively rare and indirect. One hundred and ten, the phrase is often used by Jeremiah (e.g. 50 22), significant as the Egyptian ideal of longevity (Smith, DB, 1894 4 380, 381; J. A. Skinner, 'Jer."

7. The Number of the Name (Ab, v.1 and 4; several other numbers are found in the contexts).

VI. Gematria (gematria)—A parallel application of numbers which was in great use with the later Jews and some of the early Christians and is not absolutely unknown to the Bible, is gematria, that is the use of the letters of a word so as by means of their combined numerical value to express a name, or a witty association of ideas. The term is usually explained as an adaptation of the Gr word geomatia, that is, "geometry," but Dalman (Wörterbuch, s.v.) connects it in this application of it with grammatia. There is only one clear example in Scripture of the use of numbers which is the number of a man, six hundred sixty and six (Rev 13 18). If, as most scholars are inclined to believe, a name is intended, the numerical value of the letters composing which adds up to 666, and if it is assumed that the writer thought in Heb or Aram. Nero Caesar, writers with the number 666, * resh = 200, vav = 6, nun = 50, kaph = 100, gemesh = 60, resh = 200; total = 666, seems to be the best solution. Perhaps the idea suggested by Dr. Milligan that the 6-fold use of 6 which just falls short of 7, the number generally considered complete, and therefore a note of imperfection, may have been also in the writer's mind. Some modern scholars find a second instance in Gen 14 14 and 15 2. As the numerical value of the consonants which compose Elohim in Heb add up to 318, it has been maintained that the number is not historical, but has been fancifully constructed by means of gematria out of the name. This strange idea is not new, for it is found in the Midrash on Gen (ch 43) in the name of a rabbi who lived c 200 AD, but its antiquity is its greatest merit.

Literature

I. Title and Contents.—Styled in the Heb Bible מַעְרִיב, "in the wilderness," from the 5th word in 1 1, probably because of recording the fortunes of Israel in the Sinaitic desert. The 4th book of the Pent (or of the Hex, according to criticism) was designated אָדָם, אֱרָתָמָי, in LXX and Numan in the Vulg, and from this last received its name "Numbers" in the AV, in all 3 evidently because of its reporting the 2 censuses which were taken, the one at Sinai at the beginning and the other on the plains of Moab at the close of the wanderings. Of the contents the following arrangement will be sufficiently detailed:

(1) Before leaving Sinai, 1 1—10 10 (a period of 19 days, from 1st to the 30th of the 2d month after the exodus), describing:
   (a) the numbering and ordering of the people, chs 1—4.
   (b) the cleansing and blessing of the congregation,
   (c) the princes' offerings and the dedication of the 63 centers, chs 5—8.
   (d) the observance of a second Passover, 9 1—14.
   (e) the cloud and the trumpets for the march, 9 15—10 10.

(2) From Sinai to Kadesh, 10 11—14 45 (a period of 10 days, from the 20th to the 30th of the 2d month), narrating:
   (a) The departure from Sinai, 10 1—11.
   (b) The events at Taberah and Kibroth-hattavah, ch 11.
   (c) The rebellion of Miriam and Aaron, ch 12.
   (d) The wanderings of the spies, ch 13.

(3) The wanderings in the desert, chs 15—19 (a period of 37 years, from the end of the 2d to the beginning of the 4th year), recording:
   (a) Sundry laws and the punishment of a Sabbath breaker, ch 15.
   (b) The rebellion of Korah, ch 16.
   (c) The budding of Aaron's rod, ch 17.
   (d) The duties and revenues of the priests and Levites, ch 18.
   (e) The water of separation for the unclean, ch 19.

(4) From Kadesh to Moab, chs 20, 21 (a period of 10 months, from the beginning of the 40th year), reciting:
   (a) The story of Balaam, 22 2—24 25.
   (b) The zeal of Pinchas, ch 25.
   (c) The second census, 26 1—51.
   (d) Directions for dividing the land, 26 52—27 11.
   (e) Appointment of Moses' successor, 27 12—29.
   (f) Concerning offerings and vows, chs 28—30.
   (g) War with Midian, ch 31.
   (h) Settlement of Reuben and Gad, ch 32.
   (i) List of camping stations, 33 1—49.
   (j) Canaan to be cleared of its inhabitants and divided, 33 50—34 29.
   (k) Citizens refuge to be appointed, ch 35.
   (l) The marriage of heiresses, ch 36.

II. Literary Structure.—According to modern criticism, the text of Nu, like that of the other books of the Pent (or Hex), instead of being regarded as substantially the work of one writer (whatever zeal they may have been his sources of information and whoever may have been its first or latest editor), should be distributed—not always in solid blocks of composition, but frequently in fragments, in sentences, clauses or words, so mysteriously put together that they cannot now with certainty be separated—among three writers, J, E and P with another D (at least in one part)—these writers, individuals and not schools (Gunkel), belonging, respectively: J to the 9th cent. BC (c 530), E to the 8th cent. BC (c 750), P to the 5th cent. BC (c 644), and D to the 7th cent. BC (c 621).

The grounds upon which this distribution is made are principally these: (1) the supposed preferential use of the Divine names, of

1. Alleged Jeh (Lord) by J, and of Elohim (God) by E and P—a theory of the Hex;

2. Distribution hopelessly breaks down in its application, as Orr (PET, ch viii), Eerdman (St, 33 ff) and Wiener (EPC, 1) have conclusively shown, and as will afterward appear; (2) distinctions in style of composition, which are not always obvious and which, even if they were, would not necessarily imply diversity of authorship unless every author's writing must be uniform and monotonous, whatever his subject may be; and (3) perhaps only a prejudice in religious development in Israel, according to which the people in pre-Mosaic times were animists, totemists and polytheists; in Mosaic times and after, henotheists or worshippers of one God, while recognizing the existence of other gods; and latterly, in exilic and post-exilic times, monothists or worshippers of the one living and true God—which theory, in order to vindicate its plausibility, required the reconstruction of Israel's religious documents in the way above described, but which is now rejected by archaeologists (Delitzsch and A. Jeremias) and by theologians (Orr, Baentisch [though accepting the analysis of other grounds] and König) as not supported by facts.

Without denying that the text-analysis of criticism is on the first blush of it both plausible and attractive and has brought to light valuable information relative to Scripture, or without overlooking the fact that it has behind it the names of eminent scholars and is supported by not a few considerations of weight, one may fairly urge against it the following objections.

2. Object is unproved.—At the best, the theory is an unproved and largely imaginary hypothesis, or series of hypotheses—"hypothesis built on hypothesis" (Orr); and nothing more strikingly reveals this than (a) the frequency with which in the text-analysis conjecture ("perhaps" and "probably") takes the place of reasoned proof; (b) the arbitrary manner in which the supposed documents are constructed by the critics who, without reason given, and often in violation of their own rules and principles, lift out of J (for instance) every word or clause they consider should belong to E or P, and vice versa every word or clause out of E or P that might suggest that the passage should be assigned to J, at the same time explaining the presence of the inconvenient word or clause in a document to which it did not belong by the careless or deliberate action of a redactor; and (c) the failure even thus to construct the documents, the most that J and E cannot with confidence be separated from each other—Kuenen himself saying that "the attempt to make out a Jehovistic and an Elohist writer or school of writers by means of the Divine names has failed of its ends in those of P substituted"; and some even denying that P ever existed as a separate document at all, Eerdmans (St, 33, 82), in particular, maintaining, as the result of elaborate exegesis, that P could not have been constructed in the post-exilic times "as an introduction to a legal work.

(2) Written record not impossible.—It is impossible to demonstrate that the story of Israel's "wanderings" was not committed to writing by Moses, who certainly was not unacquainted with the art of writing, who had the ability, if any man had, to prepare such a writing, whose interest it was, as the leader of his people, to see that such writing, whether done by himself or by others under his superintendence, was never allowed to be without at least a few such precautions as had been commanded by God to write the journeys of Israel (33 2). To suppose that for 500 years no reliable record of the fortunes of Israel existed, when during these years writing was practised in Egypt, and the Moabites had been commanded by God to write the journeys of Israel (33 2). To suppose that for 500 years no reliable record of the fortunes of Israel existed, when during these years writing was practised in Egypt, and the Moabites had been commanded by God to write the journeys of Israel (33 2). To suppose that for 500 years no reliable record of the fortunes of Israel existed, when during these years writing was practised in Egypt, and the Moabites had been commanded by God to write the journeys of Israel (33 2). To suppose that for 500 years no reliable record of the fortunes of Israel existed, when during these years writing was practised in Egypt, and the Moabites had been commanded by God to write the journeys of Israel (33 2). To suppose that for 500 years no reliable record of the fortunes of Israel existed, when during these years writing was practised in Egypt, and the Moabites had been commanded by God to write the journeys of Israel (33 2).

(3) No book constructed in this way.—No reliable evidence exists that any book either ancient or modern was ever constructed as, according to criticism, the Pent. and in particular Nu, was. Volumes have indeed been composed by two or more authors, acting in concert, but their contributions have never been intermixed as those of J, E, and P are declared to have been; nor, when joint authorship has been acknowledged on the title-page, has it been possible for readers confidently to assign to each author his own contribution. And yet, modern criticism, dealing with documents more than 2,000 years old and in a language quite different from the original, and modern, is, even in MSS not older than the 10th cent. AD (Buhl, Canon and Text of the OT, 28), and the text of which has been fixed not infallibly either as to consonant or vowel—claims that it can tell exactly (or nearly so) what parts, whether paragraphs, sentences, clauses or words, were supplied by J, E, P and D respectively. Credet Judaeus Apella! (4) Inherent difficulties of analysis.—The critical theory, besides making of the text of Nu, as of the other books of the Pent, such a patchwork as is unthinkably impossible in any document with ordinary pretension to historical veracity, is burdened with inherent difficulties which make it hard to credit, as the following examples, taken from Nu, will show.

P, 13 1-17a.21.25-26a (to Paran).32a; 14 1.2 (in the main); 5.7.10.26-38 (in the main).

Kautzsch generally agrees; and Hartford-Battles in HDB professes ability to divide between J and E.

(i) According to this analysis, however, up to the middle of the 5th cent. BC, either JE began at 13 178, in which case it wanted both the instruction to search the land and the names of the searchers, both of which were subsequently added from P (assuming it to have been a separate document, a notion which is doubtless); or, if JE contained both the instruction and the names, these were supplanted by 1-17a from P. As the former of these alternatives is hardly likely, one naturally asks why the opening verses of JE were removed and these verses of P substituted? And if they were removed, what has become of them? Does not the occurrence of Jeh in 1-17a, on the critical principles of some, suggest that this section is the missing paragraph of JE?

(ii) If these JE passages furnish a nearly complete narrative (Driver), why should the late compiler or editor have deemed it necessary to insert two whole verses, 21 and 25, and two halves, 26a and 32a, if not because without these the original JE narrative would have been incomplete? Ver 21 states in general terms that the spies searched the whole land, proceeding as far as. As Hamath, after which ver 22 mentions that they entered the country from the S. and went up to Hebron and Eshcol, a little without at Judges 13 21 and 32a, implying (Driver) that they traveled no farther N— the reason for specifying the visit to Eshcol being the interesting fact that there the extraordinary cluster of grapes was obtained. Vs 25.26a relate quite naturally their return from the Eshcol fresh after 40 days and reported what they had found to Moses and Aaron as well as to all the congregation.

Without these verses the narrative would have stated neither how long the land had been searched nor whether Moses and Aaron had received any report from their messengers, although ver 26b implies that a report was given to some person or persons unnamed. That Moses and Aaron should not have been named in JE is exceedingly improbable. Yet this is in no way inconsistent with vs 266-31, which state that the land was flowing with milk and honey. What ver 32a adds is an expression of the exaggerated fears of the spies, whose language could not mean that the land was so barren that they would die of starvation, a statement which would have expressly contradicted ver 27 (JE)—in which case why should it have been inserted?—but that, notwithstanding its fruitfulness, the population was continually being treated by interminable wars and the incursions of surrounding peoples. The starvations theory, moreover, is not supported by the texts (Lev 26 38; Ezek 36 13) usually quoted in its behalf.

(iii) To argue (Driver) for two documents because Joshua is not always mentioned with Caleb is not strikingly convincing; while if Joshua is not included among the spies in Je, that is obviously because the passages containing his name have been assigned beforehand to P. But if Joshua's name did not occur in JE, why would it have been inserted in the story by a post-exilic writer, when even in Dt 1 38 Joshua is not among the witnesses of the prophecy? Throughout the language in Dt 1 38 tacitly suggests that both Caleb and Joshua were among the promoters of the expedition, and again the impression that Joshua was not among the spies is strongly suggested. If the text-analysis is as the critics argue, how comes it that in JE the name Jeh does not once occur, while all the verses containing it are allocated to P?

(iii) The rebellion of Korah: Chs 16 and 17 are supposed to be the work of "two, if not three," contributors (Driver, Kautzsch)—the whole story being assigned to P (anach or continuity to experience). If one or another (text analysis are not unanimous), with the exception of 16.15:2.12-15:25.26:27-34, which are given to JE, though variations and interpolations are uniformly always. It is admitted that the JE verses, if read continuously, make out a story of Dathan and Abiram as distinct from and separate from the company that the motives of Dathan and Abiram probably differed from those of Korah, and that Dathan and Abiram were swallowed up by an earthquake, while the 250 incense-offerers were destroyed by fire. To conclude from this three or even two narratives have been intermixed is traveling beyond the premises.

(iii) If JE contained more about the conspiracy of the Peobaithites, Dathan and Abiram, than has been preserved in the verses assigned to it, what has become of the excised verses, if they are not those ascribed to P; and if they are not, what evidence exists that P's verses are better than the lost verses of JE? And how comes it that the same used throughout, with one exception, ver. 22, is Jeh, while in JE it occurs only 6 times? (ii) JE contains only the parts assigned to it and nothing more happened than the Reubenites smote, why should the Korahite rebellion have been added to it 4 centuries later. (iii) If the rebellion never happened? (iii) If the Korahite conspiracy did happen, why should it have been omitted in JE, and nothing whispered about it till after the exile? (iv) If the two conspiracies, ecclesiastical (among the princes) and civil (among the laymen), arose contemporaneously, and the conspirators made common cause with one another, in that there was nothing ground for two such stories, it is not understandable. If Moses addressed himself now to Korah and again to Dathan and Abiram, why should not the same document say so? (iii) If Dathan and Abiram were swallowed up by an earthquake, and the 250 princes were consumed by fire from the tabernacle, it is not at all clear what the events of the two documents since both events might have occurred together. (vii) It is not certain that P (vs 35-45) represents Korah as consumed by fire. While the JE (vs 3-6) declares he was swallowed up by the earth. At least P (36 10) distinctly states that Korah was swallowed up by the earth, since that only the 250 were consumed by fire.

Therefore, in the face of these considerations, it is not too much to say that the evidence for more documents than one in this story is not convincing.

(c) The story of Balaam: Chs 22-24 fare more leniently at the hands of analysis, being all left with JE, except 22:23 which is definitely handed over to P. Uncertainty, however, exists as to how to partition ch 22 between J and E. Whether all should be given to E because of the almost uniform use of Elohim rather than of Jeh, with the exception of vs 92-94 which are the property of P because of the use of Jeh (Driver, Kautzsch); or whether some additional verses should not be assigned to J (Cornill, HDB), critics are not agreed. As to chs 23 and 24, authorities hesitate whether to give both to J or to E, or ch 23 to J and ch 24 to E, or both to a late redactor who had access to the two sources—surely an unsatisfactory demonstration in this case at least of the documentary hypothesis.

Comment on the use of the Divine names in this story is reserved till later.

Yet, while declining to accept this hypothesis as proved, it is not contended that the material in Nu are always arranged in chronological order, or that the style of composition is throughout the same, or that the book as it stands has never been revised or edited, but is in every jot and tittle the same as when first constructed. In ch 7, e.g., the narrative goes back to the 1st day of the 1st month of the 2d year, and in ch 9 to the 1st month of the 2d year, though both begins with the 1st month of the 2d year. There are also legislative passages interspersed among the historical, and poetical among the prosaic, but diversity of authorship, as already suggested, cannot be inferred from either of these facts unless it is impossible for a writer to be sometimes the editor of the arrangement of his materials; and for a lawyer to be also a historian, and for a prose writer occasionally to burst into song. Assertions like these, however, cannot be entertained. Hence any argument for plurality of documents founded on them must be set aside. Nor is it a fair conclusion against the literary unity of the book that its contents are varied in substance and form and have been subjected, as is probable, to revision and even to interpolations, when the revisers and interpolators have not changed the meaning of the book. Whether, therefore, the Book of Nu has or has not been compiled from preexisting documents, it cannot be justly maintained that the text-analysis suggested by the critics has shown that the literary unity of Nu has been disproved.

III. Historical Credibility. —Were the narrative in this book written down immediately or soon after the events it records, no reason would exist for challenging its authenticity, unless it could be shown either from the narrative itself or from extraneous sources that the events chronicled were internally improbable, incredible or falsified. Even should it be proved that the text consists of two or more preexisting documents interwoven with one another, this would not necessarily invalidate its truthfulness, if these documents were practically contemporaneous with the incidents they report, and were not combined in such a way as to distort and misrepresent the occurrences they related. If, however, these preexisting documents were prepared 500 (JE) or 1,000 (P) years after the incidents they narrate, and were merely a fixing in written characters of traditions previously handed down (JE), or of oral traditions (P) or an entirely imaginary one, (P), it will not be easy to establish their historical validity. The credibility of this portion of the Pent has been assailed on the alleged ground that it contains chronological inaccuracies, statistical errors and physical improprieties.

1. The Pasover (9-10) —The critical argument is that a contemporary historian would naturally have placed this paragraph before 1 1. The answer is that pos-

logically he would have done so had his object been to observe strict chronological order, which it manifestly was not (see chs 7 and 9), and had he when commencing the book deemed it necessary to state that the Israelites had celebrated a second Pasover on the legally appointed day, the 14th of the 1st month of the 2d year. This, however, he possibly at first assumed would be understood, and only afterward, when giving the reason for the supplementary Pasover, realized that in after years readers might erroneously conclude that this was all the Pasover that had been kept in the 2d year. So to obviate any such mistaken inference, he prefixed to his account of the Little Pasover, as it is sometimes called, a statement to the effect that the statutory Pasover, the one which had been observed at the usual time, in the usual way, and that, too, in obedience to the express commandment of Jeh.

(2) The thirty-seven years' chasm.—Whether 20 1 be considered the beginning of the 3d or of the 40th year, in either case 37 years is a round figure over—in at least one case in almost unbroken silence: in the other with scarcely anything of moment recorded save Korah's rebellion. The explanation that a flux of chains concurred with offerings to be made when the people reached the land of their habitation. To pronounce the whole book unhistorical, because of long intervals of absolute or comparative silence (Block) is unreasonable. Most historians believe there would be space into the whole period. Besides, a historian might have as good reason for passing over as for recording the incidents of any period of 20 years. This might have been the case with the author of Nu. From the moment sentence of death given at Kadesh till the hour when the new generation started out for Canaan, he may have counted that Israel had practically passed away: the least that the fortunes formed no part of the history of Jeh's kingdom; it is noticeable that scarcely had the tribes returned at Kadesh in preparation for their onward march than Miriam and Aaron, probably the last of the doomed generation, died. Accordingly, from this point on, the narrative is occupied with the fortunes of the new generation. Whether correct or not, this solution of 37 years' silence (Kurtz) is preferable to that which suggests (Ewald) that the late compiler, having found it impossible to locate all the tradition he had collected into the closing years of the wanderings, placed the rest of the story in a later date, and left this interval a blank, in a solution which has not even the merit of being clever and explains nothing. It does not explain why, if the narrative was begun in history, there could have been an interval at all. A romance would not have missed so splendid an opportunity for an incident, this art would have been spared, had the 37 years been unfiled, but like the writers of the apocryphal Gospels would have crowded it with manufactured details.

On the better theory, not only is the silence explained, but the items inserted are accounted for as well. Though the unbelching generation had ceased to be the people of Jeh, Aaron had not yet been sentenced to exclusion from the future land and was still one of the representatives of the kingdom of Jeh, and Korah's rebellion practically struck a blow at that kingdom. As such it was published, and as part of its breaking, and suppression was recorded, as a matter of vitally concerned the story of the departure of the last generation, the later narrative sections were included in the narrative. They were Jeh's acts and not the people's. They were statutes and ordinances for the new generation in the new land.

(3) The fortieth year.—The events recorded as having taken place between the 1st of the 5th month (the date of Moses' death) and the 1st of the 11th month (the date of Moses' address) are so numerous and important as to render it impossible, it is said, to maintain the credibility of this portion of the narrative. But (a) it is not certain that all the events in this section were fulfilled; before Moses began his oration, neither (b) nor (c) is it necessary to hold that they all occurred in succession; while the events (Ex 14) which follow one another so closely, that one is uncertain, it will not be possible to decide whether or not they could all have been begun and finished in a space of 6 months.

(1) Number of the fighting men.—This, which may be set down roughly at 600,000, has been challenged on two grounds: (a) that the 2,000,000 number is too large, and (b) that the statistical censuses at Sinai and in Moab are Errors too nearly equal.

The first of these objections will be considered in the following section when treating of the size of the congregation. The second will not appear formidable if it be remembered (a) that it is not impossible nor unusual for the population of a country to remain stationary for a long series of years; (b) that there was a special fitness in Israel's case that the doomed generation should be replaced by one as nearly as possible equal to that which had perished; (c) that had the narrative been invented, it is more than likely that the numbers would have been made either exactly equal or more widely divergent; and (d) that no such variations occurring in the strength of the tribes as numbered at Sinai and again in Moab, while nearly equal, is uncontroversial; constitutes a watermark of truthfulness which should not be overlooked.

(2) The size of the congregation.—Taking the fighting men at 600,000, and the whole community at 411 times that number, or about 271 millions, several difficulties emerge which have led to the suggestion (Erdmann, Conder, Wiener) that the 600,000 should be reduced (to, say, 6,000), and the entire population to less than 30,000. The following alleged impossibilities are believed to justify the reduction: (a) that of 700 millions between the descent into, and the departure from, Egypt; (b) that of 2½ millions being led out of Egypt in one day; (c) that of obtaining support for so large a multitude with their flocks in the Sinaitic desert, and flocks should have been either at the Mount Sinai, or on the limited territory of Pal; and (e) that of the long time it took to conquer Pal if the army was 600,000 strong.

(a) Multiplication of people: As to the possibility of 70 souls multiplying in the course of 215 years or 7 generations (to take the shorter interval rather than the longer of 430 years) into 2½ millions of persons giving 600,000 fighting men, that need not be regarded as incredible till the rate of increase in each family is exactly known. Allowing to each of Jacob's sons who were married (say 51 out of 53), 4 male descendants (Colenso allows 4), these would in 7 generations—not in 4 (Colenso)—amount to 835,584, and with surviving fathers and grandfathers added might well reach 600,000 in 20 years or 600,000 in 2,000 years of age. But in point of fact, without definite data about the number of generations, the rates of birth and of mortality in each generation, all calculations are at the best problematical. The most that can be done is to consider whether the narrative mentions any circumstances fitted to explain this large number of fighting men and the great size of the congregation, and then whether the customary objections to the Bib. statement can be satisfactorily answered.

As for confirmatory circumstances, the Bible expressly states that during the years of the oppression the Hebrews were extraordinarily fruitful, and that this was the reason why Pharaoh became alarmed and issued his edict for the destruction of the male children. The fruitfulness of the Hebrews, however, has been challenged (Erdmann, Vorgeschichte Israels, 78) on the ground that were the births so numerous as this presupposes, two midwives (Ex 1 20), who according to the narrative followed one another is ascertained, it will not be possible to decide whether or not they could all have been begun and finished in a space of 6 months.

(1) Number of the fighting men.—This, which may be set down roughly at 600,000, has been challenged on two grounds: (a) that the 2,000,000 number is too large, and (b) that the statistical censuses at Sinai and in Moab are Errors too nearly equal.

The first of these objections will be considered in the following section when treating of the size of the congregation. The second will not appear formidable if it be remembered (a) that it is not impossible nor unusual for the population of a country to remain stationary for a long series of years; (b) that there was a special fitness in Israel's case that the doomed generation should be replaced by one as nearly as possible equal to that which had perished; (c) that had the narrative been invented, it is more than likely that the numbers would have been made either exactly equal or more widely divergent; and (d) that no such variations occurring in the strength of the tribes as numbered at Sinai and again in Moab, while nearly equal, is uncontroversial; constitutes a watermark of truthfulness which should not be overlooked.

people thirsting for liberty and only waiting the signal to move, aware also of the hour at which that signal would be given, viz. at midnight, it does not appear so formidable a task as is imagined to get them all assembled in one day at a forsaken desert; nor is it probable they would be likely to delay or linger in their movements. But how could there have been 2½ millions of fugitives, it is asked (Eerdmans, Wiener), if Pharaoh deemed 600 chariots sufficient for pursuit? The answer is that Pharaoh did not reckon 600 chariots sufficient, but in addition to these, which were "chosen chariots," he took all the chariots of Egypt, his horsemen and his army (Ex 14 7.9), which were surely adequate to overcome a weaponless crowd, however big it might be. And that it was big, a vast horde indeed, Pharaoh's host implies.

(c) Support in wilderness: The supposed difficulty of obtaining support for 2½ millions of people with the flocks and herds in the Sinaitic desert takes for granted that the desert was then as barren a region as it is now, which cannot be proved, and is as little likely to be correct as it would be to argue that Egypt, which was then the granary of the world, was no more fertile than it was 10 years ago, or that the regions in which Babylon and Assyria were supposed to be the granaries of their region were not. This supposition disregards the fact that Moses fed the flocks of Jethro for 40 years in that same region of Sinai; that when the Israelites passed through it, it was inhabited by several powerful tribes. It overlooks, too, the fact that the flocks and herds of Israel were not necessarily all cooped up in one spot, but were most likely spread abroad in districts where water and vegetation could be found. And it ignores the statement in the narrative that they were not driven away by the produce of the desert, but had manna from heaven from the 1st day of the 2d month after leaving Egypt till they reached Canaan. Rationalistic expositors may relegate this statement to the limbo of fable, but unless the supernatural is to be eliminated altogether from the story, this statement must be accorded its full weight. So must the two miraculous supplies of water at Horeb (Ex 17) and at Kadesh (Nu 20) be treated. It is sometimes added that the Israelites were not driven away for 2½ millions of people with their flocks and herds; and that therefore the congregation could not have been so large. But the narrative in Nu states, and presumably it was the same in Ex, that the smitten rock at Horeb had water in a unceasing abundance, that "the people drank abundantly with their flocks." Wherefore no conclusion can be drawn from this against the reported size of the congregation.

(d) Room at Mt. Sinai: As to the impossibility of finding room for 2½ millions of people either before the Mount at Sinai or within the land of Canaan (Conder), few will regard this as self-evident. If the site of their encampment was the Ez-Rahal (Robinson, Staunton)—though the plan of Schayer, admittedly not so roomy, has been mentioned (Ritter, Kurtz, Knobel)—estimates differ as to the sufficiency of accommodation to be found there. Conder gives the dimensions of the plain as 4 sq. miles, which he deems insufficient, forgetting, perhaps, that its extent is farther increased by lateral valleys receding from the plain itself (Forty Days in the Desert, 73; cf Keil on Ex 19 1.2). Kailsch, though putting the size of the plain at a smaller figure, adds that not thus farminured were the sides, so that the host of Israel—"a conclusion accepted by Ebers, Ri hern and others. In any case it seems driving literal interpretation to extreme lengths to hold that camping before the Mount necessarily meant that every member of the host required to be in full view of Sinai. As to not finding room in Canaan, it is doubtful if, after the conquest, the remnants of both peoples at any time numbered as many persons as dwelt in Pal during the most flourishing years of the kingdom. There is no indication of the population of Pal today amounts to only about 600,000 souls; but Pal today under Turkish rule is no proper gauge for judging of Pal under David or even under Joshua.

(e) Slow movements of Canaan: The long time it took to conquer Pal (Eerdmans, Vorgeschichte Israel, 78) is no solid argument to prove the unreliable character of the statement about the size of the army, and therefore of the congregation. Every person knows that great hordes of modern warriors, which do not always go with the big battalions; and in this instance the desert-trained warriors allowed themselves to be seduced by the idolatries and immoralities of the Canaanites and forgot to execute the commands of God with the trust, viz. to drive out the Canaanites from the land which had been promised to their fathers. Had they been faithful to Jehovah, they would not have taken so long completely to possess the land (Ps 105 39; 106 13.14). If instead of the 30,092 Hebrew soldiers they had only possessed 6,000, it is not difficult to imagine how they could not drive out the Canaanites. The difficulty is to perceive how they could have achieved as much as they did.

(3) The number of the firstborn.—That the 22,273 firstborn males of the tribe of Judah (43) is out of all proportion to the 605,550 men of 20 years old and upward, being much too few, has frequently (Bleeck, Bohlen, Colenso and others) been felt as a difficulty, since it practically involves the conclusion that the firstborn of every family there must have been at least 12, since the Israelites were reckoned in each family. Various solutions of this difficulty have been offered, the prevalence of polygamy has been suggested (Michaelis, Havernick). The exclusion of firstborn sons who were married, the inclusion only of the mother's firstborn, the exclusion of males, but not of females, which may have been called in to surmount the difficulty (Kurtz). But perhaps the best explanation is that only those were counted who were born after the Law was given on the night of the departure from Egypt (Ex 13 2; Nu 8 13.17) (Kell, Delitzsch, Gerlach). It may be urged, of course, that this would require an exceptionally large number of births in the 15 months, but these exceptionally joyous circumstances of the emancipation this might not have been impossible. In any case, it appears probable that the solution of this difficulty, which might vanish are all the facts known, to impeach the historical accuracy of the narrative, even in this particular.

(4) As to the joint appearance of Aaron and his sons, it is supposed (Bleek, Delitzsch, Keil, et al.) that this phrase is intended to be illustrated in the following manner: Aaron was representing his tribe, and his sons the two tribes of the Levitical tribe (Joseph and Ephraim). In any case it is evident that the firstborn of the tribe of Levi was taken into the number of those who were numbered in the desert. The number of the firstborn was not reckoned, or it would have been 15,406, 600,000 in 20 years of age, for which there is no room.
(2) The assembling of the congregation.—The assembling of the congregation at the door of the tabernacle (10 3.4) has been added as another physical impossibility; and no doubt it was if every man, woman and child, or even only every man, would have to be counted to have the congregation was ordinarily represented by its "renowned" or "called" men, princes of the tribes of their fathers, heads of thousands of Israel (1 16). To suppose that anything else was meant is surely not required. When Moses called all Israel and spoke unto them (Dt 5 1; 29 2), no intelligent person understands that he personally addressed every individual, or spoke so as to be heard by every individual, though what he said was intended for all. An additional difficulty in the way of assembling the congregation, and by implication an argument against the size of the congregation, has been discovered in the two silver trumpets which, it is contended, were too few for summoning so vast a host as 23 3 millions of people. But it is not stated in the narrative either (a) that it was absolutely necessary that every individual in the camp should hear the sound of the trumpets any more than it was indispensable that Balaam's curse should have been spoken without the presence of his ass (Num 22 13), or that a public proclamation by a modern state, though prefixed by means of an "Oyez," should be heard by all within the state or even within its capital; or (b) if it was necessary that everyone should hear, that the trumpeters could not move about through the camp but must remain stationary at the tabernacle door; or (c) that in the clear air of the desert the sound of the trumpets would not travel farther than into the noisy and murky atmosphere of modern cities; or (d) that should occasion arise for more trumpets than two, Moses and his successors were forbidden to make them.

(3) The marching of the host.—The marching of the host in four main divisions of about half a million each (2; 10 14-20) has also been pronounced a stumbling-block (Colenso, Eerdmans, Doughty), inasmuch as the procession formed (i.e. if no division began to fall into line till its predecessor was completed) would require the whole day for its completion, and would make a column of unprecedented length—of 22 miles (Colenso), of 600 miles (Doughty)—and would even on the most favorable hypothesis travel out of the camp. It is the whole situation that need to reconstruct the camp. The simple statement of this shows its absurdity as an explanation of what actually took place on the march, and indirectly suggests that the narrative may be historical after all, as no remonancer of a late age would have risked his reputation by laying down such directions for the march, if they were susceptible of no other explanation than the above. How precisely the march was conducted may be difficult or even impossible to describe in such a way as to obviate all objections. But some considerations may be advanced to show that the march through the desert was neither impossible nor incredible. (a) The deploying of the four main divisions into line may have gone on simultaneously, as they were widely apart from each other, on the E. (Judah), on the S. (Reuben), on the W. (Ephraim) and on the N. (Dan). (b) There is no ground for thinking that the march would be conducted, at least at first, with the precision of a modern army, or that each division would extend itself to the length of 22 miles. It is more than likely that they would follow their standards as best they could or with such order as could be arranged by their captains. (c) If the camps of Judah and Reuben started their preparations together, say at 6 o'clock in the morning (which might be possible), and occupied 4 hours in completing these, they might begin to advance at 10 o'clock and cover 10 miles in another 4 hours, thus bringing them on to 2 PM, after which 4 hours more would enable them to encamp themselves for the night. The same would apply to the other two divisions falling into line, say at 2 o'clock, would arrive at 6 PM, and by 10 PM would be settled for the night. (d) It does not seem certain that every night upon the march they would arrange themselves into more or less rigorous, uncluted camps, rather it is reasonable to conclude that this would be done only when they had reached a spot where a halt was to be made for some time. (e) In any case, in the absence of more details as to how the march was conducted, astronomical calculations are of little value and are not entitled to discredit the truthfulness of the narrative.

(4) The victory over Midian.—This has been objected to on moral grounds which are not now referred to. It is the supposed impossibility of 12,000 Israelites slaying all the male Midianites, capturing all their women and children, including 32,000 virgins, seizing all their cattle and flocks, with all their goods, and burning all their cities and castles. The account of the battle without the complications of a vast march and all the difficulties of a night march was designed to obviate perplexity. Yet Scripture relates several victories of a similar description, as e.g. that of Abraham over the kings of the East (Gen 14 15), in which, so far as the record goes, no loss was incurred by the parting army; that of Gideon's 300 over the Midianites at a later date (Jgs 7 22); that of Samson single-handed over 1,000Philis (Jgs 15 15); and that of Jephoshaphat at the battle of Tekoa (2 Ch 20 24), which was won without a blow—all more or less miraculous, but not such occasions perplexity. Yet the narrative of Joshua shows that the account of the battle at the Mosaic age is entitled to a certain degree of confidence. The narrative is probably an element in which the Romans slaughtered all the foes without losing a single man; and Strabo (xvi. 1128) mentions a battle in which 1,000 Arabs were slain by only 2 Romans; while the life of Saladin contains a like statement concerning the issue of a battle (Hävernack, Intro, 380). Hence Israel's victory over Midian does not afford sufficient ground for challenging its historic credibility.

IV. Authorship. —Restricting attention to evidence from Nu itself, it may be observed in a general way that the question of authorship is practically settled by what has been advanced on its literary structure and historical credibility. For, if the materials of which the book were substantially the work of one pen (whoever may have been the chief collector or last redactor), and if these materials are upon the whole trustworthy, there will be little room to doubt that the original pen was in the hand of a contemporaries and eyewitness of the incidents narrated, and that the contemporary and eyewitness was Moses, who need not, however, have set down everything with his own hand, all that is necessary to justify the ascription of the writing to him being that it should have been composed by his authority and under his supervision. In this sense it is believed that indications are not wanting in the book both against and for the Mosiac authorship; and these may now be considered.

(1) The alternating use of Divine names.—This usage, after forming so characteristic a feature in Gen and largely disappearing in Ex, Against and Lev, reasserts itself in Nu, and the Mosaic more particularly in the story of Authorship Balaam. If chs 23 and 24 can be depended only on documents pieced together, because of the use of "God" in chs 23 and of "Lord" in ch 24, then Moses was not their author. But if the varying use of the Divine names is susceptible of explanation on the assumption that the two chapters originally formed one document, then most distinctly the claim of Moses to authorship is not debarred. Now whether Balaam was a false or a true prophet, it is clear that he could hope to please Balak only by cursing Israel in the name of Jeh, the Elohim of Israel; and so it is always Jeh he consults or pretends to consult below, if Moses ever quotes Balak, considering times it did so (22 8; 19; 23 3,15); and 3 it is Elohim who met him (22 9; 20; 23 14), while every time it was Jeh who put the word in his mouth. Can any conclusion be fairer than that the historian regarded Elohim as speaking through the Divine Agency, and represented this as it were by a double emphasis, which showed (a) that the Jehovah whom Balaam consulted was Elohim or the supreme God, and (b) that the God who met Balaam and supplied him with oracles was Israel's Lord? Thus explained, the alternate use of the Divine names does not require the hypothesis of two single documents rolled into one; and indeed the argument from the use of the Divine names is now generally abandoned. (2) Traces of late authorship. Traces of late authorship and the belief that this influence has existed in several passages: (a) 15 32–36 seems to imply that the writer was no longer in the wilderness, which may well have been the case, if already he was in the land of Moab. (b) 20 5 suggests, it is said, that the people were then, 744, but there is the impression that they were not yet come to Canaan; and in point of fact the people were at Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin. (c) In 21 14, 15, 17, 18, 27–30, certain archaic songs are cited as if the people were familiar with them. The round and the Arnon is mentioned as the border of Moab long before Israel reached the river. But that poets were among the people at the time of the exodus and probably long before, the song of Moses (Ex 16) shows, and be forgotten. (c) 22, 24 3, according to the Arnon was begun to be composed soon after the defeat of Amalek is not an unreasonable hypothesis (Ex 17 14). As for the statement that “Armnon leant upon the borders of Moab;” that may have been superfluous as a matter of information to the contemporaries of Moses when they were about to cross the stream (Strack, Einl, 25), but it was quite in place in an old prophetic song, as showing that their present position had been long before anticipated. (d) 24 4, 5, or 6, like 22 34, could not have been composed before the rise of the monarchy; and certainly it could not, if prediction of future events is impossible. But if reference to a coming king in Israel was put into Balaam's mouth, it could not have been in the time of Moses, then it could easily have been made before the monarchy; and so could (e) 24 17, 18 have been written before the reign of David, though the conquest of the Edomites only then began (25 8 14; 1 K 11 1; 1 Ch 18 12, 13).

Examples such as these show that many, if not most, of the like objections against the Moses authorship of this book are capable of at least possible solution; and that Kuenen's caution should not be forgotten: "He who relies upon the impression made by the whole, without interrogation of the parts one by one, repudiates the first principles of all scientific research, and pays homage to superficiality" (Rdl. of Israel, I, 11).

(1) Certain passages have the appearance of having been written later than Moses.—These are: (a) those which bear evidence of having been intended for a people not settled in cities but dwelling in tents and camps, as e.g. chs 1–4, describing the arrangements for the formation of the camp; 6 24–26, the high-priestly benediction; 10 35, 36, the orders for the marching and the halting of the host; 10 1–9, the directions about the silver trumpets; ch 19, the legislation which obviously presupposes the wilderness as the place for its observance (vs 3.7.9.14). If criticism allows that these and other passages have descended from the Mosaic age, why should it be necessary to seek another author for them than Moses? And if Moses ever quotes Balak, consideration of the presumption at least is created that the whole book has proceeded from his pen. (b) The patriotic songs taken from the Book of the Wars of the Lord (ch 21), which some critics (Cornill, Kautzsch and others) hold not to have been composed by Moses, are by equally competent scholars (Bleek, De Wette, E. Meyer, Königs and others) recognized as parts of Israel's inheritance from the Mosaic age, whenever they were incorporated in Nu. (c) The list of camping stations (ch 33) is expressly assigned to him. Whether "by the commandment of the Lord" should be connected with the "journeys" (König) or the "writing" makes no difference as to the authorship of this chapter, at least in the sense that it is based on a Mosaic document (Strack). It is true that even if this chapter as it stands was prep-
NUN, nōn (נון, Νῖν): The 14th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as n. It came also to be used for the number 50. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

NUN, nun (נון, נון, “fish,” derivative meaning “fecundity”): Father of Joshua (referred to thus 20 t.) (Ex 33 11; Nu 11 28, etc; 1 Ch 7 27, m “Non”; Sir 46 1, m “Nave”).

NURSE, när's, NURSING, när's'ing: “Nurse” in AV represents two different Heb words: In 8 passages (Gen 24 59; 35 8; Ex 2 7 bis 9; 2 K 11 2; 2 Ch 22 11; Isa 49 23) the word nun or ve renders some form of the vb מָנוּנָה, מָנוּנָה, “to suck.” The fem. causative part. of this vb. is commonly used to denote nurse or foster-mother. According to Ex 2 7 Moses’ mother—“a nurse of the Heb women”—became, at Pharaoh’s daughter’s request, the foster-mother of the foundling. Joshua, the son of Ahihu, was in charge of a nurse until he was 7 years old (2 K 11 2; 2 Ch 22 11). But it is obvious that the term was used in a more general way, e.g. of a lady’s maid or nurse-woman. Rebekah was accompanied by her nurse when she left home to be married (Gen 24 59; 35 8). In 5 passages (Nu 11 12; Ruth 4 16; 2 S 4 4; Isa 49 23; 60 4 AV) “nurse” represents the Heb word מָנה, מָנה, “to support,” “be faithful,” “nourish.” The part. of this vb. denoted a person who had charge of young children—a guardian or nurse. Naomi took charge of Ruth’s child “and became nurse unto it” (Ruth 4 16). In Nu 11 12 Moses asks whether he has to take charge of the Israelites “as a nursing-father cherish the suckling child.” The same word is found in 2 K 10 15 (AV “them that brought up,” i.e. guardians of the sons of Ahab) and in Est 2 7 (AV “and he brought up,” i.e. he [Mordecai] adopted, his niece). Deutero-Isa uses both terms together (49 23) to describe the exalted position of Israel in the future when foreign kings and queens will offer their services and wait upon the chosen people.

In the solitary passage in the NT where “nurse” occurs, it renders the Gr word γυνή, γυναίκα. In this case the word does not mean a hired nurse, but a mother who nurses her own children (1 Thess 2 7).

NUMENIUS, Num-ēn'i-us (Νουμένιος, Νουμένιος): The son of Antiochus and Antipater were the two ambassadors whom Jonathan sent to the Romans, “to the Spartans, and to other places,” after his victory in the plain of Hasor (Galilee) over the princes of Demetrius (1 Macc 12 10) about 144 BC. Their mission was to confirm and renew the friendship and treaty which had existed from the days of Judas (7 17 ff). They were well received and successful, both at Rome (12 3 ff) and at Sparta (12 19 ff; 14 22 ff). After the death of Jonathan, the victories of Simon and the establishment of peace, Simon sent Numenius on a second embassy to Rome (14 24), again to confirm the treaty and present a golden shield weighing 1,000 minæs—apparently just before the popular decree by which Simon was created high priest, leader and captain “for ever” (1 Macc 14 27 ff), September, 141 BC. The embassy returned in 139 BC, bearing letters from the son to the kings of Egypt, Syria and “all the countries,” confirming the integrity of Jewish territory, and forbidding these kings to disturb the Jews, and requiring them also to surrender any deserters (14 15 ff). See also Lucius; Schürer, Gesch. des jüdischen Volkes (3d and 4th edd), I., 236, 250 ff.

NUTS, nuts: (1) מָנוּנָה, מָנוּנָה, כַרָפָה, כָרָפָה; Arab. jaus, “the walnut” (Gen 1 11): This is certainly the walnut tree, Juglans regia, a native of Persia and the Himalayas which flourishes under favorable conditions in all parts of Pal; particularly in the moun-church in Colossae, the latter city being only a very few miles distant from Laodicea. Indeed, so near were they, that Paul directs that the Ep. to the Col be read also in Laodicea. If Nymphas if Nymph be read, then it is a Christian lady who is meant—a person of outstanding worth and importance in the church of Laodicea, for he had granted the use of his dwelling-house for the ordinary weekly meetings of the church. The apostle’s substitution is a 3-fold one—to the brethren that are in Laodicea, that is, to the whole of the Christian community in that city, and to Nymphas, and to the church in his house.

OAK, 6k: Several Heb words are so tr2, but there has always been great doubt as to which words should be tr2 "oak" and which ‘terebinth’. This uncertainty appears in the LXX and all through EV; in recent revisions ‘terebinth’ has been increasingly added in the m. All the Heb words are closely allied and originally had simply the meaning of ‘tree’, but it is clear that, when the OT was written, they indicated some special kind of tree.

The words and references are as follows:

One, then, of the many ‘oaks’ of Paul’s letter to the Ephesians is a 3-fold one—oaks Terebinths; oaks Terebinths; oaks Terebinths. This is shown by the context, or the reference to the.oak. There, in the last 12 verses of the chapter, there is a great deal of variety in the use of these words. The readers have been shown, in this place, to recognize the ‘oaks’ as such.

OAK at Gilgal, the Sladean Oak (Quercus coccifera).

It attains to great size, reaching as much as 60 ft. in height. It is distinguished by its large sessile acorns with hemispherical caps covered with long, narrow, almost bristly, scales, giving them a mossy aspect. The wood is hard and of fine grain. Acorns are common upon its branches.

(2) Quercus lusitanica (or Ballota), also known in Arab. as Bollt, like the last is frequently found dashed to a bush, both, when protected, attains a height of 30 ft. or more. The leaves are dentate or crenate and last late into the winter, but are shed before the new twigs are developed. The acorns are solitary or few in cluster, and the cupules are more or less smooth. Acorns are common, and a variety of this species is often known as Q. infectoria, on account of its liability to infection with gall-worms.

(3) The Valonia oak (Q. coccifera), known in Arab. as Mollt, has large oblong or ovate deciduous leaves, with deep serrations terminating in a bristle-like point, and very large acorns, globular, thick cupules covered with long reflexed scales. The

2. The Church in His House

This fact, that the church met there, also shows that Nymphas was a person of some means, for a very small house could not be occupied by the Christian men and women who gathered together on the first day of every week for the purposes of Christian worship, but also from what is said of it in Rev 3.17 AV—must have been large and influential; ‘Thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing.’ The house of Nymphas, therefore, must, have possessed a large room or saloon sufficiently commodious to allow the meeting of a numerous company. Nymphas would be a person both of Christian character and of generous feeling, and of some amount of wealth. Nothing more is known regarding him, as this is the only passage in which he is named.

(4) The Evergreen oak is often classed under the general name “live oak” or Holm (i.e. holly-like) oak. Several varieties are described as occurring in Pal. Q. ilex usually has rather a shrublike growth, with abundant glossy, dark-green leaves, oval in shape and more or less prickly at the margins, though sometimes entire. The cupules of the acorns are woolly. It shows a marked predilection for the neighborhood of the sea. The Q. coccifera (with var. Q. pseudococcifera) is known in Arab. as Sīnīdān. The leaves, like the last, usually are prickly. The acorns are solitary or twin, and the hemispherical cupules are more or less velvety. On the Q. coccifera are found the insects which make the well-known Kermes dyes. These evergreen oaks are the common trees at sacred tombs, and the once magnificent, but now dying, “Abraham’s oak” at Hebron is one of this species.

Oaks occur in all parts of Pal, in spite of the steady ruthless destruction which has been going on for centuries. All over Carmel, Tabor, around Banias and in the hills to the Modern W. of Nazareth, to mention well-known localities, there are forests of oak; great tracts of country, esp. in Galilee and E. of the Jordan, are covered by a stunted brushwood which, were it not for the wood-cutter, would grow into noble trees. Solitary oaks of magnificent proportions occur in many parts of the land, esp. upon hillslopes; such trees are saved from destruction because of their “sacred” character. To bury beneath such a tree has ever been a favorite custom (cf Gen 35 8; 1 Ch 10 12). Large trees like these, seen often from great distances, are frequently landmarks (Josh 19 33) or places of meeting (cf “Oak of Tabor,” 1 S 10 3). The custom of heathen worship beneath oaks or terebinths (Hos 4 13; Ezek 6 13, etc) finds its modern counterpart in the cult of the Wolly in Pal. The oak is sometimes connected with some historical event, as e.g. Abraham’s oak of Mamre now shown at Hebron, and “the oak of weeping,” Allon bocath, of Gen 35 8.

OAK OF TABOR (אֹ֣בֵ֥ק תָּבוֹ֖ר, ‘elôn tâbôr): Thus RV in 1 S 10 3 for AV “plain of Tabor” (RVm “terebinth”). Tabor was famous for its groves of oak, but what “oak” is meant here is not known. Ewald thinks that “Tabor” is a different pronunciation for “Deborah,” and connects with Gen 35 8; but this is not likely. See Oak, 3.

OAR, or. See Ships and Boats, II, 2, (3).

OATH, 6th (אָהַ֛ת, shêbhah’âh, probably from shêbha, “seven,” the sacred number, which occurs frequently in the ritual of an offering, or sacrifice), and the stronger word נָקָ֖ת, ‘âdhâh, by which a curse is actually invoked upon the oath-breaker (LXX ἀφα, arid): In Mt 26 70–74 Peter first denies his Lord simply, then with an oath (shêbhâh’âh), then invokes a curse (‘âdhâh), thus passing through every stage of asseveration.

The oath is the invoking of a curse upon one’s self if one has not spoken the truth (Mt 26 74), or if one fails to keep a promise (1 S 19 1). Law regarding oaths played a very important part, not only in the lawsuits (Ex 23 1; Lev 19 12) and state affairs (Am 7 10, x, 4), but also in the dealings of everyday life (Gen 24 37; 50 5; Jgs 21 5; 1 K 18 10; Ezr 10 5). The Mosaic laws concerning oaths were not meant to limit the widespread custom of making oaths, so much as to impress upon the people the use of a sacred oath, forbidding on the one hand swearing falsely (Ex 20 7; Lev 19 12; Zec 8 17, etc), and on the other swearing by false gods, which latter was considered to be a very dark sin (Jer 12 16; Am 8 14). In the Law only two kinds of false swearing are mentioned: false swearing of a witness, and false asseveration upon oath regarding a thing found or received (Lev 5 1; 6 2 f; cf Prov 29 24). Both required a sin offering (Lev 5 1 f). The Talm gives additional rules, and lays down certain punishments for false swearing; in the case of a thing found it states what the false swearer must pay (Makkoth 2 3; Shêbhâh’âh 8 3). The Jewish interpretation of the 3d commandment is that it is not concerned with oaths, but rather forbids the use of the name of Jehovah in ordinary cases (so Dalman).

Swearing in the name of the Lord (Gen 14 22; Dt 6 13; Jgs 21 7; Ruth 1 17, etc) was a sign of loyalty to Him (Dt 10 20; Isa 58 18). We know from Swearing Scripture (see above) that swearing by false gods was frequent, and we learn also from the newly discovered Elephantine papyrius that the people not only swore by Jahu (=Jeh) or by the Lord of Heaven, but also among a certain class of other gods, e.g. by Horun-Bethel, and by Isun. In ordinary intercourse it was customary to swear by the life of the person addressed (1 S 1 26; 20 3; 2 K 2 2); by the life of the king (1 S 17 55; 26 26; 2 S 11 11); by one’s own head (Mt 3 30); by the earth (Mt 5 35); by the heaven (Mt 5 34; 23 22); by the angels (BJ, II, xvi, 4); by the temple (Mt 23 16), and by different parts of it (Mt 23 16); by Jesus (Mt 5 35; Mar 13 31; Lk 23 46). The oath “by heaven” (Mt 5 34; 23 22) is connected by Jesus as the oath in which God’s name is invoked. Jesus does not mean that God and heaven are identical, but He desires to rebuke those who paltered with an oath by avoiding a direct mention of a name of God. He teaches that such an oath is a real oath and must be considered as sacredly binding.
Not much is told us as to the ceremonies observed in taking an oath. In patriarchal times he who took the oath put his hand under the thigh of him to whom the oath was given (Gen 24 2; 47 29). The most usual form was to hold up the hand to heaven (Gen 14 22; Ex 6 8; Dt 32 40; Ezek 20 5). The wife suspected of unfaithfulness, when brought before the priest, had to answer "Amen, Amen" to his adjuration, and this was considered to be an oath on her part (Nu 6 22). The usual formula of an oath was either: "God is witness betwixt me and thee" (Gen 31 50), or more commonly: "As Jehovah [or God] liveth" (Jgs 8 19; Ruth 3 13; 2 S 2 27; Jer 38 16), or "Jehovah be a true and faithful witness amongst us." (Jer 42 5). Usually the penalty invoked by the oath was only suggested: "Jehovah [or God] do so to me" (Ruth 1 17; 2 S 3 35; 1 K 2 23; 2 K 6 31); in some cases the punishment was expressly mentioned (Jer 29 22). Nowack suggests that in general the punishment was not expressly mentioned because of a superstitious fear to hear the sentence, although speaking the truth, might draw upon himself some of the punishment by merely mentioning it.

Philo expresses the desire (il. 194) that the practice of swearing should be discontinued, and the Egyptians used no oaths (Bj II, viii, 6; Ant, XV, x, 4).

That oaths are permissible to Christians is shown by the example of Our Lord (Mt 26 63 f.) and of Paul (2 Cor 1 23; Gal 1 20) and some writers of the primitive church (He 6 13–18).

Permissible Consequently when Christ said, "Swear not at all" (Mt 5 34), He was laying down the principle that the Christian must not have two standards of truth, but that his ordinary speech must be as truly true as his oath. In the kingdom of God, where that principle holds sway, oaths become unnecessary.

OBA DI AH, BOOK OF: Obadiah is the shortest book in the OT. The theme of the book is the destruction of Edom. Consequently upon the overthrow of Edom is the enlargement of the borders of Judah and the establishment of the kingship of Jeh. Thus far all scholars are agreed; but on questions of authorship and date there is wide divergence of opinion.

(1) Jeh summons the nations to the overthrow of proud Edom. The men of Edom will be brought down from their lofty strongholds;

1. Contents their hidden treasures will be rifled; of the Book their confederates will turn against them; nor will the wise and the mighty men of Edom be able to avert the coming calamity (vs 1–9).

(2) The overthrow of Edom is due to the violence and cruelty shown toward his brother Jacob. The prophet describes the cruelty and shameless gloating over a brother's calamity, in the form of earnest appeals to Edom not to be selfish and heartless deed of which he had been guilty when Jerus was sacked by foreign foes (vs 10–14).

(3) The day of the display of Jeh's retributive righteousness upon the nations is near. Edom shall be completely cut off, the man whom he has tried to uphold, while Israel's captives shall return to take possession of their own land and also to seize and rule the mount of Esau. Thus the kingship of Jeh shall be established (vs 15–21).

The unity of Ob is first challenged by Eichhorn in 1824, vs 17–19 of Pusey regarded as an appendix attached to the original exilic prophecy (Ps 89: 24–29), and to this time of Amos (Ob 7–8 BC). Ewald thought that an exilic prophecy, to whom he ascribed vs 11–14, 18–21, had been readapted by the prophet Obadiah. Obadiah's prophecy by Obadiah in vs 1–10, and vs 15–18 of material from another older prophecy, which was contemporary, like Obadiah, with Isaiah. As the years went on, the material assigned to the older oracle was limited in vs 1–10 only some to the oracle of Jehovah assigned to Obadiah vs 1–5, 7, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, while all else was regarded as a later appendix; and the composition of Ob is thus summed up by Beyer: "Vs 1–6 is a preexilic oracle of Obadiah, which was afterwards, by Jeremiah, and readapted with additions (vs 7–15) by another Obadiah in the early post-exilic days: vs 16–21 in an appendix, probably by Micah, ruled by that of Obadiah's; (p. 92). Beyer's own view is closely akin to Barton's. He thinks that Obadiah, writing in the 5th cent., "quotes vs 1–4 almost word for word literally; that he commented on the older oracle in vs 5–7, partly in the words of the older prophet, partly in his own words, in order to show that it had been fulfilled in his own day; and that in vs 8–9 he quotes once more by the older oracle without any show of littleness." He ascribes to Obadiah vs 10–14 and 159. The appendix consists of two sections: vs 12–15 and 159. It was added by two different authors, vs 18 being a quotation from some older prophet or prophets. To the average reader, who is not a student of prophecy, an minute analysis of a brief prophecy must seem hypercritical. He will prefer to read the book as a unity: and in doing so will get the essence of the message it has for the present day.

Certain preliminary problems require solution before the question of date can be settled.

(1) Relation of Ob and Ob 49.—

3. Date of Ob 1. Did Obadiah quote from Jer? The Book Pusey thus sets forth the impossibility of such a solution: "Out of 16 verses of which the prophecy of Jeremiah against Edom consists, four are identical with those of Obadiah; but 12 of the 16 verses of Obadiah are derived from verses which remain, ten have some turns of expression or idioms, more or fewer, which recur in Jer, either in these prophecies against foreign nations, or in his prophecies generally. Now it would be wholly improbable that a single verse of the prophecy of Jeremiah, should have selected precisely those which contain none of Jeremiah's characteristic expressions; whereas it perfectly fits in with the supposition that Jeremiah interwove other verses of Obadiah with his own. So that on the one hand, the obvious absence of any verses which recur in Obadiah, and the presence of some peculiar turns of expression which occurs elsewhere in Jer' (Minor Prophets, I, 347).

(b) Did Jeremiah quote from Ob? It is almost incredible that the vigorous and well-articulated prophecy in Ob could have been made by piecing together detached quotations from Jer; but Jeremiah may well have taken from Ob many expressions that fell in with his general purpose. There are differences among modern scholars, most of whom think that Obadiah preserves the vigor of the original, while Jeremiah quotes with more freedom; but Betz in TCE, after a detailed comparison, thus sums up: "Our conclusion is that Obadiah quoted in vs 1–9 an older source, and in vs 10–15 a better preserved version of Jer 49." The student will do well to get his own first-hand impression from a careful comparison of the two passages. With Ob vs 1–4 cf Jer 49 14–16, with Ob vs 5 cf Jer 49 9.10s; with Ob vs 8 cf Jer 49 7; with Ob vs 9 cf Jer 49 22. On the whole, the view that Jeremiah, who often quotes from earlier prophets, draws directly from Ob, with free working over of the older prophets, seems still tenable. (2) Relation of Ob and Joel.—There seems to be in Joel 2 32 (Heb 3 5) a direct allusion to Ob 17. If Joel prophesied during the minority of the king Joash (c. 830 BC), Obadiah would be, on this hypothesis, the earliest of the writing prophets.

(3) What capture of Jerus is described in Ob vs 10–14?—The disaster seems to have been great enough to be called "destruction" (Ob vs 12). Hence most scholars identify the calamity described by Ob with the fall and destruction of Jerus by the Chaldaeans in 587 BC. But it is remarkable, on this hypothesis, that no allusion is made either in Ob or Jer 49 7–22 to the Chaldaeans or to the destruction of the temple or to the wholesale transportation of the inhabitants of Jerus to Babylon. We know, however, from Ezk 36 1–15 and Ps 137 7 that Edom rejoiced over the final destruction of Jerus by the Chaldaeans in 587 BC, and that they encouraged the destroyers to blot out the holy city. Certain it is that the events of 587 accord remarkably with the language of Ob vs 10–14. Pusey indeed argues from the use of the form of the direct prohibition in Ob vs 12–14 that Edom had not yet committed the sins against which the prophesied calamity was uttered; but Judah was not yet destroyed, when Obadiah wrote. But almost all modern scholars interpret the language of vs 12–14 as referring to what was already past; the prophet "speaks of what the Edomites had actually done as our author ought scholars who, regard Obadiah as the first of the writing prophets locate his ministry in Judah during the reign of Jehoram (c. 845 BC). Both 2 K and 2 Ch tell of the war of rebellion in the days of Jehoram when Edom rose after a fence struggle, threw off the yoke of Judah (2 K 8 20–22; 2 Ch 21 8–10). Shortly after the revolt of Edom, according to 2 Ch 21 16 f., the Philis and Arabians broke into Judah, "and carried away all the substance that was found in the king's house, and his sons also, and his wives; so that there was never a son left him, save Jehoahaz, the youngest of his sons." Evidently the capital city fell into the hands of the invaders. It was a calamity of no mean proportions.

The advocates of a late date call attention to three points that weaken the case for an early date for Ob: (a) The silence of 2 K as to the invasion of the Philis and Arabians. But what motive could the author of Ch have for inventing the story? (b) The absence of any mention of the destruction of the city by the Philis and Arabians. It must be acknowledged that the events of 587 BC accord more fully with the description in Ob vs 10–14, though the disaster in the days of Jehoram must have been terrible. (c) The silence as to Edom in 2 Ch 21 16 f. But so also are the historic books silent as to the Edomites; the latter destruction of Jerus in 587. It is true that exilic and post-exilic prophets and psalmists speak in bitter denunciation of the unbrotherly conduct of Edom (Lam 4 21–22; Ezk 25 12–14; 36 1–15; Ps 137 7; Mal 1 1–5; of also Isa 34 and 63 1–6); but it is also true that the earliest Heb literature bears witness to the keen rivalry between Edsam and Jacob (Gen 25 22; 27 41; Nu 20 14–21), and one of the earliest of the writing prophets denounces Edom for unnatural cruelty toward its brother (Am 1 11; cf Joel 3 19 [Heb 4 19]).

(4) The style of Ob.—Most early critics praise the style. Some of the more recent critics argue for different authors on the basis of a marked difference in style within the compass of the twenty-one verses in the little roll. Thus Seebach writes in HDB: "There is a difference in style between the two halves of the book, the first being terse, animated, and full of striking figures, while the second is diffuse and marked by poverty of ideas and aimless figures. The criticism that the style of the book is somewhat exaggerated, though it may be freely granted that the first half is more original and vigorous. The Heb of the book is classic, with scarcely an admixture of Aram. words or constructions. The author may well have lived in the golden age of the Heb language and literature."

(5) Geographical and historical allusions.—The references to the different sections and cities in the land of Israel and in the land of Edom are quite intelligible. As to Sepharad (ver 20) there is considerable difference of opinion. Schrader and some others identify it with a Shapardia in Media, mentioned in the annals of Sargon (722–705 BC). Many think of Asia Minor, or a region in Asia Minor mentioned in Pers inscriptions, perhaps Bitinka or Galatia (Soyate). Some think that the mention of "the captives of this host of the children of Israel" and "the captives of Jerus" (ver 20) proves that both the Assyr captivity and the Bab exile were already past. This argument has considerable force; but it is well to remember that Ezek, in the second half of the book, describes wholesale deportations from the land of Israel by men engaged in the slave trade (Am 1 6–10). The problem of the date of Ob has not been solved to the satisfaction of Bib. students. Our choice must be between a very early date (c 845) and a date shortly after 587, with the scales almost evenly balanced. One of the elements of historic description is that Ob is to be interpreted as prediction of the Book rather than history. In vs 11–14 there are elements of historic description, but vs 1–10 and 15–21 are predictive. OBDAIA, ob-daia, (A, O'hbaia, Obdaia, B, O'hbaa, Hobbaia); One of the families of usurping priests (1 Esd 5 38) = "Hobaiah" of Ezra 2 61; "Hobaiah" of Neh 7 63.
Obed, obed (אבד, אָבֵד, abed, "worshipper"); in the NT ἀβεδ, ἀβδός, ἀβδόν.
(1) Son of Boaz and Ruth and grandfather of David (1 Sam 17:25).
(2) Son of Ephal and descendant of Sheshan, the Jerahmeelite, through his daughter who was married to Jareh, an Egyptian servant of her father's (1 Ch 2 37,38).
(3) Son of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11:47).
(4) A Korahite doorkeeper, son of Shemaiah, and grandson of Obad-edom (1 Ch 26:7).
(5) Father of Azariah, one of the centurions who took part with Jehoiada in depositing Queen Athallah and crowning Josiah (2 Ch 23:1; cf 2 K 11:1–16).

Obed-edom, obed-edom (אֲבֶד-אֶדֹם, oved-edom, אֲבֶד-אָדֹם, oved-adom) [2 Ch 25 24, 26; 2 S 6 10; 1 Ch 13 13,14; 15 25], but elsewhere without yodh, ῥαβδήκτης, "servant of [god] Edom"; so W. R. Smith, Religion of Semites, 42, and H. P. Smith, Samuel, 294 f, though others explain it as = "servant of man": In 2 S 6 10.11,12; 1 Ch 13 13.14 a Philistine of Gath and servant of David, who received the Ark of Jeh into his house when David brought it into Jerusalem from Kirjath-jearim. Because of the sudden death of Uzzah, David was unwilling to place the Ark to his house until and it remained three months in the house of Obed-edom, "an Arab blessed Obad-edom, and all his house" (2 S 6 11). According to 1 Ch 13.14 the Ark had a special "house" of its own while there. He is probably the same as the Levite of 1 Ch 15 25. In 1 Ch 15 16–21 Obad-edom is a "singer," and in 1 Ch 15 24 a "doorkeeper," while according to 1 Ch 26 4–8.15 he is a Korahite doorkeeper, to whose house fell the overseership of the storehouse (ver 15), who names himself as a "servant before the ark," a member of the house or perhaps a Temple of Jeduthun (see 2 Ch 26 24).

Obad-edom is an illustration of the service rendered to Heb religion by foreigners, reminded one of the Simon of Cyrene who bore the cross of Jesus (Mt 27 32, etc.). The Chronicler naturally desired to think that only Levites could discharge such duties as Obad-edom performed, and hence the references to him as a Levite.

Obedience, δοκίμασιν, OBED, δοκίμα (δοκίμα, shāma'; ὀπακός, ὁπακός): In its simpler OT meaning the word signifies "to hear," "to 1. Meaning listen." It carries with it, however, of Terms the ethical significance of hearing with reverent and obedient assent. In the NT a different origin is suggestive of "hearing under" or of subordinating one's self to the person or thing heard, hence, "to obey." There is another NT usage, however, indicating persuasion from, "ἀποδείξεως, ἀποδήμων.

The relation expressed is twofold: first, human, as between master and servant, and particularly between parents and children. "If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, that will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother, and, though they chasten him, will not hearken unto them; then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him, and bring him out unto the elders of his city, and unto the gate of his place" (Dt 21 18,19; cf Prov 15 20); or between sovereign and subjects, "The sovereign shall shun themselves unto me; as soon as they hear of me, they shall obey me" (2 S 22 45; 1 Ch 29 23).

The highest significance of its usage, however, is that of the relation of man to God. Obedience is the supreme test of faith in God and reverence for Him. The OT conception of obedience was vital. It was the one important relationship which must not be broken. While sometimes this relation may have been formal and cold, it nevertheless was the one strong tie which held the people close to God. The significant spiritual relationship as expressed by Samuel when he asks the question, "Hath Jeh as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of Jeh? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice; and to hear than the fat of rams" (1 S 15 22). It was the condition without which no right relation might be sustained to Jeh. This is most clearly stated in the relation between Abra-]

The one ceases to be a Sin, for he is to be "truth and obedience of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Tit 3 7). In pro gnostic utterances, future blessing and prosperity were conditioned upon obedience: "If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land" (Isa 1 19). After surveying the glories of the Messianic kingdom, the prophet assures the people that "this shall come to pass if ye diligently obey the voice of Jeh your God" (Zec 6 15). On the other hand misfortune, calamity, distress and famine are due to their disobedience and distrust of Jeh. See Deborah.

This obedience or disobedience was usually related to the specific commands of Jeh as contained in the law, yet they conceived of God as giving commands by other means. Note esp. the rebuke of Sarah to Saul: "...he obeyed not the voice of Jeh, ... therefore Jeh hath done this thing unto thee this day" (1 S 28 18).

In the NT a higher spiritual and moral relation is sustained than in the OT. The importance of obedience is just as emphasized. Christ Himself is its one great Conception. The illustration of obedience. He "humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross" (Phil 2 8). By obedience to Him we are through Him made partakers of His salvation (He 5 9). This act is a supreme test of faith in Christ. Indeed, it is so vitally related that they are in some cases almost synonymous. "Obedience of faith" is a combination used by Paul to express this idea (Rom 1 5). Peter designates believers in Christ as "children of obedience" (1 Pet 1 14). Thus it is seen that the test of fellowship with Jeh in the OT is obedience. The bond of union with Christ in the NT is obedience through faith, by which the believer is identified and the believer becomes a disciple.

Walter G. Clippinger

OBEDIENCE OF CHRIST: The "obedience" (ὑπακοή, ὕπακος) of Christ is directly mentioned but only three times in the NT, although many other passages describe or allude to it: 1. "Through the obedience of the one shall the many be made righteous" (Rom 5 19); "He humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross" (Phil 2 8); "Though he was a Son, yet...he submitted obedience by the things which he suffered" (He 5 8). In 2 Cor 10 5, the phrase signifies an attitude toward Christ: "every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ.

His subjection to His parents (Lk 2 51) was a necessary manifestation of His loving and sinless character, and of His disposition and power to do the right in any situation. 1. As an Element of His obedience to the moral law in concert with His subjection to God's will and the NT writers: "without sin" (He 4 15); "character "who knew no sin" (2 Cor 5 21); • holy, guileless, undefiled, separated from sinners (He 7 26), etc; and is affirmed by Himself: "Which of you convinceth me sin" (John 8 46); and implicitly conceded by His enemies, since no shadow of accusation against His character appears. Of His ready, loving, joyful, exact and eager obedience to the Father, mention will be made later, but it was His central and most outstand characteristic. As God at its highest reach, limitless, "unto death." He was usually submissive and law-abiding attitude toward the authorities and the great movements and religious requirements of His day was a part of His loyalty to God, and of the strategy of His campaign, the action of the one who would set an example and would have a new influence, as at His baptism: "Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness" (Mt 3:15); the synagogal worship (Lk 4:16, "as His custom was"); the incident of the tribute money: "Therefore the sons are free. But, lest we cause them to stumble," etc (Mt 17:24-27). Early, however, the necessities of His mission as Son of God and institutor of the new dispensation obliged Him frequently to display a judicial antagonism to current prescription and an authoritative superiority to the rulers, and even to important details of the Law, that would in most eyes mark Him as insurgent, and did culminate in the cross, but was the sublimest obedience to the Father, whose authority alone He held as full-grown man, and Son of man, could recognize.

Two Scriptural statements raise an important question as to the inner experience of Jesus. He 5:8 states that "though he was a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which he suffered" (ἐναθέναν ταλ ματιάν ἐρημήσατο τὸν ἱππόκαινον). Phil 2:6, 8: "Existing in the form of God . . . he humbled himself, becoming obedient, even unto death." As Son of God, His words were never out of accord with the Father's will. How then was it necessary to, or could He, learn obedience, or become obedient? The same question in another form arises from another part of the passage in He 5:9: "and having been made perfect, he became unto all them that obey him the author [cause] of eternal salvation"; also He 2:10: "It became him [God] . . . to make the author [captain] of their salvation perfect through suffering." How was this done, and why should He make it perfect? Gethsemane, with which, indeed, He 5:8 is directly related, presents the same problem. It finds its solution in the conditions of the Redeemer's work and life on earth in the light of His true humanity and of His eternal essence in His human existence, obedience to His Father was His dominant principle, so declared through the prophet- psalmist before His birth: He 10:7 (Ps 40:7), "Lo, I am come (in the roll of the book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God." It was His law of life: "I do always the things that are pleasing to him. I do nothing of myself, but as the Father taught me, I speak these things" (Jn 8:29); "I can of myself do nothing. . . . I seek mine own will, but the will of him that sent me" (5:30). It was the indispensable preparation of His activity as the "image of the invisible God," the expression of the Deity in terms of the phenomenal and the human. He could be a perfect revelation only by the perfect correspondence in every detail, of will, word and work with the Father's will (Jn 5:19). Obedience was also His life nourishment and satisfaction (Jn 4:34). It was the guiding principle which directed the details of His work: "I have power to lay it [life] down, and I have power to take it again." The Lord received 1 from my Father" (Jn 10:18); "The Father that sent me, he hath given me a commandment, what I should say, and what I should speak" (Jn 12:49; cf 14:31, etc.). But in the Incarnation this essential and filial obedience must find expression in human forms according to human demands and processes of development. As true man, obedient disposition on His part must meet the test of voluntary choice under all representative conditions, or He was not the Prince and Saviour, or the practical virtue of obedience on earth. Gethsemane was the culmination of this process, when in full view of the awful, shameful, horrifying meaning of Calvary, the obedient disposition was crowned, and the obedient Divine-human life reached its highest manifestation, in the great ratification: "Nevertheless, not my will, but thine, be done." But just as Jesus' growth in knowledge was not from error to truth, but from partial knowledge to completer, so His "learning obedience" led Him not from disobedience or debate to submission, but from obedience at the present stage to an obedience at ever deeper and deeper cost. The process was necessary for His complete humanity, in which sense He was "made perfect by obedience" to the Father (He 5:9), also necessary for His perfection as example and sympathetic High Priest. He must fight the human battles under the human conditions. Having translated obedient aspiration and disposition into obedient action in the face of, and in suffering unanimous death, even the death of the cross, He is able to lead the procession of obedient sons of God through every possible trial and surrender, Without this testing of His obedience He could have had no sympathy of His suffering, His "known what was in man," but He would have lacked the sympathy of a kindred experience. Lacking this, He would have been for us, and perhaps also in Himself, but an imperfect "captain of our salvation," certainly no "leader" going before us in the very paths we have to tread, and tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin. It may be worth noting that He "learned obedience" and was made perfect by suffering, not the results of His sin being suffered, but, alto- gether the results of the sins of others.

In Rom 5:19, in the series of contrasts between sin and salvation ("Not as the trespass, so also is the free gift"); we are told: "For as through the one man's disobedience the many were made disobedient, so through the obedience of the one shall the many be made righteous." Interpreters and theologians, esp. the latter, differ as to whether "obedience" here refers to the specific and supreme act of obedience on the cross, or to the sum total of Christ's Incarnate obedience through His whole life; and they have made the distinction between His "passive obedience," yielded on the cross, and His "active obedience" in carrying out without a flaw the Father's will at all times. This distinction is hardly tenable, as the whole Scriptural representation, esp. His own, is that He was never more intensely active than in His death: "I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till I be accomplished" (Lk 12:50); "I lay down my life, that I may take it again." No one takes it away from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again" (Jn 10:18). "Who, having offered himself without blemish unto God, is applicates the active obedience of one who was both priest and sacrifice. As to the question whether it was the total obedience of Christ, or His death on the cross, that constituted the atonement, the kindred question whether it was not the spirit of obedience in the act of death, rather than the act itself, that furnished the value of His redemptive work, it might conceivably, though improbably, be said that the slave to his master, in the presence of Deity, and is generally rendered, "to worship" in AV. In all probability this was the original significance of the word (Gen 24:26, etc.). Obedience (=obedience) originally signified the vow of obedience made by a vassal to his lord or a slave to his master, but in time denoted the act of bowing as a token of respect. T. LEWIS

OBELISK, ob'e-lisk, ob'd-lisk: A sacred stone or maszêbhôh. For maszêbhôh RV has used "pillar" in the text, with "obelisk" in the margin in many instances (Ex 33:24; Lev 26:1; Deut 12:3; 1 K 14:23; Hos 3:4; 10:1,2, etc), but not consistently (e.g. Gen 28:18). See Pillar.

OBETH, o'beth (Oôbêth, B, Oûbê, Dubbên): One of those who went up with Ezra (1 Esd 8:32) ="Ebed" of Ezr 8:6.

OBJEKT, ob'jek't: Now used only in the sense "to make objection," but formerly in a variety of meanings derived from the literal sense "to throw against." So with the meaning "to charge with" in Wied 2:11, AV ob's-ku'ri-ti: a general term for all kinds of offering, but used only in Ezk, Lev and Nu. RV renders consistently "oblation." In Ezk (also Isa 40:20), "oblation" renders הַכֹּ֧ל, הַכֹּל, generally tr4 "heave offering." In some cases (e.g. Isa 1:13; Dn 9:21) "oblation" in AV corresponds to הַכֹּל, חַיָּ֔הוֹ, the ordinary word for "gift," in P "grain offering." See Sacrifice.

OBOOTH, o'booth, o'bôth (Oôbôth, 'obhôth, "water-bags"): A desert camp of the Israelites, the 3d after leaving Mt. Hor and close to the borders of Moab (Nu 21:10,11; 33:43,44). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

OBSCURITY, ob-skû'rî-ti: In modern Eng. generally denotes a state of very faint but still perceptible illumination, and only when preceded by some such adj. as "total" does it imply the absence of all light. In Bib. Eng., however, only the latter meaning is found. So in Isa 29:18 (מִרְמָּר, "opHEL, "darkness"); 58:10; 69:9 (מִרְמָּר, בֹּדֵה, "darkness"); Ad Est 11:8 (גְּדֹפֶּה, גְּדֹפֶּה, "darkness"); Cf Prov 20:20, AV "in obscure darkness," ERV "in the blackest darkness," ARV "in blackness of darkness."

OBSERVE, ob-zôr'v (representing various words, but chiefly מִרְמָּר, שָׂמֵר, "to keep," "to watch," etc): Properly means "to take heed to," as in Isa 43:20, "Thou seest many things, but thou observest not" and from this sense all the usages of the word in EV can be understood. Most of them, indeed, are quite good modern usage (as "observe a feast," Ex 12:17, etc.; "observe a law," Lev 19:37, etc), but a few are archaic. So Gen 37:11, AV "His father observed the saying" (RV "kept the act in mind"); Hos 13:7, "As a leopard. . . . will I observe them" (RV "watch"); Jon 2:8, "observe lying vanities" (RV "regard," but "give heed to" would be clearer; cf Ps 107:43). Still farther from modern usage is Hos 14:8; "I have heard him, and observed him" (RV "will regard;" the meaning is "care for"); and Mk 6:20, "For Herod feared John . . . and observed him" (RV "kept him safe"). In the last case, the AV editors seem to have used "to observe" as meaning "to give reverence to.

Observation(4) is found in Lk 17:20, "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation" (metá vaspá-rhí-seos, metá paratéríseos). The meaning of the Eng. is, "so that it can be observed," but the exact force of the underlying Gr ("visibly") so that it can be computed in advance(5) is a matter of extraordinary dispute at the present time. See Kingdom of God.

OBSTINACY, ob-sti-nä-si. See HArdening.

OCCASION, o-kä-shën: The uses in RV are all modern, but in Jer 2:24 "occasion" is employed (both in Heb and Eng.) as a euphemism for "time of conception of offspring."

OCCUPY, ok'ä-pi: Is in AV the tr of 7 different words: (1) ἐπιτάξαν; (2) ἐπιχείρησα; (3) ἔργάζόμεθα; (4) εἴσηγον; (5) ἐναπλα-

OCCURRENCE, o-kür'ənt (AV, ERV, 1 K 5:4): An obsolete form of occurrence (so ARV). See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

ODOLLOM, o'do-löm (Odolámm, Odołóm): The Gr form of ÆDULLAM (q.v.), found only in 2 Macc 12:38.

ODOMERA, o'do-mér-ä (Odomérä, Odómérä, B, O'dou'mer, Odo'marris, Iuda Odeare, AV Odonarkes, m Odomarres): It is not certain whether Odomera was an independent Bedouin chief, perhaps an ally of the Syrians, or an officer of Bacchides. He was defeated by Jonathan in his campaign against Bacchides (1 Macc 9:60) in 156 BC. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

ODOR, o'dör: In the OT the rendering of ἐνθαλ'æ, besem, "fragrance" (2 Ch 16:14; Est 2:12; in Jer 34:5, RV "burnings"), and of one or two other words; in the NT of ἵνα, ὑπέρ (Jn 12 3; Phil 4 18; Eph 5 2 RV); in Rev 5 8; 18 13, of ὑποκατάστασις, ἀναστάσις, where RV (with AVm in former passing) has "incense." See also Savon.

OF, ov: (1) In Anglo-Saxon, had the meaning "from," "away from" (as the strengthened form "off" has still), and was not used for genuine or possessive separations being expressed by special case-forms. In the Norman period, however, "of" was taken to represent the French de (a use well developed by the time of Chaucer), and in the Elizabethan period both senses of "of" were in common use. But after about 1600 the later force of the word became predominant, and the old construction (which is now practically obsolete) it was replaced by other prepositions. In consequence AV (and in some cases RV) contains many uses of "of" that are not any more similar—most of them, to be sure, causing no difficulty, but there still being a few responsible for real obscurities. (2) Of the uses where "of" signifies "from," the most common obscure passages are those where "of" follows a vb. of hearing. In modern Eng. "hear of" signifies "to gain news about," etc. AV (Mk 7 25; Rom 10 11, etc.). But more commonly this use of "of" in AV denotes the source from which the information is derived. So Jn 16 15, "all things that I have heard of my Father." Acts 20 29, etc. Other uses of "of" are 22 29, "the desire to hear of thee;" cf 1 These 2 13; 2 Tim 1 13; 2 2, etc (similarly Mt 11 29, "and learn of me;" cf Jn 6 45). All of these are ambiguous and in modern Eng. give a wrong meaning, so that in most cases (but not Mt 11 29 or Acts 20 29) RV substitutes "from." A different example of the same use of "of" is 2 Cor 5 1, "a building of God" (RV "from"). So Mk 9 21, "of a child," means "from childhood" ("from a child," RV, is dubious). A still more obscure passage is Mt 23 25, "full of extortion and excess.""Full of" sometimes a case where AV (and even in the immediate context, Mt 23 27 28) refers to the contents, but here the "of" represents the Gr ἐκ, ὑπέρ, "out of," and denotes the source—"The contents of your cup and platter have been purchased from the gains of extortion and excess." RV again substitutes "from," with rather awkward results, but the Gr itself is unduly compressed. In Mk 11 8, one of the changes made after AV is the substitution of "full of" for where the el of 1611 read "cut down branches of the trees," the modern ed have "off" (RV "from"). For clear examples of this use of "of," without the obscurities, of Jn 2 21, they went forth of Nineveh; 2 Macc 4 25, "for the sanctuary;" and, esp. Mt 21 25, "the baptism of John, whence was it from heaven, or of men?" Here "from" and "of" represent exactly the same Gr prep., and the change in Eng. is arbitrary (RV writes "from" in both cases). The same sense use of "of" as "from" was employed rather loosely to connect an act with its source or motive. Such uses are generally clear enough, but the Eng. today seems sometimes rather curious: Mt 13 13, "rejoicing more of that sheep" (RV "over"); Ps 99 8, "vengeance of their inventions" (so AV); 1 Cor 7 4, "hath not power of her own body" (RV "over"); etc. (4) A very common use of "of" in AV is to designate the agent—a use complicated by the fact that "by" is also employed for the instrument. There are also the two interchanged freely. So in Lk 9 7, "all that was done by him ... it was said of some ..." the two words are used side by side for the same Gr prep. (RV replaces "of" by "by," but follows a different text in the first part of the verse). Again, most of the examples are clear enough, but there are some obscurities.

So in Mt 19 12, "which were made eunuchs of men," the "of men" is at first sight possessive (RV "by men"). Similarly, 2 Esd 16 30, "there are left some of the children of them that digged through the vineyard." (RV "by them"). So 1 Cor 14 24, "He is convinced of all, he is judged of all," is quite misleading (RV "by all" in both cases). Phil 3 12, AV I am apprehended of Christ Jesus, seems almost meaningless (RV "by") but there are no other instances of this use. In 2 Cor 2 12, "A door was opened unto me of the Lord" should be "in the Lord" (so RV). 2 S 21 4, "We will have no silver nor gold of Saul, nor of his house," is very loose, and RV revives the verse entirely. In all these cases, AV seems to have looked solely for smooth Eng., without caring much for exactness. In 1 Pet 1 11, however, "sufferings of Christ" probably yields a correct sense for a difficult phrase with the meaning of "sufferings of Christ in the Gr (34 times). Frequently a paraphrase is needed to give the precise meaning. And, finally, in He 11 18, the Gr itself is ambiguous and there is no way of deciding whether the prep. employed (ἐπί, πρός) means "to" (so RV) or "of" (so AVm, RVm; cf He 1 17, "through").

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

OFFENCE, o-iens', OFFEND, o-ends' (Ἐπίθεσις, ἀφήμ, ἀφαγμ, ὑπεράγμ, ἁπάντα, σκανδάλω, σκανδαλίζομαι, skandalon, σκανδαλίζομαι, skandalizō): "Offend" is either trans or intran. As trans it primarily "to strike against," hence "to displease," "to make angry," "to do harm to," "to affront," in Scripture, "to cause to stumble;" intran it is "anger," in Scripture, "to be caused to sin." "Offence" is either the cause of anger, displeasure, etc., or a sin. In Scripture we have the special significance of a stumbling-block, or cause of falling, sin, etc.

In the OT it is frequently the tr of ἀφαγμ, "to be guilty," "to transgress": Jer 2 3, RV "shall be held guilty;" 50 7, RV "not guilty;" Ezek 25 12, "he hath greatly offended;" Ps 5 15, "all they acknowledge their offence," RVm "have borne their guilt;" 13 1, He offended in Baal, RVm "became guilty;" Hab 1 11, He shall pass over, and offend, [imputing] this his power upon his god, RV "his god" by [as] a wind, and shall pass over [in "transgress"], and be guilty, [even] he whose might is his god.

In 2 Ch 28 13, we have σκανδαλίζω ἀν' ἐξετασάμ. The "offending against, RV a trespass [in 'or guilt] against Jehu; we have also ἂν ἔστω, to mislead the mark, in Ex 15 22, "to err." (Gen 20 9, RV "sinned against thee;" 40 1, "offended their lord;" 2 K 13 14; Jer 37 18, RV "sinned against thee"); RSV "false dealing against;" (Ps 75 15, "offend against the generation of thy children," RV "dealt treacherously with"); kobhtai "to act wickedly;" (Job 34 31; miktheth, a stumbling block) (Lev 19 14: 19 14); in Is 8 14, "a rock of offence;" cf Ezek 15 4; Is 21 5; Ps 119 103, "nothing shall offend," RV "no occasion of stumbling;" cf Is 57 17; Jer 6 21, etc; plēkha, "to be fraudulent or to transgress;" Prov 18 19, "a brother offended," RVm "injured."); "Offence in miktheth (see above, 18 17; 19 8 14); in Is 8 14); in Ezek 15 4; (2 Cor 13 4), "Yielding and yielding your greatest offences;" RV "They yield;" ERY "yielding;" allayeth, ARVm "Calmness (ERY "gentleness)"); leavest great sins undone;" Acts "to offend: it is bitter (1 K 11 21, m. "Heb sinners); Is 29 21, that make a man an offender for a word," ARVm "that make a man an offender in his cause;" m. "make men to offend by [their] words;" or, "for a word." ERY in a cause, in make men to offend by [their] words;"

The NT usage of these words deserves special attention. The word most frequently used in AV is skandalizō (skandalon, "offence"); very frequent in the Gospels (Mt 5 29, "if thy right eye offend thee"; 5 30; 11 6; 18 6, "whoso shall offend one of these little ones"); 13 41, 2. NT "all things that offend"; Lk 17 1, "It Usage is impossible but that offences will come," etc; Rom 14 21; 16 17, "Mark them which cause divisions and offences...offence; 1 Cor 8:8 11 bis, "if meat make my brother to offend," etc. Skandalon is primarily "a trap-stick," "a bent-stick on which the bait is fastened which the animal strikes against and so springs the trap," hence it comes to denote "snare" or anything which strikes against injuriously (it is LXX for μολὼνκλ. Lev 19 14). For skandalize, skandalon, tv in AV "offend," "offence," RV gives "cause to stumble," "stumbling-block," etc; thus; Mt 5 29, "if thy right eye causeth thee to stumble," i.e. "is an occasion for thy falling into sin"; Mt 16 23, "Thou art a stumbling-block unto me," an occasion of turning aside from the right path; Mt 26:31-33 bis, "offended" is retained, m 33 bis, "Gr caused to stumble" (same word in ver 31); Mk 9 42, "whosoever shall cause one of these little ones that believe on me to stumble," to fall away from the faith, or to so sin (Lk 17 1), "It is impossible but that occasions of stumbling should come; but woe unto him, through whom they come"; in Rom 14 21; 16 17; in 1 Cor 8, Paul's language has the same meaning, and we see how truly he had laid to heart the Saviour's earnest admonitions—"break brethren"—with him answering to the master's "little ones who believe"; Rom 14 21, "It is good not to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor to do anything whereby thy brother stumbles," i.e. "is led by your example to do that which he cannot do with a good conscience"; ver 20, "It is evil for that man who eateth with offences [did prosōmatos]," so as to place a stumbling-block before his brother, or, rather, "without the confidence that he is doing right," cf ver 23, "He that doubteth is condemned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith; and whatsoever is not of faith is sin"; so 1 Cor 10 13; Rom 16 17. "Mark them that are causing the divisions and occasions of stumbling, contrary to the doctrine, [so that] every man which is taught, and knoweth, is not then "teaching" of Christ Himself implied here? Everything that would embolden another to do that which would be wrong for him, or that would turn any one away from the faith, must be carefully avoided, so as not to put stumbling-blocks in the way of his brother, "for whom Christ died," "giving no occasion of stumbling [proskapel] in anything" (2 Cor 6 3).

A próskopos, "not causing to stumble," is tvr "void of offence;" Acts 4 16, "a conscience void of offence;" 1 Cor 10 32, RV "occasions of stumbling;" Phil 1 10, "void of offence;" khamartelion, "to miss the mark;" "to sin," "to err," is tvr "offended" (Acts 9 22, RV "sinned"); khamartia, "sin;" "error" (2 Cor 11 7, RV "Did I commit sin in the things?"; 2 Thess 2 3 2 bis, "stumble," "offend;" RV "tripped up;"

patamó, "a falling aside or away," is tvr "offence" (Rom 4 25; 5 13bis 16 17 18 20, in each case RV "trespass"); adikía, "to be unrighteous" (Acts 25 11, RV "wrong-doer;" AV "offender").

In Apoc we have "offence" (skandalon, Jth 12 2); RV "I will not eat thereof, lest there be occasion of stumbling;" offended (khamartelion, Ex 7 7); RV "sin;" "greatly offended" (prosochelion, 23 21) "offended" (skandalis, 32 15), "stumble;"

OFFER, of'tr, OFFERING, of'ing. See SACRIFICE.

OFFICE, of's: In the OT the word is often used in periphrastic renderings, e.g. "minister...in the priest's office...lit. act as priest" (Ex. 28 31, etc); "do the office of a midwife," lit. cause or help to give birth (Ex 1 16). But the word is also used as a rendering of different Heb words, e.g. יָדוֹן, "pedestal," "place" (Gen 40 13, AV "place"); 41 13); רָבָז, "abhàdhàh, "labor," "work" (1 Ch 6 32); 7:25, pr'íudáh, "oversight," "charge" (Ps 109 8); רָבָז, ma'ánâdâh, lit. "standing," e.g. waiting at table (1 Ch 23 28); רָבָז, mish'mâr, "charge," observance or service of the temple (Neh 13 14 AV). Similarly in the NT the word is used in periphrastic renderings, e.g. priest's office (Lk 1 8 9); office of a deacon (dakosia, dialonta, 1 Tim 3 10); office of a bishop (episkopos, episkopad, 1 Tim 3 1). RV uses other renderings, e.g. "ministry" (Rom 11 13); "serve as deacons" (1 Tim 3 10). In Acts 1 20, RV has "office" (m "overservice") for AV "bishoprick." T. LEWIS

OFFICER. of's: In AV the term is employed to render different words denoting various officials, domestic, civil and military, such as διάκονος, "eunuch," "minister of state" (Gen 37 36); πράξας, πακisted, "person in charge," "overseer" (Gen 41 36); パース, νηπίστ, "stationed," "garrison," "prefect" (1 K 4 19); מנה, שדָדיא, "scribe" or "secretary" (perhaps arranger or organizer), then any official or overseer. In Est 9 3 for AV "officers" of the king, RV has (more literal) "they that did the king's business." In the NT "officer" generally corresponds to the Gr word ἱερέως, ὕπερελωτέρ, "servant," or any person in the employ of another. In Mt 25 the term evidently means "bailiff" or exactor of the fine imposed by the magistrate, and corresponds to παρκῶνειν, πρῶτωρ, used in Lk 12 58. T. LEWIS

OFFICES OF CHRIST. See Christ, OFFICES OF.

OFFSCOURING, of'skour-ing: This strong and expressive word occurs only once in the OT and once in the NT. The weeping prophet uses it as he looks upon his exiled race and holy city, despoiled, defiled, derided by the profane, the scourings of God and of His people (Lam 3 45, רָבָז, סחי). The favored people, whose city lies in heaps and is patrolled by the heathen, are haled and held up as the scrapings, the offscouring, the offal of the earth. They were "humbled in the dust, carried away to be the slaves of licentious idolaters. The haughty, cruel, cutting boastfulness of the victors covered Israel with contumely.

In 1 Cor 4 13 the greatest of the apostles reminds the prosperous and self-satisfied Corinthians that they, the apostles, were "made as the filth of the world, the offscouring of all things." In such contempt were they held by the unbelieving world and by false apostles. The strange, strong word παρπατος, parpato, should be reminded as what it cost in former times to be a true servant of Christ. G. H. GERBERING

OFFSPRING, of'spring. See CHILDREN.

OFTEN, of'en (παρχόνα, palkos, "thick," "close"): An archaic usage for "frequent;" "Thine often infirmities" (1 Tim 5 23); cf "by often rumination" (Shakespeare, As You Like It, IV, i, 18); "The often round" (Ben Jonson, The Forest, III); "Of wretched and broken limb—an often chance!" (Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette).

OG (גֶּלֶת, גַּפֶּה; ὡς, ὑπό): King of Bashan, whose territory, embracing 60 cities, was conquered by Moses and the Israelites immediately after the conquest of Sihon, king of the Amorites (Nu 21 33–35; Dt 3 1–12). The defeat took place at Edrei, one of the chief of these cities (Nu 21 33; Josh 12 4), and Og and his people were "utterly destroyed" (Dt 3 6). Og is described as the last of the "giant-race" of that district, and his giant stature is borne out by what is told in Dt 3 11 of the dimensions of his "bedstead of iron" (Ceres barzel), 9 cubits long and 4 broad (13 ft. by 6 ft.), said to be still preserved at Rabbabah of Ammon when the verse describing it was written. It is not, however, necessary to conclude that Og's own height, though immense, was as great as this. Some, however, prefer to suppose that what is intended is a "sarcophagus of black basalt," which iron-like substance abounds in the Hauran. The conquered territory was subsequently bestowed on the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh (Nu 32 33; Dt 3 12.13). Other references to Og are Dtr 1 4; 4 47; 31 4; Josh 2 10; 9 10; 13 12.30. The memory of this great conquest lingered all through the national history (Ps 135 11; 136 20). On the conquest, cf Stanley, Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, 1, 185–87, and see Archeology. JAMES ORR

OHALAH,  образом, 'orhal', meaning unknown: A son of Simeon, mentioned as third in order (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 16.16). The name is not found in the list of Nu 26 12–14.

OHEL,  המֶרְבָּע, 'obel', "tent"): A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 20).

OHALAH,  "father's tent"; AV Aholab): A Danite artificer, who assisted Bezaleel in the construction of tabernacle and its furniture (Ex 31 6; 35 34; 35 11; 38 23).

OHLIBAH,  הָוָלָה, 'ohlibah, "tent in her," or "my tent is in her"): An opprobrious and symbolic name given by Ezekiel to Jerusalem, representing the kingdom of Judah, because of her intrigues and base alliances with Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia, just as the name Oholah (q.v.) was given to Samaria or the Northern Kingdom, because of her alliances with Egypt and Assyria. There is a play upon the words in the Heb which cannot be reproduced in Eng. Both Oholah and Oholibah, or Samaria and Jerus, are the daughters of one mother, and wives of Jeh, and both are guilty of religious and political alliance with heathen nations. Idolatry is constantly compared by the Heb prophets to marital unfaithfulness or adultery. W. W. DAVIES

OHLIBAHAMAH,  מֶרְבָּע, 'ohlibhamah, "tent of the high place");

1. One of Esau's wives, and a daughter of Anah the Hivite (Gen 36 2.5). It is strange that she is not named along with Esau's other wives in either Gen 28 9 or 26 30. Various explanations have been given, but none of them is satisfactory. There is probably some error in the text.

2. An Edomite chief (Gen 36 41; 1 Ch 1 52).

OIL,  שֶׁמֶן, "oil," or "olive," occurs with shemen in several passages (Ex 27 20; 30 24; Lev 24 2). The corresponding Arab. ça, a contraction of zeitun, which is the name for the olive tree as a plant, is now applied to oils in general, to distinguish them from solid fats. Zeit usually means olive oil, unless some qualifying name indicates another oil. A corresponding use was made of shemen, and the oil referred to so many times in the Bible was olive oil (except Est 2 12). Compare the use with the Gr ἐλαιόν, "oil," a neuter from ἐλαῖον, ἐλάτη, "olive," the origin of the Eng. word "oil." סֶפֶן, zephah, lit. "glistening," which occurs less frequently, is used possibly because of the light-giving quality of olive oil, or it may have been used to indicate fresh oil, as the clean, newly pressed oil is bright. סֶפֶן, mesubah, a Chal. word, occurs twice: Ezr 6 9; 7 22. ḫna, ḫlaon, is the NT term.

Olive oil has been obtained, from the earliest times, by pressing the fruit in such a way as to filter out the oil and other liquids from the press residue. The Scripture references correspond so nearly to the methods practised in Syria up to the present time, and the presses uncovered by excavators at such sites as Gezer substantiate so well the similarity of these methods, that a description of the oil presses and modes of expression still being employed in Syria will be equally true of those in use in early Israelitish times.

The olives to yield the greatest amount of oil are allowed to ripen, although some oil is extracted from the green fruit. As the olive ripens it turns black. The fruit begins to fall from the trees in September, but the main crop is gathered after the first rains in November. The olives which have not fallen naturally or have not been blown off by the storms are beaten from the trees with long poles (cf Dt 24 20). The fruit is gathered from the ground into baskets and carried on the heads of the women, or on donkeys to the houses or oil presses. Those carried to the houses are preserved for eating. Those carried to the presses are piled in heaps until fermentation begins. This breaks down the oil cells and causes a more abundant flow of oil. The fruit thus softened may be trod out with the feet (Mic 6 15), which is now seldom practised or crushed in a handmill. Such a mill was uncovered at Gezer beside an oil press. Stone mortars with wooden pestles are also used. Any of these methods crushes the fruit, leaving only the stone unbroken, and yields a purer oil (Ex 27 20). The method now generally practised of crushing the fruit and kernels with an edgerunner mill probably dates from Rom times. These mills are of crude construction. The stones are cut from native limestone and are turned by horses or mules. Remains of huge stone in this type of mill yield Rom presses in Mt. Lebanon and other districts.

The second step in the preparation of the oil is the expression. In districts where the olives are plentiful and there is no commercial demand for the oil, the householders crush the fruit in a mortar, mix the crushed mass with water, and after the solid portions have had time to settle, the pure sweet oil is skimmed from the surface of the water.

Ancient Oil Presses (Land and the Book).

This method gives a delicious oil, but is wasteful. This is no doubt the beaten oil referred to in connection with religious ceremonies (Ex 27:29). Usually the crushed fruit is spread in portions on mats of reeds or goats' hair, the corners of which are folded over the mass, and the packets thus formed are piled one upon another between upright supports. These supports were formerly two stone columns or the two sections of a split stone cylinder hollowed out within to receive the mats. Large hollow tree trunks are still similarly used in Syria. A flat stone is next placed on top, and then a heavy log is placed on the pile in such a manner that one end can be fitted into a socket made in a wall or rock in close proximity to the pile. This socket becomes the fulcrum of a large lever of the second class. The lever is worked in the same manner as that used in the wine presses (see WINE PRESS). These presses are now being almost wholly superseded by hydraulic presses. The juice which runs from the press, consisting of oil, extractive matter and water, is conducted to vats or run into jars and allowed to stand until the oil separates. The oil is then drawn off from the surface, or the watery fluid and sediment is drawn away through a hole near the bottom of the jar, leaving the oil in the container. (For the construction of the ancient oil presses, see Excavations of Gzer, esp. Macalister.)

The oil, after standing for some time to allow further sediment to settle, is stored either in huge earthenware jars holding 100 to 200 gallons, or in underground cisterns (cf 1 Ch 27:28) holding a much larger quantity. Some of these cisterns in Beirut hold several tons of oil each (2 Ch 11:11; 32:28; Neh 13:3; Prov 21:20). In the homes the oil is kept in small earthen jars of various shapes, usually having spouts by which the oil can be easily poured (1 K 17:12; 2 K 4:2). In 1 S 16:13; 1 K 1:39, horns of oil are mentioned.

1. As a commodity of exchange.—Oliver oil when properly made and stored will keep sweet for years, hence was a good form of merchandise to hold. Oil is still sometimes given in payment (1 K 5:11; Ezek 27:17; Hos 12:1; Lk 16:6; Rev 18:13).

2. As a cosmetic.—From earliest times oil was used as a cosmetic, esp. for oiling the limbs and head. Oil used in this way was usually scented (see OINTMENT). Oil is still used in this manner by the Arabs, principally to keep the skin and scalp soft when traveling in dry desert regions where there is no opportunity to bathe. Sesame oil has replaced olive oil to some extent for this purpose. Homer, Pliny and other early writers mention its use for external application. Pinny oil was supposed to protect the body against the cold. Many Bib. references indicate the use of oil as a cosmetic (Ex 25:6; Dt 25:40; Ruth 3:3; 2 S 12:20; 14:2; Est 2:12; Ps 23:5; 92:10; 104:15; 141:5; Ezek 16:9; Mic 6:15; Lk 7:46).

3. As a medicine.—From early Egypt literature down to late Arab. medical works, oil is mentioned as a valuable remedy. Many queer prescriptions contain olive oil as one of their ingredients. The good Samaritan used olive oil mingled with wine to dress the wounds of the man who fell among robbers (Mk 6:13; Lk 10:34).

4. As a food.—Olive oil replaces butter to a large extent in the diet of the people of the Mediterranean countries. In Bible lands food is fried in it, it is added to stews, and is poured over boiled vegetables, such as beans, peas and lentils, and over salads, sour milk, cheese and other foods as a dressing. A cake is prepared from ordinary bread dough which is smeared with oil and sprinkled with herbs before baking (Lev 8:5). At times of fasting (oriental Christians use only vegetable oil for cooking, for Bib. references to the use of oil as food see Nu 11:8; Dt 7:13; 14:23; 32:13; 1 K 17:12; 14:16; 2 K 4:27; 1 Ch 12:40; 2 Ch 2:10-15; Ezk 3:7; Prov 21:17; Ezek 16:13; Hos 10:22; Hag 2:12; Rev 6:6).

5. As an illuminant.—Olive oil until recent years was universally used for lighting purposes (see LAMP). In Palestine there were a few primitive forms of lamp similar to those employed by the Israelites in oil, and some in favor of the exclusive use of olive oil for lighting holy places is disappearing. Formerly any other illuminant was forbidden (cf. Ex 25:6; 27:20; 35:8.14.28; 39:37; Mt 25:3.4.8).

6. In religious rites.—(a) Consecration of officials or sacred things (Gen 28:18; 35:14; Ex 29:21.22; Lev 2:18; Nu 4:9ff; 1 S 10:1; 16:13; 2 S 1:21; 1 K 1:39; 2 K 9:13.6; Ps 89:20). This was adopted by the early Christians in their ceremonies (Jas 5:14), and is still in the consecration of crowned rulers and church dignitaries. (b) Offerings, votive and otherwise: The custom of making offerings of oil to holy places still survives in oriental religions. One may see burning before the shrines along a Syrian roadside or in the churches, small lamps with oil as the supply of oil, as necessary. In Israelitic times oil was used in the meal offering, in the consecration offerings, offerings of purification from leprosy, etc (Ex 29:22; 40:9ff; Lev 2:2ff; Nu 4:9ff; Dt 18:4; 1 Ch 9:29; 2 Ch 31:5; Neh 10:37-39; 13:5.12; Ezek 16:18,19; 46:46; Mic 6:7). (c) In connection with the burial of the dead: Eadep papyri mention this use. In the OT no direct mention is made of the custom. Jesus referred to it in connection with His own burial (Mt 26:12; Mk 14:8-9; Lk 23:56; Jn 12:3-5; 19:40). Abundant oil was a figure of general prosperity (Dt 32:13; 33:21; 2 K 18:32; Job 29:6; Joel 2:19.24). Languishing of the oil indicated general famine (Jdel 1:10; Zech 14:11).

4. Figurative.—The oil of the olive is still described as the oil of joy (Isa 61:3), or the oil of gladness (Ps 46:7; He 1:9). Ezekiel prophesies that the rivers shall run like oil, i.e. become viscous (Ezek 32:14). Words of deceit are softer than oil (Ps 56:21; Job 23:9). Cursing becomes a habit with the wicked as readily as oil soaks into stones (Ps 109:18). Excessive use of oil indicates wastefulness (Prov 21:17), while the saving of it is a characteristic of the wise (Prov 21:20). Oil was carried into Egypt, i.e. a treaty was made with that country ( Hos 12:1).

OIL, ANOINTING (חֹקָר חֹקָר, shemen ha-miskhâkh): This holy oil, the composition of which is described in Ex 30:22-33, was designed for use in the anointing of the tabernacle, its furniture and vessels, the altar and laver, and the priest, that being thus consecrated, they might be "most holy." It was to be "a holy anointing oil" unto Jehovah throughout all generations (ver 31). On its uses, see Ex 37:29; Lev 8:12; 10:7; 21:10. The care of this holy oil was subsequentlyentrusted to Eleazar (Nu 4:16); in later times, it seems to have been prepared by the sons of the priests (1 Ch 9:30). There is a figurative allusion to the oil on Aaron's head in Ps 133:2. See OIL; ANOINTING. James Orr.

OIL TREE, oil trê (עִלְיָה, 'eq shemen [Isa 41:19], m "oleaster," in Neh 8:15, tr' "wild olive," AV "pine"); תַּנָּא, 'eq shemen, in 1 K 6:23.31.32, tr' "olive wood"). The name "oleaster" used to be applied to the wild olive, but now belongs to another plant, the silver-berry, Elaeagnus hortensis (N.O. Elaeagnus) known in Arabic as Zei'ZFną. It is a pretty shrub with sweet-smelling white flowers and silver-grey-green leaves. It is difficult to see how all the three references can apply to this tree; it will suit the first two, but this small shrub would never supply wood for carpentry work such as that mentioned in 1 K, hence the tr "olive wood." On the other hand, in the reference in Neh 8:15, olive branches are mentioned just before, so the tr "wild olive" (the difference being too slight) is improbable. Post suggests the tr of "abonies" by Pine (q.v.), which if accepted would suit all the requirements. E. W. G. Masterman.

OINTMENT, oint'ment: The present use of the word "ointment" is to designate a thick unguent of buttery or tallow-like consistency. AV in frequent instances translates shemen or miskhâkh (see Ex 30:25) "ointment" where a perfumed oil seemed to be indicated. ARV has consequently substituted the word "oil" in most of the passages. Merkôbah is rendered "ointment" once in the OT (Job 41:31 [Heb 41:23]). The well-known power of oils and fats to absorb odors was made use of by the ancient perfumers. The composition of the holy anointing oil used in the tabernacle worship is mentioned in Ex 30:22-25; Olive oil formed the base. That was scented with "flowing myrrh . . . . sweet cinnamon . . . . sweet calamus . . . . and . . . . cassia." The oil was probably mixed with the above ingredients added in a powdered form and heated until the oil had absorbed their odors and then allowed to stand until the insoluble matter settled, when the oil could be decanted. Olive oil, being a non-drying oil which does not thicken readily, yielded an ointment of oily consistency. This is indicated by Ps 150:4, where it says that the precious oil ran down on Aaron’s beard and on the collar of his outer garment. Anyone attempting to make the holy anointing oil would be cut off from his people (Ex 30:33). The scented oils or ointments were kept in jars or vials (not boxes) made of alabaster. These jars are frequently found as part of the equipment of ancient tombs.

The word tr' "ointment" in the NT is ἁρώπ, μύρον, "myrrh." This would indicate that myrrh, an aromatic gum resin, was the substance commonly added to the oil to give it odor. In Lk 7:46 both kinds of oil are mentioned, and the verse might be paraphrased thus: My head with common oil thou didst not anoint; but she hath anointed my feet with costly scented oil.

OLD MAN (םילאוס, palaios, "old; "ancient"): A term thrice used by Paul (Rom 1:6; Eph 4:22; Col 3:9) to signify the unregenerated man, the natural man in the corruption of sin, i.e. sinful human nature before conversion and regeneration. It is theologically synonymous with "flesh" (Rom 8:7-9), which is a term, not for bodily organism, but for the whole nature of man (body and soul) turned away from God and devoted to self and earthy things.

The old man is "in the flesh": the new man "in the Spirit." In the former "the works of the flesh" (Gal 5:19-21) are manifest; in the latter "the fruit of the Spirit" (vs 22-23). One is "corrupt according to the deceitful lusts"; the other "created in righteousness and true holiness" (Eph 4:22-24 AV). See also MAN, NATURAL; MAN, NEW.

OLD PROPHET, THE (711 פַּדְעַל, nôbîh, ֶהַדָּה זַקֵּן; "an old prophet" [1 K 13:11], פַּדְעַל ֶה, ha-nôbîh 'ha-zákên, "the old

1. The "prophet" (ver 29): The narrative of Narrative 1 K 13:11-32, in which the old prophet is mentioned, is part of a larger account telling of a visit paid to Bethel by "a man of God" from Judah. The Juedaic prophet uttered a curse upon the altar erected there by Jeroboam I. When the king attempted to use force against him, the prophet was saved by the prophet's intervention; the king then invited him to receive royal hospitality, but he refused because of a command of God to him not to eat or drink there. The Juedaic then departed (vs 1-10). An old prophet who lived in Bethel heard of the stranger's words, and went after him and offered him hospitality. This offer too was refused. But when the old prophet resorted to falsehood and pleaded a Divine command on the subject, the Juedaic returned with him. While at the table the old prophet is given a message to declare that death will follow the southerner's disobedience to the first command. A lion kills him on his way home. The old prophet hears of the death and explains it as due to disobedience to God; he then buries the dead body in his own grave and expresses a wish that he also at death should be buried in the same sepulcher.

There are several difficulties in the text. In ver 11, AV reads "his sons came" instead of one of his sons came." and tr ver 120: "And his sons showed the way the man of God went." There is a gap in the MT after the word "tahal" in ver 20, and ver 29 should be tr'. "And it came to pass after he had eaten bread and drunk water, that he saddled for himself the ass, and departed ass." (following LXX, B with W. B. Stevenson, H.D.B. III, 594a, n.).

2. Critical

The critical question in the text is whether the old prophet was "Meschullam" of Ex 10:29. Several interpretations have been put forward. If not Meschullam, then he was "an old prophet" (fr. 1), or "an old man" (fr. 2). The latter view is probably the correct one. The text is not clear. The Juedaic literally says: "And he showed him the way of the man of God went." The word "the way of the man of God went" was expressed variously in the MT and Targum, and the text is apparently corrupt. The Juedaic translator takes the LXX reading, which is also the reading of the LXX and Targum. The text is corrupt and requires emendation. The interpretation is thus: "And he showed him the way of the man of God went." There is a gap in the MT after the word "tahal" in ver 20, and ver 29 should be tr'. "And it came to pass after he had eaten bread and drunk water, that he saddled for himself the ass, and departed ass." (following LXX, B with W. B. Stevenson, H.D.B. III, 594a, n.).
Benzerger ("Die Bücher der Könige," Kurz. Hand-Komm. zum AT, 91) holds that we have here an example of a midrash, i.e. according to LOT, 529, "an imaginative development of a thought or theme suggested by Scripture, esp. a didactic or homiletic one or an edifying religious story." 2 Ch 24:27 refers to a "midhrash of the book of the kings," and 2 Ch 13:22 to a "midrash of the prophet Iddo." In 2 Ch 9:29 we have a reference to "the visions of Iddo the seer concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat." Jos names the Judaean prophet Jadon (Ant., VIII, viii, 5), and some would trace this narrative to the midrash of Iddo, which would be a late Jewish work. There is a trace of late Heb in ver 3, and evidence in several places of a later editing of the original narrative. Ketzer and Renzinger think it possible that the section may be based on a historical incident. If the narrative is historical in the main, the mention of Josiah by name in ver 2 may be a later insertion; if not historical, the prophecy there is ex eventu, and the whole section a midrash on 2 K 22 13-20.

(1) Several questions are suggested by the narrative, but in putting as well as in answering these questions, it must be remembered that the old prophet himself, as has been pointed out, is not the chief character of the piece. Hence it is a little pointless to ask what became of the old prophet, or whether he was not punished for his falsehood.

The passage should be studied, like the parables of Jesus, with an eye on the great central truth, which is, here, that God punishes disobedience even in "a man of God." It is not inconsistent with this to regard the old prophet as an example of "Satan fashioning himself into an angel of light" (2 Cor 11:14), or of the beast which "had two horns like unto a lamb" (Rev 13:11).

(2) It must also be remembered that the false prophets of the OT are called prophets in spite of their false prophecies. So here the old prophet in spite of his former lie is given a Divine message to declare that with death will follow the other's disobedience.

(3) One other question suggests itself, and demands an answer. Why did the old prophet make the request that at death he should be buried in the same grave as the Judaean (ver 31)? The answer is implied in ver 32, and is more fully given in 2 K 23:15-20, where King Josiah defiles the graves of the prophets at Bethel. On seeing a "monument-stone by the graves" he inquires what it is, and is told that it marks the grave of the prophet from Judah. Thereupon he orders that his bones be not disturbed. With these the bones of the old prophet escape. Perhaps no clearer instance of a certain kind of meanness exists in the OT. The very man who has been the cause of another's downfall and ruin is base enough to plan his own escape under cover of the virtues of his victim. And the parallels in modern life are many.

OLIVE TREE, ol'iv tre' (C77), zayith, a word occurring also in Aram., Ethiopic and Arab.; in the last it means "olive oil," and zaitun, "the olive tree". Aata, elain: The olive tree has all through history been one of the most characteristic, most valued and most useful of trees in Pal.

1. The Olive Tree. It is only right that it is the first named. Olive Tree "king" of the trees (Jgs 9:8,9). When the children of Israel came to the land they acquired olive trees which they planted not (Dt 6:11; cf Josh 24:13). The cultivation of the olive goes back to the earliest times in Canaan. The frequent references in the Bible to evidence (see 4 below) from archaeology and the important place the product of this tree has held in the history of the inhabitants of Syria make it highly probable that this land is the actual home of the cultivated olive. The wild olive is indigenous there. The most fruitful trees among the product of bare and rocky ground (cf Dt 33:13) situated preferably at a great distance from the sea. The terraced hills of Pal, where the earth lies never many inches above the limestone rocks, the long rainless summer of unbroken sunshine, and the heavy "dews" of the autumn afford conditions which are extraordinarily favorable to at least the indigenous olive.

The olive, Olea Europaea (N.O. Oleaceae), is a slow-growing tree, requiring years of patient labor before reaching full fruitfulness. Its growth implies a certain degree of settlement and peace, for a hostile army can in a few days destroy the patient work of two generations. Possibly this may have something to do with its being the emblem of peace. Enemies of a village could not easily carry out revenge by cutting away a ring of branches from the trunks of the olives, thus killing the trees in a few months. The beauty of this tree is referred to in Jer 11:16; Hos 14:6, and its fruitfulness in Ps 128:3. The characteristic olive-green of its foliage, frosted silver below and the twisted and gnarled trunks—often hollow in the center—are some of the most picturesque and constant signs of settled habitations. In some parts of the land large plantations occur: the famous olive grove near Be'erith is 5 miles square; there are also fine, ancient trees in great numbers near Bethlehem.

In starting an oliveyard the fellah not infrequently plants young wild olive trees which grow plentifully over many parts of the land, or he may grow from cuttings. When the young trees are 3 years old they are grafted from a choice stock and after another three or four years they may commence to bear fruit, but they take quite a decade more before reaching full fruitition. Much attention is, however, required. The soil around the trees must be frequently plowed and broken up; water must be conducted to the roots from the earliest rain, and the soil must be freely enriched with a kind of manure known in Aram. as hawwârâh. If neglected, the older trees soon send up a great many shoots from the roots all around the parent stem (perhaps the idea in Ps 128 3); these must be pruned away, although, should the parent stem decay, some of these may be capable of taking its place. Being, however, from the root, below the original point of grafting, they are of the wild olive type—with smaller, stiffer leaves and prickly stem—and need grafting before they are of use. The olive tree furnishes a wood valuable for many forms of carpentry, and in modern Pal is extensively burnt as fuel.

The olive is in flower about May; it produces clusters of small white flowers, springing from the axile of the leaves, which fall as showers to the ground (Job 15 33).

2. The Fruit

The first olives mature as early as September in some places, but, in the mountain districts, the olive harvest is not till November or even December. Much of the earliest fruit falls to the ground and is left by the owner un-gathered until the harvest. The trees are beaten with long sticks (Dt 24 20), the young folks often climbing into the branches to reach the highest fruit, while the women and older girls gather up the fruit from the ground. The immature fruit left after such an ingathering is described graphically in Isa 17 6: "There shall be left therein gleanings, as the shaking [in "beating"] of an olive-tree, two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough, four or five in the outmost branches of a fruitful tree." Such gleanings belonged to the poor (Dt 24 20), as is the case today. Modern villages in Pal allow the poor of even extreme poverty to glean the olives. The yield of an olive tree is very uncertain; a year of great fruitfulness may be followed by a very scanty crop or by a succession of such.

The olive is an important article of diet in Pal. Some are gathered green and pickled in brine, after slight bruising, and others, the "black" olives, are gathered quite ripe and are either packed in salt or in brine. In both cases the salt modifies the bitter taste. They are eaten with bread.

More important commercially is the oil. This is sometimes extracted in a primitive way by crushing a few berries by hand in the hollow of a stone (cf Ex 27 20), from which a shallow channel runs for the oil. It is an old custom to Gem the them by foot (Mic 6 15). Oil is obtained

3. Olive Oil

3. Olive Oil on a larger scale in one of the many varieties of oil mills. The berries are carried in baskets, by donkeys, to the mill, and they are crushed by heavy weights. A better class of oil can be obtained by collecting the first oil to come off separately, but not much attention is given to this in Pal, and usually the berries are crushed, stones and all, by a circular millstone revolving on upright round central pivot. Pleasant harvest of oil was looked upon as one of God's blessings (Job 2 24; 3 13). That the "labor of the olive" should fail was one of the trials to faith in Jch (Hab 3 17). Olive oil is extensively used as food, as bread being dipped into it in eating; also medicinally (Lk 10 34; Jas 5 14). In ancient times it was greatly used for anointing the person (Ps 23 5; Mt 6 17). In Rome's days of luxury it was a common maxim that a long and pleasant life depended upon two fluids—"wine within and oil without." In modern times this use of oil for the person is replaced by the employment of soap, which in Pal is made from olive. In all ages this oil has been used for illumination (Mt 25 3).

Comparatively plentiful as olive trees are today in Pal, there is abundant evidence that the cultivation was once much more extensive.

4. Greater Plenty of Olive Trees in Ancient Times

The countless rock-cut oil- and wine-presses, both within and without the walls of the city of Gezer), show that the cultivation of the olive and vine was of much greater importance than it is anywhere in Pal today. Excessive taxation has made olive culture unprofitable ("Mem," PEF, 11, 23). A further evidence of this is seen today in many now deserted sites which are covered with wild olive trees, descendants of large plantations of the cultivated tree which have quite disappeared. Many of these spring from the fallen drupes. Isolated trees scattered over many parts of the land, esp. in Galilee, are sown by the birds. As a rule the wild olive is but a shrub, with small leaves, a stem more or less prickly, and a small, hard drupe with but little or no oil. That a wild olive branch should be grafted into a fruitful tree would be a proceeding useless and contrary to Nature (Rom 11 17 24). On the mention of "branches of wild olive" in Neh 8 15, see Ol. Tree. For "olives" as in the Greek Testament, see E. W. G. Maspero.

Olivet comes to us through the Vulg Olivetum, “an oliveyard.”

Jos frequently uses the expression “Mount of Olives” (e.g. Ant, VII, ix, 2; XX, xvii, 6; BJ, V, ii, 3; xii, 2), but later Jewish

1. Names writings give the name Ḥar ha-mishḥah, “Mount of Oil”; this occurs in some MSS in 2 K 23:13, and the common reading Ḥar ha-mishabbeth, “Mount of Corruption,” in “destruction,” may possibly be a deliberate alteration (see below). In later ages the Mount was termed “the mountain of lights,” because here there used to be kindled at one time the first beacon light to announce throughtout Jewry the approach of the new moon.

To the natives of Pal today it is usually known as Jebel et Tūr (“mount of the elevation,” or “tower”), or, less commonly, as Jebel Tūr ez zait (“mountain of the elevation of oil”). The name Jebel ez-zawāt ("Mount of Olives") is also well known. Early Arab. writers use the term Tūr Zait, “Mount of Oil.”

The mountain ridge which lies E. of Jerus leaves the central range near the valley of Shephath and runs for about 2 miles due S. After descrdinating in the mountain mass on which lies the “Church of the Ascension,” it may be considered as giving off two branches: one lower one, which runs S.S.W., forming the southern side of the Kidron valley, terminating at the Rd of the Nea, and another, higher one, which slopes eastward and terminates a little beyond el-'Aziziyeh (modern Bethany). The main ridge is considerably higher than the site of ancient Jerus, and still retains a thick cap of the soft chalky limestone, mixed with flint, known variously as Nārī and Ka'bāl, which has been entirely denuded over the Jerus site (see Jerusalem, II, 1). The flints were the cause of a large settlement of paleolitic man which occurred in prehistoric times on the northern end of the ridge, while the soft chalky stone breaks down and forms a soil suitable for the cultivation of olives and other trees and shrubs. The one drawback to arboriculture upon this ridge is the strong northwest wind which permanently bends most trees toward the S.E., but affords the soft olive less, so that the quince is the growing pine. The eastern slopes are more sheltered. In respect of wind the Mount of Olives is far more exposed than the site of old Jerus.

The lofty ridge of Olivet is visible from far, a fact now emphasized by the high Russian tower which can be seen for many scores of miles on the E. of the Jordan. The range presents, from such a point of view particularly, a succession of summits. Taking as the northern limit the dip which is crossed by the ancient Anathoth (‘anatād) road, the most northerly summit is that now crowned by the house and garden of Sir John Gray Hill, 2,690 ft. above sea-level. This is sometimes incorrectly pointed out as Scopus, which lay farther to the N.W. A second sharp dip in the ridge separates this northern summit from the last, a broad plateau now occupied by the great Kaiserin Augusta Victoria Stiftung and gardens. The road makes a sharp descent into a valley which is traversed from W. to E. by an important and ancient road from Jerus, which runs eastward along the Rd of the Nea. W.S. of the last dip lies the main mass of the mountain, that known characteristically as the Olivet of ecclesiastical tradition. This mass consists of two principal summits and two subsidiary spurs. The northern of the two main summits is that known as Karem ṣeat Binyād, the vineyard of the hunter, and also as “Galilee,” or, more correctly, as Viri Galilaei (see below, 7). It reaches a height of 2,793 ft. above the Mediterranean and is separated from the southern summit by a narrow neck traversed today by the carriage road. The southern summit, of practically the same elevation, is the traditional “Mount of the Ascension,” and for several years has been distinguished by a lofty, though somewhat inarticulate, tower erected by the Russians. The two subsidiary spurs referred to above are: (1) a somewhat broken ridge running S.E., upon which lies the squall village of el-'Aziziyeh—Bethany; (2) a small spur running S., covered with grass, which is known as “the Prophets,” on account of a remarkable 4th-c. Christian tomb found there, which is known as “the tomb of the Prophets”—a spot much venerated by modern Jews.

A further extension of the ridge as Batin el-Hawa, “the belly of the wind,” or traditionally as “the Mount of Offence” (cf 1 K 11:7; 2 K 23:13), is usually included in the Mount of Olives, but its lower altitude—it is on a level with the temple-platform—and its position S. of the city mark it off as practically a distinct hill. Upon its lower slopes are clustered the houses of Sī‘ām (Siloam).

The notices of the Mount of Olives in the OT are, considering its nearness to Jerus, remarkably scanty.

(1) David fleeing before his rebellious son Absalom (2 S 15:16) crossed the Kidron and “went up by the ascent of the mount of the house of Olives, and wept as he went up; and Associations he had his head covered, and went barefoot: and all the people that were with him covered every man his head, and they went up, weeping as they went” (ver 30). . . . And it came to pass, that, when David was come to the top of the ascent, behold, Ziba the servant of Mephibosheth met him, with a couple of asses saddled, and upon them two hundred loaves of bread, and a hundred clusters of raisins, and a hundred of summer fruits, and a bottle of wine” (16 1).

It is highly probable that David’s route to the wilderness was neither by the much-trodden Anathoth road nor over the summit of the Mount of Olives but by the path running N.E. from the city, which runs between the Viri Galilaei hill and that supporting the German Sanatorium and descends into the wilderness by Wādy er Rawdah. See Barurim.

(2) Ezekiel in a vision (11:23) saw the glory of Jehovah go up from the midst of the city and stand “upon the mountain which is on the east side of the city” (cf 43:2). In connection with this the Rabbi Janna records the tradition that the shāikhnut (leader) stood 91 years upon Olivet, and preached, saying, “Seek ye the Lord while he may be found, call ye upon him while he is near”—a strange story to come from a Jewish source, suggesting some overt reference to Christ.

(3) In Zec 14:4 the prophet sees Jehovah in that day stand upon the Mount of Olives, and “the Mount of Olives shall be cleft in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half of it toward the south.”

In addition to these direct references, Jewish tradition associates with this mount—this “mount of Corruption”—the rite of the red heifer (Nu 19); and many authorities consider that this is also the mount referred to in Neh 8 15, whence the people are directed to fetch olive branches, branches of wild olive, myrtle branches, palm branches and branches of thick trees to make their booths.

It is hardly possible that a spot with such a wide outlook—especially the marvelous view of the Jordan valley and Dead Sea to the lands of Ammon and Moab—should have been neglected in the days when Scm religion crowned such spots with their sanctuaries. There is no evidence that there was a "high place" here. In the account of David's flight mention is made of the spot on the summit "where he was wont to worship God" (2 Sam 15 32 m). This is certainly a reference to a sanctuary, and there are strong reasons for believing that this place may have been Nob (q.v.) (see 1 Sam 21; 2 Sam 11.19; Neh 11 32; but esp. Is 10 32). This last reference seems to imply a site more commanding in its outlook over the ancient city than Ras el Musharif proposed by Driver, one at least as far S. as the Anathoth road, or even that from Wady er Raveabi. But besides this we have the definite statement (1 K 11 7): "Then did Solomon build a high place for Chemosh in the mount that is before [i.e. E. of] Jerus, and for Moloch the abomination of the children of Ammon," and the further account that the "high places that were before [E. of] Jerus, which were on the right hand [S.] of the mount of corruption [i.e. "destruction"], which Solomon the king of Israel had built for Asherah the abomination of the Sidonians, and for Chemosh the abomination of Moab, and for Milcom the abomination of the children of Ammon, did the king [Joshiah] defile" (2 K 23 13). That these high places were somewhere upon what is generally recognized as the mount of Olives, seems clear, and the most probable site is the main mass where are today the Christian sanctuaries, though Graets and Dean Stanley favor the summit known as Virc Galloaet. It is the recognition of this which has kept alive the Jewish name "Mount of Corruption" for this mount to the day. The term Mons offendionis, given to the southeastern extension, S. of the city, is merely an ecclesiastical tradition going back to Quaresimus in the 17th cent., which is repeated by Burchard (see 3 AD).

More important to us are the NT associations of this sacred spot. In those days the mountain must have been far different from its condition today. Titus in his siege of Jerus destroyed all the timber here and elsewhere in the environs, but before this the hillsides must have been clothed with verdure—oliveyards, fig orchards and palm groves, with myrtle and other shrubs. Here in the fresh breezes and among the thick foliage, Jesus, the country-bred Galiliean, must gladly have taken Himself from the noise and closeness of the over-crowded city. It is to the Passion Week, with the exception of Jn 8 1, that all the incidents belong which are repeatedly mentioned occurring on the Mount of Olives; while there would be a special reason at this time in the densely packed city, it is probable that on other occasions also Our Lord preferred to stay outside the walls. Bethany would indeed appear to have been His home in Judæa as Capernaum was in Galilee. Here we read of Him as staying with Mary and Martha (Lk 10 38-42); again He comes to Bethany from the wilderness road from Jericho for the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11), and later He is at a feast, six days before He was raised on the mount of Olives (Lk 12 13). The Mount of Olives is expressly mentioned in many of the events of the Passion Week. He approached Jerus, "unto Bethphage and Bethany, at the mount of Olives" (Mk 11 1; Mt 21 1; Lk 19 29); over a shoulder of this mount—very probably by the route of the present Jericho carriage road—He made His triumphal entry to the city (Mt 21; Mk 11; Lk 19), and on this road, when probably the full night of the city first burst into view, He Wept over Jerus (Lk 19 41). During all that week "every day he was teaching in the temple; and every night he went out, and lodged in the mount that is called Olivet" (Lk 21 37)—the special part of the mount being Bethany (Mt 21 17; Mk 11 11). It was on the road from Bethany that He gave the sign of the withering, colourless fig tree (Mt 21 17-19; Mk 11 12-14.20-24), and "as he sat on the mount of Olives" (Mt 24 3; Mk 13 3) Jesus gave His memorable sermon with the doomed city lying below Him.

On the lower slopes of Olivet, in the Garden of Gethsemane (q.v.), Jesus endured His agony, the betrayal and arrest, while upon one of its higher points—not, as tradition has it, on the inhabited highest summit, but on the secluded eastern slopes "over against Bethany" (Lk 24 50-52)—He took leave of His disciples (Acts 1 12).

The view of Jerus from the Mount of Olives must ever be one of the most striking impressions which any visitor to Jerus carries away with him. It has been described countless times. It is today as then, when view is taken from Olivet a modern writer with historic imagination has thus graphically sketched the salient features of that sight:

"We are standing on the road from Bethany as it breaks round the Mount of Olives and on looking north-west this is what we see. . . . There spreads a vast stone stage, almost continuous, some 400 yds. N. and S. by 300 E. and W., held up above Ophel and the Kidron valley by a high and massive wall, from 50 to 150 ft. and more in height, according to the levels of the rock from which it rises. Deep cloisters surround this platform on the inside of the walls. . . . Every gate has its watch and other guards patrol the courts. The crowds, which pour through the south gates upon the platform for the most part keep to the right; the exceptions, turning westward, are excommunicated or in mourning. But the crowd are not all Israelites. Numbers of Gentiles mingle with them; there are costumes and colors from all lands. In the cloisters sit teachers with groups of disciples about them. On the open pavement stand the booths of hucksters and money changers; and from the N. sheep and bullocks are being driven toward the inner sanctuary. This lies not in the center of the great platform, but in the northwest corner. It is a separate and fortified, oval-shaped building with its 9 gates rising from a narrow terrace at a slight elevation above the platform and the terrace enclo-

The Mount of Olives is a hill on the southeastern outskirts of Jerusalem, on which stands a large hotel with a NT examination made there in 1859. The Mount was once covered with olive trees, hence its name. The Mount of Olives is one of the sacred places of the NT and has been the scene of many events associated with Jesus. It is also a place of importance in the Jewish and Christian traditions.

OLIVÉT, OFI.-VET. See Olives, Mount of.

OLYMPSAS, LIMPIAS (Olympaian, Olympia): The name of a Rom Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16:15). Olympia is an abbreviated form of Olympiadorus. The joining in one salutation of the Christians mentioned in ver 15 suggests that they formed by themselves a small community in the earliest Rom Church.

OLYMPIUS, LIMPIUS (Olympios): An epithet of Jupiter or Zeus (q.v.) from Mt. Olympus in Thessaly, where the gods held court presided over by Zeus. Antiocbus Ephipanes, "who on God's altars danced," insulted the Jewish religion by dedicating the temple of Zeus to Jupiter Olympius, 108 BC (2 Mac 6:2; 1 Mac 5:48)

OMAERUS, OMAA-TOUS: AV-RV "Isaureus" (1 Esd 9:34).

OMAR, OMAAR (OMAR, OMAAR, connected perhaps with 'amar, 'speak'; LXX Ἄμαρ, Ὄμνα, or Ὄμηρος, Ὅμηρος): Grandson of Esau and son of Eliphaz in Gen 36:11; 1 Ch 1:50; given the title "duke" or "chief" in Gen 36:15.

OMEGA, OMEGA (OME-GA, OME-GA, OME-GA): See Alpha and Omega.

OMENS, O'MEN. See AUGURY; DIVINATION.

OMER, O'MER (OMER, O'MER): A dry measure, the tenth of an ephah, equal to about 73 pints. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

OMNIPOTENCE, OMNI-POT'ENCE: The noun "omnipotence" is not found in the Eng. Bible, nor any noun exactly corresponding to it in the original Heb or Gr.

1. Terms and Usage

The adj. "omnipotent" occurs in Rev 19:6 AV; the Gr for this, παντοκράτωρ, παρθένος, occurs also in 2 Cor 4:18; Rev 1:10; 2:10; 14:19; 19:16; 21:22 (in all of which AV and RV render "omnipotent"). It is also found frequently in LXX, esp. in the rendering of the Divine names Jehovah (יְהוֹה), and (El Shaddai, שדָּדַי, "the name of authority," "sovereignty," "side by side with that of power," makes itself more distinctly felt than it does to the modern reader of "omnipotent," though it is means to be included in the latter also. Cf further δυνάμει, ὁ δυνατός, in Lk 1:46.

The formal concept of omnipotence was worked out in theology does not occur in the OT. The substance of the idea is conveyed in the

2. Inherent variety of indirect ways. The notion of "strength" is inherent in the OT concept of God from the beginning, being already represented in one of the two Divine names inherited by Israel from ancient Sem religion, the name "El. According to one etymology it is also inherent in the other, the name "Elohim", and in this case the pl. form, by bringing out the fullness of power in God, would mark an approach to the idea of omnipotence. See God, NAMES OF.

In the patriarchal religion the conception of "might" occupies a prominent place, as is indicated by the name characteristic of this period, "El Shaddai," of Gen 17:1; 28:3; 35:11; 43:14; 45:3; 49:24-25; Ex 3:13. This name, however, designates the Divine power as standing in the service of His covenant-relationship to the patriarchs, as transcending Nature and overpowering it in the interests of redemption.

Another Divine name which signifies this attribute is Jehovah El, Jehovah of Hosts. This name, characteristic of the prophetic period, describes God as the King surrounded and followed by the angelic hosts, and since the might of an omnipotent being is measured by the splendor of his repute, as of great, incomparable power, the King Omnipotent (Ps 24:10; Isa 2:12; 6:35; 8:13; Jer 46:18; Mal 1:11).

Still another name expressive of the same idea is Abinad. From Omnipotence compounded with Jacob or Israel (Gen 49:24; 32:33; 33:3; 45:5). Further, El Gabbah, "God-Hero" (Isa 9:6 of the Messianic period, Jer 20:8); and the figure of the designation of God as "Ref.," occurring esp. in the address to God in the Psalm (Ps 23:1). "Mighty One," "Most High," "Omnipotent" are the names with which the Divine nature operates. See also the name El Bes, "Living God," which God bears over against the ailments of man (Ex 15:25; Ps 22:16; Jer 23:36; Dn 6:20; 26). An anthropomorphic description of the power of God is in the figure of his "hand," "his arm," his "finger." See God.

Some of the attributes of Jeh have an intimate connection with omnipotence. Under this head esp. God's nature as Spirit and His holiness come under consideration.

3. Other Modes of Expression of God as Spirit in the OT does not primarily refer to the incorporeality of the Divine nature, but to its inherent power. The physical element underlying the conception of Spirit is that of air in music. The Hebrew word at first not its visibility, but the force forms the point of comparison. The opposite of "Spirit" in this sense is "flesh," which expresses the weakness and impotence of the creature over against God (Isa 2:22; 31:3).

The holiness of God in its essence is the widest sense of restriction to the ethical sphere, designates the most specific, distinctive character of the Holy One, that which each other kind of holiness may be compared to. It is not a single attribute, but a peculiar aspect under which all the attributes can be viewed, that which renders the holy God to be distinct from all created beings. Hence the creation (1 S 2:2; Hos 11:9). In this way holiness becomes closely associated with the power of God, for the power of God is seen in the holiness of his people, and in the holiness of his name becomes synonymous with Divine power—omnipotence (Ex 16:11; Nu 20:12), and esp. in Exk, where God's "holy name" is often equivalent to his renown for power, hence interchangeable with his "great name" (Exk 36:20-24). The objective Spirit as a distinct hypostasis and the executive of the Godhead on its one side also represents the Divine power (Isa 32:15; Mk 14:28; Lk 1:36; Jn 4:14; Acts 10:38; Rom 15:10; 1 Cor 2:4).

In all these forms of expression a great and specifically Divine power is predicated of God. State-ments like Ps 46:5, "The Lord is in his holy temple. He is the King above all the gods. Who may stand in the presence of his face?" It is to him alone (Ps 50:6) that may be said, "The heavens are his throne, and the earth his footstool. Who will stand when he passes by? For he is like a fire that devours all things. His name is holy. His power is great."

4. Unlimited Extent affirmed are rare. The reason, however, lies not in any actual restriction placed on this power, but in the conception of a specific religious thing, which prevents abstract formulation of the principle. The point to be noticed is that no statement anywhere makes any exception aught from the reach of Divine power. Nearest to a general formula come such statements as nothing is "too hard for Jehovah" (Gen 18:14; Jer 32:17); or "I know that thou canst do everything," or "God . . . hath done whatever he pleased" (Ps 115:3; 136:6); or, negatively, no one can "hide" God's affairs in which the power of God is concerned (Ps 138:13) or God's hand is not "waxed short" (Nu 21:23); in the NT: "With God all things are possible" (Mt 19:26; Mk 10:27; Lk 18:27); "Nothing is impossible with God" (Rev 3:20) . "No word from God shall be void of power," (Lk 1:37). Indirectly omnipotence is the effect ascribed to faith (Mt 17:20; "Nothing shall be impossible unto you"); Mk 9:23; "All things are possible to him that believeth"), because faith puts the Divine power at the disposal of the believer. On its subject side, the principle is reciprocated and faith finds expression in Isa 40:28: God is not subject to weariness. Because God is conscious of the unlimited extent of his resources nothing is marvelous in his eyes (Zec 8:6).

It is chiefly through its forms of manifestation that the distinctive quality of the Divine power, which renders it omnipotent becomes

5. Forms of apparent. The Divine power operates not merely in single concrete acts, but is comprehensively manifested to the world by power. Both in Nature and history, in creation and in redemption, it produces and directs everything that comes to pass. Nothing in the realm of actual or conceivable things is withdrawn from it (Am 9:23; Dn 4:35); even to the minutest and most negligible causes and effect it extends and masters all details of reality (Mt 10:30; Lk 12:7). There is no accident (I S 6:9; cf. with ver 12; Prov 16:33). It need not operate through second causes; it itself underlies all second causes and makes what they are.

It is creative power producing its effects through a mere word (Gen 1:3 f.; Dt 8:3; Ps 33:9; Rom 4:17; He 1:3; 11:30). Among the prophets, esp. Isaiah emphasizes this manner of the working of the Divine power in its immediacy and suddenness (Isa 9:8; 17:13; 18:1-4; 29:5). All the processes of God's sovereign will are presented as the castration of Jeh (Job 5:9 f.; 9:5 f.; chs 38 and 41), the operation of Jehovah as the one "living God" (Isa 40:12 f.; Ps 22:16; 43:5; 5 S 27; Jer 23:36; Dn 6:20). A comprehensible instance is the creation of heaven and earth (Gen 1:1-2:4), whether the heaven is named as of illustrative this (Ps 65:7; 104:9; Isa 52:2; Jer 2:32; 33:5). The OT seldom says "it rains" (Ezr 4:7), but "the rain of the Lord." (Lev 26:4; Dt 11:17; 1 S 12:17; Job 36:27; Ps 29:29 and 65:5; Acts 14:7; Mal 4:7). The same is true of the processes of history. God sovereignly disperses, not merely of Israel, but of all other nations, even of the most powerful, e.g., the Assyrians, as His instruments for the accomplishment of His purpose (Am 1:1-3; 9:7; Isa 10:5.15; 28:2; 46:1; Jer 26:9; 27:6; 43:10).

The prophet ascribed to Jeh not merely relatively greater power than to the gods of the nations, but His power extends into the sphere of the nations, and the heathen gods are ignorant in the estimate put upon His might (Isa 31:3).

More even than the sphere of Nature and history, that of redemption reveals the Divine omnipotence, from the point of view of the supernatural and miraculous. Thus Ex 15 celebrates the power of Jehovah in the wonders of the exodus. It is God's exclusive prerogative to do wonders (Job 5:9; 9:10; Ps 72:18). All things come under the category of a "new thing" (Nu 16:30; Isa 43:19; Jer 31:22). In the NT the great emblem of this redemptive omnipotence is the resurrection of believers (Mt 22:29; Mk 12:24) and specifically the resurrection of Christ (Col 3:1; 1 Thes 4:16; 1 Cor 15:19 f.); but it is evidenced in the whole process of redemption (Mt 19:26; Mk 10:27; Rom 8:31; Eph 1:3; 1 Pet 1:5; Rev 11:17).

The signification of the idea may be traced among two distinct lines. On the one hand the Divine omnipotence appears as a support of faith. On the other hand it is productive of that specifically religious Biblical Religion state of consciousness which Scripture calls "the fear of Jehovah." Omnipotence in God is that to which human faith addresses itself. It lies in the ground for assurance that He is able to save, as in His love that He is willing to save (Ps 65:5; 78:18; 118:14-16; Eph 3:20).

As to the other aspect of its significance, the Divine omnipotence in itself, and not merely for soteriological reasons, evokes a specific religious response. This is true, not only of the OT, where the element of the fear of God stands comparatively in the foreground, but remains true also of the NT. Even in our Lord's teaching the promissive given to the fatherhood and love of God does not preclude that the transcendent majesty of the Divine nature, including omnipotence, is kept in full view and made a potent factor in the cultivation of the religious mind (Mt 6:1). The beauty of Jesus' teaching on the nature of God consists in this, that He knows all things, in every place and at every time, and His loving condescension toward the creature in perfect equilibrium and makes them mutually frustrated by each other. Religion is more than the inclusion of God in the general altruistic movement of the human mind; it is a devotion at every point colored by the consciousness of that Divine omnipresence in which God's omnipresence occupies a foremost place.

GEBHARD VON

OMNIPRESENCE, om-ni-pres'en-s: Neither the noun 'omnipresence' nor adj. 'omnipresent' occurs in Scripture, but the idea that God is everywhere present is throughout presupposed and sometimes explicitly formulated. God's omnipresence is closely related to His omnipotence and omniscience: that He is everywhere enables Him to act everywhere and to know all things, and, conversely, through omnipotent action and omniscient knowledge He has access to all places and all things (cf. Acts 17:27; 2 Tim 3:15; Ps 3; 49; 100; 115; Ps 20; 26; 8; 46; 3; Isa 8:18; Joel 3:16,21; Am 1:21; in the Holy Land 1:28; Hosea 9:3; in Christ John 11:1,12; 2 Cor 1:19; the Church Eph 2:20; Rom 8:11; 1 Cor 3:16; 6:19; Eph 2:21-22; 1:11; 2 Tim 3:15; Heb 10:21; 1 Pet 5:1); in the ecclesiastical assembly of His people (Rev 21:3). In the light of the same principle must be interpreted the presence of God in heaven. This also is manifestly an ontological presence, but, as a presence of specific democratic manifestation (1 K 8:10; 20:18); 2 Sam 6:12; 13ff.; 104b; 111; 18:15; 66:1; Hab 2:13; Nm 3:34; 6:9; Acts 7:45; 18:21; Eph 1:1; Heb 1:3). How little the word 'presence' is meant to imply a literal or terrestrial presence of God elsewhere may be seen from the fact that the two representations, that of God's self-manifestation in heaven and in the partial sanctuary, and that of God's self-manifestation on earth (1 K 8:26-53; Ps 20:2-6; Am 9:6). It has been alleged that the term 'presence' had a comparatively late attainment in the religion of Israel, of which in the pre-prophetic period no trace can as yet be discovered (see Stade, Bibl. Theol. des AT, 1:103, 184). There are, however, a number of passages in the Pentateuch which refer to the existence of this belief (Gen 11:1-9; 19:24; 21:17; 22:11; 25:12). JeB comes, according to this belief of the earliest period, with the clouds (Ex 14:19; 20:18; Nu 11:24-25). That even in the opinion of the people JeB's local presence in an earthly sanctuary need not have excluded Him from heaven follows also from the unhesitating belief in His simultaneous presence in a plurality of sanctuaries. This was not a question of a comparatively circumscribed presence as between sanctuary and sanctuary, it needed to have been a presence as between earth and heaven (cf. Gunsol, Gen. 157).

Both from a generally religious and from a specifically soteriological point of view the omnipresence of God is of great practical importance. 6. Religious for the religious life. In the former significance it means the guaranty that the actual nearness of a person of communion with Him may be enjoyed everywhere, even apart from the places hallowed for such purpose by a specific gracious self-manifestation (Ps 139:5-10). In the other respect the Divine omnipresence assures the believer that God is at hand.
OMNISCIENCE, om-nish·e·ns: The term does not occur in Scripture, either in its nominal or in its adjectival form.

In the OT it is expressed in connection with such words as ἔφη, de·ia·ē, ἡ·με·ρ·ē, θη·κα·θ, etc. hok·hm·ah; also "seeing" and "hearing." "the eye" and "the ear" occur as figures of knowledge of God, as "arm," "hand," "finger" to serve his power. In the NT are found ἴδ·ει·ν, γνή·δο·κεί·ν, γνώ·蕊·τα, εἰπ·εί·ν, ὁ·π divides.

Scripture everywhere teaches the absolute universality of the Divine knowledge. In the historical books, although there is no abstract formula, and occasional allusions to the omniscience of the doings of man, about the hearing of prayer, the disclosing of the future (1 S 16 7; 23 9-12; 1 K 8 39; 2 Ch 16 9). Explicit affirmation of the principle is made in the Psalter, the Prophets, the bookmahah literature, and in the NT. This is due to the increased internalizing of reality, by which its hidden side, to which the Divine omniscience corresponds, receives greater emphasis (Job 26 6; 28 24; 34 22; Ps 139 12; 147 4; Prov 16 31; 1 S 15; Isa 40 18; Acts 1 24; Rev 4 11; 12 2). This absolute universality is affirmed with reference to the various categories that comprise within themselves all that is possible or actual.

It extends to God's own being, to all as well as to what exists outside of Him, in the created world. God has perfect possession in consciousness of His own being. The unconscious finds no place in Him (Acts 15 18; 1 Jn 1 5). Next to Himself God knows nothing of its totality. His knowledge extends to small as well as to great affairs (Mt 6 8.32; 10 30); to the hidden heart and mind of man as well as to that which is open and manifest (Job 11 11; Ps 14 21; 17 6f; 33 13-15; 40 4; 51 5; Jer 17 10; Am 4 13; Lk 16 15; Acts 1 24; 1 Thess 2 4; Heb 4 13; Rev 2 23). It extends to all the divisions of time, the past, present and future alike (Job 14 17; Ps 68 15; Isa 41 22-24; 44 6-8; Jer 1 5; Hos 13 12; Mal 3 16). It embraces that which is contingent from the human viewpoint as well as that which is certain (1 S 23 9-12; Mt 11 22.23).

Scripture brings God's knowledge into connection with His omnipresence, and the clearest expression of this. Omniscience is the knowledge of that which is to be actual, is not identical with such knowledge or with the purpose on which such knowledge rests, for in God, as well as in man, the intellect and the will are distinct faculties. In the last analysis, God's knowledge of the world has its source in His self-knowledge. The world is a revelation of God that is actual or possible in it therefore is a reflection in created form of what exists uncreated in God, and thus the knowledge of the one becomes a reproduction of the knowledge of the other (Acts 17 27; Rom 1 20).

The Divine knowledge of the world also partakes of the quality of the Divine self-knowledge in that respect, that it is never dormant. God does not depend for embracing the multitude and complexity of the existing world on such mental processes as abstraction and generalization.

The Bible nowhere represents Him as attaining to knowledge by reasoning, but everywhere as simply knowing. From what has been said about the immanent sources of the Divine knowledge, it follows that the latter is not a posteriori derived from its objects, as all human knowledge based on experience is, but is exercised without receptivity or dependence. In knowing, as well as in all other activities of His nature, God is sovereign and self-sufficient. The act of knowing is not a process of He needs not wait upon the things, but draws His knowledge directly from the basis of reality as it lies in Himself. While the two are thus closely connected it is nevertheless of importance to distinguish between God's knowledge of Himself and God's knowledge of the world, and also between His knowledge of the actual and His knowledge of the possible. These distinctions mark off the theistic conception of omniscience from the pantheistic idea regarding God. God is not bound to His life with the world in such a sense as to have no scope of activity beyond it.

Since Scripture includes in the objects of the Divine knowledge also the issue of the exercise of freewill on the part of man, the problem arises, how the contingent character of such decisions and the certainty of the Divine knowledge can coexist. It is true that the knowledge of God is perfect and the possibility and actuality are distinct, and that not the former but the latter determines the certainty of the outcome. Consequently the Divine omniscience in such cases adds or detracts nothing in regard to the certainty of the Divine purpose (Isa 44 6; Isa 51 15). It is impossible for God to produce but presupposes the certainty by which the problem is raised. At the same time, precisely because omniscience presupposes certainty, it appears to exclude every conception of contingency in the free acts of man, such as would render the latter in their very essence undetermined. The knowledge of the issue must have a fixed point of certainty to terminate upon, if it is to be knowledge at all. These who make the essence of freedom an absolute index of the purpose must, therefore, except in this class of events from the scope of the Divine omniscience. But this is contrary to all the testimony of Scripture, which distinctly makes God's absolute knowledge extend to such acts (Acts 2 23).

It has been attempted to construe a peculiar form of the Divine knowledge, which would relate to this class of acts specifically, the so-called scientia media, to be distinguished from the scientia necessaria, which has for its object God Himself, and the scientia libera which terminates upon the certainties of the world, outside of God's absolute knowledge.

This scientia media would then be based on God's foresight of the outcome of the free choice of man. It would involve a knowledge of receptivity, a contribution to the sum total of what God knows derived from observation on His part of the world-process. That is to say, it would be knowledge a posteriori in essence, although not in point of fact. It is, however, difficult to see how divine knowledge can be possible in God, when the outcome is psychologically undetermined and indeterminate. The knowledge could originate no sooner than the determination originates through the free decision of man. It would, therefore, necessarily become an a posteriori knowledge in time as well as in essence. The appeal to God's eternity as bringing Him equally near to the future as to the present and enabling Him to see the future decisions of man's free will as though they were present cannot remove this difficulty, for when once the observation and knowledge of God are made dependent on any temporal issue, the Divine eternity itself is thereby virtually denied. Nothing remains but to recognize that God's eternal knowledge of the outcome of the free will choices of man implies that there enters into these choices, notwithstanding their free character, an element of predetermination, to which the knowledge of God can attach itself.

The Divine omniscience is most important for the religious life. The very essence of religion as communion with God depends on His 6. Religious all-comprehensive cognizance of the Importance of man at every moment. Hence it is characteristic of the religions to deny the omniscience of God (Ps 10 11.12; 94 7–9; Isa 29 15; Jer 23 23; Ezk 8 12; 9 9). Esp. among the three lines this fundamental religious importance reveals itself: (a) it lends support and comfort when the pious suffer from the misunderstanding and misrepresentation of men; (b) it acts as a deterrent to those tempted by sin, esp. secret sin, and becomes a judging principle to all hypocrisy and false security; (c) it furnishes the source from which man's desire for self-knowledge can obtain satisfaction (Ps 19 12; 51 6; 139 23.24).

GEERHARDUS VOS

OMRI, omri ("Omri", Omri; LXX "Aµpµ; Ambrí; Assyř "Humri" and "Humria"):

1. The 6th king of Northern Israel, and founder of the 11th Dynasty which reigned for nearly 50 years. Omri reigned 12 years, c 857–876 BC. The historical sources of his reign are contained in 1 K 16:16–29; 2 K 9:1–11; 2 Chr 16:1. Vos, A. S. Assyriological, Assyria, and its Dependencies, in the published accounts of recent excavations in Samaria. In spite of the brief passage given to Omri in the OT, he was one of the most important of the military kings of Northern Israel.

O. is first mention as an officer in the army of Elah, which was engaged in the siege of the Philii town of Gibbethon. While O. was thus engaged, Zimri, another officer of Elah's army, conspired against the king, whom he assassinated in a drunken debauch, exterminating at the same time the remnant of the house of Baasha. The conspiracy evidently lacked the support of the people, for the report that Zimri had usurped the throne no sooner reached the army at Gibbethon, than the people proclaimed O., the more powerful military leader, king over Israel. O. lost not a moment, but leaving Gibbethon in the hands of the Philis, he marched to Tirzah, which he besieged and captured, while Zimri perished in the flames of the palace to which he had set fire with his own hands (1 K 16:1–18). O., however, had still another opponent in Tibni the son of Ginath, who laid claim to the throne, and who was supported in his claims by his brother Joram (1 K 16:22 LXX) and by a large number of the people. Civil war followed this rivalry for the throne, which seems to have lasted for a period of 29 years. It is, however, difficult to date accurately how many years elapsed, because we have only the Biblical record as a basis for our observations. By an easy conquest of Tirzah, the former capital. Accordingly, he purchased the hill Shomeron of Shemer for two talents of silver, about $3,500.00 in American money. The conical hill, which rose from the surrounding plain to the height of 400 ft., and on the top of which there was room for a large city, was capable of easy defense.

The superior strategic importance of Samaria is evidenced by the sieges it endured repeatedly by the Assyrians and Babylonians.

2. The palace was finally taken by Sargon in 722.

Founding of Samaria That the Northern Kingdom endured as long as it did was due largely to the strength of its capital. With the fall of Samaria, the nation fell.

Palace of Omri and Abab at Samaria.

Recent excavations in Samaria under the direction of Harvard University throw new light upon the ancient capital of Israel. The first results were the uncovering of massive foundation walls of a large building, including a stairway 80 ft. wide. This building, which is Rom in architecture, is supposed to have been a temple, the work of Herod. Under this Rom building was recovered a part of a massive Heb structure, believed to be the palace of O. and Abab. During the year 1910 the explorations revealed a building covering 14 acres of ground. Four periods of construction were recognized, which, on archaeological grounds, were tentatively assigned to the reigns of O., Ahab, Jehu, and Joash. See Samaria and articles by David G. Lyon in Harvard Theological Review, IV, 1911; JBL, V, xxx, Part I, 1911; PEPIS, 1911, 79–83.

Concerning O.'s foreign policy the OT is silent beyond a single hint contained in 1 K 20:34.

Here we learn that he had to bow before the stronger power of Syria. It is probable that Ben-hadad 1 besieged Samaria shortly after it was built, for he forced O. to make "streets" in the city for the Syrians. It is probable, too, that at this time Ramoth-gilead was lost to the Syrians. Evidently O. was weakened in his foreign policy at the beginning of his reign by the civil conflict engendered by his accession. However, he showed strength of character in his dealings with foreign powers. At least he regained control over the northern part of his territory as we learn from the M S. Lines 4–8 tell us that "Omri was king of Israel and afflicted Moab many days because Chemosh was angry with his land; . . . Omri obtained possession of the land of Medebah and dwelt therein during his days and half the days of his son, forty years." O. was the first king of Israel to pay tribute to the Assyrians under their king Asurnasirpal III.
in 876 BC. From the days of Shalmaneser II (860 BC) down to the time of Sargon (722 BC), Northern Israel was known to the Assyrians as "the land of the house of Omri." On Shalmaneser's black obelisk, Jehu, who overthrew the dynasty of O., is called "J'ba aabat 'huwmri," "Jehu son of Omri.", by the marriage of his son Ahaz to Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Sidonians. This may have been done as protection against the powers from the East, and as such would have seemed to be a wise political move, but it was one fraught with evil for Israel.

Although O. laid the foundation of a strong kingdom, he failed to impart to it the vitalizing and rejuvenating force of a healthy spiritual religion. The testimony of and Death coupled with the reference to "the statutes of Omri" in Mic 6 16, indicates that he may have had a share in substituting foreign religions for the worship of Jehovah, and therefore, he may have had a part in the downfall of the house of Omri. Upon his death, O. was succeeded upon the throne by his son Ahab, to whom was left the task of shaking off the Syrian yoke, and who went beyond his father in making the Phoenican influence more prevalent in Israel, thus leading the nation into the paths that hastened its downfall.

(2) A Benjamite, son of Becher (1 Ch 7 8).
(3) A Judahite, descendant of Perez, who lived at Jerus (1 Ch 9 4).
(4) A prince of Issachar in the time of David (1 Ch 27 18).

On, on (Tn, 'on; Egy. An, 'Ant, 'Annâ, probably pronounced Ân only, as this is often all that is written, a "stone" or "stone pillars"); Later called Heliopolis. The name On occurs only in Gen 41 45; 46 20. It occurs in one other place in Ex X (Ex X 11), where On is mentioned with Pithom and Raamses as strong cities which the Israelites built. Heb slaves may have worked upon fortifications here, but certainly did not build the city. On is possibly referred to as ышXJ, in Isa 19 18 (see R-TH-HEBRAICS). On may also be mentioned by Jeremiah (43 13) under the name Beth-shemesh. Ezekiel speaks of an Ave (ышXJ, 'âven) (Ezk 30 17), where it is mentioned with Besebas (Bubastis). Avein this passage is almost certainly the same as On in Gen 41 45; 46 20, as the letters of both words are the same in the Heb. Only the placing of the vowel-points makes any difference. If there is a mistake, it is a mistake of the Massoretes, not of the Heb writer.

There were two Ons in Egypt: one in Upper Egypt, An-resh (Herresh); the other in Lower Egypt, An-Mcheet (Brugsch, Geogr. Egypt, AN-CHET). The latter is the On referred to in the Bible. It lay about 20 miles N. of the site of old Memphis, about 10 miles N.W. of the location of modern Cairo. It has left until this time about 4 sq. miles of ruins within the old walls. Little or nothing remains outside the walls.

On was built at the edge of the desert, which has now retroflected some 3 or 4 miles eastward, the result of the rising of the bed of the Nile by sediment from the inundation, and the broadening of the area of infiltration which now carries the water of the Nile that much to the E. The land around On has risen about 10 ft., and the waters of infiltration at the time of lowest Nile are now about 1½ ft. above the floor-level of the temple.

The history of On is very obscure, yet its very great importance is in no doubt. No clear description of the ancient city or sanctuary has come down to us, but there are so many incidental references, and so much is implied in ancient records, that it stands out as of the very first importance, both as capital and sanctuary. The city comes from the 1st Dynasty, when it was the seat of government, and indeed must have been founded by the 1st Dynasty or have come down to it from prehistoric time. From the 11th to the 8th Dynasty the seat of government was shifted from On to Memphis, and in the XIIth Dynasty to Dendopolis. Throughout these changes On retained its religious importance. It had been the great sanctuary in the time of the Pyramid Texts, the oldest religious texts of Egypt, and judging from the evident great development of the temple of On at the time of the writing of the texts, the city must have anticipated them by considerable time (Budge, Hist of Egypt, II, 83, 84, 108; Breasted, Development of Religion and Thought in Egypt, chs i, ii). The myth of Osiris makes even the charge against Set for the murder of Osiris to have been preferred at Heliopolis (Breasted, op. cit., 34). This certainly implies a very great age for the sanctuary at On. It contained a temple of the sun under the name Ra, the sun, and also Atum, the setting sun, or the sun of the Underworld. There was also a Phoenix Hall and a sacred object called a ben, probably a stone, and the origin of the name An, a "stone" or "pillar" (cf Breasted, op. cit., 76, 11, and 71). Though the XIIth Dynasty removed the capital to Dendopolis, Usertsen I (Sneferu) of that Dynasty erected a great obelisk at On in front of the entrance to the temple. The situation of this obelisk in the temple area indicates that the great temple was already more than a half-mile in length as early as the XIIth Dynasty. The mate of this obelisk on the opposite side of the entrance seems not to have been erected until the XVIIIth Dynasty. Its foundations were discovered in 1912 by Petrie. Some scraps of the granite of the obelisk bear inscriptions of Thothmes III. A great Hyksos wall, also discovered by Petrie in 1912, exactly similar to that of the fortified camp at Tel el Yehudiyeh, 4 miles N., makes it quite certain that these usurpers between the Old Empire and the New fortified On as the capital once more. The manifest suberviency of the priests of On in the story of Joseph makes it most probable that the old capital at On had already been subjugated in Joseph's time, and that within this old fortification still existing Joseph ruled as prime minister of Egypt. Merenptah in his 5th year began to fortify On. Sheshonk III called himself "divine prince of Annu," and seems to have made On one of the greatest sanctuaries of his long reign. On still figured in Egypt history in the rebellion against Ashurbanipal. The city has been deserted since the Pers invasion of 525 BC. Tradition makes the dwelling-place of Joseph and Mary with the child Jesus, while in Egypt, to have been near Heliopolis.

The exploration of On was attempted by Schiaparelli, but was not carried out, and his work has not been published. In 1912 Petrie began a systematic work of excavation which, it is expected, will continue until the whole city has been examined. The only great discovery of the first season was the Hyksos wall of fortification. Its full import can only be determined by the continuance of the exploration.

ON (חנ, ḥn; Αν, Ανώ): A Reubenite, son of Peleth, who took part with Dathan and Abiram in their revolt against Moses (Nu 16 1).

ONAM, 6 nam (חנ, ḥnam, "vigorous"); cf ONAN:

1. "Son" of Shobal "son" of Seir the Horite (Gen 36 23; 1 Ch 1 40).

2. "Son" of Jerahmeel by Atarah; perhaps the name is connected with Onan son of Judah (1 Ch 2 26 28).

ONAN, 6 nam (חנ, ḥnam, "vigorous"); cf ONAN: A "son" of Judah (Gen 38 4 8-10; 46 12; Nu 26 19; 1 Ch 2 3). The story of the untimely death of Onan implies that two of the ancient clans of Judah early disappeared" (Curtis, Chron, 84). See Skinner, Gen 45, where it is pointed out that in Gen 38 11 Judah plainly attributes the death of his sons in some way to Tamar herself. The name is allied to Onam.

ONESIMUS, ὁ νεισιμος (Oνησιμος, Onesimos, lit. "profitable", "helpful" [Col 4 9; Phil. ver 10]): Onesimus was a slave (Phil. ver 16).

1. With belonging to Philemon who was a Paul in wealthy citizen of Colossae, and a prominent member of the church there. O. was still a heathen when he defrauded his master and ran off from Colossae. He found his way to Rome, where evil men tended to flock as to a common center, as Tacitus tells us they did at that period. In Rome he came into contact with Paul, who was then in his own hired house, in military custody, dying.

What brought him into contact with Paul we do not know. It may have been hunger; it may have been the pangs of conscience. He could not forget that his master was the name where the Christians met in their weekly assemblies for the worship of Christ. Neither could he forget how Philemon had many a time spoken of Paul, to whom he owed his conversion. Now that O. was in Rome—what a strange coincidence—Paul also was in Rome.

The result of their meeting was that O. was converted to Christ, through the instrumentality of the apostle, and he was at once delivered to his master ("Gave place to me in your heart," Phil. ver 10). His services had been very acceptable to Paul, who would gladly have kept O. with him; but as he could not do this without the knowledge and consent of Philemon, he sent O. back to Colossae to his master there.

At the same time Paul wrote Jesus to Philemon on other matters, and he intrusted the Ep. to the Col to the joint care of 2. Paul's Tychicus and O. The apostle recom- mends O. to the brethren in Colossae, Colossae as a "faithful and beloved brother, and to whose one is of you," and he goes on to Philemon to say that Tychicus and O. will make known to them all things that have happened to Paul in Rome. Such a commendation would greatly facilitate O.'s return to Colossae.

But Paul does more. He furnishes O. with a letter written by himself to Philemon. Returning to a city where it was well known that he had been neither a Christian nor even an honest man, he needed someone to vouch for the reality of the change which had taken place in his life, and Paul does this for him both in the Ep. to the Col and in that to Philemon.

With what exquisite delicacy is O. introduced. "Receive him," says the apostle, "for he is my own very heart" (Phil. ver 12). The man whom the Colossians had only known hitherto, if they knew him at all, as a worthless runaway slave, is thus commended to them, as no more a slave but a brother, no more dishonest and faithless but trustworthy; no more an object of contempt but of "love" (Lightfoot's Comm. on Col, 335).

(1) Onesimus profitable.—The apostle accordingly begs Philemon to give O. the same reception as he would rejoice to give to himself. The past history of O. had been such as to belittle the meaning of his name. He had not been "profitable"—far from it. But already his consistent conduct in Rome and his willing service to Paul there have changed all that; he has been profitable to Paul, and he will be profitable to Philemon too.

(2) Paul guarantees.—O. had evidently stolen his master's goods before leaving Colossae, but in regard to this the apostle says that if he has defrauded Philemon in anything, he has become his surety. Philemon can regard Paul's handwriting as a bond guaranteeing payment: "Put that to mine account," are his words, "I will repay it." Had Philemon not been a Christian, and had Paul not written this most beautiful letter, O. might well have been afraid to return. In the Roman empire slaves were constantly crucified for smaller offences than those of which he had been guilty. A thief and a runaway had nothing but torture or death to expect.

(3) The change which Christ makes.—But now under the sway of Christ all is changed. The master who has been defrauded now owns allegiance to Jesus. The letter, which is delivered to him by his slave, is written by a bound "prisoner of Jesus Christ." The slave too is now a brother in Christ, beloved by Paul: surely he will be beloved by Philemon also. Then Paul intimates that he hopes soon to be set free, and then he will come and visit them in Colossae. Will Philemon receive him into his house as his guest?

(4) The result.—It cannot be imagined that this appeal in behalf of O. was in vain. Philemon would do more than Paul asked; and on the apostle's visit to Colossae he would find the warmest welcome, both from Philemon and from Onesimus.

ONESIPHORUS, δ'ησ'ήφος ('Ονησιφόρος, Onēsipōros, lit. "profit bringer" [2 Tim 1:6; 5:19]): Onesiphorus was a friend of the apostle Paul, who mentions him twice when writing to Timothy. He was the former of the two passages where his name occurs, his conduct is contrasted with that of Phygellus and Hermogenes and others—all of whom, like O. himself, were of the province of Asia—from whom Paul might well have expected to receive sympathy and help. These persons had “turned away” from him. O. acted in a different way, for “he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain; but, when he was in Rome, he sought me diligently, and found me.”

O. was one of the Christians of the church in Ephesus; and the second passage, where his name is found, merely sends a message of greeting from Paul, which Timothy in Ephesus is requested to deliver to “the household of O.” (AV).

O. then had come from Ephesus to Rome. It was to Paul that the church at Ephesus owed its origin, and it was to him therefore that Rome O. gratefully remembered these facts. But Paul in his arrival arrived in Rome, and learned that Paul was in prison, “he very diligently” sought for the apostle. But to do this, though it was only his duty, involved much personal danger at that particular time. For the persecution, inaugurated by Nero against the Christians, had raged bitterly; its fury was not yet abated, and this made the profession of the Christian name a matter which involved very great risk of persecution and of death.

Paul was not the man to think lightly of what his Ephesian friend had done. He remembered too, “in how many things he ministered at Ephesus.” And, writing to Timothy, he reminded him that O.’s kindly ministrations at Ephesus were already well known to him, from his residence in Ephesus, and from his position, as minister of the church there. It should be observed that the ministration of O. at Ephesus was not, as AV gives it, “to me,” that is, to Paul himself. “To me” is omitted in RV. What O. had done there was a wide Christian ministration of kindness; it embraced many things which were too well known—for such is the force of the word—to Timothy to require repetition.

The visits which O. paid to Paul in his Roman prison were intensely “refreshing.” And it was not once or twice that he thus visited the chained prisoner, but he did so oftentimes.

Though O. had come to Rome, his household had remained in Ephesus; and a last salutation is sent to them by Paul. He could not write again, as he was nowready to be offered, to the Lord in that day. It is not clear whether O. was living, or whether he had died, before Paul wrote this ep. Different opinions have been held on the subject.

The way in which Paul refers twice to “the household” (RV “house”) of Onesiphorus, makes it possible that O. himself had died. If this is so—but certainty is impossible—the apostle’s words in regard to him would be a pious wish, which has nothing in common with the abuses which have gathered round the subject of prayers for the dead, a practice which has no foundation in Scripture.

ONIARES, δ’ηναρές, δ’ηναρέα: 1 Mac 12:19 AV = RV Areus (Q.v.).

ONIAS, δ’ηνας (Onias, Oinas): There were 3 high priests of the name of Onias, and a 4th Onias who did not become a high priest but was known as the builder of the temple of Leontopolis (Jos, Ant, XIII, iii, 5). Only two versions of the name are mentioned in the Apoc—Onias I and Onias III.

(1) Onias I, according to Jos (Ant, XI, viii, 7), the son of Jaddua and father of Simon the Just (ib, XII, ii, 5; Sir 50), and, according to 1 Mac 12 7-20, a contemporary of Areus (Arius), king of Sparta, who reigned 309-265 BC (Diod. xx.29). This Onias was the recipient of a friendly letter from Areus of Sparta (1 Mac 12 7; see MSS readings here, and 12 20). Jos (Ant, XII, iv, 10) represents this letter as written to Onias III, which is an error, for only two Areus are known, and Areus II reigned about 255 BC and died a child of 8 years (Paus. iii.6.6). The letter—it genuine—exists in two copies (Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 10, and 1 Mac 12 20 f) (see Schürer, History of the Jewish People, 4th ed., I, 182 and 237).

(2) Onias III, son of Simon II (Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 10), whom he succeeded, and a contemporary of Seleucus IV and Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 1:1-4 7). O. was the son of Onias II. He had been sent to Rome for his godliness and zeal for the law, yet was on such friendly terms with the Seleucids that Seleucus IV Philopator defrayed the cost of the “services of the sacrifices.” He quarreled with Simon the Benjamite, guardian of the temple, about the temple buildings (Greek edifice). Being unable to get the better of Onias and thirsting for revenge, Simon went to Apollonius, governor of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia, and informed him of the “untold sums of money” lodged in the treasury of the temple. The governor told the king, and Seleucus dispatched his chancellor, Heliodorus, to remove the money. Onias remonstrated in vain, pleading for the “deposits of widows and orphans.” Heliodorus persisted in the object of his mission. The high priest and the people were in the greatest distress. But when Heliodorus had already entered the temple, “the Sovereign of spirits, and of all authority caused a great apparition,” a horse with a terrible rider accompanied by two strong men who scourged and wounded Heliodorus. At the intercession of Onias, his life was spared. Heliodorus advised the king to send on the same errand any enemy or conspirator whom he wished punished. Simon then slandered Onias, and the jealousy having caused bloodshed between their followers, Onias decided to repair in person to the king to intercede for his country. Apparently before a decision was given, Seleucus was assassinated and Epiphanes succeeded (175 BC). Jason, the brother of Onias, having offered the king larger revenues, secured the priesthood, which he held until he himself was similarly supplanted by Menelaus, Simon’s brother (2 Mac 4:23; Jos, Ant, XII, v, 1, says Jason’s brother). Menelaus, having stolen golden vessels belonging to the temple to meet his promises made to the king, was sharply reproved by Onias. Menelaus took revenge by persecuting Andronicus, the king’s deputy, to entice Onias by false promises of friendship from his sanctuary at Duphne and by treacherously slaying him—an act which caused indignation among both the Jews and the Greeks (2 Mac 4 34 ff). Jos (Ant, XII, v, 1) says that “on the death of Onias the high priest, Antiochus gave the high-priesthood to his brother Jesus [Jason],” but the account of 2 Mac given un-yun ('οινά, b'q'ditan, kró'menos), one of the delicacies of Egypt for which the children of Israel pined in the wilderness (Nu 11 5). The onion, allium cepa (N.O. Liliaceae), is known of Him only consciously cultivated all over Syria and Egypt; it appears to be as much a favorite in the Orient today as ever.

ONLY BEGOTTEN, ὃνλίᾳ βεγητὸν (μονογενῆς, monogenēs). Although the Eng. words are found only in the NT, the Gr word appears 9 times, and often in the LXX. It is used literally of an only child: "the only son of his mother" (Lk 7 12); "an only daughter" (8 42); "one only child" (9 38); "Isaac . . . his only begotten" (He 11 17). In all other places in the NT it refers to Jesus Christ as "the only begotten Son of God" (Jn 1 14 18; 3 16 18; 1 Jn 4 9). In these passages, too, it might be tē as "the only son of God"; for the emphasis seems to be on His uniqueness, rather than on His sonship, though both ideas are certainly present. He is the son of God in a sense in which no others are. "Monogenēs describes the absolutely unique relation of the Son to the Father in His Divine nature; it describes the relation of the Risen Christ in His glorified humanity to man" (Westcott in Heb 1 6). Christ's uniqueness as it appears in the above passages consists of two things: (a) He reveals the Father: "No man hath seen God at any time; but the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him" (Jn 1 18). Men therefore behold His glory, "glory of the only begotten from the Father" (1 14). (b) He is the mediator of salvation: God hath sent His only begotten Son into the world that we might live through him" (1 Jn 4 9; Jn 3 16); "He that believeth not [on him] hath been judged already" (Jn 3 18). Other elements in His uniqueness may be gathered from other passages, as His sinlessness, His authority to forgive sins, His unconquered companionship with the Father, and His unique knowledge of Him. To say that it is a uniqueness of nature or essence carries thought no farther, for these terms still need definition, and they can be defined only in terms of Him; His sonship is therefore a revelation of God, and esp. of His intimate union as Son with the Father (see also Begotten; Person of Christ; Son of God).

The reading "God only begotten" in Jn 1 18 RVm, though it has strong textual support, is improbable, and can well be explained as due to orthodox zeal, in opposition to adoptionism. See Grimm-Thayer, Lexicon; Westcott, ad loc.

ONO, ò'ños (Onos), ò'ños. See Oinoch."}

ONYX, ò'niks, ò'niks. See Stones, Precious.

OPEN, ò'p'n: In the OT represents chiefly ἀνοίγω, pathēhath, but also other words, as ὑπάρξειν, ἄνοιγμα, "to uncover"; of the opening of the eyes in vision, etc (thus Balsam, Nu 22 31; 24 4; cf Job 33 16; 36 10; Ps 119 18; Jer 32 11 14). In the NT the usual term is ἀνοίγω, ἀνοίγμα (of operator of mouth, eyes, heavens, doors, etc). A peculiar word, ἀνοίχθω, ἀνοίχθων (lit. to have the neck bent, to be laid bare), is used for "laid open" before God in He 4 13.

OPEN PLACE: (1) The "open place" of Gen 38 14 AV, in which Tamar sat, has come from a misunderstanding of the Heb, the translators having taken b'vephērēn ἀνοίγειν to mean "in an opening publicly," instead of "in an opening [i.e. a gate] of Enaim" (cf Prov 1 21 in the Heb). RV has corrected; see Enaim. (2) In 1 K 22 10 [2 Ch 18 9 RV relates that Ahab and Jehoshaphat sat each on his throne, arrayed in their robes, in an open place [in "Heb a threshing-floor," AV "a void place"] at the entrance of the gate of Samaria." The Heb here is awkward, and neither the LXX nor the Syr seems to have read the present text in 1 K 22 10, the former having "in arms," at the gate of the son of Hatturim, and the latter "in all colored garments." Consequently various attempts have been made to emend the text, of which the simplest is the omission of b'shērēn, "in an open place." If, however, the text is right—as is not impossible—the operator of the threshing-floor close to the gate. See the commentaries.

OPERATION, op-ér-a'shun (-appointed, ma'āsaleh, "work"); ἐνέργεια, energēia, ἐνέργεια, ἐνέργεια, "energy"); Twice used in the OT of God's creative work (Ps 28 4; Isa 5 12). The Holy Spirit's inscribing and power are manifest in the bestowment of spiritual gifts on individuals and on the church (1 Cor 12 6 AV), and in the resurrection of Jesus Christ, through which energy or operation of God those dead in sins are, through faith, raised to newness of life (Col 2 12 AV).

ONYCHA, on-k'ka (appointed, skh'eloth; of Arab. ò'nsk'hal, "filings," "husks"): "Onycha" is a transmutation of the LXX ὀνχα, onoucha, acc. of ὀνος, onux, which means "nail," "hoof," and also "onyx," of Semitic origin. The form "onycha" was perhaps chosen to avoid confusion with "onyx," the stone. The Heb skh'eloth occurs only in Ex 30 34 as an ingredient of the sacred incense. It is supposed to denote the horned operculum found in certain species of naticid molluscs. The operculum is a disk attached to the upper side of the hinder part of the "foot" of the mollusc. When the animal draws itself into its shell, the hinder part of the foot comes last, and the operculum seals the breach of the shell, a portion of which may be horned or stony, is absent in some species. The horned opercula when burned emit a peculiar odor, and are still used in combination with other perfumes by the Arab women of Upper Egypt and Nubia. (See Sir S. Baker, The Nile Tribes of Abyssinia, cited by EB, s.v. "Onycha.")

m "Heb Ophel," but AV "the tower," m "secret place." It is true that "tower" occurs in other occurrences, but the word in Gen 10:11, "Zevun, 'ophir", is in order of the sons of Joktan (Gen 10:29). Ophir is the name of a land or city somewhere to the S. or S.E. of Pal for which Solomon's ships are said to have found out from Ezion-geber at the head of the Gulf of Akabah, returning with great stores of gold, precious stones and "almug"-wood (1 K 9:28; 10:11; 2 Ch 9:10; 1 K 22:48; 2 Ch 8:18). We get a fuller list of the wares and also the time taken by the voyage if we assume that the same vessels were referred to in 1 K 10:22, "Once every three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks." The other products may not have been native to the land of Ophir, but it is certain that the gold at least was produced there. This gold was proverbial for its purity, as is witnessed by many references in the OT (Ps 45:9; Job 28:16; Isa 13:12; 1 Ch 29:4), and, in Job 22:24, Ophir is used for fine gold itself. In fact, the above list of Ophir's wares has been subjected to much discussion, in some cases the name occurs also in two passages under the form "Uphaz" (Jer 10:9; Dn 10:5).

At all times the geographical position of Ophir has been a subject of dispute, the claims of three different regions being principally geographical. The name is a Persian term meaning "far east," and the Arabic word for "sandal-wood." Ophir was the name of a region of the Arabian coast, and the mention of "sandal-wood" is suggestive of it being a sandal-wood producing district. The term "Ophir" is also used for a district of the Arabian coast which is not specified. The word is sometimes used as a proper noun, and in that case it is associated with "Punt," a country in the desert between the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean. This country was a source of ivory, gold, and other precious metals and stones. The word "Ophir" is also used to refer to the city of Ophir, which was the capital of the kingdom of Ophir. The city was a center of commerce and was known for its wealth. The word "Ophir" is also used to refer to the mountain of Ophir, which was the location of the temple of Solomon. The temple was built on the mountain of Ophir and was considered to be a place of great importance. The word "Ophir" is also used to refer to the river Ophir, which was a river that flowed through the land of Ophir. The river was considered to be a source of gold and other precious metals and stones. The word "Ophir" is also used to refer to the city of Ophir, which was the capital of the kingdom of Ophir. The city was a center of commerce and was known for its wealth.
ably brought there from more distant lands, and thence conveyed by Solomon's merchants to Ezion-geber. If the duration of the voyage (3 years) be used as evidence, it favors this location of Ophir as much as that on the east coast of Africa. It seems therefore the least assumable view that Ophir was on the Persian Gulf in Southwest ern Arabia and served in old time as an emporium of trade between the East and West.

OPHNI, of n (02677, hā-ophnî, Ḥaphni, Ḥaphnî): A place in the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18:24). The Orbs is here called Shechemah, and without marauding bands, one easternward, down the valley of Sheboim toward the wilderness; the third "turned out the way that leadeth to Ophrah, unto the land of Shual. This road must have run northward, as Jeh, who commanded the passage to the S. Onom places it 5 Rom miles E. of Bethel. A site which comes near to fulfilling these conditions is et-Taiyebeh, which stands on a conical hill some 5 miles N.E. of Beita. This is possibly identical with "Ephron" (2 Ch 13:19), and "Ephraim" (Jn 11:54).

(A city in the tribal lot of Manasseh W. of Jordan. It is mentioned only in connection with Gideon, whose native place it was, and with his son Abimelech (Jgs 6:11, etc.). It was, indeed, family property, belonging to Joash the Abiezrite, the father of Gideon. It was apparently not far from the plain of Esdraelon (vs 33 f), so that Gideon and his kinsmen understood under the near presence of the oppressing Midianites Manasseh, of course, as bordering on the southern edge of the plain, was in close touch with the invaders. At Ophrah, Gideon reared his altar to Jah, and made thorough cleansing of the instruments of idolatry. After his great victory, he set up here the golden glob made from the spoils of the enemy, which proved a snare to himself and to his house (8:27). Here he was finally laid to rest. It was at Ophrah that Abimelech, aspiring to the kingdom, put to death upon one stone three score and ten of his brethren, as possible rivals, Jotham alone escaping alive (9:5). Apparently the mother of Abimelech belonged to Shechem; this established a relationship with that town, his connection with which does not therefore mean that Ophrah was his native place. A quite satisfactory identification has yet been suggested. Conder (PEFS, 1876, 197) quotes the Samaritan Chronicle as identifying Ferata, which is 6 miles W. of Nablus, with an ancient Ophra, "and the one that suggests itself as most probably identical is Ophrah of the Abiezrite." But this seems too far to the S.

(3) A man of the tribe of Judah, son of Me monothai (1 Ch 4:14).

OPINION, of pain (27, dê, דֵּין, g'rîppim): "Opinion" occurs only 5 times in Job (32:6, 10, 17) as the tr of dê, "knowledge," "opinion" (in the address of Elihu), and once of g'rîppim, from gâ'aph, "to divide or branch out," hence division or party, unsettled opinion (in the memorable appeal of Elijâh, "How long halt ye between two opinions?"

1 K 18:21, ARV "How long go ye limping between the two sides?"). In Ecclus 3:24, we have, "For many are deceived by their own vain opinion" (hapusôsis, "a taking up," "a hasty judgment"), RV "The conceit of many hath led them astray."

OPOBALSAMUM, op-o-bal-sa-mum: RVm in Ex 30:34. See Stacte.

OPPRESSION, o-presh'un: Used in AV to translate a variety of Heb words, all of which, however, agree in the general sense of wrong done by violence or force, in either case, the who are wronged is to the oppression of Israel by foreigners, as by their Egypt masters (Ex 3:9; Dt 26:7), or by Syria (2 K 13:4), or by an unmentioned nation (Isa 30:20 AVm). In all these cases the Heb original is פָּדָה, lâhâq. But in the vast number of cases the reference is to social oppression of one kind or another within Israel's own body. It is frequently the theme of psalmist and prophet and wise man. The poor and weak must have suffered greatly at the hands of the stronger and more fortunate. The word lâhâq, various forms of the וַפַּדְתַּה, ăshâk, and other words are used by the writers and prophets to express the sorrow and indignation over the wrongs of their afflicted brethren. In his own sorrow, Job remembers the suffering of the oppressed (Job 35:9; 36:15); it is a frequent subject of song in the Ps (Ps 12:5; 46:2; 45:2; 44; 65:5; 119:134); the preacher observes and reflects upon its prevalence (Eccl 4:1; 5:8; 7:17 AV); the prophets Amos (3:9), Isaiah (5:7; 59:13), Jeremiah (6:6; 22:17) and Ezekiel (22:7,29) thundered against it. It was exercised toward strangers and also toward the Israelites themselves, and was never wholly overcome. In Jas 2:2, "oppress" is the rendering of ἀπατοῦσατε, ἀπατοῦσατε, "to exercise harsh control over one," "to use one's power against one."

WILLIAM JOSEPH McGLOTHLIN

OR, or: The word is used once for either (1 S 26:10), and is still in poetic use in this sense; as in, "Without or wave or wind" (Coleridge); "Or the bakke or some bone he broketh in his southe" (Pier a Plowman [B], VII, 93; cf Merchant of Venice, III, ii, 65). It is also used with "for" for (Ps 9:18; Ecclus 19:10) and ARV substitutes in Ecclus 12:6 (cf vs 12:2); Cant 6:12; Dan 6:24.

ORACLE, or-a-k'l: (1) A Divine utterance delivered to man, usually in answer to a request for guidance. So in 2 S 16:23 for נִשְׁבַּה, dibbah ("word," as in RVm). The use in this passage seems to indicate that at an early period oracular utterances were sought from Jah by the Israelites, but the practice certainly fell into disuse at the rise of prophecy and there are no illustrations of the means employed (1 S 18:19,36-42, etc, belong rather to Divinatio [q.v.]). In RVm of such passages as Isa 13:1, "oracle" is used in the titles of certain special prophecies as a substitute for Bruchon (q.v.) (בְּרֵעֶון, massad), with considerable advantage (esp. Gen 1:22, etc., in Rom 1:1), and in temples "oracle" was used for the chamber in which the utterances were delivered (naturally a most sacred part of the structure). This usage, coupled with a mistake in Heb philology (connecting נִשְׁבַּה, dibbah, "hinder part," with נֵבְאָה, "prophet," caused RV to give the title "oracle" to the Most Holy Place of the Temple, in 1 K 5:5, etc, following the example of Aquila, Symmachus and Vulg. But the title is very unfortunate, as the Most Holy Place had nothing to do with the delivery of oracles, and RV should have corrected (cf Ps 28:2).
ORACLES, EBULLINE, sib'il-in, -lin. See Apocalyptic Literature, v.

ORATOR, or'a-tér, ORATION, or'a-shun; The word “orator” occurs twice: (1) As AV rendering of ἐκβολή, labash; only Isa 3 3, “the eloquent orator,” AVm “skilful of speech,” where RV rightly substitutes “the skilful enchanter.” The word labash is probability a mimetic word meaning “a hiss,” “a whisper,” and is used in the sense of “incantation,” “charm.” The word ἐκβολή is “skilful of incantation,” “expert in magic.” See Divination; Enchantment. (2) As the rendering of ὁρατός, ὁράτης, the title applied to Tertullus, who appeared as the advocate of the Jewish accusers of Paul (Acts 24 1). The proceedings, as was generally the case in the provincial Rom courts, would probably be conducted in Lat, and under Rom modes of procedure, in which the parties would not be well versed; hence the need of a professional advocate. ὁράτης is here the equivalent of the older Gr συκόπος, “the prosecuting counsel,” as opposed to the συνδίκος, “the defendant’s advoca-

Ordination occurs only in Acts 12 21: “Herod . . . . made an oration unto them” (ἐκβολή, ἐκβολήν ὁρατοῦ, ἐκβολήν ὁρατῆς σύκοποῦ). The vb. ἐκβολῆν, “to speak in an assembly” from διόμα, “people,” ὁμογένες, “to harangue”), is often found in classical Gr, generally in a bad sense (Lat conscionare); here only in the N.T.

ORCHARD, or'chard; (1) ὠρχήσις, porclies, from Old Pers, “a walled-in enclosure”; ἱπατία, παραίδευσις, a word in classical Gr applied to the garden of Babylon (Diodorus Siculus xi.10) and to a game park, as in Acts 19 21. See Neh 3 15, “forests”; in “park”; Cant 4 13, “orchard,” “in-

"paradise” (of pomegranates); Ecc 2 5, “park,” AV “orchards”; see Paradise. (2) κήπος, képos, “garden” or “orchard”: “a white thorn in an orchard” (Bar 6 71).

ORDAIN, or-dān’ ORDER, or'di-nā'shun (Lat ordinare, “to set in order,” “to arrange”; in post-Augustan Lat “to appoint to office”; from ordo, gen. ordinis, “order,” “arrangement”). In AV the vb. “to ordain” renders as many as 85 different words (11 Heb words in the OT, 21 Gr words in Apoc and the NT, and 3 Lat words in Apoc). This is due to the fact that the Eng. word has many shades of meaning (esp. as used in the text of AV was made), of which the following are the chief: (1) To set in order, arrange, prepare: “All things that we ordained festival. Turn from their office to black funeral.” —Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, IV, v, 84.

This meaning is now obsolete. It is found in AV of Ps 133 17; Isa 50 33; He 9 6 (in each of which case RV or mss substitute “appointed” or “set apart”); 2 Esd 17 9 (RV “appoint”); Ps 7 13 (RV “milketh”); Hab 1 12 also RV). (2) To establish, institute, bring into being: “When first this order [i.e. the Garter] was ordained, my Lord [Shakespeare, Son in K 12 22, “i.e. ‘ordained; or ordained in the sixteenth month” (ver 33); Nu 28 6; Ps 8 3 2; Isa 26 12; 2 Esd 6 49 AV (RV “preserve”); Sir 7 15; Gal 3 19. (3) To decree, give orders, prescribe: “And doth the power that man adores Ordain their doom?” —Byron.

So Est 9 27, “The Jews ordained . . . . that they would keep these two days according to the writing thereof”: 1 Esd 6 34; 2 Esd 7 17; 8 14 AV; 2 Esd 1 6; 8 7 17 (RV “commandment”); 1 Mac 4 59; 7 49; Acts 15 4; Rom 7 10 AV; 1 Cor 7 3; 7 17; 9 14; Eph 2 10 AV. (4) To set apart for an office or duty, appoint, destine: “Being ordained his special governor” (Shakespeare). Frequent in EV. When AV has “ordain” in this sense, RV generally substitutes “appoint”; e.g. “He [Jesus] appointed [AV ‘ordained’] twelve, that they might be with him” (Mk 3 14). So 2 Ch 11 15; Jer 1 5; Dn 2 1; 1 Esd 8 49; 1 Mac 3 55; 10 20; 15 16; Acts 14 20; 1 Tim 2 7; Tit 1 5; 1 Tim 1 8; 1 8; 3 8. 3 RV substitutes “forbade” for Lk 9 2; “recorded” in Sir 48 10, “become” in Acts 1 22, “written of” (n. ‘set forth’) in Jude ver 4, but retains “ordain” in the sense of “appoint,” “set apart,” in Mk 2 5; 1 Ch 27 22; 1 Esd 8 23; Ad Est 13 6; Acts 10 42; 13 2; 17 31; Rom 13 1. (5) To appoint ceremonially to the ministerial or priestly office, to confer holy orders on. This later technical or ecclesiastical sense is never found in EV. The nearest approach is (4) above, but the idea of “formal or ceremonial setting apart” to office (prominent in its modern usage) is never implied in the word.

Ordination: The act of arranging in regular order, esp. the act of investing with ministerial or succes-sional rank (ordo), the setting-apart for an office in the Christian ministry. The word does not occur in EV. The NT throws but little light on the origin of the later ecclesiastical rite of ordination. The 12 disciples were not set apart by any formal act on the part of Jesus. In Mk 3 14; Jn 15 16, the AV rendering “ordain” is, in view of its modern usage, misleading; nothing more is implied than an appointment or election. In Jn 20 21-23, we have indeed a symbolic act of consecration: “He breathed on them” (ἐνθάνετο, “to breathe”), “a quies act is described as one and not repeated. The gift was once for all, not to individuals but to the abiding body” (Westcott, ad loc.). In the Apostolic age there is no trace of the doctrine of an outward rite conferring inward grace, though the instances of the formal appointment or recognition of those who had already given proof of their spiritual qualification. (1) The Seven were chosen by the brethren as men already “full of the Spirit and of wisdom,” and were then "appointed by the Twelve, who prayed and laid their hands upon them (Acts 1 6). (2) The call of Barnabas and Saul came direct from God (Acts 13 2, “the work whereunto I have called them”; ver 4, they were ‘sent forth by the Holy Spirit’). Yet certain prophets and teachers were instructed by the Holy Spirit to “separate” them (i.e. publicly) for their work, which they did by fasting and praying and laying on of hands (ver 5). But it was utterly foreign to Paul’s point of view to regard the church’s act as constituting him an apostle (of Gal I 1). (3) Barnabas and Paul are said to have “ordained,” RV “appointed” (ἐκποτομάσαν, cheirotonéssan, “elect,” “appoint,” without indicating the particular kind of appointment). Elder-presbyters in every city with prayers and fasting (Acts 14 23). So Titus was instructed by Paul to “appoint elders in every city" in Cretan (Tit 1:5). (4) The gift of Timothy for evangelistic work seems to have been formally recognized in two ways: (a) by the laying on of hands of the presbytery (1 Tim 4:14), (b) by the laying on of hands of the local elders (2 Tim 4:9-15). The words "lay hands hastily on no man" (1 Tim 5:22) do not refer to an act of ordination, but probably to the restoration of the penitent.

The reference in He 6:2 is not exclusively to ordination, but to all occasions of laying on of hands (see Hands, I. Postion of). From the few instances mentioned above (the only ones found in the NT), we infer that it was regarded as advisable that persons holding high office in the church should be publicly recognized in some way, as by laying on of hands, fasting, and public prayer. But no great emphasis was laid on this rite, hence "it can hardly be likely that any essential principle was held to be involved in it." (Hort, The Christian Ecclesia, 216.) It was regarded as an outward act of approval, a symbolic offering of intercessory prayer, and an emblem of the solidarity of the Christian community, rather than an indispensable channel of grace for the work of the ministry. (For a fuller discussion of the liturgical doctrine and practice see Edin Hatch's valuable art. on "Ordination" in the Catholic Antiquity.)

ORDER, őrder (777, ἀραχή, "to arrange"); ὁράσω, ἀρασήν (ἀποδιασεῖν, ἄρας, ἀργυμ:); "Order" in Heb phrases may indicate (1) arrangement in rows, (2) sequence in time, (3) classification and organization, (4) likeness or manner, (5) regulation, direction or command, or (6) the declaring of a will. In many passages it is difficult if not impossible to determine from the context to which of these senses the word is used.

The fundamental idea suggested by the Heb, Gr and Eng. words is that of arrangement in rows. Thus "order" is used in the Bible of arranging wood for an altar (Lev 7:1; 1 Ken in 18:33; cf Heb Gen 22:9; Isa 30:33); Rows of laying out flux-stalks for drying (Josh 2:6); of preparing offerings (Lev 1:8-12; cf. 6:6, 7:6); of arranging lamps (Ex 27:21; 39:37; Lev 24:3-4); of Ps 139:17); of placing the swhebread on the table (Ex 40:43; Lev 6:12; 24:8; 2 Ch 13:11); of drawing up the battle array (1 Ch 12:38; Heb 39, "a CENTAUR"); and of arranging weapons in order for battle (Jer 46:3; ARV "prepare") as in Zech, "to order" in the older VSS usually has the obsolete sense "to arrange" and not the more usual Eng. meanings, "to demand" or "to direct." Thus: "In the tent of meeting shall Aaron order it" (Lev 24:4, ARV "keep in order"); "Order ye the buckler and shield" (Jer 46:3; cf Ps 119:133; Job 23:4, ARV "set in order"); Jth 2:16; Wsd 1:15; 15:1, 16:1; Eccles 2:6). The Heb pa'arn (lit. "hoof-beat, occurrence," "repetition") in the plural conveys the idea of an architectural plan (Ezk 41:6). Another word, šālahb, lit. "to join," in connection with the tabernacle, has in some VSS been tr as including the idea of orderly arrangement (Ex 26:17). The word "order" standing by itself may mean orderly or proper arrangement (1 Esd 1:10; Wsd 7:29; 1 Macc 6:40; Col 2:5). Akin to the idea of arranging things in a row is that of arranging words (Job 33:5; 37:19; Ps 5:3), of recounting things in order (Isa 44:7; Lk 1:1 AV [diatassein]; In Ps 19:14; Lk 11:40 AV [‘ ordinate]). A legal case (Job 23:4; 13:18; cf Ps 50:21). From the idea of ranging in order for the purpose of comparison the Heb ἀραχή acquires the meaning "to compare" (Isa 40:18; Ps 89:7). This is clearly the meaning of "ἐν ἀραχή διδότης" (Ps 1:5 [Heb 6:1]), where "They cannot be set in order unto thee." must be interpreted to mean "There is nothing that can be compared unto thee."

As the fundamental meaning of ἀραχή is arrangement in space, that of σόδαρ is order or sequence in time. (The LXX ἐφανε[ρών] signifies, in the place of ἀραχή, a word for "light," possibly σολο[μαί].) In the NT we find "order" used of time in connection with the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor 15:23 [katakēchē]; the phrase "in order unto" (Ps 119:35) expresses causal sequence and hence purpose.

The idea of classification is present in the Heb tākan, tr as "set in order," with reference to a collection of proverbs (Eccl 12:9). The same stem is used with reference to the fiction and arrangement of songs before the altar (Heb Eccles 47:9). The classification of priests according to their service is known from Lev 16 (cf. 1 Ch 24 3:19, Heb ἀρακά). Next to the high priests ranked priests of the second order (mishnehes, 2 K 23:4; cf 25 16; Jer 52:24). The related concept of organization is present where the Heb kūn (lit. "to establish") is used (Isa 52:37). "To the second ("to the other") (Ps 119:33; Ps 2 Ch 29:35; cf 1 Macc 16:14). A similar use of the term "order" is found in the NT in connection with the organization of the affairs of the church (1 Cor 16:1 [diatassein]; Tit 15:epiôrētēs); 1 Cor 11:2). "Order," in the sense of likeness or manner, is used in the phrase "after the order of Melchizedek" to translate the Heb al dīkērāth (or rather)

4. Likeness the archaic form al dīkērāth (Ps 110 or Manner 4), which in other passages is tr as "be- cause of" (cf Ecc 3:18; 7:14; 8:2). This well-known phrase is rendered in LXX kathē tēn ἀραξίαν, a tr adopted in He 6:6; 10:19; 7:11,17, where the passage from Ps is made the basis of an extended argument, in the course of which "order" is taken in the sense of "likeness" (He 7:16).

In the sense of regulation, we find "order" as a tr of mishnaḥ (which is lit. "the ruling of a shophēl," whether as a judicial decree or legislative actative act) in connection with the constitution of the Levitical priestly group (Lev 21:17; 2 Ch 20:16; cf Lk 1:8; 1:11). With reference to the Nazirite regulations in the story of Samson (Jgs 13:12, RV "manner"), church services (1 Cor 14:40) and, in the older Eng. VSS, with reference to other ritual matters (1 Ch 15:13; 23:31; 2 Ch 18:14, ARV "ordinance"). The phrase "al yadh, lit. "according to the hand of," tr as Ex 10:10; 1 Ch 25:29,3:6 bia in various ways, means "under the direction of," or "under the order of," as tr in the last instance. The modern sense of "command" is suggested here and in several other instances (1 Ch 8:10; 1 Macc 9:55). He "that ordereth his conversation aright" (sām derēk, Ps 60:23) is probably one who chooses the right path and directs his steps along it. "Who shall order the battle?" (1 K 20:14) is corrected in ARV: "Who shall begin the battle?" (cf Ch 13:3, Heb ṭaqar, lit. "to bind," hence "to join" or "begin"); of paradin contraining fort, tr as in the legal case (Job 23:4; 13:18; cf Ps 50:21). From the idea of ranging in order for the purpose of comparison the Heb ἀραχή acquires the meaning "to compare" (Isa 40:18; Ps 89:7). This is clearly the meaning of "ἐν ἀραχή διδότης" (Ps 1:5 [Heb 6:1]), where "They cannot be set in order unto thee."

The phrase "to set one's house in order" (Isa 38 1:2 K 20:1; 2 S 17:23), used of Hezekiah and Ahithophel, in contemplation of death, means to give final instructions to one's household or to make one's will. The Heb ἀρακά used in this phrase is found in the later Heb

Order Ornament THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA 2200
ORDB, 6\d\d, 9, "r\d\m-nte:" in common with all the Orientals, the Hebrews were very fond of wearing ornaments, and their tendency to extravagance of this kind often met with stern prophetic rebuke (Isa 3 16-24; Ezek 13 18-20). On this subject, little is said in the NT apart from James’ Lk 7 25; 12 23 and James’s (2 2) invectives against meretricious estimates of man’s character. Yet the employment of attractive attire receives sanction in the Divine example of Ezek 16 10-14.

Ornaments in general would include finely embroidered or decorated fabrics, such as the priest’s dress or the high-priestly attire, and the richly wrought veil, girdle and turban used by the wealthier class. But the term may be limited here to the various rings, bracelets and chains made of precious metals and more or less jeweled (cf Jer 2 32).

These latter, described in detail under their own particular names, may be summarized here as finger-rings, particularly prize as seal-rings (Gen 38 16-25; Jer 22 24); arm-rings or bracelets (Gen 24 22; 2 S 1 10); earrings (Gen 35 4; Ex 32 2); nose-rings (Gen 24 47; Ezek 16 12); anklets or anklet-chains (Isa 3 16,18); head-bands or fillets or curls (referred to in Isa 3 18 only), and necklaces or neck-chains (Gen 41 42; Ezek 16 11).

Figureative: The universal devotion to ornament among the Orientals is the occasion for frequent Bib. allusions to the beauty and splendor of personal jewelry and attire. But everywhere, in Divine injunctions, the emphasis of value is placed upon the beauty of holiness as an inward grace rather than on the acquisitions of outward ornament (Job
Moreover, the ospray was not numerous as were other hawks and eagles. It was a bird that lived almost wholly on fish, and these were not plentiful in the waters of Pal. This would tend to make it a marked bird, so no doubt the tr is correct as it stands, as any hawk that lived on fish would have been barred as an article of diet (see Tristram, Nat. Hist. of the Bible, 182; also Studer, Birds of North America, p. and pl. 16).

Gene Stratton-Porter

OSSIFRAGE, os'-fräg (ἡ ἀνὰθη; τομή; ὑπία; γέφυρα; Lat. Ossifraga): The great bearded vulture known as the lammer-goat (Lev 11:13; Dt 14:11 AV “gier-eagle”). The Heb name periq means “to break.” Lat. osisis, “bone,” and frangere, “to break,” indicate the most noticeable habit of the bird. It is the largest of the vulture family, being 3 ft. in length and 10 in sweep. It has a white head, black beard on the chin, and the part of the eye commonly called the “white” in most animals, which is visible in but few birds, in this family is pronounced and of a deep angry red, thus giving the bird a formidable appearance. Its head is grayish black, the feathers finely penciled, the shaft being white, the median line tawny. The under parts are tawny white and the feet and talons powerful. It differs from the vulture in that it is not a consistent carrion feeder, but prefers to take prey by the size captured of the largest eagles. It took its name from the fact that after smaller vultures and eagles had stripped a carcass to the last shred of muscle, the lammer-goat then carried the skeleton aloft and dropped it repeatedly until the marrow and the bone could be eaten. It is also very fond of totoise, the meat of which it secures in the same manner. As this bird frequents Southern Europe, it is thought to be the one that stook the bald head of Aeschylos, the poet, for a stone and let fall on it the totoise that caused his death. This bird also attacks living prey of the size of lambs, kids and hares. It is not numerous and does not flock, but pairs live in deep gorges and rocky crevices. It builds an enormous nest, deposits one pinkish or yellowish egg, and the young is black. It requires two years to develop the red eyes, finely penciled plumage and white head of the adult bird. It was included among the abominations because of its diet of carrion. Gene Stratton-Porter

OSTRACA, os'tra-ka: The word osrocon (“potsherd,” Heb heres) occurs in Joh 2:8 (LXX), *kai elaben *eprrakwa *ei *ostraka, “he took him a potsherd.” Earthen vessels were in general use in antiquity (they are twice mentioned in the NT: *sekyn *eprrakwa, seek *ostrakina [2 Cor 4:7; 2 Tim 2:20]), and the broken fragments of them, which could be picked up almost anywhere, were made to serve various purposes. Upon the smoothest of these pieces of unglazed pottery the poorest might write in ink his memoranda, receipts, letters or texts.

A fortunate discovery at Samaria (1910), made among the ruins of Ahab’s palace, has brought to light 75 Heb ostraca inscribed with ink, 1. Hebrew in the Phoen character, with accounts Ostraca and memoranda relating to private matters and dating probably from the time of Ahab. Their historical contribution, aside from the mention of many places not mentioned in the NT, is slender, but for ancient Heb writing and to a less extent for Heb words and forms they are of value, while the fact that in them we possess documents actually penned in Israel in the 9th BC gives them extraordinary value. The nature of ostraca tends to their preservation under conditions which would quickly destroy parchment, skin or papyrus, and this discovery in Pal encourages the hope of further and more significant finds.

Gr ostraca in large quantities have been found in Egypt, preserving documents of many kinds, chiefly tax receipts. The texts of some 2,000 of these have been published, principally by Wilcken (Griechische Ostraka, 2 vols, 1899), and serve to illustrate in unexpected ways the everyday Gr speech of the common people of Egypt through the Ptolemaic, Rom and Byzantine periods. Like the papyri, they help to throw light on NT syntax and lexicography, as well as on ancient life in general.

It is said that Cleaneines the Stoic, being too poor to buy papyrus, used to write on ostraca, but no remains of classical lit. have been found on the ostraca thus far discovered. In some instances, however, Christian literary texts are preserved upon ostraca. Some years ago Bou- riant bought in Upper Egypt 20 ostraca, probably of the 7th cent., inscribed with the Gr text of parts of the Gospels. The ostraca are of different sizes, and preserve any others one long continuous passage (Lk 22 40-71), which runs over 10 of the pieces. The ostraca contain from 2 to 9 verses each, and cover Mt 27 31-32; Mk 5 40-41 (9 3); 9 17.18.22; 15 21; Lk 12 15-16; 22 40-71; Jn 1 1-9; 1 14-17; 18 10-25; 19 15-17. The texts are in different hands, and attest the interest of the poor in the gospel in the century of the Arab conquest. Another late ostraca has a rough drawing labeled "St. Peter the evangelist," perhaps in allusion to the Gospel of Peter.

Coptic ostraca, too, are numerous, esp. from the Byzantine period, and of even more interest for Christian history than the Greek. A Coptic ostraca preserves the pericope on the woman taken in adultery (Jn 7 53-8 11), which is otherwise unattested in the Sa'idi NT. A Christian hymn to Mary, akin to the catenies of Luke, and some Christian letters have been found. The work of W. E. Crum on the Coptic ostraca is of especial importance. OSTRICH, os'trich (נָעֲרִית, yānāth; στροβύλος, strōvulōs; Lat. Struthio camelus); The largest bird now living. The Heb words yānāth, which means "greediness," and both ha-yānāth, "daughter of greediness," are made to refer to the indiscriminate diet of the ostrich, to which bird they apply; and again to the owl, with no applicability. The owl at times has a struggle to swallow whole prey it has taken, but the mere fact that it is a night hunter forever shuts it from the class of greedy and promiscuous feeders. The bodies of owls are proverbially lean like eagles. Neither did the owl frequent several places where older versions of Jer and Isa place it; so the tr are now correctly rendered "ostrich." These birds came into the Bible because of their desert life, the companions they lived among there, and because of their night cries that were guttural, terrifying groans, like the roar- ing of lions. The birds were brought into many pictures of desolation, because people dreaded their fearful voices. They homed on the trackless deserts that were dreaded by travelers, and when they came feeding on the fringe of the wilderness, they fell into company with vulture, eagle, lion, jackal and adder, and joined their voices with the night hawks and owls. For these reasons no birds were more suitable for drawing strong comparisons from.

They attained a height ranging from 6 to 8 ft., and weighed from 200 to 300 lbs. The head was small with large eyes having powerful vision, and protected by lashes. The Peculiarities neck was long, covered with down, and the windpipe showed, while large bites could be seen to slide down the gullet. The legs were bare, long, and the muscles like steel from the long distances covered in desert travel. The foot was much like the cloven hoof of a beast. The inner toe was 7 in long, with a clawlike hoof, the outer, smaller with no claw. With its length and strength of leg and the weight of foot it could strike a blow that saved it from attack by beasts smaller than a leopard. The wings were small, the muscles soft and pliable. They would not bear the weight of the bird, but the habit of lifting and beating them proved that this assisted in attaining speed in running (cf Xen. Anab. 1.5.2, 3). The body was covered with soft flexible feathers, the wings and tail growing long plumes, for which the bird has been pursued since the beginning of time. These exquisite feathers were first used to decorate the headdress and shields of desert chieftains, then as decorations for royalty, and later for hat and hair ornaments. The badge of the Prince of Wales is three white ostrich plumes. The females are smaller, the colors gray and white, the males a glossy black, the wing and tail plumes white. The ostrich has three physical peculiarities that stagger scientists. It has eyelashes, developed no doubt to protect the eyes from the dust and sand of desert life. On the wings are two plumless shafts like large porcupine quills. These may be used in resisting attack. It also has a bladder like a mammal, that collects urine acid, the rarest organ ever developed in a feathered creature.

"These birds hemed on the deserts of Arabia and at the lower end of the great Sina. Here the ostrich left her eggs on the earth and
2. Eggs warmed them in the sand. That young care to the fact that they were covered for protection during the day and brooded through the cooler nights. The eggs average 3 lbs. weight. They have been used for food in the haunts of the ostrich since the records of history began, and their stout shells for drinking-vessels. It is the custom of the birds, after laying a nest to take a long stick and draw out an egg. If incubation has advanced enough to spoil the eggs for use, the nest is carefully covered and left; if fresh, they are eaten, one egg being sufficient for a small family. No doubt these were the eggs to which Job referred as being tasteless without salt (Job 6 6). The number of eggs in the nest was due to the fact that the birds were polygamous, one male leading from 2 to 7 females, all of which deposited their eggs in a common nest. When several females wanted to use the nest at the same time, the first one to reach it deposited her egg in it, and the others on the sand close beside. This accounts for the careless habits of the ostrich as to her young. In the same manner, containing from 2 to 3 dozen eggs, it is impossible for the mother bird to know which of the young is hers. So all of them united in laying the eggs and allowing the father to look after the nest and the young. The bird first appears among the ruins of Solomon in Lev 11 16 RV, AV "owl"; Dt 14 16, RV "little owl" AV "owl." This must have referred to the toughness of grown specimens, since there was no other offensive in the bird's diet to taint its flesh and the young tender ones were delicious meat. In his agony, Job felt so much an outcast that he cried:

"I am a brother to jackals, And a companion to ostriches" (Job 30 29).

Again he records that the Almighty disconcerted to him of the ostrich in the following manner:

"The wings of the ostrich wave proudly, But are they the plumes and plumage of love" (Isa 13 15).

The ostrich history previously given explains all this passage save the last two verses, the first of which is a reference to the fact that the Arabs thought the ostrich a stupid bird, because, while it traveled to exhaustion, it bid its head and thought its body safe, and because some of its eggs were found outside the nest. The second was due to a well-known fact that, given a straight course, the ostrich could outrun a horse. The birds could attain and keep up a speed of 60 miles an hour for the greater part of half a day and even longer, hence it was possible to take them only by a system of relay riders (Xen, op. cit.) When Isaiah predicted the fall of Babylon, he used these words: "But wild beasts of the desert shall be there; and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and ostriches shall dwell there, and wild goats shall dance there" (Isa 13 21). Because this was to be the destruction of a great city, located on the Euphrates River and built by the fertility and prosperity of the country surrounding it, and the ruins those of homes, the bird indicated by every natural condition would be the owl. The wild goats clambering over the ruins would be natural companions and the sneaking wolves—but the big bird of sometime tribe shall hunt desert habitation, accustomed to constant pursuit for its plumage. Exactly the same argument applies to the next reference by the same writer

(34 13). "And the wild beasts of the desert shall meet with the wolves, and the wild goat shall cry unto him, O thou foremost of the flock; what art thou here, and shall find her a place of rest" (34 14). "The beasts of the field shall honor me, the jackals and the ostriches; because I give waters in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert, to give drink to my people, my chosen" (45 20). Hence, and the ostrich in its natural location, surrounded by creatures that were its daily companions. The next reference also places the bird at home and in customary company: "Therefore the wild beasts of the desert shall honour me; the jackals, and the ostriches shall stand upon their habitations; and I will set them in their habitation, and they shall dwell in their own places" (Jer 50 9).

"Even the jackals draw out the breast, they give suck their young ones; The daughter of my people is become cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness" (Lam 4 3).

This reference is made to the supposed cruelty of the ostrich in not raising its young.

OTHELI, oth'ni-el (Οθηλ), oth'ni-el, meaning unknown): A son of Shemariah, a Korahite Levite (1 Ch 26 7).

OTHEIEL, oth'ni-el (Οθηλ), oth'ni-el): A hero in Israel, son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother. He conquered Kiriath-sepher, later known as Debir, in the territory of Judah in the days of Joshua, and was given the daughter of Caleb, Achsah, as a reward (Josh 15 17 Jgs 1 13). He later smote Cushan-rishathaim, king of Mosopotam, whom the children of Israel had served 8 years, and thus not only saved the Israelites, but by reviving national sentiment among them (cf Am, V, iv, 3), and re-establishing government became the first of those hero-rulers known as "judges." The effects of his victory lasted an entire generation (40 years, Jgs 3 9-11). He had a son named Hathath (1 Ch 4 13) and probably another named Meonoath (cf LXX, ad loc.). In the days of David we find a family-bearing the name of Othniel, from which came Heldai the Metophathite, captain of the twelfth month (1 Ch 27 15).

ANTHAN ISAACS

OTHOMIAS, oth-o-mi'as (Οθομαίος, Othomias): One of those who had taken "strange wives" (1 Eed 9 28) = "Mattaniah" of Ezr 10 27.

OUCHES, ouch'ez, -ez (ὕπέρθον, miah'roth [Ex 28 11.13.14.25; Ex 29.16.18.19]; ARV "settings," but in Ex 39 13, "inclosures"). The secondary meaning of this now archaic word is the gold or silver setting of a precious stone. In Ez, where it occurs 8 x, it is clear that the gold settings of the engraved stones forming the breast-plate of the high priest are intended; the onyx stones forming the fibula or brooch for holding together the two sides of the breast-plate being said to be "inclosed in ouches [settings] of gold" (Ex 39 6). Not only are these onyx or beryl stones so set, but the 12 stones forming the front of the breast-plate were "inclosed in gold in their settings" (Ex 39 20). The same word occurs in Ps 45 13, where the king's daughter is said to have her clothing "inwrought with gold," i.e. embroidered with gold thread or wire. Ex 39 3 tells us how this wire was produced. From this fact it may be inferred that the settings of the breast-plate were not solid pieces of gold, but were formed of woven wire wrought round the stones, in a sort of filigree. See also STONES, PRECIOUS.

OUTCAST, out'kast: Represents some form of כִּבְשָׁן, ḫâshân, or כִּבִּשׁ, ḫâshâb, both meaning "thrust OUTGOING, out'g-ing: In Ps 65 8, "Thou makest the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice," the Heb is נָּכֹד, nacôd. The word (from יָכֹד, "to go forth") refers to the "going forth" of the sun, and so means "east" (as in Ps 75 6). The connection of nacôd with "evening" is therefore zeugmatic, but the meaning is clear and there are extra-Bib. parallels (cf. "the two Orientes"). In Josh 17 18, AV uses "outgoings" for the Heb נָּכֹד, na'ad (also from יָכֹד), where the meaning in "extremity" (RV "goings out," as in Nu 34 5, etc.). "Outwent" occurs in Mk 6 33. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

OUTLANDISH, out-land'ish (Neh 12 26, AV "Him did outlandish women cause to sin"): "Outlandish" in modern Eng. is colloquial only and with the sense "utterly extraordinary," but AV uses it in the lit. meaning "out of the land," "foreign," ERV "outlandish women," ARV "foreign women," Heb נָּכֹד, nacôd, "foreign.

OUTRAGE, out'raj. OUTRAGEOUS, out-rä'jus: The noun (from the Fr. outrage, "that which goes beyond") only in the heading to Ps 10 AV; the adj. in Prov 27 4, AV and ERV, for וַעַלְגָּה, 'agalô, "hated," "hated." "Anger is overwhelming" (ARV), is much better.

OUTROADS, out'rôdz (אָדוֹלָה, edolô, "to go forth, "to make a military expedition"; AV and RV in 1 Mac 15 41, "horsemen . . . , that they might make outroads upon the ways of Judah"); 1 Esd 4 23, RV "goeth forth to make outroads"); "Outroads" is obsolete, but its opposite, "inroads," is still good Eng.

OUTWARD, out'wîrd. MAN (גֶּפֶן, ge'fen, "outside", "without", "out of doors"): The body, subject to decay and death, in distinction from the inner man, the imperishable spiritual life which "is renewed day by day" (2 Cor 4 16); also the body as the object of worldly thought and pride in external dress and adornment (1 Pet 3 3). See Man, Natural; Man, New.

OVEN, uv"n. See Bread; Furnace.

OVERCHARGE, ֹוַרְשְׁרֵי. Lk 21 34, "lest haply your hearts be overcharged with drunkenness" (בְּשָׁנֶה, bashôneh, "burden," here with the force "be occupied with"); 2 Cor 2 5, AV "that I may not overcharge you" (בָּשָׁנֶה, epibashône, "overload"), RV "that I press not too heavily." See Charges.

OVERPASS, ֹוַרְפָּס. A special tr. of the very common vb. ֹוַרְפָּס, 'abar, "to pass over," found in EV of Ps 57 1 and Isa 26 20 in the sense "to pass by," and in Jer 5 28 with the meaning "to overflow."

ruins, that lay mostly in the heart of rich farming lands, where prosperous cities had been built and then destroyed by enemies. Near these locations the ostrich was pursued for its plumage, and its nesting conditions did not prevail. The location was strictly the owl's chosen haunt, and it had the voice to fit all the requirements of the text. In the lists of abominations, the original Heb yansākî ḫ (derived from a root meaning twilight, is tr̄ “great owl” (see Lev 11 17 and Dt 14 16). It is probable that this was a bird about 2 ft. in length, called the eagle-owl. In the same lists the word kōs (ve-sou̇lou̇s, nuktidōra) refers to ruins, and the bird indicated is specified as the “little owl,” that is, smaller than the great owl—about the size of our barn owl. This bird is referred to as the “mother of ruins,” and the tr̄ that place it in deserted towns and cities is beyond all doubt correct. Kūp̄k p̄ (kēōs, echōs) occurs once (Isa 34 15), and is tr̄ “great owl” in former versions; lately (in ARV) it is changed to “dart-snake” (ERV “arrow-snake”). In this same description lūth (bokēstaios, oukōntauroi), “a specter of night,” was formerly screech-owl, now it reads “night monster,” which is more confusing and less suggestive. The owls in the lists of abominations (Lev 11 17 18; Dt 14 16) are the little owl, the great owl and the horned owl. The only other owl of this group that is recorded such impressions of description in the Books of Isa, Jer, Job and Mic is referred to in Ps 102 6: “I am like a pelican of the wilderness: I am become as an owl of the waste places.” Here it would appear that the bird habitual to the wilderness and the waste places, that certainly would be desert, would be the ostrich—while in any quotation referring to ruins, the owl would be the bird indicated by natural conditions.

OWL, GREAT (יוֹנָשׁ), yansākî ḫ; LXX ἱφα, ἴθι, or ἰφα, ἴθι: A member of the Pal species of the family Strigidae. The great owl mentioned in the Bible was no doubt their largest specimen of the family, a bird fully 2 ft. in length, fully feathered, with unusually large head and long ear tufts. It was a formidable and noble-appearing bird, with resounding voice. It was abundant among the ruins of temples, the tombs of Carmel, the caves of Gennesaret, and among the ruined cities of Southern Judah. It is included in the abomination lists of Lev 11 17 and Dt 14 16. See OWL.

OWL, LITTLE (יוֹנָת), kōs; νυκτικόρας, nuktidōra; Lat Athene meridionalis: A night bird of prey distinguished by a round head, and extremely large eyes. The little owl is left in RV only in the lists of abominations (see Lev 11 17; Dt 14 16). See Owl.

OWL, SCREECH. See NIGHT MONSTER.

OWNER, οὖντερ. See SHIPS AND BOATS, III, 2.

OX. See ANTELOPE; CATTLE; WILD OX.

OX, οὐκ: One of the ancestors of Judith (Jth 8 1). The name is not Heb. Perhaps the Itala Ozi and the Syr 'Uz point to the Heb 'Uzzi.

OX-GOAD, οὐκ' γόδ. See GOAD.

OZEM, οζεμ (יוֹצֵם, 'ōzem, meaning unknown): (1) The 6th son of David (1 Ch 2 15). LXX ('Arous, 'Āsôm) and Vulg suggest that the name should be pointed 'Ως, 'āzōm. (2) A “son” of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2 25).

OZIAS, οζ'ιας: (1) ('Ωζιας, Oziel, 'Ôzias, Ozi, Oias, B a b): The son of Micah, a Simeonite, one of the 3 rulers of Bethulia in the days of Judith (Jth 6 15 16; 7 25; 8 9 f; 10 6). (2) ('Ωζιας, Oziel, B and Sweet; Av Ezias [1 Esd 8 2], following A, 'Ezias, Ezias): An ancestor of Ezra (1 Esd 8 2; 2 Esd 1 2) = "Uzzi" of Ex 7 4; 1 Ch 6 51. (3) Head of a family of temple-servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 8 51) = "Uzza" of Ex 2 49; Neh 7 51. (4) Gr form of Uzziah (q.v.) in Mt 1 8 9 AV. A king of Judah.

OZIEL, οζ'ιελ (Ὁζίελ, Oziel): An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8 1); another form of the OT name "Uziel."

OZNI, οζ'νι (יוֹנָת, "Oznî, "Oznî, "my hearing," or "my ear"): A "son" of Gad (Nu 26 16) = "Ezbon" of Gen 46 16 (cf 1 Ch 7 7).

OZNITES, οζ'νῖτες (with the art. 'יוֹנָת, hā-oznî [collective], “the Oznites”): Of the clan of Ozn (Nu 26 16). See OZNI.

OZORA, οζ'ωρα. See EZORA.

PADDAN, pad'ân (Gen 48 7; AV Padan, pā- dan). See next article.

PADDAN-ARAM, pad'an-ārām or p-ārām (יוֹנָת-אָרָם, pōdān 'āram; LXX Μεσοποταμία τῆς Συρίας, Mesopotamia tē Syriās; Av Padan-aram): In Gen 46 7, Paddan stands alone, but as the LXX, Sam, and Pesh read "Arām" also, it must in this verse have dropped out of the MT. In the time of Abraham, pōdān occurred the Bab contract-tablets as a land measure, to which we may compare the Arab. fddān or "ox-gang." In the Assyr syllabaries it is the equivalent of ḫitu, "a field," so that Paddan-aram would mean "the field of Arām," and with this we may compare Hos 12 12 (Heb 12 13) and the use of the Heb sōdeh in connection with Moab and Edom (Jgs 5 4; Ruth 1 6).
Furthermore, padanu and harranu are given as synonyms with the meaning of "rood." Paddan-aram occurs only in the PC, but it corresponds to the "Haran" of the older documents. The versions agree in translating both as Mesopotamia, and identify with the home of the patriarchs, and the scene of the domestic strife of the district of Haran to the E. of the Upper Euphrates valley. More in harmony with the length of Jacob's flight, as indicated by the time given (Gen 31:22-25), is Haran-el-Awamid, an ancient site 10 miles to the E. of Damascus, which satisfies all the demands of history. See ARAM.

W. M. CHRISTIE

PADON, pâ'dôn (תָּפָדָה, "redemption"): One of the Nethinim (see NETHINIM) who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:44; Neh 7:47), the "Phaleas" of 1 Esd 5:29 (m "Paddon").

PAGIEL, pâ'gi-el, pâ'gi-el, pa'giel (נפתיל, "God's intervention"): Son of Ocran, of the tribe of Asher, among those enrolled by Moses at the numbering of Israel (Nu 1:3; 2:27). When the tabernacle was set up, the heads of the families of Israel "brought their offerings" in rotation and these priests and the sons of Aaron, were members of the 11th day (Nu 7:72). Nu 7:72-77 describes his offering. In the journeys of Israel he was "over the host of the tribe of the children of Asher" (Nu 10:26), and possibly standard-bearer (cf Nu 10:14,22,25).

HENRY WALLACE

PAHATH-MOAB, pâ'hath-mô'âb (פַּחַת-מֹעָב, "sheik of Moab"): in 1 Esd 5:11; 8:31, "Phaath Moab"): A Jewish clan probably named after an ancestor of the above title. Part of the clan returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:6; cf Neh 7:11) under two family names, Jesusu and Joab; and a part came back with Ezra (Ezr 8:4). Hashub, a "son of Pahath-moab," is named among the repairers of both the wall and the "tower of the furnaces" at Jerus (Neh 3:11). It is the name of one of the signatories "sealing" the "sure covenant" of Neh 9:38 (Neh 10:14). Some of the sons of this name had taken "strange wives" (Ezr 10:30).

HENRY WALLACE

PAI, pâi (פָּאִ, pâ'î; פָּם, Pâm): The royal city of Hadad or Hadar, king of Edom (1 Ch 1:50). The name is given as "Pau" (פָּאִ, pâ'î) in Gen 36:39. There is no indication of its position. It is not identified.

PAIN, pân (פָּן, bàn, bâh, bôh, bôh, hôbel, הָלָה, hâlah, hôlahth, hôlah, kâ'hôb, kâ'ñâ, kâ'b'hôb, kôb'hôb, mîgâr, hâlah, mak'hôb, hàbb, hâ'môl, הַזָּה, hâzâ, קְצֵר, kôṣer, hîshô, hânâ, nôsô, pôsô, pânôs, ôôî, ôdâs): These words signifying various forms of bodily or mental suffering are generally tr "pain": 28 out of the 34 passages in which the word is used are in the poetical or prophetical books and refer to conditions of mental disquiet or disharmony due to the punishment of personal or national sin. In one instance only is the word used as a historic record of personal physical pain: the case of the wife of Phinehas (1 S 4:19), but the same verb is used figuratively in Isa 15:8; 21:5; 30:16, and tr "pangs" or "sorrows." In other passages where we have the same comparison of consternation in the presence of God's judgments to the pangs of childbirth, the word used is hîbel, as in Isa 66:7; Jer 13:21; 22:23; 49:24. In some of these and similar passages several synonyms are used in the one verse to intensify the impression, and are tr "pain," "pangs," and "sorrows," as in Isa 15:8.

The word most commonly used by the prophets is some form of פָּן or פָּה, sometimes with the addition as of a word of addition, פָּה, etc.

"Deborah" (Jdg 4:14, 16, 19, 21, 22); Jer 6:34; 22:23; Mic 4:10. This pain is referred to the heart (Ps 109:4) or to the head (Ps 25:6 E). In Ezk 30:4, it is the physical affliction of Ethiopia, and in ver 16 AV "Sin [Tanis] shall have great pain" (RV "anguish"); in Ezk 33:5 E. Ezekiel's words are quoted in the news of the fall of Tyre. Before the invading host of Tyre encircled the city, Ezekiel prophesies much pain in the sense of toil and trouble in Jer 12:13 in the tr of hâlah, a word more frequently rendered grieving or sickness, as in 1 K 8:14; Ps 32:8; Jer 2:5; Jer 5:3. The reduplicated form hâlahh is esp. used of a twisting pain usually referred to the loins (Isa 21:3; Ezek 39:7).

Pain in the original meaning of the word (as it has come down to us through the Old Fr., from the Lait poëme) as a penalty inflicted for personal sin is expressed by the words kâeb'h or kâ'b'h in Job 14:12; 15:20, and in the questioning complaint of the prophet (Jer 15:18). As a judgment on personal sin pain is also expressed by makh'ôb in Job 3:19; Jer 51:8, but this word is used in the sense of infliction in Is. 13:15 (the restoration of "man of sorrows." The Psalms (Ps 25:18) praying for deliverance from the afflictions which he experienced on his lip; in Ps 27:16, as expressing Asaph's disquiet due to his misunderstanding of the word of Providence (Is. 39:6), or of the word of God (Ps 116:3 AV), which Götz hold of the Psalms in his sickness, is the rendering of the word môçה: the same word is tr "distress" in Ps 116:3. The words have a primary meaning of physical twisting, or constriction.

In the NT Ôdîn is tr "pain" (of death, RV "pang") in Acts 2:24. This word is used to express any sort of pain, such as physical (as in Aschyleus, Chôephoti, 211) the pain of intense apprehension. The vb. from this, Ódêndêmai, is used by the Rich Man in the parable to describe his torment (RV "anguish") (Lk 16:24). The related vb. sunodînôb is used in Rom 8:22 and is tr "travailing in pain together." In much the same sense the word is used by Euripides (Helen, 727).

In Rev 12:2 the woman clothed with the sun (bassaniômenë) was in pain to be delivered; the vb. (bassanizô) which means "to torture" is used both in Mt 8:6 in the account of the grievously tormented centurion's servant, and in the description of the laboring of the apostles' boat on the stormy Sea of Galilee (Mt 14:24). It seems to have been a case of spinal meningitis. This vb. occurs in Thucydides vii.86 (viii.92), where it means "being put to torture." In the two passages in Rev where pain is mentioned the word is pônos, the pain which affected those on whom the fifth vial was poured (16:10), and in the description of the City of God where there is no more pain (21:4). The primary meaning of this word seems to be "toil," as in 1 Thess 5:25, but it is used by Hippocrates to express disease (Aphorism. iv.44).

PAINFULNESS, pân'fôl-nës (πάθος, môchhtos): In the summary of his missionary labors in 2 Cor 11:27 AV, St. Paul uses this word. RV renders it "travail," which probably now expresses its meaning most closely, as in Mt 12:38 ("painfulness") is usually restricted to the condition of actual soreness or suffering, although we still use "painstaking" in the sense of careful labor. The Gr word is used for toil or excessive anxiety, as in Euripides (Medea. 136), where it refers to that care for her children which she had lost in her madness. Tindal uses "painfulness" in 1 Jn 4:18 as the tr of xôbaras, katônas, which AV renders "torment" and RV "punishment."

PAINT, pānt (from Old Fr. peintre, frequentative of peindre, Lat. pingō, “to paint”): (1) From Heb. בְּנָה, masheb, “to smear,” “to anoint,” “to paint,” describing the painting of interiors with vermilion, perhaps resembling lacquer: “smiled with cedar, and painted with vermilion” (Jer 22 14). The shields of the Ninevite soldiers were red, presumably painted (Nah 2 3). (2) From noun פָּקָה, pākā, “paint,” “antimony,” “stibium,” “black mineral powder,” used as a cosmetic, to lend artificial size and fancied beauty to the eye, always spoken of as a meretricious device, indicating light or unworthy character. Jezebel “painted her eyes, and attired her head” (2 K 9 30), lit. “put pākā into her eyes”). To the bront city Jerusalem, Jeremiah (4 30) says, “deceast thee . . . en- largest thine eyes with paint” (pākā). AV renders “rentest thy face,” as if the stain were a cut, or the enlarging done by violence. (3) From vb. בָּנָה, kābāl, “to smear,” “to paint.” Ezekiel says to Oholah-Oholibah (Judah-Israel),“disted wash thyself, paint [kābāl] thine eyes,” as the adulteress prepares herself for her paramour (Ezk 23 40). The antimony, in an extremely fine powder (Arab. kuhul, from kābāl), is placed in the eye by means of a very fine rod, bodkin, or probe, drawn between the edges of the eyelids. This distends the eye, and also increases its apparent size, the effect being increased by a line of stain drawn from the corner, and by a similar line prolonging the eyebrow. See EYEPaint; Color. PAIR, pār: The m of Cant 4 2 (but not of the l 6 6) reads, “which are all of them in pairs,” while the text has, “whereof every one hath twins. The Heb. בַּיִל, bēyil, is from a פַּלְא, ‘palal, “double,” and is perhaps susceptible of either meaning. But the description is of sheep, and the m gives no comprehensible figure, while the text points to the exceedingly sleek and healthy appearance. “Pairs” seems to result from confusing the figure with the thing figured—the teeth, where each upper is paired with the corresponding lower.

PALACE, pal’ās: In Heb chiefly בַּיִלְת, ’armôn, in RV text tr* “castle” in 1 K 16 18; 2 K 15 25; בַּיִלְת, bēyilt, the same word often rendered “court,” in RV “courtyard” (Mt 26 35.56.89; Mk 14 54.66; Lk 11 21; Jn 18 15). On the other hand, “palace” takes the place in RV of AV “common hall” or “judgment hall” (παροικίαν, Mt 27 27; Jn 18 28. 30; 19 9; Acts 23 35). See JUDGMENT, HALL OF. A description of Solomon’s palace is given in 1 K 7 1–12 (see TEMPLE). Archaeology has brought to light the remains of great palaces in Egypt, Babylonia, Assyria (Sargon, Sennacherib, Assur-banipal, etc), Syria, etc. See HOUSE.

PALAL, pālāl (פַּלְא, pālāl, “judge”): Sea of Uzal, and one of the repairers of the wall (Neh 3 25).

PALANQUIN, pal-an-kān: In Cant 3 9 occurs פָּרָקָן, parāqān, a word that has no Sem cognates and is of dubious meaning. In form, however, it resembles the Gr. φαράκων, parakōn, both of which mean “litter bed.” Hence RV “palanquin” (ultimately derived from φαράκων). The m “ear of state” and AV “chariot” are mere guesses.

LITERATURE

The word properly means “Philistia,” but appears to be first used in the extended sense, as meaning all the “Land of Israel” or “Holy Land” (Zec 2 12), by Philo and by Ovid and later Rom authors (Reland, Pal Illustr., I, 38–42).

I. Physical Conditions.—The Bible in general may be said to breathe the air of Pal; and it is here intended to show how important for our social consideration is the consideration of its geography, and of the numerous incidental allusions to the natural features, fauna, flora, cultivation, and climate of the land in which most of the Bible books were written. With the later history and topography of Pal, after 70 AD, we are not here concerned, but a short account of its present physical and geological conditions is needed for our purpose.

Pal W. of the Jordan, between Dan and Beersheba, has an area of about 6,000 sq. miles, the length from Hermon southward being nearly 150 miles, and the width gradually increasing from 20 miles on the N. to 60 miles on the S. It is thus about the size of Wales, and the height of the Palestinian mountains is about the same as that of the Welsh. E. of the Jordan an area of about 4,000 sq. miles was included in the land of Israel. The general geographical features are familiar to all.

1. General miles, and the width gradually increasing from 20 miles on the N. to 60 miles on the S. It is thus about the size of Wales, and the height of the Palestinian mountains is about the same as that of the Welsh. E. of the Jordan an area of about 4,000 sq. miles was included in the land of Israel. The general geographical features are familiar to all.

(1) The land is divided by the deep chasm of the Jordan valley, an ancient geological fault continuing in the Dead Sea, where its depth (at the bottom of the lake) is 2,600 ft. below the Mediterranean.

(2) W. of the valley the mountain ridge, which is a continuation of Lebanon, has very steep slopes on the E. and gentle on the S. Its present level during the Pleistocene and Pluvial periods, after which—its peculiar fauna, having developed there in the long ages before the appearance of man. The bed upheaved include: (1) the Nubian Sandstone (of the Green sand period), which was sheared along the line of the Jordan fault E. of the river, and which only appears on the western slopes of Lebanon, (2) the limestone of Upper Pal, and, (3) the soft Eocene limestone, which appears chiefly on the western spurs and in the foothills, the angle of upheaval being less steep than that of the older main formation. On the shores of the Mediterranean a yet later sandy limestone forms the low cliffs of Sharon. See GEOLOGY OF PALESTINE.

As regards fauna, flora and cultivation, it is sufficient here to say that they are still practically the same as described throughout the Bible. The lion and the wild bull and Flora (Box primigenius) were exterminated within historic times, but have left their bones and tracks in Jordan gravel and flint. The bear has gradually retreated to Hermon and Lebanon. The buffalo has been introduced since the Moslem conquest. Among trees the apple has fallen out of cultivation since the Middle Ages, and the cactus has been introduced in the land of corn, wine and oil, and famous for its fruits. Its trees, shrubs and plants are those noticed in the Bible. Its woods have been thinned in Lower Galilee and Northern Sharon, but on the other hand the groves have often grown up in former vineyards and villages, and there is no reason to think that any general desiccation has occurred within the last 40 centuries, such as would affect the rainfall.

The climate of Pal is similar to that of other Mediterranean lands, such as Cyprus, Sicily or Southern Italy; and, in spite of the Delta in Egypt, or of Mesopotamia, the summer heat is oppressive only for a few days at a time, when (esp. in May) the dry wind—deficient in ozone—blows from the eastern desert. For most of the season a moisture-laden sea breeze, rising abo the River, blows at AM, blows throughout all the western slopes of the mountains. In the bare deserts the difference between 90 F. by day and 40 F. by night gives a refreshing cold. With the east wind the temperature rises to 105 F., and the nights are oppressively warm. In autumn, the shade temperature reaches 120 F. In this season mists cover the mountains and swell the grapes. In winter the snow sometimes lies for several days on the watershed ridge and on the summit mountain even Hermon is sometimes quite snowless at 9,000 ft. above the sea. There is perhaps no country in which such a range of climate can be found, from the Alpine to the tropical, and none in which the range of fauna and flora is consequently so large, from the European to the African.

The rainfall of Pal is between 20 and 30 in. annually, and the rainy season is the same as in other Mediterranean countries. The "former rains" begin with the thunderstorms of November, and the "latter rains" cease with April showers. From December to February—except in years of drought—the rains are heavy. In most years the supply is quite sufficient for purposes of cultivation, which begins in autumn, and the corn is rarely spoiled by storms in summer. The fruits ripen in autumn

2. Water-Supply. Pal is abundant, except in the desert regions above noticed, which include the N. and the S. and the E. of the area. The Jordan runs into the Dead Sea, which has no outlet and which maintains its level solely by evaporation, being consequently very salt; the surface is nearly 1,300 ft. below the Mediterranean, whereas the Sea of Galilee (650 ft. below sea-level) is sweet and full of fish. The Jordan is fed, not only by the snows of Hermon, but by many affluent streams from both sides. There are several streams also in Sharon, including the Crocodile River under Carmel. In the mountains, where the hard dolomite limestone is on the surface, perennial springs are numerous. In the lower hills, where this limestone is covered by a softer chalky stone, the supply depends on wells and cisterns. In the Beersheba plains the water, running under the surface, is reached by scooping shallow pits—esp. those near Gerar, to be noticed later.

The fertility and cultivation of any country depends mainly on its geological conditions. Those are favorable for crops as in Pal, and have undergone no change since the age when man first appeared, or since the days of the Hebrew patriarchs. The country was first upheaved from the ocean in the Eocene age, and settled in Miocene age, the great crack in the earth's surface occurred, which formed a narrow gulf stretching from that of the 'Ababah on the

In most years the supply is quite sufficient for purposes of cultivation, which begins in autumn, and the corn is rarely spoiled by storms in summer. The fruits ripen in autumn and suffer only from the occasional appearance of locust swarms. There appears to be no reason to suppose that rainfall has undergone any change since the times of the Bible; and a consideration of Bible allusions confirms this view.

Thus the occurrence of drought, and of consequent famine, is mentioned in the OT as occasional in all times (Gen 12:10; 26:2; 41:50; 7:26; 8:35; 1 K 8:35; and Isa 5:6; Jer 14:1; Joel 1:10-12; Hag 1:11; Zec 14:17), and droughts are also noticed in the Mish (Tal. Kid. 1, 4-7) as occurring even lasting throughout the rainy season till spring. Good rains were a blessing from God, and drought was a sign of His displeasure, in Heb belief (Dt 11:14; Jer 5:24; Joel 2:23). A thunderstorm in harvest time (Nay) was most unusual (1 S 12:17;18), yet such a storm does still occur as a very exceptional phenomenon. By "snow in harvest" (Prov 25:13) we are not to understand a snowstorm, for it is likened to a "faithful messenger," and the reference is to the ice of snow for cooling wine, which is still usual at Damascus. The notice of fever on the shores of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 8:14) shows that this region was as unhealthy as it still is in summer. The decay of irrigation in Sharon may have rendered the land more fertile, but the identity of the Palestinian flora with that of the Bible indicates that the climate, generally speaking, is unchanged.

II. Palestine in the Pentateuch.—The Book of Gen is full of allusions to or connected with the memory of the Heb patriarchs. In the time of the population consisted of

1. Places visited by

visited by tribes, mainly Sem, who came originally from Babylonia, including Canaanites ("greeners") between Sidon and Gaza, and in the Jordan valley, and Amorites ("highlanders") in the mountains (Gen 10:15-19; Nu 13:29). Their language was akin to Heb, and it is only in Egypt that we read of an interpreter being needed (Gen 42:23), while excavated remains of seal-cylinders, and other objects, show that the civilization of Pal was similar to that of Babylonia.

(1) Shechem.—The first place noticed is the shrine or " ALT. altar " (7 8) of Shechem, with the Elion Morch (LXX "high oak"), where Jacob afterward buried the idols of his wives, and where Joshua set up a stone by the "holy place" (Gen 12:6; 35:4; Josh 24:26). Sam tradition showed the site near "the foot of Il. Gerizim". The "Canaanite was then in the land" (in Abraham's time), but was exterminated (Gen 34:25) by Jacob's sons. From Shechem Abraham journeyed southward and raised an altar between Bethel (Bethin) and Hai (Haydn), E. of the town of Luz, the name of which still survives hard-by at the spring of Loch (Gen 12:8; 13:3; 28:11;30:13; 35:2).

(2) The Negeb. —But, on his return from Egypt with large flocks (12:16), he settled in the pastoral region, between Beerseba and the western Kadesh (13:1; 20:1), called in Heb the negeb, "dry" country, on the edge of the cultivated lands. From E. of Bethel there is a fine view of the lower Jordan valley, and here Lot "lifted up his eyes" (13:10), and chose the rich grass lands of that valley for his flocks. The "cities of the Plain" (bikkâr) were clearly in this valley, and Sodom must have been near the river, since Lot's journey to Zoor (19:22) occupied only an hour or two (vs 15:23) through the plain to the foot of the Moab mountains. These cities were here mentioned by Hosea from near the Hebron; but, from the hilltop E. of the city, Abraham could have seen "the smoke of the land" (19:28) rising up. The first land owned by him was the garden of Mamre (13:18; 19:1; 23:19), with the cave-womb which tradition still points out under the floor of the Hebron mosque. His tent was spread under the "oaks of Mamre" (18:1), where his mysterious guests rested "under the tree" (ver 8). One aged oak still survives in the flat ground W. of the city, but this tree was very near the mountains of Judah. In all these incidental touches we have evidence of the exact knowledge of Pal which distinguishes the story of the patriarchs.

(3) Campaign of Amraphel.—Pal appears to have been an outlying province of the empire of Hammurabi, king of Babylon in Abraham's time; and the campaign of Amraphel resembled those of later Assyr overlords exacting tribute of petty kings. The route (14:5-8) lay through Bashan, Gilgal and Moab to kadesh (probably at Petra), and the return through the desert of Judah to the plains of Jericho. Thus Hebron was not attacked (see ver 13), and the pursuit by Abraham and his Amorite allies led up the Jordan valley to Dan, and thence N. of Mount Etna. The Canaanites, whose king blessed Abraham on his return was thought by the Samaritans, and by Jerome, to be the city near the Jordan valley afterward visited by Jacob (14:13; 33:18), but see JERUSALEM.

4. Return to Canaan.—(4) Gerar. —In J. and Ne each of the desert plains, and "sojourned in Gerar" (20:1), now Umm J affar, 7 miles S. of Gaza. The wells which he dug in this valley (26:15) were no doubt shallow excavations like those from which the Arabs still obtain the water. And the surface in the same vicinity (SWP, III, 390), though that at Beersheba (21:25-32), to which Isaac added another (26:23-25), may have been more permanent. Three masonry wells now exist at Bir es Seba, but the masonry of "two men" at this place (21:33) is an interesting touch, since the tree is distinctive of the dry lowlands. From Beersheba Abraham journeyed to "the land of Moriah" (LXX "the high land") to sacrifice Isaac (22:2); and the mountain, according to Heb tradition (2 Ch 3:1), was at Jerus, but according to the Samaritans was Gerizim near the Elion Morch—a summit which could certainly have been seen "far off" (ver 4) on "the third day". Isaac, by Isaac, his father, a well-watered wilderness, at the western Kadesh (25:11) and at Gerar (26:2), suffered like his father in a year of drought, and had similar difficulties to those of the Arabs still obtain the water. In this vicinity we have no remains of such cultivation. Thence he retreated S.E. to Rehoboth (Rubheib), N. of Kadesh, where ancient wells like those at Beersheba still exist (26:22). To Beersheba he finally returned (26:23).

When Jacob fled to Haran from Beersheba (28:10) he slept at the "place" (or shrine) consecrated by Abraham's altar near Bethel, and—the Canaanites were exterminated (Gen 34:25) by Jacob's sons. From Shechem Abraham journeyed southward and raised an altar between Bethel (Bethin) and Hai (Haydn), E. of the town of Luz, the name of which still survives hard-by at the spring of Loch (Gen 12:8; 13:3; 28:11;30:13; 35:2).

(1) Haran to Succoth.—His return journey from Haran to Gilgal raises an interesting question. The distance is about 350 miles from Haran to the Galedor or "witness heap" (31:48) at Mizpah—probably Saf in North Gilead. This distance Laban is said to have covered in 7 days (31:23), which would be possible for a force mounted on riding camels. Abraham was turned to the south when he reached Laban on the 3rd day (ver 22), and some time would elapse before he could gather his "brethren." Jacob with his flocks and herds must have needed 3 weeks for the journey. It is remarkable that the vicinity of Mizpah still presents ancient monuments like the “pillar” (ver 45) round which the “memorial cairn” (gô’ôhr-sâhâdôâhôth) was formed. From this place Jacob journeyed to Mahanaim (pâh-môh’nâ), S. of the Jabbok river—a place which afterward became the capital of South Gilead (Gen 32 1 f; 1 K 4 14); but, on hearing of the advance of Esau from Edom, he retreated across the river (Gen 32 22) and then reached Succoth (33 17), believed to be Tell Der’âla, N. of the stream.

(2) From the Jordan to Hebron.—Crossing the Jordan by one of several fords in this vicinity, Jacob approached Shechem by the perennial stream of Wûdî Fârîn, and camped at Shalem (Sâlîm) on the east side of the fertile plain which stretches thence to Shechem, and here he bought land of the Hivites (33 18-20). We are not told that he dug a well, but the necessity for digging one in a region full of springs can only be explained by Hivite jealousy of water rights, and the well still exists E. of Shechem (cf Jn 4 5 f), not far from the Elon Moreh where were buried the tê’ôphîm (Gen 35 4) or “spirits” (Assyr tarpû) from Haran (31 30) under the oak of Abraham. These no doubt were smallcists, such as are often encountered in Pal. The further progress of Jacob led by Bethel and Bethelhem to Hebron (35 6 19-27), but some of his elder sons seem to have remained at Shechem. Thus Joseph was sent later from Hebron (37 14) to visit his brethren there, but found them at Dothan.

(3) Dothan (37 17) lay in a plain on the main trade route from Egypt to Damascus, which crossed the low watershed at this point and led down the valley to Jezreel and over Jordan to Bashan. The “wood” of Dothan. (1 K 4 11) is still shown at Tell Dîthân, and the Isma‘illite, from Midian and Gilead, chose this easy caravan route (37 25-28) for camels laden with the Gilead balm and spices. The plain was fitted for feeding Jacob’s flocks. The products of Pal then included also honey, pistachio nuts, and almonds (43 11); and a few centuries later we find notice in a text of Thothmes III of honey and balsam, with oil, wine, wheat, spelt, barley and fruits, as rations of the Egyptian troops in the Delta (West Egypt, 21-22).

The episode of Judah and Tamar is connected with a region in the Seperâh, or low hills of Judaea.

4. Mentioned in the Bible—Judah, the latter being in a pastoral valley where with Judah Judah met his sheep shears.”

Tamar sat at “the entrance of Enaim” (of vs 14 22 ERV) or Enam (Josh 15 34), perhaps at Kefr ‘Ana, 6 miles N.W. of Timnah. She was mistaken for a kêtôshehâh, or vavty of Ashrethoth (Gen 38 15 21), and we know from Hammurabi’s laws that such votaries were already recognized. The mention of Judah’s signet and staff (ver 15) also reminds us of Bab customs as described by Herodotus (ibid), and signet-bearers of Babylon, and of early date, have been unearthed in Pal at Gezer and elsewhere (cf the “Bab garment,” Josh 7 21).

Generally speaking, the geography of Gen presents no difficulties, and shows an intimate knowledge of the country, while the allusions to natural products and to customs are in accord with the Bible. Only one difficulty needs notice, where Atad is mentioned (40 10) on the way from Egypt to Hebron, and is described as “beyond the Jordan.” In this case the Assyrian language perhaps helps us, for in that tongue the word “the” is omitted, and the reference may be to the Nile itself, which is called Yâ’ar in Heb (p’ôr) and Assyry alike.

Ex is concerned with Egypt and the Sinai desert, though it may be observed that its simple agricultural laws (chs 21-23), which so often recall those of Hammurabi, and which probably were already in use on the confines of Gilead and Bashan, before crossing the Jordan. In Lev (ch 11) we have a list of animals most of which belong to the desert—as for instance the “coney” or hyrax (Lev 11 5; Ps 104 18; Prov 30 20), but others—such as the swine (Lev 11 7), the stork and the heron (ver 19)—to the Aravab and the Jordan valley, while the hoopoe (AV “lapwing,” ver 19) lives in Gilead and in Western Pal. In Dt (ch 14) the fallow deer and the roe (ver 5) are now inhabitants of Tabor and Gilead, but the “wild goat” (ibex), “wild ox” (bubull), “pygarg” (addax) and “chamois” (wild sheep), are found in the Aravab and in the deserts. In Nu the conquest of Eastern Pal is described, and most of the towns mentioned are known (21 18-33); the notice of vineyards in

7. Numbers—Moab (ver 22) agrees with the discovery of ancient rock-cut wine presses near Heshbon (SEP, 1 221). The view of Israel, in camp at Shittim by Balak (22 41), standing on the top of Pisgah or Mt. Nebo, has become possible by the discovery of Jebel Neba, where also rude dolmens recalling Balak’s altars have been found (SEP, 1 202). The plateau of Moab (32 5) is described as a “land for cattle,” and still supports Arab flocks. The Israel left their cattle, women and children during the wars, for 6 months, stretched (33 49) from Beth-jeshimoth (Swâvinèm), near the northeastern corner of the Dead Sea over Abel-shittim (“the acacia meadow”—a name later been in use), and watered by several brooks, and having good herbage in spring.

(1) Physical allusions.—The description of the “good land” in Dt (8 7) applies in some details with special force to Mt. Gilead, which possesses more perennial streams than Western Pal throughout—“a land of brooks of water, of fountains and springs, flowing forth in valleys and hills.” A land also “of wheat and barley, and vines and fig-trees and pomegranates, a land of olive-trees and honey” is found in Gilead and Bashan. Pal itself is not a mining country, but the words (ver 9) “a land whose stones are iron and copper, and when thou mayest dig copper,” may be explained by the facts that iron mines existed near Beirût in the 10th cent. AD, and copper mines at Pusûn N. of Petra in the 4th cent. AD, as described by Jerome (Onom, e. v. Phîmûn). In Dt also (11 29; cf 27 4; Josh 8 30) Ebal and Gerizim are first noticed, as beside the “oaks of Moreh.” Ebal the mountain of curses (3,077 ft. above sea-level) and Gerizim the mountain of blessings (2,550 ft.) are the two highest tops in Samaria, and Shechem lies in a rich valley between them. The first sacred centre of Israel was thus established at the place where Abraham built his first altar and Jacob dug his well, where Joseph was buried and where Joshua recognized a holy place at the foot of Gerizim (Josh 20 26). The last chapters of Dt record the famous pilgrimage from Mt. Nebo (34 1-3), which answers in all respects to that from Jebel Neba, except as to Dan, and the utmost (or “western”) sea, neither of which is visible. Here we should probably read “toward” rather than “over” (cf. the very similar phraseology of the plains of Shittim whence a better view can be obtained of the Jordan valley, from Zoor to Jericho, of the watershed mountains as far N. as Gilboa and Tabor, and of the slopes of Gilead.

(2) Archaeology.—But besides these physical allusions, the progress of exploration serves to illustrate the doctrine of Dt. Israel was commanded (12 3) to overthrow the Can. altars, to break the standing stones which were emblems of superstition, to burn the 'ashêrah poles (or artificial trees), and to hew down the graven images. That these commands were obeyed is clear. The rude altars and standing stones are now found only in Moab, and in remote parts of Gilead, Bashan, and Galilee, not reached by the power of reforming kings of Judah. The 'ashêrah poles have disappeared, the images are found, only deep under the sand. The third (of Dt 27 17) pronounced against the man who should dare to remove the stone. (See illustration under NEBUCHADNEZZAR.)

III. Palestine in the Historic Books of the OT.—

Josh is the great geographical book of the OT; and the large number of names of places, rivers and mountains of Joshua in Pal mentioned in the Bible are to

(1) Topographical accuracy.—About half of this total of names were known, or were fixed by Dr.
Robinson, between 1838 and 1852, and about 150 new sites were discovered (1872-78, 1881-82) in consequence of the 1-in. trigonometrical survey of the country, and were identified by the present work. The third period; sites have been added by M. Clermont-Ganneau (Adul-ham and Gezer), by Rev A. Henderson (Kiriat-jearim), by Rev. W. F. Birch (Zoar at Tell esh Shaphira), and by others. Thus more than three-quarters of the sites have been fixed with more or less certainty, most of them preserving their ancient names. It is impossible to study this topography without seeing that the Bible writers had personal knowledge of the country; and it is improbable that the Hob in Babylonia, could have possessed that intimate acquaintance with all parts of the land which is manifest in the geographical chapters of Josh. The towns are enumerated in due order by districts; the twelve lower natural Highlands and mountain ridges—and the character of various regions is correctly indicated. Nor can we suppose that this topography refers to conditions subsequent to the return from captivity, for these were quite different. Simeon had ceased to inhabit the south by the time of David (1 Ch 4 24), and the lot of Dan was colonized by men of Benjamin after the captivity (8 12-13; Neh 11 34-35).
Tirzah is mentioned (Josh 12 24) in Samaria, whereas the future capital of Omri is not. Ai is said to have been made “a heap for ever” (8 28), but was inhabited apparently in Isaiah’s time (10
28 = Aiath) and certainly after the captivity (Ezr
2 28; Neh 7 52; 11 31 = Aiha). At latest, the topography seems to be that of Solomon’s age, though it is remarkable that very few places in Samaria are noticed in the Book of Josh.

(2) The passage of the Jordan.—Israel crossed Jordan at the lowest ford E. of Jericho. The river was in flood (Jer 43 1), and the melting snows of Hermon melted (Hos 3 15); the stoppage occurred 20 miles farther up at Adam (Ed-damiêh), the chalky cliffs at a narrow place being probably undermined and falling in, thus damming the stream. A Modern writer asserts that a similar stoppage occurred in the 13th cent. AD near the same point. (See JORDAN RIVER.) The first camp was established at Gilgal (Jîôgalîh), 3 miles E. of Jericho, and a “circle” of 12 stones was erected. Jericho was not at the mediavel site (er Riba) S. of Gilgal, or at the Herodian site (er Riba, but farther W.), but at “Ain es Sultân, close to the mountains to which the spies escaped (2 16). The great mounds were found by Sir C. Warren to consist of sun-dried bricks, and further excavations (see Mittel, der Deutschen Orient-Gesell, December, 1909, No. 41) have revealed little but the remains of houses of various dates.

(3) Joshua’s first campaign.—The first city in the mountains attacked by Israel was Ai, near Hûsgân, 2 miles S. E. of Bethel. It has a deep valley to the N., as described (Josh 8 22). The fall of Ai and Bethel (ver 17) seems to have resulted in the peaceful occupation of the region between Gibeon and Shechem (8 30—9 27); but while the Hivites submitted, the Amorites of Jerus and of the S. attacked Gilboa (10 10), and the Israelites were thrown back in a steep pass of Beth-horon (Beit A’ar) to the plains (10 1—11). Joshua’s great raid, after this victory, proceeded through the plain to Makkedah, now called el Mughdr, from the “cave” (of 10 17), and was on the high road of the Tell el-Far’ah, thus up to Hebron, and “turned” S. to Debir (edh Dâdhûrîyeh), thus subduing the shêphélāh of Judah and the southern mountains, though the capital at Jerus was not taken. It is now very generally admitted that the six letters of the Amorite king of Jerus included in Am Tab may refer to this war. The ‘Abirî or Habirî are therein noticed as a fierce people from Seir, who “destroyed all the rulers,” and who attacked Ajalon, Lachish, Ash-kelon, Keila, and Elah (the latter was reduced to Hebron) and other places (see EXONYS, THE

(4) The second campaign (11 1-14) was against the nations of Galilee; and the Heb victory was claimed as all the “waters of Meron” (ver 5). There is no sound reason for placing these at the Hâlekh lake; and the swampy Jordan valley was a very unlike field of battle for the Can. chariots (ver 6).
The kings noticed are those of Madon (Madînîn), Shimron (Semmûniw), Dor (possibly Tell Tharâh),
“the west,” and of Hazor (Hazûrî), all in Lower Galilee. The success was also to the Styx (Sidôn (ver 8); and Merom may be identical with Shimron-meron (12 20), now Semmûniw, in which case the “waters” were those of the perennial stream in Wadî el Melek, 3 miles to the N., which flow W. to join the lower part of the Kishon.
Shimron-meron was one of the 31 royal cities of Pal. W. of the Jordan (12 9—24).

The regions left unconquered by Josh (13 2-6) were those afterward conquered by David and Solomon, including the Phil. plains, and the Sidonian coast from Meurrâ (el-Mujhârîyeh) northward to Aphek (Af’âsî) in Lebanon, on the border of the Amorite country which lay S. of the “land of the Hittites” (1 4). Southern Lebanon, from Gebal (Jubâl) and the “entering into Hamath” (the Eleutheros Valley) on the W. to Ras el-Bâsîlî (prob. ably at ‘Aiûn Judeîdeh on the northwestern slope of Hermon) was also included in the “land” by David (2 8 6—10). But the whole of Eastern Pal (13 7-28), and of Western Pal, excepting the shore atlands, was given to the sons of Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh), being the strongest, least, appear to have occupied the mountains and the shêphélāh, as far N. as Lower Galilee, before the final allotment.

Thus the lot of Simeon was within that inherited by Judah (19 1—3) that of Joseph partly taken from Ephraim, since Joseph’s lot originally reached to Gezer (16:3); but Benjamin appears to have remained active (cf. 15:1-3; 18:22-25). This lot was larger than that of Ephraim, and Benjamin was not then the "smallest of the tribes" (cf. Josh 19:49). The destruction of the tribe did not occur till after the death of Joshua and Eleazar (Josh 20:28).

The twelve tribes were distributed in various regions which may here briefly be described. Reuben held the Mountain (Waśhār) and Arnon (Wwšā'r) on the east of the Dead Sea. Gad had all the W. of Gilead, being separated from the Ammonites by the upper course of the Jordan. The W. of the Jordan valley E. of the river was included in this lot. Manasseh held Bashan, but later transferred to Gilead. Simeon had the Negeb plateau S. of Bocheth. Judah occupied the mountains S. of Jerusalem, with the mountains of Shechem, but this tribe occupied only the hills, and was unable to drive the Canaanites out of the plains (Josh 17:11-16). Ephraim also complained of the smallness of its lot (ver 15), which lay in rugged country between Bethel and Samaria, including, however, the corn plateau E. of the latter city, Issachar held Mount Tabor and Shechem, with the Jordan valley to the E., but soon became subject to the Canaanites. Zebulon had the hills of Lower Galilee, and all the S. coast from Acre to Tyre. Asher had the hills W. of Naphtali, and the narrow slopes from Acco to Tyre. Thus each tribe possessed a proportion of mountain land fit for cultivation of vines, olives and corn, and of arable land fit for cultivation. The areas of these tribes corresponded to the size and prosperity of the various regions which they were able to command.

The Levitical cities were fixed in the various tribes as centers for the teaching of Israel (Dt 33:10), but a Levite was not obliged to live in such a city, and was expected to go to his course annually to the sacred center, before they retreated to Jerusalem on the occasion of the conquest of the kingdom (2 Ch 11:14). The 48 cities (Josh 21:13-42) include 13 in Judah and Benjamin for the priests, among which Beth-shemesh (1 S 6:13-15) and Anathoth (1 K 2:6) are expressly named as Levitical. The other tribes had 3 or 4 such cities each, divided among Kohathites (10), Gershonites (13), and Merarites (12). The six cities of Refuge were included in the total, and were placed 3 each on the E. and W. of the Jordan, namely Hebron, Shechem and Kedesh on the W., and Bezer (unknown), Ramoth (Reinon) and Golan (probably Sukhem el Jaulan) on the E. of the river. Another less perfect list of these cities, with 4 on each side of the Jordan, and Abel-mizraim in the S., is given in 1 Ch 6:57-81. Each of these cities had "suburbs," or open spaces, extending (Nu 35:4) about a quarter-mile beyond the walls, while the fields, to about half a mile distance, also belonged to the Levites (2 K 25:34).

1. Early Wars.—In Jgs, the stories of the heroes who successively arose to save Israel from the heathen carry us to every part of the country. After the death of Joshua" (cf. Judges 1:1-2:12, 18:21-25), which occupied 15 years (of Josh 15:15-19) as lying in a "dry" (AV "south") region, yet with springs not far away. The actual site (edh Dāhēreš) is a village with ancient tombs 12 miles S.W. of Hebron; it has no springs, but about 7 miles to the N.E. there is a mountain stream with "upper and lower springs." As regards the Philistian cities (Jgs 1:18), the LXX reading seems preferable; for the Gr says that Jashub "did not take Gaza" nor Ashkelon nor Ekron, which agrees with the statement that the destruction of the tribe did not occur till after the death of Joshua and Eleazar (20:28).

And Canaanite enemies, or Even the Canaanites having "chariots of iron." The Can. chariots are often mentioned about this time in the Am Tab and Egypt accounts speak of their being plated with metals. Manasseh, Ephraim, Zebulun, Asher and Naphtali, were equally powerless against cities in the plains (vs 27-33); and Israel began to mingle with the Canaanites, while the tribe of Dan seems never to have really occupied its allotted region, and remained encamped in the borders of Judah till some, at least, of its warriors took refuge under Hormon (1:34; 18:1-30) in the time of Jonathan, the grandson of Moses.

(2) Defeat of Sisera.—The oppression of Israel by Jabin II of Hazor, in Lower Galilee, appears to have occurred in the time of Rameses II, who, in his 8th year, conquered Shalem (Sâlôm, N. of Tannach), Anem ('Anîm), Dapur (Debêrîâh, at the foot of Tabor), with Bethanath (Arînâtha) in Upper Galilee (Brugsch, Hist Egypt, II, 64). Sisera may have been a successor of E. as recorded in the time of Jabin (3:4); his victory occurred near the foot of Tabor (ver 14) to which he advanced E. from Harosheh (el Harâthîykh) on the edge of the sea plain. His host "perished at Endor" (Ps 83:9), and fled into the camp of the Philistines (Nu 21:32). The tale of the Kedesh in "the plain of swamps" (4:11) to which he fled is doubtful. Perhaps Kedesh of Issachar (1 Ch 6:72) is intended at Tell Kedès, 3 miles N. of Tannach, for the plain is here swampy in parts. The list of cities is thought to belong from Taanach to Megiddo (6:19), but the old identification of the latter city with the Rom town of Legio (Legiân) was a mere guess which does not fit with Egypt accounts placing Megiddo near the Jordan. The large site at Mâqatî's, in the Valley of Jezreel seems to be more suitable for all the OT as well as for the Egypt accounts (SWP, II, 90-99).

Gideon's Victory.—The subsequent oppression by Midianites and others would seem to have coincided with the troubles which occurred in the 8th year of Minuchesh (see EXOD. XIV) Gideon's home (Jgs 6:11) at Ophrah, in Manasseh, is placed by Sam tradition at Fe'ara, 6 miles W. of Shechem, but his victory was won in the Valley of Jezreel (7:1-22), the sites of Beth-shittah (She'âthâ) and Abiezer (Abîezér) to the E., and of the ravens' rock and "the wolf's hollow" (cf. 7:25, W. of the Jordan. It is remarkable (as pointed out by the present author in 1874) that, 3 miles N. of Jericho, a sharp peak is now called "the ravens' nest," and a ravine 4 miles farther is named "the wolf's hollows." These sites are rather farther S. than might be expected, unless the two chiefs were separated from the fugitives, who followed Zebah and Zalmunna to Gilead. In this episode "Mt. Gilead," (7:3) seems to be a clerical error for "Mt. Gilboa," unless the name survives in corrupt form at 'Ain Jâlûtâ (Goliath's spring), which is a large pool, usually supposed to be the spring of Harod (7:1), where Gideon camped, E. of Jezreel. The story of Abimelech takes us back to Shechem. He was made king by the "oak of the pillar" (9:6), which was no doubt Abraham's oak already noticed; it seems also to be called 'the enchanter's oak' (ver 57), probably from some superstition connected with the burial of the Teraphim under it by Jacob. The place called Beer, to which Jotham fled from Abimelech (ver 21), may have been Bearoth (Birch) in the lot of Benjamin. Thebez, the town taken by the latter (ver 50), and where he met his death, is now the village Tūba, 10 miles N.E. of Shechem.

The Ammonite oppression of Israel in Gilead occurred about 300 years after the Heb conquest (11 26), and Jephthah the deliverer returned to Bethel (ver 28), which was probably the present village Sūf (already noticed), from his exile in the "land of Tob" (vs 36). This may have been near Yāsibeh, 9 miles S. of Gadarā, in the extreme N. of Gilead—a place notable for its ancient dolmens and huge stone monuments which occur also at Mizpah. Jephthah's dispute with the men of Ephraim (12 1) indicates the northern position of Mizpah. Aroer (11 33) is known, but lay near Rabbath-ammon (Josh 13 25; 2 S 54 5); it is to be distinguished from Aroer (Ar'ār) in the Arnon ravine, mentioned in Jgs 11 26.

The scene of Samson's exploits lies in the shāfēlah of Judah on the borders of Philistia. His home at Zorah (Sūrāh) was on the hills N. of the Valley of Sorek, and looked down on the camp of Dan (7 1), then pitched on a flat valley near Beth-shemesh. Eshtaol (Eshho'ā) was less than 2 miles E. of Zorah on the same ridge. Timnath (14 1) was only 2 miles W. of Beth-shemesh, at the present ruin Tūmeh. The region was one of vineyards, and the name Sorek (Makir) still survives at a ruin 2 miles W. of Zorah. Sorek signified a "choice vine," and a rock-cut wine press exists at the site (SWP, III, 126). These 5 places, all close together, were also close to the Philistine lands (15 5) in a region of vines and olives. Samson's place of refuge in the "left of the rock of Etam" (see 15 8) was probably at Beit 'Attāb, only 5 miles E. of Zorah, but rising with a high knob above the southern precipices of the gorge which opens into the Valley of Sorek. In this knob, under the village, is a rock passage now called "the well of refuge" (Bīr el Hāsūtāt), which may have been the "left" into which Samson "went down." Lehi (ver 9) was apparently in the valley beneath, and the name ("the jaw") may refer to the narrow mouth of the gorge whence, after conference with the Philis, the men of Judah "went down" (ver 11) to the "left of the rock of Etam" (SWP, III, 83, 137), which was a passage 250 ft. long leading down, under the tops of the cliffs (S 7?); it is still inhabited. It is connected with this one valley (for Dēllālah also lived in the "Valley of Sorek," 16 4) excepting his visit to Gaza, where he carried the gates to the "hill facing Hebron" (16 3), traditionally shown (SWP, III, 137), to prevent the enemy from the town where he died, and where his tomb is (wrongly) shown. Another tomb, close to Zorah, represents a more correct tradition (16 31), but the legends of Samson at this village are of modern Christian origin.

The appendix to Jgs includes two stories concerning Levites who both lived in the time of the 2d generation after the Heb conquest (18 30; 20 28), and who both "sojourned" in Bethelhem of Jehovah (17 5; 19 2), though their proper city was one in Mt. Ephraim. In the first case Jonathan, the grandson of Moses, founded a family of idolatrous priests, setting up Micah's image at Dan (Tell el Kāfī) beside the sources of the Jordan, where ancient dolmen altars still exist. This image may have been the cause why Jeroboam afterward established a calf-temple at the same place. It is said to have stood there till the "captivity of the ark" (St. Petersburg MS, Jgs 16 30), "all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh" (vs 14). From this narrative we learn that the tribe of Dan did not settle in its appointed lot (18 1), but pitched in the "camp of Dan," west of Kiriath-jearim (ver 12). This agrees with the former mention of the site (13 25) as being near Zorah; and the open valley near Beth-shemesh is visible, through the gorges of Lehi, from the site of Kiriath-jearim at 'Erma.

(4) Appendix: Defeat of Benjamin.—In the 2d episode we trace the journey of the Levites from Bethlehem past Jerus to Gibeath ('Je'ū'). From Ramah (er-Rām), a distance which could easily be traversed in an afternoon (cf 19 8-14), Gibeath was no doubt selected as a halting-place by the Levite, because it was a Levitical city. The story of the great crime of Gibeath and the known to Hosea (9 9). Israel gathered against them at Mizpah (Tell en Nāsbeh) on the watershed, 3 miles to the N.W., and the ark was brought by Phinehas to Bethel (cf 20 1 31; 16 25 27), 5 miles N.E. of Mizpah. The defeat of Benjamin occurred where the road to Gibeath leaves the main north road to Bethel (ver 31), W. of Ramah. The survivors fled to the rock Ramrôn (Rummān), 3 1/2 miles E. of Bethel, on the edge of the "wilderness" which stretches from this rugged hill toward the Jordan valley. The position of Shiloh, 9 miles N. of this rock, is very accurately described (21 19) as being N. of Bethel (Be'tūn), and E. of the main road, thence to Shechem which passed Lebonah (Lābūn), 3 miles N. of the village S. of the N.W. of Sēlēth or Shiloh. The "vineyards," in which the maidens of Shiloh used to dance (ver 20) at the Feast of Tabernacles, lay no doubt where vineyards still exist in the little plain S. of this site. It is clear that the writer of these two narratives had a sound knowledge of Palestinian topography as exact as that shown throughout Jgs. Nor (if the reading "captivity of the ark" be correct) is there any reason to suppose that they were written after 722 BC.

The Book of Ruth gives us a vivid picture of Heb life "when the judges ruled" (1 1 AV), about a century before the birth of David. Laws as old as Hāmmerūbi's age allowed the widow the choice of remaining with her husband's family, or of quitting his house (cf 1 8). The beating out of gleanings (2 17) by women is still a custom which accounts for the rock mortars found so often scooped out on the hillside. The villagers still sleep, as a guard, beside the heap of winnowed corn in the threshing-floor (S 7?); to-day they still set out in the morning to trample it. The barley has been used to carry six measures of barley (ver 15). The courteous salutation of his reapers by Boaz (2 4) recalls the common Arab, greeting (Allah mālākum), "God be with you." But the thin wine (ver 14) is the "current" of the Semitic peasants, who only "dip" their bread in oil.

(1) Samuel.—The two Books of S present an equally valuable picture of life, and an equally real topography throughout. Samuel 4 Books of Saul's father—apious Levite (1 Samuel 6 27)—descended from Zuph who had lived at Ephrathah (Bethlehem; cf 1 S 9 4 5), had his house at Ramah (1 19) close to Gibeath, and this town (er-Rām) was Samuel's home also (7 17; 25 1). The family is described as "Ramathites, Zuphites of Mt. Ephraim" (1 18), but the term "Mt. Ephraim" was not confined to the lot of Ephraim, since it included Bethel and Ramah, in the land of Benjamin (Jgs 4 5). As a Levite, Elikanah obeyed the law of making annual visits to the central shrine, though this custom had to be generally observed in an age when "every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Jgs 21 25). The central shrine had been removed by Joshua from Shechem to the remote site of Shiloh (Josh 18 1), perhaps on the top of this, and here the tabernacle (ver 19) was pitched (cf 1 S 22 22) and remained for 4 centuries till the death of Eli. The great defeat of Israel, when the ark was captured by the Philis, took place not far from Mizpah (4 1), although the track from Shiloh (cf ver 12). Ekron, whence it was sent back (16 16), was only 12 miles from Beth-shechem ("Ain shems"); where the ark rested on a "great stone" (LXX, ver 18); and Beth-shechem was only 4 miles W of Bethel. Jonathan slew (vers 1-7) which placed the latter was probably removed after Eli's death, when Shiloh was deserted. The exact site of Nob is not known, but probably (cf Isa 10 22) it was close up to Mizpah, whence the first glimpse of Jerus. is caught, and thus near Gibea, where it was laid apart. to "the shed of the priest"" (1 S 21 1; 22 18; 2 Ch 1 3), when the ark was again taken to Kirath-jearim (2 S 6 2). Mizpah (Tell en-Naheb) was the gathering-place of Israel under Samuel, and the "stone of help" (Ehren-zeer) was erected, after his victory over the Philis, "between Mizpah and Shen" (1 S 7 12)—the latter place (see LXX) being probably the same as Jeshanan ("Ein Sinai"). 6 miles N of Mizpah which Samuel visited yearly as a judge (ver 16).

(1) "The journey of Saul, who, "seeking assed found a kingdom," presents a topography which has often been misunderstood. He started (9 4) from Gibea ("Jebus") and went first to the land of Shalisha through Mt Ephraim. Baal-shalisha (2 K 4 12) appears to have been the present Kefer Thilth, 18 miles N of Lydda and 24 miles N.W. of Gibea. Saul then searched the land of Shaim—probably that of Shaul (1 S 13 17), N.E. of Gibeah. Finally he went south beyond the border of Benjamin (10 2) to a city in the "land of Zuph," which seems probably to have been Bethel, whence (as above remarked) Samuel's family—descendants of Zuph—came originally. If so, it is remarkable that Saul and David were concealed the fact of his anointing (10 16) till the lot fell upon him at Mizpah. This public choice by lot has been thought (Wellhausen, Hist Israel, 1885, 252) to indicate a double narrative, but to a Hebrew there would not appear to be any discrepancy, since "The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of Jah" (Prov 16 33). Even at Mizpah he was not fully accepted till his triumph over the Ammonites, when the kingdom was "renewed" at Gilgal (11 14). This cam. was celebrated with great rejoicing. Only 7 days' respite was allowed to the men of Jabesh in Gilead (11 3), during which news was sent to Saul at Gibeah, and messengers dispatched "through the borders of Israel" (ver 7), while the host went on to the battle. Saul at Gibeah on the 7th or 8th day (vs 8-10 at dawn. Bezeck appears to be a different place from that W. of Jerus (Jgs 1 4) and to have been in the middle of Pal at Beth, 14 miles N. of Shechem, and 25 miles W. of Gibeah, which probably lay by the road through the Gilead. It is not difficult for the messengers would not have exceeded 80 miles; and, allowing a day for the news to reach Saul and another for the march from Bezek to Jabesh, there would have been just time for the gathering of Israel at this fairly central meeting-place.

The scene of the victory over the Philis at Michmash is equally real. They had a 'post' in Gaba (or Gibeon, 13 3), or a governor (cf LXX), whom Jonathan slew. They came up to Michmash (Mikmads) to attack Jonathan's force which held Gibeah, on the southern side of the Michmash valley, hard by. The northern cliff of the great gorge was called Bozae ("shining") in contrast to the south here called Besech or "thorn" (14 4). Jos (BII, V, ii, 2) says that Gibeon of Saul was by "the valley of thorns," and the ravine, flanked by the two precipitous cliffs E. of Michmash, is still called Wady es Suwewet, or "the valley of little thorn trees." Jonathan climbed the steep slope that leads to a small flat top (1 S 14 14 AV), and surprised the Phili 'post.' The pursuit was by Bethel to the Valley of Ajalon, down the steep Beth-horon pass (vs 23 31); but it should be noted that there was no "wood" (vs 25 26) on this bare hilly ridge, and the word (cf Cant 5 1) evidently means "honeycomb." It is also possible that the altar raised by Saul, for fulfilment of the Law (Gen 9 4; Ex 20 25), was at Nob where the central shrine was then established.

(4) David's early life—David's early life—David's early life—David's early life—David's early life—David's early life—David's early life—David's early life—David's early life. The wilderness below Bethel, where many a silent and dreadful "Valley of Shadows" (cf Ps 23 4) might make the stoutest heart fail. The lion crept up from the Jordan valley, and (on another occasion) the bear came out on the rugged mountains above (1 S 17 34). No bears are now known S. of Hermon, but the numerous references (2 K 2 24; Isa 59 11; Hos 13 8; Prov 17 12; 28 15) show that they must have been exterminated, like the leprosy, in comparatively late times. The victory over Goliath, described in the chapter containing this allusion, occurred in the Valley of Elah near Shochoth (Shuweteh); and this broad valley (Wady es Sual) ran into the Phili plain at the probable site of Gath (Tell es S'elle) to which the pursuit led (1 S 17 12 52). The watercourse still preserves "smooth stones" (ver 40) fit for the sling, which is still used by Arab shepherds; and the valley still has in it fine "terebinths" such as those from which the story of Goliath's armor of the giant (vs 5 6) indicates an early stage of culture, which is not contradicted by the mention of an iron spearhead (ver 7), since iron is found to have been in use in Pal long before David's time. The story of Goliath being taken "to Jerus" is also capable of explanation. Jerus was not conquered till at least 10 years later, but it was a general practice (as late as the 7th cent. BC in Assyria) to preserve the heads of dead foes by salting them, and it was probably done in another case (2 K 10 7) when the heads of Abah's sons were sent from Samaria to Jezered to be exposed at the gate.

David's outlaw life began when he took refuge with Samuel at the "settlements" (Nacho) near Ramah, where the company of prophets lived. He easily met Jonathan near Gibeon, which was only 2 miles E.; and the "stone of departure" ("Ezel," 1 S 20 19) may have marked the Levitical boundary of that town. Nob also (21 1) was, as we have seen, not far off, reached Bezech on the 7th or 8th day (vs 8-10 at dawn). The boundary Thence David retraced the road of the Valley of Elah to Adullam (Aid-el-ma), which stood on a hill W. of this valley near the great turn (southeastward) of its upper course. An inhabited cave still exists at Wady es Yellah (vert 6 25) and there is a repetition of this requirement (Sfl P, III, 311, 347, 361 67). Keilah (25 1) is represented by the village Kila, on the east. side of the same valley, 3 miles farther up; and Hereth (25 3) was also near, but "in Judah" (23 3), as at the village Khorais on a wooded spur 7 miles N.W. of Hebron and near the "downland" (ver 2) to Kidseh 2 miles away to the W. As there was no safety for the outlaws, either in Philistia or in Judah, they had to retreat to the wilderness of Ziph (Tell ez Zif), 4 miles S.E. of Hebron. The word "wood" (hâresh) may more probably be a proper name, represented by the ruin of Khorais, rather more than a mile S. of Ziph, while the hill Hachilah (ver 19) might be the long spur, over the Jeshimon or desert of Judah, 6 miles E. of Ziph, now known as Maum (Mpera) on the edge of the same desert still farther S., about 8 miles from Hebron. En-gedi (23 29; 24 1 2) was on the precipices by the Dead Sea. The "wild goats" (ibex) still exist here in large droves, and the caves of this desert are still used as fold for sheep in spring (ver 3). The villagers S. of Hebron are indeed remarkable for their large flocks—which by agreement with the nomads—are sent to pasture in the Jeshimon, like those of Nabal, the rich man of Carmel (Karmel), near Nazareth (25 2), who refused the customary present to David's band which had protected his shepherds "in the fields" (ver 15) or pastures of the wilderness. In summer David would naturally return to the higher ridge of Hachilah (25 1) on the south side of which there was a large (impassable save by a long detour), across which he talked to Saul (ver 13), likening himself (ver 20) to the desert "partridge" still found in this region.

(7) Early years of David's reign.—David, till the 5th year of his reign, was king of Judah only. The first battle with Saul's son occurred at Gibeon (2 S 2 13), where Saul's "pool" was captured, as Saul himself was probably the Sayra, Malhâkhâh ("cliff of slippings" or "of slippings away", near Maum of 1 S 23 19 24 28), which lay farther S. than Ziph.

(8) Hebrew letter-writing.—In this connection we find the first notice of a "letter" (11 14) as written by David to Joab. Writing is of course noticed as early as the time of Moses when—as we now know—the Canaanites wrote letters on clay tablets in cuneiform script. These, however, were penned by special scribes, and such a scribe is mentioned at Ugarit (Ugarit Expedition). The list of cities to which David sent presents at the time of Saul's death (30 20 31) includes those near Ziklag and as far N. as Hebron, thus referring to "all the places where David himself and his men were wont to haunt.

(9) Wellhausen:-theory of a double narrative.—The study of David's wanderings, it may be noted, and of the climatic conditions in the Jeshimon desert, does not serve to confirm Wellhausen's theory of a double narrative, based on the secret sunction and public choice of Saul, on Gibeon, and of the fact that an obsequious king had forgotten the name of David's father. The history is not a "pious make-up" without a "word of truth" (Wellhausen, Hist Israel, 48 49); and David as a "youth" of twenty years, may yet have been called a "man after my own heart" (Ps 13 1 2 18), without being recognized by the reader of this genuine chronicle. Nor was there any "Apelik in Sharon" (p 200), and David did not "amuse himself by going first toward the north" from Gibeon (p 267); his visit to Ramah does not appear to be a "worthless anachronistic anecdote" (p 271); and no one who has visited the terrible Jeshimon could regard the meeting at Hachilah as a "jest" (p 265). Nor did the hill ("the dusky top") "take its name from the" (Wellhausen) "desert road" (ver 4) to Kidseh 2 miles away to the W. As there was no safety for the outlaws, either in Philistia or in Judah, they had to retreat to the wilderness of Ziph (Tell ez Zif), 4 miles S.E. of Hebron. The word "wood" (hâreš) may more probably be a proper name, represented by the ruin of Khorais, rather more than a mile S. of Ziph, while the hill Hachilah (ver 19) might be the long spur, over the Jeshimon or desert of Judah, 6 miles E. of Ziph, now known as Maum (Mpera) on the edge of the same desert still farther S., about 8 miles from Hebron. En-gedi (23 29; 24 1 2) was on the precipices by the Dead Sea. The "wild goats" (ibex) still exist here in large droves, and the caves of this desert are still used as fold for sheep in spring (ver 3). The villagers S. of Hebron are indeed remarkable for their large flocks—which by agreement with the nomads—are sent to pasture in the Jeshimon, like those of Nabal, the rich man of Carmel (Karmel), near Nazareth (25 2), who refused the customary present to David's band which had protected his shepherds "in the fields" (ver 15) or pastures of the wilderness. In summer David would naturally return to the higher ridge of Hachilah (25 1) on the south side of which there was a large (impassable save by a long detour), across which he talked to Saul (ver 13), likening himself (ver 20) to the desert "partridge" still found in this region.
(9) Last years of David's reign.—On the rebellion of Absalom David retreated to Mahanaim, apparently by the road N. by the Mount of Olives, if the Tq of Jerusalem (2 K 15 5) be correct. In place of Bahurim at Almon (Abin), N.E. of Jerus. It is not clear where the "wood of Ephraim," in which Absalom perished, may have been, but it was beyond Jordan in Gilead (17 22; 18 6); and oak woods are more common there than in Western Pal. The latest revolt, after Absalom's death, was in the extreme north at Abel (Abib), in Upper Galilee (20 14), after which Joab's journey is the last incident to be studied in the Books of S. For census purposes he was king of the Jordan valley (perhaps the city on the Arnon), to the "river of Gad" (Wady Na'â'dâr) near Jazer, and through Gilead. Tahim-hodshi (24 6) is believed (on the authority of three Gr MSS) to be a corruption of the "Hittites to Kadesh" (Kodes), the great city on the Orontes (see Hirîtîttes), which lay on the northern boundary of David's dominions, of the kingdom of Hamath. Thence Joab returned to Zidon and Tyre, and after visiting all Judah to Beersheba reached Jerus again within 10 months. The acquisition of the temple-site then closes the book.

(1) Solomon's provinces.—The Books of K contain also some interesting questions of geography. Solomon's twelve provinces appear to answer very closely to the lots of the twelve tribes described in Josh. They included (1 K 4 7-19) the following: (a) Ephraim, (b) Dan, (c) Southern Judah (see Josh 12 17), (d) Manasseh, (e) Issachar, (f) Northern Gilead and Bashan, (g) Southern Gilead, (h) Naphtali, (i) Asher, (j) part of Issachar and probably Zebulun (the text is doubtful, for the order of ver 17 differs in LXX), (k) Benjamin, (l) Reuben. LXX renders the last clause (ver 19), "and one Nephesh [i.e. officier] in the land of Judah," probably superior to the other twelve. Solomon's dominions included Philistia and Southern Syria, and stretched along the trade route by Tadmor (Palmyra) to Tischlah on the Euphrates (vs 21.24; of 9 18=Tamar; 2 Ch 8 4=Tadmor). Another Tischlah (now Tishlah) lay 6 miles S.W. of Shechem (2 K 15 16). Gezer was presented to Solomon's wife by the Pharaoh (1 K 9 16).

(2) Geography of the Northern Kingdom.—Jeroboam was an Ephraimite of Zereda, probably 30 miles N.W. of Bethel, but the LXX reads "Sarâir," which might be Sûrâr, 1 1/2 miles E. of Shiloh. After the revolt of the ten tribes, "Shishak king of Egypt" (11 40; 14 25) sacked Jerus. His own record, though much damaged, shows that he not only invaded the mountains near Jerus, but that he even conquered part of Galilee. The border between Israel and Judah lay S. of Bethel, where Jeroboam's calf-temple was erected (12 28), Ramah (er-Râm) being a frontier town with Qevas and Mizpah (15 17 23); but after the Syrian raid into Galilee (ver 20), the capital of Israel was fixed at Tirzah (ver 21), a place celebrated for its beauty (Cant 6 4), and perhaps to be placed at Tâerêzr, about 11 miles N.E. of Shechem, in romantic scenery above the Jordan valley. Omri reigned here also for six years (16 23) before he built Samaria, which remained the capital till 722 BC. Samaria appears to have been a city at least as large as Jerus, a strong site 5 miles N.W. of Shechem, commanding the road which ran to its west. It resisted the Syrians for 3 years, and when it fell Sargon took away 27,290 captives. Excavations at the site will, it may be hoped, yield results of value not as yet published. See next article.

The wanderings of Elijah extended from Zarephath (Sourân), S. of Sidon, to Damascus. The position of the Brook Cherith (17 3) where—according to one reading—"the Arabs brought him bread and flesh" (17 6) is not known. The site of this great contest with the prophets of the Tyrian Baal is supposed to be at el Mahrâkah ("the place of burning") at the southeastern end of the Carmel ridge. Some early king of Israel perhaps, or one of the judges (cf Dt 33 19), had built an altar to Jeh above the Kishon (1 K 18 20.40) at Carmel; but, as the water (ver 35) probably came from the river, it is doubtful whether this altar was on the "top of Carmel," 1,500 ft. above, from which Elijah's servant had full view of the sea (vs 42.43). Elijah must have run before Ahab no less than 15 miles, from the nearest point on Carmel (ver 46) to Jezreel, and the journey of the Shunammite woman to find Elisha (2 K 4 25) was equally long. The vineyard of Naboth in Jezreel (1 K 21 1) was perhaps on the east of the city (now Zer'in), where rock-out wine presses exist. In the account of the ascension of Elijah, the expression "went down to Bethel" (2 K 2 2) is difficult, if he went "from Gilgal" (ver 1). The town intended might be Jîyânâ, on a high hill 7 miles N. of Bethel. LXX, however, reads 'they came.'

(3) Places connected with Elisha.—The home of Elisha was at Abel-meholah (1 K 19 16) in the Jordan valley (Jgs 7 22), probably at Ain Huleh, 10 miles S. of Beth-shan. If we suppose that Ophel (2 K 5 24 RVm), where he lived, was the present Afulah, it is not only to understand that he would often "pace by Shunem" (which lay between Ophel and Abel-meholah), but also how Naaman might have gone from the palace of Jezreel to Ophel, and thence to the Jordan and back again to Ophel (vs 6.14.24), in the course of a single day in his chariot. The road down the valley of Jezreel was easy, and up it Jehu afterward drove furiously, coming from Ramoth in Gilead, and visible afar off from the wall of Jezreel (9 20). The top of the asents' (ver 13), at Ramoth, refers no doubt to the high hill on which this city (now Re'mâ) stood as a strong fortress on the border between Israel and the Syrians. The flight of Ahaziah of Judah, from Jezreel was apparently N. by Gur (Kârûn), 4 miles W. of Ibleam (Yebâla), on the road to the "garden house" (Bêt Je'n), and thence by Megiddo (Mo'âz) down the Jordan valley to Jerus (9 27.28). Of the rebellion of Moab (2 K 1 1; 3 4) it is enough to point out here that King Meshia's account on the M S agrees with the OT, even in the minute detail that "men of Gad dwelt in Ataroth from of old" (cf Nu 32 34), though it lay in the lot of Reuben.

The topographical notices in the books written after the captivity require but short notice. The Benjaminites built up Lod (Luds), Ono (Kofran) and Abu Gosh (Abu), which are found to the south of the list of the hosts of III, a century before the Heb conquest, mentioned in Chronicles (2 Chron 13 16). There is much less information not to be found elsewhere in the OT. His list of Rehoboth's fortresses (2 Chron 11 10) includes 14 towns, most of which were on the frontiers of the diminished kingdom of Judah, some being noticed (such as Shear and Tamar) by Moses in Edom. He speaks of the "valley of Sorekith" (14 10), now Wady Safah, which is otherwise unnoticed, and places it correctly at Mearasha (Mezarsh), on the edge of the Philo plain. He is equally clear about the topography in describing the attack on Jezebel by the Ammonites, Moabites and Edomites. They camped at En-gedi (Cain Jida), and marched W toward Tokha (Takha), to reach an ambiguous spot, after an attempt. Heb victory, was in the valley of Beraea (2 Chron 30 19 20 36), which retains its name as Beka'at, 4 miles W.

IV. Palestine in the Poetic Books of the OT.—In Job the scene is distinctly Edomite. Ub (Job 1 1; cf Gen 22 21 E RV; Jer 25 20; 26 of Job 15 24) are the Assyrian Ezau and Bazu reached by Esarhaddon in 673 BC S. of Edom. Tena and Sheba (Job 6 19) are noticed yet earlier, by Tiglath-pileser III, and Sargon, who conquered the Thamudites and Nabataeans. We have also the connexion of snow-capped mountains and ice (Job 6 16) with notice of the desert and the 'Arabah valley (24 5), which could hardly apply to any region except Edom. Again, we have a nomad population dwelling close to a city (29 4 7)—perhaps, or rather, there were mines, not in the Sinai desert, but at Punon in Northern Edom (cf 28 2 11). The white broom (30 4) is distinctive of the deserts of Moab and Edom. The wild ass and the ostrich (39 13 14) are known only in the desert E. of the Dead Sea, while the stork (39 13 RVm) could have been found only in the 'Arabah, or in the Jordan valley. The wild ox (39 9 RV), or Bos primigenius, is now extinct (LXX "unicorn", Nu 23 22; Dt 33 17), though it abounds in the Jordan valley. It was hunted in the 1330 BC in Syria by Tiglath-pileser I (cf Ps 29 6), and is mentioned as late as the time of Isaiah (34 7) in connection with Edom; its Heb name (ger kau), attached to a representative of the beast, as regards the crocodile ("Leviathan," 41 1), it was evidently well known to the writer, who refers to its strong, musky smell (ver 31), and it existed not only in Egypt but in Pal, and is still found in the Crocodile River, N. of Caesarea in Sharon. Beemoth (40 13), though commonly supposed to be the hippopotamus, is more probably the elephant (on account of its long tail, its trunk, and its habit of feeding in mountains, vs 17 20 24); and the elephant was known to the Assyrians in the 9th cent. BC, and was found wild in the Euphrates in the 16th cent. BC. The physical allusions in Job seem clearly, as a rule, to point to Edom, as do the geographical names; and though Christian tradition in the 4th cent. AD St. Silva, who shared the Urn in the four times of the LXX (42 18) defines it as lying "on the boundary of Edom and Arabia." None of these allusions serves to fix dates, or do the peculiarities of the language, though they suggest Aram. and Arab. influences. The mention of Babyloniens (1 17) (Kasdim) as raiders may, however, point to about 600 BC, since they could not have reached Edom except from the N., and did not appear in Pal between the time of Amraphel (who only reached Kades-harcha) and of Nebuchadrezzar (Ps 10 15) E. of the plateau to 6,700 ft. above sea-level; but there may be a reference to the time of Solomon, being the last in the original collection of 'prayers of David' (ver 20). In Ps 5 8 we find a confederacy of Edom, Ishmael, Moab and the Hagarines (or "wanderers") E. of Pal; (cf 1 Ch 5 18-22) with Gebal (in Lebanon), Ammon, Amaele, and Tyre, all in alliance with Assyria—a condition which first existed in 732 BC, when Tiglath-pileser III conquered Damascus and the Hagarines to the E. (25 1-32) tribes points to this date (ver 3), since this conqueror made captives also in Galilee (2 K 15 20; 1 Ch 5 26; Isa 9 1).

In Prov the allusions are more peaceful, but not geographical. References to Seir occur at (21 15), 12 11 23, to trade (7 16; 31 14 24) and to books (30 1 10). The "unanswerable paradoxes" of 28 8 reads literally, "As he who packs a stone into the stoneyard, so is he that gives or receives gifts." Jerome said that this referred to a superstitious custom; and the erection of stone heaps at graves, or round a sacred place (Gen 41 45 46), is a widely spread and very ancient custom (still preserved by Arabs), each stone being the memorial of a visitor to the spot, who thus honored either a local ghost or demon, or a dead man—a rite which was foolish in the eyes of a Hebrew of the age in which this verse was written (see Expos II, VIII, 590, 524).

4. Songs of Solomon. It is not confined, and as it says, to the north, but includes the whole of Pal and Syria. The writer names Kedar in North Arabia (1 5) and Egypt, whence horses came in Solomon's time (1 9 1 K 10 28 29). He knows the henna (Anthemis), and the vineyards of En-geidi (1 14), where vineyards still existed in the 12th cent. AD. He speaks of the "rose" of Sharon (2 1), as well as of Lebanon, with Shenir (Assy. Sziriu) and Homeun (4 5) above Damasc. (7 4). He knows the hilly slopes of Gilead (6 5), and the brown pool, full of small fish, in the brook below Heshbon (7 4), in Moab. The locks of the "peaceful one" (6 13, Vulg pacificae) are like the thick copes of Carmel; the king is sought in the "sage gallery." She is "beautiful as Tirzah (in Samaria), comely as Jerusalem, terrible to look at" (6 4 AV). She is a garden and a "paradise" ("orchard") of spices in Lebanon, some of which spices (calamus, cinnamon, frankincense and myrrh) have come from far lands (4 12-15). Solomon's vineyard—another emblem of the bride—(1 6 8 11) was in Baal-hamon, which some suppose to be Baal-hermon, still famous for its vineyards. He comes to fetch her from the wilderness (5 6); and the dust raised by his followers is like that of a chariot and horse, which stack over the dry plains of Bashan in summer. The single word "paradise" (4 13 m) is hardly enough to establish late date, since—though used in Pers,—its etymology and origin are unknown. The word for "vineyard" is also not Pers (6 11), for the Arab, word Isra, is Sem, and means a "pair," referring to the walnut which abounds in Shechem. The "rose of Sharon" (2 1), according to the Tg, was the white "narcissus"; and the Heb word occurs also in Assy (bahashidad), as noted by Delitzsch (quoting W F, V 32, no 4), referring to a white bulbous plant.
Sharon in spring is covered still with wild narcissi, Arab. buqel (cf Isa 35 1 2). There is perhaps no period when such a poem is more likely to have been written than in the time of Solomon, when Israel "dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree" (1 K 4 25); when the roe and the fallow deer (Cant 2 17; 1 K 4 25) abounded; and when merchants (Cant 3 6) brought "powders" from afar; when also the dominion included Damascus and Southern Lebanon, as well as Western Pal with Gilead and Moab. See also Song of Songs.

V. Palestine in the Prophets.—Isaiah (1 S) likens Zion, when the Assyrian armies were holding Samaria, Moab and Philistia, to "a booth in a vineyard, a lodge in a garden of cucumbers." He refers no doubt to a "tower" (Mt 21 33), or platform, such as is to be found beside the rock-cut wine press in the deserted vineyards of Pal; and such as is still built, for the watchman to stand on, in vineyards and vegetable gardens.

The chief topographical question (10 28–32) refers to the Assyrian advance from the north, when the outposts covered the march through Samaria (whether in 732, 722, or 702 BC) to Philistia. They extended on the left wing to Ai (Hajān), Michmash (Mukhmds), and Geba, S. of the Michmash valley (Jeho), leading to the flight of the villagers, from Ramah (er-Rām) and the region of Gebah—which included Ramah, with Geba (1 S 22 6) and Migron (1 S 14 2) or "the precipice." They were alarmed also at Gallim (Bet Jāda), and Anathoth (Arād), near Jerus; yet the advance ceased at Nob (cf Neh 11 32) where, as before noted, the first glimpse of Zion would be caught if Nob was at or near Mizpah (Tell en Nāṣibeh). The main north road leading W. of Ramah.

Another passage refers to the towns of Moab (Isa 15 1–6), and to Nimrim (Tell NW'mr) and Zoar (Tell shāhār) in the valley of Shittim. The ascent of Luhith (ver 5) is the present Tāat el Heith, on the southern slope of Nebo (Jebel Neba). The curious term "a heifer of three years old" (cf Jer 48 34 m) is taken from LXX, but might better be rendered "a round place with a group of three" (see EGLAITH-SHELISHIYAH). It is noticed with the "high places" of Moab (Isa 15 2; Jer 48 35), and probably refers to one of those large and ancient stone circles, surrounding the central group of three rude pillars, which still remain in Moab (SEP, I, 187, 203, 233) near Nebo and Zoar. Samiah—probably ostrich want of care for her young, because she endeavors (like other birds) to escape, and thus draws away the hunter from the hest. This verse should not be regarded as showing that the author knew that whales were mammals, since the word "sea-monsters" (AV) is more correctly rendered "jackals" (RV) or "wild beasts."

In Ezk (ch 27), Tyre appears as a city with a very widespread trade extending from Asia Minor to Arabia and Egypt, and from Assyria to the isles (or "coasts") of the Mediterranean. The "oaks of Bashan" (27 6; Isa 2 14; Zee 11 2) are still found in the S.W. of that region near Gilead. Judah and Israel then provided wheat, honey, oil and balm for export as in the time of Jacob. Damascus sent white wool and the wine of Helbon (Helbōn), 13 miles N., where fine vineyards still exist. The northern border described (47 15–18) is the same that marked that of the dominions of David, running along the Euphrates River toward Zedad (Sūfa). It is described also in Nu 34 8–11 as passing Riblah (Riblah) and including Ain (el 'Ain), a village on the western slopes of the Anti-Lebanon, E. of Riblah. In this passage (as in Ezk 47 18) the Hauman (or Bashan plain) is excluded from the land of Israel, the border following the Jordan valley, which seems to point to a date earlier than the time when the Havvoth-jair (Nu 32 41; Dt 3 15; Jos 13:30: Jgs 10:4; 1 K 4:13; 1 Ch 2:23), in Gilgal and Bashan, were conquered or built—possibly after the death of Joshua. The southern border of the land is described by Ezekiel (47:19) as extending from Kirjath-jearim (‘Arvah)—probably Bethel—to Tamar, which seems to be Tamarah, 6 miles N.E. of Gaza.

In the Minor Prophets there are fewer topographical notices. Hosea (12:11) speaks of the boundaries of Gilead and Gilgal as being "the heights in the furrows of the fields."

4. Minor Prophets—He perhaps alludes to the large dolmen-fields of this region, which still characterize the country E. of the Jordan. He also perhaps speaks of human sacrifice at Bethel (13:2). In Joel (1:12) the apple tree (Heb. yayŷāh, Arab. buṭṭahl), is noticed (as Cant 2:3 5; 8 5), and there seems to be no reason to doubt that the apple was cultivated, since el Mukaddasi mentions "excellent apples" at Jerus in the 10th century. AD, though it is not now common in Pal. The acyclic fig (Am 7:14), which was common in the plains and in the shdhibbôn (1 K 10:27), grew also near Jericho (Lk 19:4), where it is still to be found. In Mic (1:10-15), a passage which appears to refer to Hezekiah's destruction of the shrines of Bethel and Dan (2 K 23:15), there is mention of going on Gaza before 702 BC (2 K 18:2 8; 2 Ch 28:18) gives a list of places and a play on the name of each. They include Gath (Tell el-Safî), Safir (es Safîr), Lachish (Tell el-Hesî), Agrab (Arab. ‘Akrâb), and Marreshah (Marâshô). The glories of the tube shall not even unto Adullam (‘Aid-el-ma) perhaps refers to Hezekiah himself (Mic 1:15). After the captivity Philistia (Zec 9:5) is still independent. See PHILISTINES. The meaning of the "mound of Hezekiah," called Gihon, is disputed. Jerome (see Reland, Pal Ituat., II, 891) says that the former of these names referred to a town near Jezreel (Maximianopolis, now Ramāneh, on the western side of the plain of Esdraelon), but the mound of an only son was probably a site of the Syrian god called Hadas, or otherwise Rimmon, like the mourning for Tammuz (Ezk 8:14).

VI. Palestine in the Apocalypse.—The Book of Jth is regarded by some (Eusebius, V. 14 20; as Ρωμανός, or legend, written in Heb in 74 AD. It is remarkable, however, that its geographical notices are less accurate than those of other authors.

Juth was apparently the tribe of Ma- ca, though the name, was buried between Dotham (Tell Dothan) and Balnam (in Wady Belâneh), E. of Dothan. Her history is very obscure. She is mentioned (in high hill (6:11.12), 5 miles S.E. of Dothan (SWP, II, 1894, 54), as the "land of Marreshah," the narrative of the above is well met; for this village is supplied only by wells (7:13.20), though there are springs at the foot of the hill to the S. (7:719), while there is a good view over the valley to the N. (10:19), and over the plain of Esdraelon to Nazareth and Tabor. Other mountains surround the village (11:3). The camp of the invaders reached from Dothan to Belaim (Balnam) from W. to E., and their rear was at Oymam (Tell Keimân), at the foot of Carmel. The Babylonians were allied with tribes of Carmel, Gilgal and Galilee on the N. with the Samaritans, and with others from Betanea (probably Beth-anath, now Beit A‘in, N. of Hebron), and with the tribes of S.W. of Beersheba, and Kades (‘Ain Kade), on the way to Egypt. Among Samaritan towns S. of Shechem, Ekrehel (‘Akrahô) and Chisil (‘Kâshû) are mentioned with "the brook Mechunor" (Wady el Hamûne) rising N. of Ekrehel and running E. into the Jordan.

The Biblical Book of Wisd has many references to Pal; and in Eccles the only allusions are to the palm of Emek Da’ud, which is still exist., and to the "rose plant in Jericho" (Ps 14 4 of 39 13; 50 8); the description of the rose in the field, as "the rod of wild, crystal, rises high," is "the rod of donerion (Tстра, NHB, 477), which boughs near the Jordan and grows to the boughs of Gilgal.

Juda Maccaeus.—The first Book of Macca is a valuable history going to 135 BC, and its geographical allusions are sometimes important. Modin, the home of Judas Maccabaeus (2:16), where his brother Simon erected seven monuments visible from the sea (9:19; 20 20-25), was about 20 miles W. of the present village el Mâdîth on the low hills with a sea view, 17 miles from Jerus and 6 miles S. of Lydda, near Yehoshua (Yômôni s.v. "Modeim") places Modin. The first victory of Judas (3:24) was won at Beth-horon, and the second at Emacma (labeled by the Transjordan scenes of Joshua's victories also.

The Green Man attacked to reach Jerus from the S. and were again defeated at Beth-zur (4:29), now Beit-sâûr, on the watershed, 15 miles S. of Jerus, where the road runs through a pass. In the plain of Emmaus (the temple in 165 BC) marched S. of the Dead Sea, attacking the Edomites at Arbatinne (perhaps Akrahôm) and penetrating to the Moabite frontier (3:5-8). On his return to Judae the heathen of Gilgal and Bashan rose against the inhabitants of Tiberias (ver 33) or Tob (Tawîyêbê), and the Phoenicians against the Galilean Hebrews who were, for a time, withdrawn to Jerus. (cf Jph. 15), and was then visible to Jerus. (11 7.69). In the regions of Northern Gilead and Egypt (5:26-37), and in the Upper Galilee they are recorded (Bast), Almea (Kefû el-mo), Casolon (Kisifôn), Maged (perhaps el Mójd, N. of ‘Amân), and Carmain (Asher-karnam), now Tell ‘Ashirâh. The notice of a "brook" at the last-named place (ver 42) is an interesting one. 34 BC Judas was defeated at Basilathâria (6:32), now Beîl Shôra, 9 miles S. of Jerus, but the cause was small. The brook is, at the west end of the town, a fine stream runs through the centre of the town. In 63 BC Judas was defeated at Basilathâria (6:32), now Beîl Shôra, 9 miles S. of Jerus, but the cause was small. The brook is, at the west end of the town, a fine stream runs through the centre of the town.

Thus the districts for the southern border of Samaria were then added to Judaea (10:30; 11:34), namely Syzn, Amairis (or Escrên), now Taïlîyêb, and Ramathem (er-Rââm); and Jonathan defeated the Greeks in Philistia (10 60; 11:6). Simon was "captain," from the village of Tered (or Tekrûr), or the pass N. of Accho, to the borders of the Jordan (11:50), and the Greeks in Upper Galilee were again defeated by Jonathan, who advanced from Gennesaret to the plain of Hazor (Qaz‘ar), and pursued them even to Kedron. Napthali (Kenê), which marches near the Jordan, but in 159 BC the Greeks made peace with Jonathan, who returned to Mehemach (73) and lived another year to Jerus (10 17). This district is the southern border of Samaria, which were then added to Judaea (10:30; 11:34), namely Syzn, Amairis (or Escrên), now Taïlîyêb, and Ramathem (er-Rââm); and Jonathan defeated the Greeks in Philistia (10:60; 11:6). Simon was "captain," from the village of Tered (or Tekrûr), or the pass N. of Accho, to the borders of the Jordan (11:50), and the Greeks in Upper Galilee were again defeated by Jonathan, who advanced from Gennesaret to the plain of Hazor (Qaz‘ar), and pursued them even to Kedron. Napthali (Kenê), which marches near the Jordan, was next (4), and five years later he won a final victory at Cedron (Ketra), near Jemâma (Yeboah), but was murdered at Dok (16:15), near Jericho, which site was a small fort at ‘Ain Dâb, a spring N. of the city.

The second Book of Macca presents a contrast to the first in which, as we have seen, the geography is easily understood, and the site of Cais was with its lake (12:25). It seems to be placed in Dimâmah, and Charax (or Charax) is the lake, and later Galata (ver 17). Ephron, W. of Asher-karnam (vs 26.27), is unknown; and Beth-shemesh is called by its later name a place (or Beth-shemesh) near to Beth-lama (Jgs 1:27) and in Jos (Ant. XII, v. 5:6). 1. A curious passage (8:26-6) seems to record the destruction of some great towers (still used by Parsees), one of which appears to have existed at Berea (Aleppo), though this was not a Greek custom.
Palestine

Jesus expected the Messiah to appear in the home of David (Mic 5:2); and the Northern Bethlehem was not called "of Nazareth," as asserted by Rix (Tent and Testament, 258); this was a conjectural reading by Neubauer (Géog. du Talm., 189), but the Talm (Talm Jerus, M'hillah 1) calls the place Bethlehem-gräd ("of halm"), no doubt from the storax-bush (Styrax officinalis) or stacte (Ex 30:34), the Arab, 'abbar, which still abounds in the oak wood close by.

(1) Galilean scenery.—The greater part of the life of Jesus was spent in Nazareth in Zebulun, and the ministry at Capernaum in Naphtali (cf Mt 4:13-15; Isa 9:1), with yearly visits to Jesus. The Gospel narratives and the symbolism of the parables constantly recall the characteristic features of Galilean scenery and nature, as they remain unchanged today. The "city set on a hill" (Mt 5:14) may be seen in any part of Pal; the lilies of the field grow in all its plains; the "foxes have holes" and the sparrows are still eaten; the vineyard with its tower; the good ploughland, amid stony and thorny places, are all still found throughout the Holy Land. But the deep lake surrounded by precipitous cliffs and subject to sudden storms, with its shoals of fish and its naked fishes; the east nets and dragnet nets and small heavy boats of the Sea of Galilee, are more distinctive of the Gospels, since the lake is but briefly noticed in the OT.

(2) Nazareth was a little village in a hill plateau N. of the plain of Esdraelon, and 1,000 ft. above it.

Traditional Mount of the Precipitation near Nazareth.

The name (Heb náqórûd) may mean "verdant," and it had a fine spring, but it is connected (Mt 2:23) in the Gospels with the prophecy of the "branch" (néger, Is 11:1) of the house of David. Its population was Hebrew, for it possessed a synagogue (Lk 4:16). The "brow of the hill whereon their city was built" (4:29) is traditionally the "hill of the leap" (Jebel Kafés), 2 miles to the S. on a cliff overhanging the plain. Nazareth was not on any great highway; and so obscure was this village that it is unnoticed in the OT, or by Jos, while even a Galilaean (Jn 1:46) could hardly believe that a prophet could come thence. Jerome (Onom s.v.) calls it a "village"; but today it is a town with 4,000 Christians and 2,000 Moslems, the former taking their Arab name (Nasratā) from the home of their Master.

(3) Capernaum (Mt 4:13; 9:1) lay on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, apparently (Mt 14:34; Jn 6:17) in the little plain of Gennesaret, which stretches for 3 miles on the northwest side of the lake, and which has a breadth of 2 miles. It may have stood at the foot of the cliff and been overlooked by the Sin. MS rendering of Mt 11:23—"Shalt thou be exalted unto heaven?"—and it was a military station where taxes were levied (9:9), and possessed a synagogue (Mk 1:21; Lk 4:33; Jn 6:50). Christian tradition, since the 4th cent., AD, has placed the site at Tell Ham, where ruins of a synagogue (probably, however, not older than the 2d cent. AD) exist; but this site is not in the plain of Gennesaret, and is more probably Kaphar 'Āhirim (Talm Bab, Middoth 86n). Jewish tradition (Midrash Koheloth, vii:20) connects Capernaum with mixim or "heretics"—that is to say Christians—whose name may yet linger at 'Āin Mineyeh at the north end of the plain of Gennesaret. Jos states (Bf, III, x, 8) that the spring of Capernaum watered this plain, and contained the can. coronicus which is still found in 'Āin el Mudawwarah ("the round spring"), which is the principal source of water in the Gennesaret oasis.

(4) The site of Chorazin (Kerdah) has never been lost. The ruined village lies about 2 miles N. of Tell Ham and possesses a synagogue of similar character. Bethsaida ("the house of fishing") is once said to have been in Galilee (Jn 12:21), and Rehob (Pet Hlastr., II, 555-55) thought that there were two towns of the name. It is certain that the other notices refer to Bethsaida, called Julias by Herod Philip, which Jos (Ant. XVIII, ii:1; iv:6; Bf, III, x, 7) and Pliny (NH, v:15) place E. of the Jordan, near the place where it enters the Sea of Galilee. The site may be at the ruin of Dikkēh ("the platform"), now 2 miles N. of the lake, but probably nearer of old, as the river deposit has increased southward. There are remains of a synagogue here also. The two miracles of feeding the 5,000 and the 4,000 as both done at E. of the Jordan, the former (Lk 9:10) in the desert (of Golan) "belonging to the city called Bethsaida" (AV). The words (Mk 6:45 AV), "to go to the other side before unto Bethsaida," may be rendered without any straining of grammar, "to go to side opposite to Bethsaida." For the disciples are not said to have reached that city; but, after a voyage of at least 3 or 4 miles (Jn 6:17,19), they arrived near Capernaum, and landed in Gennesaret (Mk 6:53), about 5 miles S.W. of the Jordan.

(5) The place where the swine rushed down a steep slope into the lake (Mt 8:32; Mk 5:1; Lk 8:26) was in the country of the Gerasenes (see Vat. Mis.), probably at Kereon on the eastern shore opposite Tiberias, where there is a steep slope to the water. It should be noted that this was in Decapolis (Mk 5:20), a region of "ten cities" which lay (except Seytopolis) in Southwest Bashan, where a large number of early Gr inscriptions have been found, some of which (e.g. Vogé-Waddington, nos. 2412, 2413) are as old as the 1st cent. AD. There was evidently a Gr population in this region in the time of Our Lord, and his accounts for the feeding of swine, otherwise distinctive of "a far country" (Lk 16:13,15); for, while no Hebrew would have tended swine, the uncleanness which rendered them were swineherds from the time at least of Homer.

(6) The site of Magadan-Magdala (Mejdel) was on the west shore at the S.W. end of the Genezareth plain (Mt 15:39). In Mk 8:10 we find Dalmanutha instead. Magdala was the Heb migdōl ("tower"), and was probably called "Bēth-magdōl" at that time. This stood at the head of the stream (Mo-jaronk) which runs thence to the sea N. of of Acts Jews, and it was thus a half-way station between Jerusalem and the sea-side capital of Capernaum. It was then called "Rds el Ḫān" ("head of the spring"), and a cistern, built in the 12th cent., stands above the waters. The old Rom road runs close by (SWP, II, 258). Caeasarea was a new town, founded by Herod the Great about 20 BC (SWP, II, 13-29). It was even larger than Joppa, and had its own harbor.

The Book of Acts the only new site, unnoticed before, is that of Gadir. This stood near the head of the stream (Mo-jaronk) which runs thence to the sea N. of Acts.

(7) Other allusions in the Synoptic Gospels, referring to natural history and customs, include the notice of domestic fowls (Mt 23:37; 25:34), which are never mentioned in the OT. They came from Persia, and were introduced probably after 400 BC. The use of manure (Lk 13:8) is also unnoticed in the OT, but is mentioned in the Mish (Shabbat, i. 2), as is the custom of annually whitening sepulchers (Mt 23:27; Sckalim, i. 1). The removal of a roof ( Mk 2:4; cf Lk 5:19) at Capernaum was not difficult, if it resembled those of modern Arabian houses.

G. The toponymy of the Fourth Gospel is important as indicating the writer's personal knowledge of Pal. He mentions several places not otherwise noticed in the NT.

Fourth Gospel

Beth-abarah, a depending village, was at Bethabara (Jn 1:28, RV "Bethabarah," 10 40), or "the house of the crossing," was beyond the Jordan." Origen rejected the reading "Bethania," instead of Beth-abarah, common in his time, and still found in the third oldest uncial MSS in the 4th and 5th cents. AD. The place was a halting place of journey, and the name of the toponymy (Lk 2:7) may have been that of a "Kāvā," a mile N. of Nazareth. It was two or three days' distance from Bethany near Jerus (Jn 10:40; 11:36-17). and would thus lie in the upper part of the Jordan valley. In 1874, the surveyors found a ford well known by the name "Abārāth, N. of Beisan," in the required situation. John, we are told, baptized "in all the region round about the Jordan" (Mt 3:5), including the waters of Ḥémon near "Bethane" (Jn 3:23). Like the preceding sites, it is noticed only in the Fourth Gospel, as is Bethesda, while this Gospel also gives additional indications as to the position of Calvary. The town of Ephraim, "near to the wilderness" (11:51), is noticed earlier (2 S 13:29; of Ephraim, 2 Ch 13:19), and the surveyors may be regarded as the Arab. equivalent (D'almânābhy) meaning "the place of high buildings"; so that there is no necessary discrepancy between the two accounts. From this place Jesus again departed by ship to "the other side," and reached Bethsaida (Mt 16:5; Mk 8:13:22), travelling thence up the Jordan valley to Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16:13; Mk 8:27), or Bāniyās, at the Jordan springs. There may be little doubt that the "high mountain apart" (Mt 17:1) the verbal signification "separate," to the solitary temple; and the sudden formation of cloud on the summit seems to explain the allusion in Lk 9:34.

Literature

Previous to the last century, almost the entire stock of knowledge concerning ancient Pal, including its races, languages, history and manners, was obtained from Jos and the Bible, with a few brief additional references given by Gr and Rom authors; knowledge concerning modern Pal was limited to the reports of chance travelers. The change has been due largely to the compelling interest taken in sacred history and the "Holy Oracles." This smallest country in the world has aroused the spirit of exploration as no other country has or could. It has largely stimulated many of the investigations carried on in other lands.

I. Era of Preparation.—Much direct information concerning ancient Pal, absolutely essential to the understanding of modern exploration in that country, is contained in the Holy Bible. The book or books of the Bible which have been most carefully studied and commented on by modern scholars are the Books of Genesis and Deuteronomy, the two most ancient, i.e., containing the earliest historical data. The Book of Deuteronomy, in so far as it deals with the history of Israel, has been especially valuable, not only for the event list given in it, but for the light it throws upon the law or laws of the patriarchal period. The events of the Exodus and the period of the Israelites in the desert are, even now, the most obscure chapters in the history of ancient Pal, though the Burnt Offering of the Israelites, and the descent of Moses on Mount Horeb, are subjects about which the Bible, in detail, is silent. The history of the twelve tribes of Israel, as given in the Bible, is the best account we have of them. Only a very few trace of the tribes of Benjamin and Levi, and the two lost tribes, Joseph and Dan, that is, the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, have any information about them. It is a matter of doubt whether the Bible contains the history of the other tribes.

The Book of Deuteronomy, however, contains a large amount of geographically correct information concerning Pal of the time of Moses. The Bible is, therefore, the only ancient source of information concerning Pal which can be relied upon in modern exploration. The Book of Jos, on the other hand, contains a large amount of information concerning Pal of the period of Jos, but the information is less valuable, and the events are not always the same.

II. In Palestine

GEORGE LEUPOLD

The Jewish Bible, and the Christian Bible, are the two main sources of information concerning ancient Pal. The Jewish Bible is the Old Testament, and the Christian Bible is the New Testament. The Jewish Bible contains the history of the Jews, and the Christian Bible contains the history of the Christians. The Jewish Bible is divided into the two parts of the Law and the Prophets, and the Christian Bible is divided into the Gospels and the Epistles.

The Jewish Bible is the most important source of information concerning ancient Pal, as it contains a large amount of information concerning Pal of the period of the Jews. The Christian Bible is also important, as it contains a large amount of information concerning Pal of the period of the Christians.

III. The Importance of the Bible

The Bible is the most important source of information concerning ancient Pal, as it contains a large amount of information concerning Pal of the period of the Jews and Christians. The Bible is the only ancient source of information concerning Pal which can be relied upon in modern exploration.

IV. The Importance of Other Sources

Other sources of information concerning ancient Pal are the ancient monuments, the ruins, the inscriptions, the papyri, the coins, and the documents. These sources of information are of great importance, as they can be used to supplement the information contained in the Bible.

cemeteries, rock-cut tombs and other monuments. He also laid down important criteria for the age of stone masonry (yet see PEFs, 1897, LXI); identified various sites including Adullam, found the "cave Dexib," "Zoeth," etc., and made innumerable plans of churches, tombs, etc., and did an incredible amount of other important work. Capt., afterward Col., C. R. Conder did an equally important work, and as the head of the archaeological party could finally report 10,000 plans, names and geometry, to the Society for Exploration, and 172 new Bible sites successfully identified, while the boundaries of the tribes had been practically settled and many vitally important Bible locations for the first time fixed. The excavations in Jerus under the same auspices had meanwhile been carried out as planned. After an introductory examination by Sir Charles Wilson, including some little excavating, Sir Charles Warren (1867-70) and, later, Col. Conder (1872-75) made thorough excavations over a large area, sinking shafts and following ancient walls to a depth of 80-150 ft. They uncovered the Temple-area from its countless tons of debris and traced its approximate outline; examined underground rock chambers; opened ancient streets; discovered many thousands of specimens of pottery, glass, etc., from Jewish to Byzantine, and the place in the Tyropoeon Valley, where Robinson's arch had rested, and also parts of the ancient bridge; traced the line of several important ancient walls, leading gates and towers, and fixed the date of one wall certainly as of the 8th cent. BC, and probably of the age of Solomon (G. A. Smith), thus accomplishing an epoch-making work upon which all more recent explorers have safely rested—as Mr. Gladstone (1875), in his masterly Memoirs of Alexander the Great, and Guthe (1881), who made fine additional discoveries at Ophel, as well as Warde and Conder in their work afterward (1884), when they published plans of the whole city with its streets, churches, mosques, etc., 25 in. to the mile, which in that direction remains a basis for all later work. See JERUSALEM.

Perhaps, however, the greatest work of all done by this society was the Topographical Survey (1881-88), accomplished for Judaea and Samaria by Col. Conder, and published in large, attractive form, resulting in a great map of Western Pal in 26 sheets, on a scale of an inch to the mile (with several abridged additions), showing all previous identifications of ancient places. These maps, with the seven magnificent folios of Memoirs, and the thousands of feet of scientific work done by the various parties, marked such an epoch-making advance in knowledge that it has been called "the most important contribution to illustrate the Bible since its translation into the vulgar tongue."

In addition to the above the Palestine Exploration Fund established a Quarterly Statement and Society of Biblical Archaeology from which subscribers could keep in touch with the latest Bib results. And has published large quantities of in of ancient texts and travels and of books reporting discoveries as these were made. Altogether more advance was made during these 15 years from 1865-80 than in the 15 centuries before.

The next ten years (1880-90) did not furnish as much new material as from Pal exploration, but in 1880 the Silasam Inscription (of 2 K

3. Most Recent Results in Surface Exploration were scientific discoveries of Eastern Pal. In 1881 H. Clay Trumbull rediscovered and properly described Kadesh-barnae, settling authoritatively its location and thus making it possible to fix previously obscure places mentioned in the account of the Exodus. Excavations in tombs, etc., and new investigations in small districts not adequately described previously have taken place, new additions to the zoological, botanical, geological and meteorological knowledge of Pal have been frequent; studies of irrigation and the water-supply have been made, as well as investigations into the customs, proverbs, folklore, etc., of the Arabs; many districts E. of the Jordan and through Petra down into Sinai have yielded important results, and many discoveries of surface tombs, ossuaries, mosaics, seals and manuscripts have been made in many parts of Pal. This has been done perhaps chiefly by the Palestine Exploration Fund, but much by individuals and some by the newly organized excavation societies (see below). The most surprising discoveries made by this method of surface exploration (a method which can never become completely obsolete) have been the finding at different times of four the Boundary Stones of Gezer (1874, 1881, 1889) by C. F. Hamilton, in 1889, of the very large monolith at Medeba by Father Cleopas, librarian of the Greek Patriarch.

The latter proved to be part of the pavement of a 6th-cent. basilica and is a "veritable map of Pal," showing its chief cities, the boundaries of the tribes, and the city of Jerus with its walls, gates, chief buildings, including the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and chief streets, notably one long straight street intersecting the city and lined with colonnades. As Archeologists are fond of saying, on the ground of Mt. Nebo, it is thought the artist may have intended to represent ideally a modern (6th-cent.) vision of Moses. George Adam Smith (HGHL, 7th ed, 1901); Jerusalem (2 vols, 1910), and E. Huntington, Pal and Its Transformation (1911), have given fine studies illustrating the supreme importance of accurate topographical knowledge in order to understand correctly the Bible narratives and the social life and politics of the Hebrews.

III. Of Scientific Excavation (1) Tell el-Hes (Palestine Exploration Fund) — Excavation must always continue, but excavation 1. Southern is a vast advance. The modern era in Palestinian study begins with Petrie at LACHISH (v.) in 1860. Though Renan was the first to put any excavations into the soil (1860), yet his results were practically confined to Phoenicia. From Renan's time to 1890 there had been no digging whatever, excepting some narrow but thorough work in Jerus, and a slight tickling of the ground at Jericho and the so-called Tombs of the Kings. Nothing was more providential than this delay in beginning extensive excavations in Pal, such as had been previously so profitably conducted in Egypt and elsewhere. The results could not have been interpreted even two years earlier, and even when these excavations were commenced, the only man living who could have understood what he found was the man who had been selected to do the work. Nearly two centuries before, a traveler in Pal (Th. Shaw) had suggested the possibility of certain mounds ("tels") being artificial (cf Josh 6 28; Jer 30 18); but not even Robinson or Guérin had suspected that these were the cenotaphs of buried cities, and had believed them to be mere mannerly cut hour in the history of exploration in Pal, and perhaps in any land, was that in which on a day in April, 1890, W. M. Flinders Petrie climbed up the side of Tell el-Hes, situated on the edge of the Phil plain, e 30 miles S.W. of Jerus, and 17 miles
N.E. from Gaza, and by examining its strata, which had been exposed by the stream cutting down its side, determined before sunset the fact, from Tell el-Hesy that the stratum XIX was a marked city covering 1,000 years of history, the limits of occupation being probably 1500 BC to 500 BC. This ability to date the several occupations of a site without any inscription to assist him was due to the chronological scale of styles of pottery which he had studied earlier and worked out positively for the Gr epochs at Naukratis a year or two before, and for the epochs preceding 1100 BC at Iklhun in the Fayyûm only a month or two before. The potsherds were fortunately very numerous, and Tell el-Hesy, being the only six weeks' work he could date approximately some eight successive occupations of the city, each of these being mutually exclusive in certain important forms of pottery in common use. Given the surface date, depth of accumulation and rate of deposit as shown at Lachish, and a pretty sure estimate of the history of other sites was available. Not only was this pottery scale so brilliantly confirmed and elaborated at Tell el-Hesy that all excavators have been enabled to date the last settlement on a mound almost by walking over it; but by observations of the methods of stone dressing he was able to rectify many former guesses as to the age of buildings and to establish some new architectural supports of age. He has proved that some of the walls at this site were built by "the same school of masons which built the Temple of Solomon," and also that the Iliconic volute, which the Greeks borrowed from the Asians, went back to the 15th cent. BC, while one pilarster he found the architectural motif of the "ram's horn" (cf Ps 118 27). He also concluded, contrary to former belief, that this mound marked the site of Lachish (Josh 10 31; 2 K 18 14), as by a careful examination he found that no other ruins near could fill the known historic conditions of that city, and the inscription found by the next excavator and all more recent research make this conclusion practically sure. Lachish was a great fortress of the ancient world. The Egypt Pharaohs often mention it, and it is represented in a picture on an Assyrian monument, under which is written, "Sennacherib . . . . . . receives the spoil of Lachish" (see 2 Fr 18 14). It was strategically a strong point, the mound rising some 50 ft. above the valley and the fortification which Sennacherib probably attacked being over 10 ft. thick. The debris lay from 50-70 ft. deep on top of the hill. Petrie fixed the directions of the various walls, and settled the approximate dates of each city and of the imported pottery found in several of these. One of the most unexpected things was an iron knife dug up from a stratum indicating a period not far from the time when Israel must have entered Canaan. The earliest form of Gezer's weapons ever found up to this date (cf Josh 17 16).

The next two years of scientific digging (1891-92), admirably conducted by Dr. F. G. Bliss on this site, wholly confirmed Petrie's general inductions, though the limits of each occupation were more exactly fixed and the beginning of the oldest city was pushed back to 1700 BC. The work was conducted under the usual dangers, not only from the Bedawyn, but from excessive heat (104 in the shade), from malaria which at one time prostrated 8 or 10 of the party, and of the early season wars which had to be carried 6 miles, and from the sirocco (see my report, Proc, XXI, 140-70 and Petrie's and Bliss's journal, XXI, 219-46; XXIII, 192, etc). He excavated thoroughly one-third of the entire hill, moving nearly a million cubic feet of debris. He found that the wall of the oldest city was nearly 30 ft. thick, that of the next city 17 ft. thick, while the latest wall was thin and weak. The oldest city covered a space 1,300 ft. sq., the latest only one-third of this. The pottery had a richer color and higher polish than the later, and this art was indigenous, for at this level no Phoen or Mycenaean styles were found. The late pre-Israelitish period (1550-800 BC) shows such imports and also local Canaani limitations. In the "Jewish" period (800-330 BC) this influence is lost and the new styles are coarse and ungraceful, such degeneration not being connected with the entrance of Israel into Canaan, as many have supposed, but with a later period, most probably with the desolation which followed the exile of the ten tribes (Bliss and Petrie). In the pre-Israelite cities were found mighty towers, fine bronze implements, such as battle-axes, spearheads, bracelets, pins, needles, etc, a wine and træche press, one very large building "beautifully symmetrical" a smelting furnace, and finally an inscribed tablet from Zimrida, known previously from the Am Tab to have been governor of Lachish, c 1400 BC. Many Jewish pot ovens were found in the later ruins and incorporated into the larger fortifications, and marks and others with inscriptions. Clay figures of Astarte, the goddess of fertility, were found in the various layers, one of these being of the unique Cypriote type, with large earrings, and many Cypriote figures, symbols and animal forms. See also LACHISH.

(2) Excavations in Jerus.—During 1894-97, notwithstanding the previously good work done in Jerus (see above) and the peculiar embarrassments which then 1011 with the attempt to dig in a richly populated town, Dr. Bliss, assisted by an expert architect, succeeded in adding considerably to the sum of knowledge. He excavated over a large area, not only positively confirming former inductions, but discovering the remains of the wall of the empress Eudokia (450 AD), and under this the line of wall which Titius had destroyed, and at a deeper level the wall which surrounded the city in the Herodian age, and deeper yet that which must probably be dated to Hezekiah, and below this a construction "exquisitely preserved," with walls which must be either the remains of a wall of Solomon or some other preëxille fortification not later than the 8th cent. He found gates and anciently paved streets and manholes leading to ancient sewers and cisterns, and many other places, but esp. settled disputed questions concerning important walls and the levels of the ancient hills, thus fixing the exact topography of the ancient city. H. G. Mitchell and others have also carefully examined certain lines of wall, identifying Nehemiah's Dung Gate, etc, and making a new survey of certain parts of underground Jerus, the results of the entire work being a modification of tradition in a few particulars, but confirmatory in most. The important springs and reservoirs, valleys and hills of the ancient Jerus have been certainly identified. It is now settled that modern Jerus "still sits virtually upon her ancient seat and at much the same slope," though not so large as the Jerus of the kings of Judah which certainly extended over the Southwestern Hill. Mt. Zion, contrary to tradition which locates it on the Southwestern Hill where the citadel stands, probably lay on the Eastern Hill above the Virgin's Spring (Ghion). On this Eastern Hill at Ophel lay the Temple, and S. of the Temple on the same level lay the old Jebusite stronghold (David's City). The ancient altar of burnt offering was almost surely at es-Sakhra. The evidence has not been conclusive as to the line of the second wall, so that the site of Golgotha and the Holy Sepulchre cannot certainly

(3) Excavations in the Shephelah (Palestine Exploration Fund).—During 1898-1900 important work was done by Bliss and Macalister at 4 sites on the border land between Philistia and Judaea, with five other excavations confined to small mound areas, but without important results. The four chief sites were Tell Zakariya, lying about midway between Jerus and Tell el-Hesay; Tell es-Safi, 5 miles W. of Tell Zakariya, and Tell Sandahannah, about 10 miles S., while Tell ej-Judeidah lay between Tell Zakariya and Tell Sandahannah. As Tell ej-Judeidah was only half-excavated and merely confirmed other results, not being remarkable except for the large quantity of jar inscriptions found (37), we omit further mention of it. (a) Tell Zakariya: From this height, 1,214 ft. above the sea, almost all Philistia could be seen. A pre-Israelitish town was found under some 20 ft. of débris, containing pre-Israelitish, Jewish and Seleucidan pottery. Many vaulted cisterns, partly hewn from the rock, were found in the lowest level. Various large Jewish pit ovens were found and inscribed jar-handles with winged Egyptian symbols, implements of bronze, iron, bone and stone, and Egyptian images of Bes and the Horus eye, etc., besides a strange bronze figure of a woman with a fish's tail which seems to represent the Atargatis of Ashkelon. The ancient rampart was strengthened, perhaps in Rehoboam's time, and towers were added in the Seleucidan era. Only half of this site was excavated. (b) Tell es-Safi. The camp was pitched near here in the Vale of Elah. From a depth of 21 ft. to the rock, was found the characteristic pre-Israelitish pottery and much imported pottery of the Mycenaean type. A high place was also found here, containing boxes of camels, sheep, cows, etc., and several monoliths of soft limestone in situ, and near by a jar-burial. In an ancient rubbish heap many fragments of the goddess of fertility were found. Many old Egyptian and later Gr relics were also found, and four Babylonian seals were found, as was much earlier pre-Israelitish and later pottery. With strong probability this site was identified as Gath. (c) Tell Sandahannah: This was situated c 1,100 ft. above sea-level. The town covered about 6 acres and was protected by an inner and outer wall and multiple town gates. The strongest wall averaged 30 ft. thick. The work done here "was unique in the history of Palestinian excavation" (Bliss). At Tell el-Hesay only one-third of each stratum was excavated; at Tell Zakariya only one-half; at Jerus the work was confined to the enclosures of the temple, a few city walls and a few churches, pools, streets, etc, but at Tell Sandahannah "we recovered almost an entire town, probably the ancient Maresha* (Josh 15:44), with its inner and outer walls, its gates, its streets, etc." (Bliss). Nearly 400 vessels absolutely intact and unbroken were found. It was a Seleucidan town of the 3d and 2d cent. B.C., with no pre-Israelitish remains. The town was built with thin brick, like bits of soft limestone, set with wide joints and laid in mud with occasionally larger, harder stones chisel-picked. The town was roughly divided into blocks of streets, some of the streets being paved. The houses were lighted from the street and an open court was enclosed in the lowest part of the house, while many were of awkward shape. Many closets were found and pit ovens and vaulted cisterns, reached by staircases, as also portions of the old drainage system. The cisterns had plastered floors, and sometimes two heavy coats of plaster on the walls; the houses occasionally had vaulted roofs but usually the ordinary roof of today, made of boards and rushes covered with clay. No religious building was found and no trace of a colonnade, except perhaps a few fragments of ornament. An enormous columbarium was uncovered (1906 niches). No less than 328 Gr inscriptions were found on the handles of imported wine jars. Under the Seleucidan town was a Jewish town built of rubble, the pottery of the usual kind including stamped jar-handles. An Astarte was found in the Jewish or Gr stratum, as also various animal forms. The Astarte was very curious, about 11 in. high, hollow, wearing a long cloak, but with breasts, body and part of right leg bare, having for headdress a closely fitting sunbonnet with a circular serrated top ornament in front and with seven stars in relief. A most striking find dating from about the 2d cent. AD was that of 16 little human figures bound in fetters of lead, iron, etc., undoubtedly representing "revenge dolls" through which the owners hoped to work magic on enemies, and 49 fragments of magical tablets inscribed in Gr on white limestone, with exorcisms, incantations and imprecations. It ought to be added that the four towns as a whole supplement each other, and positively confirm former results. No royal stamps were found at Tell el-Hesay, but 77 were found in these 4 sites, in connection with 2- or 4-winged symbols (Egypt scarabaeus or winged sun-disk). Writing-materials (stylus) were found in all the strata, their use being "continuous times into the Seleucidan period" (Bliss). From the four towns the evolution of the lamp could be traced from the pre-Israelite, through the Jewish to the Gr period. Some 150 of the labyrinthine rock-cut caves of the district were also examined, some of which must be pre-Christian, as in one of these a million cubic feet of material had been excavated, yet so long ago that all signs of the rubbish had been washed away. (A) Painted "Tombs of Marissa."—In 1902 John P. Peters and Hermann Thiersch discovered at Beit Jibrin (adjoining Tell Sandahannah) an example of sepulchral art totally different from any other ever found in Pal. It was a tomb containing several chambers built by a Sidonian, the walls being brilliantly painted, showing a bull, panther, serpent, ibex, crocodile with ibis (?) on its back, hunter on horseback, etc, with dated inscriptions, the earliest being 196 BC (see John P. Peters, Painted Tombs in Necropolis of Marissa, 1905). The writer (April 18, 1913) found another tomb here of similar character, decorated with grapes, birds, two cocks (life size), etc. Perhaps most conspicuous was a wreath of beautiful flowers with a cross & in its center. Nothing shows the interrelations of that age more than this Phoen colony, living in Pal, using the Gr language but employing Egypt and Libyan characteristics freely in their funeral art.

(1) Tell el-Tanenek (Austrian government and Vienna Academy).—During short seasons of three years (1902–4) Professor Ernst Sellin made a rapid examination of this town (Bib. Taannah), situated in the plain of Esdraslon in Northern Pal, on the ancient road between Egypt and peculiarly foreign type, wearing excessively large earrings, and this is in close connection with one of the most unique discoveries ever made in Pal—a hollow terra cotta Can. or Israelite (2 K 16 10) altar (800–600 BC), having no bottom but with holes in its sides, in which what is marked on the craft when fire was kindled below; in its ornamentation showing a mixture of Bab and Egypt motives, having on its right side winged animals with human heads by the side of which is a man (or boy) struggling with a serpent the head of which is widely distended in anger; at its top two ram's (?) horns, and between them a sacrificial bowl in which to receive the “drink offering”; on its front a tree (of life), and on each side of it a rampant ibex. A bronze serpent was found near this altar, as also near the high place at Gезer. Continuous evidence of the gruesome practice of foundation sacrifices, mostly of little children, but in one case of an adult, was found between the 13th and 9th cents. BC, after which they seem to cease. In the house the skeletons of a lady and five children were found, the former with her rings and necklace of gold, five pearls, two scarabs, etc. Many jar-burials of new-born infants, 16 in one place, were found, and, close to this deposit, a rock-hewn altar with a jar of yellow incense (?). Egypt and Bab images were found of different eras and curious little human-looking amulets (as were also found at Lachish) in which the parental parts are prominent, which Sellin and Bliss believe to be “serpulmin”. (Gen 31 19 34;cf. Mackay, Oriental Research, 57, etc.), such as Rachel, being pregnant, took with her to protect her on the hard journey from Haran to Pal (Maacalister).

The high place, with one or more steps leading up to it, suggesting “elevation, isolation and mystery” (Cf. p. 272), was of course near this altar; and on many other Palestinian ruins, and the evidence shows that it continued long after the entrance of Israel into Canaan. When Israel entered Pal, no break occurred in the civilization, the art development continuing at about the same level; so probably the two races were at about the same culture-level, or else the Hebrew occupation of the land was very gradual. In the 8th cent. there seems to have been an indication of the entrance of a different race, which doubtless is due to the curious and interesting discovery that was of the dozen cuneiform tablets found in a terra cotta chest or jar (cf Jer 32 14) from the pre-Israelite city.

These few letters cannot accurately be called “the first literary found in Pal”; but the documents were there, since the personal and comparatively unimportant character of some of these notes and their easy and flowing style prove that less formal documents must have existed. These show that letter-writing was used not only in great questions of state between foreign countries, but in local matters between little contiguous towns, and that while Pal at this period (c 1400 BC) was politically dependent on Egypt, yet Babylonia had maintained its old literary supremacy. One of these letters mentions “the finger of Ashirat,” this deity recalling the “translated” or sacred post of the OT (see Images); another note is written by Abi-Yawi, a name which corresponds to Heb Abir, that is, “well-born,” thus indicating that the form of the Divine name was then known in Canaan, though its meaning (i.e. the essential name of the Lord) remains unknown. Ex 3 16; 16 6; Neh 9 2; Jer 44 20, may not have been known. Abi-Yawi invokes upon Ishaar-washir the blessing of the Lord of the Gods.”

On the same level with these letters were found two subterranean ovens with a wooden box with a lid in front and a rock-hewn altar above, and even the ancient drain which is supposed to have conveyed the blood from the altar into the “chamber of the dead” below. It may be added that Dr. Sellin thinks that the city of which this city is entirely harmonious with the Bible accounts of its history (Josh 13 21; 17 11; Jgs 1 37; 5 19–21; 1 K 4 12; 9 15; 1 Ch 7 29). So far as the ruins testify, there was no settled city life between c 600 BC and 900 AD, i.e. it became a desolation about the time of the Bah captivity. An Arab castle dates from about the 10th cent. AD.

(2) Tell el-Mutesellim (Megiddo, Josh 12:21; Jgs 5:19; 2 K 9:27).—This great commercial and military center of Northern Pal was opened to the world in 1903-5 by Dr. E. Sellin and his efficient staff. The diggings being conducted under the auspices of His Majesty the Kaiser and the Ger. Pal Society. The mound, about 5 miles N.W. from Tel 'annak, stood prominently 120 ft. above the plain, the ruins being limited to 1.02 acres. An average of 70 diggers were employed for the entire time. The debris was over 33 ft. deep, covering some eight mutually excluding populations. The surrounding wall, 30×35 ft. thick, confirmed itself to the contour of the town. The excavations reached the virgin rock only at one point; but the oldest stratum uncovered showed a people living in houses, having fire, cooking food and making sacrifices; the next city marked an advance, but the third city, proved by its Egypt remains to go back as far as the 20th cent. BC, shows Hebrew presence at a stage indicating a surprising civilization, building magnificent city gates (57×36 ft.), large houses and tombs with vaulted roofs, and adorning their persons with fine scarabs of white and green steatite and other jewelry of bronze. In the very rich colored pottery and little objects such as tools, seals, terra cotta figures and animals, including a bridled horse, and some worked iron is also said to have been found. In one pile of bowldes were two children wearing beautiful bronze bracelets. The city lying above this begins as early as the 16th cent. BC, as is proved by a scarab of Thothmes III and by other signs, although the scarabs, while Egypt in form, are often foreign in design and execution. Anbais, Bethanah and other Egyptian figures appear also 32 scarabs in one pot, much jewelry, including gold ornaments, and some very long, sharp bronze knives. One tomb contained 42 vessels, and one skeleton held 4 gold-mounted scarabs in its hand. One remarkable fragment of pottery contained a colored picture of pre-Israelite warriors with great black beards, carrying shields (?). A most interesting discovery was that of the little copper (bronzes?) tripod supporting lamps, on one of which is the figure of a girl, being strikingly similar to pictures of Delphic oracles and to representations lately found in Crete (MNDPV, 1906, 46). This city was destroyed by a fearful conflagration, and is separated from the next by a heavy stratum of cinders and ashes. The fifth city is a remarkable fact, a splendid palace with walls of stone from 3-5 ft. thick. This city, which probably begins as early as Solomon's time, shows the best masonry. An oval, highly polished seal of jasper on which is engraved a Heb name in script closely resembling the MS. suggests a date for the city, and casts an unexpected light upon the Heb culture of Pal in the days of the monarchy. The seal is equal to the best Egypt or Assyrian work, clearly and beautifully engraved, and showing a climax of art. In the center is the Lion ( SCR), with wide open, tall erect, body tense. Upon the seal is carved: "To Shema, servant of Jeroboam." This name may possibly not refer to either of the Bib. kings (10th or 8th cent. BC), but the stratum favors this dating. The seal was evidently owned by a member of the large, prosperous period when the Jeroboam was in power, and so everything is in favor of this being a relic from the court of one of these kings, probably the latter (Kautzsch, M. u. N., 1904, 81). We have here, in any case, one of the oldest Heb inscriptions known. We find another elegant ever engraved (see MNDPV, 1906, 33). After seeing it the Sultan took it from the museum into his own private collection. A second seal of lapis lazuli, which Schuchmacher and Kautzsch date from about the 7th cent. BC, also contains in Old Heb the name "Ashph" (cf M. u. N., 1906, 334; MNDPV, 1904, 147). There are several other remarkable works of art, as e.g. a woman playing the tambourine, wearing an Egypt headdress; or a series of six terra cotta heads, one with a prominent Sem nose, another with Egypt characteristics, another quite un-Egypt, with regular features, vivacious eyes, curls falling to her shoulders in an area.

The sixth stratum might well be called the temple-city, for here were found the ruins of a sanctuary built of massive blocks in which remained much of the ceremonial furniture—sacrificial dishes, a beautiful basalt pot with three feet, a plate having a handle in the form of a flower, etc. Seemingly connected with the former town, three religious buildings covered by a fourth, and one with a pyramidal top; so here several monoliths were found which would naturally be thought as religious monuments—though, since they have been touched with tools, this is perhaps doubtful (Ex 20:25). One incense altar, carved out of gray stone, is so beautiful as to be worthy of a modern Gr cathedral. The upper floor rests on the stratum. In it some stair-ways in colored pottery, including iron plowshares, larger than the bronze ones in the 20th cent. 4th layers. No buildings were found, which may possibly belong to the former town, representing a man before an altar with his hands raised in adoration, possibly to a sacred animal, such as a 6-pointed star, crescent moon, etc. Another most wonderful seal has a white hard stone with several lines of symbols, in the first a vulture chasing a rabbit; in the second a conventional palm tree, with wings of creatures on one side, and a third a large head, an ibex (?) under the crescent moon. Near by was found a cylinder of black granite, containing hieroglyphs, and much crushed pottery. The 7th city, which was previous to the Gr or Rom eras, shows only a complex of destroyed buildings. After the abandonment, the place remained occupied till the 11th cent. AD, when a poor Arab tower was erected, evidently to protect the passing caravans.

These excavations were specially important in proving the archaeological richness of Pal and the elegance of the native works of art. They were reported with an unexampled minuteness—various drawings of an original design showing the exact place and altitude where every little fragment was found.

(3) Tell 'Ham (Capernaum), etc.—In April and May, 1905, the German Oriental Society excavated a Heb synagogue of the Rom era at Tell 'Ham. It was 78 ft. long by 59 ft. wide, was built of beautiful white limestone, almost equal to marble, and was in every way more magnificent than anything yet found in Pal, that in Chorazin being the next finest. Its roof was gable-shaped and it was surprisingly ornamented with fine carvings representing animals, birds, fruits, flowers, etc., though in some cases these ornamentations had been intentionally mutilated. In January, 1907, Macalister and Masterman proved that Khan Minyeh was not the ancient Capernaum, as it contained no pottery older than Arab time, thus showing Tell 'Ham to be the ancient site, so that the synagogue referred to in Lk 7:29 be the one referred to in Lk 7:5. At Samieh, 6 hours N. of Jerus, two important Can. cemeteries were discovered by the fellahin in 1906, consisting of circular or oval tomb chambers, with roofs roughly dome-shaped. One at Gezer, covering a large quantity of pottery and bronze objects, much of excellent quality, was found (Harvard Theol. Rev., I, 70-96; Masterman, Studies in Gallei; Henson, Researches in Palestine). Jericho (German Oriental Society).—During 1908-9, Dr. E. Sellin, assisted by a specialist in pottery, (Watzinger) and a professional architect (Langenegger), with the help of over 200 workmen, opened to view this famous Bib. city (Josh 6:1-24). Jericho was most strategically situated at the eastern gateway of Pal, with an unlimited water-supply in the 'Ain es-Sultan, having complete control of the great commercial highway across the Jordan and possessing natural provisions in its palm forest (Smith, HGHL). It was also set prominently on a hill rising some 40 ft. above the plain. The excavations proved that from the earliest historic time these natural advantages had been increased by every possible artifice known to ancient engineers, until it had become a veritable Gibraltar. The oldest city, which was in the form of an irregular ellipse, somewhat egg-shaped, with the point at the S.W., was first surrounded with a rampart following the contour of the hill, a rampart so powerful that it commands the admiration of all military experts who have examined it. The walls even in their ruins are some 28 ft. high. They were built in three sections: (a) a substratum of clay, gravel and small stones, making a deposit upon the rock about 3 or 4 ft. deep, somewhat analogous to modern concrete; (b) a rubble wall, 6 to 5 ft. thick, of large stones laid up to a height of 16 ft. upon this conglomerate, the lowest layers of the stone being enormously large; (c) upon all this a brick wall over 6 ft. thick, still remaining, in places, 8 ft. high. Not even Megiddo, famous as a military center throughout all the ancient world, shows such workmanship (cf Josh 2 1; Nu 13 28). "These were masters in stone work and masonry" (The Builder): "Taken as a whole it may justly be regarded as a triumph of engineering skill which a modern city, under the same conditions, could scarcely excite!" (Langenegger): "It is as well done as a brilliant military engineer with the same materials and tools could do today" (Vincent). All the centuries were not able to produce a natural crevice in this fortification. At the N., which was the chief point of danger, and perhaps along other sections also, a second wall was built about 100 ft. inside the first, and almost as strong, while still another defense ("the citadel"), with 265 ft. of frontage, was protected not only by another mighty wall but by a well-constructed glacis. The old pre-Israelite culture in Jericho was exactly similar to that seen in the southern and northern cities, and the idolatry also. In its natural elements Canaan civilization was probably superior to that of the Hebrews, but the repugnant and ever-present polytheism and fear of magic led naturally to brutal and impure manifestations. It cannot be doubted that, at least in some cases, the infants buried in jars under the floors represented foundation sacrifices. Some of the pottery is of great excellence, comparing favorably with almost the best examples from Egypt; a number of decorative figures of animals in relief are specially fine; the bronze utensils are also good; esp. notable are the 22 writing-tablets, all ready to be used but not inscribed. Somewhere near the 15th cent. the old fortifications were seriously damaged, but equally powerful ones replaced them. The German experts all believed that a break in the city's history was clearly shown about the time when, according to the pottery, Israel ought to have captured the city, and it was confidently said that the distinctively Canaanite pottery ceased completely and permanently at this point; but further research has shown that at least a portion of the old town had a practically continuous existence (so Josh 16 7; Jgs 11 16; 3 13; 2 S 10 5). No complete Israelitish house was preserved, but the Israelitish quarter was located close to the spring and no little furniture of the usual kind was found, including dishes, pots, combs, lamps, etc., many iron instruments and terra cotta heads of men and animals. The pottery is quite unlike the old Canaanite, being closely allied to the Gr-Phoen ware of Cyprus. It is noticeable that, as in other Palestinian towns, in the 7th and 6th cent. some little influence is discernible; the Assyrian and Egyptian influence is not as marked as in the cities dug up near the Mediterranean coast. One large edifice (60 by 80 ft.) is so like the dwellings of the 7th cent. B.C., that it has been named "the Syrian palace" (Vincent). Absolutely unique was the series of 12 Rhodian hand-carvings stamped in Aram. "To Jehovah" (Yah, Yahweh). Vincent has suggested that as during the monarchy (7th to 6th cent.) "To the King" meant probably "For His Majesty's Service," so in post-exilic time the Divine name meant "For the Temple" (Rev. biblique). After the exile the city had about 3 centuries of prosperity; but disappears permanently in the Maccabean era (MDP, 1907; MDQ, 1908-9; PEPS, 1910; Rev. biblique, 1907-9).

(1) Jerusalem.—See above, III, 1, (2).

(2) Samaria (Harvard Expedition).—Although the ancient capital of the Northern Kingdom, yet Samaria was centrally located, being 4. Central 20 miles from the Mediterranean coast and only about 30 miles N. of Jerusalem. Ancient Samaria was very famous in Israel for its frivolity and wealth, special mention being made of its palace of music, luxurious couches, and its "ivory palace" (Am 6 4-6; 1 K 16 14). Its history is known so fully that the chronological sequences of the ruins can be determined easily. The Citadel and town originally lay on the hill, with the Temple of Baal and palace were constructions of Ahab (1 K 16 32; 22 39); it continued prosperous down to the Assyrian exile, 722 BC (1 K 22 to 2 K 17); Sargon and Esarhaddon established a Babylon colony and presumably fortified the town (720-670 BC); Alexander the Great captured it in 331 BC, and established there a Syriac-Maccabean colony; it was destroyed by John Hyrcanus in 109 BC, but rebuilt by Pompey in 60 BC, and again by Herod (90-1 BC). All of these periods are identified in the excavations, Herod's work being easily recognized, and Josephus' description of the town being found correct; the Gr work is equally well defined, so that the lower layers of masonry which contained the characteristic Jewish pottery, and which in every part of the ruin lay immediately under the Bab and Gr buildings, must necessarily be Heb, the relative order of underlying structures thus being "beyond dispute" (Reisner). During the 1908-9 expedition, Reisner, with a staff of specialists, including David G. Lyon of the Harvard Semitic Museum, G. Schumacher, and an expert architect, undertook systematically and thoroughly to excavate this large detached "tell" lying 350 ft. above the valley and 1,450 ft. above sea-level, its location as the only possible strategic stronghold proving it to be the ancient Samaria. This was a "gigantic enterprise" because of the large village of 800 population, which covered the hill. Some $65,000 were spent during the two seasons, and the work finally ceased before the site was fully excavated. The following statement is an abridgment, in so far as possible in their words, of the official reports of Dr. Reissner and to the Harvard Theological Review: An average of 285 diggers were employed the first season and from 280-60 the second. Hundreds of Arabian lamps, etc., were found close to the surface, and then nothing more until the Rom ruins. Many fine Rom columns still remained upright, upon the surface of the hill. The road of columns leading to the Forum and ornamental gate (oriented unlike the older gates), the great outer wall "20 stadiin in circuit" (Jos), the hippodrome, etc., were all found with inscriptions or coins and pottery of the early Roman Empire. Even the old Rom chariot road leading into the Forum was identified. Adjoining the Forum and connected with it by a wide doorway was a basilica, consisting of a large open stone-paved court surrounded by a colonnade with a colonnade on each side. An architrave from a Greek architrave in the courtyard dates this to 12-15 AD. The plan of the Herodian temple consisted of a stairway, a portico, a vestibule and a cella with a corridor on each side. The staircase was about 80 ft. wide, composed of 17 steps beautifully constructed, the steps being quite modern in style, each tread overlapping the next lower by several inches. The roof was arched and the walls very massive and covered with a heavy coat of plaster still remaining traces of columns of Cubic Drusian marble found near here, and 150 "Rhodian" stamped amphora handles and many fragments of Lat inscriptions. A complete inscription on a large stele proved to be a dedication from some Pannonian soldiers (probably 2d or 3d cent. AD) to "Jupiter Optimus Maximus." Near this was found a torso of heroic size carved in white marble, which is much finer than any ever discovered before in Pal, the work "bringing to mind the Vatican Augustus" (Vincent), though not equal to it. Gr in front of the statue was a Rom altar (presumably Herodian) c 13 by 7 ft., rising in six courses of stone to a height of 6 ft. Beneath the Rom city was a Seleucid town (c 300-108 BC), with its fortifications, gates, and streets, temples, public buildings and a complex of private houses, in connection with which was a large bath house, with mosaic floor, hot and cold baths, water closet, etc., which was heated by a furnace. Underneath the Gr walls, which were connected with the well-known red figured Gr ware of c 400 BC, were brick structures and very thick fortress walls built in receding courses of small stones in the Bab style. In the filling of the construction trench of this Bab wall were found Israelite vases. A few Gr seals with some inscriptions, and 1 fragment of a cuneiform tablet. Below these Bab constructions "there is a series of massive walls beautifully built of large limestone blocks founded on rock and forming a part of one great building which can be no other than the Jewish palace." It consisted of "great open courts surrounded by small rooms, comparable in plan and even in size with the Bab palaces and is certainly royal in size and architecture." Its massive outlines which for the first time in Israel modern work. Masonry of an Israelite palace show that unexpected material resources and technical skill were at the command of the kings of Israel. An even greater discovery was made when on the palace hill was found an alabaster vase inscribed with the cartouche of Osorkon II of Egypt (874-853 BC), Ahab's contemporary; and at the same level, about 75 fragments of pottery, not jar-handle but ostraca, inscribed with records or memorials in ancient Hebrew. The script is Phoenician, and is sent to such experts as Lyon and Driver, practically identical with that of the Siloam Inscription (c 700 BC) and MS (c 850 BC). "The inscriptions are written in ink with a reed pen in an easy flowing hand and show a pleasing contrast to the stiff forms of Phoen inscriptions cut in stone. The graceful curves give evidence of a skill which comes only with long practice" (Lyon). The ink is well preserved, the writing is distinct, the words are divided by dots or strokes, and with two exceptions all the ostraca are dated, the reigning king probably being Ahab. The following samples represent the ordinary memoranda: "In the 11th year. From 'Abi'tezer. For 'Ashi, Akhelemelek (and Ba'al). From 'Elathan (?). . . . in 9th yr. From Yasat. For 'Abi'mam. A jar of old wine. . . . in 11th yr. For Badyo. The vineyard of the Tell." Baal and El form a part of several of the proper names, as also the Heb Divine name, the latter occurring naturally not in its full form, YHWH, but as ordinary in compounds with it. For the dates see Rev., 1911, 79-83. In a list of 30 proper names all but three have Bib. equivalents. "They are the earliest specimens of Heb writing which have been found, and in amount they exceed by far all known ancient Heb inscriptions; moreover, they are the first Palestinian records of this nature to be found" (see esp. Lyon, op. cit., I, 70-96; II, 102-13; III, 136-38; IV, 136-43; Reissner ib, III, 246-63; also Theol. Literar., 1911, 23-27; Rev. biblique, VI, 435-45). (3) 'Atin Shems (Beth-shemesh, 1 S 6:1-21; 2 K 14.11). In a short but important campaign, during 1911-12, in which from 86 to 167 workmen were employed, Dr. D. Mackenzie uncovered a massive double gate and primitive walls 12-15 ft. high, with mighty bastions, and found in later deposits Gr images, Syrian Astaries, imported Aegean vases and a remarkable series of inscribed "royal jar-heads" in the form of a "goose to the archy" (Vincent), as also what seemed to be an ancient Sem tomb with facade entrance. The proved Cretan relations here are esp. important. The town was suddenly destroyed, probably in the era of Seti's successor (PEFS, 1911, LXXIX, 172; 1912, XII, 145). (4) Gezer (Palestine Exploration Fund).—Tell e-Jezar occupies a conspicuous position, over 250 ft. above the plain, and 750 ft. sea level, on a ridge of hills some 20 miles N.W. of Jerua over-looking the plain toward Jaffa, which is 17 miles distant. It is in plain sight of the two chief trade caravans of Southern Pal which it controlled. The ancient Gezer was well known from many references to it in the N.T., the Book of Kings, the Epistle of Barnabas, etc. As a center of 13th century BC and 12th century BC, Gezer is known from the name of several governors of Gezer being given in letters dating from c 1400 BC and Menephtah (c 1200 BC) calling himself "Binder of Gezer," etc. The discovery of the boundary stones of Gezer (see above) positively identified it. It was thoroughly excavated by R. A. Stewart Macalister in 1902-5, 1907-9, during which time 10,000 photographs were made of objects found. No explorations have been so long continued on one spot or have brought more unique discoveries, among which are six dividing monuments of Palestinian culture and religion, and none have been reported as fully (Excavations of Gezer, 1912, 3 vols; Hist of Civilization in Pal, 1912). Ten periods are recognized as being distinctly marked in the history of the mound—which broadly speaking represents the development in all parts of Pal: (a) pre-Sem period (c 3000-2500 BC), to the entrance of the first Semites; (b) first Sem city (c 2500-1800 BC), to the end of the XIIth Egypt Dynasty; (c) second Sem city (c 1800-1400 BC), to the end of the XVIIIth Egypt Dynasty; (d) these periods continued (1400-1000 BC) to the beginning of the Hebrew monarchy; (e) fourth Sem city (c 1000-550 BC), to the destruction of the monarchy and the Bab exile; (f) Pers and Hel period (550-100 BC), to the beginning of the Rom dominion; (g) this period (100 BC-350 AD); (h) Byzantine (350-600 AD); (i) and (j) early and modern Arabian (350 AD to the present). The last four periods have left few important memorials and may be omitted from review.

(a) The Neolithic non-Sem inhabitants of Gezer were troglodytes (Gen 14:7) living in the caves of a honeycomb district (of ZDPY, 1909, VI, 12), modiﬁed for domestic purposes for hours within a small area 5 ft. 4 in. to 5 ft. 7 in. in height, slender in form, with rather broad heads and thick skulls, who hunted, kept and raised domestic animals, and wove and spun wool, and cooked food; possessed no metals, made by hand a porous and gritty soft-baked pottery which they decorated with simple lines and found in large quantities of about a yard high and long by 24 ft. and in the bodies were burned with evidence of a ritual. The cup made in the rocks suggest possible religious rites; in close connection with these markings were certain remains, including bones of swine (cf Lev 11:7).

(b) The Semites who displaced this population were more advanced in civilization, having stone tools and potter's wheels, with ﬁner and more varied pottery; they were a heavier race, being 5 ft. 7 in. to 5 ft. 11 in. in stature, large-headed, broad-faced, with jaws and teeth large, and remarkable of all were their works of engineering. They built enormous structures, square, rectangular and circular. One of the soft chalk and limestone rocks, of which consisted 60 chambers, one chamber being 40 ft. long by 30 ft. wide, was a tomb which was made c 2000 BC, passing out of use c 1540-1250 BC, and which shows the power of these Early Philistines. The tomb was 200-350 ft. in circumference, being a runway cut through the rock of some 47 ft. to an inner hall, 12 ft. high and 8 ft. in thickness, which led to a long sloping passage of equal dimensions, with the arch having a vaulted roof and the sides well plumb. This led into a bed of much harder rock, where dimensions were reduced and the workmanship was poorer, but ultimately reached, about 130 ft. below the present surface of the ground, an enormous living chamber of such depth that the excavators could not empty it of the soft mud with which it was ﬁlled. A well-cut but well-worn and battered stone staircase, over 12 ft. high, connects the upper and lower sections of the tunnel 94 ft. above. Beyond the spring was a natural cave 80 ft. by 25 ft. Dr. Macalister asks, "Did a Canaanite governor plan and Canaanite workmen execute this vast work? How did the ancient engineers discover the plan answer?" Certainly the tunnel was designed to bring the entrance of the water passage within the courtyard protected by the palace wall.

Another great reservoir, 57 by 40 ft., at another part of the city was squared in the rock to a depth of 29 ft. and below this another one of equal depth but not so large, and narrowing toward the bottom. These were over ﬁlled with layers of cement and surrounded by a wall; they would hold 60,000 gallons.

(c) The second Sem city, built on the ruins of the first, was smaller. Here were fewer buildings but larger rooms. The potter's wheel was worked, pottery becomes much ﬁner, better styles and decoration reaching a climax of grace and refinement. Foreign trade begins in this period and almost or quite reaches its culmination. The Hyksos scarabs found here prove that under their rule (XVth and XVIth Dynasties) there was close intercourse with Pal, and the multitudes of Egypt articles show that this was also true before and after the Hyksos. The Cretan and Phoenician trade, esp. the latter, introduced new art ideas which soon brought local attempts at imitation. Scribes implements for writing in wax and clay begin here and are found in all strata hereafter.

While the pottery is elaborately painted, it is but little modeled. The potter "combed" it. (Possibly) "combed" it, and it disappears, while garnished ornament reaches high-water mark. Another distinctive feature of this period is the elaborately modeled and stuck on; but it is insufﬁcient art. Burials still occur in natural caves, but also in stone masonry. Mummies were deposited on the floor without coffins, generally in a crouching posture, and stones are laid around and over them without system. Drink offerings always and food offerings generally are placed with the dead. Scarabs are found with the skeletons, and ornaments of bronze and silver, occasionally gold and beads, and sometimes even a chain. Lamps also begin to be deposited, but in small numbers.

(d) During this period Menephtah "spoiled Gezer," and Israel established itself in Canaan.

The excavations have given no hint of Menephtah's raid, unless it be found in an ivy pectoral bearing his cartouche. About 1400 BC a great wall, 4 ft. thick, was built of large and well-shaped stones and protected later by particularly fine towers, perhaps, as Macalister suggests, by the Pharaoh who captured Gezer and gave it as a dowry to his daughter, wife of King Solomon. A curious fact, which seemingly illustrates Josh 18:10, is the large increase of the town shortly after the Heb invasion. "The houses are smaller and more crowded and the sacred area of the high place is built over." There is no indication of an exclusively Israelite population around the city outside. (Macalister, v. Driver, Modern Research, 69). That land was taken for building purposes from the old sacred enclosure, and that new ideas in building plans and more heavily fortified buildings were now introduced have been thought to suggest the entrance among the ancient population of another element with different ideas. The finest palace of this period with very thick walls (3-9 ft.) carefully laid out at right angles, and certainly built near "the time of the Heb invasion," was perhaps the residence of Horam (Josh 10:33). At this period Early first are found (10 being found here, as against 28 in the next period, and 31 in the Hellenistic) and also iron tools; the use of the carpenter's compass is proved, the bow drill was probably in use, bronze and iron nails appear (wrought iron being fairly common from e 1000 BC); a cooking-pot of bronze was found, and spoons of shell and bronze; modern methods of making buttons and button holes are found from this period; pottery buttons being introduced in the next city. One incantation to the alliance between Gezer and Lachish (Josh 10:33) finds unexpected illustration from the fact that a kind of pottery peculiar to Lachish, not having been found in any other of the Southern Palestinian towns, was found at Gezer. The pottery here in general shows the same method of construction as in the 3d stratum, but the decoration and shapes deteriorate, while there is practically no molding. It shows much the same foreign influence as before, the styles being affected from Egypt, Crete, the Aegean, and esp. Cyprus. From this period come 218 scarabs, 68 from the period previous and 93 from the period following. Ornamental colored specimens of imported Egyptian glass also occur, clear glass not being found till the next period. Little intercourse is proved with Babylon at this era as against 16 Bab cylinders found in the previous period, only 4 were found in this and 15 in the next period. There is no marked change in the method of disposing of the dead, but the food vessels are of smaller size and are placed in the graves in greater numbers, most of these being broken either through the use of poor vessels because of economy or with the idea of liberating the spirit of the object that it might serve the deceased in the spirit world. Lamps are common now in every town but there is a marked decrease in the quantity and value of ornamental objects. Religious emblems occur but rarely. The worship of Astarte (see Ashtoreth), the female consort of Baal, is most popular at this era, terra cotta figures and plaques of this goddess being found in many towns and in large numbers. It is suggestive that these grow notably less in the next stratum. It is also notable that primitive idols are certainly often intentionally ugly (Vincent). So to this day Arab women cover their heads with a veil.

C) This period, during which almost the entire prophetic lit. was produced, is of peculiar interest. Gezer at this time as at every other period was in general appearance like a modern Arab village, a huge mass of crooked, narrow, airless streets, shut inside a thick wall, with no trace of sanitary conveniences, with huge cisterns in which dead men could lie undetected for centuries, and with no sewers. Even in the Maccabean time the only sewer found ran, not into a cesspool, but into the ground, close to the governor's palace. The mortuary pile was excessively high, few old men being found in the cemetery, while curvature of the spine, syphilis, brain disease, and esp. broken, unset bones were common. Tweezers, pins, pendants, rings, mirrors, perfume boxes, scrapers (for baths) were common in this stratum and in all that follow it, while we have also here silver earrings, bracelets and other beautiful ornaments with the first sign of clear glass objects; tools also of many kinds of stone, bronze and iron, an iron hoe just like the modern one, and the first known pulley of bronze. The multitude of Heb weights found here have thrown much new light on the weight-standards of Pal (see esp. Macalister, Gezer, II, 287-90, E. J. Pyle, PEPS, 1912; A. R. S. Kenyon, Expedition, XXIV). The pottery was poor in quality, clumsy and coarse in shape and ornament, excepting as it was imported, the local Aegean imitations being unworthy. Combed ornament was not common, and the burned as a rule was limited to random scratches. Multiple lamps became common, and a large variety of styles in small jars was introduced. The motives of the last period survive, but in a degenerate form. The hard frieze so characteristic of the 3d Temp period disappear. The scarab stamp goes out of use, but the impressions of other seals "now become fairly common as potter's marks." These consist either of simple devices (stars, pendants, etc) or of names in Cn. Heb script. These Heb-inscription stamps were found at many sites and consist of two classes, (i) those containing personal names, such as Azariah, Hagga, Menahem, Shebaniah, etc, (ii) those which are confined to four names, often repeated—Hebron, Socoh, Zipp, Manshith—in connection with a reference to the king, e.g. "For [or Of] the king of Hebron." These latter date, according to Dr. Macalister's final judgment, from the Pers period. He still thinks they represent the names of various potters' guilds in Pal (cf. 1 Ch 2, 4, 5, and see esp. Bible Side-Lights from Gezer, 150, etc), but others suppose these names to represent the local measures of capacity, which differed in these various districts; others that these represented guilds of potters, whose wares would be used and bought. At any rate, we certainly have here the work of the king's potters referred to in 1 Ch 4 23. Another very curious Heb tablet inscription is the so-called Zodiacal Tablet, on which the signs of the Zodiac are figured with certain other symbols which were at first supposed to express some esoteric magical or religious meaning, but which seem only to represent the ancient agricultural year with the proper months indicated for sowing and reaping—being the same as the modern seasons and crops excepting that flax was cultivated anciently. An even more important literary memorial from this period consists of two cuneiform tablets written about three-quarters of a century after the Ten Tribes had been carried to Assyria and foreign colonies had been thrown into Israelite territory. This collapse of the Northern Kingdom was not marked by any local catastrophe, so far as the ruins indicate, any more than the mass of the KINGDOM of the Assyrians from Israel entered Pal; but soon afterward we find an Assyrian colony settled in Gezer "using the Assyrian language and letters, etc, and carrying on business with Assyrian methods." In one tablet (649 BC), which is a bill of sale for certain land in the town of Ziph, the language, appearing the name of the buyer, seals of seller and signature of 12 witnesses, one of whom is the Egyptian governor of the new town, another an Assyrian noble whose name precedes that of the governor, and still another a Western Asiatic, the others being Assyrian. It is a Hebrew "Nethaniah," who the next year, as the other tablet shows, sells his field, his seal bearing upon it a lunar stellar emblem. Notwithstanding the acknowledged literary work of high quality produced in Pal during this period, no other hint of this is found clear down to the Gr period except in one neo-Bab tablet. The burials in this period were much as previously, excepting that the caves were smaller and toward the end of the period the shelves around the walls received the bodies. In one Sem tomb as many as 150 vessels were found. Quite the most astonishing discovery at this level was that of several tombs which scholars generally agree to be "Philistine." They were not native Canaanite, but certainly Aegean intruders with relations with Crete and Cyprus, such as we would expect the Philistines to have (see PHILISTINES). The tombs were oblong or rectangular, covered with large horizontal slabs, each tomb containing but a single body, ascribed, and these were only covered with a sheet of alabaster and silver about her, and wearing a Cretan silver mouth plate; another was a man of Simon's body, a large oblong vessel, 3 ft. long and 2 ft. broad and 1 ft. 2 in. deep, which is differently interpreted as being the block upon which the 'Heb ébôth, may have been erected, or as an altar, or perhaps a laver for ablutions. Inside the sacred enclosure was found a small bronze cobra (2 K 18 4), and also the entrance to an ancient cave, where probably oracles were given, the excavators finding that this cave was connected with another by a small, secret passage—through which presumably the message was delivered. In the stratum underlying the high place was a cemetery of infants buried in large jars. "That the sacrificed infants were the firstborn, devoted in the temple, is indicated by the fact that none were over a week old" (Macalister). In all the Sem strata bones of children were also found in corners of the houses, the deposits being identical with infant burials in the high place; and examination showed that these were not stillborn children. At least some of the burials under the house thresholds and under the foundations of walls carry with them the mute proofs of this most gruesome practice. In one place the skeleton of an old woman was found in a corner where a hole had been left just large enough for this purpose. A youth of about 18 had been cut in two at the waist and only the upper part of his body deposited. Before the coming into Pal of the Israelites, a lamp began to be placed under the walls and foundations, probably symbolically to take the place of human sacrifice. A lamp and bowl deposit under the threshold, etc., begins in the 3rd Sem period, but is rare till the middle of that period. In the 4th Sem period it is common, though not universal; in the Hellenic it almost disappears. Macalister suspects that these bowls held blood or grape juice. In one striking case a bronze figure was found in place of a body. Baskets full of phalli were carried away from the high place. Various types of the Astarte were found at Gezer. When we see the strength and popularity of this religion against which the prophets contended in Canaan, "we are amazed at the survival of this world-religion," and we now see "why Ezra and Nehemiah were forced to raise the fence of the law" against this heathenism, which did in fact overwhelm all other Sem religions" (George Adam Smith, P E F S, 1906, 288).

(f) During the Maccabean epoch the people of Gezer built reservoirs (one having a capacity of 4,000,000 gallons) used well-paved rooms, favored complex house plans with pillars, the courtyard becoming less important as compared with the rooms, though domestic bowls were now for the first time introduced. The architectural decorations have all been annihilated (as elsewhere in Pal) excepting a few molded stones and an Ionic volute from a palace, supposed to be that of Simon Maccabaeus because of the references in Jos and because of a scribbled impression found in the courtyard: "May fire overtake [?] Simon's palace." This is the only inscription from all these post-exilic centuries, to which so much of the beautiful Bible lit., is ascribed, excepting one grotesque animal figure on which is screwed a name which looks a little like "Antiochus." Only a few scraps of Gr bowls, some Rhodian jar-handles, a few bronze and iron arrow heads, a few animal figures and a fragment of an Astarte, of doubtful chronology, remain from these four centuries. The potsherds prove that foreign imports continued and that the local potters followed classic models and did excellent work. The ware was always burnished hard; combed ornament and burnishing were out of style; molded ornament was usually confined to the rope design; painted decorations were rare; potter's marks were generally in Gr, though some were in Heb, the letters being of late form, and no names appearing similar to those found in Scripture. The tombs were well-cut square chambers, with shafts hewn in the rock for the bodies, usually nine to each tomb, which were cut into them head foremost. The doorways were well cut, the covers almost always being movable flat slabs, though in one case a swinging stone door was found—circular rolling stones or the "false doors" so often found in the Jerus tombs being unknown here. Little shrines were erected above the forecourt or vestibule. When the body decayed, the bones in tombs having these kakhin, shafts, were collected into ossuaries, the inscriptions on these ossuaries showing clearly the transition from Old He to the square character. After the Maccabean time the town was deserted, though a small Jewish community lived here in the 4th cent. AD. See also GEZER.

PALLU, pal'6, PALLUTES, pal'-tis (Stg., pal'th, 'distinguished'): A son of Reuben (Gen 46 6 "Phallu"); Ex 5 14; Nu 26 5.8; 1 Ch 5 3). Perhaps Peleth of Nu 16 1 is the same. Pallutes, the patronymic, occurs in Nu 26 5.

PALM, pām (OF THE HAND) (יָד, yôd): The Heb word which is used in a variety of senses (see HAND; FAW) is usually tr3 (hand) in EV, but the tr "palm" is found in 5 passages of the OT, in 3 of which the Heb text adds the word "yôd, ("hand.") 1 S 5 4; 2 K 9 35; Dnl 10 10). It would properly mean the "hollow hand" (root kaphph, "to bend," "to break," etc.), which receives or grasps things. It is therefore used in reference to filling the priest's hands with sacrificial portions (Lev 14 15.16). The palms of the hands of Dagon are mentioned as cut off, when the idol was found mutilated in the presence of the ark of Jeh (1 S 6 4), from which many people inferred that this deity was represented with hands spread out in blessing, as we find in numerous Bab representations of divinities.

In a beautiful metaphor God answers the repentant people of Jerus, who thought Jeh had forgotten and forsaken them: "Behold, I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands" (Isa 49 16; see also Ecles 18 3). Daniel is touched upon the palms of his hands to wake him from sleep (Dnl 10 10).

In the NT we find the phrase, "to smite with the palms of hands," as a τρόπος in the Gr th rhópsa, rhópsos (Mt 21 9; 20 19; Mk 11 9; 11 11; 11 7); see also 5 19; 1 X X X Hos 11 1; 1 Esd 4 30), and, derived from the same vb., δωευσα, rhópsa, a blow of the palm on the cheek, etc (Mk 14 65; Jn 18 22; 19 3, where, however, in EV the word "palm" has not been given). The marginal tr "to smite or strike with the palms" (Mt 21 19; 11 57; Jn 18 22; 19 3) and "strokes of rod" (Mk 14 65 m) does not seem to be applicable to the Gr text of the OT and NT, while it is a frequent meaning of the words in classical language. It would therefore be better to eliminate these marginal additions.

PALM TREE, pām'trē (ποιμ, dāmār, same as the Aram. and Ethiopic, but in Arab. = "date"); φοίνιξ, phóiniz (Ex 15 27; Lev 23 40; Nu 33 9; Dt 34 3; Jgs 1 16; 3 13; 2 Ch 28 15; Neh 8 15; Ps 92 12; Cant 7 7 f; Joel 1 12); tāmer, Deborah "dwelt under the palm-tree" (Jgs 4 5); "they are like a palm-tree in [m"pillar"], of turned work" (Jer 10 5); הַתָּנָר, tāmarâd [only in pl.], the palm tree as an architectural feature (1 K 6 29.32.35; 7 36; 2 Ch 3 5; Ezk 40 16]; Gr only Ecles 50 12; Jn 12 13; Rev 7 9): The palm, Phoenix dactylifera (N.O. Palmae), Arab. nakẖl, is a tree which from the earliest times has been associated with the Sem peoples. In Arabia, the very existence of man depends largely upon its presence, and many authorities consider this to have been its original habitat. It is only natural that such a tree should have been sacred both there and in Assyria in the earliest ages. In Pal the palm leaf appears as an ornament upon pottery as back as 1800 BC (cf PEFS, Gezer Memoirs 1, 172). In Egypt the tall palm stem forms a constant feature in early architecture, and among the Hebrews it was extensively used as a decoration of the temple (1 K 6 29.32.35; 7 36; 2 Ch 3 5). It is a symbol of beauty (Cant 7 7) and of the righteous man: "The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree: He shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon. They are planted in the house of Jehovah; They shall flourish in the courts of our God. They shall still bring forth fruit in old age; They shall be full of sap and growth" (Ps 92 12-14).

The palm tree or branch is used extensively on Jewish coinage and most noticeably appears as a symbol of the land upon the celebrated Judaea Capta coins of Vespasian. A couple of centuries or so later it forms a prominent architectural feature in the ornamentation of the Galilean synagogues, e.g., at Tell Hal (Capernaum). The method of artificial fertilization of the pistillate (female) flowers by means of the staminate (male) flowers appears to have been known in the earliest historic times. Winged figures are depicted on some of the early Assyra sculptures shaking a bunch of the male flowers over the female for the same purpose as the people of modern Gaza ascend the tall trunks of the fruit-bearing palms and tie among the female flowers a bunch of the pollen-bearing male flowers.

Date Palm with Fruit (at Jaffa).
In Pal today the palm is much neglected; there are few groves except along the coast, e.g. at the bay of Akka, Jaffa and Gaza; solitary palms occur all over the land in the ancient courts of mosques (cf Ps 92 13). Abundance and houses even in the mountains. In Palestine once palms flourished upon the mount of Olives (Neh 8 15), and Jericho was long known as the "city of palm-trees" (Dt 34 3; Jgs 1 16; 3 13; Jos, Ib, IV, viii, 2-3), but today the only palms are scarce and small; under its name Hazzazon-tamar (2 Ch 20 2), En-gedi would appear to have been as much a place of palms in ancient days as we know it was in later history. A city too, called Tamar ("date palm") appears to have been somewhere near the southwestern corner of the Dead Sea (Ezk 47 19; 48 28). Today the numerous salt-encrusted stumps of wild palm trees washed up all along the shores of the Dead Sea witness to the existence of these trees within recent times in some of the deep valleys around.

Branches of palms have been symbolically associated with several different ideas. A palm branch is used in Isa 9 14; 19 15 to signify the "head" of the highest of the people, as contrasted with the rush, the "tail," or humblest of the people. Palm branches appear from early times to have been associated with rejoicing. On the first day of the Feast of Tabernacles the Hebrews were commanded to take branches of palms, with other trees, and rejoice before God (Lev 23 40; cf Neh 8 15; 2 Macc 10 7). The palm branch still forms the chief feature of the lulabb carried daily by every pious Jew to the synagogue, during the feast. Later it was connected with the idea of triumph and victory. Simon Maccabeus entered the Akra at Jerusalem after its capture, "with thanksgiving, and branches of palm trees, and with harps and cymbals, and with songs and hymns; because there was destroyed a great enemy out of Israel" (1 Macc 13 51 AV; cf 2 Macc 10 7). The same idea comes out in the use of palm branches by the multitudes who escorted Jesus to Jerusalem (Jn 12 13) and also in the vision of the "great multitude, which no man could number ... standing before the ... Lamb, arrayed in white robes, and palms in their hands" (Rev 7 9). Today palms are carried in every Moslem funeral procession and are laid on the new-made grave.

So also Tamar as a proper name.

PALMER-WORM, Pām'ēr-wārn (272, jāzān; LXX καμήλ, kammēlem; Am 4 9; Joel 1 4; 2 255): "Palm-worm" means "eaterpillar," but the insect meant is probably a kind of locust. See Insect; Locust.

PALSY, pōl'zi, PARALYSIS, par-al'i-sis (παράλυσις, paralúsis): The Eng. word "palsy" is derived from the Gr. paralysis, which in Middle Eng. was shortened into palese, the form in which it appears in Wyclif's version. In the 16th cent. it appears as "palsy," the form used in AV. This, however, is seldom used at the present day, the Latinized Gr form "paralysis" being more frequently employed, both in modern literature and in colloquial Eng. "Sick of the palsy" is the tr either of the adj. para-times; one of them, called the Kimax or the Ladder, with its broad stair-like steps 2,000 ft. high, may still be seen on the high land which was once called “Pisidia,” but which the Romans, in 70 AD, made a part of Pamphylia.

Pamphylia, unless in pre-historic times, was never an independent kingdom; it was subject successively to Lydia, Persia, Macedon, and Rome. Because of its comparatively isolated position, civilization was less developed than in the neighboring countries, and the Asiatic influence was at most times stronger than the Gr. As early as the 6th cent. B.C. a Gr. colony settled there, but the Gr. language which was spoken in some of its cities soon became corrupted; the Gr. inscriptions, appearing upon the coins of that age, were written in a peculiar character, and before the time of Alexander the Great, Gr. ceased to be spoken. Perga then became an important city and the center of the Asiatic religion, of which the Artemis of Perga, locally known as Leot, was the goddess. Coins were struck also in that city. Somewhat later the Gr. City of Attaleia, which was founded by the Ptolemies (159–188 B.C.), rose to importance, and until recent years has been the chief port of entry on the southern coast of Asia Minor. About the beginning of our era, Side became the chief city, and issued a long and beautiful series of coins, making possible to facilitate trade with the pirates who found there a favorable market for their booty. Pamphylia is mentioned as one of the recipients of the “letters” of 1 Mac 15 23.

Christianity was first introduced to Pamphylia by Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13 13; 14 24), but because their stay in the country was brief, or because of the difficulty of communication with the neighboring countries, or because of the Asiatic character of the population, it was slow in being established. See also Attalia; Perga; Side, the chief cities of Pamphylia.

PAN: Name of a utensil used in the preparation or the serving of food, and representing several words in the original. Passing over the use of the word in connections like 1 Ch 9 31, “things baked in pans,” where the Heb word ḫabbāthin refers, not to the pan itself, but to the cakes baked in the flat pan or griddle which was called mōḥāth (Ex 27 23; 1 K 7 50, etc.), we see that we have been used to carry burning coals, we note the following words:

1. ḫōṭḥāḇ, mōḥāḥth, “pan” AV, “baking-pan” RV, a dish of uncertain shape and size which was used in the preparation of the minḥāḥ, or vegetable offering. See Lev 2 5; 6 21; 7 9; 1 Ch 23 29.

2. Ḫēḡōr, rendered “pan” in 1 S 2 14. The same word is used in the phrase, “pan of fire” RV, “hearth of fire” AV (Zec 12 6); and it is also trd “laver” in the descriptions of the furnishing of tabernacle and temple (Ex 30 18; 1 K 7 20, etc.). As it held water and was used for boiling meat and the like, it must have been a kind of pot or kettle.

3. Ḫōṭḥāḇ, masērāth (2 S 13 9). The connection gives no clue as to shape or size except that it must have been small enough to serve food in, and of the proper shape to hold a substance which could be poured out. Some authorities suggest a connection with the root Ḫōr, 5th sgr, “leave,” and think that this pan was the kneading-trough in shape.

4. Ḫēḡōr, sgr, rendered “pan” in Ex 27 3 AV, “pot” RV (see Port).

5. Ḫōṭḥāḇ, pārār, “pan” in Nu 11 8 AV, “pot” RV (see Port).

6. Ḫōṭḥāḇ, ṣēlābhāḥ (2 Ch 35 13). Some kind of dish or pot. Slightly different forms of the same root are rendered “cruse” in the Vulgate, “diah” (2 K 21 13 [cāllāḥāth]; and also in RV in Prov 19 24; 26 15, instead of the probably incorrect “bosom” of AV.

7. Ḫēḡō or, lēbēs, trd “pan” in 1 Esd 1 12 AV (“cauldron”).

8. Ḫēḡō’, ṣāghōn, 2 Mac 7 35, with the vb. Ḫēḡō, ṣāghō, ṣāghō, ver 5, is the usual Gr word for “frying-pan,” but here a large sheet of metal must be meant (cf 4 Mac 8 13; 12 10 20).

PANNAG, pan’aq (םענ, pannagq: kar‘ia, kasia; Ezk 27 17 m, “Perhaps a kind of confection”): One of the articles of commerce of Judah and Israel. The kasia of the LXX is said to be a similar shrub to the laurel. Nothing is known of the nature of pannag. Cheyne (EB, 3565) thinks the Heb letters have got misplaced and should be קק קק קק, gophen, “vine,” and he would join it to the יִּבְבַּי, “wine,” which follows in the verse, giving a tr “grape honey,” the ordinary ḫabb of Pal.—an extremely likely article of commerce. See Honey.

PANOPLY, pan’o- pli: 1 Mac 13 29 RVm. See Armor.

PAP (פָּפ, shabd, ?w, shōdāh, “breast” [Ezk 23 21]; μαστός, masōs, “the breast” [Lk 11 27; 25 29; Rev 1 13]). The Eng. word, which goes back to Middle Eng. “pappe” (see Skeat, Concise Etymological Dict. of the Eng. Language, 327) and is now obsolete, has been replaced in RV by “breast.” The Heb word signifies the “female breast”; the Gr word has a wider signification, including the male chest.

PAPER REEDS, rēdā: In Isa 19 7 AV (RV “meadows”).

PAPHOS, pā’ fōs: The name of two towns, Old (Ἀλάξα Ἀλάξα, Palæa Paphos, Ἀλάξανδρα, Palaipaphos) and New Paphos (Νέος, Néos Paphos), situated at the southwestern extremity of Cyprus. Considerable confusion is caused by the use of the single name Paphos in ancient writers to denote now one, now the other, of these cities. That referred to in Acts 13 6 13 is strictly called New Paphos (modern Bafio), and lay on the coast about a mile S. of the modern Ktima and some 10 miles N.W. of the old city. The latter (modern Ktikia) is situated on an eminence more than a mile from the sea, on the left bank of the Diakirio, probably the ancient Bocarus.

It was founded by Cinyras, the father of Adonis, or, according to another legend, by Acras, and was regarded as the capital of the most important kingdom in Cyprus except that of Old Salamis. Its territory embraced Paphos a considerable portion of Western Cyprus, extending northward to that of Soli, southward to that of Galatia, and eastward to the range of Troodos. Among its last kings was Nicodem, who ruled shortly after the death of Alexander the Great. In 310 BC Nicotan of Salamis, who had been set over the whole of Cyprus by Ptolemy I of Egypt, was forced to put an end to his life at Paphos for plotting with Antigonus (Diodorus xx. 21, who wrongly gives the name as Nicocles; see note on the Roman Agrippa), and it is from that time Paphos remained under Egyptian rule until the Roman annexation of Cyprus in 58 BC. The growth of New Paphos brought with it the decline of the old city, which was also ruined by successive earthquakes. Yet its temple still retained much of its old fame, and in 69 AD Titus, the future emperor of Rome, turned aside on his journey to Jerusalem, which he was to capture in the following year, to visit the sacred shrine and to inquire of the priests into the fortune which awaited the island (Tacitus Hist. ii. 24; Suetonius Titus 5).

New Paphos, originally the seaport of the old town, was founded, according to tradition, by Agapenor of Arcadia (Hid. ii.600; Hid. iii.520); its possession of a good harbor secured its prosperity, and it had several rich temples. According to Dio Cassius (iv.23) it was restored by Augustus in 15 BC after a destructive earthquake and received the name Augustoa (Or Schol. on the Roman Agrippa), which was the the administrative capital of the island and the seat of the governor. The extent remains all date from this period and include those of public buildings, private houses, city walls and the moles of the harbor.

The sanctuary of Paphos, the source of its fame was the local cult, of which the kings and their descendants remained hereditary priests down to the Roman seizure of Cyprus. The goddess, identified with the Greek Aphaia, was said to have risen from the sea at Paphos, was in reality a Nature-goddess, closely resembling the Bab Ishtar and the Phoen Astarte, a native deity of Asia Minor and the Aegean Islands. Her cult can be traced back at Paphos to Homeric times (Odyssey vii.362) and was repeatedly celebrated by Gr and Lat poets (Aeschylus Suppl. 555; Aristoph. Lys. 833; Virgil Aen. i.415; Horace Odes i.19 and 30; iii.20; Statius Silvae i.2, 101, etc.). The goddess was represented, not by a statue in human form, but by a white conical stone (Max. Tyr. viii.8; Tacitus Hist. ii.3; Servius Ad Aen. i.724), of which models were on sale for the benefit of pilgrims (Athenaeus xxv.18); her worship was spread further afield and she is referred to by Athenais as the dedication of lust (Contra Gentes 9). Excavation has brought to light at Old Paphos a complex of buildings belonging to Rom times and consisting of an open court with chambers or colonnades on three sides and an entrance on the E. only, the whole forming a quadrilateral enclosure with sides about 210 ft. long. In this court may have stood the altar, or altars, of incense (Homer speaks of a single altar, Virgil of "a hundred altars warm with incense"; a good might be shed thereon, and although it stood in the open it was "wet by no rain" (Tacitus, 1c.; Pliny, NH, ii.210). On the south side are the ruins of another building, possibly an earlier temple, now almost destroyed save for the western wall (Journal of Hellenic Studies, 193-224). But the fact that no remains or inscriptions have been found here earlier than the Rom occupation of Cyprus militates against the view that the sanctuary stood at this spot from prehistoric times. Its site may be sought at some distance to the south of Kouklia (D. G. Hogarth, Times, August 5, 1910), or possibly on the plateau of Rachhantì, some 3 miles S.E. of the village, where numerous inscriptions in the old Cyprian syllabic script were found in the summer of 1910 (M. Olmefalsch-Richer, Times, July 12, 1910).

After visiting Salamis and passing through the whole island, about 100 miles in length, Barnabas, Paul and Mark reached Paphos, the 5. The Apostle Barnabas of the Rom proconsul, Apostles' Sergius Paulus (for the title see Visit Cyprus). Here too they would doubtless begin by preaching in the synagogue, but the governor—who is probably the same Paulus whose name appears as proconsul in an inscription of Soli (D. G. Hogarth, Devia Cyprus, 114)—hearing of their mission, sent for and questioned them on the subject of their preaching. A Jew named Bar-Jesus or Elymas, who, as a Magian or exorcist, was known as "the sorcerer," presumably as a member of his suite, used all his powers of persuasion to prevent his patron from giving his adherence to the new faith, and was met by Paul (it is at this point that the name is first introduced) with a seething denunciation and a sentence of temporary loss of sight. The blindness which at once fell on him produced a deep impression on the mind of the proconsul, who professed his faith in the apostolic teaching. From Paphos, Paul and his companions sailed, as Tacitus tells us, "to the island of Crete," a weekly direction to Pergamum Pamphylia (Acts 15 6-13).

Paul did not revisit Paphos, but we may feel confident that Barnabas and Mark would return there on their 2d missionary journey (Acts 15 39). Of the later history of the Paphos church little is known. Tycho, Paul's companion, is said to have been martyred there, and Jerome tells us that Hilarion sought in the neighborhood of the decayed and almost deserted town the quiet and retirement which he craved. (Vita Hieron. 42). The Acts Barnabas speak of a certain Rhoden, who was attached to the temple service at Old Paphos, as having accepted the Christian faith.

LITERATURE—Besides the works already referred to see Journal of Hellenic Studies, 175-92 citation of passages from ancient authors relating to Old Paphos, together with a list of medival and modern authorities, 235-71 (inscriptions and combs), and the bibliography appended to INT. CYPRUS.

MARCUS N. TOD

A marsh or water plant, abundant in Egypt in ancient times, serving many purposes in antiquity. The papyrus tuft was the emblem of the Northern Kingdom in Egypt. Like the lotus, it suggested one of the favorite capitals of Egypt architecture. Ropes, sandals, and mats were made from its fibers (see Odyssey xxi.391; Herod. ii.37, 69), and bundles of the long, light stalks were bound together into light boats (Isa 18 2; Breasted, Hist Egyptians, 91).

Most importantly, from it was made the tough and inexpensive paper which was used from very ancient times in Egypt and which 1. Papyrus Paper became the common writing-material. Paper of the cellular pith of the long triangular papyrus stalk was stripped of its bark or rind and sliced into thin strips. Two layers of these strips were laid at right angles to each other, paste between (Pliny, says with the air of a secret). The sheets thus formed were

Egypt papyrus rolls are in existence dating from the 27th cent. BC, and no doubt the manufacture of papyrus had been practised for centuries before. The Egypt rolls were sometimes of great length and were often beautifully decorated with colored vignettes (Book of the Dead). Egypt documents of great historical value have been preserved on these fragile rolls. The Papyrus Ebers of the 16th cent. BC sums up the medical lore of the Egyptians of the time of Amenhotep I. The Papyrus Harris, 133 ft. long, in 117 columns, dates from the middle of the 12th cent. BC and records the benefactions and achievements of Ramses III. For the XIXth, XXth and XXIst dynasties, indeed, papyrus are relatively numerous, and their contribution important for Egypt history, life and religion. By the year 1000 BC, papyrus had doubtless come to be used for writing far beyond the limits of Egypt. The Wenamon Papyrus (11th cent.) relates that 500 rolls of papyrus were among the gifts sent from the Delta to the Prince of Biblus, but except in the rarest instances papyrus have escaped destruction only in Upper Egypt, where climatic conditions esp. favored their preservation.

In very recent years (1895, 1904, 1907) several Aram. papyri have been found on the island of Elephantine, just below the First Cataract, dating from 494 to 400 BC.

Papyrus

They show that between 470 and 408 BC a flourishing colony of Jews existed there, doing business under Pers away, and worshipped their god Yahwot not in a synagogue, but in a temple, in which they offered meal offerings, incense and burnt offerings. In 408, the Egyptians had destroyed their temple at Yot, and the Jews appealed for address to the Pers governor. It is well known that some Jews had taken refuge in Egypt in 586 BC, taking the prophet Jeremiah with them, and with some such band of refugees the Yeh colony may have originated, although it may have been much older (cf Jer 44 1.15; 2 Macc. XXIX, 1907, 305 ft.; XXXI, 448 ft.; chief publications by Euting, Bayce and Cowley, and esp. Sachau, Drei aramische Papyrusurkunden aus Elephantine, 2d ed, 1908; Aramische Papyrus und Ostroaka, 1911).

The first important discovery of Gr papyri made in modern times was among the ruins of Heracleanum, near Naples, where in 1752 the Papyrus Antiquorum.

In 1820 another body of papyri was found by natives, buried, it was said, in an earthen pot, on the site of the Serapeum at Memphis, just above Cairo. These came from the most part of the year 155 BC. They fell into various hands, and are now in the museums of London, Paris, Leyden, Rome and Dresden. With them the stream of papyri began to flow steadily into the British and Continental museums. In 1821 an Englishman, Mr. W. J. Bankes, bought an Elephantine roll of the xxvith book of the Itiad, the first Gr literary papyrus to be derived from Egypt. The efforts of Mr. Harris and others in 1847-50 brought to England considerable parts of lost orations of Hyperides, new papyri at the xxvith book of the Itiad, and parts of Itiad ii, iii, ix. In 1855 Mariette purchased a fragment of Alcman for the Louvre, and in 1856 Mr. Stobart obtained the funeral oration of Hyperides.

The present period of papyrus recovery dates from 1877, when an immense mass of Gr and other papyri, for the most part documentary, not literary, was found in the Fayum, on the site of the ancient Asinoeo. The bulk of this collection passed into the hands of Archchuke Rainer Vienna, minor portions of it being secured by the museums of Paris, London, Oxford and Berlin. These belong largely to the Byzantine period. Another great find was made in 1892 in the Fayum; most of these went to Berlin, some few to the British Museum, Vienna and Geneva. These were mostly of the Rom period.

It will be seen that most of these discoveries were the work of natives, digging about indiscriminately in the hope of finding antiquities to sell to tourists or dealers. By this time, however, the Egypt Exploration Fund had begun its operations in Egypt, and Professor Flinders Petrie was at work there. Digging among Ptolemaic tombs at Gurob in 1889-90, Professor Petrie found many mummies, or mummy-casings, adorned with breast-pieces and sandals made of papyri pasted together. The separation of these was naturally a tedious and delicate task, and the papyri when extricated were often badly damaged or mutilated; but the Petrie papyri, as they were called, were hailed by scholars as the most important found up to that time, for they came for the most part from the 3d cent. BC. Startling acquisitions were made about this time by representatives of the British Museum and the Louvre. The British Museum secured papyri of the lost work of Aristotle on the Constitution of Athens, the lost Mines of Herodas, a fragment of an oration of Hyperides, and extensive literary papyri of works already extant; while the Louvre secured the larger part of the Oration against Athenogenes, the masterpiece of Hyperides. In 1894 Bernard P. Grenfell, of Oxford, appeared in Egypt, working with Professor Petrie in his excavations, and securing papyri with Mr. Hogarth for England. In that year Petrie and Grenfell obtained from native dealers papyrus rolls, one more than 40 ft. in length, preserving revenue laws of Ptolemy Philadelphus, dated in 259-258 BC. These were published in 1896 by Mr. Grenfell, the first of many important works in this field from his pen.

With Arthur S. Hunt, of Oxford, Mr. Grenfell excavated in 1896-97, at Bohness, the Rom Oxyrhynchus, and unearthed the greatest mass of Greek papyri of the Rom period thus far found. In 9 large quarto volumes, aggregating 3,000 pages, only a beginning has been made of publishing these Oxyrhynchus texts, which number thousands and are in many cases of great importance. The story of papyrus digging in Egypt since the great find of 1896-97 is largely the record of the work of Grenfell and Hunt. At Tebtunis, in the Fayum, in 1900, they found a great mass of Ptolemaic papyri, comparable in importance with their great discovery at Oxyrhynchus. One of the most productive sources of papyri at Tebtunis was the crocodile cemetery, in which many mummies of the sacred crocodiles were found rolled in papyrus. Important Ptolemaic texts were found in 1902 at Hibeh, and a later visit to Oxyrhynchus in 1903 produced results almost as astonishing and quite as valuable as those of the first excavations there. The work of Rubensohn at Abusir in 1906 has exceptional interest, as it developed the first considerable body of Alexandrian papyri that has been found. The soil and climate of Alexandria are destructive to papyri, and only to the fact that these had anciently been carried off into the interior as rubbish is their preservation due. Hogarth, Jouguet, Wileken and other Continental scholars have excavated in Egypt for papyri with varying degrees of success. The papyri are found in graves a few feet below the surface, in house ruins over which sand has drifted, or occasionally in carthen pots buried in the ground. Despite government efforts to stop indiscriminate native digging, papyri in considerable quantities have continued to find their way into the hands of native dealers, and thence into English, Continental, and even American collections.

Thus far upward of 650 literary papyri, great and small, of works other than Bib. have been published. The fact that about one-third of these are Homeric attests the great popularity enjoyed by the Homeric poems in Gr-Rom times. These are now so abundant and extensive as to make an important contribution to the Homeric text. Rather less than one-third preserve works of other ancient writers which were already known to us through later copies, mediaeval or modern. Among these are works of Plato, Demosthenes, Isocrates, Thucydides, Euripides, Sophocles, Aeschines, Herodotus and others. Rather more than one-third preserve works, or fragments of works, which have been either quite unknown or, oftener, regarded as lost. Such are portions of Aleman and Sappho, fragments of the comedies of Menander and the iambic of Callimachus, Mimes of Herodas, poems of Bacchylides, parts of the lost Antiope and Hypsipyle of Euripides, Aristotle On the Constitution of Athens, the Periochae of Timotheus (in a papyrus of the 4th cent. BC, probably the oldest Gr book in the world), and six orations, one of them complete, of Hyperides. In 1906 Grenfell and Hunt discovered at Oxyrhynchus the unique papyrus of the lost Paean of Pindar, in 380 fragments, besides the Hellenic of Theopompos (or Cratinus?), whose works were believed to have perished.

Of the Gr OT (LXX) more than 20 papyri have been discovered. Perhaps the most important of these is the Berlin Genesis (3d or 4th cent.) 1 in a cursive hand, purchased at Akhmim in 1906. Other papyri preserving parts of Gen among the Amherst (2), British Museum (3), and Oxyrhynchus (4), papyri date from the 3d or 4th cent. A Bodleian papyrus leaf (6) (7th or 8th cent.) preserves Cant. 1-6. An Amherst papyrus (6) (7th cent.) contains Job 1:21; 2:3. There are several papyri of parts of the Ps. An Amherst papyrus (7) (5th or 6th cent.) has Ps 5-6-12. Brit. Mus. 37 (Fragmenta Londinensis, 6th or 7th cent.) (8), of thirty leaves, contains Ps 10:2-18:6 and 20:14-34:6. This was purchased in 1836 and is one of the longest of Bib. papyri. Brit. Mus. 230 (9) (3d cent.) preserves Ps 12:7-15:4. A Berlin papyrus (10) contains Ps 40:20-41:4. Oxyrhynchus papyrus 845 (11) (4th or 5th cent.) contains parts of Ps 65, 70. Another Amherst papyrus (12) (7th cent.) shows parts of Ps 108, 118, 135, 138-140. There is also a papyrus at Leipzig (13) which contains part of the Ps. Of the Prophets the chief papyrus is the Heidelberg codex (14) (7th cent.), which contains Zec 4:6-Mal 4:5. Oxyrhynchus 846 (15) (6th cent.) contains Am 2. A Rainer papyrus (16) (3d cent.) preserves Isa 38-3:13-16, and a Bodleian (17) (3d cent.) shows Exk 5:12-6:3. The Rylands papyri include Dt 2:3 (18) (4th cent.); Job 1:5, 6 (19) (6th or 7th cent.); Ps 90 (20) (5th or 6th cent.). Recent Oxyrhynchus volumes supply parts of Ex 21, 22, 40 (21, 22) (3d cent., O.P. 1074, 1075); and of Gen 16:23 (3d cent., O.P. 1160), and 31:24 (4th cent., O.P. 1187). The great antiquity of some of these documents gives especial interest to their readings. Twenty-three papyri containing parts of the Gr NT have thus far been published, nearly half of them coming from Oxyrhynchus (O.P. 2, 208, 209, 402, 457, 1058, 1009, 1078, 10, 23, 14, 7), the pieces range in date from the 3d to the 6th cent. Their locations, dates and contents are:

1. Philadelphia, Pa. 3d or 4th cent. Mt 1 1-9, 12.
3. Vienna. 6th cent. Lk 7 56-55; 10 34-42.
5. Cambridge, Mass. 4th or 5th cent. Jn 4 1-12.
7. St. Petersburg. 5th cent. 1 Cor 1 17-20; 6 13.
16. Berlin Pap. 13,269 (7th cent.) is a liturgical paraphrase of Jn.
17. Further details as to nos. 1-14 may be found in Gregory, Papyri, 1056-92, and for nos. 1-20 in Kenyon, Handbook to Text. Crit., or Milligan, NT Documents, 249-54.

Among other theological papyri, the Oxyrhynchus Sayings of Jesus (O.P. 1,564), dating from the 2d and 3d cent.s, are probably the most widely known (see LOGIA). Other papyri

9. Theological

Oxyrhynchus pieces preserve parts of the Apocrypha of Baruch (chs 12-14; 4th or 5th cent.; O.P. 493); the Gospel according to the Hebrews (in its later form, if at all: 3d cent.; O.P. 655); the Acts of John (4th cent.; O.P. 850, cf 851); the Shepherd of Hermas (3d or 4th cent.; O.P. 494); Irenaeus, Adv. Haer., ii.i9 (3d cent.; O.P. 495). Other small fragments of the Shepherd and Iggdrasil are among the Amherst and Berlin papyri. Early Christian hymns, prayers and letters of interest have also been found.

We have spoken thus far only of literary papyri, classical and theological. The overwhelming majority of the papyri found have of course been documentary—private letters, accounts, wills, receipts, contracts, leases, deeds, complaints, petitions, notices, invitations, etc. The value of these contemporary and original documents for the illumination of ancient life can hardly be overestimated. The life of Upper Egypt in Ptolemaic and Rom times is now probably better known to us than that of any other period of history down to recent times. Many papyri that have no literary papyri at all, but are rich in documentary value. Each year brings more of these to light and new volumes of them into print. All this vast and growing body of material contributes to our knowledge of Ptolemaic and imperial times, often in the most intimate ways. Among the most important of these documentary papyri from Ptolemaic times are the revenue laws of Ptolemy Philadephus (259 BC) and the decrees of Ptolemy Euergetes II, 47 in number (118 BC, 140-130 BC). Very recently (1910) a Hamburg papyrus has supplied the Constitutin Antonianum, by which the empire was officialy conferred upon the peregrini of the empire. The private documents in ways even more important illustrate the life of the common people under Ptolemaic and Rom rule.

It is not necessary to point out the value of all this for Bibl. and esp. NT study. The papyri have already made a valuable contribution to textual materials of both OT and NT. The NT Study has been of surprising interest (the Oxyrhynchus Logia and Gospel fragments). The discovery of a series of uncial MSS running through six centuries back of the Codex Vaticanus breaks the gap between what were our earliest uncials and the hand of the inscriptions, and puts us in a better position than ever before to fix the dates of uncial MSS. Minuscule or cursive hands, too, so common in NT MSS of the 10th and later centuries, appear in a new light when it is seen that such writing was not a late invention arising out of the uncials, but a break from the opposite side with it at least the 4th cent. BC, as the ordinary, as distinguished from the literary, or book, hand. See WITTING. The lexical contribution of these documentary papyri, too, is already considerable, and it is likely to be very great. Among the NT writings, they reflect the common as distinguished from the literary language of the times, and words which had appeared exceptional or unknown in Gr lit. are now shown to have been in common use. The problems of NT syntax are similarly illuminated. Speculative or theoretical notices sometimes light up dark points in the NT, as in a British Museum decree of Gaius Vibius Maximus, prefect of Egypt (104 AD), ordering all who are out of their districts to return to their own homes in view of the approaching census (cf Lk 2 1-5). Most important of all is the contribution of the papyri to a sympathetic knowledge of ancient life. They constitute a veritable gallery of NT characters. The strong life sometimes thrown upon the social evils of the time, of which Ptolemaic Egypt was so sterily. The child, the prodigal, the thief, the host with his invitations, the steward with his accounts, the thrifty housholder, the soldier on service receiving his vocation, or retired as a veteran upon his farm, the Jewish merchant, the house-bandman, and the publican, besides people in every domestic relation, we meet at first hand in the papyri which they themselves in many cases have written. The worth of this for the historical interpretation of the NT is very great.

The principal collections of Gr papyri with their editors are Schow, Herculeanum Papyri; Peyron, Turin Papyri; Leumann, Leyden Papyri; Wessel, Breslau, and Berlin Papyri; Kenyon and Bell, British Museum Papyri; Mahaffy and Smyly, Petrie Papyri; Grenfell and Hunt, Oxyrhynchus, Amherst, and Hith Papyri (with Hogarth), Fayum Papyri, and (with Smyly and Converse) Tenius Papyri; Hunt, Rylands Papyri; Nicola, Geneve Papyri; Krebs, Wielken, Vieereck, Schubart and others, Berlin Papyri; Meyer, Hamburg and Gessen Papyri; Deismann, Pappyri, Hildergabern Papyri, Vitelli and Comparetti, Florence Papyri; Millies, Leipzig Papyri; Prisse and Strasbourg Papyri; Skemer and Schou, Papyri; Jouguet and Lessquier, Lilie Papyri; Rubensohn, Elephantine Papyri; Vassallo and Vassallo, Cairo Papyri; Godeau, Speedy, Calio and Chicago Papyri. The last-named have been described by Wielken. Milligan's Gr Papyri, Kenyon's Papyri, and Garbe's Palaeography of Gr Papyri, From the Ancient East are useful introductions to the general subject. Mayser has prepared a Grammatik der Ptolemaischen Papyri.

Coptic, Arab., Heb and Demotic papyri are numerous; even Lat papyri are found. The Coptic have already made important contributions to early Christian literature. A considerable

Other Papyrus, Clement, almost complete, have recently been published by Carl Schmidt. Another much mutilated papyrus of 1 Clement, with James, complete, is at Strassburg. A Coptic text of Prov has been brought to light from the same source which supplied the Clement codex (the White Convent, near Akhmt); indeed, Bib. papyri in Coptic are fairly numerous, and patristic lit. is being rapidly enriched by such discoveries of Coptic papyri, e.g. the Disputation of the Acts, Papyrus 1912 (cf. Sahidie NT, Oxford, 1911).

Arab. papyri first began to appear from Egypt in 1825, when three Arab. pieces were brought to Paris and published by Silvestre de Sacy. Two others, from the 7th cent., were published by him in 1827. It was not until the great papyrus finds of 1877-78, however, that any considerable number of Arab. papyri found their way into Europe. The chief collections thus far formed are at Vienna (Rainer Collection), Berlin and Cairo. Becker has published Schott's collections of Arab. papyri at Heidelberg, and Karabasche has worked upon those at Vienna. They belong of course to the period after the Arab. conquest, 640 AD.

PAPYRUS, VESSELS OF. See SHIPS AND BOATS, II, 2, (1).

Etymologically the word "parable" (παραβολή, parabolē) signifies a placing of two or more objects together, usually for the purpose of a comparison. In this widest sense of the term there is practically no difference between parable and simile (see Thayer, Dict. of NT Gr., s.v.). This is also what substantially some of Christ's parables amount to, which consist of only one comparison and in a single verse (cf. Mt 13 33.44-46). In the more usual and technical sense of the word, "parable" ordinarily signifies an imaginary story, in which details have actually transpired, the purpose of the story being to illustrate and inculcate some higher spiritual truth. These features differentiate it from other and similar figurative narratives as also from actual history. The similarity between the last-mentioned and a parable is sometimes so small that exegetes have differed in the interpretation of certain pericopes. A characteristic example of this uncertainty is the story of Dives and Lazarus in Lk 16 19-31. The problem is, as those who regard the story as actual history are compelled to interpret each and every statement, including too the close proximity of heaven and hell and the possibility of speaking from one place to the other, while those who regard it as a parable can restrict their interpretation to the features that constitute the substance of the story. It differs again from the fable, in so far as the latter is a story that could not actually have occurred (e.g. Jgs 9 8 ff.; 2 K 14 9; Es 27 2). The parable is often described as "absurd," but the etymological features of the word, as well as the relation of parables to other and kindred devices of style, are discussed more fully by Ed. Koenig, in HDB, III, 660 ff.

Although Christ employed the parable as a means of inculcating His message more extensively and more effectively than any other teacher, He did not invent the parable. It was His custom in general to take over from the re- ligious and popular literature that was available in His own day the materials that He employed to convey the higher and deeper truths of His gospels, giving them a world of meaning they had never before possessed. Thus e.g. every petition of the Lord's Prayer can be duplicated in the Jewish liturgies of the times, yet on Christ's lips these petitions have a significance they never had or could have for the Jews. The term "parable" for the second person in the Godhead is an adaptation from the Logos idea of a cosmic, religious thought, though not specifically of Philo's. Baptism, regeneration, and kindred expressions of fundamental thoughts in the Christian system are terms not absolutely new (cf. Deutsch, art. "Tal- mud," Literature Remains). The parable was employed both in the OT and in contemporaneous Jewish literature (cf. e.g. 2 Sm 12 1-4; Is 5 1-6; 28 24-28, and for details see König's art., i.e.). Jewish and other non-Bib. parables are discussed and illustrated by Mr.-ng's Mythology of the Parables of Our Lord, introd. essay, ch. iv: "On Other Parables besides Those in the Scriptures."

The one and only teacher of parables in the NT is Christ Himself. The Epp., although they often employ rhetorical allegories and similes, are not the absolutely same as parables, so common in Christ's pedagogical methods. The distribution of these in the Canonical Gospels is unequal, and they are strictly confined to the three Synoptic Gospels. Mark again has only one peculiar to this book, namely, the Seed Growing in Secret (Mk 4 26), and he gives only three others that are found also in Mt and Lk, namely the Sower, the Mustard Seed, and the Wicked Husbandman, so that the bulk of the parables are found in the First and the Third Gospels. Two are common to Mt and Lk, namely the Leaven (Mt 13 33; Lk 13 21) and the Lost Sheep (Mt 18 12; Lk 15 3 ff). Of the remaining parables, 18 are found only in Lk and 10 only in Mt. Lk's 18 include some of the finest, viz. the Two Debtors, the Good Samaritan, the Friend at Midnight, the Rich Fool, the Watchful Servants, the Barren Fig Tree, the Chief Seats, the Great Supper, the Rash Builder, the Rash King, the Lost Coin, the Juryman, the Unprofitable Servants, the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Unprofitable Servants, the Unrighteous Judge, the Pharisee and Publican, and the Pounds. The 10 peculiar to Mt are the Tares, the Hidden Treasure, the Pearl of Great Price, the Draw Net, the Unmerciful Servant, the Laborers in the Vineyard, the Two Sons, the Marriage of the King's Son, the Ten Virgins, and the Talents. There is some uncertainty as to the exact number of parables we have from Christ, as the Marriage of the King's Son is sometimes regarded as a different recension of the Great Supper, and the Talents of the Pounds. Other numberings are suggested by Trench, Jülicher and others.

It is evident from such passages as Mt 13 10 ff (cf Mk 4 10; Lk 8 9) that Christ did not in the beginning of His career employ the parable as a method of teaching, but introduced it later. This took place evidently during the 2d year of His public ministry, and is connected with the changes which about that time He made in His attitude toward the people in general. It evidenced was Christ's purpose at the outset to win over, if possible, the nation as a whole to His cause and to the gospel; when it appeared that the leaders and the great bulk of the people would not accept Him for what He wanted to be and bring them to their carnal Messianic ideas and ideals, Christ ceased his appeal to the masses, and, by confining His instructions chiefly to His disciples and special friends, saw the necessity of organizing an ecclesiola in ecclesia, which was eventually to develop into the world-conquering church. One part of this general withdrawal of Christ from a proclamation of His gospel to the whole nation was this change in His method of teaching and the adoption of the parable. On that subject He leaves no doubt, according to Mt 13 11-12; Mk 4 21-23; Lk 8 8-14. The purpose of the parable is both to reveal and to conceal the truth. It was to serve the first purpose in the case of the disciples, the second in the case of the underserving Jews. Psychologically this difference, notwithstanding the acknowledged inferiority in the training and education of the disciples, esp. as compared with the scribes and lawyers, is not hard to understand. A simple-minded Christian, who has some understanding of the truth, can readily understand figurative illustrations of this truth, which would be absolute enigmas even to an educated Hindu or Chinaman. The theological problem involved is more difficult. Yet it is evident that we are not dealing with those who have committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, for the issue is not the possibility of a return to grace, according to He 6 4-10; 10 26 (cf Mt 12 31-32; Mk 3 28-30), and who accordingly could no longer be influenced by an appeal of the gospel, and we have rather before us the case of Christ having failed to draw the offer of redemption—whether temporarily or definitely and finally, remaining an open question—according to His policy of not casting pearls before the swine. The proper sense of these passages is to be understood in the light of the teaching of Mt 13 11 ff, where the διϊν, δία, is found. The word is to be withheld from these people, so that this preaching would not bring about the ordinary results of conversion and forgiveness of sins. Hence Christ now adopts a method of teaching that would be capable to all those who have yet been imbued by it, and this new method is that of the parable.

The principles for the interpretation of the parables, which are all intended primarily and in the first place for the disciples, are furnished by the parable itself and by Christ's own method of interpreting some of them. The first and foremost thing to be discovered is the scope or the particular spiritual truth which the parable is intended to convey. Just what this scope is may be stated in so many words, as is done, e.g., by the introductory words to that of the Pharisees and the Publican. Again the scope may be learned from the direction of the parable, as the question of Peter in Mt 18 21 gives the scope of the following parable, and the real purpose of the Prodigal Son parable in Lk 15 11 ff is not the story of this young man himself, but is set over against the murmuring of the Pharisees because Christ received publicans and sinners, in vs 1 and 2, to exemplify the all-forgiving love of the Father. Not the Son but the Father is in the foreground in this parable, which fact is also the connecting link between the two parts. Sometimes the scope can be learned only from the examination of the details of the parable itself and then may be all the more uncertain.

A second principle of the interpretation of the parables is that a sharp distinction must be made between what the older interpreters called the body (corpus) and the soul (anima). It is not to use other terms or words to distinguish between the shell or bark (cortex) and the marrow (medulla). Whatever serves only the purpose of the story is the “ornamentation” of the parable, and does not belong to the substance. The former does not call for interpretation. Once the spiritual lesson; the latter does. This distinction between those parts of the parable that are intended to convey spiritual meanings and those which are to be ignored in the interpretation is based on Christ's own interpretation of the so-called parabolae. The purpose of the parable in Mt 13 18 ff, interprets the parable of the Sower, yet a number of data, such as the fact that there are four, and not more or fewer kinds of land, and others, are discarded in this explanation as without meaning. Again in His interpretation of the Tares among the Wheat in Mt 13 36 ff, a number of details of the original parable are discarded as meaningless.

Just which details are significant and which are meaningless in a parable is often hard, because impossible to determine, as the history of their exegesis amply shows. In general it can be laid down as a rule, that those features which illustrate the scope of the parable belong to its substance, and those which are a mere dress are to be ignored. But even with this rule there remain many exegetical cruxes or difficulties. Certain, too, it is not that all of the details are capable of interpretation. Some are added of a nature that indeed illustrate the story as a story, yet, from the standpoint of Christian morals, are more than objectionable. The Unjust Steward in using his authority to make the bills of the debtors of his master smaller may be a model, in the shrewd use of this world's goods for his purposes, that the Christian may follow in making use of his goods for his purposes, but the action of the steward itself is incapable of defence. Again, the man who finds in somebody else's property a pearl of great price but conceals this fact from the owner of the land and quietly buys this ground may serve as an example to show how much the kingdom of God is worth, but from an ethical standpoint his action cannot be sanctioned. In general, the parable, like all other forms of figurative expression, is a means of tertium comparationis goes, that is, the third thing which is common to the two things compared. But all this still leaves a large debatable ground in many parables. In the Laborers in the Vineyard does the "penny" belong to the parable, and again the history of the debate on this subject is long. In the Prodigal Son do all the details of his sufferings, such as eating the husks intended for swine, have a spiritual meaning?

The interpreters of former generations laid down the rule, theologa parabolon non est argumentation, i.e., the parables, very rich in mission thoughts, do not furnish a basis for the Parables of the doctrinal argument. Like all figurative expressions and forms of thought, the parables too contain elements of doubt as far as their interpretation is concerned. They illustrate truth but they do not prove or demonstrate truth. Omnia similia claudieunt, “all comparisons limp,” is applicable here also. No point of doctrine can be established on figurative expressions of Scripture, as then all elements of doubt would not be eliminated, this doubt being based on the nature of language itself. The argumentative or doctrinal value of parables is found in this, that they may, in accordance with the harmony of Scripture, illustrate truth already clearly expressed elsewhere. Cf esp. Trench, introd. essay, in Notes on the Parables of Our Lord, ch iii, 30-43; and Terry,
PARACLETE, parakletos.

This word occurs 5 times in the NT, all in the writings of John. Four instances are in the Gospel and one in the First Ep. In the Gospel the passages are 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7, in the Ep., 2:1. "Paraclete" is simply the Gr word transferred into Eng. The tr of the word in Ev is "Comforter," in the Gospel, and "Advocate" in the Ep. The Gr word is παρακλητός, paraklētos. It is derived from παρακλείω, parakleíō, parakleíō, to implore, entreat, beseech, supplicate, beseech, counsel, comfort. The word for "Paraclete" is passive in form, and etymologically signifies "called to one's side." The active form of the word is παρακλητός, parakleitēs, not found in the NT but found in LXX in Job 16:2 in the pl., and means "comforters," in the saying of Job regarding the "miserable comforters" who came to him in his distress.

In general the word signifies (1) a legal advocate, or counsel for defence, (2) an intercessor, (3) a helper, generally, (4) a helper, or teacher; (5) a helper, or teacher; (6) an advocate, or counselor, etc.

Meaning predominates in classical usage, corresponding to our word "advocate," "counsel," or "attorney." The corresponding Lat word was advocatus, "advocate." The advocate applied to Christ in Ev in the tr of the Gr word paraklētos, in 1 Jn 2:1. There is some question whether the tr "Comforter" in the passages of John's Gospel in AV and RV is warranted by the meaning of the word. It is certain that the meaning "comforter" is not the primary signification, as we have seen. It is very probable, however, a secondary meaning of the word, and some of its cognates clearly convey the idea of comfort in certain connections, both in LXX and in the NT (Gen 37:35; Zec 1:13; Mt 5:4; 2 Cor 1:3). In the passage in 2 Cor the word in one form or another is used 5 times and in each means "comfort." In none of these instances, however, do we find the noun "Paraclete," which we are now considering.

Among Jewish writers the word "Paraclete" came to have a number of meanings. A good deed was called a parakletos, or advocate, and a transgression was an accusation. Repeal and repentance and good works were called parakletos, or the verb of benevolence and mercy done by the people of Israel in this world become agents of peace and intercessors [parakletos] between them and their Father in heaven. The sin offering is parakletos; the parakletos created by each good deed is called an angel (Jew Enc, IX, 514-15, art. "Paraclete").

Philo employs the word in several instances. Usually he does not use it in the legal technical sense. Josephus is represented as bestowing forgiveness on his brethren who had wronged him and saying to them: "no one else as paraklete," or "intercessor" (De Joseph c. 40). In his Life of Moses, iii 4, it is a technical passage which indicates Philo's spiritualizing methods of interpreting Scripture as well as reflects his philosophical tendency. At the close of a somewhat elaborate narrative of the account of the emblematic significance of the vestments of the high priest and their jeweled decorations, his words are: "The twelve stones arranged on the breast in four rows of three stones each, namely, the emerald, being also an emblem of that reason which we hold to regulate the universe. For it was indispensable [ἀπαρακλητόν, unbegotten] that the man who was consecrated with the high priest should be called as a paraklete, his son, the being most perfect in all virtue, to procure the forgiveness of sins, and a supply of grace." This is rather a striking version or formal parallel to the statement in 1 Jn 2:1 where Christ was called with the N.T. name, although none of Philo's conceptions of the Divine "reason" and "son" are by no means the Christian conceptions.

If now we raise the question what is the best tr of the term "Paraclete" in the NT, we have a choice of several words. Let us glance at 5.

The Best them in order. The tr "Comforter" translation conveys an element of the usage of the word as employed in the Gospels, and harmonizes with the usage in connection with its cognates, but it is too narrow in meaning to be an adequate tr. Dr. J. Hastings in an otherwise excellent article on the Paraclete in HDB says the Paraclete was not sent to comfort the disciples, since prior to His actual coming and after Christ's promise the disciples' sorrow was turned into joy. Dr. Hastings thinks the Paraclete was sent to cure the unbelief or half-belief of the disciples, but this conceives the idea of comfort in too limited a way. No doubt in the mind of Jesus the comforting aspect of the Spirit's work applied to all their future sorrows and trials, and not merely to comfort for their personal loss in the going of Christ to the Father. Nevertheless there was more in the work of the Paraclete than comfort in sorrow. "Intercessor" comes nearer the root idea of the term and contains an essential part of the meaning. "Advocate" is a closely related word, and is also suggested by the work of the Spirit. Perhaps the Eng. word broad enough to cover all the significance of the word "Paraclete" except the word "Helper." The Spirit helps the disciples in all the above-indicated ways. Of course the objection to this tr is that it is too indefinite. The specific Christ's Spirit's work has been lost in the comprehensiveness of the term. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the term "Paraclete" itself would perhaps be the best designation of the Spirit in the passage in John's Gospel, and thus become a proper name for the Spirit and the various elements of meaning would come to be associated with the words which are found in the context of the Gospel.

Christianity introduced many new ideas into the world for which current terms were inadequate media of expression. In some cases it is best to adopt the Christian term itself, in our translations, and let the word slowly acquire its own proper significance in our thought and life. If, however, instead of translating we simply transfer the word "Paraclete" as a designation of the Holy Spirit in the Gospel passages, we would need then to translate it in the passage in the Ep. where it refers to Christ. But this would offer no serious difficulty. For fortunately in 1 Cor. the tr may very clearly be trd "Advocate" or "Intercessor.

We look next at the contents of the word as employed by Jesus in reference to the Holy Spirit.

In 14:16 the Paraclete is promised as one who is to take the place of Jesus. It is declared elsewhere by Jesus that it is expedient that He go away, for unless He go away the Paraclete will not come (Jn 16:7). Is the Paraclete, then, the successor or the substitute for Christ as He is sometimes called? The answer is that He is both and neither. He is the successor of Christ historically, but not in the sense that Christ ceases to act in the church. He is the substitute for Christ's physical presence, but only in order that He may make vital and actual Christ's spiritual presence. As we have seen, the Paraclete moves only in the range of truths conveyed in and through Christ as the historical manifestation of God. A "Kingdom of the Spirit," therefore, is impossible in the Christian sense, save as the historical Christ should be seen in the Spirit's action in history. The promise of Jesus in 14:18, "I come unto," is parallel and equivalent in meaning with the preceding promise of the Paraclete. The following are given as the specific forms of activity of the Holy Spirit: (1) to show them the things of Christ, (2) to teach them things to come, (3) to teach them all things, (4) to quicken their memories for past teaching, (5) to bear witness to Christ, (6) to dwell in believers, (7) other things shown in the context such as “greater works” than those of Christ (see Jn 14 16,17), (8) to convict of sin, of righteousness and judgment. It is possible to range the shades of meaning outlined above under these various forms of the Spirit’s activity. As Comforter His work would come under (1), (2), (3) and (6); as Advocate and Intercessor under (6), (7), (8); as Helper and Teacher under (1), (2), (3), (4), (6), (7), (8).

The manner of the sending of the Paraclete is of interest. In Jn 14 16 the Paraclete comes in answer to Christ’s prayer. The Father will give the Spirit whom the world cannot receive. In 14 26 the Father will send the Spirit in Christ’s name. Yet in 15 26 Christ says, “I will send [him] unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth,” and in 16 7, “If I go, I will send him unto you.” See Holy Spirit.

It remains to notice the passage in 1 Jn 2 1 where the term “Paraclete” is applied to Christ: “If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous;” ver 2 reads: “and he is Christ the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world.” Here the meaning is quite clear and specific. Jesus Christ the righteous is represented as our Advocate or Intercessor with the Father. His righteousness is set over against our sin. Here, as well, is the basis of His propitiatory offering for the sins of men, intercedes for them with God and thus averts from them the penal consequences of their transgressions. The sense in which Paraclete is here applied to Christ is found nowhere in the passages we have cited from the Gospel. The Holy Spirit as Paraclete is Intercessor or Advocate, but not in the sense here indicated. The Spirit as Paraclete convicts the world of sin, of righteousness and judgment. Jesus Christ as Paraclete vindicates believers before God.

PARADISE, par'-a-ils (Ὄαδος, παράδεισος, παραδείσος): A word probably of Pers origin meaning a royal park. See Garden.

1. Origin and Meaning. The word occurs in the Heb Scriptures but 3 t: Cant 4 13, where it is trd “an orchard”; Neh 2 8, where it is trd “a forest” (RVm “park”); Eccl 2 5, where it is in the pl. number (AV ‘orchards, RV ‘parks”). But it was early introduced into the Gr language, being made specially familiar by Xenophon upon his return from the expedition of Cyrus the Younger to Babylonia (see Arba, i, 2, § 7; 4, § 9; Cyrop. i, 3, § 14). In LXX the word is of frequent use for translating other terms of kindred significance. The Garden of Eden became “the paradise of pleasure or luxury” (Gen 2 15; 3 23; Joel 2 3). The valley of the Jordan became ‘the paradise of God’ (Gen 15 10). In Ezek 31 8,9, according to LXX, there is no tree in the ‘paradise of pleasure or luxury’ which symbolizes the glory of Assyria. The figures in the first 9 verses of this chapter may well have been suggested by what the prophet had himself seen of parks in the Pers empire.

In the apocryphal and pseudepigraphical lit. the word is extensively used in a spiritual and symbolic sense, signifying the place of happiness to be inherited by the righteous in contrast to Gehenna, the place of punishment to which the wicked are assigned. In the later Jewish lit. “Sheol” is represented as a place where preliminary rewards and punishments are bestowed previous to the final judgment (see Apocalyptic Literature; Eschatology of the OT; and of 2 Esd 2 19; Joel 2 20). The representations in this lit. are often vague and conflicting, some holding that there were 4 divisions in Sheol, one for those who were martyred for righteousness’ sake, one for sinners who on earth had paid the penalty for their sins, one for the just who had not suffered martyrdom, and one for sinners who had not been punished on earth (Ez 102 15). But among the Alexandrian Jews the view prevailed that the separation of the righteous from the wicked took place immediately after death (see Wis 3 14; 4 10; 5 17; Jos, Ant, XVIII, i, 3; BJ, II, viii, 14). This would seem to be the idea underlying the use of the word in the NT where it occurs only 3 t, and then in a sense remarkably free from sensuous suggestions.

Christ used the word but once (Lk 23 43), when He said to the penitent thief, “To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise” (see Abraham’s Bosom [cf Hades]). This was no time to choose words with dialectical precision. The consolation needed by the penitent thief suffering from thirst and agony and shame was such as was symbolized by the popular conception of paradise, which, as held by the Essenes, consisted of “habitations beyond the ocean, in a region that is neither open to the light of sun, or snow, or with intense heat, but that this place is such as is refreshed by the gentle breathing of a west wind, that is perpetually blowing from the ocean” (Jos, BJ, II, viii, 11). See Eschatology of the NT.

Nowhere in His public teaching did Christ use the word “Paradise.” He does indeed, when speaking in parables, employ the figure of the marriage supper, and of new wine, and in the parable of Abraham’s houses not made by hands, eternal in the heavens; but all these references are in striking contrast to the prevailing sensuous representations of the times (see 2 Esd 2 19; 8 32), and such as have been noted above. Hammedan lit. Likewise St. Paul (2 Cor 12 4) speaks of having been “caught up into Paradise” where he “heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter.” See Eschatology of the NT. But in ver 2 this is referred to more vaguely as “the third heaven.” In Rev 21 it is said to the members of the church at Ephesus who should overcome, “I [will] give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the Paradise of God.” The Eden of Gen 2 is made the symbol of the abode of the righteous, more fully described without the words in the last chapter of the book. The reticence of the sacred writers respecting this subject is in striking contrast to the profuse and cruder both of rabbinical writers before Christ and of apocryphal writers and Christian commentators at a later time. “Where the true Gospel are most reticent, the mythical are most exuberant” (Perowne). This is esp. noticeable in the Gospel of Nicodemus, the Acts of John, the apocryphal Acts of Peter, and The Shepherd’s Paradise and The Life of the Recluse; see Deut. 5 27; Deut 10 11; 13; De Anim. c. 55; Tertullian’s treatise De Paradiso is lost). Clement of Alexandria (Frag. 51), and John of Damascus (De Orthod. Fid., ii, 11). In modern lit. the conception of Paradise is effectually sublimated and spiritualized in Faber’s familiar hymn:

“O Paradise, O Paradise, I greatly long to see
The special place my dearest Lord
Is destining for me:
Where loyal hearts and true
Stand ever in the light,
All capture thro’ and thro’.
In God’s most holy sight.”

PARAH, pārā, pārā ( Revelation 21:9; ha-pārāh; B, ἡ φαρά, Pharād, Phārād, Α'Φαρ, Ἀφάρ): A city named as in the territory of Benjamin between Avvim and Ophrah (Josh 18:29). It may with some confidence be identified with Fārāk on Wādy Fārāk, which runs into Wādy Suweinīt, about 3 miles N.E. of ‘Anāda.

PARALYSIS, par-’al’i-sis, PARALYTIC, para-l'it'ik. See FALSY.

PARAMOUR, par’o-mōr (心仪的, πίλληγγος, “a concubine,” masc. or fem.): A term applied in Ezek 23:20 to the male lover, but elsewhere tr’ “concu-bine.”

PARAN, pārān, El-PARAN ( Revelation 21:19; pārān, הַפִּךְ, הַפּוֹךְ, El-pārēn; ἡ φαράν, Phäran): (1) El-paran (Gen 14:6) was the point farthest S. reached by the kings. LXX renders הַפִּךְ by τετεβιόσ, τετεβίνθος, and reads, “unto the ter-birth of Paran.” The evidence is slender, but it is not unreasonable to suppose that this is the place elsewhere (Dt 2:8; 1 K 9:26, etc) called Elath or Eloth (רְחֹּוך ויהו fem. termination), a seaport town which gave its name to the Atlantic Gulf (modern Gulf of ’Aqaba), not far from the wilderness of Paran (2).

(2) Many places named in the narrative of the wanderings lay within the Wilderness of Paran (S. 10:13; 21:13; 27:14; of 13:3.26, etc). It is identified with the high limestone plateau of El-Tib, stretching from the S.W. of the Dead Sea to Sinai along the west side of the Arabah. This wilderness offered hospitality to Ismael when driven from his father’s tent (Gen 21:21). Hitler also came David when bereaved of Samuel’s protection (1 S 25:1).

(3) Mount Paran (Dt 33:2; Hab 3:3) may be either Jebel Maḥrah, 29 miles S. of ’Āin Kādis (Kadesh-barnea), and 130 miles N. of Sinai (Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, 510); or the higher and more imposing range of mountains W. of the Gulf of ’Aqaba. This is the more probable if El-paran is rightly identified with Elath.

(4) Some place named Paran would seem to be referred to in Dt 1:1; but no trace of such a city has yet been found. Paran in 1 K 11:18 doubtless refers to the district W. of the Arabah.

PARBAR, pār'bär (חֶפֶר, parbar [1 Ch 26:18]), and חֶפֶר, pār'ārām, tr’d “precincts” [AV ‘suburbs’ in 2 K 23:11]; LXX φαραυρέα, pharoureia]: In 1 Ch 26:18 reference is made to the position of the gatekeepers, “for Parbar westward, four at the causeway, and two at Parbar.” The word is supposed to be of Pers origin, connected with Par-ward, meaning “possessing light,” and hence the meaning has been suggested of ‘colonnade’ or “portico,” some place open to the light. In the pl form (2 K 23:11) the situation of the house of “Nathan-melech” is described, and the tr’ “in the colonnades,” should, if the above origin is accepted, be more clearly understood than E V. It is difficult to understand the occurrence of a Pers word at this time, and it has been suggested (EB, col 3585) that the word is a description of the office of Nathan-melech, ba-parārdim being a misreading for ba-prārdhim, meaning “who was over the halls.”

PARCEL, pär’sel: Properly “a little part,” in Elizabethan Eng. being used in almost any sense. In Av of Gen 33:19; Josh 24:32; Ruth 4:3; 1 Ch 11:13.14 it is the tr’ of הִכָּה, heldhā; Ju 4:5 of שְׂפַר, chārōn both the Gr and Heb words meaning a “piece of land.” RV writes “plot” in 1 Ch 11:13.14, but if the change was needed at all, it should have been made throughout.

PARCHED, pärch’t: Four different root words have been tr’d “parched” in Ev:

(1) הָסַר, heldhā, “roasted.” This word is applied to corn or pulse. It is a common practice in Pal and Syria to roast the nearly ripe wheat for eating as a delicacy. A handful of heads of fully developed grain, with the stalks still attached, are gathered and bound together and then, holding the bunch by the lower ends of the stalks, the heads are roasted over a fire through the husk or through the burn of most of the sheaths are blackened the grain is toasted, and, after rubbing off the husks between the hands, is ready to eat (Lev 2:14). A form of pulse is toasted in the same way and is more sought after than the grain. In the larger towns and cities, vendors go about the streets selling bunches of toasted chick-peas. The Bible references, however, are probably to another form of roasted grain. The threshed wheat or pulse is roasted over a fire on an iron plate or on a flat stone, being kept in constant motion with a stirrer until the operation is finished. The grain thus prepared is a marketable article. Parched grain is not now so commonly met with as the pulse, which either roasted or un-roasted is called hommos (from Arab. 자Rose) or “parsh”). Parched pulse is eaten not only plain, but is often made into confection by coating the seeds with sugar. In Bible times parched wheat or pulse was a common food, even taking the place of bread (Lev 23:14; Josh 2:14). It was a useful food supply for armies, as it required no further cooking (1 S 17:17). It was frequently included in gifts or hostages (1 S 26:18; 2 S 17:28).

(2) חַרֵך, harēr, “burned” or “parched” (of Arab. bārk, “burned”), is used in the sense of dried up or arid in Jer 17:6.

(3) כָּה, čēh, is used in Isa 5:13, AV “dried up,” RV “parched”; כָּה, čēhā, in Ps 68:6, AV “dry,” RV “parched.”

(4) שַׁרְדָּב, šārēdāb, rendered “parched” in AV, is “glowing” in RV. The word implies the peculiar wavy effect of the air above parched ground, usually accompanied by mirages (cf Arab. serdāb, “mirage”) (Isa 35:7; 49:10). In predicting a happy future for Zion the prophet could have chosen no greater contrast than that the hot glowing sands which produce illusive water effects should be changed into real pools. See MIRAGE. JAMES A. PATCH

PARCHED, pärcht, CORN. See Food.

PARCHMENT, pär’ch’mant (μπαβα, membrāna [2 Tim 4:13]): The word “parchment,” which occurs only once (2 Tim 4:13), is the name of a skin. By the late time lagera (Gr. μπαβα, Pergamenē), i.e. pertaining to Pergamum, the name of an ancient city in Asia Minor where, it is believed, parchment was first used. Parchment is made from the skins of sheep, goats or young calves. The hair and fleshy portions of the skin are removed as in tanning by first soaking in lime and then in burning, scraping and washing. The skin is then stretched on a frame and treated with powdered chalk, or other absorbent agent, to remove the fatty substances, and is then dried. It is finally given a smooth surface by rubbing with powdered pumice. Parchment was extensively used at the time of the early Christians for scrolls, legal documents, etc., having replaced papyrus for that purpose. It was no doubt used at even a much earlier time. The roll mentioned in Jer 36 may have been of parchment. Scrolls were later placed by codices of the same material. After the Arabs introduced paper, parchment was still used for centuries for the book bindings. Diplomas printed on "sheepskins," still issued by many universities, represent the survival of an ancient use of parchment. See following articles.

JAMES A. PATCH

PARCHMENTS, parch'ments (μεμραναί, membrānai, "membranes," "parchments," "vellum"): The skins, chiefly of sheep, lambs, goats and calves, prepared so as to be used for writing on (2 Tim 4 13).

In Gr and Rom times parchment was much employed as a writing material. "At Rome, in the 1st cent. BC, and the 1st and 2d cents. AD, there is evidence of the use of vellum, but only for notebooks and rough drafts or inferior copies of literary works, ... A fragment of a vellum MS, which may belong to this period, is preserved in Brit. Mus. Add. Ms 34,478, consisting of two leaves of Demosthenes, De Foes. Leg., in a small hand, which appears to be of the 3d cent." (F. G. Kenyon in HDB, IV, 947).

Paul directs Timothy that, when he comes from Ephesus to Rome, he is to bring "the books, esp. the parchments." These, as well as the "cloak," which it is also mentioned, had evidently been "left at Troas with Carpus." What were these parchments? They are distinguished from "the books," which were probably a few choice volumes or rolls, some portions of the Scriptures of the OT, some volumes of the Law of Moses or of the Prophets or of the Ps. Among "the books" there might also be Jewish exegetical works, or heathen writings, with which, as is made evident by reference in his Epp., Paul was well acquainted.

The parchments were different from these, and were perhaps notebooks, in which the apostle had, from time to time, written what he had observed and wished to preserve as specially worthy of remembrance, facts which he had gathered in his study of the OT or of other books. These notes may have been the result of many years' reading and study, and he wished Timothy to bring them to him.

Various conjectures have been made in regard to the contents of the parchments. It has been suggested by Kenyon (HDB, III, 673) that they contained the OT in Gr; by Farrar, that the parchments were a diploma of Paul's Rom citizenship; by Bull, that they were his commonplace books; by Latham, that the parchments were a copy of the "Graeca" of the Gospels, a volume containing the all-important narrative of the Saviour's life and cross and resurrection. Workman (Persecution in the Early Church, 39) writes: "By tas membranaus I understand the proofs of his citizenship."

Whatever their contents may have been, they were of such importance as to have "remained with him in his prison at Rome, so that, if life were spared for even a few weeks, he could use the parchments and perhaps make a hint of his arrest by the Roman authorities took place at that city, and that it was the suddenness of his arrest that caused him to be unable to pass on the books and parchments to the clerk with him." "The police had not even allowed him time to find his overcoat or necessary documents" (Workman, op. cit., 39; see p. 1588, 14).

So this as it may, he is desired to have them now. His well-disciplined mind, even in the near prospect of death by public execution, could find the most joyous labor in the work of the gospel, wherever his influence reached, and could also find relaxation among "the books, esp. the parchments."

LITERATURE
I. THE APOSTOLIC DOCTRINES. — The Second Coming of Christ (a phrase not found in the Bible) is explained by the following
1. Terms special terms: (1) "Parousia" (παρουσία, parousiа), a word fairly common in Gr, with the meaning "presence" (2 Cor 10 16; Phil 2 12). More esp. it may mean "presence after absence," "arrival" (but not "return," unless this is given by the context), as in 1 Cor 16 17; 2 Cor 7 6.7; Phil 1 26. And still more particularly it is applied to the Coming of Christ in 1 Cor 16 23; 1 Thess 2 20; 3 13; 4 14 15; 1 Tim 6 14; 2 Thess 3 12. Jn 2 24—25—in all 13 t. besides 2 Thess where the coming is predicted of Antichrist. This word for Christ's Second Coming passed into the early Patristic lit. (Dionysius, vii.6, etc.; cf. also 2 Tim). It is used as a verb, and this sense is not infrequent. For instance the word in Ignatius, Philadophilus, ix.2, means the Inearnation. Or the Inearnation is called the first Parousia, as in Justin, Trypho, xiv. But in modern theology it means invariably the Second Coming. Recent archaeological discoveries have explained why the word received such general Christian use in the special sense. In Hellenistic Gr it was used for the arrival of a ruler at a place, as is evidenced by inscriptions in Egypt, Asia Minor, etc. Indeed, in an Epiphanus inscription of the 3d cent. BC (Dittenberger, Synges, No. 803, 34), "Parousia" is applied to a manifestation of Asclepius. Consequently, the adoption by the Gr-speaking Christians of a word that already contained full regal and even Divine concepts was perfectly natural. (The evidence is well summarized in Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 372-78, Ger. ed, 251-87.) (2) "Epiphany" (ἐπίφανες, epiphaneia), "manifestation," "used of the Incarnation in 1 Cor 15 40, but of the Second Coming in 2 Thess 2 5; 1 Tim 6 14; 2 Tim 4 1.5; Tit 2 13. The word was used like Parousia in Hellenistic Gr to denote the ceremonial arrival of rulers; cf. Deissmann, as above. (3) "Apotheosis" (ἀποθεώσεις, apokathasis), "revelation," denotes the Second Coming in 1 Cor 1 7; 2 Thess 1 7; 1 Pet 4 7; 13; 4 13. (4) "Day of the Lord," more or less modified, but referring to Christ in 1 Cor 1 5; 5 5; 2 Cor 1 4; Phil 1 6; 10; 1 Thess 5 2; 2 Thess 2 2. The phrase is used of the Father in the strict OT sense in Acts 2 20; 2 Pet 3 12; Rev 16 14, and probably in 2 Pet 3 10. Besides, as in the OT and the intermediate lit., "day of wrath," "last day," or simply "day" are used very frequently. See DAY OF THE LORD.
Of the first three of the above terms, only Parousia is found in early church exegesis, and in Mt 24 (vs 37-39), and in the last three of these all the set phrase "so shall be the coming of the Son of Man at the consummation of the ages," spoken in Aram., the use of "Parousia" here is of course due to Matthew's adoption of the current Gr word.
The last of the 4 terms above brings the apostolic doctrine of the Parousia into connection with the eschatology (Messianic or otherwise)
2. Data and of the OT and of the intermediate Sources writes. But the connection is far closer than that supplied by this single term only, for nearly every feature in the apostolic doctrine can be paralleled directly from the Jewish sources. The following summary does not begin to give complete references to even such Jewish material as is extant, but enough is presented to show how closely allied are the eschatologies of Judaism and of early Christianity.
The end is not to be expected instantly. There are still signs to come to pass (2 Thess 2 3), and it is especially a determined number of martyrs must be filled up (Rev 6 11; cf. 2 Esd 4 35.36). There is need of patience (Jas 5 7, etc.; cf. 2 Esd 4 34; Bar 83 4). But it is at hand (1 Pet 4 7; Rev 1 3; 22 10; cf. 2 Esd 14 17). "Yet a little while" (He 10 37.38), "the night is far spent" (Rom 13 11-12); "the Lord is at hand" is the beginning of "We that are alive" expect to see it (1 Thess 4 15; 1 Cor 15 51; cf Bar 76 5); the time is shortened henceforth (1 Cor 7 29; cf Bar 20 1; 2 Esd 4 26, and the comments on 1 Cor). Indeed, there is hardly time for repentance even (Rev 22 11, ironically), certainly there is no time left for self-indulgence (1 Thess 5 3; 1 Pet 4 2; 2 Pet 3 3; Rev 3 3; cf Bar 83 5), and watchfulness is urgently demanded (1 Thess 5 6; Rev 3 3).
An outstanding feature of the prophecies of the end (Acts 2 17.18; of XII P, Test. Levi 18 11; Sib Or 4 46, always after the consummation in the Jewish sources). But the world is growing steadily worse, for the godly and intense trials are coming (passim), although this phrase is not found in the OT. For instance the Judgment (1 Pet 4 17; cf En 99 10). Iniquity increases and false teachers are multiplied (Jude verse 18; 2 Pet 3 3; 2 Tim 3 verse 18; cf En 80 7; Bar 70 5; 3 Bar 9 18.19). Above all there is to be an anathema of dubious_messes in the midst of Antichrist (1 Jn 2 18.22; 4 3; 2 Jn verse 7; 2 Thess 2 8—10; Rev 19 19; cf Bar 36 8—10; Sib Or 63 70, and see Antichrist), who will gather all nations to his ensign (Rev 19 19; 2 Thess 2 10 of 2 Esd 13 5; En 96). Plagues fall upon men (Rev, passim; cf esp. Philo, Euseb.), and natural portents occur (Acts 2 19.20; Rev, passim; cf 2 Esd 5 4.5; En 80 5—8). But the conversion of the Jew (Rom 11 20) is brought about by these plagues (Rev 11 13), and not of Jewish sources independently; the conversion of Gentiles, as in Sib Or 3 616—623; En 10 21). Then Christ is manifested and Antichrist is slain or captured (2 Thess 2 8; Rev 19 20; cf 2 Esd 13 10.11.), in Rev 3 the Millennium follows of 2 Esd 13 34.35, and often in rabbinical lit.; the "millennium" in Slavie, ch, is, of very dubious existence), but other traces of millennial doctrine in the NT are of the vaguest (cf the comments to 1 Cor 16 24, for instance, esp. Schmiedel, J. Weiss, and Lietzmann, and see MILLENNIUM). The general resurrection follows (see RESURRECTION for details).
The Father holds the Judgment in He 10 30; 12 23; 13 4; Jas 4 11.12; 1 Pet 1 17; Rev 14 7; 20 11, and probably in Jude vs 14.15. Christ is Judge in Acts 17 31; Rom 2 16, and probably in Rom 2 2—6; 3 6. In 2 Thess Christ appears as the executor of punishment, but the detailed form and number of Jewish schemes, cf, for instance, 2 Esd 7 33 and En 45 3. For the fate of the wicked see ESCHATOLOGY; HELL; St. Paul, rather curiously, has very little to say about this (Rom 2 3; 1 Cor 3 17; 2 Thess 1 8). The Nature of the future is nowhere adequately presented in En 45 4.5 or completely destroyed (1 Cor 7 31; He 12 27; Rev 21 1; cf En 1 6; 2 Esd 7 30), by fire in 2 Pet 3 10 (cf Sib Or 4 172—77), so as to leave only the eternal torments (He 12 27; cf 2 Esd 7 30[?]), or to be replaced with a new heaven and a new earth (Rev 21:1; cf. Slavonic En 33:1-2). And the righteous receive the New Jerusa (Gal 4:26; He 12:22; Rev 3:12; 21:2:10; cf. Bar 4:2-6; 2 Esdr 7:26). It is of course possible, as in the older works on dogmatics, to reconcile the slight divergences of the above details and to fit them all into a single scheme. But the propriety of such an undertaking is more than dubious, for the traditional nature of these details is abundantly clear—a tradition that is due solely to the fact that the Christian and the Jewish schemes have a common OT basis. That the Jewish writers realized that the eschatological details were only symbols is made obvious by the contradictions that every apocalypse contains—the contradictions that are the despair of the beginner in apocalyptic. No writer seems to have thought it worth while to reconcile his details, for they were purely figures of dimly comprehended forces. And the Christian symbolism must be interpreted on the same principle. No greater injustice, for instance, could be done St. Paul's thought than to suppose he would have been in any least disturbed by St. John's interpretation of the Synoptist's walking-ways to earth Incarnation, and to re-interpret all of them in other human beings (1 Jn 2:18;19).

The symbolism, then, in which the Parousia is described was simply that held by the apostles in the pre-Christian days. This symbolism, to be sure, has been thoroughly purified from such puerilities as the Symbolism feast on Leviathan and Behemoth of Bar 29, or the "thousand children" of En 10:17, and all the more remarkable as 2d-century Christianity has enough of this and more (e.g. Irenaeus, v.33). What is more important is that the symbolism of the Parousia is simply in the Jewish sources the symbolism of the coming of the Messiah (of or in such schemes as have no Messiah). Now it is to be observed that among the apostles the Kingdom of God is almost uniformly regarded as a future quantity (1 Cor 6:9-10; 15:50; Gal 6:21; Eph 5:5; 2 Tim 4:1:18; 2 Pet 1:11; Rev 11:15; 12:10), with a definitely present idea only in Col 1:13. Rembrandt said that the term "Messiah" means simply "the Bringer of the Kingdom," the case becomes entirely clear. No apostle, of course, ever thought of Christ as anything but the Messiah. But not only did they think of the Messiah as work as completed, or, if the problem of eschatological "interpretation" be pressed, of the strict Messianic work as done at all. Even the Atonement belonged to the preliminary acts, viewed perhaps somewhat as En 39:6 views the preexistent Messiah's residence among the "church expectant." This could come to pass more readily as the traditions generally were silent as to what the Messiah was to do before He brought the Kingdom, while they all agreed that He was not to be created only at that moment. In the blank, esp. with the help of Isa 63:et, our Lord's earthly life and Passion fitted naturally, leaving the fact of His Second Coming to be identified with the coming of the Messiah as originally conceived.

II. The Teaching of Jesus.—It will be found helpful, in studying the bitter controversies that have raged around Christ's teaching about the future, to remember that the apocalyptic idea of the word "Messiah" is the same as that of "King"; that, for instance, "Messiah" and "Saviour of the world" are not quite convertible terms, or that a redefinition of the Messiah as a moral teacher or an expounder of the will of God does not rest on a "spiritualizing" of the term, but on a destruction of it in favor of "prophet." Now the three expressions, "Messianic work," "coming of the Kingdom," and "Parousia" are only three titles for one and the same thing, while the addition of "Son of Man" to them merely involves their being in the most traditional form possible. In fact, this is the state of affairs found in the Synoptists. Christ predicts the coming of the Kingdom. He claims the title of his kingdom (or Regent under the Father). The realization of this expectation He placed on the other side of the grave, i.e. in a glorified state. And in connection with this evidence we find His use of the title Son of Man. From all this the doctrine of the Parousia follows immediately, even apart from the passages in which the regular apocalyptic symbolism is used. The contention may be made that this symbolism in the Gospels has been drawn out of other sources by the evangelists (the so-called "Little Apocalypse" of Mk 13:7-11; 20-24; 27-30; 31 is the usual point of attack), but even if the contention could be made out (and agreement in this regard is anything but attained), no really vital part of the case would be touched. Of course, it is possible to begin with the a priori assumption that "no sane man could conceive of himself as an apocalyptic dynamo walking on earth..." from the standpoint of later testimony the Gospels that contradicts this assumption. But then there are difficulties. The various concepts involved are mentioned directly or indirectly and so often that the number of passages be reproduced grows alarmingly large. Then the concepts interlock in such a way as to present a remarkably firm resistance to the critical knife; the picture is much too consistent for an artificial product. Thus there are a number of indirect references (the tree of the Cross, the "new creation," etc.) that contradict all we know of later growths. And, finally, the most unskilled critic finds himself confronted with a last stubborn difficulty, the unwavering conviction of the earliest church that Christ made the eschatological claims. It is conceivable that the apostles may have misunderstood Christ in other matters, but an error in this central point of all (as the apostles appraised things) is hardly in the realms of critical possibility. On the other hand, such an attempt to force the whole evidence of the documents would seem something surprisingly like the violence done to history by the most perverse of the older dogmatists.

The number of relevant passages involved is so large and the problems so complex that any detailed discussion is prohibited here.

1. Critical Problems

1. Fall of Jerusalem 24 with Mk 13 and Lk 17:20-37; or Lk 17:31 with Mk 13:15.16 (noting the inappropriateness of Lk 17:31 in its present context). The critical discussions of Mk 13 are familiar and those of Lk 21 (a still more complex problem) only less so. Remembering what the fall of Jesus or its immediate prospect would have meant to the apostles, the tendency to group the statements of Christ will be resolved. Consequently, not too much stress should be laid on the connection of this with the Parousia, and in no case can the fall of Jesus be considered to exhaust the meaning of the Parousia.

A second question is that of the time of the Parousia. Here Mk 13 30 | Lk 21 32 | Mt 24 34 place it within Christ's generation, while Mt 10 23 before all the cities of Judaea are closed to Christ's apostles (cf. the argument for any reference to the fall of Jerusalem). Then there is "ye shall see" of Mk 14 62; Lk 13 35 | Mt 23 39. Agreeing with this are the exhortations to watchfulness (Mk 13 33-37; Lk 12 40 | Mt 24 44, etc., with many parables, such as the Ten Virgins). Now Mk 13 32 | Mt 24 36 do not quite contradict this, for knowledge of the generation is quite consistent with ignorance of the day and hour; "It will be within your generation, but nothing more can be told you, so watch!" The real difficulty lies in Mt 13 10 | Mt 24 14, the necessity of all Gentiles hearing the gospel (Lk 21 24 is hardly relevant). To leave the question here, as most conservative scholars do, is unsatisfactory, for Mk 13 10-13 (cf. Mt 24 18) is a new combination of service and this value is far outweighed by the real contradiction with the other passages. The key, probably, lies in Mt 10 18, from which Mk 13 10 differs only in insisting on all Gentiles, perhaps with the apostles thought the 'world' and "Roye Empire" were practically coextensive. With this assumption the data yield a uniform result.

III. St. John's Evaluation.—It appears, then, that Christ predicted that shortly after His death an apostasy would take place (cf. 3 18), and not He only but the Spirit (14 23), and even the whole world (14 18). When the disciples are so equipped, their presence in the world subjects the world to a continual sinning process of judgment (16 11). The fate of men by this process is to be eternally fixed (3 18), while the disciples newly made are assured that they have already entered into their eternal condition of blessedness (11 25-26; 5 24; 10 28; 17 23). Equally directly the presence of Christ is conceived in Rev 3 20. So in St. Paul, the glorified Christ has returned to His own to dwell in them (Rom 8 30, etc.), uniting them into a body vitally connected with Him (Col 1 18), so supernatural that it is the teacher of 'angels' (Eph 3 10), a body whose members are already in the Kingdom (Col 1 13), who even sit already in heavenly places (Eph 2 6). The same thought is found in such synoptic passages (Lk 7 28 | Mt 11 11; Lk 17 21[?]; see Kingdom or Gon) as represent the Kingdom as present. Already the eschatological promises were realized in a small group of men, even though they lacked the transforming influence of the Spirit. Compare the continuous coming of Mt 26 64 (Lk 22 69). It is on these lines of the church as a supernatural quantity (of course not to be confused with any particular denomination) that the immediate realization of the Parous would occur of so transcendental quantity, through which a Divine Head works, whose reaction on men settles their eternal destiny, and which in turn is secured by the fall of the world. Did the quantity of history be "injected" a supernatural quantity, through which a Divine Head works, whose reaction on men settles their eternal destiny, and which in turn is secured by the fall of the world.

2. The Church a Body.

a. Divine Quantity. The Church a body is felt at the crisis of human history, perhaps esp. after the catastrophe of the primitive community. This conception of the church as a Divine quantity, so, to speak, a part of heaven extended into earth, is faithful to the essentials of the predictions. Yet is it a rationalization of them, if the idea of the church itself be not closely connected with all realms of Christian activity take on a transcendent significance, both in life and (esp.) death, giving to the individual the confidence that he is building better than he knows, for even the apostle could not realize the full significance of what they were doing. Generally speaking, the details in the symbolism must not be pressed. The purpose of revelation is to minister to life, not to curiosity, and, in teaching the future, Christ simply taught with "watchfulness," for the day, with the one change that in the supernatural process He Himself was to be the central figure. Still, the end is not yet. "The hour cometh, in which all that are in the tombs shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, to the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, to the resurrection of condemnation." (Jn 6 28; cf. Mt 25 31-46). The impression that human destiny is drawing to a climax that can be expressed only in spiritual terms that transcend our conceptions. See, further, ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT.

LITERATURE.—This is overwhelming. For the presuppositions, GJV (HJP is antiquated); Voltz, Jüdische Eschatologie; Boureet, Religion des Judenaumen; General discussion: see Lobsieht, Jesus Rezzent, Holtzmann, Das messianische Bewusstsein Jesu (a classic); von Dobschütz, The Eschatology of the Gospels (popular, but very sound). Eschatological extreme: Schweizer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus; (Von Reimarus zu Wrede), is quite indispensable; Tyrell, Christianiaity at the Cross Roads (perverse, but valuable in parts); Loby, Gospel and the Church (of his Evangelies synoptiques). Anti-eschatological: Shamer, The Teaching of Jesus about the Future (minute criticism, inadequate premises, some astounding exegetals); Bacon, The Beginning of Gospel Story (based on Holtzmann). For the older literature, see Schweizer, Sunday, Holtzmann above, and of Fairweather, The Background of the Gospels, and Brown, "Parousia," in HIB.

PARSHANDATHA, pār-shan-dātha, pār-'shan-dā-tha (NT); "parshanda" (V); PARSHANDATHA; LXX Παρσανάθ, Παρσανάθα, or Παρσανάθα, Parthanaesthen; perhaps from the Pers. franga-data (given by prayer); One of the sons of Haman (Est 9 7).

PART, pārt: As a vb. is no longer in good use (except in a few special phrases, of Ruth 1 17), but is obscure only in Prov 18 15, where the meaning is "break up their quarrel" (cf. 2 S 14 20). Part has not changed AV's usage, except (strangely) in 1 S 30 24, where "share" is written. For the noun see PORTION.

PARTHIANS, pār-thi-ans (Παρθοί, Pārthoi): A people mentioned in Acts 2 9 only, in connection with other strangers present at Jesus

1. Country at Pentecost, from which we infer that and Early they were Jews or proselytes from the regions included in the Parthian empire (for which see the Euphrates to the confines of India and the Oxus, and for centuries was the rival of Rome, and more than once proved her match on the battlefield. The Parthians are not mentioned in the OT, but are frequently in the NT, and they have connection with the history of the Jews, on account of the large colonies of the latter in Mesopotamia, and the interference of the Parthians in the affairs of Judaea, once making it a vassal state.

Parthia proper was a small territory to the S.E. of the Caspian Sea, about 300 miles long by 120 wide, a fertile though mountainous region, bordering on the desert tract of Eastern Persia. The origin of the Parthians is rather uncertain, though the prevailing opinion is that they were of Scythic stock or of the great Tartar race. We have no reference to them earlier than the time of Darius the Great, but they were doubtless among the tribes subdued by Cyrus, as they are mentioned by Darius as being in revolt. They seem to have remained faithful to the Persians after that, and submitted to Alexander without resistance.

They next came under the rule of the Seleucid kings of Syria, but revolted about 250 BC, in the reign of Antiochus II (Theos), and gained their independence under the lead of Arsaces I who established the dynasty of the Arsacidae, which continued for nearly 5 centuries. His capital was Hecatompylos, but his reign continued only about 3 years, and his brother Tridates succeeded him as Arsaces II and he consolidated the kingdom. The war between the Seleucids and the Ptolemies freed him from interference from that quarter until 237 BC, when Seleucus II (Callinicus) marched against him, but was completely defeated, and Parthia independent remained. Antiochus I, who followed him, extended his dominions westward to the Zagros Mountains, but Antiochus III would not permit such an encroachment with impunity, and led an expedition against him, driving him back and even invading his ancestral dominion. But after a struggle of some years the Parthians remained still unsubdued, and the difficulties of the contest led Antiochus to conclude peace with him in which he acknowledged the independence of Parthia. For about a quarter of a century the king of Parthia remained quiet, but Phraates I (181–174 BC) recommenced aggressions on the Seleucid empire which were continued by Mithridates I (174–137), who added to his dominions a part of Bactria, on the E., and Media, Persia and Babylon on the W. This was a challenge to Demetrius II, of Syria, to whose empire the provinces belonged, and he marched against him with a large force, but was defeated and taken prisoner. He remained in Parthia some years, well treated by Phraates II, whose sister he married, and when Phraates wished to create a diversion against Antiochus Sidetes, he set Demetrius at liberty and sent him back to Syria. Antiochus was at first successful, as his force of 300,000 men far outnumbered the Parthians, but he was at last defeated and slain in 229 BC and his army destroyed. This was the last attempt of the Seleucid kings to subdue Parthia, and it was acknowledged as the dominant power in Western Asia. But Phraates fell in conflict with the Scyths, whom he called in to aid him in his war with Sidetes, and his successor likewise, and it was only on the accession of Mithridates in 124 BC that these barbarians were checked. The king then turned his attention toward Armenia, which he probably brought under his control, but, being long engaged in war with the Romans, subjugated its independence and even attacked the Parthians, and took from them two provinces in Mesopotamia.

Not long after, the power of Rome came into contact with Armenia and Parthia. In 66 BC when, in subduing Mithridates of Pontus, Pompey came into Syria, Phraates III made an alliance with him against Armenia, but was offended by the way in which he was treated and thought of turning against his ally, but refrained for the time being. It was only a question of time when the two powers would come to blows, for Parthia had become an empire and could ill brook the intrusion of Rome into Western Asia. It was the ambition and greed of Crassus that brought about the clash of Rome and Parthia. When he took the East as his share of the Roman world as apportioned among the triumvirs, he determined to rival Caesar in fame and wealth by subduing Parthia, and advanced across the Euphrates in 53 BC, with the intention of subduing Armenia in 53 BC. The story of his defeat and death and the destruction of the army and loss of the Roman eagles is familiar to all readers of Roman history. It revealed Parthia to the world as the formidable rival of Rome, which she continued to be for nearly 3 centuries. After the death of Crassus, the Parthians crossed the Euphrates and ravaged Northern Syria, but retired the following year without securing any portion of the country, and thus ended the first war with Rome. In 40 BC, after the battle of Philippi, Pescorus, who was then king, invaded Syria a second time and took possession of it together with all Pal, Tyre alone escaping subjection. He set Antigonus on the throne of Judaea, deposing Hyrcanus for the purpose. Syria and Pal was remained in the hands of Parthia for 3 years, but the coming of Ventidius gave a new turn to affairs. He drove the Parthians out of Syria, and when they returned the following year, he defeated them again and took Pescorus as a hostage. Parthia had to retire within its own borders and remained abstemious. Antony's attempt to subdue them proved abortive, and his struggle with Octavian compelled him to relinquish the project. The Parthians were unable to take advantage of the strife in the Roman empire on account of troubles at home. An insurrection led by Tridates drove the king Phraates IV from the throne, but he recovered it by the aid of the Scyths, and Tridates took refuge in Syria with the youngest son of the king. Augustus afterward restored him without ransom, and obtained the lost standards of Crassus, and thus peace was established between the rival empires. Each had learned to respect the power of the other, and, although contention arose regarding the suzerainty of Armenia, peace was not seriously disturbed between them for about 130 years, until the reign of Trajan. Parthia was not at peace with herself, however. Dynastic troubles were frequent, and the reigns of the kings were short. Artabanus III, who reigned 107–122 AD, and when Phraates wished to create a diversion against Antiochus Sidetes, he set Demetrius at liberty and sent him back to Syria. Antiochus was at first successful, as his force of 300,000 men far outnumbered the Parthians, but he was at last defeated and slain in 129 BC and his army destroyed. This was the last 50 years. The ambition of Trajan led him to disregard the policy inaugurated by Augustus, adhered to, for the most part, by his successors, not to extend the limits of the empire. After the conquest of Dacia he turned his attention to the East and resolved on the invasion of Parthia. The Parthian king, Chosroes, endeavored to placate Trajan by embassy bearing presents and proposals of peace, but Trajan rejected them and carried out his purpose. He subjugated Armenia, took Upper Mesopotamia, Adiabene (Assyria), Ctesiphon, the capital, and reached the Pers Gulf, but was obliged to turn back by revolts in his rear and far away. To secure the Parthian provinces were restored, however, by Hadrian, and the Parthians did not recommit until the reign of Aurelius, when they overran Syria, and in 162 AD, Lucius Verus sent to punish them. In the following year he drove them back and advanced into the heart of the Parthian empire, inflicting the severest blow it had yet received. It was evident that the empire was on the decline, and the Romans did not meet with the resistance they had expected. Fortunatus, Caracalla, and Severus, with Caracalla both made expeditions into the country, and the latter took the capital and massacred the inhabitants, but after his assassination his successor, Macrinus, fought a three days' battle with the Parthians in which he was killed. This was what he was worsted and was glad to conclude a peace by paying an indemnity of some £1,500,000 (217 AD).

But this was the last achievement of the Parthians. It is evident that Artabanus had suffered severely in his conflict with the Romans, and but one more national expedition, led by Artaxerxes, who overthrew the Parthian empire and established the dynasty of the Sassamides in its place (226 AD).

4. Full of the Empire

The Parthians were not a cultured people, but displayed a rude magnificence, making use, to some extent, of remains of Gr culture which they found within the regions they seized from the empire of Alexander. They had no native lit., as far as known, but made use of Gr in writing and on their coins. They were familiar with Heb or Syro-Chaldaic, and the later kings had Sem legends on their coins. Jos is said to have written his history of the Jewish War in Parthian languages. In no method of government they seem to have left the different provinces pretty much to themselves, so long as they paid tribute and furnished the necessary contingents.

PARTICULAR, parrē-k'tlar, par-tik'-tlar, PARTICULARLY: the adverbial phrase "in particular" occurs twice in AV (1 Cor 12 27, 2 k μέρους, εκ μέρους, RV "severally," RVm "each in its part"); and Epp 5 33, εκ αὐτοῦ, καὶ καθ' ἑαυτόν, RV "severally," RVm "individually"); in both cases it has the absolute meaning of "severally," "individually." The advb, "particularly" occurs in the same sense in Acts 21 19 AV, καθ' εἰς τὰ κρατῖα, καθ' ἑαυτόν, RVm "each in its part"; and 1 Pet 3 16, εκ αὐτοῦ, εκ καθορίσεως, RVm "formally." The phrase "in detail," in 2 Mac 2:30, "to be curious in particulars"; 11:20 (AV "of the particulars I have given order," RV "I have given order in detail"); and the adj, "particular," in the sense of "in detail" in the first Prologue to Sirach (AV, Vulg peculiare; the whole section omitted in RV).

PARTITION, parr-ish'un, par-tish'un, THE MIDDLE WALL OF (πῆλος του εἰς τοῦ φραγμοῦ, τῆς μεσοδομίας τοῦ φραγμοῦ (Epp 2:14)): What Paul here asserts is that Christ is our peace, the peace of both Jewish and Gentile believers. He has made them both to be one in Himself, and has broken down the barrier which divided them from one another. Then the apostle regards Jew and Gentile as two, who by a fresh act of creation in Christ are made into one new man. Any attempt of this simile he refers to an actual wall in the temple which between which no one was allowed to pass unless he were a Jew, the balustrade or barrier which marked the limit up to which a Gentile might advance but no further. Curiously, this middle wall of partition had a great deal to do with the Partho-Syrian Partition, for the multitude of the Jews became infuriated, not merely because of their general hostility to him as an apostle of Christ and a preacher of the gospel for the world, but specially because it was erroneously supposed that he had brought Therismos to Ephesus past this barrier into the temple (Acts 21:29), and that he had in this manner profaned the temple (24:6), or, as it is put in 21:28, he had brought Greeks into the temple and polluted this holy place.

2. Herod's Partition of the Temple; Its Divisions; the Courts of the Jews; the Consecration of the Temple.

The temple was built on a nucleus which had already been made on Paul they violently seized and dragged him out of the temple—dragged him outside the balustrade. The Levites at once shut the gates, to prevent the possibility of any further profanation, and Paul in a piece of typical Greek gallantry as Roman commander and his soldiers forcibly prevented.

In building the temple Herod the Great had included a large area to form the various courts. The temple proper consisted of the Holy Place, entered by the priests every year, and the Holy Place, into which the high priest entered alone once every year; Divisions: year immediately outside the temple was the Court of the Gentiles, and in it was placed the great altar of burnt offering. Outside of this, near the bottom of the Sons of Israel, and beyond this the Court of the Women. The site of the temple itself and the space occupied by the various courts already mentioned formed a raised plateau or platform. "From it you descended at various points down 5 steps and through gates in a lofty wall, to find yourself overlooking another large court—the outer court to which Gentiles, who desired to see something of the glories of the temple and to offer gifts and sacrifices to the God of the Jews, were freely admitted. Further in than this court they were forbidden, on pain of death, to go. The actual boundary line was not the high wall with its gates, but a low stone barrier about 14 ft. in height, marked by a marble "bottom of 14 more steps" (J. Armitage Robinson, D.D., Sir John's "History of the Epiphany; see also, Ederseh, The Temple, Its Ministry and Services as They were at the time of Jesus Christ, 46).

The middle wall of partition was called ἀναβάσθαι, and was built of marble beautifully ornamented. The Court of the Gentiles formed the lowest and the outermost enclosure of all the courts of the sanctuary. It was paved with the finest variegated marble. Its name signified that it was open to all, Jews or Gentiles alike. It was very large, and is said by Jewish tradition to have formed a square of 785 ft.

It was in this court that the oxen and sheep and the dove for the sacrifices were sold as in the old court. It was in this court too that there were the tables of the money-changers, which Christ Himself overthrew when He drove out the sheep and oxen and them that bought and sold in His Father's house. The multitudes assembling in this court must have had plenty of space on occasions such as the Passover and Pentecost and at the other great feasts, and the din of voices must sometimes have been deafening. And if any Gentile in this court no Gentile might go. See TEMPLE.

In the year 70, while excavations were being made on the site of the temple by the Palestine Exploration Fund, M. Clermont-Ganneau discovered one of the pillars which have been described as belonging to the very barrier or middle wall of partition, to which Paul refers. The pillar is now preserved at Constantiople and is inscribed with a Gr inscription in capital or uncials letters, which is translated as follows: NO MAN OF ANOTHER NATION ENTER WITHIN THE FENCE AND ENCLOSURE AROUND THE TEMPLE AND WHOMSOEVER IS CAUGHT WILL HAVE HIMSELF TO BLAME THAT HIS DEATH ENDURE.
While Paul was writing the Ep. to the Eph at Rome, this barrier in the temple at Jerusalem was still standing, yet the chained prisoner of Jesus Christ was not afraid to write that Christ had broken down the middle wall of partition, and had thus admitted Gentiles who were far off, strangers and foreigners, to all the privileges of access to God ancienly possessed by Israel alone; that separation between Jew and Gentile was done away with forever in Christ.

If Paul wrote the Ep. to the Eph in 60 or 61 AD, then the actual barrier of stone remained in its position in the Court of the Gentiles not more than some 10 years.

4. The Throwing Down of the Barrier for it was thrown down in the burning of the temple by the Roman army. And out of those ruins a fragment has been excavated in our own day, containing the very inscription threatening death to the gentile intruder, and reminding us that it is only in Christ Jesus that we now draw nigh unto God, and that we are thus one body in Christ, one new man. Christ has broken down the middle wall of partition, for He, in His own person, is our peace.

PARTRIDGE, pār'trij (נַפְרֵדֵן, נפרד; Lat. perdix; LXX. 1 S 26 20, νυκτικόραξ, νυκτικόραξ; "owl," Jer 17 11, περδίξ, perdix): A bird of the family Tetraonidae. The Heb word for this bird, נפרד, means "a caller," and the Lat perdix is supposed to be an imitation of its cry, and as all other nations base their name for the bird on the Lat, it becomes quite evident that it was originally named in imitation of its call. The commonest partridge of Palestine, very numerous in the wilderness and hill country, was a bird almost as large as a pheasant. It had a clear, exquisite cry that attracted attention, esp. in the mating season. The partridge of the wilderness was smaller and of beautifully marked plumage. It made its home around the Dead Sea, in the Wilderness of Judaea and in rocky caverns. Its eggs were creamy white; its cry very similar to its relatives'. The partridge and its eggs were used for food from time immemorial.

The first reference to it is found in 1 S 26 20: "Now therefore, let not my blood fall to the earth away from the presence of Jeh: for the king of Israel is come out to seek a flea, as when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains." David in this dialogue with Saul clearly indicates that if he did not hunt the partridge himself, he knew how it was done. The birds were commonly chased up the mountains and stunned or killed with "throw sticks." David knew how best these birds were at hiding beside logs and under dry leaves colored so like them as to afford splendid protection; how swiftly they could run; what expert dodgers they were; so he compared taking them with catching a flea. The other reference is found in Jer 17 11: "As the partridge that sitteth on eggs which she hath not laid, so is he that getteth riches, and not by right; in the midst of his days he shall leave him, and at his end he shall be a fool." If this reference is supposed to indicate that partridges are in the habit of brooding on the nest of their kind or of different birds, it fails wholly to take into consideration the history of the bird. Partridges select a location, carefully deposit an egg a day for from 10 to 15 days, sometimes 20, and then brood, so that all the young emerge at one time. But each bird knows and returns to its nest with unfailing regularity. It would require the proverbial "Philadelphia lawyer" to explain this reference to a "partridge sitting on eggs she had not laid." No ornithologist ever could reconcile it to the habits or characteristics of the birds. AV & the lines, "As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not." This was easy to explain clearly. The eggs of the partridge were delicious food, and any brooding bird whose nest was discovered after only a few days of incubation did not hatch, because she lost her eggs. Also the eggs frequently fall prey to other birds or small animals. Again, they are at the mercy of the elements, sometimes being spoiled by extremely wet cold weather. Poultry fanciers assert that a heavy thunderstorm will spoil chicken eggs when hatching time is close; the same might be true with eggs of the wild. And almost any wild bird will desert its nest and make its former brooding useless, if the location is visited too frequently by man or beast.

There is also a partridge reference in the Book of Eccles (11 29 ff RV): "Bring not every man into thine house; for many are the plots of the deceitful man. As a decoy partridge in a cage, so is the heart of a proud man; and as one that is a spy, he looketh upon thy falling. For he lieth in wait to turn things that are good into evil, and in things that are praiseworthy he will lay blame." The reference is to confining a tame partridge in a hidden cage so that its calls would lure many of its family within range of arrows or "throw sticks" used by concealed hunters.

PARUAH, pa-ro'ō-a (תְּפֻרָה, pär'ēh, "blooming"): Father of Jehoshaphat, who was one of Solomon's twelve victualers or providers, and had charge in Issachar of this function (1 K 4 17).

PARVAIM, pār-vā'īm (תְּפָרֵיִם, par'ē'im): The word occurs only in 2 Ch 3 6, as the place from which Solomon obtained gold for the decoration of his Temple. A derivation is given from the Sanskrit pāra, "eastern," so that the name might be a vague term for the East (Genesius, Thesaurus, 1125). Whether there was such a place in Arabia is doubtful. Farwa in Yemen has been suggested, and also Sak el Parwain in Yemenah. Some have considered the name a shortened form of Saphrō'ānim which occurs in the Syr and Tg Jonathan for the "Sephar" of Gen 10 30.

PAS-DAMMIM, pas-dam'mīm. See Ephes-dammim.

PASEAH, pa-sē'ā, pas'ē-a (תְּפָשֵׁא, pāshēh, "divider"): Son of Japhlet, descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7 33).

PASSING, pas'ing, PASSAGES, pas'ing-s. See Apocryphal Gospels.

PASSING OF MARY, THE. See Apocryphal Gospels.

PASSING, pash'ūn, PASSIONS, pash'un: "Passion" is derived from Lat passio, which in turn is derived from the vb. patior, with the √ pat. The Lat words are connected with the Gr √ παθ, path, which appears in a large number of derivatives. And Gr. pathos and with other languages in addition* words connected with this √ pat, path, are often susceptible of a great variety of meanings, for which the dicta, must be consulted. For "*passion, *" however, as it appears in EV only three of these meanings need be considered. (1) Close to what seems to be the primary force of the root is the meaning "*suffer, *" and in this sense "*passion *" is used in Acts 1 3, "to whom he also showed himself alive after his passion." This is a paraphrase (Gr παθήματα; due to the Vulg (post passionem suam), and in Eng. as old as Vycliff, whom the subsequent EV has followed. This is the only case in AV and RV where "*passion *" has this meaning, and it can be so used in modern Eng. only when referring (as here) to the sufferings of Christ (cf. "*Passion play"). (2) "*Suffering," when applied to the mind, came to denote the state that is controlled by some emotion, and so "*passion *" was applied to the emotion itself. This is the meaning of the word in Acts 14 15, "men of like passions," Gr συμμίσθις, homoioopathēs; RV "of like nature" gives the meaning exactly; "men with the same emotions as we." (3) From "emotion" a transition took place to the "passion" itself and this is the normal force of "passion" in modern Eng. AV does not use this meaning, but in RV "passion" in this sense is the Gr of φαλάκρινον, pathēma; in its three occurrences: Rom 2 20 (AV "affection"); Col 3 5 (AV "passion"); 1 Thess 5 15 (AV "lust"). It is used also for two occurrences of παθώνα, pathēma (closely allied to pathos) in Rom 7 5 (AV "movtions," AVM "passions") and in Gal 5 24 (AV "affection"). The fixing of the exact force in any of these cases is a delicate problem fully discussed in the comms. In Col 3 5 only does "passion" stand as an isolated term. The context here perhaps gives the word a slight sexual reference, but this must not be overstressed; the warning probably includes any violent over-emotion that robs a man of his self-control. PASSION, GOSPEL OF THE. See Apocryphal Gospels.

PASSOVER, pas'o-ver (πάσχα, pesah, from pasha, "to pass" or "spring over" or "to spare") [Ex 12 13-23:27; cf Isa 31 5]. Other conjectures connect the word with the "passing over" into a new year, with Asyer pasah, meaning "to placate," with Heb pasha, meaning "to dance," and even with the skipping motions of a young lamb; Arab. nitsa, pasa, whence Gr πάσχα, Pæschas; whence Eng. "paschal." In early Christian centuries folk-etymology connected pæschas with Gr pæschas, "to suffer" [see Passion], and the word was taken to refer to Good Friday rather than the Passover: 1. Pessa and Maçcath 2. Pessa mikayim 3. Pessa dörath 4. Maçcath 5. The Omery 6. To-traditional Theories 7. The Higher Criticism 8. Historical Celebrations: OT Times 9. Historical Celebrations: NT Times 10. The Jewish Passover.

The Passover was the annual Heb festival on the evening of the 14th day of the month of 'Abibh or Nisan, as it was called in later times. It was for 4000 years could be done. And pæschas, a 7 days festival of maçcath, or unleavened bread, to which the name Passover was also applied by extension (Lev 23 5). Both were distinctly connected with the Exodus, which, according to tradition, they commemorate; the Passover in in commemoration of Egypt, eaten in preparation for the journey, while Jeh, passing over the houses of the Hebrews, was slaying the firstborn of Egypt (Ex 12 12; 13 2-12 it); the maçcath festival being in memory of the first days of the journey during which this bread of haste was eaten (Ex 12 14-20).

The ordinance of pesah mikayim, the last meal in Egypt, included the following provisions: (1) the taking of a lamb, or butt of blemish, for each household on the 10th of the month; (2) the killing of the lamb on the 14th at even; (3) the sprinkling of the blood on doorposts and lintels of the houses in which it was to be eaten; (4) the roasting of the lamb with fire, its head with its legs and inwards—the lamb was not to be eaten raw or sodden (bâshal) with water; (5) the eating of unleavened bread and bitter herbs; (6) eating in haste, with lions brought, shoes on the feet, and all in hand; (7) and remaining in the house until the morning; (8) the burning of all that remained; the Passover could be eaten only during the night (Ex 12 1-23).

This service was to be observed as an ordinance forever (Ex 12 14-24), and the night was to be lôl shîmûrîm, "a night of vigils," or, at least, "to be much observed" of all the children of Israel throughout their generations (Ex 12 42). The details, however, of the pesah dörath, or later observances of the Passover, seem to have differed slightly from those of the Eng Passover (Mish, Pâghûm, ix.5). Thus it is probable that the victim could be taken from the flock or from the herd (Dt 16 2; cf Ex 4 22). (3), (6) and (7) disappeared entirely, and even from Dt 16 7, the prohibition against eating (Hcb bâshal) was not understood to apply (unless, indeed, the omission of the expression "with water" gives a more general sense to the Heb word bâshal, making it include roasting). New details were also added: for example, that the Passover could be sacrificed only at the central sanctuary (Dt 16 5); that no alien or uncircumcised person, or unclean person, could partake of it, and that one prevented by uncleanness or some other cause from celebrating the Passover in season could do so a month later (Nu 9 9f). The singing of the Hallel (Ps 113-115), both while the Passover was being sung and at the meal, and other details were no doubt added from time to time.

Unleavened bread was eaten with the Passover meal, just as with all sacrificial meals of later times (Ex 23 18; 34 25; Lev 7 12), independently and generally the fact that the Passover came in such close proximity with the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Ex 12 8). Jewish tradition distinguishes, at any rate, between the first night and the rest of the festival in that the eating of maçcath is an obligation on the first night and optional during the rest of the week (Pâghûm 120), although the eating of unleavened bread is commanded in general terms (Ex 12 15; 18; 13 6.7; 23 15; 34 18; Lev 23 6; Nu 28 17). The eating of leavened bread is strictly prohibited, however, during the entire week under penalty of kârîth, "excision" (Ex 12 15.19.14; 13 7; 13 14.15 3), and this prohibition has been observed traditionally with great care. The 1st and 7th days are holy convocations, days on which no labor is done. These were so regarded as necessary in the preparation of food. The festival of Maçcath, is reckoned as one of the three pilgrimage festivals, though strictly the pilgrimage was connected with the Passover portion and the first day of the festival.

During the entire week additional sacrifices were offered in the temple: an offering for sin and burnt offering, 2 young bullocks, 1 ram, 7 lambs of the first year, 1 young goat as a sin offering, and drink offerings and a goat for a sin offering.

During the week of the mâsôt festival comes the beginning of the barley harvest in Pal (Mô'âdôth 650) which lasts from the end of March in the low Jordan valley to the beginning of May in the elevated portions.

Next day, the offering is made to the standing corn (Dt 16:9) and of bringing the sheaf of the peace offering is spoken of as the morning of the Sabbath (Lev 23:15), that is, according to the Jewish tradition, the day after the first day, or rest-day, of the Passover (Mô'âdôth 650; My T'an, 1; Jos, Ant, III, x, 5), and according to Samaritan and Boethusian traditions and the modern Karites the Sunday after the Passover. At this time a wave offering is made of a sheaf, followed by a meal offering with a meal and drink offering, and only thereafter might the new corn be eaten. From this day 7 weeks are counted to fix the date of Pentecost, the celebration connected with the wheat harvest. It is of course perfectly natural for the agricultural people to celebrate the turning-points of the agricultural year in connection with their traditional festivals. Indeed, the Jewish liturgy of today retains in the Passover service the Prayer of Dél (âl) which grew up in Pal on the basis of the needs of an agricultural people.

Many writers, however, eager to explain the entire festival of the Passover, go back to an agricultural origin (presumably a Canaanite one, though there is not a shred of evidence that the Canaanites had such a festival), have seized upon the word the priests offer towards the end of the sacrifice of the firstborn of man and beast (both institutions being traditionally traced to the judgment on the firstborn of the Egyptians in Ex 13:11-15; Ps 110:5; P 134:19; P 135:20), so as to characterize the Passover as a festival of the firstborn. Here, however, is the difference. The firstborn of the flocks of the Hebrews, were of course very valuable, and therefore exceptional from the point of view of the Hebrews, but this is not positive evidence that has been added to our knowledge of the Passover by this theory.

The Pent speaks of the Passover in many contexts and naturally with constantly varying emphasis. Thus in the Pentateuch itself the observance of the festival is naturally to be expected in the next verse. The Pent and Hût, in both of which the word sacrifices is used, thus introduce the idea of the sacrifices, and according to the view here taken, we must distinguish between the pesah mîca'â'âm and the pesah mîkatim. Nevertheless, great stress is laid in the Pent and Ps 80 and Hût on the variations in the several accounts, but no certain groups of critics, on the basis of which they seek to support their several theories of the composition of the Pent or Hût. Without entering into this controversy, it will be sufficient here to enumerate and classify all the discrepancies said to exist in the several Passover passages, together with such explanations as have been suggested. These discrepancies may be called, (1) omissions, (2) differences of emphasis, and (3) conflicts of statements.

The writers of the Passover, because of their lack of historical insight into the past, were here to be used to designate passages assigned to the various sources by the higher criticism of today merely for the sake of convenience. There is nothing remarkable about the omission of the daily sacrifices from all passages except Lev 23:8 (H) and Nu 28:19 (P), nor is there any mention of the dry bread in the highy holy communion on the first day in the contexts of Dt 16:8 and Ex 23:16. There is no omission of notices to a central sanctuary in passages other than Dt 16. Neither can any significance be attached to the fact that the passover is mentioned in Ex 23:16 (P), the historical importance of which is that the date is spoken of, and in Lev 23:15 (H) where the date can be interpreted as that of Pentecost there. (2) As to emphasis, it is said that the so-called Elohist Covenant (E) (Ex 33) has no reference to the Passover; it speaks only of Yahweh in which this festival is spoken of together with the other.

The children of Israel began the keeping of the Passover in its due season according to all its ordinances in the wilderness of Sinai (Nu 8:5). In the very beginning of their national life in Pal we find them celebrating the Passover under the leadership of Moses (Josh 5 10). History records few but later celebrations in Pal, but there are enough intimations to indicate that it was frequently if not regularly observed. Thus Solomon offered sacrifices three times a year upon the altar which he had built to Jeh, at the appointed seasons, including the Feast of Unleavened Bread (1 K 9 25-26 Ch 8 13). The later prophets speak of appointed seasons for pilgrimages and sacrifices (cf Isa 1 12-14), and occasionally perhaps the Passover celebration (cf Isa 30 29), bearing in mind that the Passover is the only night-feast of which we have any record. In Hezekiah's time the Passover had fallen into such a state of desuetude that neither the priests nor the people were prepared for the king's urgent appeal to observe it. Nevertheless, he was able to bring together a large concourse in Jerus during the 2d month and institute a more joyful observance than any other record since the days of the Judges. Notice, however, that Josiah, however, there was celebrated the most memorable Passover, presumably in the matter of conformity to rule, since the days of the Judges (2 K 23 21; 2 Ch 30 1 ff.). The continued observance of the Passover is thus attested by Ezekiel's interest in it (Ezk 45 18). In post-exilic times it was probably observed more scrupulously than ever before (Ezr 6 19 ff).

Further evidence, if any were needed, of the importance of the Passover in the life of the Jews of the second temple is found in the NT Times.

9. Historical Celebrations: We have both Bab and Pal g'mârâ. NT Times.

The NT Times speak of the sacrifice and to the sacrificing side and to the ministration of offering out and destroying leaven, what constitutes leaven, and similar questions, instruction in which the children of Israel sought, for 30 days before the Passover. Jos speaks of the festival often (Avd, I, iv, v, 6; III, 1, 13; IX, 4, 8; XIV, 2, 27; XV, 3; B, II, 1, 3; V, iii, 1; VI, ix, 3). Besides repeating the details already explained in the Bible, he tells of the innumerable multitudes that came for the Passover to Jerus out of the country and coming from beyond the borders of all Pal in the year in the days of Cestius, 256,500 lambs were slaughtered and that at least 20 men were counted to each. (This estimate of course includes the regular

Various authors have accepted recognition of the Passover. At this great festival even the Roman officers released prisoners in recognition of the people's celebration. Travel and other ordinary pursuits were no doubt suspended (cf Acts 12:3; 20:15). The details were impressed on the minds of the people and lent themselves to symbolic and homiletic purposes (cf 1 Cor 5:7; Jn 19:34–36, where the paschal lamb is made to typify Jesus; and He 11:28). The best-known instance of such symbolic use is the institution of the Eucharist. The basis of the paschal meal still holds. Some doubt exists as to whether the Last Supper was the paschal meal or not. According to the Synoptic Gospels, it was (Lk 22:7; Mt 26:17; Mk 14:12); while according to John, the Passover was to be eaten some time following the Last Supper (Jn 18:28). Various harmonizations of these passages have been suggested, the most ingenious, probably, being on the theory that when the Passover fell on Friday night, the Pharirees ate the meal on Thursday and the Sadducees on Friday, and that Jesus followed the custom of the Pharisees (Chwolson, Das letzte Passahmal Jesu, 2d ed., St. Petersburg, 1904). Up to the Nicene Council in the year 325, the church observed Easter on the Jewish Passover. It took Paul to Caesarea in order to separate the two, condemning their confusion as Arianism.

After the destruction of the temple the Passover became a home service. The paschal lamb was no longer included. On the other hand, parts of the Samaritans have continued this rite to this day. In the Jewish home a roasted bone is placed on the table in memory of the rite, and other articles symbolic of the Passover are placed beside it: such as a roasted egg, said to be in memory of the free-will offering; a sauce called haroseth, said to resemble the mortar of Egypt; salt water, for the symbolic dipping (cf Mt 26:23); the bitter herbs and the maror. The sefer (program) is as follows: sanctification; washing of the hands; dipping and dividing the paschal; breaking and setting aside a piece of maror to be distributed and eaten at the end of the supper; reading of the haggadah shel pesah, a poetic narrative in answer to the four questions asked by the youngest child in compliance with the Bib. command found 3 t in Ex and once in Dt, "Thou shalt tell thy son on that day"; washing the hands for eating; grace before eating; tasting the maror; eating the bitter herbs; eating of them together; the meal; partaking of the maror that had been set aside as 'apikoren or dessert; grace after meat; Hal'el; request that the service be accepted. Thereafter folk-songs are sung, traditional melodies, and poems recited, many of which have allegorical meanings. A cup of wine is used at the sanctification and another at grace, in addition to which two other cups have been added, the 4 according to the Mish (Pesh. xxvi) symbolizing the 4 words employed in Ex 6:6.7 for the delivery of Israel from Egypt. Instead of eating in haste, as in the Egyptian Passover, it is customary to recline or lean at this meal in token of Israel's freedom.

The prohibition against leaven is strictly observed. The searching for hidden leaven on the evening before the Passover and its destruction in the morning have become formal ceremonies for which appropriate blessings and declarations have been included in the liturgy since the days when leaven was the normal bread of the Jews. As in the case of other festivals, the Jews have doubled the days of holy convocation, and have added a semi-holiday after the last day, the so-called 'segur' hagig, in token of their love for the ordained celebration and their loathness to depart from it.

LITERATURE

The First and Second Ep. to Tim, and the Ep. to Tit form a distinct group among the letters written by Paul, and are now known as the Pastoral Epistles, because they were addressed to two Christian ministers. When Timothy and Titus received these epistles, they were not acting, as they had previously done, as missionaries or itinerant evangelists, but had been left by Paul in charge of churches; the former having the oversight of the church in Ephesus, and the latter having the care of the churches in the island of Crete. The Pastoral Epistles were written to guide them in the discharge of the duties devolving upon them as Christian pastors. Such is a general description of these epistles. In each of them, however, there is a great deal more than is covered or implied by the designation "Pastoral"—much that is personal, and much also that is concerned with Christian faith and doctrine and practice generally.

I. genuineness

In regard to the genuineness of the epistles, there is abundant external attestation. Allusions to them are found in the external writings of Clement and Polycarp. In evidence of this the middle of the 2d cent. the epistles were recognized as Pauline in authorship, and were frequently among the New Testament canon. "Marcion indeed rejected them, and Tatian is supposed to have rejected those to Timothy. But, as Jerome states in the preface to his Comm. on Tit., these heretics rejected the epistles, not on critical grounds, but merely because they disliked their teaching. He says they used no argument, but merely asserted, 'This is Paul's. This is not Paul's. It is obvious that men holding such opinions as Marcion and Tatian held, would not willingly ascribe authority to epistles which condemned asceticism. So far, then, as the early church can guarantee to us the authenticity of the epistles ascribed to Paul, the Pastoral Epistles are guaranteed' (Marcus Dods, Intro to the NT, 167).

The external evidence is all in favor of the reception of these epistles, which were known not only to Clement and Polycarp, but also to Irenaeus, Tertullian, the author of the Ep. to the churches of Vienne and Lyons, and Theophilus of Antioch. The evidence of Polycarp, which is dated in 167 AD, is remarkably strong. He says, "The love of money is the beginning of all trouble, knowing . . . that we brought nothing into the world, neither can carry anything out" (1 Tim 6:10). It would be difficult to overthrow testimony of this nature.

The decision of certain critics to reject the Pastoral Epistles, as documents not from the hand of Paul, is not reached on the external evidence, which is perhaps as early an attestation as can be reasonably expected. They are included in the Muratorian Canon, and quoted by Tertullian and Irenæus and even Tertullian is satisfied with Paul's" (A. S. Peake, A Critical Intro to the Acts, 3). This受理 is admitted by many others. Baur asserted that they were written for the purpose of vindicating the Christianism of the period, and of defending the church from it by means of ecclesiastical organization, and that the date of their composition was the year 150. This

II. Alleged Difficulties against Pauline Authorship. — Various difficulties have been alleged against the reception of the Pastoral Epp., as Pauline. The chief of these are: (1) the difficulty of finding any place for these letters in the life of Paul, as that is recorded in the Acts and in the Pauline Epp. written before the Pastoral; (2) the fact that there are said to be in them indications of an ecclesiastical organization, and of a development of doctrine, both orthodox and heretical, considerably in advance of the Pauline age; (3) that the language of the epp. is on large extents, different from that in the accepted epp.; (4) the "most decisive" of all the arguments against the Pauline authorship—so speaks Dr. A. C. McGiffert (A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, 402)—is that "the Christianity of the Pastoral Epp. is not the Christianity of Paul."

Where can a place be found for these epp., in the life of Paul? The indications of the date of their composition given in the epp. them- to Paul's

1. Relative solves are these:

(1) Data in 1 Tim.—In 1 Tim. 3, experiences Paul had gone from Ephesus to Macedonia, and had left Timothy in Ephesus in charge of the church there. In the Pastoral Epp. and in the previously written parts of the Acts, it is impossible to find such events or such a state of matters as will satisfy these requirements. Paul had previously been in Ephesus, on several occasions. His 1st visit to that city is recorded in Acts 18 19-21. On that occasion he went from Ephesus, not into Macedonia, but into Syria. His 2d visit was his 3 years' residence in Ephesus, as narrated in Acts 19; and when he left the city, he had, previous to his own departure from it, already sent Timothy to Macedonia. In 2 Tim. 1 3, the reverse of that described in 1 Tim. 3. Timo- thy soon rejoined Paul, and so far was he from being left in Ephesus then, that he was in Paul's company on the remainder of his journey toward Rome (Acts 27-28). But does the Cor 3

No place therefore in Paul's life, previous to his arrest in Jerusalem, and his first Rom imprisonment, can be found, which satisfies the requirements of the situation described in 1 Tim. 3. "It is impossible, unless we assume a second Rom imprisonment, to reconcile the various historical notices which the epp. [2 Tim] contains" (McGiffert, op. cit., 407).

In addition to this, the language used by the apostle at Miletus, when he addressed the elders of the Ephesian church (Acts 20 30) about the men speaking pernicious things, who should arise among them, showed that these false teachers had not made their appearance at that time. There is, for this reason alone, no place for the Pastoral Epp. in Paul's life, previous to his arrest in Jerusalem. But Paul's life is a blank at the termination of his first Rom imprisonment; and this one fact gives ample room to satisfy all the conditions, as these are found in the three Pastoral Epp.

Those who deny the Pauline authorship of these epp. also deny that he was released from what, in this article, I term his 1st Rom imprisonment. But a denial of this latter statement is an assumption quite unwarranted and unproved. It assumes that Paul was not set free, simply because there is no record of this in the Acts. But the Acts is, on the very face of it, an incomplete or unfinished record; that is, it brings the narrative to a certain point, and then breaks off, evidently for the reason which Sir W. M. Ramsay demonstrates, that Luke must needs — however, which he was unable, owing to some cause now unknown, to carry into execution. The purpose of the Acts, as Ramsay shows (St. Paul the Traveller and the Rom Citizen, 23, 308), is to lead up to the release of Paul, and to show that the Christian faith was not an forbidden or illegal religion, but that the formal imprisonment of the apostle before the supreme court of the empire ended in his being set at liberty, and thus there was established the fact that the faith of Jesus Christ was not, at that time, contrary to Rom law. "The Pauline authorship . . . can be maintained only on the basis of a hypothetical reconstruction, either of an entire period subsequent to the Rom imprisonment, or of the events within some period known to us" (McGiffert, op. cit., 410). The one fact that Paul was set free after his 1st Rom imprisonment gives the environment which fits exactly all the requirements of the Pastoral Epp.

Attention should first be directed to the facts and to the conclusion stated in the art. Pastoral Epistles (4). Mommsen having shown that the words, "My bonds became manifest in Christ throughout the whole prastorian guard" (Phil 1 13), mean that at the time when Paul wrote the Ep. to the Phil, the case against him had already come before the supreme court of appeal in Rome, it had been partly heard, and that the impression made by the prisoner upon his judges was so favorable, that he expected soon to be set free. The indications are to be drawn from other expressions in three of the epp. of the Rom captivity—Phil, Col and Philem—are to the same effect. Thus, writing to the Philippians, he says that he hopes to send Timothy to them, so soon as he sees how matters go with him, and that he trusts in the Lord that he himself will visit them shortly. And again, writing to his friend Philemon in the city of Colossa, he asks him to prepare him a lodging, for he trusts that through the prayers of the Colossians, he will be granted to them.

These anticipations of acquittal and of departure from Rome are remarkable, and do not in any degree coincide with the idea that Paul was not set free but was under arrest at that time. "It is obvious that the importance of the trial is intelligible only if Paul was acquitted. That he was acquitted follows from the Pastoral Epp. with certainty for all who admit their genuineness; while even they who deny their Pauline origin must allow that they imply an early belief in historical details which are not consistent with Paul's journeys before his trial, and must either be pure inventions or events that occurred on later journeys. . . . If he was acquitted, the issue of the trial was a formal decision by the supreme court of the empire that it was permissible to preach Christianity; the trial, therefore, was really a charter of religious liberty, and therein lies its immense importance. It was indeed overturned by later decisions of the supreme court; but its existence was a highly important fact for the Christians" (Ramsay, op. cit., 308). "That he was acquitted is demanded both by the plan evident in Acts and by other reasons well stated by others" (ib, 380).

It should be observed that there is the direct and corroborative evidence of Paul's release, afforded by such writers as Cyril of Jerusalem, Ephrem Syr., Chrysostom and Theodoret, all of whom speak of Paul's going to Spain. Jerome (Vir. Ill., 5) gives it as a matter of personal knowledge that Paul traveled as far as Spain. But there is more important evidence. The Muratorian Canon, in 1:37, says the words, "profectionem Pauli ab urbe ad Spaniam proficiscens" ("the journey of Paul as he journeyed from Rome to Spain"). Clement also in the ep, from the church in Rome to the church in Corinth, which was written not later than the year 96 AD, says in reference to Paul, "Having taught righteousness to the whole world, and having gone to the extremity of the west [ἐπὶ τὸ τέρμα τῆς διάστασις ἔδην] and having borne witness before the rulers, so many years he resided there, but to these, being the greatest example of endurance." The words, "having gone to the extremity of the west," should be specially noticed. Clement was in Rome when he wrote this, and, accordingly, the natural import of the words is that Paul went to the limit of the western half of the then known world, or in other words, to the western boundary of the lands bordering the Mediterranean, that is, to Spain.

Now Paul never had been in Spain previous to his arrest in Jesus, but in Rom 15:24-28 he had twice expressed his intention to go there. These independent testimonies of Clement and of the Muratorian Canon, of the fact that after Paul's arrest in Jerusalem and earlier than the purpose to visit Spain, are entitled to great weight. They involve, of course, the fact that he was acquitted after his 1st Roman imprisonment.

Having been set free, Paul could not do other than to spend some time in Philadelphia and himself also go there, as he had already promised when he wrote to the Philippian church (Phil 2:19-24). As a matter of course he would also resume his apostolic journeys for the purpose of proclaiming the gospel. There is now ample room in his life for the Pastoral Epp., and they give most interesting details of his further labors. The historical and geographical requirements in 1 Tim are, in this way, easily satisfied. It was no great distance to Ephesus from Philippi and Colosse, where he had promised that he would "come shortly."

(2) Data in 2 Tim.—The requirements in 2 Tim are (a) that Paul had recently been at Troas, at Corinth, and at Miletus, each of which he mentions (2 Tim. 4:9-10); (b) that the man he wrote the ep. to was in Rome (1:17); (c) that he was a prisoner for the cause of the gospel (1:8; 2:9), and had once already appeared before the emperor's supreme court (4:16,17); (d) that he had then emerged, but that a second and more serious case, which he believed that on the next hearing of his case the verdict would be given against him, and that he expected it could not be long till execution took place (4:6); (e) that he hoped that Timothy would be able to come from Ephesus to see him at Rome before the end (4:9,21). These requirements cannot be made to agree or coincide with the first Rom captivity, but they do agree perfectly with the facts of the apostle's release and subsequent second imprisonment in that city.

(3) Data in Tit.—The data given in the Ep. to Tit are (a) that Paul had been in Crete, and that Titus had been with him there, and had been left behind in that island, when Paul sailed from its shores, Titus being charged with the oversight of the churches there (Tit 1:5); and (b) that Paul meant to spend the next winter at Nicopolis (3.12). It is simply impossible to locate these events in the recorded life of Paul, as that is found in the other ep.,. But they agree perfectly with his liberation after his first Roman imprisonment.

As there is then no historical evidence that Paul did not survive the year 64, and as these Pastoral Epp. were recognized as Pauline in the immediately succeeding age, we may legitimately accept them as evidence that Paul did survive the year 64—that he was acquitted after his second imprisonment, and was again arrested and brought to Rome, and from this second imprisonment wrote the Second Ep. to Tit—his last extant writing" (Dods, Intro to the NT, 172).

The second difficulty alleged against the acceptance of these epp. as Pauline is that there are said to exist in them indications of an ecclesiastical organization and of a doctrinal development, both orthodox and heretical. The Pastorals, as it was called, is considerably later than the Titus, and some have thought that there is a special attempt to introduce an orthodox ecclesiastical idea of the episcopacy into the existing church.
clearly stated in the Ep. to the Col., certainly point to an incipient Gnosticicism. But had the writer of the Pastoral Epp. been combating the Gnosticism of the 2d cent., he could not now use such phrases as these that he would have employed, but others much more definite. Godet, quoted by Dods (Intro., 175), writes, "The danger here is of substituting intellectualism in religion for piety of heart and life. Had the writer been a Christian of the 2d cent., he would not have used expressions like those who were without parallel in the earlier epp. of Paul, who expressed himself in language without apparent purpose or meaning" (Zahn, Intro., II, 117). A comparison of the statements in these epp. about various kinds of false doctrine, and of those portions of the same that deal with the organization and officers of the church, with conditions actually existing in the church, esp. the church of Asia Minor, at the beginning and during the course of the 2d cent., proves, just as conclusively as do external evidence and historical fact, that they must have been written at least before the year 100. But this would not necessarily have been done as early as the first cent. after Paul's death; because of the character of the references to persons, facts and conditions in Paul's life, his personal history, and because of the impossibility on this assumption of discovering a plausible motive for their forgery. Consequently the claim that they are post-Pauline, and contain matter which is un-Pauline, is to be treated with the greatest suspicion" (Zahn, op. cit., II, 118).

The third difficulty alleged against the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epp. is the language employed, which is said to be, to a large extent, different from that in the accepted epp. The facts in regard to this matter are that in 1 Tim there are 82 words not found elsewhere in the New Testament, and in Tit. there are 33. But, while the total of such words in 1 Tim is 168, the total number, large though it appears, may be compared with the words used only once in the other Epp. of Paul. In Rom. 1, Cor. 3, Gal. 2, 3, Eph. 2, Phil. 2, 2 Thess. 2, Tit., Col. 1, words of this description are 627 in number. No such contrast can be made, however, in the 10 leading words of the Pastoral Epp., that can safely he alleged as proof against their Pauline authorship. The special subjects treated in these epp. required adequate language, a requirement and a claim which could not be refused in the case of any ordinary author.

The objections to the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral Epp. based upon the dissimilarity of diction in them and in Eph.Phil., are based upon the same reason as to the existence of the 3d cent. Epp., and cannot now be considered when the theory of the 3rd cent. origin is no longer persisted in, that the nucleus of the Pastoral Epp. was composed during the 3rd cent. imprisonment, which, according to this theory ended, not in the apostle's release, but in his execution. The fact that he was written by false, unenlightened friends, who were not imbued with the spirit of the divine Father, and with the truths of the gospel, should, to a large extent, weaken the authority of the Pastoral Epp. as to the character of the references to persons, facts and conditions in Paul's life, his personal history, and because of the impossibility on this assumption of discovering a plausible motive for their forgery. Consequently the claim that they are post-Pauline, and contain matter which is un-Pauline, is to be treated with the greatest suspicion (Zahn, op. cit., II, 118).

3. Difficulty of the Language Connected with the Text of the Pastoral Epp.

The "most decisive" of all the arguments against the Pauline authorship is that the "Christianity of the Pastoral Epp. is quite different from the Christianity of the New Testament," Dr. McGiffert himself gives in a footnote (2 Tim 1 9-11; 211 ff.; Tit 3 4-7), as well as other references, do most certainly refer to this very aspect of the Church. For example, themselves in 2 Thess. 2 contains these words, "If we died with him [Christ], we shall also live with him." What is the matter? The truth is the union of the Christian believer with Christ? The believer is one with Christ in His death, one with Him now as He lives and reigns. This notion, therefore, which is "most decisive of all," is one which is not true in point of fact. Dr. McGiffert also charges the author of the Pastoral Epp. as being "one who understood by resurrection nothing else than the resurrection of the flesh, not of the body" (op. cit., 405). But in view of the Lord was raised from the dead, but how very unjust this accusation is, is evident from such a passage as 1 Tim 3 16, "And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness. He was manifested in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached among the nations, believed on in the world, received up in glory.

Charges of this nature are unsupported by evidence, and are of the kind on which Dr. A. S. Peake (A Critical Intro. to the NT, 71) bases his rejection of the Pauline authorship—except for a Pauline nucleus—that he "feels clear." More than an "evisceration" of this sort is needed.

The theory that the Pastoral Epp. are based upon genuine letters or notes of Paul to Timothy and Titus is thus advocated by Peake, McGiffert, Moffatt and many others. It bears very hard upon 1 Tim. "In 1 Tim not a single verse can be indicated which he has not or does not employ" (Peake, op. cit., 70). We may fairly conclude then in agreement with many modern scholars that we have here, in the Pastoral Epp., authentic letters of Paul to Timothy and Titus, worked over and enlarged by another hand" (McGiffert, op. cit., 405). In regard to 1 Tim he writes, "It is very likely that there are scattered fragments of the original ep. in 1 Tim, as for instance in ver 23. But it is difficult to find anything which we can be confident was written post-Tim. (op. cit., p. 407)."

Dr. McGiffert also alleges that in the Pastoral Epp., the word "faith," "is not employed in its profound Pauline sense, but is used to signify one of the cardinal virtues, along with love, peace, purity, righteousness, leisure, patience and meekness." One of the Pauline references to this contrasts the Pastoral, the Ep. to the Gal; and the groundlessness of this charge is evident from Gal 5 22, where "faith" is included in the list there given of the fruit of the Spirit, along with love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, meekness and self-control.

If the Pastoral Epp. are the work of Paul, then. Dr. McGiffert concludes, Paul had given up that form of the gospel which he had been taught and which had been for Paul. He had been for Paul. He had been descended from the lofty religious plane upon which he had always moved, to the level of mere pieté and morality (op. cit., 404). But this charge is not just or reasonable, in view of the fact that the apostle is inquiring throughout these two Epistles into the character of the persons and practices of immoral teachers. Or again, in such a passage as 1 Tim 1 12-17 AV, the author of the ep. has not descended from the lofty religious plane upon which he had always moved, to the level of mere pieté and morality, when he writes, "The grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant with faith and love which is in Christ Jesus." This is a faithful saying, worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief."

If such be the "most decisive" objection against the Pauline authorship, the other difficulties, as already seen, need not cause alarm. For they resolve themselves into the equally groundless charges that the historical requirements of the epp. cannot be fitted into any part of Paul's life, and that the doctrine and ecclesiastical organization... do not suit the Apostolic age. These objections have been already referred to.

The real difficulty writes Dr. Peake (A Critical Intro., 68.) is that "the old energy of thought and expression is gone, and the greater smoothness and continuity in the sense of Christian men and the lack of grip and of continuity in the thought." Dr. Peake well and truly summed up the position does not admit of detailed proof. Lack of grip and lack of continuity in thought are not the characteristics of such passages as 1 Tim. 1 9-17, a passage which has no connection with anything in the acknowledged Pauline Epp.; and there are many other similar passages, e.g. Tit. 2 11-3 7.

What must be said of the dulness of the intelligence which has been made now for several generations more positively than in the case of any other Pauline epp.—has no support from tradition. . . .

To sum up, the evidence of the early reception of the Pastoral Epp, as Pauline is very strong. The confident denial of the genuineness of these letters—"It is impossible to suppose that Paul was the author of such compositions."—is therefore corroborated as this is by their reception in the church, dating from the very earliest period. The Pastoral Epp. may be used by it for the utmost confidence, as having genuinely come from the hand of Paul.

PATARa, pa'ta-ra (rā Ἡλλα, tā Patarā): A coast city of ancient Lycia, from which, according to Acts 21 18, St. Paul said he was to set sail from. Because of its excellent harbor, many of the coast trading ships stopped at Patara, which therefore became an important and wealthy port of entry to the towns of the interior. As early as 440 BC an autonomous city was struck there; during the 4th and the 3d cents. the coinage was interrupted, but was again resumed in 168 BC when Patara joined the Lycian league. Ptolemy Philadelphus enlarged the city, and changed its name to Arsinoe in honor of his wife. The city was celebrated not only as a trading center, but esp. for its celebrated oracle of Apollo which is said to have spoken only during the six winter months of the year. Among the ruins there is still to be seen a deep pit with circular steps leading to a seat at the bottom; it is supposed that the pit is the place of the oracle. In the history of early Christianity, Patara took but little part, but it was the home of a bishop, and the birthplace of St. Nicholas, the patron saint of the sailors of the E. Though born at Patara, St. Nicholas was a bishop and saint of Myra, a neighboring Lycian city, and there he is said to have been buried.

Gedemish is the modern name of the ruin. The walls of the ancient city may still be traced, and the foundations of the temple and castle and other public buildings are visible. The most imposing of the ruins is a triumphal arch bearing the inscription: "Pata the Metropolis of the Lycian Nation." Outside the city walls many sarcophagi may be seen, but the harbor, long ago choked by sand, has been converted into a useless swamp. See also MYRA.

PATH, pāth (πάθος, ἐνδοιχθῆτι): The word usually tr. "crown," "crown of the head" (Gen 49:26; Dt 32:35; 33:13-20; 2 S 14:25; Job 2:7; Isa 3:17; Jer 5:16; 43:45) and "path" (Ps 68:21) is rendered "pate" in Ps 7:16 in agreement with earlier Eng. translators since Coverdale: "His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violence shall come down upon his own pate." The reason for the choice of the word lies evidently in the desire to make the Heb parallelism with "head" (rō'sh) apparent. The same object has, however, been achieved differently in another poetical passage (Gen 49:26 | Dt 33:16), viz. by the juxtaposition of "head" and "crown of the head".

(1) In the OT.—In addition to its obvious literal sense (e.g. Gen 49:17), it has very frequently a figurative meaning. (a) As applied to man, a course or manner of life: (i) man's outward lot in life, his career or destiny, whether of the just man (Isa 26:7) or of the ungodly (Job 8:13); (ii) frequently in an ethical sense, of men's conduct or inward life-purpose, whether it be good or evil (e.g. Prov 2:15), generally accompanied by a term defining the moral quality of the conduct, either an abstract noun (e.g. "the paths of uprightness," Prov 2:13; 4:11; "the paths of justice," Prov 2:8; Isa 40:14; "the paths of life," Ps 16:11; Ps 29:19), or a concrete adj. or noun (e.g. "crooked paths," Isa 59:8; "the paths of the righteous," Prov 20:20; 4:18). (b) The term is also applied to God either (i) of the methods of the Divine Providence, God's dealings with men (Ps 26:10; 65:11), or (ii) of the principles and maxims of religion and morality Diviney revealed to men. (c) The usual AV, "O Jehovah, teach me thy paths," Ps 25:4; cf Isa 2:3.

(2) In the Apoc we have the "paths" of Wisdom (tribos, Bar 3:21.31); the "path" shown to men by the Law (semita, 2 Esd 14:22); and a man's "path" (tribos, Tob 4:10).

In the NT the word occurs only in Mt 3:3 and passages Mk 1:3; Lk 3:4 (of the forerunner's work), and in He 12:13 (in the OT ethical sense).

Pathway occurs in Prov 12:28 (dereth wnhthbkh) and Wisd 5:10 (atpwrh). See Way.

PATHUS, pa-thus (Παθαος, Pathaος, Pathoς, Patháos): One of the Levites who had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9:23) = "Pethahiah" of Ezr 10:23.

PATHROS, path'ros (Παθρος, patris, Παθρος): The name of two cities in the 1st Egyptian province of Lower Egypt (Isa 11:11; Jer 44:1.15; Ezek 29:14; 30:14).

PATHUSIM, path-woo-sim, path-ruw-sim (πατρισμ, πατροσίμ): "an inhabitant of Pathros"; LXX of Ephesians 2:20, "an inhabitant of Pathros." The name appears in the Greek name of the area of Egypt north of the Nile Delta (Gen 10:13f; 1 Ch 1:11f).

PATIENCE, pāshens (παθήσεως, pæthos, παθομα, παθοματια, παθοματια): "Patiency" implies suffering, enduring or waiting, as a determination of the will and not simply under necessity. As such it is an essential Christian virtue to the exercise of which there are many exhortations. The word "wait patiently" is the tr of ἦνοι, one of the meanings of ὅνο "to wait" or "to hope for" or "to expect" (cf Job 14:24); "patient" occurs (Eccl 7:8) as the tr of ἔρηκ ρε, "long of spirit," and (Job 6:11) "that I should be patient" (ha'drikh nechk). Cf "impatient" (Job 21:4).

"Patience" occurs frequently in the Apoc, esp. in Ecclus, e.g. 2:14; 16:13; 17:24; 41:2 (hupomone); 5:11 (makrothuma); 29:8 (makrothumot, RV "long patience") (in Wisd 2:19, the Gr word is aneraxia).

Patience is often hard to gain and to maintain, but, in Rom 5:5, 5, God is called "the God of patience" (ARV "steadfastness") as being able to grant that grace to those who look to Him and depend on Him for it. It is in reliance on God and acceptance of His will, with trust in His goodness, wisdom and faithfulness, that we are enabled to endure and to hope steadfastly. See also God.

PATMOS, pat'mos (Πατμος, Patmos; Ital. San Giovanni di Patiio): A Turkish island of the group Sperones, near Samos, NE of Bodrum, on the Aegean coast of the old Asia Minor. The island of Patmos is the one described in the Apocalypse, Rev 1:9, "I, John ... was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus" (G2 τον λόγον τοῦ θεοῦ καὶ τὴν μαρτυρίαν Ἰησοῦν, did ἐπάνω ἐν τῷ θεῷ καὶ τὴν μαρτυρίαν Ἰησοῦν). The island is 10 miles long, and about 6 broad along the northern coast. It is for the most part rocky. The highest part in Mt. St. Elias, which rises to a height of over 800 ft. As in Greece, and in the adjacent mainland of Asia Minor, the land is treeless. Patmos, the city of Patmos, there is a good harbor. A famous monastery, St. Christodoulos, was founded on the island in 1088. Near this is a thriving school attended by students from all parts of the Archipelago. The population of the island numbers 3,000, almost entirely Gr. The ancient capital was on an isthmus between the inlets of La Scala and Merika. Many ruins can still be seen. The huge walls of Cyclopean masonry, similar to those at Tynys, attest their great age. In Rom times Patmos was one of the many places to which Rome banished her enemies, cf Acts 28:15, according to the tradition preserved by Irenaeus, Eusebius, Jerome and others. St. John was exiled here—in the 14th year of the reign of Domitian—whence he returned to Ephesus under Nerva (96 AD). The cave in which he is said to have seen his visions is still pointed out to the traveler. Only a small part of the once valuable library in the monastery of St. Christodoulos is left. Just 100 years ago (1814) Mr. E. D. Clark purchased here the manuscript of Plato which is now in the Bodleian Library, the celebrated Clarkianus, a parchment written in the year 895, and admittedly the best of all for the 1st of the 2 vols into which the works of Plato were divided for convenience. Patmos is mentioned by Thucydides (iii.23), by Pliny (NH, iv.23), and by Strabo (x.3). See also JOHN THE APOSTLE; REVELATION OF JOHN.

PATRIARCH, πάτριαρχός, πατριάρχης: The word occurs in the NT in application to Abraham (He 7 4), to the sons of Jacob (Acts 7 80), and to David (Acts 2 29). In LXX it is used as the equivalent of the head of the fathers’ house, or of a tribe (1 Ch 24 31; 27 32; 2 Ch 26 12). Commonly now the term is used of the persons whose names appear in the genealogies and covenants in the periods preceding Moses (Gen 5, 11, histories of Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, etc; of “patrician” dispensation”). The problems connected with the longevity ascribed to the patriarchs in the genealogies and narratives in Gen are dealt with in special articles. PATRMONY, πατρώμοι (πάτρινον, ἡ-ἀ-βοθάθη), “the fathers”: A word occurring once in EV (Dt 18 8), meaning lit. “the fathers,” which, however, is obscure, probably by reason of abbreviation for some phrase, e.g. “house of the fathers.” It may indicate “some private source of income possessed by the Levite [who has come up from a country district to the central sanctuary] distinct from what he is given first by officiating in the central sanctuary” (Driver, “Dt,” ICC, in loc.). Beyond this one occurrence of the word the same idea is conveyed often by other words or phrases: “He divided unto them his living” (Lk 19 13); “Teacher, give me the inheritance with which thou hast provided me” (Lk 12 13). Full and specific directions were given in the Law for the division of the patrimony (Nu 27; Dt 21, etc) and for its redemption (Ruth 4 1–12). The idea was frequently used with figurative and spiritual application: the land of Canaan was Israel’s patrimony, being inherited from Jeh (Ps 105 11); salvation because of its origin in grace was the believer’s patrimony (Gal 3 26–4 7). Contrariwise Israel was Jeh’s inheritance (Isa 19 25; 21; 14; of Ps 110 14); and the whole earth is the Messianic inheritance: “Father’s Eternal Father” (Ps 2 8). See BIRTHRIGHT; FAMILY; INHERITANCE; PROPERTY.

PATRONAS, pa tro’nas (Πατρονάς, Patrobas): The name of a member of the Christian community at Rome to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 14). The name is an abbreviation form of “Patrobus.” There was a wealthy freedman of Nero of the same name who was put to death by Galba (Tac. Hist. 1.49; 11.90); he was a patronas of St. Paul may have been a dependent of his.

PAULCLOS, pa trō’klos (Πατρόκλουσ, Patroklos): The father of the Syrian general Nicanor (2 Macc 8 9).

PATTERN, pat’er-n (πατρόν, tabhāth, “model,” πάτρινος, mor’eh, “a vision” or “view”): The OT words tr “pattern” do not necessarily indicate a drawing such as a modern constructor begins with, or the patterns made from these drawings for the guidance of workmen. In Ex 25 9.40 the word “idea” or “suggestion” would possibly indicate more distinctly than “pattern” what Moses received in regard to the building of the tabernacle, etc. It is doubtful if any architect’s drawing was ever made of the temple. It is not the custom in Pal and Syria today to work from any pattern more concrete than an idea. A man who wants a house calls the builder and says he wants to build so many rooms of such and such dimensions, for example, a court 10 drabs (arm’s lengths) wide and 15 drabs long, made of sandstone and plastered inside and out. With these meager instructions the builder starts. The details are worked out as the building proceeds. When a piece of iron or brass work is to be made, the customer by gestures with his hands outlines the form the piece should take. “I want it hāk wa hāk” (“thus and thus”), he says, and leaves the metal worker to conceive the exact form. It is probable that directions similar to these were given by David to Solomon. “Then David gave to his son [his concept of] the porch of the temple,” etc (1 Ch 28 11). The above does not apply to Gr and Rom work in Syria. Their workmen, probably mostly native, were trained to work from models. Williams in the Architect, January, 1913, says of the works at Baalbek and Palmyra, “There is a machine-like resemblance betokening slavish copying.” At the present time native workmen coming under the influence of foreigners are beginning to work from models and plans, but they show little tendency to create models of their own.

Three Gr words have been tr in the NT: τός, τύπος, “type,” occurs in Tit 2 7 and He 8 5. In the first instance RV reads “ensample.” ὁμοίωσις, ὑποτύπωσις, “outline,” has been similarly tr in 1 Tim 1 16, but “pattern” in 2 Tim 1 13. In He 9 24 ARV ἀντίτυπος, antitupos, is rendered “like in pattern.” ὑπόδειγμα, ὑποδείγμα, AV “pattern,” is tr in ARV “copy” (He 8 5), “copies” (He 9 23). At the time of the tr of AV the word “pattern” meant either the thing to be copied or the copy.

gives an able, but unconvincing, presentation of the arguments for the addition of the chapter by a later hand. Deissmann (St. Paul, 19) calls Rom 16 'a little epistle from Pauline Christians and the Rom community, and to show that he had not written to them quite exclusively in his own name.' A common-sense explanation of Paul's personal ties in Rome is the fact that as the center of the world's life the city drew people thither from all parts of the earth. So today many a man has friends in New York or London who has never been to either city. A much more serious controversy rages as to the integrity of 2 Cor. Semler took 2 Cor 10-13 to be a separate and later ep., because of its difference in tone from 2 Cor 1-9, but Haurwitz put it earlier than chs 1-9, and made it the letter referred to in 2 4. He has been followed by many scholars like Schmiedel, Cone, McGiffert, Bacon, Moulton, Regel, Reuss, Weiss, Menzies. The precision of date and place turns on its date. Lightfoot (loc. cit.) argues for Corinth, since it was probably written shortly before Rom. But Moffatt (Intro., 102) holds tentatively to Ephesus, soon after Paul's arrival there from Galatia. So he gives the order: Ga., 1 and 2, Rom. In so much doubt it is well to follow Lightfoot's logical argument. Gal leads naturally to Rom, the one hot and passionate, the other calm and contemplative, but both on the same general theme.

(c) Third group: Phil, Philem, Col, Eph. Date 61-63, unless Paul reached Rome several years earlier. This matter depends on the date of the coming of Festus to success Felix (Acts 24, 27). It was once thought to be 60 AD beyond any doubt, but many are of the opinion that it is uncertain. See "Chronology," III, 2, (2), below. At any rate these four ep. were written during the first Rom imprisonment, assuming that he was set free.

But it must be noted that quite a respectable group of scholars hold that one or all of these ep. were written from Caesarea (Schnurr, Thiersch, Meyer, Haurwitz, Sabatier, Reuss, Weiss, Hupt, Spitta, McPherson, Hick). But the arguments are more specious than convincing. See HORT, Rom and Eph, 101-10. There is a growing opinion that Philem, Col and Eph were written from Ephesus during a public imprisonment in Paul's stay of 3 years there. So Deissmann (Light from the East, 223) and ST. PAUL, 101; ST. LUCAS (Vinylca Sancntorit, 1900). M. A. Albertz (Theol. Studien und Kritiken, 1910, 551 ff.). B. W. Bacon (Journal of Bnt. Lit. 1910, 181 ff.). The strongest argument for this position is that Paul apparently did not know personally the arrival of Eph. He is not willing to allow that he had written to Colaph in counter to his written to Galatia. So he gives the order: Ga., 1 and 2, Rom. But this objection need not apply if the so-called Ephesian Ep. was a circular letter and if Paul did not visit Colossae and Laodicea together (cf. Acts 19:10). But these two points are more attractive at first than on reflection. He throws this group before Rome—a difficult view to concede.

But even so, the order of these ep. is by no means clear that Col, 1st, Rom, 2nd, Eph were sent together. Tycheius was the bearer of Col (4 7 f) and Eph (6 21 f). Onesimus bore Philem (vs 10 13) and was also the companion of Tycheius to Colossae (Col 4 9). So these three ep. from Rome and Galatia commonly assumed that Phil was the last of the group of four, and hence later than the other three, because Paul is balancing life and death (Phil 2 12 f) and is expecting to be set free (1 25), but he has the same expectation of freedom when he writes Philem (ver 12). The absence at Ephesus (Phil 2 20) has to be explained on either hypothesis. Moffatt (Intro., 159) is dogmatic, "as Phil was certainly the last letter that he wrote," ruling out of court Eph, not to say the later Pastoral Epp. But this conclusion given in Moffatt trouble with the Ep. to the Laodi-ceans (Col 4 16) which he can only call "the enigmatic reference" and cannot follow Rutherford (St. Paul's Epp. to Colossae and Laodicea, 1908) in identifying the Laodicean Ep. with Eph, as indeed Marson seems to have done. But the notion that Paul's letters to the Laodi-ceans are to the Ephesians, or to any other church more than one church (hence without personalities) still holds the bulk of modern opinion.

Von Soden (Hist of Early Christian Lit., 294) is as dogmatic as Wrede or Van Manen: "All which has hitherto been stated is a hypothesis; it has no real being. It is an attractive idea, but it makes the Pauline letters too late, and it gives us an attractive story of the life of the Apostle." He admits "verbal echoes of Pauline epp.

Lightfoot puts Phil before the other three because of its doctrinal affinity with the second group in ch 3 as a reminiscence, and because of its anticipation of the Christological controversy with incipient Gnosticism in ch 2. This great discussion is purely central in character in the theory that it is a consistent and coherent interpretation of the group. Philem, though purely personal, is wonderfully vital as a sociological document. Paul is in this group at the height of his powers in his grasp of the Person of Christ.

(d) Fourth group: 1 Tim, Tit, 2 Tim The Pastoral Epp. are still hotly disputed, but there is a growing willingness in Britain and Germany to make a place for them in Paul's life. Von Soden bluntly says that it is impossible that these epp. as they stand can have been written by St. Paul (Hist of Early Christian Lit., 310). He finds no room for the heresy here combated, or for the details in Paul's life, or for the linguistic peculiarities in Paul's style. But he sees a "literary unity" in this group that binds them together and separates them from Paul. Thus tersely he puts the case against the Pauline authorship. So Moffatt argues for the sub-Pauline environment and the sub-Pauline atmosphere of these epp. They have been accused of pseudocray (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 410). But this thrusts aside the personal details and argues that the epp. give merely the tendency of early Christianity (Ueber Aufgabe und Methode der Sorgen. NT Theologische, 1927). The Hacht-Van Manen art. in EB admits only that "the Pastoral Epp. occupy themselves chiefly with the various affairs of the churches within Pauline circles."

Moffatt has a vigorous attack on these letters in EB, but he "almost entirely ignores the external evidence, while he has been unconcerned to say to its form, its content, its ideas, its presuppositions, absolutely excludes the possibility of a Pauline authorship." He admits "verbal echoes of Pauline epp."
groups had shown no change in vocabulary and style. The case of Shakespeare is quite pertinent, for the various groups of plays stand more or less apart. The Pauline documents to Paul's old school and deal with personal and ecclesiastical matters in a more or less reminiscence of vehemence than with wisdom. In the earlier epistles, but this situation is what one would reasonably expect. The "eclesiastical organization" arrangement is a matter of fact, "the organization in the Pastoral Ep. is not appar- ently advanced beyond that of the church in 1 and 2 Thess. at Philippi in 61 AD." (Ramsay, _Expos. VII, viii, 17._) The "gnoths" by these epistles (1 Tim 6 20; Tit 1 14) have been developed type since the Ignatian Ep. of the 2d cent. Indeed, Bultmann ("Historic Setting of the Pastoral Ep._, _Expos._, January, 1913, 20) pointedly says of the "Churches and "Christian Ecclesiastical and Ramsay's "Historical Commentary on 1 Timotheo. are of the 6th cent. (VII, viii, i.), "one feels the subject has been lifted to a new level of reality and that much criticism between Bauer and Juelicher is out of date and irrelevant." It is now shown that the Pastoral Ep. are not directed against Gnosticism of advanced type, but even of a more Jewish type (Tit 1 14) than that in Col. Ramsay (_Expos._, VIII, i, 263) sweeps this stock criticism aside as "from the wrong point of view." It falls to the ground.

Lightfoot ("Note on the Heresy Committed in the Pastoral Ep._, _Bib. Essays._, 415) has insisted on the Jewish char- acter of the Gnostic attack here. As a matter of fact, the main objection to these epistles is that they do not fit into any of the types which break abruptly with Paul in Rome. But it is a false premise to assume that they do not fit into any of the types at all. Harnack turns the objection that Paul in Acts 26 predicted that he would never see the Epiphanius aged again that no one else could do the Lord's work after 2 Tim 4 21 (The Date of Acts and Synoptic Gospel) that Paul may not have visited Epipha- nus after all, but may have seen Timothy at Miletus also (1 Tim 1 3). Harnack frankly admits the acquisit and pseudo Pauline and thus free play for the Pastoral Ep. Blass (_Apostolus, 24_) acknowledges the _Pastoral_ Ep. as genuine. In _BD,_ _Morrow,_ etc., Col. H.B. Deane in _Standard BD._, Sunday (Inspiration, 364) comments on the _standard view_ of the evidence for the Pastoral Ep. Even Holtzmann (Ri, 291) appears to admit echoes of the Pastoral Ep. in the Ignatian Ep. Lightfoot (Bib. Essays, p. 220) points out, with much justice, the complete ‘acceptance of the Pauline authorship. Deissmann (St. Paul, 15) has a nodding word: 'The deduction is still current in certain circles that the _scientific distinction of a Bible scholar may be estimated in the form of a percentual according to the proportion of his verdicts of spuriousness. . . . The extant letters of St. Paul have been innocently obliged to endure again a fair share of the martyrdom suffered by the historic St. Paul." See further _Pastoral Epistles._

(3) _Paul’s conception of his Ep._—Assuming, therefore, the Pauline authorship of the thirteen epw., we are on one hand, though it were the day of our death, the growth in Paul's apprehension of Christ and Christianity, his adaptation to varied situations, his grasp of world-problems and the eternal values of life. Paul wrote other ep., we know. In 1 Cor 1 10, 14 on a clear point, now known to us otherwise, earlier than 1 Cor. In the use of "every epistle" in 2 Thess 3 1 naturally implies that Paul had written more than two already. It is not certain to what letter Paul refers in 2 Cor 2 4—most probably to one between 1 and 2 Cor., though, as already shown, some scholars find that letter in 2 Cor 10 13. More than Paul (Col 4 16) mentions an ep. addressed to the church at Laodicea. This ep. is almost certainly that which we know as Eph. Indeed, at least two apocryphal Ep. to the Laodiceans were written to supply this deficiency. As early as 2 Thess 2 2 forgers were at work to palm off ep. in Paul's name, "or by ep. as from us," to attack and pervert Paul's real views, whom Paul denounced as false. Admittedly, that this "mistake to limit Paul's Epp. to the local and temporary sphere given them by Duissmann.

(4) Development in Paul's Epp.—For Paul's gospel theology see later. Here we must stress the fact that all four groups of Paul's Epp. are legitimate developments from his fundamental experience of grace as conditioned by his previous training and later work. He met each new problem with the same basic truth that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God, revealed to Paul on his way to Damascus. The reality of this great experience must here be assumed (see discussion later). It may be admitted that the Acts does not stand upon the same plane as the Pauline Epp. as a witness concerning Paul's conversion (Fletcher, The Conversion of St. Paul, 1910, 5). But even so, the Epp. amply confirm Luke's report of the essential fact that Jesus appeared to Paul in the same sense that He did to the apostles and other Christians (1 Cor 15:4-9). The revelation of Christ to Paul and in Paul (ék proswp., en émou, Gal 1:16) and the specific call connected therewith to preach to the Gentiles gave Paul a place independent of and on a par with the other apostles (1:16; 2:1-10). Paul’s first preaching (Acts 9:20) "proclaimed Jesus the Christ, and the Son of God." This "primitive Paulinism" (Sabatier, The Apostle Paul, 1893, 113) lay at the heart of Paul's message in his sermons and speeches in Acts. Professor P. Casey regards Luke as a "careless" historian ("The Speech of St. Paul in Acts," Cambridge Bib. Essays, 1909, 336), but he quite admits the central place of Paul's conversion, both in the Acts and the Epp. (6b; cf also The Religious Experience of St. Paul).

We cannot here trace in detail the growth of Paulinism. Let Wernle speak (Beginnings of Christianity, 1903, I, 221) for us: "The decisive factor in the genius of St. Paul's theology was his personal experience, his conversion on the road to Damascus. His atoning death, not by works of the Law (Acts 13:38 f). In the first group there are allusions to the "work of faith and labor of love and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ," etc. (2 Thess 1:3) and he speaks of "election" (1:4) and "our gospel" (1:5) and the resurrection of Jesus (1:10). The Father, Son and Spirit cooperate in the work of salvation (2 Thess 3:14), which includes election, belief, sanctification, glorification. It is not necessary to stress the argument for the conception of salvation by faith in Christ, grace as opposed to works, in the second group. It is obviously present in the third and the fourth. We seem forced to the view therefore that Paul's experience was revolutionary, not evolutionary. If we consider the whole history of Paul as it is disclosed to us in his letters, are we not forced to the conclusion that his was a catastrophic or explosive, rather than a slowly progressive personality? (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 1911, 32). "His gospel was included in his conversion, and it was meditation that made explicit what was thus implicit in his experience." (ib). This is not to say that there was no "spiritual development of St. Paul" (Matheson, 1906). There was growth of expression in the successive application of the fundamental Christian conception. The accent upon this or that phase of truth at different stages in Paul's career does not necessarily mean that the others were without expression. The occasion has arisen for emphasis and elaboration.

In a broad generalization the first group of the epp. is eschatological, the second soteriological, the third Christological, and the fourth pastoral (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 22). But one must not get the notion that Paul did not have a full gospel of salvation in the first group, and did not come to the true motive of the person of Christ as Lord till the second, or understand the pastoral office till the fourth. See emphasis on Paul's work as pastor and preacher in 1 Thess 2 (first group), and the Lordship of Christ also (1 Thess 1:13; 2 Thess 1:1; 2 Thess 3:1), on a par with the Father.

There was a change of accent in each group on questions of eschatology, but in each one Paul cherishes the hope of the second coming of Christ up to the very end when he speaks of his own death. In 1 Cor 15:1-11, Paul pointedly alludes to his conversion: "I was laid hold of by Jesus Christ," as giving him the goal of his ambition, "that I may lay hold;" "I count not myself yet to have laid hold." This concentration of effort to come up to Christ's purpose in him is the key to Paul's life and letters, "I press on toward the mark," as he put it in Phil 3:14. "What is the..." (Phil 2:5). See also 2 Cor 13:10 and Gal 1:2, for Paul's formal defense of his apostolic authority. The pleasantry in Rom 15:14 does not displace the claim in 15:16-23 f. In the third group note the great passage in Phil 3:12-14, where Paul pointedly alludes to his conversion: "I was laid hold of by Jesus Christ," as giving him the goal of his ambition, "that I may lay hold;" "I count not myself yet to have laid hold." with due emphasis on the soteriological aspects of Christ's work and on Christian life. Bruce (St. Paul: Concept and Christianity) conceives that Paul gives us his entire conception of Christianity in the four great epp. of the second group, while B. Weiss (Bib. Theol. of the NT) sees a more developed doctrine in the third group. He is in his prime in both groups. In the fourth group the same struggleingers on with variations in Crete and even in Ephesus. The Jewish phase of the heresy is more decided (perhaps Pharisaic), and recalls to some extent the Judaistic controversy in the second group. Paul's view of the Church and Christianity has enemies within and without. He turns to young ministers as the hope of the future in the propagation of the gospel of the happy God. The fires have burned lower, and there is less passion and heat. The tone is now fiercer, now tender. The style is broken and reminiscent, and personal, though not with the rush of torrential emotion in 2 Cor., nor the power of logic in Gal and Rom. Each ep. fits into its niche in the group. Each group falls into proper relation to the stage in Paul's life and writing reveals the changes of thought and feeling in the great apostle. It is essential that one study Paul's Epp. in their actual historical order if one wishes to understand the mind of Paul. Scholars are not agreed, to be sure on this point. They agree on nothing for the most part. There are two methods of presenting Paul's Epp. in Robertson, Chronological NT (1904), and Moffatt, Historical NT (1901).

2. Modern Theories about Paul—Findlay (HDB, "Paul") offers a needed warning when he reminds us that the modern historical 1. Criticism and psychological method of study is not infallible prejudice as the older categories of scholastic and dogmatic theology. "The focus of the picture may be displaced and its colors falsified by philosophical no less than by ecclesiastical spectacles." (ib.) Deissmann (St. Paul, 4th) sympathizes with this protest against the infallibility of modern subjective criticism: "That really and properly is the task of the modern student of St. Paul: to come back from the paper St. Paul of our western libraries, Germanized, dogmatized, modernized, to the historic St. Paul; to penetrate to Paulinian Christianity as it comes to the St. Paul of ancient reality." He admits the thoroughness and the magnitude of the work accomplished in the 19th cent. concerning the literary questions connected with Paul's letters, but it is a "philological method... that cannot go farther astray." Deissmann conceives of Paul as a "hero of piety first and foremost," not as a theologian. "As a religious genius St. Paul's outlook is forward into a future of universal history." This position of Deissmann has been attacked by the pre-Baur time. Deissmann would like to get past all the schools of criticism, back to Paul himself. Baur started the modern critical attitude by his Pastoralbriehe (1855, p. 79), in which he remarked that there were only four epp. of Paul (Gal. 1 and 2 Cor. and Rom.) which could be the 2. Tübingen Theory (1845) he expounded this thesis. He also rejected the Acts. From the four great epp. and from the pseudo-Clementine literature of the 2nd cent., Baur argued that Paul and Peter were bitter antagonists. Peter and the other apostles were held fast in the grip of the legalistic conception of Christianity, a sort of Christianized Pharisaism. Paul, when one comes to a violent against this view, and became the exponent of gentle freedom. Christianity was divided into two factions, Jewish Christians (Petrinists) and gentile Christians (Paulinists). With this key Baur ruled out the other Pauline epp. and Acts as spurious, because they did not show the bitterness of this controversy. He called them "tendency" writings, designed to cover up the strife and to show that peace reigned in the camp. This arbitrary theory cut a wide swath for 50 years, and became a fetish with many scholars, but it is now dead. "It has been seen that it is bad criticism to make a theory on insecure grounds, and then to reject all the literature which contradicts it" (Mac-

3. Protest in Germany is Th. Zahn (cf his against Eind in das NT, 2 vols., 1895–99; Intro to Baur's View to 1899). Zahn saw the true successor of Lightfoot as the chief antagonist of the Tübingen School is Dr W. M. Ramsey, whose numerous volumes (Church in the Rm Empire, 1895; Critics and Bishops of Phrygia, 1895; St. Paul the Tübinger and Other Studies, 1906; Cities of St. Paul, 1908; Luke the Physician and Other Studies, 1908; Pictures of the Apostolic Church, 1910; The First Christian Century, 1911) have given the finishing touches to the overthrow of Baur's contention. But even so, already the Baur school had split into two parts. The ablest representatives, like H. J. Holtzmann, Pflueger, Harnack, were sors to Baur compelled to admit more of Paul's Epp. as genuine than the four principal ones, till there are left practically none to fight over. Even the Baurite Epp. This protest eliminated completely Baur's thesis of the 19th cent. near to that of Lightfoot, Ramsay and Zahn. Von Soden (Early Christian Lit., 324) still stands out against B Thess, but Harnack has deserted him on that point. But the old narrow view of Baur is gone, and Von Soden, who, at first, was his enthusiastic admirer, has signed the death warrant of his great literary memorial of the Greeks we may well question whether these Pauline letters are not equal to these.—Indeed, do not surpass them—in spiritual significance, in psychological depth, and loftiness of ideal, above all in the realm of complete and forcible expression." The other wing of Baur's school Findlay (HDB) calls "ultra-Baurians." It is mainly a Dutch school with Loman and Van Manen as its main exponents, though it has support in Germany from Steck and Volter, and in America from W. B. Smith. These writers do not say that Paul is a myth, but that our sources (Acts and the 13 epp.) are all legendary. It is a relentless carrying of Baur's thesis to a redicuo absurdum. Van Manen (EB) says of the "historical Paul" as distinct from "the legendary Paul": "It does not appear that Paul's ideas differed widely from those of the other disciples, or that he had emancipated himself from Judaism, or had outgrown the habits of more than 2000 years. The). We have disposed of all the evidence he is entirely free to reconstruct the picture to suit himself. Quite arbitrarily, Van Manen accepts the "we-sections in Acts as authoritative. But these give glimpses of the historical Jesus quite as truly as the Pauline Epp., and should therefore be regarded by advocates of the mythical Jesus. So the pendulum swings back and forth. One school destroy the other, but the fact of Paul's personality remains. "The new start is one of such importance that we must distinguish the pre-Pauline from the post-Pauline Christianity." (C. Anderson, "Jewish Christianity," the same thing, the Palestinian sect and the world-religion?" (Werne, Beginnings of Christianity, I, 159).

In his Paulus (1904), Wrede finds the explanation of Paul's theology in late Jewish apocalyptic views and in the oriental mystery-religions. Byzantine "Religion des Kyrieus" (the Holy Father) seeks to find in the "late Jewish apocalyptic" "conceptions from the Bab and the Irano-Zarathushtrian religions" (Schweitzer, Paul and His Message, 179). According to Wrede's view, Paul is one of the creators of "Christ" as distinct from the Jesus of history (cf. "Jesus or Christ," HJ, suppl., January, 1909).

Wrede's object is to overthrow the view predominant in modern theology, that Paul loyally and consistently expounded and developed the theology of Jesus" (J. Weiss, Paul and Jesus, 1909, 2). J. Weiss in this book makes a careful reply to Wrede as others have done; cf. A. Meyer, Jesus or Paul (1909), who concludes (p. 134) dramatically: "Paul — just one who points the way to Jesus and to God! See also Jülicher, Paulus and Jesus (1907); Kaftan, Jesus and Paulus (1906); Kölling, Die geistige Einwirkung der Person Jesu und Paulus (1906). The best reply to Wrede's arguments about the mystery-religion is found in articles in the Epos for 1912-13 (now in book form) by H. A. A. Kennedy on "St. Paul and the Irving Family" (1912) and "The Chinese Mission in Persia" (1913) in the Kautský-Bibl. Zeitschriften. The position of Wrede is carried to its logical conclusion by Drews (Die Christus-Mythe, 1909), who makes Paul the creator of Christianity. W. B. Smith (Der vorchristliche Jesus, 1906) tries to show that "Jesus was a pre-Christian myth, not a god." Schweitzer (Paul and His Interpreters, 255) sums the matter up thus: "Drews' thesis is not merely a curiosity; it indicates the natural limit at which the hypothesis advanced by the advocates of comparative religion, when left to its own momentum, finally comes to rest." Schweitzer himself may be accepted as the best exponent of the rigid application of this view to Paul (Paul and His Interpreters, 1912) that he had made to Jesus (The Quest of the Historical Jesus, 1910). He glories in the ability to answer the interpretation absurdities of Steck, Loman and Van Manen and Drews by showing that the eschatological conceptions of Paul in his epp. are primitive, not late, as belonging to the 1st cent., not to the 2d (Paul and His Interpreters, 249). He thus claims to be the true pupil of Baur, though reaching conclusions utterly different. There is undoubtedly an element of truth in this contention of Schweitzer, but he loses his case, when he insists that nothing but eschatology must be allowed to figure. "The edifice constructed by Baur has fallen," he proclaims (p. viii), but he demands that in its place the "exclusively Jewish-eschatological" (p. ix) interpretation. There he slips, and his theory will go the same way as that of F. C. H. M. Scott ("Jesus and Paul," Cambridge Bibl. Essays, 365) admits that Paul has the same eschatological outlook as Jesus, but also the same ethical interest. It is not "either . . . or," but both in each case. See a complete bibliography of the "Jesus and Paul" controversy in J. G. Machens' Paulus und Jesus und Paul" in Bibl. and Theol. Studies (1912, 547 f.) As Ramsay insists, we are now in the 20th cent. of insight and sanity, and Paul has come to his own. Even Werne (Beginnings of Christianity, I, 163) sees that Paul is not the creator of Christianity, but the interpreter of historical facts. God—Christ—Paul, such is the order." Sataurbury (History of Criticism, 152) says: "It has been the mission of the 19th cent. to prove that everybody's work was written by somebody else, and it will not be the most useless task of the 20th to betake itself to more profitable inquiries."

III. Chronology of Paul's Career. — There is not a single date in the life of Paul that is beyond dispute, though several are narrowed a little. There are a fine point, and the general course and relative proportion of events are clear enough. Luke gave careful data for the time of the birth of Jesus (Lk 2 1 f.), for the entrance of the Baptist on his ministry (3 1 f.), and the age of Jesus when he began his work (3 25), but he takes no such pains in the events in chronology. But we are left with a number of incidental allusions and notes of time which call for some discussion. For fuller treatment see Chronology of the NT. Garvie (Life and Teaching of Paul, 1910, 181) gives a comparative table of the views of Harnack, Turner, Ramsay, and Lightfoot for the events from the crucifixion of Christ to the close of Acts. The general scheme is nearly the same, differing only from one to four years here and there. Shaw (The Pauline Epp., xi) gives a good chronological scheme. Moffatt (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 62 f.) gives the theories of 23 scholars:

Let us look at the dates given by ten of this list:
This table shows very well the present diversity of opinion on the main points in Paul's life. Before expressing an opinion on the points at issue it is best to examine a few details. Paul himself gives some notes of time. He gives "after 3 years" (Gal 1:18) as the period between his conversion and first visit to Jerusalem, though he does not necessarily mean 3 full years. In Gal 2:1, Paul speaks of another visit to Jerusalem "after the space of 14 years." Then again Luke quotes him as saying to the Ephesian elders at Miletus that he had spent "3 years" at Ephesus (Acts 20:31). The point is that these were times when Peter's mission was in going forth from Jerusalem, and in that connection we know from Acts 11 that Barnabas had been in Syrian, or Galatian, or Antiochian, or perhaps Cilician, regions during the same period. There is also mentioned a time when Paul was present at Jerusalem, and they do not embrace the time between his conversion and arrest. There is also another note of time in 2 Cor 12:2, where he speaks in an enigmatic way of experiences of his "14 years" ago from the writing of this ep. from Macedonia on the third visit. This will take him back to Tarsus before coming to Antioch at the request of Barnabas, and so overlaps a bit the other "14" above, and includes the "3 years" at Ephesus. We cannot, therefore, add these figures together for the total. But some light may be obtained from further details from Acts and the Epistles.

(1) The death of Stephen.—Saul, "a young man" (Acts 7:58) when this event occurs. Like other rabbis, he was in the prime of life. A rabbi in the age of sixty. Points had probably been thus active several years, esp. as he was now in a position of leadership, and may even have been a member of the Sanhedrin (Acts 26:10). Pontius Pilate was not deposed from his procuratorship till 36 AD, but was in a state of uneasiness for a couple of years. It is more probable, therefore, that the stoning of Stephen would take place after his deposition in the interest of the state. Many years before, when he would be afraid to protest against the lawlessness of the Jewish leaders. He had shown timidity at the death of Jesus, 29 or 30 AD, but some of the forms of law were observed. So nothing decisive is here obtained, though 35 AD seems more probable than 32 or 33.

(2) The flight from Damascus.—Paul locates this humiliating experience (2 Cor 11:32) when "the governor under Aretas the king guarded the city of the Damascenes." Aretas, the Arabian, and not the Roman, has now control when Paul is writing. The likelihood is that Aretas did not get possession of Damascus till 37 AD, when Tiberius died and was succeeded by Caligula. It is argued by some that the expression "reign a many years before, when he would be afraid to protest against the lawlessness of the Jewish leaders. He had shown timidity at the death of Jesus, 29 or 30 AD, but some of the forms of law were observed. So nothing decisive is here obtained, though 35 AD seems more probable than 32 or 33.

(3) The death of Herod Agrippa I.—Here the point of contact between the Acts (12:1-4; 19:9-23) and Jos (Ant, XIX, viii) is beyond dispute, since both record and describe in somewhat similar vein the death of this king. Jos says that at the time of his death he had already completed the 3d year of his reign over Judaea over (Acts 12:19, 22). He received this dignity soon after Claudius began to reign in 41 AD, so that makes the date 44 AD. He died after the Passover in that year (44), for Peter was imprisoned by him during that feast John 11:52; Acts 12:3). Fortunately Luke sandwiches the narrative about Herod Agrippa I. between the visit of Barnabas and Saul to Jerusalem from Aretas (Acts 11:29) and their return to Antioch (12:25). He does not say that the events here recorded were exactly synchronous with this visit, for he says merely "about that time." We are allowed therefore to place this visit before 44 AD or after, just as the facts require. The mention of "elders" in Acts 11:30 instead of apostles (cf both in 15:4) may mean that the apostles are absent when the visit is made. After the death of James (1:15) and the return of Peter we note that Peter "went to another place" (12:17). But the apostles are back again in Jerusalem in 15:4 ff. Lightfoot (Bib. Essays, 216) therefore places the visit "at the end of 44, or in 45." Once more we find that the text may be fixed by the historical facts, and that is by the death of Paul. It is disputed also whether this 2d visit to Jerusalem according to Acts (9:26; 11:29 f) is the same as the "again" in Gal 2:1. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 59) identifies the visit in Gal 2:1 with that in Acts 11:26, but Lightfoot (op. cit, p. 221) holds that it "must be identified with the third of the Acts" (15:4 f). In Gal 1 and 2 Paul is not recording his visits to Jerusalem, but showing his independence of the chief apostles who met them there. There is no reason given that he should have missed the occasion of the visit in Acts 11:29 f. The point of Lightfoot is well taken, but we have no point of contact with the outside history for locating more precisely the date of the visit of Gal 2:1 and Acts 15:4 ff., except that it was after the first missionary tour of Acts 13 and 14.

(4) The first missionary tour.—Sergius Paulus is procurus of Cyprus when Barnabas and Saul visit the island (Acts 13:7). The procurus Paulus is mentioned in a letter from the city of Soli (Hag. XIX, 80, 114) and Lucius Sergius Paulus in CIL, VI, 31, 545, but, as no mention of his being procurus is here made, it is probably earlier than that time. The Soloi inscription bears the date 55 or 56 AD, but Sergius was procurus of Cyprus from 46 to 52. Hence he may have been procurus in 50 or the early part of 51 AD. It could not be later and may have been earlier.

(5) The first visit to Corinth.—The point to note here is that Gallio becomes procurus of Achaia (Acts 18:12). Paul has been apparently in Corinth a year and six months when Gallio appears on the scene (Acts 18:11). Aquila and Priscilla had "lately come from Italy" (18:2) when Paul arrived there. They had been expelled from Rome by the emperor Claudius (18:2). On the arrival of Gallio the Jews at once accuse Paul before him; he refuses to interfere, and Paul stays on for a while and then leaves for Syria with Aquila and Priscilla (18:18). Deissmann (St. Paul, Appendix, 1, "The Proconsulate of L. Junius Gallio") has shown beyond reasonable doubt that Gallio, the brother of Seneca, became procurus of Achaia about July, 51 AD (or possibly 52). On a stone found at Delphi, Gallio is mentioned as procurus of Achaia according to the inscription, or at the beginning of the text. The stone mentions the fact that Claudius had been acclaimed imperator 26 times. By means of another inscription we get the 27th proclamation as imperator in connection with the dedication of an aqueduct on August 1, 52 AD. So thus the 26th time is before this date, some time in the earlier part of Paul's second journey. This year could well be the year of the argument (see Deissmann, op. cit.). Once more we do not get a certain date as to the year. It is either the summer of 51 or 52 AD, when Gallio comes. And Paul has already been in Corinth a year and a half. But the terminus ad quem for the close of Paul's two years' stay in Corinth would be the early autumn of 52 AD, and more probably 51 AD. Hence the 2 Thessalonian Epq cannot be later than this date. Before the close of 52 AD, and before the summer of 51 AD, the second missionary tour, the conference at Jerusalem, the first missionary tour, etc. Deissmann is justified in his enthusiasm on this point. He is positive that 51 AD is the date of the arrival of Gallio.

(6) Paul at Troas according to Acts 20 6 f. On this occasion Luke gives the days and the time of year (Passover). Ramsay figures (St. Paul the Traveller, 289 f) that Paul had his closing service at Troas on Sunday evening and the party left early Monday morning. Hence he argues back to the Passover at Philippi and concludes that the days as given by Luke will not fit into 56, 58, or 59 AD, but will suit 57. If he is correct in this matter, then we should have a definite year for the last trip to Jerusalem. Ramsay insists, over 180 (see), that this year reaches the same conclusion. The logical conclusion is that Luke is exact in his use of days in this passage. Yet Lightfoot insists on 58 AD, but Ramsay has the advantage on this point. See Pauline and Other Studies 264 f.

(7) Festus succeeding Felix.—When was Felix recalled? He was appointed procurator in 52 AD (Schurer, Jewish People in the Time of Christ, I, ii, 174). He was already ruler "many years" (Acts 24 10) when Paul appears before him in Caesarea. He holds on "two years" when he is succeeded by Festus (Acts 24 27). But in the Chronicle of Eusebius (Armenian text) it is stated that the recall of Felix took place in the last year of Claudius, or 54 AD. But this is clearly an error, in spite of the support given to it by Harnack (Chronologie d. Paulus), since Jos puts most of the rule of Felix in the reign of Nero (Ant, XX, viii, 1-9; BJ, II, xii, 8-14), not to mention the "many years" of Paul in Nero's reign. Hence this "two years" has been explained by Erbes in his Tiodadte Pauli und Petri, and made perfectly clear by Ramsay in Pauline and Other Studies, 349 f. Eusebius overlooked the interregnum of 6 years between the death of Herod Agrippa I in 44 AD, and the first year of Herod Agrippa II in 50 AD. Eusebius learned that Festus came in the 10th year of Herod Agrippa II. Counting from 50 AD, that gives us 59 AD as the date of the recall of Felix. This date harmonizes with all the known facts. The great majority of scholars accept the date 60 for Festus; but they confess that it is only an approximate date, and there is no decisive argument for it" (Ramsay, Pauline and Other Studies, 351). For minute discussion of the old arguments see Nash, ar. o. Paulus in the Schweiz Hist of the Jewish People, I, ii, 182 f. But if Erbes and Ramsay are correct, we have at last a date that will stand. So then Paul sails for Rome in the late summer of 59 AD and arrives at his destination in the early spring (third winter, Acts 20 11). He stayed 2 years (Acts 20 10). He had been "two whole years in his own hired dwelling" (28 30) when Luke closes the Acts. On the basis of his release in 63 or early 64 and the journeys of the Pastoral Epis., Paul's death would come in this year. The first mission begins in 67. On this point see later. We can now count back from 59 AD with reasonable clearance to 57 as the date of Paul's arrest in Jerusalem. Paul spent at least a year and three months (Acts 19 8.10) in Ephesus (called in round numbers three years in Acts 20 31), and then we keep the year and a half (from Pentecost (1 Cor 16 8) to Pentecost (Acts 20 16). From the spring of 57 AD we thus get back to the end of 53 as the time of his arrival in Ephesus (Acts 19 1). We have seen that Gallio came to Corinth in the summer of 51 AD (or 52), after Paul had been there a year and a half (Acts 18 11), leaving ample time in either case for the journeys from Corinth to Ephesus, to Caesarea, to Jerusalem apparently (Acts 18 21 f), and to Ephesus (Acts 19 1) from Caesarea. It is then the 2nd missionary tour, the conference at Jerusalem, the first missionary tour, etc.

IV. His Equipment.—Ramsay chooses as the title of ch ii, in his St. Paul the Traveller, the words "The Origin of St. Paul!" It is not possible to explain the work and teaching of Paul without a just conception of the forces that entered into his life. Paul himself is still woefully misunderstood by some. Thus A. Meyer (Jesus or Paul, 1909, 119) says: "In spite of all that has been said, there is no doubt that St. Paul, with his peculiar personality, with his tendency to reconcile gestes speculation and the rabbinic argument, has heavily encumbered the cause of Christianity. For many simple souls, and for many natures that are otherwise constituted than himself, he has barred the way to the simple Gospel story. That is a serious charge to make against the man who claimed to have done more than all the other apostles, and rightly, so far as we can tell (1 Cor 15 10), and who claimed that his interpretation of Jesus was the only true one (Gal 1 7-9)." Mowforth (Pauline and Paulanism, 1910, 70) minimizes the effect of Paulanism: "The majority of Paul's distinctive conceptions were either misunderstood, or dropped, or modified, as the case might be, in the course of a few decades." "Paulanism as a whole stood almost as far apart from the Christianity that followed it as from that which preceded it" (ib, 73). "The aim of some scholars seems to be to rob every great thinker of his originality" (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 1). Ramsay (Pauline and Other Studies, 3 f) boldly challenges the modern prejudice of some scholars against Paul by asking, "Shall we hear evidence or not?" Every successive age must study afresh the life and work of Paul (ib, 27) if it would understand him. Deissmann (St. Paul, 3 f) rightly says that "the whole of Paul's life is the great power of the apostolic age." Hence "the historian cannot begin his chronological account with the beginnings of Christianity, etc. St. Paul as first after Jesus." Feine (Jesus Christus and Paulus, 1902, 298) claims that Paul grasped the essence of the kingdom before Nicodemus in 51 AD, and then was the first to use Ramsay's phrase (Pauline and Other Studies, the crowning glory of Tarsus, the reason for its undying interest to the whole world, is that it produced the apostle Paul; that it was the one city which was respected and in which the Asiatic and the Western spirit to mold the character of the great Hellenist Jew; and that it nourished in him a strong source of loyalty and patriotism as the citizen of no mean city" (Ramsay, op. cit. 235). The city gave him a schooling in his social, political, intellectual, moral, and religious life, but in varying degrees, as we shall see. It was because Tarsus was a cosmopolitan city with "an amalgamated society" that it possessed the peculiar suitability to educate and mold the mind of him who would in due time make the religion of the Jewish race intelligible to the Gr-Rom world" (ib. 88). As a citizen of Tarsus Paul was a citizen of the whole world.

It was no idle boast with Paul when he said, "But I am a Roman born" (Acts 22:28). The chief captain might well be "afraid when he knew that he was a Roman, and became Citizen cause he had bound him" (22:29).

Likewise the magistrates at Philippippi feared what the Roman who was "an amalgamated society" (Acts 16:39), and promptly released Paul and Silas and "asked them to go away from the city." "To the Roman his citizenship was his passport in distant lands, his talisman in seasons of difficulties and danger" (Lightfoot, Cities of St. Paul 70 ff). A citizen of Rome, therefore, Paul stood above the common herd. He ranked with the aristocracy in any provincial town (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 20). He would naturally have a kindly feeling for the Roman government in return for this high privilege and protection. In its pessimism the Rom empire had come to be the world's hope, as seen in the Fourth Eulogium of Virgil (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 49). Paul would seize upon the Roman empire as a fit symbol of the kingdom of heaven. "Our citizenship is in heaven" (Phil 3:20); "Ye are no more strangers and sojourners, but ye are fellow-citizens with the saints" ( Eph 2:19). So he interprets the church in terms of the body politic as well as in terms of the Israelite theocracy ( Col 2:19). "All this shows the deep impression which the Rom institutions made on St. Paul" (Lightfoot, Bib. Essays, 203). Hence, the apostle, under the heading, "Paulinism in the Rom Empire" (Cities of St. Paul, 70 ff). "A universal Paulinism and a universal Empire must either coalesce, or the one must destroy the other." It was Paul's knowledge of the Rom empire that gave him the imperialism and statesmanlike grasp of the problems of Christianity in relation to the Rom empire. Paul was a statesman of the highest type, as Ramsay has conclusively shown (Pauline and Other Studies, 49). He was an educator, a teacher, but remembered as a sort of revivification of the old pagan gods" (Cities of St. Paul, 78). But, as Ramsay says, "it was not dead; it was only waiting its opportunity; it revived when freedom of thought and freedom of life began to stir in Europe; and it guided and stimulated the Protestants of the Reformation."
Suffer Ramsey once more (Pauline and Other Studies, 100): “Barbarism proved too powerful for the Gr-Rom civilization unaided by the new religious bond; and every channel through which that civilization was preserved or interest in it maintained, either directly or through its influence on the Church, has been essential part of its course Christian after the Pauline form.” Paul would show the Roman genius for organizing the churches established by him. Many of his churches would be in Rom colonies (Antioch in Pisidia, Philippoi, Corinth etc). He would address his most studied ep. to the church in Rome, and Rome would be the goal of his ministry for many years (Findlay, HDB). He would show his convergence with Rom law, not merely in knowing how to take advantage of his right as a citizen, but also in the use of legal terms like “adoption” (Gal 4 5 f), where the adopted heir becomes son, and heir and son are interchangeable. This was the obsolete Rom law and the Gr law left in force in the provinces (cf Gal 3 15). But in Rom 8 15 f the actual revolt against Rom law is referred to by which “heirship is now duced from sonship, whereas in Gal sonship is derived from heirship; for at Rome a son must be an heir, but an heir need not be a son (cf He 9 15 ff). This presupposes Rom 9 3), and as Nowry to the right of a Roman citizen (Meyer in 1-vo l HDB). So in Gal 3 24 the tutor or pedagogue presents a Gr custom preserved by the Romans. This personal guardian of the child (often a slave) led him to school, and was not the guardian of the child’s person (Gal 4 14). See Ramsey, Gal, 327-93; Ball, St. Paul and the Rom Law, 1901, for further discussion. As a Roman, Paul would have “nomen and praenomen, probably taken from the Rom officer who gave his family civitas; but Luke, a Graec, gives to Paul. Paulus, his cognomen, was not determined by his nomen; there is no reason to think he was an Ἠρωδίουs (Ramsey, St. Paul the Traveller, 31). It is probable, though not certain, that Paul spoke Latin (see Souter, Ephe, April, 1911). As a Roman citizen, according to tradition, he was beheaded with the sword and not subjected to crucifixion, the traditional fate of Simon Peter. He saw the true χάρις Romana to be the peace that passeth all understanding (Phil 4 7) cf Rostron, The Christology of St. Paul, 1912, 19). It is not possible “to specify all the influences that worked on Paul in his youth” (Ramsey, Cities of St. Paul, 76). We do not know all the personal or educational influences of his time. He turned to his profit and to the advancement of the great purpose of the resources of civilization” (Ramsey, Pauline and Other Studies, 285). Heartily agree with this conception of Paul’s ability to assimilate the life of his time, but one must not be led astray so far as Schrann who, in 1710, wrote De stupenda eruditione Pauli (“On the Stupendous Erudition of Paul”). This is, of course, absurd, as Lightfoot shows (Bib. Essays, 206). But we must not forget Paul lived in a Gr city and possessed Gr citizenship also (Ramsey, St. Paul the Traveller, 31). Certainly did not feel constrained in the use of the distributio and with the ease and familiarity displayed by no other NT writer save Luke and the author of He. He has a “poet’s mastery of language,” though with the passion of a soul on fire, rather than with the artifice of the rhetoricians of the day (Diansmann, Light from the Ancient East, 230 f). Bliss (Die Rhythmen der asiatischen und römischen Kunst prosa, 1905) holds that Paul wrote “rhythmically elaborated artistic prose—a singular instance of the great scholar’s having gone astray” (Deissmann, Light, etc, 64). But there is evidence that Paul was familiar with the use of the distributio and other common rhetorical devices, though he was very far from being tinged with Atticism or Asanism. It is certain that Paul did not attend any of the schools of rhetoric and that he avoided the rhetoricians (cf also Schramm, Philo u. d. kyriakisch-staat. Diatribe, Berlin and Heks, “ποιεῖς P. and Hellenism” in Stud. Bib, IV. How extensive was his acquaintance with Gr lit. is in doubt. Lightfoot says: “There is no ground for saying that St. Paul was a very erudite or highly-cultivated man. An obvious maxim of practical life from Menander 1 Cor 15 34; a resonant home of the Athenian schools. The repeated by Aratus, himself a native of Tarsus (Acts 17 28), a pungent satire of Epimenides (Tit 1 12), with possibly a passage here and there which dimly reflects some classical writer, these are very slender grounds on which to build the supposition of vast learning” (Bib. Essays, 206); but Lightfoot admits that he obtained directly or indirectly from contact with Gr thought and learning lessons far wider and more useful for his work than a perfect knowledge of Atticism and knowledge of the better writers of antiquity. Even so, there is no reason to say that he made his few quotations from hearsay and read no Gr books (cf Zahn, Intro to NT, 52). Certainly he knew the Gr OT and the Jewish Tanakh, and could quote passages in it. He would not admit to had such knowledge of Gr lit. and philosophy as any Jew, living among Greeks, might pick up (Life and Teaching of Paul, 2), and charges Ramsey with “overstating the influence of the gentle environment on Paul’s development” (Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 8). Ramsey holds that it is quite possible that the philosophical school at Tarsus had exercised more influence on Paul than is commonly allowed” (St. Paul the Traveller, 324), a response to the home of the Athenian doctrines. It was a stronghold of Stoic thought. “At least five of the most eminent teachers of that philosophy were in the university” (Alexander, Ethics of St. Paul, 47). It is not possible to say whether Paul attended these or any lectures at the university, though it is hard to conceive that a brilliant youth like Saul could grow up in Tarsus with no mental stimulus from such a university. Garvie (ib, 6) asks when Paul could have studied at the university of Tarsus. He was probably too young before he went to Jerusalem to study under Gamaliel. It is not probable that he remained in Jerusalem continuously after completing his studies till we see him at the death of Stephen (Acts 7 58). He may have returned to Tarsus meanwhile and taken such studies. Another possibility is that he took advantage of the years in Tarsus after his conversion (Acts 9:30; Gal 1:21) to equip himself better for his mission to which he had been called. There is no real difficulty on the score of time. The world was saturated with Gr ideas, and Paul could not escape them. He could not escape it unless he was innocent of all culture. Ramsay sees in Paul a man who could not escape the truth and reality "wholly inconceivable in a more narrow Hebrew, and wholly inexplicable without an education in Gr philosophy" ("St. Paul and Hellenism," Cities of St. Paul, 34).

Paul exhibited a freedom and universalism that he shared with the ancient Greeks. He had thought of the time which was not so decayed as some think. For the discussion between Garvie and Ramsay see Expos, April and December, 1911. Pfeiderer (Urchristentum, Vorwort, 174–75) finds a "double root" of Paulinism, a Christianized Hellenism and a Christianized Pharisaism. Harnack is more nearly correct in saying that "notwithstanding Paul's Gr culture, his conception of Christianity is, in its deepest ground, independent of Hellenism." The Hellenistic influence on Paul was relative and subordinate (Wendland, Die Religion der ersten Jahrhunderte nach Christi Geburt in der Erinnerung des Urchristentum und Christentum, 3te Aufl. 1912, 245), but it was real, as Köhler shows (Zum Verständniss des Apostels Paulus, 9) that Paul had a "Gr inheritance" beyond a doubt, and it was not all unconscious or subconscious as Green has argued (Crowther, The Christian Dogmas, 17). It is true that in Athens the Stoics and Epicureans ridiculed Paul as a "picker up of learning's erubescens"—Browning's rendering (An Epistle of St. Paul, 30) of στυχωμένος, σερμωλογος. Paul shows a fine scorn of the sophistries and verbal histrionics of the more philosophers and orators in 1 Cor 1 and 2, but all the same he reveals a real apprehension of the true significance of knowledge and life. Dr. James Adam (The Religious Teachers of Greece, 360) shows instances of "the real kinship of thought between Plato and St. Paul." He does not undertake to say how it came about. He has a Platonic expression, τά διὰ τοῦ σώματος, τά διὰ τοῦ σώματος, in 2 Cor 6:10, and uses a Stoic and cynic word in 2 Cor 9:8, αἰθρίοι, αὐθρίοι. Indeed, there are so many similarities between Paul and Seneca in language and thought that some scholars actually predicate an acquaintance or dependence of the one on the other. It is far more likely that Paul and Seneca discussed many common topics, and were influenced by the same sources, than that Seneca had seen Paul's Ep., or knew him personally. Lightfoot has a classic discussion of the matter in his essay on "St. Paul and Seneca" in the Comm. on Phil (see also Carr, St. Paul's Attitude to Gr Philosophy, Expos, v. ix). Alexander finds four Stoic ideas (Divine Immanence, Wisdom, Freedom, Brotherhood) taken and glorified by Paul to do service for Christ (Ethics of St. Paul, 49–55). Often Paul uses a Stoic phrase with a Christian content. Lightfoot suggests (Bible Essays, 207) that the later Gr lit. was a fitter handmaid for the diffusion of the gospel than the earlier.

Paul as the apostle to the Gr-Rom world had to "understand the bearings of the moral and religious life of Greece as expressed in her literature, and this lesson he could learn more impartially and more fully at Tarsus in the days of her decline than at Athens in the freshness of her glory" (ib). Ramsay waxes bold enough to discuss "the Pauline philosophy of history" (Cities of St. Paul, 10–13). I confess to sympathy with him in his rejection and finding all the Pauline ep., esp. in Rom. Moffatt (Paul and Paulinism, 66) finds "a religious philosophy of history" in Rom 9–11, throbbing with strong personal emotion. Paul rose to the height of the true Christian philosopher, though not a technical philosopher of the schools. Deissmann (St. Paul, 83) admits his language assigns him "to an elevated class," and yet he insists that he wrote "large letters" (Gal 6:11) because he had "the clumsy, awkward writing of a workman's hand" (p. 51). I can not agree that here Deissmann understands Paul. He makes "the world of St. Paul" on too narrow a scale.

Was Paul influenced by Mithraism? H. A. A. Kennedy has given the subject very careful and thorough treatment in a series of papers in Expos for 1912–13, already mentioned (see II, 5, above). His arguments are conclusive on the whole but he fails of the wild notions of W. B. Smith, Der vorschrichtliche Jesus; J. M. Robertson, Pagan Chrest, A. Drews, Die Christus-Mythe; and Lublinski, Die Entstehung des Christentums aus der antiken Kultur. A magic papyrus about 300 AD has "I adjure thee in the god the Hebrew Jesus" (II, 3019 f.), but Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East, 256) refuses to believe this line genuine: "No Christian, still less a Jew, would have called Jesus 'the god of the Hebrews.'" Clemen (Primitive Christianity and Its Monoy-Jewish Sources, 1912, 336) has made the same discovery that Paul was the author of those "Mithraic" epistles which he mentions in 1 Cor. 15:31. He rests his case on what he found in the 1st cent. AD "one cannot speak of non-Jewish influences on Christianity." One may dismiss at once the notion that Paul "defied" Jesus into a god and made Him Christ under the influence of pagan mystagogues (cf. 1 Cor. 15). One can read Rom 1 and 2 and believe that Paul was carried away by the philosophy of vain deceit of his time. He does use the words "wisdom" and "mystery" often in 1 Cor, Col, and Eph, and in Phil 4:12, "I have learned the secret," he uses a word employed in the mystic cults of the time. It is quite possible that Paul took up some of the phrases of these mystery-religions and gave them a richer content for his own purposes, as he did with some of the gnostic phraseology (Pitarome, "fulness," for instance). But Schweitzer (Paul and His Interpreters, 191 f.) deals a fatal blow against the notion that the mystery-religions had a formative influence on Paul. He urges, with point, that it is only in the 2d cent. that these current Gentile sects were set up as a rival to the empire. The dates and development are obscure, but it is "certain that Paul cannot have known the mystery-religions in the form in which they are known to us, because in this fully developed form they did not exist." Cumont (Les religions orientales dans le paganisme romain, 2d ed. 1909 [ET]) insists repeatedly on the difficulties in the way of assuming without proof that Mithraism had any influence on Paul. But in particular it is urged that Paul drew on the "mystery religions," but not on the Lord's Supper as having magical effects. Appeal is made to the magical use of the name of Jesus by the strolling Jewish exorcists in Ephesus (Acts 18:13 ff.). Kirsopp Lake (Earlier Ep. of St. Paul, 253) holds that at Corinth they all accepted Christianity as a mystery-religion and Jesus as "the Redeemer-God, who had passed through death to life, and offered participation in this new life to those who shared in the mysteries which He offered," viz. baptism and the Lord's Supper. Tomlinson (Expos, December, 1912, 545) easily shows how with Paul baptism and the Lord's Supper are not magical sacraments producing new life, but symbolic pictures of death to sin and new life in Christ which the believer has already experienced. The experience is still raging on the subject of the mystery-religions, but it is safe to say that so far nothing more than illustrative material has been shown to be true of Paul's teaching from this source.

There is nothing incongruous in the notion that Paul knew not only the philosophy of the Stoics and the Cynics but also the Gnostics. Indeed the two things may have been to some extent combined in some places. A passage in 2 Cor. 11:38 has long been considered a quotation from Rabbinic literature, "dwelling in things which he hath seen." or (m) "taking him for a god," etc. One explanation is that Paul was influenced by his teacher, Gamaliel, who was educated in the schools of the Sages of Hillel. This is supported by the fact that Paul himself, in addition to his knowledge of the religious life of the Jews (cf Independent, 1913, 376). Clearly, then, Paul uses the word in that sense in Col 2 18.

For further discussion see Jacoby, Die hellenistischen Mysterierritgen und das Christentum; Glover, Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire; Friedlander, Die hellenistischen Mysterieritgen; Friedländer, Rom Life, and Manners under the Early Empire, III: Thorburn, Jesus Christ, Historical or Mythical.

M. Brückner (Der sterbende und aufstehende Gotttheil in den orientalischen Religions und ihr Verhältnis zu Christentum, 1908) says: "As in Christianity, so in many oriental religions, a belief in the resurrection of a Redeemer-God (sometimes as His Son) occupied a central place in the worship and cultus." To this Schweitzer (Paul and His Interpreters, 193) replies: "What manipulations the myths and rites of the cults in question must have undergone before his general statement could become possible! Where is there anything about dying and resurrection in Mitthra?" There we may leave the matter.

Paul was Gr and Rom, but not "pan-Bab," though he was always free to all the winds of doctrine that blew about, as we see it.

But he was most of all the Jew, that is, before his conversion. He remained a Jew, even though he learned how to be all things to all men (1 Cor 9 22). Even though glowing in his mission as apostle to the Gentiles (Eph 3 8), he yet always put the Jew first in opportunity and peril (Rom 2 9 f). He loved the Jews almost to the point of death (Rom 9 3). He was proud of his Jewish lineage and boasted of it (2 Cor 11 16 22; Acts 22 3 ff; 36 4 ff; Phil 3 4 6). "His religious patriotism flickered up within his Christianity" (Moffatt, Paul and Paulinism, 60). Had he been a Pharisee in the cities of Galilee and his rich endowments of mind, he would probably have not been the "chosen vessel" for the work of Christ among the Gentiles (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 15). Had he not been the thorough Jew, he could not have meditated Christianity from Jew to Greek. "In the mind of Paul a universalized Hellenism coalesced with a universalized Hebraism" (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 43). Ramsay strongly opposes the notion of Harnack and others that Paul can be understood "as purely a Hebrew." So Paul both Hebraism and Hellenism meet, though Hebraism is the main stock. He is a Jew in the Gr-Rom world and a part of it, not a mere spectator. He is the Hellenistic Jew, not the Aram. Jew of Pal (cf Simon Peter's vision on the house-top at Joppa, for instance). But Paul is not a Hellenizing Jew after the fashion of Jason and Menelaus in the beginning of the Maccabean conflict. Findlay (HDh) tersely says: "The Jew in him was the foundation of everything that he was, that he did, that he thought. It was the supreme type of Judaism in spite of his persecution of the Christians. He belonged to the Judaism of the Dispersion. As a Rom citizen in a Gr city he had departed from the narrowest lines of his people (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 47). His Judaism was pure, in fact, as he gives it to us in Phil 3 5. He was a Jew of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin. He was a Hebrew, of the seed of Abraham (2 Cor 11 22). He shared in full all the covenant blessings and promises of Israel (Rom 15 13)." But this, whose crowning glory was, that of them came Jesus the Messiah. He was proud of the piety of his ancestors (2 Tim 1 3), and made progress as a student of Jewish Aheadness of his fellows (Gal 1 14). His ancestry was pure, Hebrew of the Hebrews (Phil 2 5), and so his family preserved the native Palestinian traditions in Tarsus. His name Saul was a proof of loyalty to the tribe of Benjamin as his cognomen Paul was evidence of his Rom citizenship. In his home he would be taught the law by his mother (cf Gal 1 14), and called Timothy by his mother and grandmother (2 Tim 1 5). In Tarsus he would go to the synagogue also. We know little of his father, save that he was a Rom citizen and so a man of position in Tarsus and possibly of some wealth; that he was a tent-maker and taught his son the same trade, as all Jewish fathers did, whatever their rank in life; that he was a Pharisee and brought up his son as a Pharisee (Acts 23 6), and that he sent the young Saul to Jerusalem to study at the feet of Gamaliel. This Paul had considered himself a Pharisee as distinct from the Suddaica scoeciasm (23 6). Many of the Pharisaic doctrines were identical with those of Christianity. That Paul did not consider himself a Pharisee in all respects is shown by his comparison with the Pharisees (Gal 2; Acts 15; 2 Cor 10 13). Paul says that he was reared as a strict Pharisee (Acts 26 5), though the school of Gamaliel (grandson of Hillel) was not so hard and narrow as that of Shammai. But all Pharisaic readings of the Pentateuch are present in Acts 22. Paul was fortunate in his great teacher Gamaliel, who was liberal enough to encourage the study of Gr lit. But his liberality in defending the apostles against the Sadducees in Acts 5 34 39 must not be misinterpreted in comparison with the persecuting zeal of his brilliant pupil against Stephen (7 58). Stephen had opened war on the Pharisees themselves, and there is no evidence that Gamaliel made a defence of Stephen against the lawless rage of the Sanhedrin. It is common for pupils to go farther than their teachers, but it does not come to the rescue. Still Gamaliel helped Saul, who was undoubtedly his most brilliant pupil and probably the hope of his heart for the future of Judaism. Harnack (History of Dogma, I, 94) says: "Pharisaism had fulfilled its mission in the world when it produced this man." Unfortunately, Pharisaism did not die; in truth has never died, not even from Christianity. But young Saul was the crowning glory of Pharais. An effort has recently been made to restore Pharaism to its former dignity. Herford (Pharaism, Its Aim and Method, 1912) undertakes to show that the Gospels have slandered Pharaism, that it was the one hope of the ancient world, etc. He has a chapter on "Pharaism and Paul," in which he claims that Paul has not attacked the real Pharaism, but has aimed his blow at an unreal creation of his own brain (p. 222). But, if Paul did not understand Pharaism, he did not understand anything. He knew not merely the OT but the Heb, and quotes from both, though usually from the LXX, but he also knew the Jewish Apoc and apocalypses, as is shown in various ways in his writings (see arts. on these subjects). Schweitzer (Paul and His Interpreters) carries too far his idea that Paul and Jesus merely moved in the circle of Jews eschatology. He makes it explain everything, and that it cannot do. But Paul does show acquaintance with some of these books. See Kennedy, St. Paul’s Concept of the Last Things (1904), for a sane and adequate discussion of this phase of the subject. Pfeiderer pursues the subject in his Paulinism, as does Kabisch in his Eschatologie. So Sanday and Headlam use this book on Rom. Paul knew Wied, also, a book from the Jewish-Alexandrian theology with a tinge of Gr philosophy (see Goodrick, Book of Wied, 398-403; cf also Jowett’s essay on “St. Paul and Philo” in his Epp. of St. Paul). Paul seems to use allegory (Gal 4:24) in accord with the method of Philo, but he knew how to use the Stoic diatribe, the rabbinic diatribe and the Alexandrian allegory. “In his cosmology, angelology, and demonology, as well as eschatology, he remains essentially Jewish” (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 17). When he becomes a Christian he will change many of his views, for Christ must become central in his thinking, but his method learned in the rabbinic schools remains with him (Kohler, Zum Verständnis, etc.). Here, then, is a man with a wonderfully cultured mind. What of his mental gifts?

Much as we can learn about the times of Paul (cf Selden, In the Time of Paul, 1900, for a brief sketch of Paul’s world), we know something of the personality of the 1st cent. AD, the religious condition of the age, the moral standards of the time, the intellectual tendencies of the period. New discoveries continue to throw fresh light on the life of the middle and lower classes among whom Paul chiefly labored. And, if Deissmann in his brilliant study (St. Paul, A Study in Social and Religious History) has pressed too far the notion that Paul the tent-maker ranks not with Origen, but with Amos the herdman (p. 6, on p. 52 he calls it a mistake “to speak of St. Paul the artisan as a proletarian in the sense which the word usually bears with us”), yet he is right in insisting that Paul is “a religious genius” and “a hero of piety” (p. 6). It is not possible to explain the personality and work of a man like Paul by his past and to refer with precision this or that trait to his Jewish or Gr training (Alexander, Ethics of St. Paul, 58). “We must allow something to remain in a sense the children of the past, but some men have much more the power of initiative than others. Paul is not mere ‘eclectic patchwork’ (Bruce, St. Paul’s Conception of Christ, 218). Even if Paul was acquainted with Philo, the fact by no means explains his use of Philo, the representative Jew of the Hellenistic age. “Both are Jews of the Dispersion, city-dwellers, with marked cosmopolitan traits. Both live and move in the LXX Bible. Both are capable of mystical experience, and have many points of contact in detail. And yet they stand in very strong contrast to one another, a contrast which reminds us of the opposition between Seneca and St. Paul. . . . Philo is a philosopher, St. Paul the fool pours out the vials of his irony upon the wisdom of the world” (Deissmann, St. Paul, 110). Deissmann, indeed, cares most for “the living man, Paul, whom we hear speaking and see gesticulating, here player, but a father, and tenderly coaxing, so as to win the heart, the inner soul, there thundering and lightning with the passionate wrath of a Luther, with cutting irony and bitter sarcasm on his lips” (ib, 16 f.).

1. Personal appearance.—We have no reliable description of Paul’s stature and features. The Acts of St. Paul (§ 83) have a protracted thus: “Baldheaded, bowlegged, strongly built, a man small in size, with meeting eyebrows, with a rather large nose, full of grace, for at times he looked like a man and at times he looked like a god. Paul and Ramsay (Church in the Rom Empire, 32) adds: “This plain and unflattering account of the apostle’s personal appearance seems to embody a very early tradition, and in ch xvi he argues that this story goes back to the documentary evidence. We may not agree with all the details, but in some respects it harmonizes with what we gather from Paul’s Epp. Findlay (HDB) notes that this description is confirmed by “the life-like and unconventional figure of the Rom ivory diptych, supposed to date not later than the 4th cent. We see a Paul who knew how to use the Stoic diatribe, the rabbinic diatribe and the Alexandrian allegory. “In his cosmology, angelology, and demonology, as well as eschatology, he remains essentially Jewish” (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 17). 1. Personal appearance.—We have no reliable description of Paul’s stature and features. The Acts of St. Paul (§ 83) have a protracted thus: “Baldheaded, bowlegged, strongly built, a man nor struggle with lust (Roman Catholic, stimulus carnis). Garvie (Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 65, 80) thinks it not unlikely that "it was the recurrence of an old violent temptation, rather than mere lust..." There is still no doubt that this form of temptation is more likely to assail the man of intense emotion and intense affection, as Paul was?"

But enough of what can never be settled. "St. Paul's own scanty hints admonish to caution" (Deissmann, St. Paul, 63). It is a blessing for us not to know, since we can all cherish a close bond with Paul. Ramsey (St. Paul the Traveller, 37 f) calls special attention to the look of Paul. He "fastened his eyes on" the man (Acts 13:19) and argues that he had a penetrating, powerful gaze, and hence eye trouble. He calls attention also to gestures of Paul (Acts 20:24; 26:2). There were artists in marble and color at the court of Caesar, but no one of them could preserve a likeness of the intense preacher who turned out to be the chief man of the age (Deissmann, St. Paul, 58). "We are like the Christians of Colossae and Laodicea, who had not seen his face in the flesh" (Col 2:1).

(2) His natural endowments.—In respect to his moral nature we can do much better, for his epp. reveal the mind and soul of the man. He is difficult to comprehend, not because he conceals himself, but because he reveals so much of himself in his epp. He seems to some a man of contradictions. He had a many-sided nature, and his very humanness is in one sense the greatest thing about him. There are "great polar contradictions" in his nature. Deissmann (St. Paul, 62 f) notes his ailing body and his tremendous powers for work, his impulsive, self-confident, his periods of depression and of intoxication with victory, his tenderness and his sternness; he was ardently loved and furiously hated; he was an ancient man of his time, but he is cosmopolitan and modern enough for today. Findlay (HBD) adds that he was a man possessed of dialectical power and religious inspiration. He was keenly intellectual and profoundly mystical (cf Campbell, Paul the Mystic, 1907). He was a theologian and a man of affairs. He was a man of vision with a supreme task to which he held himself. He was a scholar, a sage, a statesman, a seer, a saint (Garvie, Studies in Paul and His Gospel, 68-84). He was a man of heart, of passion, of imagination, of sensibility, of will, of courage, of sincerity, of subtlety, of humor, of audacity, of tact, of genius for organization, of power for command, of gift of expression, of leadership—"All these qualities and powers went to the making of Jesus Christ's apostle to the nations, the master-builder of the universal church and of Christian theology" (Findlay, HDB; see Lock, St. Paul the Master Builder, 1905; and M. Jones, St. Paul the Orator, 1910).

I cannot agree with Garvie's charge of cowardice (Love and Teaching of Paul, 175) in the matter of the putting to death (Acts 26) and the writing of the Sanhedrin (23 6). The one was a mere matter of prudence, the other a non-essential, the latter was justifiable in resisting the attack of unscrupulous enemies. One does not understand Paul who does not understand his emotional nature. He was quick, impetuous, strenuous, impassioned" (Brevan, St. Paul in the Light of Today, 1920). It thrusts through his epp. He loves his converts like a mother or a lover (Findlay, HBD) rather than a pastor. We forgot the emotional nature of Paul when we居于 the momentary lapses of his personality. He has elasticity and rebound of spirit, and comes up with the joy of victory in Christ out of the second and third half of his life. The words of 1 Cor. 13:2-7 are great, but it is to serve Christ his Lord. He is a man of faith and a man of prayer. For him "love is Christ. He is the love which is the bond of friendship and binds men together. He is the hook of steel—men like Barnabas, Silas, Timothy, Luke, Titus (Scoot, The Man Paul, 1906, 111 f). He is not afraid to oppose his friends when it is necessary for the sake of truth, with Peter (Gal 2 11 ff) and with Barnabas (Acts 15:39). While Paul was like the other apostles out of the clay whereof ordinary men are made and fashioned, you may say that he was also a "saint with his education" (Fairbairn, Studies in Religion and Theology, 471). If ever a man, full-blooded and open-eyed, with the earth, with the world, with Paul. It is impossible to answer the question whether Paul was married or not. He certainly was married when he wrote the Epistles. It is possible that he was a member of the Sanhedrin when he cast his vote against the disciples (Acts 26:10), as his language naturally means (Ramsay, St. Paul, 240).

There is in Paul the gift of leadership in a marked degree. He, though young, is already at the head of the opposition to Stephen (Acts 7:8), and soon drives the disciples out of Jerusalem. (3) His supernatural gifts.—He had his share of them. He had all the gifts that others could boast of at Corinth, and which he lightly esteemed except that of prophecy (1 Cor 14:18-29). He had his visions and revelations, but would not tell what he had seen (2 Cor 12:1-9). He did the signs of an apostle (2 Cor 12:12-14). He had the power to work miracles (1 Cor 4:19-21) and to exercise discipline (1 Cor 5:4 ff; 2 Cor 13:1-3). But what he cared for most of all was the fact that Jesus had appeared to him on the road to Damascus and had called him to the work of preaching to the Gentiles (1 Cor 15:8).

No other element in the equipment of Paul is comparable in importance to his conversion. (1) Preparation.—It was sudden. 7. Conversion and yet God had led Saul to the state of mind when it could more easily happen. True, Saul was engaged in the very act of persecuting the believers in Jerusalem. His mind was flushed with the sense of victory. He was not conscious of any lingering doubts about the truth of his position and the justice of his conduct till Jesus suddenly told him that it was hard for him to kick against the goad (Acts 26:14). It was suddenly brought to bay, the real truth would flash upon his mind. In later years he tells how he had struggled in vain against the curse of the Law (Rom 7:7). It is probable, though not certain, that Paul here has in mind his experience before his conversion, though the latter part of the chapter may refer to a period later. There is difficulty in either view as to the "body of this death" that made him so wretched (Rom 7:24). The Christian keeps up the fight against sin in spite of the fact (7:25). He does not feel that he is "carnal, sold under sin" (7:14). But when before his conversion did Paul have such intensity of conviction? We can only leave the problem unanswered. His reference to it at least harmonizes with what Jesus had said to him that he was to be the "great missionary" and not to the "goad. The words and death of Stephen and the other disciples may have left a deeper mark than he knew. The question might arise whether after all the Nazarenes were right. His plea for his conduct made in later years was that he was conscientious (Acts 26:9) and that he did it ignorantly in unbelief (1 Tim 1:13). He was not wilfully sinning against the full light as he saw it. It will not do to say with Holsten that Saul was half-converted to join the disciples, and only needed a jolt to turn him over. He was "yet breathing threatening and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord" (Acts 9:1), and went to the high priest and asked for letters to Damascus demanding the arrest of the disciples there. He was at a boiling point when he saw Paul. Saul was not in a mood of easy submission to the doctors. That could be true only in case Paul was born 5 or 6 BC, which is quite unlikely. It is possible again that Paul may have remained in Jesus after leaving the school of Gamaliel and have spent time in Jerusalem. He now appears in Acts 9:1-19. It was a strange transformation, but we have no express statement to this effect in the letter of Paul, when he states emphatically that he was not a party to the death of Christ. (Wynne, Pronouncing Records of Jesus of Nazareth, 1857.) It is almost certain, in view of Acts (Paul and Ananias, Acts 9:1, the portion that Paul himself adds). 1 Cor 15:1 Paul refers to the risen Jesus. The passage in 2 Cor 15:3 is argued both ways: Wherefore we believe that we shall also dwell with him; even though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now we know him spiritually. (ib. 1, 5-11) it is his strong faith in the view that he knew Jesus in the flesh. But in the first clause of the sentence above Paul means by "after the flesh," as a result of a personal and spiritual encounter. It is natural to take it in the same way as applied to Christ. He has changed his viewpoint of Christ and so of all men. Weiss pleads (ib. p. 40), at any rate, that we have no word saying that "Paul had seen Jesus in person." It may be left in abeyance as not vitaly important. He certainly had not understood Jesus, if he knew Him.

(2) Experience. Experiences do not permit a discussion of this great event of Paul's conversion at all commensurate with its significance. A literature of this kind has grown up around it. It has led to lengthy discussions in the lives and theologies of Paul (see e.g. Lord Lyttleton's famous Observations on Saul's Conversion, 1774; Fletcher's A Study of the Conversion of St. Paul, 1910; Gardner, The Spiritual Experience of St. Paul, 1915: Muggah, The Spiritual Experience of St. Paul). All sorts of theories have been advanced to explain on naturalistic grounds this great experience of Christ in the life of Paul. It has been urged that Paul had an epileptic fit, that he had a sunstroke, that he fell of his horse to the ground, that he was led by a flash of lightning, that he imagined that he saw Jesus as a result of his highly wrought nervous state, that he deliberately re-converted Judaism because of the growing conviction that the disciples were right. But none of these explanations explains. More prejudice against the supernatural, such as is shown by Weinel in his Paulus, and by Holsten in his able book (Zum Evangelium d. Paulus und Petrus), cannot solve this problem. He must be willing to hear the evidence. There were witnesses of the bright light (Acts 26:13) and of the sound (9:7) which only Paul understood (22:9), as he alone beheld Jesus. It is claimed by some that Paul had a true epileptic fit, and did not see Jesus with his eyes. Denny (Standard Bible Dict.) replies that it is not a pertinent objection. Jesus (in 21:1) "manifested" Himself, and Paul says that he "saw" Jesus (1 Cor 9:1), that Jesus "appeared" (1 Cor 15:8) to him. Hence it was both subjective and objective. But the reality of the event was as clear to Paul as in his own existence. The account is given 3 t in Acts (chs. 9, 25, 26) in substantial agreement, with a few varying details. In ch 9 the historical narrative occurs, in ch 22 Paul's defence before the mob in Jerusalem is given, and in ch 26 we have the apology before Agrippa. There are no contradictions of moment, save that in ch 26 Jesus Himself is represented as giving directly to Paul the call to the Gentiles while in chs. 9 and 22 it is conveyed through Ananias (the fuller and more accurate account). There is no need to notice the apparent contradiction between 9:7 and 22:9, for the difference in case in the Gr gives a difference in sense, hearing the sound, with the genitive, and not in substance, as with the accusative. Findlay (HBD) remarks that the conversion of Paul is a psychological and ethical problem which cannot be accounted for save by Paul's own interpretation of the change wrought in him. He saw Jesus and surrendered to Him.

(3) Effect on Paul. His surrender to Jesus was instantaneous and complete: "What shall I do, Lord?" (Acts 22:10). He could not see for the glory of that light (22:11), but he had already changed the light of the world's knowledge of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. 4:6). The god of this world could blind him no longer. He had seen Jesus, and all else had lost charm for Paul. There is infinite pathos in the picture of the blind Saul led by the hand (Acts 9:8) into Damascus. All the pride of power is gone, all the lust for vengeance.

The fierceness of the name of Saul is well shown in the dread that Ananias has and the protest that he makes to the Lord concerning him (9:10-14). Ananias does not think that the Lord had made a strange choice of a vessel to bear the message of Christ to the Gentiles, kings, and the children of Israel (9:15), but there was hope in the promise of chastisement to him (9:16). So he went, and called him "Brother Saul." Saul was filled with the Holy Spirit, the scales fell from his eyes, he was baptized. And now what next? What did the world hold in store for the proud seer of Judaism who had renounced power, place, pride for the lowly Nazarene? He went back to Damascus, and some in Damascus would have none of him now. Would the disciples receive him? They did. "And he was certain days with the disciples that were at Damascus" (9:9). Ananias vouched for him by his own sight. Jesus Christ (Acts 9:19) appeared to him and went boldly into the synagogues and "proclaimed Jesus, that he is the Son of God!" (9:20).

This was a public commitment and a proclamation of his new creed. There was tremendous path and point in this announcement from the lips of Saul, who was now an amazed (Acts 9:21). This is the core of Paul's message as we see it in his later ministry (Acts 13:17). It rests at bottom on Paul's own experience of grace: "His whole theology is nothing but the explanation of his own conversion" (Stalker, Life of St. Paul, 45). We need not argue (Garvie, Studies of Paul and His Gospel, 51) that Paul understood at once the whole content of the new message, but he had the heart of it right. V. Work. There was evidently a tumult in Paul's soul. He had undergone a revolution, both intellectual and spiritual. Before he proceeded farther it was wise to think through the most important implications of the new truths of the gospel. He gives no account of this personal phase of Paul's career, but he allows room for it between Acts 9 and 22. It is Paul who tells of his retirement to Arabia (Gal 1:17) to prove his independence of the apostles in Jesus. He did not go to them for instruction or for ecclesiastical authority. He did not adopt the merely traditional view of Jesus as the Messiah. He knew, of course, the Christian contention well enough, for he had answered it often enough. But now his old arguments were gone and he must work his way round to the other side, and be able to put his new gospel with clearness and force. He was done with calling Jesus anathema (1 Cor 12:3). Henceforth to him Jesus is Lord. We know nothing of Paul's life in Arabia nor in what part of Arabia he was. He may have gone to Mt. Sinai and thought out grace in the atmosphere of law, but that is not necessary. But it is clear that Paul grew in apprehension of the things of Christ during these years, and gathered strength for his work. But he did not grow away from the first clear vision of Christ. He claimed that God had revealed His Son in him that he might preach to the Gentiles (Gal 1:16). He claimed that from the first and to the very last. The undertone is one of love in Paul's Epp. (see Matheson, Spiritual Development of St. Paul, and Sabatier, The Apostle Paul) is, however, not a changing view of Christ that nullifies Paul’s "original Christian inheritance" (Kohler, 2nd ed. of "Apostles Paulus," 15). Pfeiffer ("Influence of the Apostle Paul in the Development of Christianity," 3d ed., 1897, 217) rejects Col because of the advanced Christology here found. But the Christology of Col is implicit in Paul’s first sermon at Damascus. "It is impossible to escape the conclusion that the significance and value of the Cross became clear to him almost simultaneously with the certainty of the resurrection and of the Messiahship of Jesus" (Garvie, Studies, etc., 57). The narrow Jew has surrendered to Christ, who demands for the sake of the universal gospel has taken hold of his mind and heart, and it will work out its logical consequences in Paul. The time in Arabia is not wasted. When he reappears in Damascus (Acts 9 22) he has "developed faith" (Findlay, HDB) and energy that bear instant fruit. He is now the slave of Christ. For him henceforth to live is Christ. He is crucified with Christ. He is in Christ. The union of Paul with Christ is the real key to his life. It is far more sublime a thing for him to have fellowship with Christ (Deissmann, St. Paul, 123). Thus it is that the man who probably never saw Christ in the flesh understands him best (Wernle, Beginnings of Christianity, 1, 135). He sustained the mission of his strength, and confounded the Jews that dwelt in Damascus, proving that this is the Christ" (Acts 9 22).

2. Opposition (Acts 9 22). Now he not merely "proclaims" as before (9 20); he "proves." It is now his purpose to work with such nervous skill that the Jews are first confounded, then enraged to the point of murder. Their former hero was now their foe. The disciples had learned to run from Saul. They now let him down in a basket through the wall by night and he is gone (Acts 9 23 f). This then is the beginning of the active ministry of the man who was called to be a chosen vessel to Gentiles, kings, and Jews. There was no need to go back to the wilderness. He had gotten his bearings clearly now. He had his message and it had his whole heart. He had not avoided Jesus because he despised flesh and blood, but because he had no need of light from the apostles since "the Divine revelation so completely absorbed his interest and absorbed his life:" (Acts 9 15). Saul, then, was open. No door was open as yet among the Gentiles. Sooner or later he must go to Jerusalem and confer with the leaders there if he was to cooperate with them in the evangelization of the world. Saul knew that he would be an object of suspicion to the disciples in Jerusalem. That was inevitable in view of the past. It was best to go, but he did not wish to ask any favors of the apostles. Indeed he went in particular "to visit Cephas" (in Acts 15 1) "to become acquainted with him" (Acts 15 37). They had been enemies, of course, as opponents. But Saul comes now with the olive branch to his old enemy. He expressly explains (Gal 1 19) that he saw no other apostle. He did see James, the Lord’s brother, who was not one of the Twelve. It seems that at first Peter and James were both afraid of Saul (Acts 9 26), "not believing that he was a disciple." If a report came 3 years before of the doings at Damascus, they had discounted it. All had been quiet, and now Saul suddenly appears in Jerusalem in a new rôle. It was, therefore, a surprise when the doings of Saul were reported to Barnabas, Saul might not have had that visit of 15 days with Peter. Barnabas was a Hellenist of Cyprus and believed Saul’s story and stood by him. Thus he had his opportunity to preach the gospel in Jerusalem, perhaps in the very synagogues in which he and Stephen, and now he is, taking Stephen’s place and is disputing against the Grecian Jews (Acts 9 29). He had days of blessed fellowship (9 28) with the disciples, till the Grecian Jews sought to kill him as Saul had helped to do to Stephen (Acts 9 29). By the grace of Damascus, but Saul did not wish to run again so soon. He protested to the Lord Jesus, who spoke in a vision to him, and recalls the fate of Stephen, but Jesus bids him go: "For I will send thee forth a renegade Jew. There were apparently no Christians in Tarsus, unless some of the disciples driven from Jerusalem by Saul himself went that far, as they did go to Antioch (Acts 11 19 f). But Saul was not idle, for he probably understood Syria and Cilicia durings this "period of obscurity" (Denney, Standard Bible Dict.) as a thing known to the churches of Judaea (Gal 1 21 f). He was not idle then. The way was not yet opened for formal resistance upon the mission of the Gentiles, but Saul was not the man to do nothing at home because of that. If they would not hear him at Damascus and Jerusalem, they would in the regions of Syria and Cilicia, his home province. We are left in doubt as to what first began Saul’s work to Gentiles or to Gentiles also. He had the specific call to preach to the Gentiles, and there is no reason why he should not have done so in this province, preaching to the Jews first as he did afterward. He did not have the seraples of Simon Peter to overcome. When he appears at Antioch with Barnabas, he seems to take hold like an old hand at the business. It is quite probable, therefore, that this obscure ministry of some 8 or 10 years may have had more results than we know. Paul apparently felt that he had done his work in that region, for outside of Antioch he gives no time to it except that in starting out on the second tour from Antioch "he went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches" (Acts 16 1), and meeting of this early ministry and apparently containing Gentiles also. Better from the Jerusalem conference was addressed to the brethren who are of the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia (Acts 16 23). Cilicia was now part of the Roman province of Syria. So then we conclude that Saul had a gentle ministry in this region. "Independently, under no human master, he learned his business as a missionary to the heathen" (Findlay, HDB). One can but wonder what Saul would have accomplished if he had not been so kindly received at home by his father and mother. They had looked upon him with pride as the possible successor of Gamaliel, and now he is a follower of the despised Nazarene and a preacher of the Cross. It is possible that his own exhortations to fathers not to provoke their children to wrath (Eph 6 4) may imply that his own father had cast him out at that time. Findlay (HDB) argues that Saul would not have remained in this region so long if his home relations had been altogether hostile. It is a severe test of character to stand alone against one. But Saul turned defeat to glorious gain.

Most scholars hold that the ecstatic experience told by Paul in 2 Cor 12 1–9 took place before he came to Antioch. If we count the years strictly, 14 from 56 AD would bring us to 42 AD. Paul had spent a year in Antioch before going up to Jerusalem.
Paul, the Apostle

(Ac 11 29 f.). Findlay (HDB) thinks that Paul had the visions before he received the call to come to Antioch. Garvie (Life and Teaching of Paul, 41) refers to the call first. "Such a mood of exaltation would account for the vision to which he refers in 2 Cor 12 1-4." At any rate he had the vision with its exaltation and the thorn in the flesh with its humiliation before he came to Antioch in response to the invitation of Barnabas. He had undoubtedly had a measure of success in his work in Cilicia and Syria. He had the seal of the Divine blessing on his work among the Gentiles. But there was a pang of disappointment over the advance towards the work. He had apparently left alone to his own resources. "Only such a feeling of disappointment can explain the tone of his references to his relations to the apostles (Gal 1 11-24)" (Garvie, Life and Teaching of Paul, 41). There is no bitterness in this tone—but puzzled surprise. It seems that the 12 apostles are more or less absent from Jerusalem during this period with James the brother of the Lord Jesus as chief elder. A narrow Pharisaic element in the church was in the fight to stop the church in its attitude toward the Gentiles. This is clear in the treatment of Peter, when he returned to Jerusalem after the experience at Caesarea with Cornelius (Acts 11 1-18). There was an acquisitive clique who noticed an exceptional case of the Lord's doing. Hence they show concern over the spread of the gospel to the Greeks at Antioch, and send Barnabas to investigate and report (Acts 11 19-22). Barnabas was a Hellenist, and evidence does not show him for a moment in the Pharisaic party in the church at Jerusalem (11 2), for he was glad (11 23 f.) of the work in Antioch. Probably minded of the disciple attempted on Simon Peter, he refrained from going back at once to Jerusalem. Moreover, he believed in Saul and his work, and thus he gave him his great opportunity at Antioch. They had there a year's blessed work together (11 25 ff). So great was the outcome that the disciples received a new name to distinguish them from the Gentiles and the Jews. But the term "Christian" did not become general for a long time. There was then a great Church at Antioch, possibly equal in size to the Jewish church in Jerusalem. The prophecy by Agabus of a famine gave Barnabas and Saul a good excuse for a return to Jerusalem with a grateful offering to relieve the poverty in the Jerusalem church. Barnabas had assisted generously in a similar strain in the beginning of the work there (Acts 4 36 f.), unless it was a different Barnabas, which is unlikely. This contribution would help the Jerusalem saints to understand now that the Greeks were really converted. It was apparently successful according to the record in Acts. The apostles seem to have been absent, since only "elders" are mentioned in 11 30.

The incidents in ch 12, as already noted, are probably not contemporaneous with this visit, but either prior or subsequent to it. However, it is urged by some scholars that this visit is the same as that of Gal 2 1-10, since Paul would not have omitted it in his list of visits to Jerusalem. But then Paul is not giving a list of visits, but is only showing his independence of the apostles. If they were absent from Jerusalem at that time, there would be some reason to doubt. Besides, Luke in Acts 15 does recount the struggle in Jerusalem over the problem of gentile liberty, and a question was raised at that time about the same issue (Acts 15 1). It is quite remarkable that he should have passed by, esp. if the matter caused much heat at the time, especially since the apostle Barnabas in ch 11 is much simpler to understand that in Acts 15 and Gal 2 1-10 we have the public and the more important aspects of the controversy. It seems to suppose that Luke has slurred the whole matter over in Acts 11 30. The identification of the incident that in Acts 15 11 and 12 25 making it possible to place Gal before the conference in Jerusalem in Acts 15 and implies the correctness of the South-

Galatian theory of the destination of the ep. and of the work of Paul of Gal. As many advocates and arguments, but which is by no means established (see below for discussion at more length). So far as we can gather from Luke, there was a visit from Luke, but this is not recorded by John Mark (Acts 12 25), "when they had fulfilled their ministerial with satisfaction. The Pharisaic element was apparently persistent, and the possibility of this work among the Gentiles seemed hopeful. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 98) argues that the revelation mentioned in Paul's speech in Acts 22 16 with this visit in 11 30 (12 25), rather than with the verse Acts 22 16, but I cannot concur in the solution of Ramsay.

Paul had already preached to the Gentiles in Cilicia and Syria; for some 10 years. The work was not new to him. He had had his spec-

5. The First Great Mission

Campaign: individual in Cilicia. The Spirit specifically directs the separation of Barnabas and Saul to this work (Acts 13 2). They were to go together, and they had the sympathy and prayers of a great church. The endorsement was probably "ordination" in the technical sense, but a farewell and sending off by the church. The missionaries went forth on the world-campaign (13 3). No such unanimous endorsement could have been obtained in Jerusalem to this great enterprise. It was momentous in its possibilities for Christianity. Paul met and converted the Greek Gentile at Antioch. The great endowment of the new convert had been in the Roman city. How that mind managed this time we do not know. Some individuals may have helped. Paul had his trade to fall back on, and often had resort to it later. The presence of John Mark "as their attendant" (13 5) was probably due to Barnabas, his cousin (Col 4 10). The visit to Cyprus, the home of Barnabas, was natural. There were already some Christians there (Acts 11 20), and it was near. They preach first in the synagogue of the Jews at Salamis (13 5). We are left to conjecture as to how the results there and through the whole island till Paphos is reached. There they meet a man of great prominence and intelligence, Sergius Paulus, the Roman proconsul, who had been under the spell of sorcery and magic (Acts 13 8). The vision (Acts 13 9) of Peter's encounter with Simon Magus in Samaria. In order to win and hold Sergius Paulus, who had become interested in Christianity, Paul has to punish Bar-Jesus with blindness (13 10 f.) in the exercise of that apostolic power which he afterward claimed with such vigor (1 Cor 5 4 f.; 2 Cor 13 10). He won Sergius Paulus, and this gave him cheer for his work. From now on it is Paul, not Saul, in the record of Luke, perhaps because of this incident, though both names probably belonged to him from the first. Now also Paul steps to the fore ahead of Barnabas, and it is "Paul's company" (13 13) that sets sail from Paphos for Pamphylia. There is no evidence here of resentment on the part of Barnabas at the leadership of Paul. The whole campaign may have been planned from the start by the Holy Spirit as the course now taken may have been due to Paul's leadership. John Mark deserts at Perga and returns to Jerusalem (his home), not to Antioch (13 13). Paul and Barnabas push on to the farther lands of Asia Minor. The Traveller, 98) thinks that Paul had malaria down at Perga and hence desired to get up into higher land. That is possible. The places mentioned in the rest of the tour are Antioch in Pisidia (13 14), and Iconium (13 51), Lystra (14 8), and Derbe (14 20), cities of Lycaonia. Some of these terms re
The matter had to stop. So the Judaisers came up to Antioch and laid down the law to Paul and Barnabas. They did not wait for them to come to Jerusalem. That would not only have split off one of the churches in Galatia (Acts 11). Paul and Barnabas had not sought the controversy. They had both received specific instructions from the Holy Spirit to make this great campaign among the Gentiles. They would not disrupt themselves and the Church in Christ by going back and having the Mosaic Law imposed on them by the ceremony of circumcision. They saw at once the gravity of the issue. The very essence of the gospel of grace was involved. Paul had turned away from this yoke of bondage. They went back to it nor would he impose it on his converts. The church at Antioch stood by Paul and Barnabas. Paul (Gal 2:2) says that he had a revelation to go to Jerusalem with the problem. Luke (Acts 16:8) says that the church sent them. Surely there is no inconsistency here. It is not difficult to combine the personal narrative in Gal 2 with the public meetings recorded in Acts 15. We have first the general report by Paul and Barnabas to the church in Jerusalem. They brought down from Antioch a live specimen, offered as a sacrifice to the Judaisers ("false brethren") and circumcised. But Paul stood his ground for the truth of the gospel and was supported by Peter, John and James and other teachers (Gal 2:1-10). In this private conference some of the timid brethren wished to persuade Paul to have Barnabas and him and the Church at Seleucia and Antioch. They make their report to the church at Antioch. It is a wonderful story. The door of faith is now wide open for the Gentiles who have entered in great numbers (Acts 14:27). No report was sent to Jerusalem. What will the Pharisaic party do now?

The early date of Gal, addressed to these churches of Pisidia and Lycaonia before the Conference in Jerusalem does not allow time for a second visit there (Gal 4:13), and requires that Paul and Barnabas dramatically turned to the Gentiles (Acts 15:45 ff.). But the Jews reached the city magistrate through the influential women, and Paul and Barnabas were ordered to leave (Acts 15:50 ff.). Similar success brings like results in Iconium. At Lystra, before the hostile Jews coming out of Lystra and Derbe, Paul, Barnabas and certain others (Acts 14:1-6) certainly made a report of this success and are taken as Mercury and Jupiter respectively, and worship is offered them. Paul's address in refusal is a fine plea on the grounds of natural theology (Acts 14:15-18) and so this report on the miraculous event came seemed successful. In the band of disciples that "stood round about him," there may have been Timothy, Paul's son in the gospel. From Derbe they retrace their steps to Perga, in order to strengthen Paul in his mission and a thence for Seleucia and Antioch. They make their report to the church at Antioch. It is a wonderful story. The door of faith is now wide open for the Gentiles who have entered in great numbers (Acts 14:27). No report was sent to Jerusalem. What will the Pharisaic party do now?

6. The Conflict at Jerusalem

Upon the heels of Paul and Barnabas, came (Acts 15:3) the letter. The Acts 15:4, 29 AD Besides, this is the less likelihood of reference. It seems to have been taken as a second time to Jerusalem (Acts 15:2) if already the question had been settled in Paul's favor (Acts 11:30). It is strange also that no reference to this previous conference on the same subject is made in Acts 15, since Peter does refer to his experience at Caesarea (Acts 15:9) and since James in Acts 21, 25 specifically ("we wrote") mentions the letter of Acts 15 which full liberty was granted to the Gentiles. Once more, the attack on the position of Paul and Barnabas was made by the conduct of Peter at Caesarea (Acts 11:1 ff.) and had reluctantly acquiesced in the plain work of God (11:18). They had likewise yielded in the matter of the Greeks at Antioch (Acts 11:19 ff.) by the help of the disciples and teachers and they had not agreed to a campaign to Hellenize Christianity.
Some time later Peter appears at Antioch in the fullest fellowship with Paul and Barnabas in their work, and proceeds in free interchange with the Gentiles, as he had timely done in the home of Cornelius, till "certain came from James" (Gal 2 11 f), and probably threatened to have Peter up before the church again (Acts 11 2) on this matter, claiming that James agreed with them on the subject. This I do not believe was true in the light of Acts 15 24, where a similar false claim is discredited, since James had agreed with Paul in Jerusalem (Acts 15 19 ff; Gal 2 9 f). The new ground for controversy was that they attempted to place the question of social relations with the Gentiles in the Jerusalem conference and that Peter had exceeded the agreement there reached. Peter quailed before the accusation, "fearing them that were of the circumcision" (Gal 2 12). To make it worse, "even Barnabas was carried away with their dissimulation" (2 13). Under this specious plea Paul was about to lose the fruit of the victory already won, and charged Peter to his face with Judaizing hypocrisy (2 11-14). It was a serious crisis. Peter had not changed his convictions, but had once more cowered in an hour of peril. Paul won both Barnabas and Peter to his side and took occasion to show how useless the death of Christ was if men could be saved by mere legalism (2 21). But the Judaizers had renewed the attack and could not keep it down. And thus the work of Paul all over the world. Paul had the light of his life upon his hands. The impulse to go out again from Paul. Despite the difference in Gal 2 13, he wished to go again with Barnabas (interwoven 15 36); but Barnabas insisted on taking along Second Mark, which Paul was not willing to Mission do to because of his failure to stick to the work at Perga. So they agreed Bar- to leave after "contention"—18 22; 1 (15 39 f). Barnabas went with Mark and and 2 Thessals, to Cyprus, while Paul took Silas, 49-51 (or "be commended by the brethren") 52 AD to the grace of the Lord." Luke follows the career of Paul, and so Barnabas drops out of view (cf later 1 Cor 9 6). Paul and Silas go "through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches" (Acts 15 41). They pass through the Cilician gates to Derbe, the end of the first missionary journey. Jerusalem was a city where more than twice Mark's place in Paul's life. Timothy's mother was a Jewess and his father a Greek. Paul decided therefore to have him circumcised since, as a half-Jew, he would be esp. obnoxious to the Jews, but Paul, having already been engaged as a witness against that of Titus, a Greek, where principle was involved. Here it was a matter merely of expediency. Paul had taken the precaution to bring along the decrees of the Conference at Jerusalem in case there was need of them. He was sure, but if Paul has to be noted that in 1 Cor 8-10 and in Rom 14 and 15, when discussing the question of eating meats offered to idols, Paul does not refer to these decrees, but argues the matter purely from the standpoint of the principles involved. The Judaizers anyhow had not lived up to the agreement, but Paul is here doing his part by the decision. The result of the work was good for the churches (Acts 16 4).

When we come to Acts 16 6, we touch a crucial passage in the South-Galatian controversy. Ramsay (Christianity in the Roman Empire, chs iii-vi; Hist and Geography of Asia Minor; St. Paul the Traveller, chs v, vi) has laid the field. But in the above "reply to Lacta- its," HDB: Comm. on Gal: The Cities of St. Paul, pp. 247-282. Ramsay is the chief champion of the view that Paul never went to Galatia proper or North Galatia, and that he addressed his Second Epistle written in the year 56. For a careful history of the whole controversy in detail, see Moffatt, Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 90-100, who strongly supports the view of Lightfoot, R. J. Holz-was stirred over the idolatry before his eyes. He preaches in the synagogues and argues with the Stoics and Epicureans in the Agora who make light of his pretensions to philosophy as a "babbling" (Acts 18 17). But curiosity leads him to invite them to speak on the Areopagus. This notable address, all alive to his surroundings, was rather rudely cut short by their indifference and mockery, and Paul left Athens with small results for his work. He goes over to Corinth, the great commercial city of the province, rich and with bizarre notions of culture. Paul determined (1 Cor 2 1-5) to be true to the cross, even after his experience in Athens. He gave them, not the flashy philosophy of the sophists, but the true wisdom of God in simple words, the philosophy of the cross of Christ (1 Cor 1 17-3 4). In Corinth Paul found fellow-helpers in Aquila and Priscilla, just expelled from Rome by Claudius. They have the same trade of tent-makers and live together (Acts 18 1-4), and Paul preached in the court (Acts 18 5-10). He is cheered by the coming of Timothy and Silas from Thessalonica (18 5) with supplies from Philippi, as they had done while in Thessalonica (Phil 4 15 f.). This very success led to opposition, and Paul has to preach in the court (Acts 18 6-10; 1 Cor 16 17). The way goes on till Galio comes and a renewed effort is made to have it stopped, but Galio declines to interfere and thus practically makes Christianity a religion tolerated, since he treats it as a variety of Judaism. When Paul writes to the Romans (15 24; 16 1-5), and after the departure of Timothy and Silas, Paul writes the letter to Thessalonians, the first of his 13 epp. They are probably not very far apart in time, and deal chiefly with a grievous misunderstanding on their part concerning the exclusiveness placed by him in the Man of Sin and the Second Coming. Paul had felt the power of the empire, and his attention is sharply drawn to the coming conflict between the Rom empire and the kingdom of God. He treats it in terms of apocalyptic eschatology. When he leaves Corinth, it is to go by Ephesus, with Aquila and Priscilla whom he leaves there with the promise to return. He goes down to Caesarea and "went up and saluted the church there at Jerusalem" (Acts 21 26). Paul is elected by the church as its new leader (fourth visit), and "went down to Antioch." If he went to Jerusalem, it was probably incidental, and nothing of importance happened. He is back once again in Antioch after an absence of some 3 or 4 years.

The stay of Paul at Antioch is described as "some time" (Acts 18 23). Denney (Standard Bible Dict.) conjectures that Paul's brief stay at Jerusalem (see above) was due to the fact that he found that the Judaism was not likely to accept his position in the absence of the apostles, and it was so unpleasant that he did not stay. He suggests also that the emissaries of the church at Jerusalem (Acts 18 22, 26) (fourth visit) had sent letters of commendation from the church for their emissaries (2 Cor 3 1) to Corinth and Galatia, which were preaching "another Jesus" of nationalism and narrowness, whom Paul did not recognize (Gal 1 10; 2 Cor 11 4). Both Denney and Findlay follow Neander, Wieseler, and Sabatier in placing here, before Paul starts out again from Antioch, the visit of certain "from James" (Gal 2 12), who overpowered Peter for the moment. But I have put this incident as much as possible in the time when Jesus was over Mark, and as probably contributing to that breach at the beginning of the second tour. It is not necessary to suppose that the Judaism remained ascendant so long.

Paul seems to have set out on the third tour alone unless Timothy came back with him, of which there is no evidence save that he is with Paul again in Ephesus (Acts 19 22). What became of Silas? Paul "went through the region of Galatia, and Phrygia, in order, establishing all the disciples" (Acts 18 23). Paul's order here (Acts 18 6-10) is that of Galatia, then Phrygia, and finally the region of Phrygia and Galatia. According to the North-Galatian view, here followed, he went through the northern part of the province, passing through Galatia proper and Phrygia on his way west to Ephesus. Luke adds, "Paul having passed through the upper country came to Ephesus" (19 1). The ministry of Apollos in Ephesus (18 24-28) had taken place before Paul arrived, though Aquila and Priscilla were still on hand. Apollos passed over to Corinth and incidentally became the occasion of such strife there (1 Cor 1 4) that he left and refused to return at Paul's request (1 Cor 16 12). Paul has a ministry of 3 years, in round numbers, in Ephesus, which is full of excitement and anxiety from the work there and in Corinth. He finds on his arrival some ill-informed disciples of John the Baptist who are ignorant of the chief elements of John's teaching about repentance, Jesus, and the Holy Spirit (Acts 19 2-7), matters of which Apollos had known before he went from Priscilla and Aquila, but there is no evidence that he was re baptized as was true of the 12 disciples of John (Robertson, John the Loyal, 290-303). The boldness of Paul in Ephesus led in 3 months to his departure from the synagogue to the house of Titus (Whose?) and to the schoolhouse of Tyranus, where he remained for 2 years (Acts 19 8-10) with such power that "all they that dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord." It is not strange later to find churches at Colossae and Hierapolis in the Lyceum Valley (cf Acts 19 11). Paul has a second visit to Synagogue, in the presence of Jewish exorcists that led to the burning of books of magic by the wholesale (19 11-20), another proof of the hold that magic and the mysteries had upon the Orient. Ephesus was the seat of the worship of Diana whose wonderful temple was their pride. A great business in the manufacture of shrines of Diana was carried on here by Demetrius, and this Paul had hurt his trade so much that he raised an insurrection under the guise of piety and patriotism and he might have killed Paul with the mob, if he could have got hold of him (19 23-41). It was with great difficulty that Paul was kept from going to the amphitheater, as it was. But here, as at Corinth, the Rom official (the town clerk) defended Paul from the rage of his enemies (through his eloquence, here the tradesmen whose business suffered). He was apparently very ill anyhow, and came near death (2 Cor 1 9). All this seems to have hastened his departure from Ephesus sooner than Pentecost, as he had written to the Corinthians (1 Cor 16 8). His heart was in Corinth because of the discussions there over him and Apollos and Peter, by reason of the agitation of the Judaizers (1 Cor 1 10-17). The household of Chloe had brought word of this situation to Paul. He had written the church a letter now lost (1 Cor 5 9). They had written him a letter (1 Cor 7 1). They sent messengers to Paul (1 Cor 16 17). He had sent Timothy to them (1 Cor 4 17; 16 10), who seems not to have succeeded in quieting the trouble. Paul wrote 1 Cor (spring of 56), and then sent Titus, who was to meet him at Troas and report results (2 Cor 2 12 f). He may also have written another letter and sent it by Titus (2 Cor 2 3 f). The sudden absence of the apostles from the church (20 6) makes it probable that Paul was to arrive ahead of time, but he could not wait for Titus, and so pushed on with a heavy heart into Macedonia, where he met him, and he had good and bad news to tell (2 Cor 2 12 ff; 7 5-13). The effect on Paul was instantaneous. He rebounded to hope and joy (2 Cor 2 14 f) in a glorious defence of the ministry of Jesus (cf. Robertson, The Glory of the Ministry; Paul's Exultation in Preaching), with a message of cheer to the majority of the church that he loved and had tried to lead and to whom he had joined cordially. He had spent considerable time at Ephesus (Acts 19 21) and thought it was time to call a halt. He then spent some time in Macedonia (Acts 20 1-3), and so the last section of his journey was to Philip (Acts 20 6). There is no evidence of Paul writing to the elders at Ephesus to request that he be allowed to stay, as he had done in other places (Acts 20 16).

8. Five Years a Prisoner (Acts 21:17 - 20:31; 22; Phil; Philem; Col; Eph 1:1-8 (with 63 AD)

Paul longed to have a change of scene and to do something to further the cause of the gospel. He had been in prison for some time, and he was eager to return to his work. He also wanted to visit the other churches that he had founded in his previous journeys, and to strengthen them in their faith. Paul wrote to the Galatians, encouraging them to stand firm in the faith, and to continue to work for the advancement of the gospel. He urged them to remember the teaching of Jesus, and to follow his example in their lives.

Paul had hoped to reach Jerusalem (Acts 20 16). He seemed to have done so,Luke gives the story of Paul in Jerusalem, Caesarea, and the voyage to Rome in much detail. He was with him and considered this period of his ministry very important. The welcome from the holy city of Jerusalem was very warm and enthusiastic, and Paul was received with open arms. He was given a warm welcome, and was able to share his message of salvation and liberation with the people. He also had the opportunity to meet with the rulers of the city, and to address them on behalf of the gospel. Paul's teaching was received with enthusiasm, and he was able to make a lasting impact on the people of Jerusalem.

The time Paul spent in Jerusalem was brief, but it was filled with activity and purpose. He met with the leaders of the church, and was able to share his message of salvation and liberation with them. He was also able to make a lasting impression on the people of Jerusalem, and to leave behind a legacy of faith and hope. Paul's time in Jerusalem was a time of growth and development, as he continued to spread the message of the gospel throughout the world, and to build the church of God.

so that they imagined that he had Greeks with him in the Jewish court, because they had seen him one day with Trophimus in the city (21 27 ff). It is a splendid illustration of the blindness of prejudice and the haste with which the people were set on for the arrest of one who had raised the hue and cry in the temple against Paul as the descender of the holy place and the Law and the people disappear, and are never heard of more (24 18). But it will take Paul five years or more of the prime of his life to get himself out of the tangled web that will be woven about his head. Peril follows peril. He was almost mobbed, as often before, by the crowd that dragged him out of the temple (21 30 f). It would remind Paul of Stephen's murder, and in the Roman captain rescues him, and had him bound with two chains as a dangerous bandit, and had him carried by the soldiers to save his life, the mob yelled "Away with him" (21 36 ff), as they had done to Jesus. After the captain, astonished that "Paul the Egyptian" men speak Gr, grants him permission to stand on the steps of the tower of Antonia to speak to the mob that clamored for his blood, he held their rapt attention by an address in Aram. (22 2) in which he gave a defense of his whole career. All this they heard as if the words were "as the prophet spoke," and which they raged more violently than ever (22 21 ff). At this the captain has Paul tied with thongs, not understanding his Aram. speech, and is about to scourge him when Paul pleads his Roman citizenship, to the amazement of the soldiers on duty who spoke the word "Genos" and simply, "Tyrannicide," because his very words were against his liberty. Almost in despair, the captain, wishing to know the charge of the Jews against Paul, brings him before the Sanhedrin. It is a familiar scene to Paul, and it is now their chance for settling old scores. Paul must face the sharp retort in anger to the high priest Ananias, for which he apologizes as if he was so angry that he had not noticed, but he soon divides the Sanhedrin hopelessly on the subject of the resurrection of Jesus. He has a little case to make on the issue that when Gamaliel scored the Sadducees in Acts 5. This was turning the tables on his enemies, and was justifiable as war. He claimed to be a Pharisee on this point, as he was still, as opposed to the Sadducees. The result was a stand Paul had to be rescued from the contending factions, and the captain knew no more than he did before (23 1–10). That night "the Lord stood by him" and promised that he would go to Rome (23 11). That was a balm, when the two years, having been simply too long for the high priest, means over. By the skill of his nephew he escaped the murderous plot of 40 Jews who had taken a vow not to eat till they had killed Paul (23 12–24). They almost succeeded, but Claudius Lysias sent Paul in haste with a band of soldiers to Caesarea to Felix, the procurator, with a letter in which he claimed to have rescued Paul from the mob, "having learned that he was a Roman" (23 26–30). At any rate he was no longer in the clutches of the Jews. Would Rom provincial justice be any better? Felix follows a perfunctory course with Paul and shows some curiosity about Christianity, till Paul makes him tremble with terror, a complete reversal of situations (cf Pilato's meanness before Jesus). But love of money from Paul or the Jews leads Felix to keep Paul a prisoner for two years, though convinced of his innocence, and to hand him over to Festus, his successor, because the Jews might make things worse for him if he released him (ch 24). The case of the Sanhedrin, who have now made it clear, that it seems to impair the Sanhedrin's authority, though pleaded by the Rom orator Tertullus, has fallen through as Paul calmly ridded their charges. Festus is at first at a loss how to proceed, but he soon follows the steps of Felix by offering to play into the hands of the Jewish leaders by sending Paul back to Jerusalem, whereupon Paul abruptly exercises his right of Rom citizenship by appealing to Caesar (25 1–12). This way, though a long one, offered the only ray of hope. The appearance of Paul before Agrippa and Bernice was approved by Festus to relieve his guests of ennu, but Paul seized the opportunity to make a powerful appeal to Agrippa that put him in a corner logically, though he wriggled out and declined to endorse Christianity, though confirming Paul's innocence, which Festus also had admitted (25 13–26 32). Paul was fortunate in the centurion Julius who took him to Rome, for he was kindly disposed to him at the start, and so it was all the way through the most remarkable voyage on record. Luke has preserved his own record, as he traces the voyage, stage by stage, with change of ship at Myra, delay at Fair Havens, Crete, and shipwreck on the island of Malta. More is learned about ancient seafaring from this chapter than from any other source (see art. Phœnix, and Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 1866). In it all Paul is the hero, both on the ships and in Malta. In the early spring of 60 another ship takes Paul and the other prisoners to Puteoli. Then they go to Rome by land. (23 16–30). Here Luke is intrusted to the care of a Roman soldier, though granted freedom to see his friends and to preach to the soldiers. Paul is anxious to remove any misapprehensions that the Jews in Rome may have about him, and tries to win them to Christ, and with partial success, (24 17–28), but Paul is finally admitted to theennis person of Christ and the glory of the church universal. In due time Paul's appeal was disposed of and he was sentenced. The Romans were provably dilatory. It is doubtful if his enemies ever appeared against him with formal charges. The genuineness of the Pastoral Epp, is here assumed. But for them we should know nothing further, save from a few fragments in the early Christian writings. As it is, some few who accept the Pastoral Epp, seek to place them before 64 AD, so as to allow for Paul's death in that year from the Neronic persecution. In that case, he was not released. There is no space here to argue the question in detail. We can piece together the probable course of events. He had expected when in Corinth last to go on to Spain (Rom 15 28), but now in Rome his heart turns back to the east again. He longs to see the Philippians (1 23 ff) and hopes to see Philemon in Colossae (Philem ver 22). But he may have gone to Spain also, as Clement of Rome seems to imply in his second section, and as stated in the Canon of Muratori. He may have been in Spain when Rome was burned July 19, 64 AD. There is no evidence that Paul went as far as Britain. On his return east he left Titus in Crete (Tit 1 5). He touched at Miletus when he left Trophimus sick (2 Tim 4 20) and when he may have met Timothy, if he did not go on to Ephesus (1 Tim 1 3). He stayed at Troas and apparently expected to come back here, as he left his cloak and books with Carpus (2 Tim 4 11). The symbol of Macedonia, a sheaf of corn (1 Tim 1 3), whence he writes Timothy in 65-67 a letter full of love and counsel for the future. Paul is apprehensive of the grave perils now confronting Christianity. Besides the Judaizers, the Gnostics, the Jews and the Romans, he may have had dim visions of the conflict with the mystery-religions. It was a syncretistic age, and men had itching ears. But Paul is full of sympathy and tender solicitude for Timothy, who must push on the work and get ready for it. Paul expects to spend the winter in Asia (Acts 20 15ff; 21 1) but the apostle is still in Macedonia when he writes to Titus a letter on lines similar to those in 1 Tim, only the note is sharper against Judaism of a certain type. We catch another glimpse of Apollos in 3 13. Paul hits off the Cretans in 1 10 with a quotation from Epimenides, one of their own poetic prophets.

When Paul writes again to Timothy he has had a winter in prison, and has suffered greatly from the cold and does not wish to spend another winter in Rome (2 Tim 4 13). The lawyer is in prison (2 Tim 4 13.21). We do not know what the charges now are. They may have been connected with the burning of Rome. There were plenty of signs and wonders of God made manifest to Nero. Proof was not now necessary. Christianity is no longer a religio licita under the shelter of Judaism. It is now a crime to be a Christian. It is dangerous to be seen with Paul now, and he feels that desolation keenly (2 Tim 1 15ff; 10). Only Luke, the beloved physician, is with Paul (4 11), and such faithful ones as live in Rome still in hiding (4 21). Paul hopes that Timothy may come and bring Mark also (4 11). Apparently Timothy did come and was put into prison (13 23). Paul is not afraid. He knows that he will die. He has escaped the mouth of the lion (2 Tim 4 17), but he will die (4 18). The Lord Jesus stood by him, perhaps in visible presence (4 17). The tradition is, for now Paul tells us, that Paul, as a Roman citizen, was beheaded on the Ostian Road just outside of Rome. Nero died June, 68 AD, so that Paul was executed before that date, perhaps in the late spring of that year (or 67). Perhaps Luke and Timothy, who were with him at Rome, suggests, to let Paul's words in 2 Tim 4 6-8 serve for his own epistle. He was ready to go to be with Jesus, as he had long wished to be (Phil 1 23).

VI. Gospel.—I had purposed to save adequate space for the discussion of Paul's theology, but that is not now possible. A bare sketch must suffice. Something was said (see above on his epp. and equipment) about the development in Paul's conception of Christ and his message about Him. Paul had a gospel which was different from that of the Galatians, but in their case he could not agree with the words of Deissmann (St. Paul, 6): "St. Paul the theologian looks backward toward rabbinism. As a religious genius St. Paul's outlook is forward into a future of universal history." He did continue to use some rabbinical methods of argument, but his theology was not rabbinical. And he had a theology. He was the great apostle and missionary to the heathen. He was a Christian statesman with far-seeing vision. He was the loving pastor with the shepherd heart. He was the great missionary of the New Testament. He was the wonder - the wonder of the great preacher of Jesus. But he was also "Paul the theologian" (Garvie, Life and Teaching of Paul, ch v). There are two ways of studying his teaching. One is to take it by groups of the epp., the purely historical method, and that has some advantages (cf. Sahatier, The Apostle Paul). But at bottom Paul has the same message in each group, though with varying emphasis due to special exigencies. The same essential notes occur all through. The more common message is: he died and rose again for sinners to Christ reconciling the world to grace, not merely a new creature himself, but he had a new outlook: "Wherefore we henceforth know no man after the flesh: even though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now we know him so no more." Wherefore in us the creator: the old things are passed away; behold, they are become new. But all things are of God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ, and gave unto us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not reckoning to them their trespasses, and having committed unto us the word of reconciliation" (2 Cor 5 19-19). Perhaps no single passage in Paul's Ep. tells us more than this one of the change in Paul's theological conceptions wrought by his conversion. His view of Christ as the revealer of God (God in Christ) and the manifestation of love for men (of God, who reconciled us to Himself, reconciling the world to himself) and the means (through Christ) by which God is able to forgive our sins ("not reckoning unto them their trespasses") on the basis of the atoning death of Christ ("wherefore"; for this see vs 14 just before ver 18) with whom the believer has vital union ("in Christ") and whom the believer, at the vantage point of the believer, is here thoroughly characteristic. Paul's passion is Christ (2 Cor 5 14; Phil 1 21). To gain Christ (3 8), to know Christ (3 10), to be found in Christ (3 9), to know Christ as the mystery of God (Col 2 2), to be united with Christ in God (3 3)—this with the new Paul is worth while. Thus Paul interprets God and man, by his doctrine of Christ. To him Jesus is Christ and Christ is Jesus. He has no patience with the infant methods of Christology which denied the true humanity of Jesus. The real mystery of God is Christ, not the so-called mystery-religions. Christ has set us free from the bondage of ceremonial legalism. We are free from the curse of the law (Gal 3 13). Grace is the distinctive word for the gospel (Rom 3-5), but it must lead to sanctification (Rom 6-8), not license (Col 3). Paul's Christology is both theocentric and anthropocentric, but it is theocentric first. His notion of redemption is the redemption of a world lost in sin and finding love's way, the only way consonant with justice, in the atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ His Son (Rom 3 21-31). The sinner comes into union with God in Christ by faith in Christ as Redeemer and Lord. Hencedon, he lives to God in Christ by the help of the Holy Spirit (Rom 8; Gal 5). Paul presents God as Father of all in one sense (Eph 4:6), but in a special sense of the believers in Christ (Rom 8:15f.). Jesus Christ is the Incarnation of the Pre-incarnate Son of God (2 Cor 8:9; Phil 2:5-10), who is both God and Man (1:1). When Paul the apostle created a new kingdom, Paul was the head of the church universal (Col 1:18; Eph 1:22f.). In the work of Christ Paul gives the central place to the cross (1 Cor 17f.); 2:2; Col 2:20; Eph 2:10). His righteousness is universal in humanity (Rom 1:17f. 18-20), but the vicarious redemption is Christ making the redemption possible to all who believe (Rom 3:21f. Gal 3:6-11). The redeemed constitute the kingdom of God or church universal, with Christ as head. Local bodies (churches) are the chief means for pushing the work of the kingdom. Paul knows two ordinances, both of which present in symbolic form the death of Christ for sin and the pledge of the believer to newness of life in Christ. These ordinances are baptism (Rom 6:1-11) and the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11:17-34). If he knew the mystery-religions, they may have helped him by way of illustration to present his conception of the mystic union with Christ. Paul is animated by the hope of the second coming of Christ, which will bring to pass the consummation of all things. This vision was at once (2 Thess 2:1), but was to be considered as always imminent (1 Thess 5:2f.). Meanwhile, death brings us to Christ, which is a glorious hope to Paul (2 Cor 5:1-10; Phil 1:21f.; 2 Tim 4:18). But while Paul was a theologian in the highest and best sense of the term, the best interpreter of Christ to men, he was also an ethical teacher. He did not divorce ethics from religion. He insisted strongly on the spiritual experience of Christ as the beginning and goal of his teaching, as in ritualistic ceremonies which had destroyed the life of Judaism. But all the more Paul demanded the proof of life as opposed to mere profession. See Rom 6-8 in particular. In most of the epp. the doctrinal section is followed by practical exhortations to holy living. Mystic as Paul was, the greatest of all mystics, he was the sanest of moralists and had no patience with hypocrites or licentious pietists or ideologists who allowed sentimentalism and emotion to take the place of righteousness. This is the place of righteousness. The personal righteousness is the place of righteousness. The righteousness demanded by God and given by God included both sanctification and justification. In the end, the sinner who for Christ's sake was created as righteous must be righteous. Thus the Gospel is Paul's regenerating work of the Spirit of God (2 Cor 3:18). Paul sees God in the face of Christ (2 Cor 4:6), and the vision of Christ brings God to all who see.

I. THE PREPARATION.—In order to understand the development of St. Paul's theological system, it is necessary to begin with his beliefs as a Pharisee. The full extent of these beliefs, to be sure, is not now ascertainable, for Pharisaism was a rule of conduct rather than a system of dogmas, and great diversity of opinions existed among Pharisees. Yet there was general concurrence in certain broad principles, while some of St. Paul's own statements enable us to specify his beliefs still more closely.

Paul, the Pharisee

1. The Pharisee—In his relation to His world He was transcendent, and governed his life in accordance with the law of his religious spirit. He was not influenced by the Gentile society in which he lived, but the law of his inner spirit determined his course. His inner life was under the guidance of a religious law which was a higher law than the law of the Gentiles, and which governed the thoughts, actions, and dispositions of his soul. In this way he was able to live in accordance with the law of his inner spirit, and to be guided by the light of his inner conscience. He was not influenced by the Gentile society in which he lived, but the law of his inner spirit determined his course. His inner life was under the guidance of a religious law which was a higher law than the law of the Gentiles, and which governed the thoughts, actions, and dispositions of his soul. In this way he was able to live in accordance with the law of his inner spirit, and to be guided by the light of his inner conscience.

2. Saul and Sin—Saul, the name given to Paul in his youth, was a Pharisee and a leader of the Pharisees. He was well acquainted with the teachings of the Pharisees, and was a zealous and devoted follower of their beliefs. However, he was not immune to the temptations of human nature, and he fell into sin and did things which he later regretted. He was, therefore, a sinner, and his salvation was necessary in order that he might be saved from the penalty of sin.

3. Primitive Christianity—The first Christian church was founded by the Apostle Paul, and its members were called Christians. They believed in one God, the Father, Maker of heaven and earth. They believed in Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who was crucified and died for the sins of the world. They believed in the Holy Spirit, who was sent by the Father to dwell in the hearts of believers. They believed in the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, and in the ascension of Jesus to heaven. They believed in the coming of the kingdom of God, and in the second coming of Jesus to judge the living and the dead. They believed in the forgiveness of sins, and in the assurance of eternal life through faith in Jesus Christ. They believed in the observance of the Lord's Supper, and in the practice of baptism by immersion. They believed in the authority of the Bible, and in the inspiration of its words. They believed in the existence of angels, and in the possibility of their intervention in human affairs. They believed in the doctrine of the trinity, and in the unity of the church. They believed in the existence of hell, and in the possibility of its destruction by the power of God. They believed in the power of the Devil, and in the possibility of his being overcome through faith in Jesus Christ. They believed in the necessity of repentance, and in the possibility of salvation through faith in Jesus Christ. They believed in the necessity of faith, and in the possibility of its being manifested through good works. They believed in the necessity of love, and in the possibility of its being shown through the practice of good works. They believed in the necessity of prayer, and in the possibility of its being answered through faith in Jesus Christ. They believed in the necessity of perseverance, and in the possibility of its being demonstrated through the practice of good works.
Pauline Theology

Saul must have gained a reasonable knowledge of Christ's teachings in this period of antagonism. He certainly could not have begun to write the Pauline epistles without learning what it was, and in the inevitable discussions with the other members of the primitive church and was the truth for which Christ had died (Mc 16:6). But it involved much. It made Christ the Son of God (Rom 8:32; Gal 4:4, etc.), "firstborn of [i.e. 'earlier than'] all creation" (Col 1:15), "existing in the form of God" (Phil 2:6) and "rich" (2 Cor 8:9). In the Messiah are "all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden" (Col 2:3), to be manifested at the end of time when the Messiah shall appear as the Judge of all (2 Cor 5:10, etc.), causing the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor 15:15, etc.). All this was given by St. Paul's former beliefs and had been claimed by Christ for Himself. That this Messiah had become man was a fact of the immediate past (the reality of the manhood was no problem at this period). As Messiah His sinlessness was understood, the fact that He proved, His sinlessness also. His teaching was wholly binding (1 Cor 7:10-11; that the writer of these words could have spared any effort to learn the teaching fully is out of the question). The conversion experience was professed by sufficient evidence, although for missionary purposes St. Paul used other evidence as well (1 Cor 15:1-11).

Faith in this Messiah brought the unmistakable experience of the Holy Spirit (Rom 8:2; Gal 3:2, etc.; cf Acts 9:17), demonstrating Christ's Lordship (1 Cor 12:3; cf Acts 2:33). So "the head of every man is Christ" (1 Cor 11:3; cf Col 1:18; Eph 1:22; 4:15), with complete control of the future (1 Cor 15:25), and all righteous men are His servants ("slaves," Rom 1:1, etc.). To Him men may address their prayers (2 Cor 12:8; 1 Cor 1:2, etc.; cf Acts 14:23).

Further reflection added to the concepts. As the Lordship of Christ was absolute, the power of all heavenly things had been brought also (Rom 1:5, 8; Phil 2:9-11; Col 2:15; Eph 1:21-23, etc.). The Being who had such significance for the present and the future could not have been without significance for the past. "In all things" He must have been "therefore" (Col 1:18). It is He who ministered to the Israelites at the Exodus (1 Cor 10: 4,9). In fact He was not only "before all things" (Col 1:17), but "all things have been created through him" (ver 16). Wisdom and Logos concepts may have helped St. Paul in reaching these conclusions, which in explicit statement are an advance on Christ's own words. But the conclusions were inevitable.

Fitting these data of religious fact into the metaphysical doctrine of God was a problem that occupied the church for the four following centuries. After endless experimenting the only conclusion was shown to be that already reached by St. Paul in Rom 9:5 (cf Tit 2:13, ERV, ARVm), that Christ is God. To be sure, St. Paul's terminology, carried over from his pre-Christian days, elsewhere elsewhere, elsewhere "God" for the Father (and cf 1 Cor 15:28). But the fact of this theology admits only of the conclusion that was duly drawn.

A second fact given directly by the conversion was the presence of the Spirit, where the actual experience transcended anything that had been dreamed of. Primarily the operation of the Spirit was recognized in vividly supernatural effects (Rom 15:19; 2 Cor 12:5-11, etc.; cf 2 Cor 12:12; Acts 2:4), but St. Paul must at first have known the presence of the Spirit through the assurance of salvation given him, a concept that he never weary of expressing (Rom 8:10-23; Gal 4:6, etc.). The work of the Spirit in producing the external fruit of Christian life needs no comment (see HOLY SPIRIT; SANCITIFICATION), but it is characteristic of St. Paul that it is on this part of the Spirit's activity, rather than on the miraculous effects, that he lays the emphasis.

"The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, etc. (Gal 5:22); the greatest miracles without love are more than useless (1 Cor 13:1-3); in such sayings St. Paul touched the depths of the purest teaching of Christ. To be sure, in the Synoptic Gospels the word "Spirit" is not often on Christ's lips, but there is the same conception of a life proceeding from a pure center (Mt 6:22; 7:17, etc.) in entire dependence on God.

Further reflection and observation taught St. Paul something of the greatest importance for Christian theology. In prayer the Spirit appeared distinguished from the Father as well as from the Son (Rom 8:26; cf 1 Cor 2:10f), giving three terms that together express the plenitude of the Deity (2 Cor 13:14; Eph 1:3,6,13, etc), with the fourth term ever similarly associated. See TRINITY.

The indwelling of the Divine produced by the Spirit is spoken of indifferently as the indwelling of the Spirit, or of the Spirit of Christ, or of Christ Himself (all three terms occur in the Union Rom 8:9-11; cf 1 Cor 12:2; Gal Mystica 4:6; Eph 3:17, etc.). The variations are in part due to the inadequacy of the old terminology (so 2 Cor 3:17), in part to the nature of the subject. Distinctions made between the operations of the persons of the Trinity on the soul can never be much more than verbal, and the terms are freely interchangeable. At all events, through the Spirit Christ is in the believer (Rom 8:10; Gal 2:20; 4:19; Eph 3:17), or, what is the same thing, the believer is in Christ (Rom 6:8; 16:7, etc.). "We have become united with him" (Rom 6:5, συμφωνοί, "grown together with") in a union once and for all effected (Gal 3:27) and yet always to be made more intimate (Rom 13:14). The union so accomplished makes the man "a new creature" (2 Cor 5:17).

St. Paul now saw within himself a dual personality. His former nature, the old man, still persisted, with its impulses, liability 4. Salvation to corruption, and certainty. The realm of ruin and death, the realm of union, and life. The "real" still existed (Gal 5:17; Rom 12:13; 14; Eph 4:22; Phil 3:12, etc.). On the other hand there was fighting in him against this former nature nothing less than the whole power of Christ, and its final victory could not be uncertain for a moment (Rom 6:12; 8:210; Gal 5:16, etc.). Indeed, it is possible to speak of the believer as entirely spiritual (Rom 6:11; 8:9, etc.), as already in the kingdom (Col 1:13), as already fitting in heavenly places (Eph 2:20). Of course St. Paul had too keen an appreciation of reality to regard believers as utterly sinless (Phil 3:12, etc.), and his pages abound in reproofs and exhortations. But the present existence of remnants of sin had no final terrors, for the ultimate victory over sin was certain, and if it was not complete until the last day when the power of God would redress even the present physical frame (Rom 8:11; Phil 3:21, etc.).

As the first man to belong to the higher order, and as the point from which the race could take a fresh start, Christ could truly be termed "the Lord" (Gal 3:14; 45-49; cf Rom 5:12-21). If Cor 15:45 has any relation to the Pauline doctrine of the two Adams, it is a polemic against it. Such a polemic would not long likely.
A most extraordinary fact, to the former Pharisee, was that this experience had been gained without conscious effort and even against conscious effort (Paul 3 7f). After years of fruitless striving a single act of self-surrender had brought him an assurance that he had despaired of ever attaining. And this act of self-surrender is what St. Paul means by “faith,” “faith without works. This faith is not naturally contained in the word, but rather than a mere intellectual acknowledgment of a fact (Rom 2 19), and is an act of the whole man, too complex for simple analysis. It finds, however, its perfect statement in Christ’s reference to “receiving the kingdom of God as a little child” (Mk 10 15). By an act of simple yielding St. Paul found himself no longer in dread of his sins; he was at peace with God, and confident as to his future; in a word, justified. In one sense, to be sure, “works” were still involved, for without the past struggles the result would never have been attained. A desire, however imperfect, to do right is a necessary preparation for justification, and the word has no meaning to a man satisfied to be sunk in complete selfishness (Rom 6 2, 8, etc). This desire to do right, which St. Paul says “presents” and the context given “faith” are sufficient safeguards against antinomianism. But the grace given is in no way commensurate with past efforts, nor does it grow out of them. It is a simple gift of God (Rom 6 23).

I. Further Developments.—The adoption by St. Paul of the facts given by his conversion (and the immediate conclusions that followed from them) involved, naturally, a readjustment and a reformulation of the other parts of his belief. The process must have occupied some time. It was ever complete during his life, and must have been affected materially by his controversies with his former coreligionists and with very many Christians.

Fundamental was the problem of the Law. The Law was perfectly clear that he—and only he—who performed it would live. But 1. Abolition of Law was found through faith in Christ, of the Law while the Law was not fulfilled. There could be no question of compromise between these two positions; they were simply incompatible (Rom 10 5f; Gal 2 16; 3 11f; Phil 3 7). One conclusion only was possible: “Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness to every one that believeth” (Rom 10 4). As far as concerns the believer, the Law had gone. Two things followed. One was the immense simplification of what we call “Christian ethics,” which were now to be determined by the broadest general principles of right and wrong and no longer by an elaborate legalistic construing of God’s commands (Rom 13 8–10; Gal 5 22f; etc; cf Mk 12 29–31). To be sure, the commandments might be quoted as convenient expressions of moral duty (Eph 6 2; 1 Cor 9 9, etc; cf Mk 10 19), but they are binding because they are right, not because they are commandments (Gal 2 16). So in St. Paul’s moral directions, he tries to bring out always the principle involved, and Rom 14 and 1 Cor 8 are masterpieces of the treatment of concrete problems by this method.

The second result of the abolition of the Law was overwhelming. Gentiles had as much right to Christ as had the Jews, barring perhaps the priority of honor (Rom 3 2, etc) possessed by the latter. It is altogether conceivable, as Acts 22 21 implies, that St. Paul’s reception of the call was a long delayed and reached only after severe struggles. The fact was utterly revolutionary, and although it was prophesied in the Old Testament (Rom 9 25f), yet the Messiah among you Gentiles remained the hidden mystery that God had revealed only in the last days (Col 1 26f; Eph 3 3–6, etc). The struggles of the apostle in defence of this principle are the most familiar part of his career.

This consciousness of deliverance from the Law came to St. Paul in another way. The Law was meant for men in this world, but the 3. Redemption-union with Christ had raised him out of the world and so taken him away from its control. In the Epistles, this fact finds expression in an elaborately reasoned form. As Christ’s nature is now a vital part of our nature, His death and resurrection are facts of our past as well. “Ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God” (Col 3 3). But “the law had dominion over a man only for so long time as he lived” (Rom 7 1). “Therefore, my brethren, ye also were made dead to the law through the body of Christ” (ver 4). Cf Col 2 11–13, where the same argument is used to show that ritual observance is no longer necessary. In Rom 6 1–14 this argument is made to issue in a practical exhortation. Through the death of Christ, which is our death (ver 4), we, like Him, are placed in a higher world (ver 5) where sin has lost its power (ver 7), a world in which we are no longer under Law (ver 14). Hence the last, greatest moral effort becomes our duty (ver 13; cf 2 Cor 5 14f).

This release from the Law, however, does not solve the whole problem. Evil, present and past, is a fact, Law or no Law (on Rom 4 15f; cf 2 Cor 3 13). Sensuality, and a forbearance of God that simply “passes over” sins is disastrous for man as well as contrary to the righteous nature of God (Rom 3 25f). However inadequate the OT sacrifices were felt to have been in relation to St. Paul’s avoidance of the Levitical terms except in Eph 6 2), yet they offered the only help possible for the treatment of this most complex of problems. The guilt of our sins is “covered” by the death of Christ (1 Cor 15 3, where this truth is among those which were delivered to converts “first of all”; Rom 3 25; 4 25; 5 6, etc). This part of his theology St. Paul leaves in an incomplete form. He was accustomed, like any other man of his day, whether Jew or Gentile, to think naturally and sacriphically. He, and neither he nor his converts were conscious of any difficulty involved. Nor has theology since his time been able to contribute much toward advancing the solution of the problem. The fatal results of unchecked sin, its inevitable lead to the woe of the guilty, and the value of vicarious suffering, are simple facts of our experience that defy our attempts to reduce them to intellectual formulas. In St. Paul’s case it is to be noted that he views the inceptive as coming from God (Rom 3 25; 5 8; 8 32, etc), because of His love toward man, so that a “gift-propitiation” of an angry deity is a theory the precise opposite of the Pauline. Moreover, Christ’s death is not a mere fact of the past, but through the “mystical union” is incorporated into the life of every believer.

Further developments of this doctrine about Christ’s death find it in the complete destruction of whatever remained of the Law (Col 1 14), esp. as the barrier between Jew and Gentile (Eph 2 15f). The extinction of the effects of the death to the unseen world (Col 2 15; cf Gal 4 9; Eph 4 8) was of course natural.

The death of Christ as producing a subjective moral power in the believer is appealed to frequently by St. Paul (e.g. Gal 2 15f; Gal 5 19f; Eph 5 25; Phil 3 5, etc), while the idea is perhaps present to some degree even in Rom 3 26. From a different point of view, the Cross as teaching the vanity of worldly things is a favorite subject with St. Paul (1 Cor 1 22-25; 2 Cor 13 4; Gal 5 11; 6 14, etc. These aspects require no explanation.

There are, accordingly, in St. Paul's view of the death of Christ, the treasury of "mysteries," the "juridical," and the "ethical." But this distinction is largely only genetic and logical, and the lines tend to blend in execution. Consequently, Paul, as in so frequently an inquieslig problem to determine which of Christ's acts is most prominent in any given passage (e.g. 2 Cor 15 4).

Regarding the Law a further question remained, which had great importance in St. Paul's controversies. If the Law was useless for salvation, why was it given at all? And if it were useful, what was its purpose? To gain righteousness one must desire it and this desire the Law taught (Rom 7 12-16; 2 18), even though it had no power to help toward fulfillment. So the Law gave knowledge of sin (Rom 3 20f; 5 20f; 7 8 25; cf. 1 Cor 15 56). Thus the Law became our παράδοσις "to bring us unto Christ" (Gal 3 24; see SCHOOLMASTER), and came in "besides" (Rom 3 27). Hence the conclusion, which must have tated to go beyond this. Familiar in his own experience with the psychological truth that a prohibition may actually stimulate the desire to transgress it, he showed that the Law actually had the purpose of bringing sin to him, and in this way he knew that grace might deal with it effectively (Rom 5 20f; 7 8 25; cf 1 Cor 15 56). Thus the Law became our παράδοσις "to bring us unto Christ" (Gal 3 24; see SCHOOLMASTER), and came in "besides" (Rom 3 27). Hence the conclusion, which must have required much time to work out, St. Paul's reversal of his former Pharisaic position was complete.

IV. Special Topics.—As Christ is the central element in the life of the believer, all believers have element in common and we can unite with each other (Rom 12 5). This is the basis of the Pauline doctrine of the church. The use of the word "church" to denote the whole body of believers is not attained until the later Epistle (Col 1 18; Phil 2 16; Eph 1 22 23) —before that time the word is in the plural, when describing more than a local congregation (2 Thess 1 4; 1 Cor 7 17; Rom 16 16, etc.)—but the idea is present from the first. Indeed, the only terms in Judaism that were available were "Israel." Paul uses the latter term (Gal 6 16) and quite constantly emphasizes the exalted status of the Gentile converts as compared with the Jewish figures for the nation (e.g. cf Eph 3 5 with Hos 2 19 f.) and time was needed in order to give ekklēsia (properly "assembled people") its content.

The church is composed of all who have professed faith in Christ and have accepted him as Saviour. The members are considered as a church by the church (Rom 15 16; 1 Cor 11 8, etc.), even in the case of the incestuous person; e.g. the Christian converts in Rome at least (Rom 16 18; cf Eph 5 11-15) makes it clear that the excommunication of grave sinners had been found necessary, and one may doubt if St. Paul had much hope for the "false brethren," of 2 Cor 11 29; Gal 2 4 (cf 1 Cor 17, etc.). But on the whole St. Paul's optimism has little doubt that every member of the church is in right relations with God and the church (in his own mind, and that of the church, form a corporate, social organism of the greatest possible solidarity (1 Cor 12 26, etc.) and have the maximum of responsibility toward one another (Rom 15 16; 1 Cor 11 8; 2 Cor 3 13-15; Gal 6 2; Eph 4 25; Col 1 24, etc.). The church is a community from the very world around them (2 Cor 4 14-18; 1 Cor 12, etc.), although in constant intercourse with the world (1 Cor 16 10-27, etc.). It was even desirable, in the conditions of the times, that the church should have her own courts like Jews in gentile cities (1 Cor 6 1-15). The right of the church to act in behalf of members is taken for granted (1 Cor 8 11; 2 Cor 2 5-11). According to Acts 14 23 St. Paul made his own appointments of church officers, but the Epistle as a whole suggests that this practice did not extend beyond Asia Minor. For further details see CREATION GOVERNMENTS. A general resemblance to the attributes of Paul's own authority is presupposed throughout.

The object of Christ's sanctifying power (Eph 2 21-22) and its method is to unite with Him as to be spoken of as His "body" (1 Cor 12 27, etc.), as the parts may be on the body (cf. 1 Cor 12 27, etc.). The unity of Christ, the extension of His personality into the world ( Eph 1 20 21), as his members, it not only their duty toward one another, but also the responsibility of carrying Christ's message into the world (Phil 3 15f. and presupposed everywhere) and the glory in the church and in Christ Jesus unto all generations for ever and ever" (Eph 3 21).

As the doctrine of Christ is something more than a subjective impression made on the mind by the fact of that death, the union of the church with the death accomplished in baptism in Rom 6 1-7 and Col 2 11 is not explained in any particular, to make a more dramatic ceremony. That St. Paul was greatly influenced by the mystery-religion concepts has not been made out. But his readers certainly were so influenced and tended to conceive very nonChristian a doctrine of the Church (Rom 10 6; 15 12 f). And historic exegesis is bound to construe St. Paul's language in the way in which he knew his readers would. A Jewish or a Christian gentle reader of St. Paul's day would have seen a purely "symbolic" meaning in either of the baptismal passages. Philo would have done so, but not the class of men with whom St. Paul had to deal. Similarly, with regard to the Lord's Supper, in 1 Cor 10 16 St. Paul teaches that through participation in a sacral meal it is possible to bring into objective relations with demons of whom one is wholly ignorant. In this light it is hard to avoid the conclusion that through participation in the Lord's Supper the believer is objectively brought into communion with the Lord (1 Cor 10 16), a communion that will react for evil on the believer if he approach it in an unworthy manner (11 29-32); i.e., the union with Christ that is the center of St. Paul's theology is not to be obtained by fasting. And in the Lord's Supper this union is further strengthened, though that faith on the part of the Christian which is an indispensable prerequisite for the efficacy of the sacraments need not be said.

PAULUS, päl'ús, SERGIUS, sär'gē-us (Σέργιος Παῦλος, Sergios Paulos): The Rom "proconsul" (RV) or "deputy" (AV) of Cyprus when Paul, along with Barnabas, visited that island on his first missionary journey (Acts 13 4-7). The official title of Sergius is curiously given to this man, who was originally an imperial provincial, but in 22 BC it was transferred by Augustus to the Senate, and was therefore placed under the administration of proconsuls, as is attested by extant Cyprian coins of the period. When the two missionaries arrived at Paphos, Sergius, who was a "prudent man" (AV) or "man of understanding" (RV), i.e. a man of practical understanding, "sought to hear the word of God" (Acts 13 7). Bar-Jesus, or Elymas, a sorcerer, was sent against the apostles by Sergius, fearing the influence of the apostles, sought, however, "to turn aside the proconsul from the faith," but was struck with blindness (vs 8-11); and the deputy, "when he saw what was done, believed, being astonished at the teaching of the Lord" (ver 12). The narrative indicates that not only the proconsul, but the people of Cyprus, with which Sergius listened to the teaching of Paul (cf ver 7) conduced to his conversion (Bengel). Attempts have been made to trace some connection between the name Sergius Paulus and the fact that Saul is first called Paul in ver 9, but the joint occurrence of the two names is probably to be set down as only a coincidence.

PAVEMENT, pāv'ment: In the OT, with the exception of 2 K 16 17, the Heb word is רכפת, rıḵāf; (2 Ch 7 3; Est 1 6; Ezk 40 17, etc.) and Sir 20 18 and Bel ver 19 the word is און, 'aron. In Jn 19 13, the name "The Pavement" (ל>'+הא, "paved with stone") is given to the place outside the Praetorium on which Pilate sat to give judicial sentence upon Jesus. The Aramaic equivalent is declared to be גָּבָרָתָה (g.b'rah). The identification of the place is uncertain.

PAVILION, pāv'il-yōn: a covered place, booth, tent, in which a person may be hid or secret (Ec 5 15; Ps 27 7; Ps 121 6; Ps 51 20), otherwise withdrawn from view.
PAW, pê (פֵּח, kapkh, lit. "palms,") of "hand"): The former (kapkh) is applied to the soft paws of animals in contradistinction to the hoofs (Lev 11:27); the latter is thrice used in 1 S 17:27; "Jeh that delivered me out of the paw (yêdôh) of the lion (Lev 15:37). He will deliver me out of the hand (yêdôh) of this Philistine." The vb. to "paw" (פֵּח, haphar) is found in the description of the horse: "He paweth (m. "they paw") in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength: he goeth out to meet the armed men (m. "the weapons")" (Job 39:21). The word is usually tr. to "delve into," "to pro into," "to explore."

PE, pê (פֵּה, LXX; פֵּא, AV): The 17th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as p. It was formerly used (primarily, generally, usually) to be used for the number 80. For name, etc., see Alphabet.

PEACE, pêâ (פֶּאָז, šâlôm; εἰρήνη, cirēnē): Is a condition of freedom from disturbance, whether outwardly, as of a nation from war, or (2 S 22:12; Ps 18:11) to kings drinking in privacy (1 K 18:27; 2 Ch 34:18) gives "pavilion" for AV "tabernacle," in Job 36:29; Isa 4:6; while in Nu 26:8 it substitutes this word, with m. "aloe," for AV "tent" (kubbâh, and Jer 43:10, for "royal pavilion" (shophûrâh), reads in m. "glittering pavilion."

The term is used with reference to God (2 S 22:12; Ps 18:11): to kings drinking in privacy (1 K 18:27), gives "pavilion" for AV "tabernacle," in Job 36:29; Isa 4:6; while in Nu 26:8 it substitutes this word, with m. "aloe," for AV "tent" (kubbâh, and Jer 43:10, for "royal pavilion" (shophûrâh), reads in m. "glittering pavilion."

In the LXX; cf Lk 19:42, RV "If thou hast known.... the things which belong unto peace", we have the word "pavilion" for AV "tabernacle."

2. In the NT, through the coming of the Christ (Lk NT 1:74:79; 12:51) and also its fulfilment in the higher spiritual sense. (1) The gospel in Christ is a message of peace from God to men (Lk 2:14; Acts 10:36, "peacemaking..."). It is "peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ," in Rom 5:1; AV 10:15; peace between Jew and Gentile (Eph 2:14:15); an essential element in the spiritual kingdom of God (Rom 14:17). (2) It is to be cherished and followed by Christians. Jesus rebuked His disciples, "Have salt in yourselves, and be at peace one with another" (Mk 9:60); Paul exHORTS, "Live in peace: and the God of love and peace shall be with you" (2 Cor 13:11; of Rom 12:18; 1 Cor 7:15). (3) God is therefore "the God of peace," the Author and Giver of all good ("peace" including every blessing) very frequently (e.g. Rom 15:33; 16:20; 2 Thess 3:16, etc., "the Lord of peace"). "Peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" is a common apostolic wish or salutation (1 Cor 1:7; Eph 1:2, 38). (4) The word "peace" as a greeting (Mk 10:13; Lk 10:5): "a son of peace" (10:6) is one worthy of it, in sympathy with it; the Lord's own greeting to His disciples was "Peace be unto you" (Lk 24:36; Jn 20:19:26). (5) And there is a perfect peace in the Lord's intercession for us (Eph 6:18). Especially His blessing of "Peace" (Jn 14:27); we have also frequently "Go in peace" (Mk 5:34; Lk 7:50). In Lk 19:38 we have "peace in heaven" (in the acclamation of Jesus on His Messianic entry of Jerusalem). (6) The peace of Christ, brought about by spiritual peace from and with God, peace in the heart, peace as the disposition or spirit. He said that He did not come "to send peace on the earth, but a sword," referring to the searching nature of His call and the divisions and clearances it would create. But, of course, the spirit of the gospel and of the Christian is one of peace, and it is a Christian duty to seek to bring war and strife everywhere to an end. This is represented as the ultimate result of the gospel and of the Spirit of Christ; universal and permanent peace can come only as that Spirit rules in men's hearts.

"Peace" in the sense of silence, to hold one's peace, etc., is in the OT generally the tr. of קָצָם, "to be still, to be quiet, to be silent" (Gen 18:11; Shem 5:14), or the surge of one's heart (Num 23:22). (7) Inward peace was the portion of the righteous who trusted in God (Job 22:21; "Acquaint now thyself with him, and be at peace [šalâm];" Ps 4:8; 85:8, "He will speak peace unto his people, and to his saints"); 119:165; Prov 3:17; Isa 26:3, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace [Hab "peace, peace"], whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee"; Mal 2:5; also outward peace (Job 5:23; Prov 16:7, etc.). (4) Peace was to be sought and followed by the righteous (2 S 22:12; Ps 25:14, "Seek peace, and pursue it"); 8:16,19, "Love truth and peace"). (5) Peace should be a prominent feature of the Messianic times (Isa 2:4; 9:6, "Prince of Peace"); 11:6; Ezek 34:25; Mic 4:2-4; Zec 9:10) In the NT, where eirēnē has much the same meaning and usage as šâlôm (for which it is employed PECHEMAKER, pēs'mâk-ër: Occurs only in the pl. (Mt 5:9, "Blessed are the peacemakers [eirēnopoûlôi]; for they shall be called sons of God") who is "the God of peace"). We have also what seems to be a reflection of this saying in Jas 3:18, "The fruit of righteousness is sown in peace for [Heb "by"] them who make peace (eirēnô).... (lote peinai eirēnē)." In classical Gr a "peacemaker" was an ambassador sent to treat of peace. The word in Mt 5:9 would, perhaps, be better rendered “peace-workers,” implying not merely making peace between those who are at variance, but maintaining peace as that which is the will of the God of peace for men.

PEACOCK, pe'kōk (אֲדוֹן, tukkel tym [pl.]; Lat Pavo cristatus): A bird of the genus Pavo. Japan is the native home of the plainer peafowl; Siam, Ceylon and India produce the commonest and most gorgeous. The peacock has a bill of moderate size with an arched tip, its cheeks are bare, the eyes not large, but very luminous, a crest of 24 feathers 2 in. long, with naked shafts and broad tips of blue, glancing to green. The neck is not long but powerfully arched, the breast full, prominent and of bright blue green, blue predominant. The wings are short and ineffectual, the feathers on them made up of a surprising array of colors. The tail consists of 18 short, stiff, grayish-brown feathers. Next is the lining of the train, of the same color. The glory of this glorious bird lies in its train. It begins on the back between the wings in tiny feathers not over 6 in. in length, and extends backward. The quills have the tip of purple, shades of blue, green, and the eye at the tip of each feather from one-half to 2 in. across, of a deep peculiar blue, surrounded at the lower part by half-moon-shaped crescents of green. Whether the train lies naturally, or is spread in full glory, the display shows exquisitely a marvelous glancing shades of blue, green, purple, blue and bronze. When this train is spread, it opens like a fan behind the head with its sparkling crest, and above the wondrous blue of the breast. The bird has the power to contract the massive train at the will of the quills and play a peculiar sort of music with them. It loves high places and cries before a storm in notes that are starting to one not familiar with them. The bird can be domesticated and will become friendly enough to take food from the hand. The peahen is smaller than the cock, her neck green, her wings gray, tan and brown—but she has not the gorgeous train. She nests on earth and breeds with difficulty when imported, the young being delicate and tender. The grown birds are hardy when acclimated, and live to old age. By some freak of nature, pure white peacocks are at times produced. Aristophanes mentioned peafowl in his Birds, II. 102, 209. Alexander claimed that he brought them into Greece by sea from the East, but failed to prove, but not by contention. Pliny wrote that Hortensius was the first to serve the birds for food, and that Auidius Lurco first fattened and sold them in the markets. It was the custom to skin the bird, roast and receive it and send it to the table, the gaudy feathers showing.

The first appearance of the bird in the Bible occurs in a summation-up of the wealth and majesty of Solomon (1 K 10:22; “...and the navy of Tarshish...”). every three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks”). (Here LXX translates πελεκηλοί [i.e., πελεκήλοι], pelekeloi [i.e., “stones” carved with an ax.”]) The same statement is made in 2 Ch 9:21: “...for the king had ships that went to Tarshish with the servants of Huram: once every three years came the ships of Tarshish, bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks” (LXX occurs). There is no question among scholars and scientists but that these statements are true, as the ships of Solomon are known to have visited the coasts of India and Ceylon, and Tarshish was on the Malabar coast of India, where the native name of the peacock was tukkel, from which tukkelym undoubtingly derives. See Gold, p. 472). The historian Tennant says that the Heb names for “ivory” and “apes” were also the same as the Tamil. The reference to the small, ineffectual wing of the peacock which scarcely will lift the weight of the body and train, that used to be found in Job, is now applied to the ostrich, and it is no doubt correct: “The wings of the ostrich wave proudly: But are they the pinions and plumage of love?” (Job 39:13).

While the peacock wing seems out of proportion to the size of the bird, it will sustain flight and bear the body to the treetops. The wing of the ostrich is useless for flight. GENE STRATTON-PORTER

PECULIAR, pe-kü'lar: The Lat peculiwm means “private property,” so that “peculiar” properly implied “pertaining to the individual.” In modern Eng. the word has usually degenerated into a half-colloquial form for “extraordinary,” but in Bib. Eng. it is a thoroughly dignified term for “esp. one’s own”; of the “peculiar treasure” of the king in Ecd 28 (AV). Hence “peculiar people” (AV Dt 23, 2 etc), means a people esp. possessed by God and particularly prized by Him. The word in the OT is usually renderedPELADHEL, ped-a-ke'el (טֶלֶדֶל, p'e-dhale’el, “whom God redeems”): A prince of Naphtali; one of the tribal chiefs who apportioned the New Canaan (Nu 34:28; cf ver 17).

PELADHUZ, pe-dá'zur (טֶלֶדָע, p'e-dhá'keur): Mentioned in Nu 1:10; 2:20; 7:54–59; 10:23 as the father of Gamilah, head of the tribe of Manasseh, at the time of the exodus. See ESR T, VIII, 555f.

PELDAIAH, pe-dá'ya, pe-d'ya (טֶלֶדַיָּה, p'e-dhá-yá’áh, “Jehovah redeems”): (1) Father of Joel, who was ruler of Western Manasseh in David’s reign (1 Ch 27:20). Form תֶלֶדַיָּה (see above).

(2) Pedahiah of Runah (2 K 23:36), father of Zebudah, Jehoiakim’s mother.

(3) A son of Jeconiah (1 Ch 3:18); in ver 19 the father of Zerubbabel. Pedahiah’s brother, Shealtiel, is also called father of Zerubbabel (Ezr 3:2; but in 1 Ch 3:17 AV spelled “Salathiel”). There may have been two cousins, or even different individuals who were referred to under Shealtiel and Salathiel respectively.

(4) Another who helped to repair the city wall (Neh 3:25), of the family of Parosh (cf. ver 47). Perhaps this is the man who stood by Ezra at the reading of the Law (Neh 8:4; 1 Esd 9:44, called “Phai-deus”).

(5) “Levite,” appointed one of the treasurers. over the “treasuries” of the Lord’s house (Neh 13:13).

(6) A Benjamite, one of the rulers residing in Jerus under the “return” arrangements (Neh 11:7).

PEDESTAL, ped’s-əs-tal (Tēn, kên): In two places (1 K 7:29-31) RV gives this word for AV “base” (in Solomon’s “Sea”).

PEDIAS, ped’i-as, pē’di-as (Πηδαῖς, Petaides, A, Πηδαίας, Petaides; AV by mistake Pelias): One of those who had taken “strange wives” (1 Esd 9:34) = “Bedezah” of Ezr 10:35.

PEDIGREE, ped’i-grē (μνημεῖον, kithyallid, “to show one’s birth”): The Eng. word “pedigree” occurs only once in the Bible, according to the concordance. In Nu 1:18, it is said: “They declared their pedigrees”; that is, they enrolled or registered themselves according to their family connections. The same idea is expressed frequently, employing a different term in the Heb, by the compound phrase of Ch, Ezr and Neh, “to reckon by genealogy,” “to give genealogy,” etc (cf 1 Ch 7:59; Ezr 2:62 f; Neh 7:64). These last passages indicate the importance of the registered pedigree or genealogy, i.e., the list of the priests in the post-exilic community, for the absence of the list of their pedigrees, or their genealogical records, was sufficient to cause the exclusion from the priesthood of certain enrolled priests.

PEEL, pil. PILL, pil: “Fill” (Gen 30:37:8; Tob 11:13 [RV “scaled”]) and “peel” (Isa 18:27 [AV and RVm]; Ezk 29:18 [AV and ERV]) are properly two different words, meaning “to remove the hair” (piles) and “to remove the skin” (peles), but in Elizabethan Eng. the two were confused. In Isa 18:27, the former meaning is implied, as the Heb word here (פור, מזרע) is rendered “pluck off the hair” in Ezr 9:3; Neh 13:25; Isa 50:6. The word, however, may also mean “make smooth” (so RVm) or “bronzed.” This last, referring to the dark skins of the Ethiopians, is best here, but in any case AV and RVm are impossible. In the other cases, however, “remove the skin” (cf “scaled,” Tob 11:13 RV) is meant. So in Gen 30:37:38, Jacob “peels” (so RV) off portions of the bark of his rods, as so to give alternating colors (cf ver 39). And in Ezk 29:18, the point is Nebuchadrezzar’s total failure in his siege of Tyre, although the soldiers had carried burdens until the skin was peeled from their shoulders (cf ARV “worm”).

PEEP, pép (לעָפָה, ἐμπαίζω; AV Isa 8:19; 10:14 [RV “chirp”]): In 10:14, the word describes the sound made by a nestling bird; in 8:19, the changed (ventriloquistic?) voice of necromancers uttering sounds that purported to come from the feeble dead. The modern use of “peep” as “lock” is found in Sir 21:23, as the tr of παρακάτω, paraqēptō: “A foolish man peepeth in from the door of another man’s house.”

PEKAH, pe’kā (פֶּקָה, pekāh, “opening” [of the eyes] [2 K 15:25-31]; פֶּקָה, Pekece): Son of Remaliah, and 18th king of Israel.

a. Accession Pekah murdered his predecessor, Pekahiah, and seized the reins of power (ver 25). His usurration of the throne is said to have taken place in the 52nd year of Uzziah, and his reign to have lasted for 20 years (ver 27). His accession, therefore, may be placed in 748 BC (other chronologies place it later, and make the reign last only a few years).

Pekah came to the throne with the resolution of assisting in forming a league to resist the westward advance of Assyria. The memory of defeat by Assyria at the battle of Karkar in 753, more than 100 years before, had never died out.

b. Attitude Tiglath-pileser III was now ruler of Assyria Assyria, and in 734 he had proved himself a resistless conqueror. His lust for battle was not yet satisfied, and the turn of Philistia and Syria was about to come. In 733, a coalition, of which Pekah was a prominent member, was being formed to check his further advance. It comprised the princes of Comagene, Gebal, Hamath, Arvad, Ammon, Moab, Edom, Gaza, Samaria, Syria, and some minor potentates, the list being taken from a roll of the subject-princes of Assyria who attended and assisted. After the fall of Damascus, Ahaz likewise attended as a voluntary tributary to do homage to Tiglath-pileser (2 K 16:10).

While the plans of the allies were in course of formation, an obstacle was met with which proved insurmountable by the arts of diplomacy. This was the refusal of Ahaz, Recaligant then on the throne of David, to join the confederacy. Arguments and threats having failed to move him, resort was had to force, and the troops of Samaria were sent against the place (2 K 18:1). Great alarm was felt at the news of their approach, as seen in the 7th and 8th chapters of Isa. The allies had in view to dispossess Ahaz of his crown, and give it to one of their own number, a son of Tabeel. Isaiah himself was the mainstay of the opposition to their projects. The policy he advocated, by Divine direction, was that of complete neutrality. This he urged with passionate earnestness, but with only partial success. Isaiah (probably) had kept back Ahaz from joining the coalition, but could not prevent him from sending an embassy, laden with gifts to Tiglath-pileser, to secure his intervention. On the news arriving that the Assyrian was on the march, a hasty retreat was made from Jerusalem, and the blow soon thereafter fell, where Isaiah had predicted, on Rezin and Pekah, and their kingdoms.

The severely concise manner in which the writer of K deals with the later sovereigns of the Northern Kingdom is, in itself, a testimony of PEAK.

The messages sent from Jerusalem to Nineveh appear to have arrived when the army of Tiglath-pileser was already prepared to march. The movements of the Assyrians being recorded, they fell upon Damascus, before the junction of the allies as and Eastern accomplished. Rezin was defeated in a decisive battle, and took refuge Overrun in his capital, which was closely invested. Another part of the invading army descended on the upper districts of Syria and Samaria. Serious resistance to the veteran troops of the East could hardly be made, and city after city fell. A list of districts and cities that were overrun is given in 2 K 15:29. It comprises Galead beyond Jordan—already subdued by Damascus—never (1 Ch 5:20); the tribal division of Naphtali, lying to the W. of the lakes of Galilee and Merom, and all Galilee, as far S. as the plain of Esdraelon and the Valley of Jezreel. Cities particularly mentioned are Ijon (now ‘A‘agan), Abel-beth-maacah (now ‘Ati,) Janoah (now Yānūn), Kadesh (now Kadous) and Hazor (now Hadirār).

These places and territories were not merely attacked and plundered. Their inhabitants were removed, with indescribable loss and suffering, to the four corners of the earth. Of the places and regions given as Halah, Habur, Hara, and both sides of the river Gozan, an affluent of the Euphrates. The transplantation of these tribes to a home beyond the great river was a new experiment in political geography, devised with the object of welding the whole of Western Asia into a single empire. It was work of immense difficulty and must have taxed the resources of even so great an organizer as Tiglath-pileser. The soldiers who had conquered in the field were, of course, employed to escort the many thousands of prisoners to their new locations. About two-thirds of the Sam kingdom, comprising the districts of Samaria, the two Galilees, and the trans-Jordanic region, was thus denuded of its inhabitants.
Left with but a third of his kingdom—humbled but still defiant—Pekah was necessarily unpopular with his subjects. In this extremity the wave of invasion from the North, having spent itself—the usual solution occurred, and a plot was formed by which the assassination of Pekah should be secured, and the assassin should take his place as a satrap of Assyria. A tool was found in the person of Hoesha, whom Tiglath-pileser claims to have appointed to the throne. The Bib. narrative does not do more than record the fact that "Hoshea the son of Elah made a conspiracy against Pekah the son of Remaliah, and smote him, and slew him, and reigned in his stead" (2 K 15 18). The date given to this act is the 20th year of Jotham. Pekah's reign lasted but 16 years, this number is evidently an error.

For the first time, the historian makes no reference to the religious cult of a king of Israel. The subject was beneath notice. The second section of Isaiah's prophecies in (7 1—10 4) belongs to the reign of Isaiah Ahaz and thus to the time of Pekah, both of whom are named in the prophecy. Pekah is named in 7 1, and is often, in this and the next chapter, referred to as "the son of Remaliah." His loss of the territorial divisions of Zebulun and Naphtali is referred to in 9 1, and is followed by a prediction of future glory for the earthly home of the Son of Man. The wording of Isa 9 14 shows that it was written before the fall of Samaria, and that of Isa 10 9—11 that Damascus and Samaria had both fallen and Jerus was expected to follow. This section of Isaiah may thus be included in the literature of the time of Pekah.

PEKAHIAH, pē-kā'-hā, pē-kā'-yā, pēkā'-yāh, "Jehah opened" [the eyes] [2 K 15 23—26]; Phäkeias, Phækeias, A, Phækeias; [Plathias]: Son of Menahem and 17th king of Israel. He is said to have succeeded his father in the "50th year of Azariah" (or Uzziah), a synchronism not free from difficulty if his accession is placed in 750—749 (see MENAHEM; UZIAH). Most date lower, after 738, when an Assyrian inscription makes Menahem pay tribute to Tiglath-pileser (cf 2 K 15 19—21).

Pekahiah came to the throne enveloped in the danger which always accompanies the successor of a exceptionally strong ruler, in a new country where there was no settled law of succession. Within two years of his accession he was feely murdered—the 7th king of Israel who had met his death by violence (the others were Naahal, Elah, Tibni, Jehoram, Zechariah and Shallum). The chief conspirator was Pekah, son of Remaliah, one of his captains, with whom, as agent in the crime, were associated 50 Gileadites. These penetrated into the palace (RV "castle") of the king's house, and put Pekahiah to death, his bodyguards, Arab and Ararih, dying with him. The record, in its close adherence to fact, gives no reason for the king's removal, but it may reasonably be surmised that it was connected with a league which was at this time forming for opposing resistance to the power of Assyria. This league, Pekahiah, preferring his father's policy of tributary vassalage, may have refused to join. If so, the decision cost him his life. The act of treachery and violence is in accordance with all that Hosea tells us of the internal condition of Israel at this time: "They...devour their judges; all their kings are fallen!" (Hos 7 7).

The narrative of Pekahiah's short reign contains but a brief notice of his personal character. Like his predecessors, Pekahiah did not depart from the system of worship introduced by Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, "who made Israel to sin." Despite the denunciation of the prophets of the Northern Kingdom (Am 5 21—27; Hos 8 1—6), the king, and a land of the calvies remained to him, till the whole was swept away, a few years later, by the fall of the kingdom.

After Pekahiah's murder, the throne was seized by the regicide Pekah. W. SHAW CALDESCOTT

PEKOD, pē'kōd (יְפֹ֫כָד, pēkōdāh): A name applied in Jer 50 21 and Ezk 23 23 to the Chaldæans. RV in the former passage gives the meaning as "visitation."

PELAIH, pē-lā'ya, pē-lā'ya (לַעֲיַה, p̄la'yāh): (1) A son of Elioenai, of the royal house of Judah (1 Ch 3 24).
(2) A Levite who assisted Ezra by expounding the Law (Neh 8 7), and was one of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (10 10). He is called "Phalais" in 1 Esd 9 48 (RV).

PELALIAH, pel-a-lā'ya (לַעֲלַיָ֥ה, p̄la'yāh), "Jeh judges": A priest, father of Jerobam, one of the "workers" in the Lord's house (Neh 11 12).

PELALIAH, pel-a-lā'ya (לָעֲלָיָה, p̄la'yāh, "Jeh delivers") as "Phalalas" as "Phaleas": (1) One who "sealed" the covenant (Neh 10 22).
(2) A descendant of Solomon, grandson of Jerubabel (1 Ch 3 21).
(3) A Simeonite, one of the captains who cleared out the Amalekites and dwelt on the captured land (1 Ch 4 42 43).
(4) A prince of the people whom Ezekiel (in Babylon) pictures as "deceiving mischief" and giving "wicked counsel" in Jerus. He is represented as falling dead while Ezekiel prophesies (Ezk 11 13). His name has the 7, v, ending.

PELEG, pē'leg (פֶלֶג, peleg, "watercourse," "division"): A son of Eber, and brother of Joktan. The derivation of the name is given: "for in his days was the earth divided" (nepheh'γāh) (Gen 10 25; of Lk 3 35, AV "Pealec"). This probably refers to the scattering of the world's population and the confounding of its language recorded in Gen 11 1—9. In Am. pēlah mean "division"; in Heb peleg means "watercourse." The name would naturally be due to the occupation by this people of some well-watered (furnished), district (e.g. in Babylonia), for these patronyms represent races, and the derivation in Gen 10 25 is a later editor's remark.

S. F. HUNTER
PELET, pe'let (םֶלֶט; pelet, "delivery";): (1) Son of Ithai (1 Ch 2 47). (2) Son of Asmaveth, one of those who resorted to David at Ziklag while he was hiding from Saul (1 Ch 12 3).

PELETH, pe'leth (פֶלֶת; peleth, "swiftness"): (1) Father of On, one of the rebels against Moses and Aaron (Nu 16 1); probably same as PALLU (q.v.). (2) A descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2 33).

PELETHITES, pe'leth-its (פֶלֶתִיתֵס; peleth-its): A company of David's bodyguard, like the CHESTITHITES (q.v.) (2 S 8 18; 15 18); probably a corrupt form of "Philistines."

PeliaS, pe'lias: AV = RV "Peleas."

PELICAN, pel-ikan (פקֹן; pekon; פֶלֵי-קָן, pe'lian; פֶלֵי-קָט, pel'kat, a place-name): Two of David's military companies are thus described: (1) "Holez the Pelican" (1 Ch 11 27) (see PALTITE); and (2) "Ahijah the Pelonite" (1 Ch 11 36).

Pen, (פֶן; פֶונֶה, heret; כָּלָמוֹס, kalamos): The first writing was done on clay, wax, lead or stone tablets by scratching into the material with some hard pointed instrument. For this purpose bodkins of bronze, iron, bone or ivory were used (Job 19 24; Isa 8 1; Jer 17 1). In Jer 17 1 a diamond is described as being used for the same purpose. In Jer 36 Baruch, the son of Neriah, declares that he recorded the words of the prophet with ink in the book. In ver 23 it says that the king cut the roll with the penknife (lit. the scribe's knife). This whole scene can best be explained if we consider that Baruch and the king's scribes were in the habit of using reed pens. These pens are made from the hollow jointed stalks of a coarse grass growing in marshy places. The dried reed is cut diagonally with the penknife and the point thus formed is carefully shaved thin to make it flexible and the nib split as in the modern pen. The last operation is the clipping off of the very point so that it becomes a stub pen. The Arab scribe does this by resting the nib on his thumb nail while cutting, so that the nib will be clean and the pen will not scratch. The whole procedure requires considerable skill. The pupil in Hcb or Arab, writing learns to make a pen as his first lesson. A scribe carries a sharp knife around with him for keeping his pen knife in good condition, hence the name penknife. The word used in 3 Jn ver 13 is kalamos, "reed," indicating that the pen described above was used in John's time (cf kalam, the common Arab name for pen). See Ink; Ink-Horn; Writing.

Figureative. Written with a pen of iron, i.e. indelibly (Jer 17 1; Ps 45 1; cf Jer 36 18). As the trained writer records a speech, so the Psalmist's tongue impresses or engraves on his hearers' minds what he has conceived.

comes a history of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the collateral lines of descendants being rapidly dismissed. The story of Joseph is told in detail, and Gen closes with his death. The rest of the Pent covers the opus of the Israelites in Egypt, the exodus and wanderings, the conquest of the Trans-Jordanic lands and the fortunes of the people to the death of Moses. The four concluding books contain masses of legislation mingled with the narrative (for special contents, see arts., on the several books).

II. Authorship, Composition, Date.—The view that Moses was the author of the Pent, with the exception of the concluding vs of Dt, was once held universally. It is still held by the great mass of Jews, Critical and Christians, but in most universities of Northern Europe and North America other theories prevail. An application of what is called 'higher' or 'documentary criticism' (to distinguish it from lower or textual criticism) has led to the formation of a number of hypotheses. Some of these are very widely held, but unanimity has not been attained, and recent investigations have challenged even the conclusions that are most generally accepted. In England the vast majority of the critics would regard Driver's LOT and Carpenter and Harford-Batterby's Hexateuch as fairly representative of their position, but on the Continent of Europe the numerous school that holds such positions is developing widely, and influencing world opinion, while even in Great Britain and America some of the ablest critics are beginning to show signs of being shaken in their allegiance to cardinal points of the higher-critical case. However, at the time of writing, the case of the Pent is in a very unsatisfactory state; the fresh formulation of their views, and accordingly the general positions of the works named may be taken as representing with certain qualifications the general critical theory. Some of the chief stadia in the development of this may be mentioned.

After attention had been drawn by earlier writers to various signs of post-Mosaic date and extraordinary perplexities in the Pent, the first real step toward what its advocates have, till within the last few years, called "the modern position" was taken by J. Astruc (1753). He propounded what Carpenter terms "the clue to the documents," i.e. the difference of the Divine appellations in Gen as a test of authorship. On this view the word "Kurios" (characteristic of the principal seer, Moses) and the Tetragrammaton, i.e. the Divine name "YHWH" represented by the "Lord" (Gen I-Deut) and "Eloah" and "Yehovah" (Pent) seemingly belong to one author, while another. Despite occasional warnings, this clue was followed in the main for 150 years after the pioneering point. In whole current of critical development, but the most recent investigations have successfully proved that it is unreliable (see below, 3, [3]). Astruc was followed by Eichhorn (1790), who made a more thorough examination of Gen, indicating numerous differences of style, representation, etc.

Goddes (1792) and Vater (1802-5) extended the method applied to Gen to the other books of the Pent. In 1822, Hengel distinguished two Eloists in Gen, but this view did not find followers for some time. The next step of fundamental importance was the assignment of the bulk of Dt to the 7th cent. BC. This was due to De Wette (1806). Hupfeld (1853) again distinguished a "principe dietro le scene" which has been adopted by the critics. Thus there are four main documents at least: D (the bulk of Dt), the Elohist (P) and E (the Pent) and one document (J) that underlies the Tetragrammaton in Gen. From 1822 (Block) a series of writers maintained that the Book of Josh was compounded from the same documents as the Pent (see Hexateuch).

Two other developments call for notice: (1) there has been great tendency to divide these documents further, regarding them as the work of schools rather than of individuals; within different streams (P, E, etc., J, etc.; or in the notation of other writers J, Je, etc); (2) a particular scheme of dating has found wide acceptance. The principal development was assumed that the principal Elohist (P) was the earliest document. A succession of writers of whom R. Hasiass, Graf, Kuenen and Wellhausen are the most prominent have, however, maintained that this is not the first hypothesis put forward, and should be referred to by the name of Josiah's reign. Later it was combined with JE into JED by a redactor (Kt6), P or PC, the last of all (originally the P, principal Elohist, minus its later part with an earlier code of uncertain date which consists in the main of most of Lev, Ex 40, the Laws of Holiness (H or Psb). P itself is largely post-exilic. Ultimately it was joined with JED by a priestly redactor (Jr) into what is called Priestly. As already stated, the theory is subject to many minor variations. Moreover, it is admitted that not all its portions are generally well supported. With JE into J and E is regarded as less certain than the separation of P, and again, there is analysis, differences of opinion as to the exact dating of the documents, and so forth. Yet the view just sketched has been held by a very numerous and influential school during recent years, nor is it altogether fair to lay stress on the differences of opinion, as to the documents involved in the Pent, that the data were inadequate to enable all the minor details to be determined with certainty (see Criticism of the Bible).

This theory will hereafter be discussed at length for two reasons: (1) while it is now commonly less gainsay ground, it is still more widely held than any other; and (2) so much of the modern work has been written from this standpoint that no intelligent use can be made of the most of the ordinary books of reference without some acquaintance with it.

Before 1908 the conservative opposition to the dominant theory had exhibited two separate tendencies. One school of conservatives rejected the scheme in toto; the other accepted the analysis with certain modifications, but sought to throw back the dating of the documents. In both these respects it had points of contact with dissentient critics (e.g. Delitzsch, Knibb, Oecolampadius). More recently, Van Hoonacker, who sought to save for conservatism any sparcs they could from the general wreck-age. The former school of thought was most prominently represented by the late H. H. John, and J. H. Raven's OT Intro may be regarded as a typical modern presentation of their view; the latter esp. by Roberton and Orr. The scheme put forward by the last named has found many adherents. He refuses to regard J and E as two separate documents, holding that the J should rather think (as in the case of the Hex) as two recensions of one document marked by the use of different Divine appellations. The critical P he treats as the work of a supplementer, and that it it is independent of the Pent as we have it. He has assumed that the whole Pent as early. He holds that the work was done by "original composers, working with a common aim, and toward a common end, in contrast with the idea of late irresponsible redactors, combining, altering, manipulating, enlarging, at pleasure" (POY, 375).

While these were the views held among OT critics, a separate opposition had been growing up among archaeologists. This was of course utilized to the utmost by the conservatives of both kinds. In some ways archaeology undoubtedly has confirmed the traditional view as against the critical (see Archaeology and Criticism); but a candid survey leads to the belief that it has not yet dealt a mortal blow, and here again it must be remembered that the critics may justly plead that they must not be judged on mistakes that they made in their earlier investigations or on refutations of the more uncertain portions of their theory, but rather on the main completed result. It was indeed fitting that it should be certain topics to which archaeology can never supply any conclusive answer. If it be the case that the Pent contains hopelessly contradictory laws, no archaeological discovery can make them anything else; if the numbers of the Israelites are original and impossible, archaeology cannot make them possible. It is fair and right to lay stress on the instances in which archaeology has confirmed the Bible as against the critics; it is neither fair nor right to speak as if archaeology had done what it never purported to do and did not do.

The year 1908 saw the beginning of a new critical development which makes it very difficult to speak positively of modern critical views. Kuenen has been mentioned as one of the ablest and most eminent of those who brought the Graf-Wellhausen theory into prominence. In that year B. D. Eerdmans, his pupil and successor at Leyden, began the publication of a series of volumes in which he renounces his allegiance to the line of critics that had extended from Astruc to the publications of our own day, and entered on a series of investigations that were intended to set forth a new critical view. As his labors are not yet complete, it is impossible to present any account of his scheme; but the volumes already published justify certain remarks. Eerdmans has perhaps not converted any member of the Wellhausen school, but he has made many realize that their own scheme is not the only one possible. Thus while a few years ago we were constantly assured that the "main results" of OT criticism were unalterable and conservative, and recent writers adopt a different tone: e.g. Sellin (1910) says, "We stand in a time of fermentation and transition, and in what follows we present our own opinion merely as the hypothesis which appears to us to be the most fruitful." (Eertunck, p. 1.) By general consent Eerd- mans' work contains a number of isolated shrewd remarks to which criticism will have to attend in the future; but it also contains many observations that are demonstrably unsound (cf. Eerdmans, 1910, 549-561). His own reconstruction is in many respects so faulty and blurred that it does not seem likely that it will ever secure a large following in its present form. On the other hand he appears to have succeeded in inducing a large number of students in various parts of the world to think along new lines and in this way may exercise a very potent influence on the future course of OT study. His arguments show increasingly numerous signs of his having been influenced by the current literature, and it seems certain that criticism will ultimately be driven to recognize the essential soundness of the conservative position. In 1912 Dahse (TMH, 1) began the publication of a series of volumes attacking the conservative view, and it seems certain that criticism will ultimately be driven to recognize the essential soundness of the conservative position. In 1912 Dahse (TMH, 1) began the publication of a series of volumes attacking the conservative view, and it seems certain that criticism will ultimately be driven to recognize the essential soundness of the conservative position. In his view many phenomena are due to the influence of the pericopes of the synagogal service or the form of the text and not to the causes generally assigned.

The examination of the Graf-Wellhausen theory must now be undertaken and attention must first be directed to the evidence which is 2. Evidence adduced in its support. Why should for the Current Critical documents designated as J and E and P Scheme and D? Why is it believed that these documents are of very late date, in one case subsequent to the exile?

(1) Astruc's clue.—It has been said above that Astruc proposed the Divine appellations in Gen 22:17 as a clue to the dissection of that book. This is based on Ex 3 8, 9, and I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of Shaddai, and made no mention of Almighty, but by my name YHWH I was not known to them.' In numerous other places unutterably settled texts are written, e.g. 4 26, where we read of men beginning to call on it in the days of Noah. The discrepancy here is very obvious, for the Astruc and E. D. S. schemes can be said to be effectually removed by postulating different sources. This clue, of course, falls after Ex 3 8, but other difficulties are found, and moreover the sources already distinguished in Gen ace, it is claimed, marked by separate styles and other characteristics as discovered by Professor J. A. Astur, R. B. D. E., are to be identified when they occur in the narrative of the later books (see Criticism of the Bible).

(2) Signs of post-Mosaic departure. Inspection of the Pent shows that it contains a number of passages which, if it is alleged, could not have reached Moses in his present form. Probably the most familiar instance is the account of the death of Moses (Dt 34). Other examples are to be found in seeming allusions to post-Mosaic events, e.g. in Gen 22 we hear of the Mount of the Lord, the land of Moriah, and the altar brought to the Temple Hill, which, however, would not have been so designated before Solomon. So too the list of kings who reigned in the land before the wander- ing over the children of Israel (36 31) presumes the existence of the monarchy. The Camels which Moses referred to "then in the land" (Gen 12 6; 13 7) did not disapper till the time of Solomon, and, accordingly, this expression means "then still" it cannot antedate his reign. Dt 3 11 (Og's bestrade) comes unnaturally from one who had vanished Og but a few weeks previous (Nu 21 14 (AV)). Contains a reference to "the book of the Wars of the Lord" which would hardly have been quoted in this way by a contemporary. Ex 16 35 refers to the cessation of the manna after the death of Moses. These passages, and many like them, are cited to disprove Mosaic authorship; but the main weight of the critical argument does not rest on them.

(3) Narrative discrepancies.—While the Divine appellations form the starting-point, they do not even in Gen constitute the sole test of different authorship. There are other critical devices, narrative discrepancies, antinomies, differences of style, duplicate narratives, etc. adduced to support the critical theory. We must now glance at some of these.

In Gen 21 14 J Ishmael is a boy who can be carried on his mother's shoulder, but from a comparison of 16 316; 17, it appears that he must have been 14 when Isaac was born, and, since weaning sometimes occurs at the age of 3 in the East, may have been even as young as 3. Again, "We all remember the scene (Gen 27) in which Isaac in extreme old age blesses his sons; we picture him as lying on his deathbed. Do we, however, all realize that according to the chronology of the Book of Gen he must have been then lying on his deathbed for eighty years (cf 25 26; 26 34; 35 28)? Yet we can only diminish this period by extending proportionately the interval between Esau marrying his Hittite wives (26 31) and his father Isaac's expectation to send Jacob away, lest he should follow his brother's example (27 46); which, from the nature of the case, will not admit of any but slight extension. Keil, however, does so extend it, reducing the period of Isaac's last illness from 30 years to 30 months. And as Esau had taken his Hittite wives, should express her fear that Jacob, then aged 77, will do the same" ( DRIVER, Contemporary Review, LVII, 29). An important instance occurs in Nu. According to 33 38, Aaron died on the 1st day of the 5th month. From Dt 1 3 it appears that 6 months later Moses delivered his speech in the plains of Moab. Into those 6 months are compressed one month's mourning for Aaron in the Asia campaign, the wandering round by the Red Sea, the entry into Canaan, and the missions to Edom and Og, the journeys to Balaam and the whole episode of his prophecies, the painful occurrences of Nu 25, the second census, the appointment of Joshua, the expedition against Mèshin, besides other events. It is clearly impossible to fit all these into the time.

Other discrepancies are of the most formidable character. Aaron dies now at Mt. Hor (Nu 20 28; 33 38), now at Moab (Dt 10 6). According to Dt 1 1 11 the Philistines of Israel left Kadesh-barnea in the 3d year, and that year 15 after being returned to it, while in Nu they apparently remain there till the journey to Mt. Hor, where Aaron dies in the 40th year. The Tent of Meeting per-has provides some of the most perplexing of the discrepancies, for while according to the well-known scheme of Ex 25 ff and many other passages, it would appear very accommodating in the midst of the camp, Ex 33 7-11 provides us with another Tent of Meeting that stood outside the camp at a distance and could be carried by Moses alone. The vs. used are frequentative, denoting a regular presence, and it is impossible to suppose that after receiving the commands for the Tent of Meeting Moses could have instituted a quite different tent of the same name. Joseph again is sold, now by Ishmaelites (Gen 37 22-28; 39 1), anon by Midianites (28a-30). Sometimes he is imprisoned in one place, sometimes apparently in another. The story of Korah, Dathan and Abiram in Nu 16 is equally full of difficulty. The enormous numbers of the Israelites given in Nu 1-4, etc., are in conflict with passages that regard them as very few.

(4) Doubts.—Another portion of the critical argument is provided by doubts or duplicate narratives of the same event, e.g. Gen 16 and 21. These are particularly numerous in Gen, but are not confined to that book. "Twice do you appear in comments made differently in Gen 31 4-6.31 ff; Ex 16 13.) Twice does Moses draw water from the rock, when the strife of Israel begets the name Meribah ("strife") (Ex 17 1-7; Nu 20 1-18)." (Carpenter, Hexateuch, 1, 30).

These must be borne in mind. So far as the argument from the laws and their supposed historical setting. By far the most important portions of this are examined in Sanctuary and Priests (q.v.). These subjects form the two main pillars of the Graf-Wellhausen theory, and if the laws, in question must be read as supplementing the present article. An illustration may be taken from the slavery laws. It is claimed that Ex 21 1-6; Dt 16 12 if permit a Hebrew to contract for life slavery after 6 years' service, but that Lev 25 39-42 takes no notice of this law and enacts the totally different provision that Hebrews may remain in slavery only till the Year of Jubilee. While these different enactments might proceed from the same hand if properly coordinated, it is contended that this is not the case and that the legislator in Lev ignores the legislator in Ex and is in turn ignored by the legislator in Dt, who only knows the law of Ex.

(6) The argument from style.—The argument from style is next and is especially a difficulty, since it depends so largely on an immense mass of details. It is said that each of the sources has certain characteristic phrases which either occur nowhere else or only with very much less frequency. For instance in Gen 1, where 'Elkalim is used throughout, we find the word "create," but this is not employed in 2 4b ff, where the Tetragrammatarion occurs. Hence it is argued that this word is peculiarly characteristic of P as contrasted with the other documents, and may be used to prove his presence in e.g. 5 11.

(7) Proofs of the development hypothesis.—While the main supports of the Graf-Wellhausen theory must be sought in the arts, to which reference has been made, it is necessary to mention briefly some other phenomena to which some weight is attached. Jer displays many close resemblances to Dt, and the framework of K is written in a style that has marked similarities to the same book. Ezek again has notable points of contact with P and esp. with R; either he was acquainted with the portion of R or else he must have exercised considerable influence on those who composed them. Lastly the Chronicler is obviously acquainted with the completed Pent. Accordingly, it is claimed that the literature provides a sort of external standard that confirms the historical stages which the different Pentateuchal sources are said to mark. Dt influences Jer and the subsequent literature. It is argued that it would equally have influenced the earlier books of the tripartite sources. Again the completed Pent should have influenced K as it did Ch, if it had been in existence when the earlier history was composed.

(1) The veto of textual criticism.—The first great objection that may be made to the higher criticism is that it starts from the Massoretic text (MT) without investigation. This is not the only text that has come down to us, and in some instances it can be shown that alternative readings that have been preserved are superior to those of the MT. A convincing example occurs in Ex 18. According to the Heb., Jethro comes to Moses and says "I, thy father-in-law, am come," and subsequently Moses goes out to meet his father-in-law. The critics here postulate different sources, but some of the best authorities have preserved a reading which (allowing for ancient differences of orthography) supposes an alteration of a single letter. According to this reading the text is "Behold thy father-in-law, is come." The result of this Moses went out and met Jethro. The vast improvement in the sense is self-evident. But in weighing the change other considerations are also involved. Since this is the reading of some of the most ancient authorities, only two views are possible. Either the MT has undergone a corruption of a single letter, or else a redactor made a most improbable cento of two documents which gave a narrative of the historical event. It seems evident that this was followed by textual corruption of so happy a character as to remove the difficulty by the change of a single letter; and this corruption was so widespread that it was accepted as the genuine text by some of our best authorities. There is little doubt which of these two cases is the more credible, and with the recognition of the textual solution the particular 'bit of the analysis that depends on this corruption falls to the ground. This instance illustrates one branch of textual criticism; there are others. Sometimes the narrative shows with certainty that in the transmission of the text the positions have taken place; e.g. the identification of Kadesh shows that it was S, of Hormah. Another frequently a difficulty, since it depends so largely on an immense mass of details. It is said that each of the sources has certain characteristic phrases which either occur nowhere else or only with very much less frequency. For instance in Gen 1, where Elkalim is used throughout, we find the word "create," but this is not employed in 2 4b ff, where the Tetragrammatarion occurs. ing the true origin of the difficulties on which the critics rely.

(2) Astruc’s clue tested.—Astruc’s clue must next be examined. The critical case breaks down with extraordinary frequency. No clean division can be fixed upon here or anywhere else. In 1 Sam 16:13, Gen makes P or E use the Tetragrammaton or J Elohim. In some of these cases the critics can suggest no reason; in others they are compelled to assume that the MT is corrupt for no better reason than that it is in conflict with their theory. Again to the theory, the textual evidence of the theory frequently forces the analyst to sunder verses or phrases that cannot be understood apart from their present contexts, e.g. in Gen 28:21 Carpenter assigns the words “and Jeh will be my God” to J while giving the beginning and end of the verse to E; in Gen 32:8 3 goes to a redactor, though E actually refers to the statement of ver 3 in ver 5; in ch 32, ver 30 is torn from a J-context and given to E, thus leaving ver 31 (J) unintelligible. When textual criticism is applied, startling facts that entirely shatter the entire critical argument are suddenly revealed. The variants to the Divine appellations in Gen are very numerous, and in some instances the new readings are clearly superior to the MT, even when they substitute Elohim for the Tetragrammaton. Thus, in one variant of the same Elohim requires the word Elohim, as the name would otherwise have been Ishmaiah, and one Heb MS, a recension of the LXX and the Old Lat do in fact preserve the reading Elohim. The full facts and arguments cannot be given here, but Professor Strong has made an exhaustive examination of the various texts from Gen 1 1 to Ex 3 12. Out of a total of 347 occurrences of one or both words in the MT of that passage, there are variants in 196 instances. A very important and detailed discussion, too long to be summarized here, will now be found in TMH. I. Wellhausen himself has admitted that the textual evidence constitutes a sore point of the documentary theory (Expos T, XX, 563). Again in Ex 6 3, many of the best authorities read “I was not made known” instead of “I was not known”—a difference of a single letter in Heb. But if this be right, there is comparative evidence to suggest that to the early mind a revelation of his name by a deity meant a great deal more than a mere knowledge of the name, and involved rather a pledge of his power. Lastly the analysis may be tested in yet another way by inquiring whether it fits in with the other data, and when it is discovered (see below 4, [1]) that it involves ascribing, e.g. a passage that cannot be later than the time of Abraham to the period of the kingdom, it becomes certain that the clue and the method are alike misleading (see further EPC, ch 1; Expos T, XX, 578 f., 473–75, 563; TMH, I, 45, 40–149; 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201; Astruc, The Name of God, NKZ, XXIV [1913], 119–48; Expos, 1913).

(3) Narrative discrepancies and signs of post-Mosaic date.—Septuagintal MSS are providing very illuminating material for dealing with the chronological difficulties. It is well known that the LXX became corrupt and passed through various recensions (see Septvagint). The original text has not yet been reconstructed, but as the result of the great variety of recensions it happens that our various MSS present a wealth of alternative readings. Some of these discrepancies are significant, e.g. a southerly march from Kadesh no longer conducts the Israelites to Arad in the north, the name Hormah is no longer used (Nu 14:45) before it is explained (21:3), there is no longer an account directly contradicting Dt and making the 40 years of wilderness wanderings 37 years at Kadesh immediately after receiving the Divine command “Go forth to the land tomorrow” (Nu 14:25). A full discussion is impossible here and will be found in EPC, 114–38. The order of the narrative that emerges as probably original is as follows: Nu 12 20 1:14–21:21 1:1–3; 13:14; 16:18; 20:2–13:22c; 21 46–9, then some 17, 100 years old when Isaac was born. In 17 25 we find that Ishmael is already 13 a year before Isaac’s birth. Now we are familiar with marginal notes that set forth a system of chronology in many printed English Bibles. In Gen 2 12, 13, and again, ver 16, while in 17 25 there is a variant making Ishmael only 3 years old. If these readings are correct it is easy to see how the difficulty arose. The narrative originally contained mere round numbers, like 100 years old, and these were afterwards corrected so as to be taken literally. A commentator constructed a scheme of chronology which was embodied in marginal notes. Then these crept into the text and such numbers as were in conflict with them were thought to be corrupt and underwent alteration. Thus the 3-year-old Ishmael became 13.

The same MSS that present us with the variants in Gen 16 have also preserved a suggestive reading in 35 28, one of the passages that are responsible for the inference that according to the text of Gen Isaac lay or was killed at deathbed for 3 years (Expos, 3, [2]). According to this Isaac was not 180, but 150 years old when he died. It is easy to see that this is a round number, not to be taken literally, but this is not the only source of the difficulty. In 27 41, Esau, according to EV, states “The days of mourning for my father are at hand; then will I slay my brother Jacob.” This is a perfectly possible rendering of the Heb, but the LXX is the text differently, and its rendering, while grammatically correct, has the double advantage of avoiding Isaac’s long lingering on a deathbed and of presenting Esau’s hatred and ferocity far more vividly. It renders, “May the days of mourning for my father approach that I may slay my brother Jacob.” Subsequent translators preferred the milder version, but doubtless the LXX has truly apprehended the real sense of the narrative. If we read the ch with this modification, we see Isaac as an old man, not knowing when he may die, performing the equivalent of making such a will. It would be hard for any good credibility to suppose that he may have lived 20 or 30 years longer. Such episodes occur constantly in everyday experience. As to the calculations based on 25 20 and 26 34, the numbers used are 60 and 40, which is as well known as the method employed by the ancient Hebrews, not as mathematical expressions, but simply to denote unknown or unspecified periods. See Nummen.

The other chronological difficulty cited above (viz., that there is not room between the date of Aaron’s death and the address by Moses in the plains of Moab for all the events assigned to this period by Nu) is met partly by a reading preserved by the Pesh and partly by a series of transpositions. In Nu 33 35 Pesh reads “first” for “until” as the month of Aaron’s death, thus recognizing a longer period for the subsequent events. The transpositions, however, which are largely due to the evidence of Dt, solve the most formidable and varied difficulties; e.g. a southerly march from Kadesh no longer conducts the Israelites to Arad in the north, the name Hormah is no longer used (Nu 14:45) before it is explained (21:3), there is no longer an account directly contradicting Dt and making the 40 years of wilderness wanderings 37 years at Kadesh immediately after receiving the Divine command “Go forth to the land tomorrow” (Nu 14:25). A full discussion is impossible here and will be found in EPC, 114–38. The order of the narrative that emerges as probably original is as follows: Nu 12 20 1:14–21:21 1:1–3; 13:14; 16:18; 20:2–13:22c; 21 46–9, then some missing vs, bringing the Israelites to the head of the Gulf of Akabah and narrating the turn northward from Ethl and Ezion-geber, then 20 223–29; 21 4e, and some lost words telling of the arrival at the precipice behind which the Hebrews were said to have crossed over to the J. 40 is a gloss that is missing in Lægerde's LXX, and vs 366–37a should probably come earlier in the chapter than they do at present.

Another example of transposition is afforded by Ex 33 7–11, the passage relating to the Tent of Meeting which is at present out of place (see above 2, [3]). It is supposed that this is E's idea of the Tabernacle, but that, unlike P, he places it outside the camp and makes Joshua its priest. This latter view is discussed and refuted in Psslers, 3, where it is shown that Ex 33 7 should be rendered "And Moses used to take a [or, the] tent and pitch it for himself," etc. As to the theory that this is E's account of the Tabernacle, Ex 18 has been overlooked. This chapter belongs to the same E but refers to the end of the period spent at Horeb, i.e. it is later than 33 7–11. In vs 13–16 we find Moses sitting with all the people standing about him because they came to inquire of God; i.e. the business which according to ch 33 was transacted in solitude outside the camp was performed in the midst of the people at a later period. This agrees with P, e.g. Nu 27. If now we look at the other available clues, it appears that 33 11 seems to introduce Joshua for the first time. The passage should therefore precede 17 8–15; 24 13; 39 17, where he is already known. Again, if Ex 18 refers to the closing scenes at Horeb (as it clearly does), Ex 24 14 providing for the temporary transaction of judicial business reads very strangely. It ought to be preceded by his last statement of the ordinance of the Tabernacle. "And there I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee" (Ex 25 22). After its erection the earlier tent was disused, and the court sat at the door of the Tabernacle in the center of the people, etc.

Some other points must be indicated more briefly. In Nu 16 important Septuagintal variants remove the main difficulties by substituting "company of Korah" for "dwelling of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram" in two vs (see EPC, 143–46). Similarly in the Joseph story the perplexities have arisen through corruptions of verses which may still be corrected by the versional evidence (PS, 29–48). There is evidence to show that the numbers of the Israelites are probably due to textual corruption (EPC, 155–69). Further, there are numerous passages where careful examination has led critics themselves to hold that particular verses are later notes. In this way they dispose of Dt 10 6 f (Aaron's death, etc.), the references to the Israelites being "kingdom" in Nu 36 31 and the Canaanites as being "then" in the land (12 5; 17 3), the bedstead of Og (Dt 3 11) and other passages. In Gen 22, "the land of Moriah" is unknown to the VSS which present the most diverse readings, of which "the land of Moriah" is probably the most probable, while in ver 14 the LXX, reading the same Heb consonants as MT, translates "In the Mount the Lord was seen." This probably refers to a view that God manifested Himself esp. in the mountains (cf 1 K 20 23–28) and has no reference whatever to the Temple Hill. The Massoretic pointing is presumably due to a desire to avoid what seemed to be an anthropomorphism (see further PS, 19–21). Again, in Nu 21 14, the LXX inserts, "the book of the Wars of Jehovah" (see Field, Hebrew-Grammar, ad loc). It is difficult to tell what the original reading was, esp. as the succeeding words are corrupt in the Heb, but it appears that no genitive followed "wars" and it is doubtful if there was any reference to a "book of wars."

(4) The argument from the doublets examined.—The foregoing sections show that the documentary theory often depends on phenomena that were absent from the original Pent. We are now to examine arguments that rest on other foundations. The doublets have been cited, but when we examine the instances more carefully, some curious facts emerge. Gen 16 and 21 are, to all appearance, narratives of different events; so are Ex 17 1–7 and Nu 20 1–13 (the drawing of water from rocks). In the latter case the critics after rejecting this divide the passages into 5 different stories, two going to J, two to E and one to P. If the latter also had a Rephidin-narrative (of Nu 13 14 P), there were 6 tales. In any case both J and E tell two stories each. It is impossible to determine the order in which the events occurred, and that the author of the Pent could not have told two such narratives, if not merely the redactor of the Pent but also J and E could do so. The facts as to the manna stories are similar. As to the flights of quails, it is known that these do in fact occur every year, and the Pent places them at almost exactly a year's interval (see EPC, 104 f, 109 f).

(5) The critical argument from the laws.—The legal arguments are due to a variety of misinterpretations, the subject-matter, the legal background and the state of the text. Reference must be made to the separate articles (esp. Sanctuary; Passers). As the slave laws were cited, it may be explained that in ancient Israel as in other communities slavery could arise or slaves be acquired in many ways: e.g. birth, purchase (Gen 14 14; 17 12, etc), gift (20 14), capture in war (14 21; 34 29), kidnapping (Joseph). The law of Ex and Dt applies only to Heb slaves acquired by purchase, not to slaves acquired in any other way, e.g. all of those who lost their eyes in the eye of the law of the law were not true slaves. Lev 25 has nothing to do with Heb slaves. It is concerned merely with free Israelites who become insolvent in one or another of the following ways (see infra): (1) (see vs 35–37). Nobody who was already a slave could wax poor and sell himself. The law then provides that these insolvent freemen were not to be treated as slaves. In fact, they were a class of free bondmen, i.e. they were full citizens who were compelled to perform certain duties. A similar class of free bondmen existed in ancient Rome and were called servi. The Egyptians who sold themselves to Pharaoh and became serfs afford another though less apt parallel. In all ancient societies insolvency led to some limitations of freedom, but while in some full slavery ensued, in others a sharp distinction was drawn between the slave and the insolvent freeman (see further SBL, 5–11).
supposed to attest the presence of P, versificational evidence seems to show that the expressions in question have been introduced by glossators, and when they are removed the narrative remains unaffected in its original, terser and more vigorous and greatly improved as a vehicle of expression. To take a simple instance in Gen 23:1, "And the life of Sarah was a hundred and seven and twenty years: . . . the years of the life of Sarah," the italicized words were missing in the LXX. When they are removed the meaning is unaltered, but the form of expression is far superior. They are obviously a mere marginal note. Again the critical method is perpetually breaking down. It constantly occurs that redactors have to be called in to intervene from a passage attributed to some source expressions that are supposed to be characteristic of another source, and this is habitually done on no other ground than that the theory requires it. One instance must be given. It is claimed that the word "create" is a P-word. It occurs several times in Gen 1:1—2 and 3 in Gen 5:12, but in 6:7 it is found in a J-passage, and some critics therefore assign it to a redactor. Yet J undoubtedly uses the word in Nu 15:30 and D in Dt 4:32. On the other hand, during the pre-Mosaic period the expression "having been in Gen 1:1—2, the word "make" being employed in 1:7, 25:26:31; 2:2, while in 2:3 both words are combined. Yet all these passages are given hesitantly.

(7) Perplexities of the theory.—The perplexities of the critical hypothesis are very striking, but a detailed discussion is impossible here. Much material, however, be found in POTT and BSS. A few general statements may be made. The critical analysis repeatedly divides a straightforward narrative into two sets of fragments, neither of which will make sense without the other. A man will go to sleep in one document and wake in another; or a subject will belong to one source and the predicate to another. No intelligible account can be given of the proceedings of the redactors who at one moment slavishly preserve their sources and at another cut them about without any necessity, who now rewrite their material and now leave it untouched. Again, the most consistent theory is that material thus preserved will be chapters will be assigned by one writer to the post-exilic period and by another to the earliest sources (e.g. Gen 14, pre-Mosaic in the main according to Sellin [1910], post-exilic according to other critics). Again, it is a fact that the repetition of words and repetition of passages has greatly increased the perplexity. Clue after clue, both stylistic and material, is put forward, to be abandoned silently at some later stage. Circular arguments are extremely common. It is first alleged that some phenomenon is characteristic of a particular source; then passages are referred to that source for no other reason than the presence of that phenomenon; lastly these passages are cited to prove that the phenomenon in question distinguishes the source. Again the theory is compelled to feed on itself; for J, E, P, etc., we have schools of J's, E's, etc., subsisting side by side for centuries, using the same material, employing the same ideas, yet remaining separate in minute stylistic points. This becomes impossible when viewed in the light of the evidences of pre-Mosaic date in parts of Gen below 4, [1] to [3].

(8) Signs of unity.—It is often possible to produce very convincing internal evidence of the unity of what is said. A strong instance of this is to be found when one considers the characters portrayed. The character of Abraham or Laban, Jacob or Moses is essentially unitary. There is but one Abraham, and this would not be so if we really had a cent of different documents representing the results of the labor of various schools during different centuries. Again, there are some times literary marks of unity, e.g. in Nu 15, the effect of rising anger is given to the dialogue by the repetition of words (see Pott, [5:7], followed by the repetition of "is it a small thing that" (vs 9.13). This must be the work of a single literary artist (see further SBL, 37 f).

(9) Supposed props of the development hypothesis.—When we turn to the supposed props of the development hypothesis we see that there is nothing conclusive in the critical argument. Jer and the subsequent lit. certainly exhibit the influence of Dt, but a Book of the Law was admittedly found in Josiah's reign and had lain unread for at any rate some considerable time. Some of its requirements had been in actual operation, e.g. in Naboth's case, while others had become a dead letter. The circumstances of its discovery, the belief in its undoubted Mosaic authenticity and the subsequent course of history led to its greatly influencing contemporary and later writers, but that really proves nothing. Ezek again was steeped in priestly ideas, but it is shown in Paviors, 50, how this may be explained. Lastly, Ch certainly knows the whole Pent, but at an entirely misjudged date.

On the other hand the Pent itself always represents portions of the legislation as being intended to reach the people only through the priestly teaching, and this fully accounts for P's lack of influence on the older literature. But the differences of style within the Pent itself, something is said in III, below. Hence this branch of the critical argument really proves nothing, for the phenomena are susceptible of more than one explanation.

(1) The narrative of Genesis. Largely different lines of argument are quite readily provided by the abundant internal evidences of date. In Gen 4. Evidence 19, we read the phrase "as thou of Date" goest toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah and Zeboim" in a definition of boundary. Such language could only have originated when the places named actually existed. One does not define boundaries by reference to towns that are purely mythical or have been overthrown many centuries previously. The consistent tradition is that these towns were destroyed in the lifetime of Abraham, and the passage therefore cannot be later than his age. But the critics assign it to a late stratum of J, i.e. to a period at least 1,000 years too late. This suggests that the repeated repetition of words! there be asked whether much reliance can be placed on a method which after a century and a half of the closest investigation does not permit its exponents to arrive at results that are correct to within 1,000 years. Secondly, it shows clearly that in the composition of the Pent very old materials were incorporated in their original language. Of the historical importance of this fact more will be said in IV; in this connection we must observe that it throws fresh light on expressions that point to the presence in Gen of sources composed in Pal, e.g. "the sea" for "the West" indicates the probability of a Palestinian source, but once it is proved that we have materials as old as the time of Abraham such expressions do not argue post-Mosaic, but rather pre-Mosaic authorship. Thirdly, the passage demolishes the theory of schools of J's, etc. It cannot seriously be maintained that there was a school of J's writing a particular style marked by the most delicate and subjective criteria subsisting continuously from the time of Abraham onward, side by side with other writers with whom its members never exchanged terms of even such common occurrence as "handmaid."
In 2:14 we read of the Hiddekel (Tigris) as flowing E. of Aṣšur, though there is an alternative reading "the Hiddekel of the west" to correct, the passage must antedate the 13th cent. BC, for Aṣšur, the ancient capital, which was on the west bank of the Tigris, was abandoned at about that date for Kalkh on the E.

(2) Archaeology and Genesis.—Closely connected with the foregoing are cases where Gen has preserved information that is true of a very early time only. Thus in 10:22 Elam figures as a son of Shem. The historical Elam was, however, an Aryan people. Recently inscriptions have been discovered which show that in the age of ver 10, Elam was inhabited by Semites. "The fact," writes Driver, ad loc., "is not one which the writer of this verse is likely to have known." This contention falls to the ground when we find that only three verses off we have material that goes back at least as far as the time of Abraham. After all, the presumption is that the writer stated the fact because he knew it, not in spite of his not knowing it; and that knowledge must be due to the same cause as the note- worthy fact in the age of ver 10, Elam was inhabited by Semites. This is merely one example of the confirmations of little touches in Gen that are constantly being provided by archaeology. For the detailed facts see the separate articles, e.g. AMARASPEL; JERUSALEM, and so forth.

From the point of view of the critical question we note (a) that such accuracy is a natural mark of authentic early documents, and (b) that in view of the arguments already adduced and of the legal evidence to be considered, the most reasonable explanation is to be found in a theory of contemporary authorship.

(3) The legal evidence of Genesis.—The legal evidence is perhaps more convincing, for here no theory of late authorship can be devised to evade the natural inference. Correct information as to early names, geography, etc, might be the result of researches by an exilic writer in a Bab library; but early customs that are confirmed by the universal experience of primitive societies, and that point to a stage of development which had long been passed in the Babylonian even of Abraham's day, can be due to but one cause—genuine early sources. The narratives of Gen are certainly not the work of comparative sociologists. Two instances may be cited. The law of the purification of the dead of those that are known to be earlier than the stage attested by Ex 21:12 ff. In the story of Cain we have one stage; in Gen 9:6, which does not yet recognize any distinction between murder and other forms of homicide, we have the other.

Our other example shall be the unlimited power of life and death possessed by the head of the family (38:24; 42:37, etc), which has not yet been limited in any way by the jurisdiction of the courts as in Ex 21. In both cases comparative historical jurisprudence confirms the Bible account against the critical, which would make e.g. Gen 9:6 post-exilic, while assigning Ex 21 to a much earlier period. (On the whole subject see further OP, 135 ff.)

(4) The professedly Mosaic character of the legislation.—Coming now to the four concluding books of the Pent, we must first observe that the legislation everywhere professes to be Mosaic. Perhaps this is not always fully realized. In critical editions of the text the rules relating to Levitical sacrifices assigned to redactors, but the representation of Mosaic date is far too closely interwoven with the matter to be removed by such devices. If e.g. we take such a section as Dt 12, we shall find it full of such phrases as "for ye are not as yet come unto the rest and to the inheritance," "when ye go over Jordan," "the place which the Lord shall choose" (AV), etc. It is important to bear this in mind throughout the succeeding discussion.

(5) The historical situation required by P.—What do we find if we ignore the Mosaic dress and seek to fit P into any other set of conditions, particularly those of the post-exilic period? The general historical situation gives a clear answer. The Israelites are represented as being so closely concentrated that they will always be able to keep the three pilgrimages. One exception only is contemplated, viz. that ritual uncleanness or a journey may prevent an Israelite from keeping the Passover. Note that this was certainly to keep it one month later (Nu 9:10). How could this law have been enacted when the great majority of the people were in Babylonia, Egypt, etc, so that attendance at the temple was impossible for them on any occasion whatever? With this exception the entire PC always supposes that the whole people are at all times dwelling within easy reach of the religious center. How strongly this view is embedded in the code may be seen esp. from Lev 16, which makes that care is not domestic animals to be slaughtered for food must be brought to the door of the Tent of Meeting. Are we to suppose that somebody deliberately intended such legislation to apply when the Jews were scattered all over the civilized world for even all the earth? If so, it means a total prohibition of all animal food for all save the inhabitants of the capital.

In post-exilic days there was no more pressing danger for the religious leaders to combat than intermarriage, but this code is supposed to have been written for the express purpose of bringing about their action, goes out of its way to give a fictitious account of a war and incidentally to legalize some such unions (Nu 31:18). And this chapter also contains a law of booby. What could be more unsuitable? How and where were the Jews to make conquests and capture booty in the days of Ezra?

"Or again, pass to the last chapter of Nu and consider the historical setting. What is the complaint urged by the repetition that waits upon Moses? It is this: If he is married to any of the sons of the other tribe of the children of Israel, then shall their inheritance be taken away from the inheritance of our fathers, and it shall be added unto the inheritance of the tribe whitherunto they shall belong." What a pressing grievance for a legislator to consider and redress when tribes and tribal lots had long since ceased to exist for ever!" (OP, 121 f.)

Perhaps the most informative of all the discrepancies between P and the post-exilic age is one that explains the freedom of the prophets from its literary influence. According to the constant testimony of the Pent, including P, portions of the law were to reach the people only through priestly teaching (Lev 10:11; Dt 24:8; 33:10, etc.). Ezra on the other hand read portions of P to the whole people.

(6) The hierarchical organization in P.—Much of what falls under this head is treated in Pug. In the 9, 10 analogies, and need not be repeated here. The following may be added: "Urim and Thummim were not used after the Exile. In lieu of the simple conditions—a small number of priests and a body of Levites—we find a developed hierarchy, priests, Levites, subpriests, priestly families, etc. In the inner sanctuary of the temple, Leviticus 21:23-25, which declares that the High Priest alone may enter the Holy of Holies together with his sons and the Levites, to burn incense and to offer the sacrifice of atonement for the sins of the people of Israel, and to minister to the Lord in the holy place in the sight of the Lord. The Epistle of the Christian Church would be justified if it were based on this law of the ceremonial order, "because it is written in the law of Moses that the high priest should offer gifts and sacrifices for sins."
carying pecuniary emoluments is far beyond the primitive simplicity of "OP (P, 122)"

(7) The legal evidence of P.—As this subject is technically of no importance for our present purpose, we may pass

Legal rules may be such as to enable the historical inquirer to define definitely that they belong to an early stage of society. Thus if we find eletary rules relating to the inheritance of a farmer who dies without leaving sons, we know that they cannot be long subsequent to the introduction of individual property in land, unless of course the law has been deliberately altered. It is an everyday occurrence for men to die without leaving sons, and the question what is to happen to their land in such case must from the nature of the case be raised and settled before very long. When we therefore find such rules in Nu 27, etc., we know that they are either very old or else represent a deliberate change in the law. The latter is really out of the question, and we are driven back to their antiquity (see further OP, 124 ff.). Again in Nu 35 we find an elaborate struggle to express a general principle which shall distinguish between two kinds of homic.

cide. The earlier law had regarded all homicide as of which no one could assign the cause. The human mind only reaches general principles through concrete cases, and other ancient legislations (e.g., the Iccelandic) bear witness to the primitive character of the rules of Nu. Thus an expert like Dareste can say that those who assert that much of the Mosaic law is extremely archaic (see further SSL and OP, passim).

(8) The evidence of D. —The following may be quoted: "Laws are never issued to regulate a state of things which has passed away ages before, and can never be revived by us, that are not, in our mind, then, of a hypothesis which assigns the code of Dt to the reign of Josiah, or shortly before it, when its injunctions to exterminate the Canaanites (20 16-18) and the Amalekites (25 17-19), who had long since disappeared, would be as utterly out of date as a law in New Jersey at the present time offering a bounty for killing wolves and bears, or a royal proclamation in Great Britain ordering the expulsion of the Danes! A law contemplating foreign conquests (20 10-15) would have been absurd when the urgent question was whether Judah could maintain its own existence against the encroachments of Babylon and Egypt. A law discriminating against Ammon and Moab (23 3-4), in which no exception is made for the present kingdom (7 5), bears witness to the Mosaic period, but not in the time of the later kings. Jeremiah discriminates precisely the other way, promising a future restoration to Moab (48 47) and Ammon (49 6), which he denies to Edom (49 17.15), who is also to Joel (3 19), Ob, and Isa (63 1-6), the representative foe of the people of God. . . . . . The allusions to Egypt imply familiarity with and recent residence in that land. . . . And how can a code belong to the time of Josiah, which, while it permits sacrifices to be offered of a king in the future (Dt 17 11 ff), nowhere implies an actual regal government, but vests the supreme central authority in a judge and the priesthood (17 8-12; 19 17); which lays special stress on the requirements that the king must be a native and not a foreigner (17 15), when the undisputed line of succession had for ages been fixed in the family of David, and that he must not 'cause the people to return to Egypt' (ver 18), as they seemed ready to do on every grievance in the days of Moses (Nu 14 4), but that he was to do justice to the poor (17 9), which were fairly established in Canaan?" (Green, Moses and the Prophets, 63 f).

This too may be supplemented by legal evidence (e.g. 22 26 testifies to the undeveloped intellectual condition of the people). OP (32 23) speaks of nu 27 as now widely regarded as Mosaic in critical circles.

Wellhausen (Protegenomen, 392, n.) now regards their main elements as pre-Mosaic Canaanitish law.

(9) Later allusions.—These are of two kinds. Sometimes they are only of the nature of reference. In other cases we find evidence that they were in operation. (a) By postulating redactors evidence can be banished from the Bib. text. Accordingly, reference will only be made to some passages where this procedure is not followed. Ezek 22 20 clearly knows of a law that dealt with the subjects of P, used its very language (of Lev 10 10 ff), and like P was to be taught to the people by the priests. Hosea also knows of some priestly teaching, which, however, is moral and may therefore be Lev 19; but not 11-13 he speaks of 10,000 written precepts, and here the context points to ritual. The number and the subject-matter of these precepts alike make it certain that he knew a bulky written law which was not merely identical with Ex 21-33, and this passage cannot be met by Wellhausen who resorts to the device of translating it with the omission of the important word "write." (b) Again, in dealing with institutions the references can often be evaded. It is possible to say, 'Yes, this passage knows such and such a law, but we really come into existence with D or P, but was an older law incorporated in these documents.' That argument would apply, e.g., to the necessity for two witnesses in the case of Naboth. That is a law of D, but who assigns it must assert that it is here merely incorporating older material. Again the allusions sometimes show something that differs in some way from the Pent., and it is often impossible to prove that this was a wear.

(10) Other evidence.—We can mention certain other branches of evidence. There is still the evidence of early date (see e.g., Lias, BS, 1910, 20-46, 299-334). Further, the minute accuracy of the narrative of Ex-Nu to local conditions, etc (noticed below, IV, 5, 6), affords valuable testimony. It may be said that the earlier narrations, which were well in mature—mirrors early conditions, whether we regard intellectual, economic or purely legal development (see further below, IV, and OP, passim).

(1) Moral and psychological issues.—The great fundamental improbabilities of the critical view have hitherto been kept out of sight in order that the arguments for and against the detailed case might not be prejudiced by other considerations. We must now glance at some of the broader issues. The first great frauds were perpetrated—in each case by men of the loftiest ethical principles. Dt was deliberately written in the form of Mosaic speeches by some person or persons who well knew what was not Mosaic. P is a make-up—nothing more. All its references to the wilderness, the camp, the Tent of Meeting, the approaching occupation of Canaan, etc., are so many tacks introduced for the purpose of deceiving. There can be no talk of literary convention, for no such convention existed in Israel. The prophets all spoke in their own names, not in the dress of Moses. David introduced a new law of booty in his own name; the Chronicler repeatedly refers to temple ordinances to David and Solomon; Samuel introduced a law of the kingdom in his own name. Yet we are asked to believe that these gigantic forgeries were perpetrated without reason or pretext. Is it credible? Consider the principles involved, e.g. the Deuteronomistic denunciations of false prophets, the prohibition of adding aught to the law, the passionate injunctions to teach children. Can it be believed that men of such principles would have been guilty of such conduct? Nemo repente fæ turpius datur, says the old maxim; can we suppose that the denunciations of those who prophesy falsely in the name of the Lord proceed from the pen of one who was himself forging in that name? Or can it be that the great majority of Biblical scholars know as little of truth when they assert it that they cannot detect the ring of unquestionable sincerity in the references of the Deuteronomist to the historical situation? Or can we really believe that documents that originated in such a fashion could have exercised the enormous force for righteousness in the world that these documents have exercised? Ex nihilo nihil. Are literary forgeries a suitable parentage for Gen 1 or Lev or Dt? Are the great monotheistic ethical religions of the world that have more than purely rooted in nothing better than folly and fraud?

(3) The divergence between the laws and post-exilic practice.—Thirdly, the entire perversion of the true meaning of the laws in post-exilic times makes the critical theory incredible. Examples have been given (see above, 4, [5], [6], and Priest, passim). It must now suffice to take just one instance to make the answer clear. Well, we know from the author of P deliberately provided that if Levites approached the altar both they and the priests should die (Nu 18 3), because he really desired that they should approach the altar and perform their service in a manner that Ezra and the people on reading these provisions at once understood that the legislator meant the exact opposite of what he had said, and proceeded to act accordingly (1 Ch 23 31). This is only one little example. It is throughout P. Everybody understands that the Tabernacle is really the second Temple and wilderness conditions post-exilic, and everybody acts accordingly. Can it be contended that this view is credible?

(4) The testimony of tradition.—Lastly the uniform testimony of tradition for Mosaic authenticity—the tradition of Jews, Samaritans and Christians alike. The national consciousness of a people, the convergent belief of Christendom for 18 centuries are not lightly to be put aside. And what is more against them is that they correspond with each fresh exponent, and that they take their start from textual corruption, develop through a confusion between an altar and a house, and end in mistreating narratives and laws by 8 or 10 centuries! (see above 3 and 4; Sanctuary: Priests, 18). If anything at all emerges from the foregoing discussion, it is the impossibility of performing any such analytical feat as the critics attempt. No critical microscope can detect with the necessary degree of certainty the joins of various sources, even if such sources really exist, and when we find that laws and narratives are constantly misdated by 8 or 10 centuries, we can only admit that no progress at all is possible along the lines that have been followed. On the other hand, certain reasonable results do appear to have been secured, and there are indications of the direction in which we must look for the further investigation.

First, then, the Pentateuch contains various notes by later hands. Sometimes the VSS enable us to detect and remove those notes, but many are pre-versional. Accordingly, it is in the impossible to remove all the conjectures on which different minds may differ.

Secondly, the Prophet's prose is, what we call, an organic whole, but we cannot determine the scope of these or the number and character of the sources employed, or of the extent of the author's work.

Thirdly, the whole body of the legislation is subject only to textual criticism Mosaic. But the laws of Dt carry with them their framework, the speeches which cannot be severed from them (see Shb. II). The speeches of Dt in turn carry with them large portions of the narrative of Ex-Nu which they presuppose. They do not necessarily carry with them such passages as Ex 35-39 or Nu 1-4, 7, 26, but Nu 1-4 contains internal evidence of Mosaic date.

At this point we examine the various phenomena that throw light on our problem. It may be said that there are three chief phenomena— textual corruption—that which is due to the ordinary processes of copying, perishable, annotating, etc., and that which is due to conscious and unconscious fraud. There is an attempt to produce, as far as possible, a correct standard text. Differences that will be found in the work of the Massoretic on the Heb text, that of Origen and others on the LXX, and that of the commission and of Aristotles and the Alexandrian critics on Homer. There is evidence that such revision is attempted. An important instance is to be found in the chronology of certain portions of Gen of which three different VSS survive. Massoretic, Sam, and Septuagint. Another instance of even greater consequence for the matters in hand is to be found in Ex 35-39. It is well known that the LXX preserves an entirely different edition from that of MT supported in the main by the Septuagint. Some other editions have been noticed incidentally in the preceding discussion; one other that may be proved by further research to possess considerable interest may be mentioned. It appears that in the law of the kingdom (Dt 17) and some other passages the Massoretes and the Septuagint specify a hereditary king. The LXX knew nothing of such a person (see further Ps 137-68). The superiority of the LXX text in this instance appears to be attested by 1 S, which is unacquainted with any law of the kingdom.

According to the view of the translators, the Sam and the Sept. While there are a number of minor readings (in cases of variation through accidental corruption) it is manifestly true that in general the way the Sam belongs to the same family as the MT. While the LXX in the crucial matters represents a different textual tradition from the other two (see Exeg. September 1911, 200-219). How is this to be explained? According to the worthless story preserved in the letter of Aristarchus the LXX was tr. from Msh brought from Jews at a date long subsequent to the Sam schism. The fact that the LXX preserves a recension so different from both Sam and MT (and indeed from our Mosaic sources in Gen., and of the 5th cent. B.C. and its lineal descendants) suggests that this part of the story must be rejected. If so, the LXX preserves portions through the text of the Pent. prevalent in Egypt and descents from a Heb that separated from the text before the Sam schism. At some point we must recall the fact that in Jer the LXX differs from MT more widely than in any other Bib. book; the nature of which is such that the difference goes back to the times of Jeremiah, his work having been preserved in a text. It may be that if the Jews of Egypt had an edition of Jer, they also had an edition of that law to which Jer refers, and it is possible that the differences between LXX and MT (with its allies) are due to the two streams of tradition separating from the time of the exile—Egypt and the Bab. The narrative of the finding of the Book of the Law in the days of Josiah (2 K 22), which probably refers to events that took place at that time, is based on the single MS found. The phenomena as a whole are strongly suggestive of the idea that they were at one time dependent on a single damaged MS, and that conscious efforts were made to restore the original or at least to make as genuine an copy as possible (see esp. EFC. 114-38; Es. 1913, 270-90). In view of the great corruption in the LXX in 35-39, it may be taken as certain that in some instances the editing went to considerable lengths.

Thus the history of the Pent. so far as it can be traced, is briefly as follows: The backbone of the book consists of pre-Mosaic sources in Gen., and the Mosaic narratives, speeches and legislation in Ex-Dt. To this, notes, archaeological, historical, explanatory, etc., were added by successive readers. The text at one time depended on a single MS which was lost or more or less tampered with to repair this damage by rearrangement of the material. It may be that some of the narrative chapters, such as Nu 1-4, 7, 26, were added from a separate source and amplified or rewritten in the course of redaction, but in this book nothing certain can be said. Within a period that is attested by the materials that survive, Ex 35-39 underwent one or more such redactions. Slighter redactions attested by Sam and LXX have affected the chronology of the Pent, the number of the legislative units and some references to post-Mosaic historical events. Further than this it is impossible to go on our present materials.

III. Some Literary Points. No general estimate of the Pent. can be attempted without a knowledge of its literary beauties. Anybody who is not would do well to compare the chapter on Joseph in the Koran (12) with the Bib. narrative. A few words must be said of some of the less obvious matters that would naturally fall into a literary consideration, the aim being rather to draw the reader's attention to points that he might overlook.

Of the style of the legislation no sufficient estimate can be formed, for the first requisite of legal style is the absence of individuality. Though some contemporaries, and today no judgment can be offered on that head. There is, however, one feature that is of great interest even now, viz. the prevalence in the main of three different styles, each marked by its special adaptation to the end in view. These styles are

1. Style of Legislation (1) mnemoniac, (2) oratorical, and (3) procedural. The first is familiar in other early legislations. It is lapidary, terse, the extreme, pregnant, and from time to time marked by a rhythm that must have assisted the retention in the memory. Occasionally we meet with parallelism. This is the style of Ex 21 ff and occasional later passages, such as the judgment in the case of Reuben's son (Num 15:10-31). No doubt these laws were memorized by the elders.

2. The Narrative. The narrative of Nu 33 is intentionally composed in a style which undoubtedly possesses peculiar qualities which cannot be appropriate to the text. The census lists, etc., appear to be written in a formal official manner, and something similar is true of the list of the spies in Nu 13. There is no ground for surprise in this. In the ancient world it would be natural to discover in the composition to a far greater extent than it does today. A literary form that is peculiar to the Pent. deserves special notice, viz. the covenant document as a form of literature. Many peoples have had laws that were attributed to some deity, but it is only here that laws are presented in the form of sworn agreements entered into with certain formalities between the Lou and God. It has been observed that it is certain that portions of the Pent. are in the form of a sort of deed with properly articulated parts. This deed would have been ratified by oath if made between men, as was the covenant between Abraham and Abimelech, but in a case like this inapplicable, and the place of the jur is in each case taken by a discourse setting forth the rewards and penalties attached by God to observance and breach of the covenant respectively. The covenant conception and the idea that the laws acquire force because they are terms in an agreement between God and people, and not merely because they were commanded by God, is one of extraordinary importance in the history of thought and in theology, but we must not through absorption in these aspects of the question fail to notice that the conception found expression in a literary form that is unknown elsewhere and that it provides the key to the comprehension of large sections of the Pent, including almost the whole of Dt (see in detail SBL, ch ii).

Insufficient attention has been paid to order and rhythm generally. Two great principles must be borne in mind: (1) in really good ancient prose there are no appeals to the ear in many subtle ways, and (2) in all such prose, emphasis, substance, and meaning are given to the sentences to the greatest extent by the order of the words. The figures of the old Gr rhetoricians play a considerable part. Thus that figure "the candle," "the circle," is sometimes used with great skill. In this the clause or sentence begins and ends with the same word, which denotes alike the sound and the thought. Probably the most effective instance—heightened by the meaning, the shortness and the heavy boom of the word—is to be found in Gen 14 from ver. 24. The parallel "clue" with הָקָל, kol, "voice"—the emphasis conveyed by the sound being at least as marked as that conveyed by the sense. This is no isolated instance of the figure; cf. e.g. in Gen 20, 24 and 27 in Luke 3: "would that we had died."] Chiasmus is a favorite figure, and asonnance, plays on words, etc., are not uncommon. Similarly this was an ancient art of the narrator, as may be seen from instances like Gen 1:2. "the voice of the Lord was softly;" "while and void;" 4:12: "the voice of a fugitive and a wanderer:" 9:6: "the voice of the waters was heard;" 4:18: "the voice of the Lord was heard;" Nu 13:30: "the voice of a song;" 14:11: "the voice of a singing man;" 19:20: "the voice of a waqeqet, and smote them and beat them down.

The prose of the Pentateuch, except in its more formal and official parts, is closely allied to poetry (cf. e.g. the Assyrian "Sin coucheth at the door" [Gen 4:17]: "how bare you on eagles' wings" [Ex 19:4]). In the oratorical prose of Dt we find an imagery and a poetical imagination that are not common among great orators. This rhythm is marked and the arrangement of the words is extraordinarily easy, esp. in such a chapter as ch. 28. It is difficult to convey any idea of how much the book loses in EV from the changes of order. Occasionally we have the point of the original in Dt 4:36: "out of heaven he made thee to hear his voice;" but consider how strikingly this contracts with the flat "He made thee to hear his voice out of heaven;" some notion may perhaps be formed of the importance of the order. However, this frequent loss of sense, however, the Eng. is false to the emphasis and spirit of the Heb. Sometimes, but not always, this is due to the exigencies of Eng. idiom. This is the cardinal fault of AV, which otherwise excels so greatly.

IV. The Pentateuch as History.—Beyond all doubt, the first duty of any who would use the Pentateuch as a historical source is to consider the light that textual criticism throws upon it. So many of the impossibilities of History bilities are relied upon by those who seek to prove that the book is historically worthless may be removed by the simplest operations of scientific textual criticism, that a neglect of this primary precaution must lead to disastrous conclusions. After all, it is common experience that a man who sets out to produce a historical narrative either by original composition or compilation—ideally, it is possible to make, e.g. a southwest march lead to a point northward of the starting-place, or a woman carry an able-bodied lad of 16 or 17 on her shoulder, or a patriarch linger some 80 years on a deathbed. When such episodes are found in the Hebrew text of history, the reader justifiably requires that we should first ask whether the text is in order, and if the evidence points to any easy, natural and well-supported solutions of the difficulties, we are not justified in rejecting them without inquiry and denying to the Pentateuch all historical value. It is a priori far more probable that narratives which have come down to us from a date some 3,000 years back may have suffered slightly in transmission than that the Pentateuch was in the first instance the story of a historical life; it is far more reasonable, e.g. to suppose that in a couple of verses of Ex a corruption of two letters (attested by Aquila) has taken place in the MT than that the Pentateuch contains two absolutely inconsistent accounts of the origin of the priesthood (see Gen 4:18). But the first principle of any scientific use of the Pentateuch for historical purposes must be to take account of textual criticism.

Having discovered as nearly as may be what the author wrote, the next step must be to consider what he means. By R. L. Here, unfortunately, the modern inquirer is apt to neglect many simpler problems. It would be a truism, but for the fact that it is so often disregarded, to say that the whole is not necessarily to be carefully read in order to ascertain the author's meaning; e.g. how often we hear that Gen 14 represents Abram as having inflicted a defeat on the enemy with only 318 men (ver. 14), whereas the context clearly shows that he had with him his allies Aner, Eschol and Mamre (i.e. as we shall see, the inhabitants of certain localities) had accompanied him! Sometimes the clue to the sense of the narrative is to be sought in the history of the book in which the methods of expression adopted cause trouble in some modern commentaries. We are often met with a passage trips and stumbles us in a way that apparently presents difficulties to the mind. Thus in Ex 9:6 it is possible to interpret "all" in the sense of a sweeping generalization in the verb as in vv. 19, 22, etc., which recognize that some cattle still existed. Or again the term may be regarded as limited by ver. 3 to all the cattle in the field (see Acts 15:26).

At this point two further idiosyncrasies of the Sem genus must be noted—the habits of personification and the genealogical tendency; e.g. in Nu 20:12-21, Edom and Israel are personified and used in relationships. Genealogies "Edom came out against him," etc. Nobody here mistakes the meaning. Similarly with genealogical methods of expression. The Semites spoke of many relationships in a way that is forcibly revealed in the expressions of the Heb for "30 years old" is "son of 30 years."] Again we read "He was the father of such as dwell in tents" (Gen 4:20). These habits of (personification and genealogical expression of relationships) are greatly extended, e.g. "And Canaan begat Zidon his first-born" (10:15). Often this leads to no trouble, yet strangely enough men who will grasp these methods when dealing with ch. 10 will claim that ch. 14 cannot be historical because localities are there personified and used in relationships. Yet if we are to estimate the historical value of the narrative, we must surely be willing to apply the same methods to one chapter as to another if the sense appears to demand this. See, further, Genealogies.

A further consideration that is not always heeded is the exigency of literary form; e.g. in Gen 24 there occurs a dialogue. Strangely enough, an ancient writer has been able to personify the narrative rather than the character of Gen on this ground. It cannot be supposed, for instance, that we have here a literal report of what was said. This entirely ignores the practice of all literary artists. Such passages are to be regarded as not a literal but a metaphorical expression of what occurred; they convey a truer and more vivid idea of what nature and importance. The literal report of the mere words, divorced from the gestures, glances and modulations of the voice that play such an important part in conversation.

5. The Sacred Numbers

Gen 10 probably contains 70 names in the original text. This is a technical consideration which must be borne in mind, and so, too, must the Heb habit of using certain round numbers to express an unspecified time. When, for instance, we read that somebody was 40 or 60 years old, we are not to take these words literally. "Forty years old" often seems to correspond to "after a man had reached man's estate" (see Numbers).

Still more important is it to endeavor to appreciate the habits of thought of those for whom the Pentateuch was intended, and to seek the nature of the thought which it expresses. The many explanations of names few are philologically correct. It is certain that Noah is not connected with the Heb for "to comfort" or Moses with "draw out"—even if Egypt princesses spoke Heb. The etymological key will not fit. Yet we must ask ourselves whether the narrator ever thought that it did. In times when names were supposed to have some mystic relation to their bearers they might be conceived as standing also in some mystic relation to events either present or future; it is possible that the formal method of the narratives was not to suggest this in literary form. How far the ancient Hebrews were from regarding names in the same light as we do may be seen from such passages as Ex 23:20; Is 30:27; see further E.P.C. 47 ff.; see also Names, Proper.

The Pent is beyond all doubt an intensely national work. Its outlook is so essentially Israelitish that no reader could fail to notice the fact.

7. National Coloring proves. Doubtless this has in many instances led to its presenting a view of history with which the contemporary peoples would not have agreed. It is not to be supposed that the exodus was an event of much significance in the Egypt of Moses, however important it may appear to the Egyptians of today; and this suggests two points. On the one hand we must admit that to most contemporaries the Pentateuchal narratives must have seemed out of all perspective; on the other the course of subsequent history has shown that the Mosaic sense of perspective was in reality the true one, however absurd it may have seemed to the nations of his own day. Consequently in using the Pent for historical purposes we must always apply two standards—the contemporary and the historical. In the days of Moses the narrative might often have looked to the outsider like the attempt of the frog in the fable to attain to the size of an ox; for us, with the light of history upon it, the two are very different. The national coloring, the medium through which the events are seen, has proved to be true, and the seemingly insignificant doings of unimportant people have turned out to be events of prime historical importance.

There is another aspect of the national coloring of the Pent to be borne in mind. If ever there was a book which revealed the immost soul of a people, that book is the Pent. This will be considered in W. It is not merely present in the narrative as such but is associated with its historical significance. In estimating actions, motives, laws, policy—all that goes to make history—character is necessarily a factor of the utmost consequence. Now here we have a book that at every turn and in every way bears the mark of national character. Alike in contents and in form the legislation is adapted with the utmost nicety to the nature of the people for which it was promulgated.

When due allowance has been made for all the various matters enumerated above, what can be said as to the trustworthiness of the Pent? The answer is entirely favorable.

8. How Far Can We Trust the Pentateuch?—It is not possible to read the references to events in such a chapter as Ex 4 without feeling that the author who speaks most fully believed the truth of his statements. The most unquestionable sincerity is impressed upon the chapter. The speaker is referring to what he believed with all the faith of which he is capable.

we have to ask whether they were truthful and able. As to the ability no doubt is possible; genius is stamped on every page of the Pent. Similarly as to truthfulness. The conscience of the narrator is essentially ethical. This appears of course most strongly in the legislation of Lev 19; and the attribution of truthfulness to God (Ex 34 6), but it may readily be detected throughout; e.g. in Gen 20 12 the narrative clearly shows that truthfulness was esteemed as a virtue by the ancient Hebrews. Throughout, the faults of the dramatic personae are never minimized even when the narrator's sympathy is with them. Nor is there any attempt to belittle the opponents of Israel's heroes. Consider on the one hand the magnanimity of Esa's character and on the other the very glaring light that is thrown on the weaknesses of Jacob, Judah, Aaron. If we are taught to know the Moses who prays, "And if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written" (Ex 32 32), we are also shown his frequent complaints, and we make acquaintance with the hot-tempered man of letters and the lawyer who disobeyed his God.

(3) The historical genius of the people.—Strangely enough, those who desire to discuss the trustworthiness of the Pentatexual narrative go on to inquire into the habits of other nations and, selecting according to their bias peoples that have a good or a bad reputation in the matter of historical tradition, proceed to argue for or against the Pentateuchal narrative on this basis. Such procedure is alike unjust and unscientific. It is unsound because the object of the inquirer is to obtain knowledge as to the habits of this people, and in view of the great divergences that may be observed among different races, the comparative method is clearly inapplicable; it is unjust because this people is entitled to be judged on its own merits or defects, not on the merits or defects of others. Now it is a bare statement of fact that the Jews possess the historical sense to a preeminent degree. Nobody who surveys their long history and examines their customs and practices to this day can fairly doubt that this. This is no recent development; it is most convincingly attested by the Pent itself, which here, as elsewhere, presents at every turn the spirit of the race. What is the highest guaranty of truth, a guaranty which unquestioning appeal may be made in the firm assurance that it will carry conviction to all who hear? "Remember the days of old, Consider the years of many generations, Think of the generations of Esa; Think, elders, and they will tell thee" (Dt 32 7). "For ask now of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth," etc (Dt 4 32). Conversely, the due handing down of tradition is a religious duty: "And it shall come to pass, when your children shall say unto you, What mean ye by this service? that ye shall say," etc (Ex 12 26). "Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes saw, and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life; but make them known unto thy children, and thy children's children" (Dt 4 9). It is needless to multiply quotations. Enough has been said to show clearly the attitude of this people toward history.

(1) The good faith of Deuteronomy.—Closely connected with the preceding is the argument from the very obvious good faith of the speeches in Dt. It is not possible to read the references to events in such a chapter as ch 4 without feeling that the speaker who speaks most fully believed the truth of his statements, and that the most unquestionable sincerity is impressed upon the chapter. The speaker is referring to what he believes with all the faith of which he is capable. Even for those who doubt the Mosaic authenticity of these speeches there can be no doubt as to the writer's unqualified acceptance of the historical consciousness of the people. But once the Mosaic authenticity is established the argument becomes overwhelming. How could Moses have spoken to people of an event so impressive and unparalleled as having happened within their own recollection if it had not really occurred? (5) Nature of the events recorded.—Another very important consideration arises from the nature of the events recorded. No nation, it has often been pointed out, will invent a story of its enslavement to another. The extreme sobriety of the patriarchal narratives, the absence of miracle, the lack of any tendency to display the ancestors of the people as conquerors or great personages, are marks of credibility. Many of the episodes in the Mosaic age are extraordinarily probable. Take the stories of the rebelliousness of the people, of their complaints of the water, the food, and so on: what could be more in accordance with likelihood? On the other hand there is another group of narratives to which the converse argument applies. A Sinai cannot be made part of a nation's consciousness by a clever story-teller or a literary forger. The unparalleled nature of the events narrated was recognized quite as clearly by the ancient Hebrews as by Thucydides (Hist. 4:92 ff.). It is incredible that such a story could have been made up and successfully palmed off on the whole nation. A further point that may be mentioned in this connection is the witness of subsequent history to the truth of the narrative. Such a witness is the history itself of the Jews, such tremendous consequences as their religion has had on the fortunes of mankind, require for their explanation causal events of sufficient magnitude.

3) External corroborations.—All investigation of evidence depends on a single principle: "The coincidences of the truth are infinite." In other words, a false story will sooner or later become involved in conflict with ascertained facts. The Bible narrative has been subjected to the most rigorous cross-examination from every point of view for more than a century. Time after time consistent assertions have been made that its falsehood has been definitely proved, and in each case the Pent has answered the test triumphantly. The detailed studies will for the most part be found enumerated or referred to under the separate articles. Here it must suffice just to refer to a few matters. It was said that the whole local coloring of the Egyptian scenes was entirely false, e.g., that the vine did not grow in Egypt. Egyptology has in every instance vindicated the minute accuracy of the Pent, down to even the non-mention of earthenware (in which the discolored Nile waters can be kept clean) in Ex 7:19 and the very food of the lower classes in Nu 14:5. It was said that writing was unknown in the days of Moses, but Egyptology and Assyriology have utterly demolished this. The historical character of many of the names has been strengthened by recent discoveries (e.g. Jerusalem; Amarna). The position of the narrator point of view modern observation of the habits of the quails has shown that the narrative of Nu is minutely accurate and must be the work of an eyewitness. From the ends of the earth there comes confirmation of the details of the story as depicted in the Pent. Finally it is worth noting that even the details of some of the covenants in Gen are confirmed by historical parallels (Churchman, 1908, 171). It is often said that history in the true sense was invented by the Greeks and that the Heb genius was the opposite; but the Divine guidance that it negated secondary causes altogether. There is a large measure of truth in this view; but so far as the Pent is concerned it can be greatly overstated.

9. The Pentateuch

One great criticism that fails to be answered entirely in favor of the Hebrew as against some Greeks, viz. as Reasoned History are given. Thucydides would have stated the reasons that induced Pharaoh to persecute the Israelites, or Abraham and Lot to separate, or Korah, Dathan and Abiram and their followers to rebel; but every reader would have known precisely what he was doing and many who can read the material passages of the Pent with delight would have been totally unable to grapple with his presentation of the narrative. The audience here is more unsophisticated and the material is presented in more artistic form. In truth, any historian who sat down to compose a philosophical history of the period covered by the Pent would in many instances be surprised at the lavish material it offered to him. A second criticism is more obvious. The writer clearly had no knowledge of the other side of the case. For example, the secondary causes for the defeat near Hormah are plain enough so far as they are internal to the Israelites, lack of moral order, lack of discipline, division of opinion, discouragement produced by the Divine disapproval testified by the absence from the army of Moses and the Ark, and the warnings of the former—but the secondary causes on the side of the Amalekites and Canaanites are entirely omitted. Thus it generally happens that we do not get the same kind of view of the events as might be possible if we could have both sides. Naturally this is largely the case with the work of every historian who tells the story from one side only and is not peculiar to the Pent. Thirdly, the object of the Pent is not merely to inform, but to persuade. It is primarily state-mentship, not literature, and its form is influenced by this fact. Seeking to sway conduct, not to provide a more philosophical exposition of history, it belongs to a different (and higher) category from the latter, and where it has occasion to use the same material puts it in a different way, e.g. by assigning as motives for obeying the commandments reasons the historian would have advanced as causes for their enactment. To some extent, therefore, an attempt to criticize the Pent from the standpoint of philosophical history is an attempt to express it in terms of something not incommensurable with it.

V. Character of the Pentateuch.—The following sentences from Maine's Early Law and Custom form a suggestive introduction to any consideration of the character of the Pent:

"The theory upon which these schools of learned men worked, from the ancient, perhaps very ancient, Apastamba and Gautama to the late Manu and the still later Narada, is perhaps still held by some persons of earnest religious convictions, but in time now buried it beneath every walk of thought. The fundamental assumption is that a sacred or inspired lit. being once bequeathed to exist, all knowledge is contained in it. The Hindu way of putting it is simply that the Scripture is true, but that everything which is true is contained therein, and to be observed that such a theory, firmly held during the infancy of systematic thought, tends to work itself into facts. As the human mind advances, accumulating observation and accumulating reflection, nascent philosophy and nascent science are separated from sacred literature, while they are at the same time limited by the ruling ideas of its priestly authors. But as the mass of its literature passes through the hands of successive expositors, it gradually specializes itself, and subjects, which at first was most mixed together, the several conceptions, become separated from one another and isolated. In the history of law the most important of these was the separating of that which was right in the law as decreed by the lawgiver from that which was right in the law as decreed by the lawgiver from that which was right in the law as decreed by the lawgiver from that which the lawgiver was bound to do from what he ought to know. A great part of the religious literature, including the Creation of the Universe, the structure of Heaven, Hell, and the World or Worlds, and the nature of the Gods, falls under the last head, what a man ought to know. Law-books first appeared about the beginning of the first century, what a man should do. Thus the most ancient books of this class are moral, and are written for all men. To this class the Hindu who would lead a perfect life. They contain much more ritual than law; a great deal more about the impiety cause things that impress crime, a great deal more about penances than about punishments" (pp. 16–18).

It is impossible not to see the resemblance between the Pentateuch and the Old Testament. Particularly interesting is the commentary they provide on the attitude of Moses toward knowledge: "The secret things belong unto Jeh, our God; but the things that are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words thereof." (Deut. 29:29).

But if the Pentateuch has significant resemblances to other old law books, there are differences that are even more significant.

"By an act that is unparalleled in history a God took to Himself a people by means of a sworn agreement. Some words that are fundamental for our understanding of the Pentateuch must be quoted from the other books:

"Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be unto me a deight among all people: for all the earth is mine: and ye shall be unto me a holy nation.

The views here expressed dominated the legislation, holiness—the correlative holiness to which the law seeks to give ethical expression, because the Holy One of Israel;

It is the holiness that is laid upon the Israelites in these words is a duty that has practical consequences in every phase of social life. I have already quoted a sentence from Sir Henry Maine in which he speaks of the uniformity with which religion and law are implanted in archaic legislation. There is a stage in human development when men can see no God but their own. It is to this stage that the Pentateuch belongs. But no other legislation so takes up one department of man's life after another and impresses all the relations of God and man into one body. Perhaps nothing will so clearly bring out my meaning a chapter of the Old Testament.

5. The National Aspect

History. If it be asked wherein the secret of this strength lies, the answer is in the combination of the national and the religious. The course of history must have been entirely different if the Pentateuch had not been the book of the people long before the Jews became the subjects of the book of the world.

LITERATURE.—The current critical view is set forth in vast numbers of books. The following may be mentioned: LOT: Cornill's "Intro to the Canonical Books of the OT"; Carpenter and Harford-Battersby's "Hexateuch" (a 2d ed. of the Intro without the text has been published as The Composition of the Hexateuch); the "Exposition of the ICC, Westminster Comms., and Century Bible. Slightly less thoroughgoing views are put forward in the "G. S. of the Konig (1893), Baudissin (1901), Sellin (1910); and Geddes, "Outlines of Intro to the Heb Bible" (1900); Ketel, "Scientific Study of the OT" (1910); Erasm. St. has entirely divergent critical views; "OT, JTR, 1, and W. Moller, Are the Critics Right? And Widersch. der Quinten und der Quellenforschung, Early Religion of Israel; Van Hoonacker, "Die Erelle der sule, and Sacredness with a Tradition and an "Early Religion of Israel; Van Hoonacker, "Die Erelle der sule, and Sacredness with a Tradition and an .."} dings, and it is impossible to sever it from the history of the "people of the book"—as Mohammed called them. It appears then that it possesses in some unique and profound way to the creation of an intensely universal character and a few words must be said as to this.

The great literary qualities of the work have undoubtedly been an important factor. All readers have felt the fascination of the stories. The Jewish character has also counted for much; so again have the moral and ethical doctrines, and the miraculous and unprecedented nature of the events narrated. And yet there is much that might have been thought to militate against the book's obtaining any wide influence. Apart from some phrases about all the families of the earth being blessed (or blessing themselves) in the seed of Abraham, there is very little in its direct teaching to suggest that it was ever intended to be of universal application. Possibly these phrases only mean that other nations will use Israel as a typical example of greatness and happiness and pray that they may attain an equal degree of glory and prosperity. Moreover, the Pentateuch is a document that cannot exist, and a corpus of jural law that has not been adopted by other peoples. Of its most characteristic requirement—holiness—large elements are rejected by all save its own people. Wherein then lies its universal element? How can an intensely national of books to exercise a world-wide and ever-growing influence? The reason lies in the very first sentence: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." This doctrine of the unity of all things is the answer to our question. Teach that there is a God and One Only All-powerful God, and the book that tells of Him acquires a message to all His creatures.

Of the national character of the work something has already been said. It is remarkable that for its own people it has in very truth contained life and length of days, for it has been in and through that book that the Jews have maintained themselves throughout their unique history. If it be asked wherein the secret of this strength lies, the answer is in the combination of the national and the religious. The course of history must have been entirely different if the Pentateuch had not been the book of the people long before the Jews became the subjects of the book of the world.

IV. ON PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM

V. TARGUMS AND CHRONICLE LITERATURE

The existence of a Sam community in Nablus is generally known, and the fact that they have a recension of the Pent which differs in some respects from the Massoretic has been long recognized as important.

I. Knowledge of the Samaritan Pentateuch.—Of the Gr Fathers Origen knew of it and notes two insertions which do not appear in

1. In Older Times Nu 13:1 and 21:12, drawn from Dt 1.2 and 2.18. Eusebius of Caesarea in his Chronicon compares the ages of the patriarchs before Abraham in the LXX with those in the Sam Pent and the MT. Epiphanius is aware that the Samaritans acknowledged the Pent alone as canonical. Cyril of Jerusalem notes agreement of LXX and Sam in Gen 4:8. These are the principal evidences of knowledge of this recension among the Gr Fathers. Jerome notes some omissions in the MT and supplies them from Sam. The Talm shows that the Jews retained a knowledge of the Sam Pent longer, and speaks contemptuously of the points in which it differs from the MT. Since the differences observed by the Fathers and the Talmudists are to be seen in the Sam Pent before us, they afford evidence of its authenticity.

After nearly a millennium of oblivion the Sam Pent was restored to the knowledge of Christendom by Pietro de la Valle who in 1616 published

2. Revised a copy from the Sam comm. Knowledge of the Pent which then existed in Damascus. This copy was presented in 1623 to the Paris Oratory and shortly after published in Paris Polyglot under the editorship of Morinus, a priest of the Oratory who had been a Protestant. He emphasized the difference between the MT and Sam Pent for argumentative reasons, in order to prove the necessity for the intervention of the church to set up which was correct. A fierce controversy resulted, in which various divines, Protestant and Catholic, took part. Since then copies of this recension have multiplied in Europe and America. All of them may be regarded as copies ultimately of the Nablus roll. These copies are in the form, not of rolls, but of codices or bound volumes. They are usually written in two columns to the page, one being the Tg or interpretation and this is sometimes in Aramaic and sometimes in Arabic. Some codices show three columns with both Tgs. There are probably nearly 100 of these codices in various libraries in Europe and America. These are all written in the Sam script and differ only by scribal blunders.

II. Codices and Script.—The visitor to the Samaritans is usually shown an ancient roll, but only rarely is the most ancient exhibited.

1. The Nablus Roll is it in circumstances in which it may be examined. Dr. Mills, who spent three months in the Sam community, was able to make a careful though interrupted study of it. His description (Nablus and the Modern Samaritans, 312) is that "the roll is of parchment, written in columns, 13 in. deep, and 7 in. wide. The writing is in a fair hand, rather small; each column contains from 70 to 72 lines, and the whole roll contains 110 columns. The name of the scribe is written in a kind of acrostic, running through these columns, and is found in the Book of Dt. The roll has the appearance of very great antiquity, but is wonderfully well preserved, considering its venerable age. It is worn out and torn in many places and patched with re-written parchment; in many other places, where not even the writing is worn, it seemed to me that about two-thirds of the original is still readable. The skins of which the roll is composed are of equal size and measure each 25 in. long by 15 in. wide." Dr. Rosen’s account on the authority of Kraus (Zeitschr. der deutschen Gesellschaft, XVIII, 582) agrees with this, adding that the “breadth of the writing is a line and the space between is similar.” Both observers have noted that the parchment has been written only on the ‘hair’ side. It is preserved in a silk covering inclosed in a silver case embossed with arkaeshh nombrons.

The reader on opening one of the codices of the Sam Pent recognizes at once the difference of the writing from the characters in an ordinary Heb Bible. The Jews admit that the character in which the Sam Pent is written is older than their square character. It is said in the Talm (Sanhedrin 21b): The law at first was given to Israel in ‘shvri’ letters and in the holy tongue and again has Ezra in the square ('ashbhr) character and the Aram. tongue. Israel chose for themselves the ‘ashbhr” character and the holy tongue; they left to the ‘heihyygof’ (“uncultured”) the ‘ashbhr character and the Aram. tongue—"the Cuthenians are the ‘heihyygof,’" says Rabbi Hasen. When Jewish hatred of the Samaritans, and the contempt of the Pharisees for them are remembered, this admission amounts to a demonstration. The Sam script resembles that on the Maccabean coins, but is not identical with it. It may be regarded as between the square character and the angular, the latter as is seen in the MS and the Siloam inscription. Another intermediate form, that found on the Assouan papyri, owes the differences it presents to having been written with a reed on papyrus. As the chronology of these scripts is of importance we subjoin those principally in question.

3. Peculiarities in Writing

In inscriptions the lapidary had no hesitation, irrespective of syllables, in completing in the next line any letter to which he had been led by a characteristic of the previous letters. In the papyri the words are not divided, but the scribe was not particular in the distribution of words. The second line is wider spacing. The first letter or couple of letters of each line are placed directly under the first letter or letters of the preceding line—so with the last letters—two or three of the line, while the other words are spread out to fill up the space. The only exception to this is a paragraph ending. Words are separated from each other by dots; sentences by a sign like our colon. The Torah is divided into 906 kism or paragraphs. The termination of these is shown by the colon having a dot added to it, thus :. Sometimes this is reinforced by a line and an angle—<. These kism are often enumerated on the margin; sometimes, in later MSS in Arab, numerals. A—sometimes separates one of these kism from the next.

When the scribe wished to inform the reader of his personality and the place where he had written the MS, he made use of a peculiar device. In copying he left a space near the middle of a column. The space thus left is a column now and then bridged by a single letter. These letters read down the column forming words and sentences which convey the information. In the case of the Nabûlûs scribe this takes place in DT and occupies three columns. In this it is said, "A Abshuú, son of Pinhas [Pinhehas], son of Elezar, son of Aharon [Aaron] the priest, have written this holy book in the wall of the tabernacle of the congregation in Mt. Gerizim in the 18th year of the rule of the children of Israel in the land of Canaan." Most of the codices in the libraries of Europe and America have like information given in a similar manner. This tarikh is usually Hebrew, but sometimes it is in Sam Aramaic. Falsification of the date merely is practically impossible; the forgery must be the work of the first scribe.

5. The Mode of Pronunciation

Not only has the difference of script to be considered, but also the different values assigned to the letters. The names given to the letters differ considerably from the Heb, as may be seen above. There are no vowel points or signs of reduplication. Only B and P of the square or KPLH are aspirated. The most singular peculiarity is that none of the gutturals are pronounced at all—a peculiarity which explains some of the names given to the letters. This characteristic appears all the more striking when it is remembered how prominent gutturals are in Arab, the everyday language of the Samaritans. The first 5 verses of Genesis are subjoined according to the Sam pronunciation, as taken down by Petermann (Versuch einer hebr. Fornehmlehre, 161), from the reading of Ahrarun the high priest: E. ráshh bâh Blaum wí oshékhém wí aáréh. Wóár, agaya tê-u bâh wóshekh al fânî, ... um uru Blaum mën, afd al as, aamem waíh la wí yéshíh, waíh al waíh al waíh aír, ada Blaum wí aír ki wóshekh al waíh bêr lef yíh wí wóshekh kara lâh. Uyâ' éer uay kâh yôm aír.

There is no doubt that if the inscription given above is really in the MS it is a forgery written on the skin at the first. Of its falsity there is also no doubt. The Am Tab of the NA- sent from Canaan, and nearly contemporary with the Israelite conquest of the land were impressed with cuneiform characters and the language was Bab. Neglecting the tarikh, we may examine the matter independently and come to certain conclusions. If it is the original from which the other MSs have been copied we are forced to assume a date earlier at least than the 10th cent. AD, which is the date of the earliest Heb MS. The script dates from the Hammonaean. The reason of this mode of writing being perpetuated in copying the Law must be found in some special sanctity in the document from which the copies were made originally. Dr. Mills seems almost inclined to believe the authenticity of the tarikh. His reasons, however, have been rendered less persuasive by Mr. C. O. Cowley, on the other hand, would date it somewhere about the 12th cent. AD, or from that to the 14th. With all the respect due to such a scholar we venture to think his view untenable. His hypothesis is that an old MS was found and the tarikh now seen in it was afterward added. That, however, is impossible unless a new skin—the newness of which would be obvious—had been written over and inserted. Even the comparatively slight change implied in turning Ishmael into Israel in the tarikh in the MT-Nahdimscroll necessitates a great adjustment of lines, as the letters of the tarikh are handled horizontally as well as perpendicularly. If that change were made, the date would then be approximately 650 AD, much older than Cowley's 12th cent. There is, however, nothing in this to explain the substitution of this MT—necessarily, because the roll was saved from fire, that it leaped out of the fire in the presence of Nebuchadnezzar. If it were found unconsumed when the temple on Mt. Gerizim was burned by John Hyrcanus I, this would account for the veneration in which it is held. It would account for its being stored in theScripture. The angular script prevailed until near the time of Alexander the Great. In it or in a script akin to it the copy of the Law must have been written which Manasseh, the son-in-law of Sanballat, brought to Samaria. The presentation of such a copy would be ascribed to miracle and the script consecrated.

III. Relation of the Samaritan Recension to the MT and LXX—While the reader of the Sam text cannot fail to perceive its practical identity with the MT, closer study to MT: reveals numerous, if minor, differences. These differences are classified by Gesenius. Besides being illogically classified, the differences are faulty, founded on the assumption that the Sam Pent text is the later. The same may be said of Kohn's. We would venture on another classification of these variations, deriving the principle of division from their origin. These variations were due either to (1) accident or (2) intention.

(a) The first of these classes arose from the way in which books were multiplied in ancient days. Most commonly one read and a score of scribes, probably slaves, wrote to this dictation. Hence errors might arise when from similarity of letters the reader mistook one word for another. (b) If the reader's pronunciation was not distinct the scribes might mis-hear and therefore write the word amiss. (c) Further, if the reader began a sentence which opened in a way that naturally was followed by certain words or phrases, he might inadvertently continue it, not in the way it was written before him, but in the customary phrase. In the same way the scribe through defective attention might also blunder. Thus the accidental variations may be regarded as due to mistakes of sight, hearing and attention. (2) Variations due to intention are either (a) grammatical, the removal of peculiarities and conforming them to usage, or (b) logical, as when a command having been given, the fulfillment is felt to follow as a logical necessity and so is narrated, or, if narrated, is omitted according to the ideas of the audience; or (c) doctrinal changes introduced into the text to suit the doctrinal position of one side or other. Questions of propriety also lead to alterations—these may be regarded as quasi-doctrinal.

(1) Examples of accidental variations.—(a) Due to mistakes of sight: The cause of mistakes of sight is the likeness of differing letters. These, however, differ in different scripts, as may be proved by consideration of the table of alphabets. Some of these may be found in connection with the Sam Pent text to be due to the resemblance of letters in the Sam script. Most of these are obvious blunders; thus in Gen 19 32, we have the meaningless 'tahuna instead of 'aki'nah, "our father," from the likeness of yod, to the yod of yod, a. In Gen 29 we have "gazed instead of yawzeth, "to seethe," because of the likeness of yod, to yod, or i. These, while in Blayney's transcription of Walton's text, are not in Petermann or the Sam MSS. The above examples are mistakes in Sam MSS, but there are mistakes also in the MT. In Gen 27 30 shows m and l, and the transposition of yod, d, and yod, d. The vb. 'adath, "to be strong," is rare and poetic, and so unlikely to suggest itself to reader or scribe. The renderings of the LXX and Pesh indicate confusion. There are numerous cases, however, where the resembling letters are not in the Sam script, but sometimes in the square character and sometimes in the angular. Some characters resemble each other in both, but not in the Samaritan. The cases in which the only letter in the square script may all be ascribed to variation in the MT. Cases involving the confusion of shadda and yodh are instances in point. It may be said that every one of the instances of variation which depends on confusion of these letters is due to a blunder of a Jewish scribe, e.g. Gen 25 13, where the Jewish scribe has written 'abadh instead of 'rabadh (Nebothi) as usual; 36 5, where the Jewish scribe has yodh instead of yod (Jehu). In the KJV rendering, writing 'raddh instead of 'raddh, the Jewish scribe in regard to the same letters has made a blunder which the Sam scribe has avoided. When d and r are confused, it must not be ascribed to the likeness in the square script, for those letters are alike in the angular also. As the square is admitted to be later than the date of the Sam script, these confusions point to a MS in angular. There are, however, confusions which apply only to letters alike in angular. Thus the word 'adamim, Invar, which Benjamin, binyamin, is written Benjamin; also in Ex 11 pithon instead of pithim, but m and n are alike only in the script of the Siloam inscription. In Dt 12 21, the Sam has yod instead of yod, fsokkken, as the MT has in 12 11, whereas the MT has fsqk, lssim. A study of the alphabets on p. 2314 will show the close resemblance between fsokk and lssim in the Siloam script, as well as the likeness above mentioned between m and n. This points to the fact that the MSS from which the MT and the Sam were transcribed in some period of their history were written in angular of the type of the Siloam inscription, that is to say of the age of Hosekiah.

(b) Variations due to mistakes of hearing: The great mass of these are due to one of two sources, either on the one hand the insertion or omission of a letter, in which case that the vowel is written penuim or the reverse, or, on the other hand, to the mistake of the gutturals. Of the former class the variations are frequency found in chapter. The latter also is fairly frequent, and is due doubtless to the fact that in the time when the originals of the present MSS were transcribed, the gutturals were not pronounced at all. Gen 27 36 shows and in Gen 47 9, and in Gen 23 18, in many Sam MSS, but the result is meaningless. This inability to pronounce the gutturals points to the time considerably before the Arab domination. Possibly this avoidance of the gutturals bore some fashionable element, as the language of law was Lat., a language without gutturals. A parallel instance may be seen in Aquila, who does not transcribe any gutteral, and the gutturals may be connected with the fact that in Assyrisp is practically the only guttural. The colonists from Assyria might not unlikely be unable to pronounce the gutturals.

(c) Changes due to deficient attention. Another cause of variation in the MT is found in the phenomenon of the reader or scribe not attending sufficiently to the actual word or sentence seen or heard; this is manifested in an interchange of words in the text.

In Gen 26:31 the Sam has 'Lehah, 'to his friend,' instead of as the MT 'Ehah, 'to his brother,' and in Ex 5:20 the Sam has 'Tehorah' instead of 'M'sorah.' In other cases it is impossible to determine which represents the original text. We may remark that the assumption of Muhammad that the MT text is always correct is due to mere prejudice. More important is the occasional interchange of a verb in the text.

In Gen 24:10, where Sam has YWfH and the MT Selh, and Gen 7:1 where it has 'Elshim and Selh, this is an instance in which the MT is more singular, in that in the 9th verse of the same chapter the MT has 'Elshim and the Sam YWfH. Another class of instances which may be due to the same cause is the completion of a sentence by adding a clause or, it may be, dropping it from failure to observe it to be incorrect.

If the text is incorrect, the Sam adds the clause "a little water from thy pitcher": if the Sam then the MT has dropped it.

(2) Changes due to intention.—(a) Grammatical: This arises from the most frequent of all the many errors with which the writing in the Sam Pent are those necessary to conform the language to the rules of ordinary grammar. In this the Sam frequently coincides with the K'th of the MT. The K'th of the MT has been brought into the Sam by 'reading' in the personal pronoun sing. In both mas. and fem. it is k'th. The Sam with the K'th corrects this to k'th'. So with na'ar, "a youth":—this is common in the K'th of the MT, but in the k'th when a young woman is in question the fem. termination is added, and so the Sam writers also. It is a possible supposition that this characteristic of the Torah is late and due to blundering peculiar to the MS from which the Massoretes copied the K'th. That it is systematic is being due to the gender, and that the latest Heb books maintain distinction of gender, we must regard this as an evidence of antiquity. This is confirmed by another set of variations between the Sam and the MT. There are, in the latter, traces of case-endings which have disappeared in later Heb. These are removed in the Sam. That case terminations have a tendency to disappear is to be seen in Eng. and Fr. The sign of the accusative, 'eth, frequently omitted in the MT, is indicated in the Sam in the case of the demonstrative pronoun pl. ('el instead of 'elah) is restricted to the Pent and 1 Ch 20:8. The syntax of the cohortative is different in Sam from that in the Massoretic Heb. It is not to be assumed that the Heb is only correct in the Sam. There are cases where, with colloquial inexactitude, the MT has joined a pl. noun to a singular vb., and vice versa; these are corrected in the Sam. Conjugations which in later Heb have a definite meaning in relation to the root, but are used in the MT of the Torah in quite other senses, are brought in the Sam Pent into harmony with later use. It ought in passing to be noted that these pentecostal forms do not occur in the Prophets; even in Josh 2:15 we find the fem. 3d personal pronoun in Jgs 19:3 we have na'darah.

(b) Logical: Sometimes the context or the circumstances implied have led to a change on one side or another. This may be, e.g., the change of some of the numbers, as in Gen 2:2, where the Sam has "sixth" instead of "seventh" (MP), in this agreeing with the LXX and Pesh, the Jewish belief the thinking the "sixth" day could only be reckoned ended when the "seventh" had begun. In Gen 4:2, after the clause, 'A Cain and Abel," the Sam, LXX and Pesh add, "Let us go into the field." From the evidence of the VSS, from the historical character of the man, and from the "visa" not speaks, from the natural meaning also of the preposition 'el, "to," not "with," see Genesis, it is clear that the MT in this place and that the Sam, LXX and Pesh represent the true text. If this is not the case, it is a case of logical completion on the part of the Sam. Another instance is the addition to each name in the genealogy in Gen 11:10-24 of the sum of the years of his life. In the case of the narrative of the plagues of Egypt a whole paragraph is added frequently. What has been commanded Moses and Aaron is repeated as history, and the result was no better than the original.

(c) Doctrinal: There are cases in which the text so suits the special views of the Samarians concerning the character of God or the doctrine of redemption that the direction it may be supposed to be the likeliest explanation. Thus there is inserted at Gen 20:17 the Pesh. Gerizim being put for Ebal, the object of the addition being to give the consecration of Gerizim the sanction of the Torah; and it defends the authenticity of this passage as against the NT. Insertion or omission according to doctrinal predilections is also seen in Gen 25:4. The Sam harmonizes the command of Jec with the action of Moses. The passage of the people in the desert, which looks so difficult to defend, on the other hand, the Jewish hatred of idolatry might suggest itself in the context, and take all the passage of the people and hang them up before the Lord against the sun, and so might be inserted. There are cases also where the language is altered for reasons of propriety. In these cases the Sam agrees with the K'th of the MT.

These variations are of unequal value as evidence of the relative date of the Sam recension of the Pent. The intention is for this purpose of little value; they are evidence of the views prevalent in the northern and southern districts of Pal respectively. Only visual blinders are of real importance, and they point to a date about the days of Hezekiah as the time when the two recensions began to diverge. One thing is obvious, that the Sam, at least as often as the MT, represents the primitive text.

(1) Statement of hypotheses.—The frequency with which the points in which the Sam Pent differs from the MT agree with those in which the LXX agrees with the MT has the support of the NT. In Gal 3:17, the apostle Paul, following the Sam and LXX against the MT, makes the "430 years" which terminated with the exodus begin with Abraham. As a rule the attention of Bib. scholars has been so directed to the resemblances between the Sam and the LXX that they have neglected the more numerous points of difference. So impressed have scholars been, e.g., when Jews, by these resemblances, have still been more dependent on the other. Frankel has maintained that the Sam was tr4 from the LXX. Against this is the fact that in all their insulting remarks against them the Talmudists never assert that the "Cushanrasis" (Sam Pent) are tr4 from the Greeks. Further, even if they only got the Law through Manasseh, the son-in-law of Sanballat, and even if he lived in the time of Alexander the Great, this was nearly half a century before the earliest date of the LXX. Again, while there are many evidences in the LXX that it has been tr4 from Heb, there are none in the Sam that it has been tr4 from Gr. The converse hypothesis is maintained by Dr. Kohl with all the emphasis of an extended type. His hypothesis is that before the LXX was thought of a Gr tr on a Sam copy of the Law for the benefit of Samarians resident in Egypt. The Jews made use of this at first, but when they found it wrong in many points, they purposed a new tr, but were so much influenced by that to which they were accustomed that it was only an improved edition of the Sam which resulted. But it is improbable that the Samarians, who were few and who had comparatively little intercourse with Egypt, should precede the more numerous Jews with a Gr tr in Egypt, in making a Gr tr. It is further against the Jewish tradition as preserved to us by Jos. It is against the Sam tradition as learned by the present writer from the Sam high priest. According to him, the Samaritans had no independent tr, beyond the fact that five of the LXX were Samaritan. Had there been any excuse for asserting that the Samaritans were the first translators, that would not have disadusted the fact that the Targums added by Manasseh, and had been, by his denunciation of foreign marriages, the cause of the banishment of Manasseh and his friends. Is it probable that he, Manasseh, would receive as Mosaic the enforcements from Ezra, or from the pronouncements of the Sama-ristan church? In the introduction of the P, the latest portion of the Law, must accordingly be put considerably earlier than it is placed at present. We have seen that there are visual blunders that can be explained only on the assumption that the MS from which the Samaritan roll was copied was written in some variety of angular script. We have seen, further, that the peculiarities suit those of the Siloeam inscription executed in the reign of Hezekiah, therefore approximately contemporary with the Priest sent by Esarhaddon to Samaria to teach the people "the manner of the God of the land." As Amos and Hosea manifest a knowledge of the whole Pent appear before the captivity, it would seem that this "Book of the Law" was Perad [Am 5: LXX] without, which would be the historic end of the priest sent from Assyria taught as above "the manner of the God of the land," would contain all the portions—J, E, D, and P—of the Law. If so, it did not retain the Book of Josiah; notwithstanding the honor they give to the reign of Cama the Samaritans have not retained the book which relates his exploits. This is confirmed by the fact that the archaism in the MT of the Pent are not found in Josiah. It is singular, if the Prophets were before the Law, that there should be archaism which are not found in the Prophets. From the way the Divine names are interchanged, as we saw, sometimes Elohim in the Sam represents YHWH in the MT, sometimes vice versa, it becomes obviously impossible to lay any stress on this. This conclusion is confirmed by the yet greater frequency with which this interchange occurs in the LXX. The result of investigation of the Sam Pent is to throw very considerable doubt on the hypothesis of the interpolations as to the date, origin and structure of the Pent.

V. Targums and Chronicle.—As above noted, there are two Tgs or interpretations of the Sam Pent, an Arabic and an Arabic-Chronicle. The Arabian Targum is a translation of the Western Aram.; in which the Jewish Tgs were written, sometimes contains the same blunders, and often in many strange words, some of which may be due to the language of the Assy chroniclers, but many are the result of blunders of copyists and corruption of the language. It agrees very closely to the original and is little given to paraphrase. Much the same may be said of the Arab. Tg. It is usually attributed to Abu Said of the 13th cent., but according to Dr. Cowley only revised by him from the Tg of Abulhassan of the 11th cent. There is reference occasionally in the works of the Patriarch to a Samaritan which has been taken to mean a Gr version. No indubitable quotations from it sur-style—what seems to be so heinously tr of the text of the Sar recension. There is in Arab, a wordy chronicle called "The Book of Joshua," it has been edited by Jubalbin. It may be dated in the 13th cent. More recently a "Book of Joshua" in Heb and written in Sam characters was alleged to be discovered in New Zealand. But however, it is manifest forgery; the characters in which it is written is very late, it is partly because of Josiah Josh, and partly from the older Sam Book of Joshua with famous additions. The Chronicle of Abulfath containing the tolerably accurate account of the history of the Samarians after Alexander the Great to the 4th cent. AD.

LITERATURE.—The text in the Sam Pent is found in the polyglots—Paris and London. Walton's text in the London Polyglot is transcribed in square characters by Drayman, Oxford, 1709. The Longman's, which is of recent times are Mills, Noahs and the Samaritans, London, 1864; Nutt, Fragmenta S. Tg. Sam. Text. London, 1874; Montgomery, The Samaritans, Philadelphia, 1907 this has a very full bibliography which includes articles and periodicals. The Sam Pent and Modern Criticism, 1911, London. In

The old Jewish festival obtained a new significance, for the Christian church, by the promised outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Jn 16:7, 13). The incidents of that memorable day, in the history of the church, are by every vivid and dramatic way in the Acts of the Apostles. The old rendering of sumperlóteiskhai (Acts 2:1) by "was fully come" was taken by Lightfoot (Hor. Heb.) to signify that the Christian Pentecost did not coincide with the Jewish, just as Christ's Last Supper was not in the Jewish Passover. This diachronically considered is not to have coincided with the Jewish Passover, on Nisan 14. The bearing of the one on the other is obvious; they stand and fall together. RV translates the obnoxious word simply "was now come." Meyer, in his commentary on the Acts, treats this question at length. The tradition of the ancient church placed the first Christian Pentecost on a Sunday. According to John, the Passover that year occurred on Friday, Nisan 14 (18:26). But according to Mt, Mk and Lk, the Passover that year occurred on Thursday, Nisan 14, and hence Pentecost fell on Saturday. The Kairates explained the shabbóth of Lev 23:15 as pointing to the Sabbath of the paschal week and therefore not the Jewish Passover. But it is very uncertain whether the custom existed in Christ's day, and moreover it would be impossible to prove that the disciples followed this custom, if it could be proved to have existed. Meyer follows the Johannic reckoning and openly states that the other evangelists made a mistake in their reckoning. No offhand decision is possible, and it is but candid to admit that here we are confronted with one of the knottiest problems in the harmonizing of the Gospels. See Chronology of the NT.

The occurrences of the first Pentecost day after the resurrection of Christ set it apart as a Christian festival and invested it, together with the commemoration of the resurrection, with a new meaning. We will not enter here upon a discussion of the significance of the events of the pentecostal day described in Acts 2. That is discussed in the article under Tongues (q.v.). The Lutherans, in their endeavor to prove the inherent power of the Word, claim that "the effects then exhibited were due to the divine power inherent in the words of Christ; and that they had resisted that power up to the day of Pentecost and then yielded to its influence." This is well described as "an incredible hypothesis" (Hodge, Systematic Theol., III, 484). The Holy Spirit descended in order to "fulfill the explicit promise of the glorified Lord, and the disciples had been prayerfully waiting for its fulfillment (Acts 1:4.14). The Spirit came upon them as "a power from on high." The Holy Spirit proved on Pentecost His personal existence, and the intellects, the hearts, the lives of the apostles were on that day miraculously changed. By that day they were fitted for the arduous work that lay before them. There is some difference of opinion as to what is the significance of Pentecost for the church as an institution. The almost universal view among theologians and exegetes is this: that Pentecost marks the founding of the Christian church as an institution. This day is said to mark the dividing line between the ministry of the Lord and the ministry of the Spirit. The later church fathers had advanced the idea that the origin of the church, as an institution, is to be found in the establishment of the apostolate, in the selection of the Twelve. Dr. A. Kuyper holds that the church as an institution was founded when Jesus called the Twelve, and that these men were "qualified for their calling by the power of the Holy Spirit." He distinguishes between the institution and the constitution of the church. Dr. H. Bavinck says: “Christ gathers a church about Himself, rules it directly so long as He is on the earth, and appoints twelve apostles who later on will be His witnesses. The institution of the apostolate is an esp. strong proof of the institutional character which Christ gave to His church on the earth” (Geref. Dogm., IV, 64).

Whatever we may think of this matter, the fact remains that Pentecost completely changed the apostles, and led them into a new horizon, to which the Holy Spirit enabled them to become witnesses of the resurrection of Christ as the fundamental fact in historic Christianity, and to extend the church according to Christ’s commandment. Jerome has an esp. elegant passage in which Pentecost is compared with the beginning of the Jewish national life on Mt. Sinai (Ad Tabith., § 7): “There is Sinai, here Sion; there the trembling mountain, here the trembling house; there the flaming mountain, here the flaming tongues; there the noisy thunderings, here the sounds of many tongues; there the clanger of the ramshorn, here the notes of the gospel-trumpet.” This vivid passage shows the close analogy between the Jewish and Christian Pentecost.

3. Later Christian Christian As yet there was no trace of Christmas, Observance which began to appear about 360 AD.

Easter, the beginning of the pentecostal period, closed the “Quadragesima,” or “Lent,” the entire period of which had been marked by self-denial and humiliation. On the contrary, the entire pentecostal period, the so-called “Quinquagesima,” was marked by joyfulness, daily communion, abstention from fasts, standing in prayer, etc. Ascension Day, the 40th day of the period, ushered in the climax of this joyfulness, which burst forth in its fullest volume on Pentecost. It was highly esteemed by the Fathers. Chrysostom calls it “the metropolis of the festivals” (De Pentec., Hom. ii); Gregory of Nazianzen calls it “the day of the Spirit” (De Pentec., Orat. 44). All the Fathers sound its praises. For they fully understood, with the church of the ages, that on that day the dispensation of the Spirit was brought about in dispensation of greater privileges and of a broader horizon and of greater power than had hitherto been vouchsafed to the church of the living God. The festival “Octaves,” which, in accordance with the Jewish custom, devoted the whole week to the celebration of the festival, from the 8th cent., gave place to a two days’ festival, a custom still preserved by the Roman church and such Protestant bodies as follow the ecclesiastical year. The habit of dressing in white and of seeking baptism on Pentecost gave it the name “Whitsunday,” by which it is popularly known all over the world. HENRY E. DOSKER

PENUEL, pê-nô-ul, pen-ô-ul. See Penuiel.

PENURÍ, pen-u-ri (πενυρί, mahgâr): In Prov 14 23, with sense of “poverty,” “want”; “The talk of the lips tendeth only to penury.” In the NT the word in Lk 21 4 (lôrêpma, xustêrêma) is in RV tr. “want” (of the widow’s mites).

PEOPLE, pê’yl: In EV represents something over a dozen Heb and Gr words. Of these, in the OT, דַּעַ֔ג, ‘am, is overwhelmingly the most common (some 2,000 t.), with דִּינָֽו, le’môn, and גֹּי, next in order; but the various Heb words are used with very little or no difference in force (e.g. Prov 14 28; but, on the other hand, in Ps 44 contrast vs 12 and 14). Of the changes introduced by RV the only one of significance (cited evidence in the Preface to ERV) is the frequent use of the pl. “peoples” (strangely avoided in AV except Rev 10 11, 17 18), where 10 times the word, “people,” is used. So, for instance, in Ps 67 4; Isa. 55 4; 60 2, with the contrast marked in Ps 33 10 and 12; Ps 77 14 and 15, etc. In the NT, λαός, ñōs, is the most common word, with ἔθνος, òthnos, used almost as often in AV. But in RV the latter word is almost always rendered “nations,” “peoples” being used only in Lk 7 12; Acts 11 21 26; 19 26, and in the fixed phrase “the common people” (ὁ ἐθνὸς ἔθνος, ho òthnos othnos) in Mk 12 37; Jn 12 9.12 m (the retention of “people” would have been better in Jn 11 42, also) with “crowd” (Mt 9 23; 25; Acts 21 35). The only special use of “people” that calls for attention is the phrase “people of the land.” This may mean simply “inhabitants,” as Ezk 12 19; 33 2; 39 13; but in 2 K 11 14, etc. and the parallel in 2 Ch, it means the people as contrasted with the king, while in Jer 1 18, etc., and in Ezk 7 27; 22 29; 46 3.9, it means the common people as distinguished from the priests and the aristocracy. A different usage is that for the heathen, (Gen 10 12; Nu 23 8; Jer 9 1 2; 10 2 11; Neh 10 38; Is 35 10; Hos 10 16:31) inhabitants of Pal. From this last use, the phrase came to be applied by some rabbis to even pure-blooded Jews, if they neglected the observance of the rabbinic traditions (cf. Jn 7 49 AV). With “people of the East” see CHILDREN OF THE EAST.

PEOR, pê’ôr (πηρ, ho-p’ôr; פֶּה, Phôgôr): (1) A mountain in the land of Moab, the last of the three heights to which Balaam was guided by Balak in order that he might curse Israel (Nu 22 32). It is placed by Onom on the way between Livias and Heshbon, 7 Rom miles from the latter. Buhl would identify it with Jebel el-Mesheikhkar, on which are the ruins of an old town, between Wady Aysin Misa and Wady Heshbon.

(2) A town in the Judaean uplands added by LXX (fôyvph, Phôgôr) to the list in Josh 16 9. It may be identical with Khirbet Fâghûr to the S. of Bethlehem.

(3) Peor, in Nu 26 15; 31 16; Josh 22 17, is a Divine name standing for “Basal-peor.”

(4) In Gen 36 39, LXX reads Phôgôr for “Pau” (MT), which in 1 Ch 1 50 appears as “Pai.”

PERAEA, pê-rê’ã (περαία, hê Peraiâ, Êpeíâ, Êperâ, Peratîâ, Perâtîâ, Perâlîâ: This is not a Scriptural name, but the term used by Jos to denote the district to which the rabbis habitually refer as “the land beyond Jordan.” This corresponds to the NT phrase περαῖ τοῦ Ἰορδανοῦ (Mt 4 15; 19 1, etc.). The boundaries of the province are given by Jos (Bj IV, iii, 3). In length it reached from Pella in the N. to Machaerus in the S., and in breadth from the Jordan on the W. to the desert on the E. We may take it that the southern boundary was the Arnon. The natural boundary on the N. would be the great gorge of the Yarmuk. Gadara, Jos tells us (Bj IV, vii, 3, 6), was capital of the Perea. But the famous city on the Yarmuk was a member of the Decapolis, and so could hardly take that position. More probably Jos referred to a city the ruins of which are found at Jodâr— a reminiscence of the ancient name—not far from Pella. The northern frontier was held by the Arnon, the southern boundary of the Peræa would run, as Jos says, from Pella eastward. For the description of the country thus indicated see GILEAD, 2.

In the time of the Maccabees the province was mainly gentle, and Julius Josue, if necessary to remove to Judea the scattered handful of Jews to secure their safety (1 Mac 5 45). Possibly under Hyrcanus Jewish influence began to
2. History prevail; and before the death of Janthe whole country was owned his sway (BTP, I, i, 297, 306). At the death of Herod the Great it became part of the tetrarchy of Ant-us (Ant, XVII, vii, 1). The tetrarch built a city on the site of the ancient Beth-haram (Josh 13 27) and called it Julias in honor of the emperor’s wife (Ant, XVIII, ii, 1; BJ, II, ix, 1). Here Simon made his abortive rising (Ant, XVII, x, 6; BJ, II, iv, 2). Claudius placed it under the government of Felix (BJ, II, xii, 8). It was finally added to the Roman dominions by Phæadius (BJ, IV, vii, 3-4). Under the Moslems it became part of the province of Damascus.

Peræa, “the land beyond Jordan,” ranked along with Judæa and Galileæ as a province of the land of Israel. The people were under the same laws as regarded tithes, marriage and property.

Peræa lay between two gentle provinces on the E., as Samaria between two Jewish provinces on the W. of the Jordan. The fords below Besaḏa and other well-accorded communication with Galileæ and Judæa respectively. Peræa thus formed a link connecting the Jewish provinces, so that the pilgrims from any part might go to Jerusalem and return without setting foot on gentile soil. And what of equal importance, they could avoid peril of hurt or indignity which the Samaritans loved to inflict on Jews passing through Samaria (Lk 9 52; Ant, XX, vi, 1; Vita, 62).

It seems probable that Jesus was baptized within the confines of the Peræa; and thither He came from the turmoil of Jerusalem at the Feast of the Dedication (Jn 10 40). It was the scene of much quiet and profitable intercourse with His disciples (Mt 19; Mk 10 1-31; Lk 18 15-30). These passages are by many thought to refer to the period after His retirement to Ephraim (Jn 11 54). It was from Peræa that He was summoned by the sisters at Bethany (ver 3).

Peræa furnished in Niger one of the bravest men who fought against the Romans (BJ, II, xx, 4; IV, vi, 1). From Bethæzah, a village of Peræa, came Mary, whose story is one of the most appalling among the terrible tales of the siege of Jerus (BJ, VI, iii, 4). Jos mentions Peræa for the last time; it was echoed by the dolorous groans and outcries that accompanied the destruction of Jerusalem.

PERAZIM, per-a-zim, pær-’az-im, MOUNT (“per’-ez,” har-p’ræ’ah): “Jehovah will rise up as in mount Perazim” (Isa 29 21). It is usually considered to be identical with Bāal-perazim (q.v.), where David obtained a victory over the Philistines (2 S 5 20; 1 Ch 14 11).

PERDITION, per-di’thun (ἀπώλεια, ἀπόλεια, “ruin” or “loss,” physical or eternal): The word “perdition” occurs in the Eng. Bible 8 t (Jn 17 12; Phil 1 28); 2 Thess 2 3; 1 Tim 6 9; He 10 39; 2 Pet 3 7; Rev 17 11.8). In each of these cases it denotes the final state of ruin and punishment which forms the opposite to salvation. The vb. apōlyein, from which the word is derived, has two meanings: (1) to lose; (2) to destroy. Both of these pass over to the noun, so that apōleia comes to signify: (1) loss; (2) ruin, destruction. The former occurs in Mt 26 8; Mk 14 4, the latter in the passages cited above. Both meanings had been adopted into the religious terminology of the Church, as early as the LXX. “To be lost in the religious sense may mean “to be missing” and “to be ruined.” The former meaning attaches to it in the teaching of Jesus, who compares the lost sinner to the missing coin, the missing sheep, and makes him the object of a seeking activity (Mt 15 24; 18 11; Lk 15 32).

“To be lost” here signifies to have become estranged from God, to miss realizing the relations which man normally sustains toward Him. It is equivalent to what is theologically called “spiritual death.” This conception of “loss” enters also into the description of the eschatological state of the sinner as assigned in the judgment (Lk 9 24; 17 33), which is a loss of life. The other meaning of “ruin” and “destruction” describes the same thing, from a different point of view. Apōleia being the opposite of σωτηρία, and σωτηρία in its technical usage denoting the reclaiming from death unto life, apōleia also acquires the specific sense of such ruin and destruction as involves an eternal loss of life (Phil 1 28; He 10 39). Perdition in this latter sense is equivalent to what theology calls “eternal death.” When in Rev 17 8.11 it is predicated of “the beast,” one of the forms of the world-power, this must be understood on the basis of the OT prophetic representation according to which the coming judgment deals with powers rather than persons.

The Son of Perdition is a name given to Judas (Jn 17 12) and to the Antichrist (2 Thess 2 3). This is the well-known Heb idiom by which a person typically embodying a certain trait or character of sin is called the son of that thing. The name therefore represents Judas and the Antichrist (see MAN OF SIN) as most irrecoverably and completely devoted to the final apōleia. GEBHARDUS VOS

PERES, pér’e-zee. See MENE.

PERESH, pér’ē-sh (פרש, perez; “dung”): Son of Machir, grandson of Manasseh through his Aramitic concubine (1 Ch 7 14.16).

PEREZ, pér’e-zee, PHAREZ, fā’rez (“fa’rez, perez,” “breach”): One of the twins born to Judah by Tamar, Zerah’s brother (Gen 38 29.30). In AV Mt 1 3 and Lk 3 33, he is called “Phares,” the name in 1 Esd 5 5. He is “Pharez” in AV Gen 46 12: Nu 26 20.21; Lk 3 25.39; 2 Ch 3 4.5; 4 1; 4 9.4. In AV and RV 1 Ch 27 3; Neh 11 4.6, he is “Perez.” He is important in the fact that by way of Ruth and Boaz and so through Jesse and David his genealogy comes upward to the Saviour. The patronymic “Pharzite” occurs in Nu 26 20 AV.

Perezites (Nu 26 20, AV “Pharzites”). The patronymic of the name Perez.

1. In the OT is the tr of shālām, “finished.”
2. In the NT “perfect,” “complete, used (except in Dt 15 15, “perfect weight”) of persons, e.g. a “perfect heart,” i.e. wholly or completely devoted to Jehovah (1 K 8 6 11, etc; 1 Ch 12 38; Isa 38 3, etc); tāmím, “complete.” “perfect,” “sound or unblemished,” is also used of persons and of God; His way, and law (“Noah was a just man and perfect, RV” “blameless” Gen 6 9); “As for God, His way is perfect” (Ps 18 30); “The law of Jehovah is perfect” (Ps 19 7, etc); tām, with the same meaning, occurs only in Job, except twice in Ps 3. 118; 2. 3, etc; Ps 37 37; 64 4); kalid, “complete,” and various other words are trd “per-
Perfection is the tr of various words so tr once only: ἀποκατάστασις (Lam 2 15); ἀποκατάστασις, "completeness" (Ps 50 2); ἀποκατάστασις, "possession" (Job 15 20, AV "neither shall he by the perfection (or possession) upon the earth.") AV "neither shall their possessions be extended on the surface of the earth". Red reverses this text and m; ἀποκατάστασις, "completeness," or "perfection" (Ps 119 96); ὠρθοσκευή (twice), "end." 2. In the "perfect" (Mt 5 48, "Ye therefore NT shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect" Mt 19 21, "if thou wouldst be perfect"; Eph 4 13, AV "till we all come... unto a perfect man," RV "full-grown"; Phil 3 15, "as many as are perfect," ARV "men full-grown," 1 Cor 2 6; Col 1 28, "perfect... every perfect man has his end." 3. The Christian Ideal must be forever beyond, not only any human, but any finite, being; it is a Divine ideal forever shining before us, calling us upward, and making endless progression possible. As noted above, the perfect man, in the OT phrase, was the man whose heart was set or wholly devoted to God. Christian perfection must also have its seat in such a heart, but it implies the whole conduct and the whole man, conformeth thereto as knowledge grows and opportunity arises, or might be found. There may be, of course, relative perfections, e.g., a child as a child compared with that of the man. The Christian ought to be continually moving onward toward perfection, looking to Him who is able to "make you perfect in every good thing (or work) to do his will, working in us that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be the glory for ever and ever. Amen" (He 13 20).

PERFORM, pér-form′ (Lp, perfomir, "to furnish completely," "to complete," "finish entirely") In modern Eng., through a mistaken connection with "form," "perform" usually suggests an act in its continuity, while the word properly should emphasize only the completion of the act. AV seems to have used the word in only one passage, of 3 sense (cf. Rom 15 28; 2 Cor 8 11, Phil 1 6, where RV has respectively "accomplish," "complete," "perfect"), but usually with so little justification in the Heb or Gr that "do" would have represented the original even better. RV has rarely changed the word in the OT, and such changes as have been made (Dt 23 23; Est 1 15, etc) seen based on no particular principle. In the NT the word has been kept only in Mt 5 33 and Rom 8 1, but in the latter verse vs. 13, RV renders the completion of the act, in the former case a perfect, "lit. to give back," in the latter postē, "to make," "to do," being used.

Performance is found in AV Sir 19 20 (RV "doing"; 2 Macc 11 17, inserted needlessly and omitted by RV), Lk 4 18 (RV "fulfillment); 2 Cor 8 11 (RV "completion").

PERFUME, pér-fyüm, pér-fy-üm, PERFUMER (πυραμήν, ἐφαρμός, κατάρ, lit. "incense"). The ancients were fond of sweet perfumes of all kinds (Pro 7 17), and that characteristic is still esp. true of the people of Bible lands. Perfumed oils were rubbed on the body and feet. At a feast in ancient Egypt a guest was anointed with scented oils, and a sweet-smelling water lily was placed in his hand or suspended on his forehead. In their religious worship the Egyptians were lavish with their incense. Small pellets of dried mixed spices and resins or resiny woods were burned in special censers. In the preparation of bodies for burial, perfumed oils and spices were used. Many Bib. references indicate the widespread use of perfumes. Cant 7 8 suggests that the breath was purposely scented; clothing as well as the body was perfumed (Ps 45 8; Cant 3 6; 4 11); clothes and beds were sprinkled with savory scents (Ez 7 17); anoints were used in the last rites in honor of the dead (2 Ch 16 14; Lk 24 1; Jn 19 39). The writer has in his collection a lump of prepared spices and resins taken from a tomb dating from the 1st or 2d cent. AD, which apparently fused and ran into the thoracic cavity, since an impression of the ribs has been made on the perfume. Its odor is similar to that of the incense used today, and it perfumes the whole case where it is kept. The above collection also contains a small glass vial in which is a bronze spoon firmly held in some solidified ointment, probably formerly perfumed oil. Perfumes were commonly kept in sealed alabaster jars or cruces (Lk 7 38). Thousands of these cruces have been unearthed in Pal and Syria.

Perfumes were mixed by persons skilled in the art. In AV these are called "apothecaries" (παραγωγης, ῥακακος). The RV "perfumer" is probably a more correct rendering, as the one who did the compounding was not an apothecary in the same sense as is the person now so designated (Ex 30 25 35; 37 29; Eccl 3 1).

Today incense is used in connection with all religious services of the oriental Christian churches. Although there is no direct mention of the uses of incense in the NT, such allusions as Paul's "a-sac-
The delights of the people of Syria in pleasant odors is recorded in their literature. The altar of roses (from Arab. 'hr, "a sweet odor") was a well-known product of Damascus. The guest in a modern Syrian home is not literally anointed with oil, but he is often given, soon after he enters, a bunch of aromatic herbs or a sweet-smelling flower to hold and smell. During a considerable portion of the year the country air is laden with the odor of aromatic herbs, such as basil, lavender, thyme. The Arabic phrase for taking a walk is sewam el-hvwah, lit. "smell the air." See Incense; Oil; Ointment.

PERGA, pér'ga (Πηγή, Perga): An important city of the ancient province of Pamphylia, situated on the river Cestrus, 12 miles N.E. of 1. Location Attalia. According to Acts 13:13, and History Paul, Barnabas and John Mark visited Perga on their first mission journey, and 2 years later, according to Acts 14:24-25, they may have preached there. Though the water of the river Cestrus has now been diverted to the fields for irrigating purposes, in ancient times the stream was navigable, and ships took off on the sea might reach the city. It is uncertain how ancient Perga is; its walls, still standing, seem to come from the Seleucid period or from the 3d cent. BC. It remained in the possession of the Seleucid kings until 189 BC, when Rom influence became strong in Asia Minor. A long series of coins, beginning in the 2d cent. BC, continued until 286 AD, and upon them Perga is mentioned as a metropolis. Though there is a strong hold of Christianity, it was the bishopric of Western Pamphylia, and several of the early Christians were martyred there. During the 8th cent. under Byzantine rule the city declined; in 1084 Attalia became the metropolis, and Perga rapidly fell to decay. While Attalia was the chief Gr and Christian city of Pamphylia, Perga was the seat of the local Asiatic goddess, who corresponded to Artemis or Diana of the Ephesians, and was locally known as Leito, or the queen of Perga. She was represented on the coins as a huntress, with a bow in her hand, and with sphinxes or stags at her side.

The ruins of Perga are now called Murtana. The walls, which are flanked with towers, show the city to have been quadrangular in shape.

2. The Ruins

Very broad streets, intersecting through the town, and intersecting each other, divided the city into quarters. The sides of the streets were covered with porticoes, and along their centers were water channels in which a stream was always flowing. They were on open at short intervals by bridges. Upon the higher ground was the acropolis, where the earliest city was built, but in later times the city extended to the S. of the hill, where one may see the greater part of the ruins. On the acropolis is the platform of a large structure with fragments of several granite columns, probably representing the temple of the goddess Leito; others regard it as the ruin of an early church. At the base of the acropolis are the ruins of an immense theater which seated 13,000 people, the agora, the baths and the stadium. Without the walls many tombs are to be seen. E. J. BANKS

PERGAMOS, pér'ga-mos, or PERGAMUM, pér'ga-mum (ἡ Πέργαμου, hē Pergamou, or τὸ Πέργαμον, to Pergamon): Pergamos, to which the ancient writers also gave the neuter form of the name, was a city of Mysea of the ancient Rom province of Asia, in the Caicus valley, 3 miles from the river, and about 15 miles from the sea. The city is navigable, and a fine harbor was the natural craft. Two of the tributaries of the Caicus were the Selinus and the Rteos. The former of these rivers flowed through the city; the latter ran along its walls. On the hill between these two streams the first city stood, and there also stood the acropolis, the chief temples, and the theaters of the later city. The early peoples of the town were descendants of Gr colonists, and as early as 420 BC they struck their coins at the possession of the town, deposited there 9,000 talents of gold. Upon his death, Philetaerus (283-263 BC) used this wealth to found the independent Gr dynasty of the Attalids kings. The first of this dynasty to bear the title of king was Attalus I (241-197 BC), a nephew of Philetaerus, and not only did he adorn the city with beautiful buildings until it became the most wonderful city of the East, but he added to his kingdom the countries of Mysia, Lydia, Caria, Pamphylia, and Phrygia. Eumenes II (197-159 BC) was the last of the Attalid kings of the dynasty, and during his reign the city reached its greatest height. Art and literature were encouraged, and in the city was a library of 200,000 volumes which later Antony gave to Cleopatra. The books of this library were first used; hence the word "parchment," which is derived from the name of the town P. Of the structures which adorned the city, the most renowned was the altar of Zeus, which was 90 ft. in height, and also one of the wonders of the ancient world. When in 133 BC Attalus III, the last king of the dynasty, died, he gave his kingdom to the Rom government. His son, Aristionus, however, attempted to set up for himself, but in 129 he was defeated, and the Rom province of Asia was formed, and P. was made its capital. The term Asia, as here employed, should not be confused with the continent of Asia, nor with Asia Minor. It applied simply to that part of Asia Minor which was then in the possession of the Romans, and formed into the province of which P. was the capital. Upon the establishment of the province of Asia there began a new series of coins struck at P., which continued into the Rom. AD. The magnificence of the city continued.

There were beautiful temples to the four great gods Zeus, Dionysus, Athena and Asclepius. To the temple of the latter, invalids from 2. Religions all parts of Asia flocked, and there, bowing in gratitude to the god revealed to the priests and physicians by means of dreams the remedies which were necessary to heal their maladies. Thus opportunities of deception were numerous. There was a school of medicine in connection with the temple. P. was chiefly a religious center of the province. A title which it bore was "Thrice Neokoros," meaning that in the city the 3 temples had been built to the Rom emperors, in which the emperors were worshipped as gods. Smyrna, a rival city, was a commercial center, and as it increased in wealth, it gradually became the political center. Later, when it became the capital, P. remained the religious center. As in many of the towns of Asia Minor, there were at P. many Jews, and in 130 BC the people of the city passed a decree in their favor. Many Jews were more or less assimilated with the Greeks, even to the extent of bearing Gr names.

Christianity reached P. early, for there one of the Seven Churches of the Book of Rev stood, and there, according to Rev 2, Antipas was martyred; he was the first Christian to be put to death by the Rom state. The same passage speaks of P. as the place "where Satan's throne is," probably referring to the temples in which the Rom emperors were worshiped. During the Byzantine times P. still continued as a religious center, for there a bishop lived. However, the town fell into the hands of the Seljuk in 1304, and in 1336 it was taken by Suleiman, the son of Orkhan, and became Turkish.

The modern name of the town, which is of considerable size, possessing 15 mosques, is Bursa, the Turkish corruption of the ancient name. One of its mosques is the early Byzantine church of St. Sophia. The modern town is built among the ruins of the ancient city, but is far less in extent. From 1870 to 1880 excavations among the ruins were conducted by Herr Humann at the expense of the German government. Among them are still to be seen the base of the altar of Zeus, the friezes of which are now in the Pergamon Museum, Berlin; the theater, the agora, the gymnasium, and several temples. In ancient times the city was noted for its ointments, pottery and parchment; at present the chief articles of trade are cotton, wool, opium, valonia, and leather.

PERIDA, pé-rí'da (Πηρίδα, πηρίδαθα), "recluses": A family of "Solomon's servants" (Neh 7:57). In Ex 2:5, a difference in the Hebrew spelling gives "Peruda" for the same person, who is also called the "Pharida" of 1 Esd 5:33.

PERIZZITE, peri'zít, pe-ri'zít (πηρίζιτος, φαρκεατος): Signifies "a village" and so corresponds with the Egyptian fellah. Hence the Perizzite is not included among the sons of Canaan in Gen 10, and is also coupled with the Canaanite (Gen 13:7; 34:30; Jgs 4:4). We hear, accordingly, of Canaanite and Perizzite ancestors at Shechem (Gen 34:30), at Bezek in Judah (Jgs 4:4) and, according to the reading of LXX, at Gezer (Jsh 16:10). In Dt 3:5 and 1 S 6:18, where AV has "unwalled towns" and "countryside villages," LXX has "Perizites," the lit. tr. of the Heb. "cities of the Perizite" or "villages" and "village of the Perizzite." The same expression occurs in Est 9:19, where it is used of the Jews in Elam. In Josh 17:15,18, where the Manassites are instructed to take possession of the forest land of Carmel, "Perizites and Rephaim" are given as the equivalent of "Canaanite." A. H. Sayce (Jer 8:5); têmâdite, "continuance," generally rendered "continually," but sometimes "perpetual" or "perpetually" (Ex 30:8; Lev 6:20).

Perpetually is the rendering of 'êdâkh, properly "progress," "duration," hence long or indefinite time, eternity (usually AV rendered "for ever"); in Am 1:1, "his angel appeared to him perpetually"; and of kâl hâ-yâmîm, "all the days," of K 9:2; 2 Ch 17:16, "my heart shall be there perpetually"; of Mt 28:20, pânas tois himârâs, lit. Perpetuity is found in RV of Lev 25:33, "The land shall not be sold in perpetuity," "The house . . . shall be made sure in perpetuity." Perpetual is frequent in Apoc, most often as the tr. of .background and kindred words, e.g. Jsh 13:20, a "perpetual praise"; Wind, 1:14, "perpetual glory," RV "eternal"; Re 11:13, "a perpetual blot," RV "blame for ever"; and in Matt 6:4, of a "perpetual name," RV "everlasting;" ãthanos, "ever-flowing," occurs in Wind 11:6 (so RV); endechôs, "constant" (Re 41:6, "perpetual reproof").

For perpetual (Jer 50:5; Hab 3:6) RV has "everlasting," for "the old hatred" (Ezk 25:15), "perpetual enmity," for "perpetual desolation" (Jer 29:12), "desolato for ever," in "Inb everlasting desolations." W. L. Walker

17. Results of Persecution

The importance of this subject may be indicated by the fact of the frequency of its occurrence, both in the OT and NT, where in AV the words "persecute," "persecuted," "persecuting" are found no fewer than 53 t, "persecution" 44 t, and "persecutor" 9 t.

It must not be thought that persecution existed only in NT times. In the days of the OT it existed too. In what Jesus said to the Pharisees, He especially referred to the inhuman blood which had been shed in those times, and told them that they were showing themselves heirs—to use a legal phrase—to their fathers who had persecuted the righteous, "from the blood of Abel the righteous unto the blood of Zachariah" (Mt 23:35).

In the period between the close of the OT and the coming of Christ, there was much and protracted suffering endured by the Jews, because of their refusal to embrace idolatry, and of their fidelity to the Mosaic Laws and the worship of God. During that time there were many patriots who were true martyrs, and those heroes of faith, the Macabees, who accompanied those who "know their God . . . and do exploit" (Dan 11:32). "We have no need of human help," said Jonathan the Jewish high priest, 'having for our comfort the sacred Scriptures which are in our hands" (1 Mac 12:9).

In the Ep. to the He, persecution in the days of the OT is summed up in these words: "Others had trial of mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover of bonds and imprisonment; they were stoned, they were sawn asunder, they were tempted, they were slain with the sword: they went about in sheepskins, in goatskins; being destitute, afflicted, ill-treated (of whom the world was not worthy)" (He 11.37).

Coming now to NT times, persecution was frequently foretold by Christ, as certain to come to those who were His true disciples and followers. He forewarned them again and again that it was inevitable. He said that He Himself must suffer it (Mt 16.21; 17.22-23; Mk 8.31).

It would be a test of true discipleship. In the parable of the Sower, He mentions this as one of the causes of defection among those who are Christians in outward appearance only. When affliction or persecution ariseth for the word's sake, immediately the stony-ground hearers are offended (Mt 13.21).

It would be a sure means of gaining a blessing, whenever it came to His loyal followers when they were in the way of well-doing; and He thus speaks of it in two of the Beatitudes (Mt 5.10; 11).

5. A Means of Blessing

"Blessed are ye when men shall reproach you, and persecute you . . . for my sake" (Mt 5.10.11; see also ver 12).

It would take different forms, ranging through every possible variety, from false accusations to the infliction of death, beyond which, He pointed out (Mt 10.28; Lk 12.4), persecutors are unable to go. The methods of persecution which were employed by the Jews, and also by the heathen against the followers of Christ, were such as these: (1) Men would revile them and would say all manner of evil against them falsely, for Christ's sake (Mt 5.11). (2) Contempt and disparagement: "Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a demon?" (Jn 8.48); "If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more them of his household!" (Mt 10.25). (3) Being, solely on account of their loyalty to Christ, forcibly separated from the company and the society of others, and expelled from the synagogues or other assemblies for the worship of God: "Blessed are ye, when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from among their countrymen, and reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of man's sake!" (Lk 6.22); "They shall put you out of the synagogues" (Jn 16.2). (4) Illegal arrest and spoliating of goods, and death itself. All these various methods, used by the persecutor, were foretold, and all came to pass. It was the fear of apprehension and death that led the eleven disciples to forsake Jesus in Gethsemane and to flee for their lives. Jesus often forewarned them of the severity of the persecution to which they would need to encounter if they were loyal to Him: "The hour cometh, that whosoever killeth you shall think that he offereth service unto God" (Jn 16.2); "I send unto you prophets . . . some of them shall ye kill and crucify; and some of them shall ye scourge in your synagogues, and persecute from city to city" (Mt 23.34).

7. In the Case of illegal arrest; the heapsing of every insult upon Him as a prisoner; false accusation; and a violent and most cruel death.

After Our Lord's resurrection the first attacks against His disciples came from the high priest and his party. The high-priesthood was then in the hands of the Sadducees, and one reason which moved them to take action of this kind was their 'secure position' because apostles "proclaimed in Jesus the resurrection from the dead!" (Acts 4.2; 5.17). The gospel based upon the resurrection of Christ was evidence of the untruth of the chief doctrines held by the Sadducees, for they held the 'dead are not raised.' But instead of yielding to the evidence of the fact that the resurrection had taken place, they opposed and denied it, and persecuted His disciples. For a time the Pharisees were more moderate in their attitude toward the Christian faith, as is shown in the case of Gamaliel (Acts 5.34); and on one occasion they were willing even to defend the apostle Paul (Acts 23.9) on the doctrine of the resurrection. But gradually the whole of the Jewish people became bitter persecutors of the Christians. Thus in the earliest of the Pauline Epis., it is said, "Ye also suffered the same things of your own countrymen, even as they [in Judaea] did of the Jews; who both killed the Lord Jesus and the prophets, and drove out us, and persecute us, and are contrary to all men" (1 Thess 2.14.15).

Serious persecution of the Christian church began with the case of Stephen (Acts 7.1-60); and his lawless execution was followed by "a great persecution" directed against the Christians in Jerusalem. This "great persecution" (Acts 8.1) scattered the members of the church, who fled in order to avoid bonds and imprisonment and death. At this time Saul signalized himself by his great activity, persecuting "this Way of death", and captured into prisons both men and women" (Acts 22.4).

By and by one of the apostles was put to death—the first to suffer of "the glorious company of the apostles"—James the brother of John, who was slain with the sword by Herod (Acts 12.2). Peter also was imprisoned, and was delivered only by an angel (13.7-11).

During the period covered by the Acts there was not much purely gentle persecution; at that time the persecution suffered by the Christian church was chiefly Jewish. There were, however, great dangers and risks of persecution encountered by the apostles and by all who proclaimed the gospel then. Thus, at Philip's (Acts 13.19-40), and, even before that time, Paul and Barnabas had suffered much at Iconium and at Lystra (Acts 14.1-16). And when Paul had pleaded in his own defence before King Herod Agrippa and the Roman governor Festus, these two judges were agreed in the opinion, "This man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds!" (Acts 26.31). Indeed it is evident (see Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Rom Citizen, 308) that the purpose of Paul's trial being recorded at length in the Acts is to establish the fact that the gospel was not forbidden by the laws of the Roman empire, but that Christianity was a religio licita, a lawful religion.

Christianity, as first, not a forbidden religion.—This legality of the Christian faith was illustrated and enforced by the fact that when Paul was at first tried by the supreme court of appeal at Rome, he was set free and resumed his missionary labors, as these are recorded or referred to in the Pastoral Ep. "One thing only, however, I may mention, not from a comparison of Phil with 2 Tim. There had been in the interval a considerable change in the policy toward Christianity of the Roman government. The change was due to the great fire of Rome (July, 64). As part of the persecution which then broke out, orders were given for the imprisonment of not a few. Besides, the many Nero's Jewish friends were not likely to forget the prisoner of the previous time. So, when news of the fire reached Rome, but steps were taken instantly for his arrest. The apostle was brought back to the city in the autumn of the same year, to what he had said at all. Indeed, of the summary punishment of his brethren, witnesses to the story of his imprisonment and the assent to a show of legality in the persecution of the leader" (Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, 38). See Pastoral Epistles; Acts; Revelation.

The legal decisions which were favorable to the Christian faith were soon overturned on the occasion of the great fire in Rome, which

12. The occurred in July, 64. The public

Neronic feeling of resentment broke out against Persecution the emperor to such a degree that, to avoid the stigma, just or unjust, of being himself guilty of setting the city on fire, he made the Christians the scapegoats which he thought he needed. Tacitus (Annals xv.44) relates all that occurred at that time, and what he says is modeled after the one of the very early notices found in any profane author, both of the Christian faith, and of Christ Himself.

(1) Testimony of Tacitus.—What Tacitus says is that nothing that Nero could do, either in the way of gifts to the populace or in that of sacrifice to the Roman deities, could make the people believe that he was innocent of causing the fire. Hence to relieve himself of this infamy he falsely accused the Christians of being guilty of the crime of setting the city on fire. Tacitus uses the strong expression of persons commonly called Christians who were hated for their religion, which is an instantiation of the saying, all manner of evil against them falsely, for Christ's sake.

The Christians, whose lives were pure and virtuous and beneficent, were spoken of as being the sufferers of the earth.

(2) References in 1 Pet.—The First Ep. of Peter is one of the parts of the NT which seem to make direct reference to the Neronic persecution, and he uses words (1 Pet. 4.12ff) which may be compared with the narrative of Tacitus: "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial among you, which cometh upon you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: but insomuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, comfort ye one another with these words. For Christ also suffered for sins once; the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God. To whom he was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." If read in the light of the persecution, it is clear that Peter was not thinking of the suffering of Christ alone, but also of their sufferings, the suffering of God's people in their suffering according to the will of God, and commit their souls in well-doing unto a faithful Creator.

(3) References in 2 Pet.—How aptly and appropriate was the comforting exhortation to the case of those who suffered in the Neronic persecution. The description which Tacitus gives is as follows: "Christians, the founder of that name, was put to death as a criminal by Pontius Pilate, procurator in the reign of Tiberius. But the pernicious superstition, repressed for a time, broke out again not only through Judaea, where the mischief originated, but through the city of Rome also whither all things horrible and disgraceful flew from all quarters as to sink, and they were encouraged. Accordingly, first, those were seized who confessed they were Christians; next, on their information, as fast multitudes were convicted, not so much on the charge of setting the city on fire, as of hating the human race. And in their deaths they were made the subjects of sport, for they were covered with the skins of wild beasts and were tortured to death by dogs, or nailed to crosses, and thus mocked and burnt to serve for nocturnal lights. Nero offered his own gardens for the spectacle, and exhibited circuses, games, indiscriminately mingling with the common people dressed as a charioteer, or else standing in his chariot. With his own hands he blessed those who died the sufferers, though guilty and deserving to be made examples of by capital punishment, because they seemed not to be cut off for the public good, but to be vipers to the ferocity of one man." See Nero.

(4) NT references.—Three of the books of the NT bear the marks of that most cruel persecution under Nero, the Second Ep. to Timothy, the First Ep. of Peter—already referred to—and the Rev. of John. In 2 Tim, Paul speaks of his impending condemnation to death, and the terror inspired by the persecution causes "all" to forsake him when he is brought to public trial (2 Tim. 4.10).

The "fierce and intractable" of Christians and Christians are exhorted to maintain their faith with patience; they are pleaded with to have their "conversation honest" (1 Pet. 2.12 AV), so that all accusations directed against them may be seen to be unfounded, and under no circumstances does a show of legality in the persecution of the leader." (Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, 38).

This important ep. proves a general persecution (1.6, 12.16) in Asia Minor, of the Taurus (1.1; note esp. Bithynia) and elsewhere (5.9). The Christians suffer 'for the name,' but not the name alone (4.14). They are the objects of vile slanders (2.12.15, 3.14-16, 4.4, 15), as well as of considerable acal on the part of officials (5.8 Gr 3.15).

As regards the slanders, the Christians should be circumspect (2.15.16, 3.16.17, 4.15). The persecution will be short, for there is none of all things at hand (4.7.13, 5.4) (Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, 354).

In Rev. the apostle John is in "Patmos, for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus" (Rev. 1.9). Persecution has broken out against the Christians in the province of Asia.

13. Persecution in At Smyrna, there is suffering, imprisonment and prolonged tribulation; but the sufferers are cleared when they are told that if they are found unto death, Christ will give them the crown of life (Rev. 2.10). At Pergamum, persecution has already resulted in Antipas, Christ's faithful martyr, being slain (2.13). At Ephesus and at Thyatira the Christians are commended for their patience and for the fact that there had been persecution (2.219). At Philadelphia there has been the attempt made to cause the members of the church to deny Christ's name (3.8); their patience is also commended, and the hour of temptation is spoken of, which comes to try all the world, but from which Christ promised to keep the faithful Christians in Philadelphia. Strangely enough, there is no distinct mention of persecution having taken place in Sardis or in Laodicea.

As the book proceeds, evidences of persecution are multiplied. In 6.9, the apostle sees under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God and for the testimony of Jesus, which means that these souls are hidden to rest yet for a little season "until their fellow-servants also and their brethren, who should be killed even as they were, should have fulfilled their course" (6.11). The meaning is that there is not yet an end to suffering for Christ's sake; persecution may continue to be as severe as ever. Cf. 20.4, "I saw the souls of them that had been beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, and for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus, and for the word of God, and for the witnesses of Jesus" (20.4); and 21.24, "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea. But the city of Jerusalem came down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I saw no temple therein, for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it. And he that leads into glory, as a assurance departed from me, and stood and became as a lampstand before the throne of God and of the Lamb, and the twelve tribes were standing with him, clothed in white robes, and they had this name written on their foreheads, "the name of the city of the living God, the new Jerusalem, which cometh down from out of heaven from God." And I John saw, and bare record, that these things are true. And the grace of God was upon me, that the word of God might be established unto them who hear." (John 21.24). Paul's martyrdom is implied in 2 Tim, throughout the whole ep., and esp. in 4.6.7.8. The martyrdom of Peter is also implied in 2 Peter 1.19.19, and in Persecution

2 Pet 1:14. The abiding impression made by these three times of persecution of the mind of the apostle John is also seen in the defence of the world found throughout his First Ep. (2:17; 5:19), and in the rejoicing over the fall of Babylon, the great persecution. The great means of the fall is described in such passages as Rev. 14:8; 16:2, 3; 17:14; 18:24.

Following immediately upon the close of the NT, there is another remarkable witness to the continuance of the Rom persecution against the Christian church. This is Pliny, proconsul of Bithynia.

In 111 or 112 AD, he writes to the emperor Trajan a letter in which he expresses his concern for the Christian faith. He goes on to say that "many of all rank and order of both sexes are being called into danger, and will continue to be so. In fact the contagion of their faith has not confined itself to its own cities only, but has spread to the villages and country districts. I am therefore putting into your hands a copy of a passage in which he [Trajan] narrate how the heathen temples had been deserted and the religious rites had been abandoned for any other observance of their faith, that the flesh of the sacrificial victims—could scarcely find a purchaser."

But Pliny had endeavoured to stem the tide of the advancing Christian faith, and he tells the emperor how he had succeeded in bringing back a number of these repentant Christians. That is to say, he had used persecuting measures, and had succeeded in forcing some of the cases. This was intended to help. He tells the emperor how he used the methods he had used. "The method I have observed to be most effectual is to bring them before me as Christians. This I asked them whether they were Christians. If they admitted it, I repeated the question a second and a third time, and threatened them with punishment if they persisted. If I ordered them to be punished, I neither spoke nor used any severe language."

"But if they confessed that they were Christians, or that they had confessed, I have, as it were for the example of the case, while it was actually under legal prosecution, several cases occurred. An anonymous information was laid before me, and I caused to be brought in the persons of those who denied that they were Christians, or that they had ever been so, repeated after me an invocation of the gods, and offered prayer with wine and water, to the statue, which I had ordered to be brought in for this very purpose, along with the statues of the gods, and they even reviled the name of Christ; whereas there is no forcing. It is said, those who are really Christians into any one of those cases, even if it should be proper to change them. Others were accused by a witness at first confessed themselves Christians, but afterward denied it. Some owned indeed that they had been Christians formerly, but had now, some for several years, and others for a few months, and even weeks and days, and had sworn to a statue, which I had ordered to be brought in for this very purpose, that they had denied that he is a Christian, and when his statement was proved by his invoking the deities, such a person, although suspected for past conduct, must nevertheless be forgiven, because of his repentance."

These letters of Pliny and Trajan treat state-persecution as the standing procedure—and this not a generation after the death of the apostle John. The sufferings and tribulation predicted in Rev. 2:10, and in many other passages, had indeed come to pass. Some of the Christians had denied the name of Christ and had worshipped the images of the emperor and of the idols, but multitudes of them had been put to death, and others had received the martyr's crown of life.

Speaking generally, persecution of greater or less severity was the normal method employed by the Rom empire against the Christian church during the 3rd and 3rd centuries. It may be said to have come to an end only about the end of the 3rd or the beginning of the 4th cent., when the empire became nominally Christian.

When the apostolic period is left, persecution becomes almost the normal state in which the church is found. And persecution, instead of abolishing the name of Christ, as the persecutors vainly imagined they had succeeded in doing, became the cause of the spread of Christianity, the suffering increasing the purity. Both of these important ends, and others too, were secured by the severity of the means employed by the persecuting power of the Rom empire.

Under Trajan’s successor, the emperor Hadrian, the lot of the Christians was full of uncertainty; persecution might break out at any moment. At the best Hadrian’s régime was only that of an unauthorized toleration.

With the exception of such instances as those of Nero and Domitian, there is the surprising fact to notice, that it was not the worst emperors, but the best, who became the most violent persecutors. One reason probably was that the ability of those emperors led them to see that the religion of Christ is a really a divisive factor in any kingdom in which civil government and pagan religion are indissolubly bound together. The more that such a ruler could be in the way of his followers, the more would he persecute the Christian faith. Hence among the rulers who were persecutors, there are the names of Antoninus Pius, Marcus Aurelius the philosopher-emperor, and Septimus Severus (died at York, 211 AD).

Persecution was no accident, which chanced to happen, but which might not have occurred at all. It was the necessary consequence of the principles embodied in the heathen Rom government, when these came into contact with the Christian church. The essential principles of the Christian faith. The reasons for the persecution of the Christian church by the Rom empire were (1) political; (2) on account of the claim which the Christian church made, and which it cannot help making, to the exclusive allegiance of the heart and of the life. That loyalty to Christ which the martyrs displayed was believed by the authorities in the state to be incompatible with the duties of a Roman citizen. Patriarchy was a fiction. They displaced the traditional attitude, and threatened the unity of worship. Hence the absence of victory, the Roman acceptance of the Christian faith made to the absolute and exclusive loyalty of all who obeyed Christ was such that it admitted of no compromise with heathenism. To receive Christ into the pantheon as another divinity, as one of several—this was not the Christian faith. To every loyal follower of Christ compromise with other faiths was an impossibility. An accommodated Christianity would itself have been false to the only true God and Jesus Christ whom He had sent, and would never have conquered the world. To the heathen there were lords many and gods many, but to the Christians there was but one God the Father and one Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world (1 Cor 8:5, 6). The essential absoluteness of the Christian faith was its strength, but this was also the cause of its being hated.

"By a correct instinct paganisms of all sorts discerned in the infant church their only rival. So, while the new Herod was yet in the cradle, they sent their snakes to kill him. But Hercules lived to oust the Augean stables" (Workman, op. cit., 88).

"For 200 years to become the meaning great renunciation, the joining a despised and persecuted sect, the swimming against the tide of popular prejudice, the coming under the ban of the authorities at any moment of imprisonment and death under its most fearful forms. For 200 years he that would follow Christ must pay the cost, and be prepared to pay the same with his liberty and life. For 200 years the more professing of Christianity was itself a crime. The Acts of the Apostles runs: "The Christian saith with Christ. We must say with Christ, with our pursuers." But he who makes it was made it by itself, and it was the same with him. Be assured, the Church of Christ is a钮ere that was necessary as a title on the back of the coin. The Hebrews had a word for that, and it is written in Genesis, "The Lord will send the sword upon the land of Egypt, and his poison upon his land; he will frustrate the anger of Egypt." (Gen. 50:20) And the Roman religious authority, "Let the God of war be risen against the Gentiles, and let him bring them down to the ground!" (Rev. 19:11) And the Christian put it otherwise: "Let the Lord be exalted in Jacob, and let the name of the Lord be praised in Israel!" (Num. 10:35) And the Hebrews put it otherwise: "Let the Lord be exalted in Jacob, and let the name of the Lord be praised in Israel!" (Num. 10:35) And the Roman religious authority, "Let the God of war be risen against the Gentiles, and let him bring them down to the ground!" (Rev. 19:11) And the Christian put it otherwise: "Let the Lord be exalted in Jacob, and let the name of the Lord be praised in Israel!" (Num. 10:35) And the Hebrews put it otherwise: "Let the Lord be exalted in Jacob, and let the name of the Lord be praised in Israel!" (Num. 10:35)

Service in the Roman army involved, for a Christian, increasing danger in the midst of an organized and aggressive heathenism. Hence arose the persecution of the Christian soldier, who refused compliance with the idolatrous ceremonies in which the army engaged, whether those ceremonies were concerned with the worship of the Roman deities or with that of the emperor. The sacred and invincible sword, as Mithra was called, had become, at the time when Tertullian and Origen wrote, the special deity of soldiers. Shrines in honor of Mithra were erected through the entire breadth of the Roman empire. Pammus, the Cheviot Hills in Britain. And wrote to the soldier who refused compliance with the religious sacrifices to which the legions gave their adhesion! The Christians in the Roman legions formed no inconsiderable proportion of the "noble army of martyrs." It being easier for the persecuting authorities to detect a Christian in the ranks of the army than elsewhere.

In the 2d and 3d cents. Christians were to found everywhere, for Tertullian, in an oftentimes quoted passage of his Apology, says, "We live beside you in the world, making use of the same water, air, sun, and moon, and all other places of trade. We sail with you, fight shoulder to shoulder, till the soil, and traffic with you; yet the very existence of Christian faith, and its profession, continued to bring the greatest risks. With the best will in the world, they remained a peculiar people, who must be prepared at any moment to meet the storm of hatred." (3 Tim 3:12) For this reason it remained the case in the way or another, hatred on the part of the world inevitably fell to the lot of the Christian, who adhered to the footsteps of the Master, "All that would live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." (2 Tim 3:12)

21. Tertullian's Apology

"The Third Race" was probably invented by the heathen, but willingly accepted by the Christians without demur, because they were for what a bishop of the church in the first race called the "third race." "The first race" was "indifferently called" the Greek, or Gentile; "the second race," was the Jews; while "the third race" was the Christian. The cry in the circus of Carthage was "[Greek: Eoig to be ta teratain]. How long must we endure this third race?"

But one of the most powerful causes of the hatred entertained by the heathen against the Christians was, that though there were no citizens so loyal as they, yet in every case where the laws and customs of the empire came into conflict with the will of God, their supreme rule was loyalty to Christ, they must obey God rather than man. To worship Caesar, to offer even one grain of incense to the shrine of Diana, no Christian would ever consent, not even when this minimum of compliance would save life itself.

The Roman empire claimed to be a kingdom of universal sway, not only over the bodies and the property of all its subjects. It invested the empire with the temporal power of the whole world. It demanded absolute obedience to its supreme lord, that is, to Caesar. This obedience the Christian could not render, for unlimited obedience of body, soul and spirit is due to God alone, the only Lord of the conscience. Hence it was that there arose the antagonism of the government to Christianity, with persecution as the inevitable result.

These results, hatred and persecution, were, in such circumstances, the natural and inevitable consequence of the fundamental tenet of primitive Christianity, that the Christian was to be true to himself, and be in accord with his own environment.ceased to hold his old connections with the state; in everything he became the bond-servant of Jesus Christ, the head of the new creation, and fealty to the new empire and the Crucified Head.

We engage in the description of Tertullian, "as men whose very lives are not our own. We have no master but God." (Workman, 195).

The persecution inaugurated by the emperor Decius in 250 AD was particularly severe. There was hardly a province in the empire where there were no martyrs; but there were also many who abandoned their faith and rushed to the magistrates to obtain their libelli, or certificates that they had offered heathen sacrifice. When the days of persecution were over, those persons usually came with cagerness to seek readmission to the church. It was in the Decian persecution that the great theologian Origen, who was then in his 89th year, suffered the cruel torture of the rack; and from the effects of what he then suffered he died at Tyre in 254.

Many libelli have been discovered in recent excavations in Egypt. In the Expos T for January, 1909, Dr. George Milligan, for example, and prints the Gr text of one of these recently discovered Egyptian libelli. These libelli are most interesting, illustrating as they do the account which Cyprian gives of the way in which some faint-hearted Christians during the Decian persecution obtained certificates—some of these certificates being true to fact, and others false—to the effect that they had sacrificed in the heathen manner. The one which Dr. Milligan gives is as follows: to these certificates of superintendence, the village of Alexander Island, from Aurelius Diogenes, the son of Sabaus, of the village of Alexander Island, being about 72 years ago, it is a sad specimen of the hardness of many. I have sacrificed and poured libations and tasted the offerings, and I request you to countersign my statement. May good fortune attend you. I Aurelius Diogenes, have made this request." (3d Hand). "I Aurelius Syrus, as a participant, have certified Diogenes as sacrificing along with us."

25. Libelli

Under Valerian the persecution was again very severe, but his successor, Gallienus, issued an edict of toleration, in which he guaranteed freedom of worship to all Christians. The empire was, so to say, definitely a religio licita, a lawful religion. This freedom from persecution continued until the reign of Diocletian.

The persecution of the Christian church by the empire of Rome came to an end in March, 313 AD, when Constantine issued the document known as the "Edict of Milan," which assured to each individual freedom of religious belief. This document marks an era of the utmost importance in the history of the world. Official Rom persecution had done its worst, and had failed; it was ended now; the Galilean had conquered.

The results of persecution were: (1) It raised up witnesses, true witnesses, for the Christian faith. Men and women, even children and even children of the martyrs whom no cruelties, however refined and protracted, could terrify into denial of their Lord. It is to a large extent owing to persecution that the Christian faith has been preserved. (2) It gave rise to a literature in itself rare, even when Quadratus and Tertullian and Origen and Cyril and many others. While some who have the Christian faith in an external and formal manner only generally went back from their profession, the true Christian, as from the Roman Empire, whose heart could not be made to do this. The same stroke which crushed the straw—such is a saying of Augustine—separated the pure grain which the Lord had chosen.
(2) Persecution showed that the Christian faith is im- mortal even in this world. Of Christ's kingdom there shall be no end, ye shall pull away not, even when the hands, yea, the hammers break, God's altar stands."—Pagan Rome, Babylon was called the name of the great apostle John in the Apocalypse, tried hard to destroy the church of Christ; Babylon was drunk with the blood of the saints. God allowed them to exist for ever years, and the blood of His children was shed like water. Why was it not expected that such a terrible and prolonged an experience of suffering? It was in order to convince the world that though the kings of the earth gathered together against the Lord and His Christ, yet all that they can do is vain. God is in the midst of it, and shall help His church and His right early. The Christian church, as it suspended between heaven and earth, had no need of other help than that of the un- speaking God, which at every moment held it up and kept it from falling. Never was the church more free, never stronger, less disfigured, perished; never more extensive in its growth, than in the days of persecution.

And what became of the great persecuting power, the hated Roman, that once trembled in fear of the true doctrine of the person and the work of Christ? It was in the ages of persecution that Gnosticism died, though it died slowly. It was in the ages of persecution that Arrianism overthrew. At the Council of Nicea in 325 AD, among those who voted in favor of the definition and the decision of the council, there were those who "bore in their bodies the brandings marks of Jesus," who had stood for Christ.

Persecution was followed by these important results. for God in His wisdom had seen fit to permit these evils to happen, in order to change them into permanent good; and thus the wrath of man was turned to good, and if the persecutors had not taken place at all. What, in a word, could be more fitted than to draw up into a firm and overrule evil itself and change it into good? God lets iniquity do what it pleases, according to its own designs; but in per- secution, the Church is not one woman, but thousands. It overrules it and makes it enter into the order of His purposes. This was the effect of this fury against the Christian faith kindled in the hearts of persecutors, so that they afflict the saints of the Most High. But the church remains safe, for persecution can work nothing but ultimate good in the hand of God. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church." So said Tertullian, and what he said is true.

Persecution has permanently enriched the history of the church. It is seen as the mark of the unknown. For it would not permit "dragged them into fame and chased them up to heaven."

Persecution made Christ very near and very precious to those who suffered. Many of the martyrs bore witness, even when in the midst of the most cruel tortures, that they felt no pain, but that Christ was with them. Instances to this effect could be multiplied. Persecution made them feel how true Christ's words were, that even as He was not of the world, so they also were not of it. If they had been of the world, the world would love its own, but because Christ had chosen them out of the world, therefore the world hated them. They were not greater than their Lord. If men had per- secuted Jesus, they would also persecute His true disciples. But though they were persecuted, they were of good cheer, Christ had overcome the world; He was with them; He enabled them to be faithful unto death. He had procured them the crown of life.

Browning's beautiful lines describe what was a common experience of the martyrs, how Christ "in them" and "through them" was "the power of life," and made them more than conquerors:

"I was some time in burning, but I was come to a Hand carried through The fire above my head, and drew My soul from Christ, whom I see. Sergius, a brother, writes for me. Tais testimony on the wall—

For me, I have forgot it all.

2. History and the black stone. The city was captured, pillaged and burned by Alexander in 324 BC, most of the inhabitants being massacred or enslaved. Much of the treasure and the Pers kings was found there. Curtius says the palace was never rebuilt. Antiochus Epiphanes (166 BC) tried but failed to plunder the temple (of Amatis, Anahita?), there (2 Mac 2; p. 54, this is the incident referred to in 1 Mac 6:1 ff, and Polyb., xxxi, 11). At Persepolis were the sepulchers of the Achaemenian kings (except Cyrus). Long and important inscriptions of Darius and Xerxes are found at Persepolis and the neighboring Naxos, Rustam, in the Fars province, and in the Achaemenian Pers, Assy and neo- Susian tongues (published by Spiegel, Rawlinson and Bechtah), Chitarchus first among Europeans mentions the city. The writer of this article visited it in 1892. Since then it has been relieved.

PERSEUS, pərˈsiːəs, pərˈsɪəs (Πέρσεις, Perseus): In 1 Mac 8:5 the conquest of "Perseus, king of the Cimmerians" (RV "king of Chittim") was part of the change of the "fate of the infant in the cradle." This Perseus, the son and successor of Philip III of Macedonia, came to the throne in 178 BC and was the last king of Macedonia. In 171 BC began the war with Rome which ended in his disastrous defeat and capture at Pydna, 168 BC (to which 1 Mac 8:5 refers), by L. Aemilius Pau- lus. Macedonia soon became a Roman province. Perseus was led to Rome to grace the triumph of his conqueror, by whose clemency he was spared, and died in captivity at Rome (Polyb. xxix, 17; Livy xlv, 40 ff).

Kittim or Chittim, properly the people of the town of Citium in Cyprus, then signifying Cyprians, and extended by Jewish writers (Gen. 10:12; Josh. 13:18; 23:1; Jer. 2:10; Ezek. 27:6; Dan. 11:30; see Jastrow, Art. 1, v1) to include the coasts of Greece generally, is here applied to Macedonians. In 1 Mac 1:1 Macedonia (in Greek "kindred of the Greeks") is called "the land of Chittim." The term is meant to suggest anything that is evil and base.

PERSEVERANCE, pərˈsɪvərəns; The word occurs only once in AV (Eph 6:18), where it refers quite simply to persistence in prayer. In theology (esp. in the phrase "final perseverance") the word has come to denote a special persistency, the undying continuance of the new life (manifested in faith and holiness) given by the Spirit of God to man. It is questioned whether such imparted life is (by its nature, or by the law of its impartation) necessarily permanent, indestructible, so that the once regenerate and believing man has the prospect of a final glory infallibly assured. This is not the place to trace the history of a great and complex debate. It is more fitting here to point to the problem as connected with that supreme class of truths in which, because of our necessary mental limitations, our true nature can only be apprehended as the unrevealed but certain harmony of seeming contradictions. Scripture on the one hand abounds with assurances of "perseverance" as a fact, and largely intimates that an excelling anticipation of it is the intended experience of the believer (see Jn 10:28 above all, and of among other passages Rom. 8 31-37; 1 Pet. 1 8, 9. On the other hand, we find frequent and urgent warnings and cautions (see e.g. 1 Cor. 8 11; 9 27). The teacher dealing with actual cases, as in pastoral work, should be ready to adopt both classes of utterances, each with its proper application; applying the first, e.g. to the true but timid disciple, the latter to the self-confident. Meanwhile Scripture on the whole, by the manner and weight of its positive statements, favors a humble belief of the permanence, in the plan of God, of the once-given new life. It is as if it laid down "perseverance" as the Divine rule for the Christian, while the negative passages came in to caution the man not to deceive himself with appearances, nor to let any belief whatever palliate the guilt and minimize the danger of sin. In the biographies of Scripture, it is noteworthy that no person appears who, at one time certainly a saint, was later certainly a castaway. The awful words of He 6 3-6; 10 20-27 appear to deal with cases (such as Balaam's) of much light but no loving life, and so are not precisely in point. Upon the whole subject, it is important to make "the Perseverance of the Saviour" our watchword rather than "the Perseverance of the saint."

LITERATURE

I. Language (Introductory) — The Perselanguage, ancient and modern alike, is an Aryan tongue. In its ancient forms it is more closely connected with Vedic Sanskrit than with any other language except Armenian. Most of its roots are to be found also in Slavonic, Gr. Lat. and other tongues of the same stock.

There were two main dialects in the ancient language of Iran (Aryanen), (1) that of the Persians proper, and (2) that of the Medes.

Dialects The former is known to us from the inscriptions of the Achaemenid kings, the latter from the Avesta, and a few Median words preserved for us by Herodotus and other Gr. writers.

II. OLD PERSIAN INSRIPTIONS.—These fall between 550 and 350 BC, and contain about 1,100 lines and 400 words. They are carved upon the rocks in a cuneiform character, simplified from that of the neo-Susian, which again comes from the neo-Babylonian. In Old Pers. inscriptions only 44 characters are employed, of which 7 are ideographs or contractions. The remaining 37 phonetic signs are syllabic, each consisting of an open syllable and not merely of a single letter, except in cases of separate vowels. The syllabary, though much simpler than any other cuneiform system, does not quite attain to being an alphabet. It was written from left to right, like the other cuneiform syllabaries. Of Cyrus the Great only one Pers. sentence has been found: Adam Kūrukh Khshayāthiya Hakhāmānsīsha, "I am Cyrus the King, the Achaemenid." Duris I has left us long inscriptions, at Behistūn (Besītūn), Mt. Alvand, Persopolis, Naqsh-i Rustam, etc., and one at Suse, the latter mentioning his conquest of Egypt and the construction of the first (?) Suez canal:

Adam niyashāyam imām yuviṣaḥ kāśānaiy hacā Pirām nāmā raṁa iya Mudrāyā dinānāy i sā-parā yē kā Nasid māna.

("I commanded to dig this canal from the river named the Nile, which flows through Egypt, to the sea which comes from Persia."

We have also inscriptions of Xerxes at Persopolis and many short ones of Artaxerxes I, Artaxerxes Mnémon, and Artaxerxes Ochus. From them all taken together we learn much concerning the history and the religion of the Achaemenid period.
It is from Achaemenian or Old Pers, and not from the Medic or Avestic, that modern Pers has sprung through Pahlavi and Dari as intermediate stages. This is probably due to the political supremacy which the Persians under the Achaemenides gained over the Medes. The few words in the inscriptions which might be doubted can be understood through comparison with Armenian and even with the modern Pers, e.g. yavigna in the above inscription is the modern vulgar Pers yib.

III. Medico Dialect.—The Medecal dialect is represented in literature by the Avesta or sacred books of the Zoroastrians (Pānīs). The word Avesta does not occur in the book itself and is of uncertain meaning and significance. It is probably the Avashta of Beq. Inscr., IV, 64, and may mean either (1) an interview, meeting (Skt. avashtha, "appearance before a judge"); or a gām-tash, "to stand near"), or (2) a petition (Pahl. apastān, "petition"); or Arm. apastun, "asylum"), in either case deriving its name from Zoroaster's drawing near to Ahura Mazda in worship.

The first Gāthā is composed of strophes of 3 lines each (as above). Each line contains 16 syllables, with a caesura after the 7th foot.

IV. Zoroaster.—Many of the Gāthās are generally acrified to Zoroaster himself, the rest to his earliest disciples. The 1. His Date, etc. now becomes a matter of very great probability that Zoroaster lived at earliest in the middle of the 7th cent. BC, more probably a century later. The former view of Zoroaster as a Persian who composed pure for 300 years, and connects its corruption with the alleged destruction of much of the Avesta in the palace burned by Alexander at Persepolis, 324 BC. This traditional indication of date is confirmed by other evidence. Zoroaster's name Vaištāpa (in Gr Hūstāpēs) bears the same name as the father of Darius I, and was probably the same person. Vaištāpa's queen Hutaosa, who also protected and favored Zoroaster, bears the same name (in Gr Adēsā) as Cambyses' sister who afterward married Darius, and probably belonged to the same family. Zoroastrianism comes to the fore under Darius, whereas Cyrus in his inscriptions speaks as a decided polytheist. Hence we conclude that the earliest part of the Avesta belongs to c. 500 BC. Of Zoroaster himself we learn much from the Avesta, which traces his genealogy back for 10 generations. It mentions his wife's name (Hyōvi), and tells of his 3 sons and 3 daughters. His first disciple was Frashōstro, his wife's natural uncle. His own name means "Owner of the yellow camel," and has none of the higher meanings sometimes assigned to it by those who would deny his existence. Tradition says he was born at Rūgha (Ragha, Ray), about 51 miles S. of the present Tehran, though some think his native place was Western Atropatene (Azərbiyān). Rejected by his own tribe, the Magi, he went to Vistāpa's court in Bactra. The faith which he taught spread to the Pers court (very naturally, if Vaištāpa was identical with Darius' father) and thence throughout the country. Tradition (Yazšt XIX, 2, etc) says that the Avesta was revealed to Zoroaster on Mt. Ushi-dārena ("intellect-holding") in Sisān. But it is not the composition of one man or of one generation.

Herodotus makes no mention of Zoroaster, but speaks of the Magi (whom he calls a Median tribe [i.101]) as already performing priestly functions. His description of their repetition of charms and theological compositions (i.129) fits very well with recitation of the Gāthās and Yasna, Mention of controversies with Gautama, Buddha's disciples (Yazšt XIII, 16) who probably reached Persia in the 2d cent. BC, is another indication of date. The fact that in both the Yasna and the Vandtād heretics (zaibā) are mentioned who preferred the comm. (zaib) on the Avesta to the Avesta itself, is a sign of late date. Names of certain persons found in the Avesta (e.g. Atare-pāts, a Dastur who lived under Hormoud I, 273 AD, and Rāt̄are-yāgyēti, whom the Dinkirt identifies with the chief Mūd of Sapor II, 300-379 AD, Aşerpā Mārespand, and who, according to the Pattī, §28, "purified" the revelation made to Zoroaster, i.e. revised the text of the earlier parts of the Avesta) enable us to prove that certain portions of the work were composed as late as near the end of the 4th cent. of our era. It is said that the text was in confusion in the time of Vologases I (51-78 [?] AD).

The final recension thus begun, and continued with much zeal by Ardashīr Papakhd, 226-40 AD. According to Geldner (Prolegomena, xlvii) the final recension took place some considerable time after Yazdigird III (overthrown 642 AD). In the times of the Sāsānides there were, it is said, 21 Nasbās or volumes of the Avesta, and the names of these are given in the Dinbārt (Book IX). Of these we now destructive of the entire Nasba, the Vendīdād, and portions of three others.

The present Avesta is divided into 5 parts: (1) The Yasna (vis. yag, Skt. yaj, "to invoke," "to praise") contains 72 chapters of hymns for sacrifices, etc., including the Avesta hymns, the "Older Yasna" or Gāthās, (2) The Present Vissyāna (vispa, "every," "all," and rdāna, "a lord") is divided into 24 chapters in Gellner's edition; it is supplementary to the Yasna. (3) The Vendīdād (rīn+dāsā+dāsā, "law for vanquishing the demons") contains 22 chapters. The first chapter contains the Iranian myth about the order in which the provinces of the Iranian world were created by Ahura Mazda. It tells how the Evil Spirit, Ahū Mainyu, created plagues, sins and death, to destroy the good creatures of the Good Spirit. The greater part of the book contains ceremonial laws and formulae, some of them boastsome and all rather paraphrased, in character. (4) The Yāhta, in all, are hymns, telling many mythological tales about Mithra, Tishtrya, etc. (5) The Khorda Avesta ("Little Avesta") consists of a number of short compositions, hymns, etc., compiled by the Aherpād Mārespad (Adharpād Maharspad, Arvōiti Mārspresspad) apparently already mentioned, in Sapor II's reign.

Much of the Avesta is said to have been destroyed by the Khalifāh 'Umar's orders when Persia was conquered by the Arabs after the battle of Nahavand (642 AD). Certainly, 'Umar ordered the destruction of the Perse libraries, as we learn from the Kēshf al Zunā (p. 341).

V. Pahlavi.—Under ancient Pers literature may be classed the Pahlavi (a) inscriptions of Sapor at Bāb-e Bākāb and elsewhere, (b) legends on Sāsānian coins, (c) translations of certain parts of the Avesta, made under the Sāsānian part, (d) such books as the Arta Vīrf Nāmā, the Zād starva, Dinbārt, Ormazd vaseh, Poly, Rākshā, etc. They are mostly of religious import. The Arta Vīrf Nāmā gives a description of the visit of the young dōxtar Arta Vīrf, to the zoroastrian heaven. The Bāzīsadānā ("creation") tells how Arzād and Ahrudiva came into being, and teaches that the fight between them. The Arta Vīrf Nāmā contains an immense number of Aram. words, but the Pers terminations are added to them, and these words are rare in Persus: thus yazagbānt-ana is written, and dātana ("to(calcite)"", in Pahlavi works that are no longer extant are the sources of the Yazag hān, Zardvastā Nāmā, Shāh-māhā, etc.

In order to understand the relation in which the Perse dialects and stages in the history of the language stand to one another, it may well be to subjoin a list of words in Old Parthian, Pahlavi, and modern Pers. It will be seen that Avestic is not the source of the Aryan part of the present tongue.

PERSIAN RELIGION (ANCIENT):

I. Before Zoroaster.—There are clear indications in the Avesta that the religion of the Medes and Persians before Zoroaster's time agreed in most respects with that of the Indians, Aryan, and in a less degree with some of the beliefs of the Aryans in general.

Religion.

All the Aryan tribes in very ancient times showed great respect for the dead, though they carefully distinguished them from the gods (e.g. Rig-Veda X, 56, 4). The latter were principally the powers of Nature, the wind, fire, water, the sky, the sun, the earth, and a host of personifications. The procreative powers in Nature, animate and inanimate, seeming to be the source of animal and vegetable life, received adoration, which ultimately led to unseemly corruption. Herodotus tells us that the Persians in his time worshipped the sun, moon, sky, earth, fire, wind, and water (i.131). Offerings to the gods were laid on a mass of pomegranate twigs (boreasm, Skt. bhrks), and the flesh of victims was boiled, or boiled, now and then mixed with haoma-juice were poured out, just as in India the soma was the drink of both gods and their worshippers.

A comparison between the spiritual beings mentioned in the Avesta and those spoken of in the Rig-Veda is most instructive in two ways. It shows that the original religion of the Iranians and of the Indian Veda Aryans agreed very closely; and it also enables us to realize the immensity of the reformation wrought by Zoroaster. Many of the names of supernatural beings are practically the same; e.g. Indra (Indra, Andra), Mitra (Mithra), Aryaman (Aryanman), Astra (Ahura), Apam Napat (Apa Mana), Tyashtir (Tishtir), Rama (Rama), Vayu (Vāyu), Vētra (Vētra). So are many words of religious import, as Sōna (Hashma), Mantra (Mātra), Hōtra (Zotār). The Yama of India is the Yima of Persia, and the father of the one is Vivasvat and that of the other Vivasvat, which is the same word with dialectical change. The Holy River of the Avesta, Avedhī Sūra, the Unstained (Anāhīta), is represented by the Saravat, the Gangā (Ganges) and other sacred streams worshipped in India. In Persia Atrō (or Fire) is a son of Ahura Mazda (Yasna LXIV, 46-33), as Agni (Ignis) is of Tvāshtir in the Rig-Veda. Armitā is Ahura Mazda's daughter, as Saranyu in the Rig-
Veda is the daughter of Tvāṣṭṛi, the “Creator.” The use of goméz (bois urina) for purification is common to both India and Persia. Though the soma-plant is not now the same as the haoma, the words are the same, and no doubt they at one time denoted one and the same plant. Many of the myths of the Avesta have a great resemblance to those of the Rig-Veda. This comparison might be extended almost indefinitely.

In another respect also there is an important agreement between the two. Though some 33 deities are adored in the Vedic Hymns, yet, in spite of polytheism and low ideas of the Divine, traces of something higher may be found. Varuna, for instance, represents a very lofty conception. In the closest connection with him stands Ašura, who is a being of great eminence, and whose sons are the gods, esp. the Ādityas.

Tvāṣṭṛi again is creator of heaven and earth and of all beings, though his worship was ultimately in Vedic times displaced by that of Indra.

3. The Creator. It is clear then that the Indian Aryans were worshippers of the Creator and that they knew something of Him long before they sank into polytheism. In the Avesta and in the Pahlavi inscriptions alike, Ahura Mazda occupies much the same position as Varuna, Ašura (the same word as Ašura), or Tvāṣṭṛi in the Rig-Veda, or rather in the ancient belief of which traces are retained in the latter work. Hence, as the Avesta teaches, Zoroaster was not for the first time preaching the existence of Ahura Mazda, but he was rather endeavoring to recall his people to the belief of their ancestors, the doctrine which Ahura Mazda had taught Yima in primeval time in his first revelation (Yaadwít PL II, 1-16,42). The great truth of the existence of the Creator, testified to by tradition, reason and conscience, undoubtedly contributed largely to Zoroaster’s success, just as a similar proclamation of the God Most High (Allāh Ta’ālā), worshipped by their ancestors, helped the thoughtful among the Arabs in later years to accept Muhammad’s teaching. The consciousness in each case that the doctrine was not new but very ancient, materially helped men to believe it true.

II. Zoroastrianism.—The reformation wrought by Zoroaster was a great one. He recognized—as Euripides in Greece did later—that Principle “if the gods do ought shameful, they are not gods.” Hence he perceived that many of the deities worshipped in Iran were unworthy of adoration, being evil in character, hostile to all good and therefore to the “All-Wise” Spirit (Ahura Mazda) and to men. Hence his system of dualism, dividing all beings, spiritual or material, into two classes, the creatures of Ahura Mazda and those of the “Destroying Mind” (Aūrō Mainyus). So many of the popular deities were evil that Zoroaster used the word dātera (the same as deva, deks, and Aram, dē) to denote henceforth an evil spirit, just as Christianity turned the Greek daimones and daiminēs (words used in a good sense in classical authors) into “demons.” Instead of this now degraded word dātera, he employed baga (Old Pers; Av. bagha, Vedic bhaga, “distribution,” “patron,” “lord”) for “God.”

But it may be remembered that Zoroaster did not teach monotheism. Darius says that “Auramazda and the other gods that there are” brought him aid (Beh. Inscri., IV, 60-63), and both he and Xerxes speak of Ahura Mazda as “the greatest of the gods.” So, even in the first Gilgāti, Zoroaster himself invokes Aša, Vohu-Maō, Ar- pattī, Sraošha, and even Gōš-sūrvan (“the Soul of the Bull”), as well as Ahura Mazda.

(1) Darius and Xerxes.—Darius mentions the “elan-gods,” but does not name any of them. He and Xerxes understood the creation of heaven and earth to Auramazda, and say that the latter, “Who made this earth, who made yon sky, who made man, who made happiness for man,” has appointed each of them king. It is “by the grace of Auramazda” (the king of Ahuramazda) that Darius conquers his enemies. But both Artaxerxes Mōrmān and Artaxerxes Ochus couple Mithra and Anāhita (Anāhita) with Auramazda (Ahura Mazda) in praying for the protection of the empire.

Ahura Mazda.

(2) Ahura Mazda.—In the Avesta, Ahura Mazda is one of the seven Amesha Spentas or “Bountiful Immortals.” Xerxes is the father of one of them, Spentā Armaiti, who is also his spouse. He is prīnum inter pares among them, their chief, but by no means the only god. Monotheism is distinctly taught in later Zoroastrian works, for instance, in the Zardusht-Nāmah, composed 1278 AD, but it is due to Christian and Islamic influence.

The modern Zoroastrian view, clearly stated in the Dāsitār i Āsmānāk and elsewhere, that all the good creatures of Ormazd (Ahura Mazda) are entitled to adoration, undoubtedly of Worship rests upon the Avesta. There we find, in the first place, the Amesha Spentas, who occupy in regard to Mazda the same position as do the Vedic Ādityas toward Varuna, though not one of the Ādityas is identical with any of the Amesha Spentas.

The names of these are: (1) Ahura Mazda (otherwise called Spentā Mainyius or “Bountiful Mind”); (2) Vohu Mano (“Good Mind”); (3) Aša Vahista (“Hast Righteousness”); (4) Khshathra Vairya (“Excellent Ruler”); (5) Spentā Armaiti (“Bounteous Piety”); (6) Haurvatāt (“Health”); (7) Amerētāt (“Immortality”). Each has a special province: thus Armaiti is the general spirit of earth and presides over its fruitfulness. She is the patroness of virtuous maidens. Khshathra is the guardian of metals. Vohu Mano guards sheep and cattle and introduces to Ahura Mazda the spirits of the just. Next in rank come the Yazatas (“Worshipful Ones”), of whom there are a large number. Three of them, Mithra, Rashnu and Spangh, preside at the judgment of the dead on the 4th day of death. Rashnu holds the scales in which a man’s deeds are weighed. Spangh guards the soul during the first three nights after death. Aryanma Isya (“the longed-for comrade”) is the protector of mankind, the bestower of peace and happiness. On one occasion (Zend., Paris, XXII, 22-24) Ahura Mazda sends his messenger Nairyō Sahha (“male instructor”) to ask for food and water at the door of Rāman Hyavāstra, the bosom friend of Mithra, presides over the atmosphere and also gives its taste to food. Mithra is the spirit of truth. The Ohrmazd of Ohrmazd, and riding in a single-wheeled chariot (the sun), while wearing golden diadem and driving fiery steeds, and identified with the dog-star Sirius, sends rain and is by Ahura Mazda endowed with his own power and dignity (Yesh VII). The many who have translated Rāman Hyavāstra, the bosom friend of Mithra also (Yesh X, 1), Ātēr (“Fire”), Vēyū (“Air”), Vātā (“Wind”), Vēchvaragān (“Stars”), Sākhs (“Prosperity”), Arītā (“genius of Justice”), Yāvēsā (“Lightning”), Predēz (“the guardian of cattle”), Bērojā (“genius of corn”), Ostā and Daēnā ("Knowledge" and "Religion"), who are others of the Yazatas. All these are entitled to worship at the hands of the true adherent of Mazda (Mazda ya, opposed to Daēnāya, or worshipper of the demons).

In opposition to the creatures of Ahura Mazda are those of Ahrō Mainyūs, who is the source of all moral and material evil. The first chapter of the Vendidad tells how he created something bad in opposition and his to everything good made by Ahura Creatures Mazda.

A demon is the adversary of each Anahīva Spēhta: Aka Mano ("Evil Mind") that of Vēlot Mano, and so in order: Indra (or Angra, "demon of untruthfulness"). Sāvyra ("Evil government"). Nāyabhatya ("discontent"). Tāuro ("who poisons water") and Zārī ("poison")—being antagonistic to the other Bountiful Immortals. Āēṃa-Dāevā ("Demon of Wrath")—the Asmodeus of Tob 3 8—is the special foe of Sraoehas, the genius of obedience. Aporōsha, demon of drought, is the enemy of Tishtrya. Būtī (or Būddhi) teaches men to worship idols, and also causes death. Būshībāta is the demon of sloth. Vidyorūt or Astuvirdhūtās causes death by destroying the body. Other evil beings, Drujes, Pārīkshas, Janīs, Yātus, are so numerous in the later parts of the Avesta that a pious Zoroastrian must have lived in continual dread of their assaults. He had even to conceal the parts of his body lest they should be used as darts to his injury by these his spiritual foes.

Fertility.—Ahura Mazda and his assistants promote life, fertility in man, beast and plant, agriculture, increase; while Ahrō Mainyus and his creatures cause destruction and death. Atar ("Fire"), also said Akūn Nāpāt ("Offspring of the Waters"), is the vital principle and the source of all energy in the world. Argvi, the male Anahīva, or Male spirit, is the male. Anahīva, or Female spirit, is the female. As a river the latter flows from Mt. Hukairya, a peak in the Elburz Range (Frānu XLI), into the Virdhak-sīr or Virdhak-sīr-sīr, a stream of which grows the tree Ḥūpsa ("well watered"), which bears seeds of all plants. Anahīva means "full filled," but it is applied to purity of soul (to purify any of the four "elements" was, for later Zoroastrians, a grievous sin). The root of each of his disciples should have said Anahīva (Anahīta). Though god of truth and righteousness Mithra is not associated with moral purity (chastity). On the contrary, he was said to fertilize the earth with his rays, as sun-god, and Anahīva as goddess of fruitfulness represented the female principle in conjunction with him. The virility which led to the identification of Anahīta with the Bab Mūlitta was doubtless of later date than Zoroaster's time, yet there was little or nothing in Zoroastrianism to check it. Something similar asserts itself in Armenia, as well as in Iran, and in fact in all Nature-worship everywhere. Associated with this was the form of incest known as next-of-kin marriage (Av. Geūs, Khūse skhas), which permitted and encouraged marriages between brothers and sisters.

According to later Zoroastrian belief, the contest between Ormazd (Ahura Mazda) and Ahriman (Ahrō Mainyūs), after continuing for 6. Contest 9,000 years, is to be decided in favor of the former only through his possessing foreknowledge and Ahriman's lacking it (Bānd). Both came into Ahriman existence independently in limitless time (Av. Zvāna Akarana; Vend., Farg. XIX, 13; Pahl. Dāmar-1 Akānderkhan-ān, Bānd, 1) which, personified in the Vendidad, is called "Self-created," and is the one by Ahura Mazda's command invoked by Zoroaster in conjunction with Vāyu, the Air, the Winds, "the bountiful, beauteous daughter of Ahura Mazda" (Armaiti), the Earth, and other objects of worship (loc. cit.). No creature of Ahriman is to be worshipped; hence Indra, though in later Vedic times rising in India to a leading position in the Pantheon, is in the Avesta accounted a fiend, the very impersonation of the lie which the Avesta so firmly decries and which Darius mentions as the cause of all the rebellions, which produced so much bloodshed in his time. No virtue was valued so highly as truth in ancient Iran, as Herodotus agrees with the Avesta in testifying.

Avestic morality encourages the destruction of all hurtful things, as being of Ahrō Mainyūs' creation, and the propagation of everything good. Hence agriculture is esp. commended, together with the rearing of cattle and sheep. Somewhat later the whole duty of man was said to consist in good thoughts, good words, good deeds. Fierce opposition to every other religion was enjoined as a religious duty, and, under the Sassanides esp., this led to fearful and repeated persecutions of Christians throughout the empire.

The Sacred Thread (Av. Aīvyaśūhka; Skt. Upanitam, etc., now by the Parsis styled the Kushti) plays as important a part in Zoroas trianism as in Hinduism. So do the charms, māhtrās (Skt. mantras), con cerning inv. of the languages of the ancient empire.

The first thing created by Ahura Mazda was a Bull, which may represent the earth, and reminds us of the Cow Audhuma in the Edga Sangavi (Vend. 6.7). The world was created by Ahrō Mainyūs (in a later version, by Mithra). His spirit (Gēūs Urean) went to heaven and became the guardian of cattle.
The first man was Gayā-maretan ("Mortal Life"); hence the phrase Haca Gayāt Mardehadat a Sooshgandt, from Gayā-maretan (Gayomard, Kayo-march) to Sooshgandt (Yasa XXVI, 10; Yasa XIII, 145), means "from the beginning to the end of the world." From the Airyavem Vātējō ("Aryan germ"), the first home of the Iranians, men were compelled to migrate because Ahrō Māmyōs so altered the climate that the winter became ten months long and the summer only two. Yima Rishagata ("Yima the Brilliant," Pers Jamsanhā, son of Vīvāhīt, though he twice refused Ahura Mazda's commission to guard his creatures, and though by three lies he lost the "Royal Light" (Harēnō Kāvāmēn) which he originally possessed, was yet directed to prepare a very extensive inclosure (Vāra), in which he preerved "the seeds of sheep and cattle, of men, of dogs, of birds, and of red, glowing fires" from some terribly severe winters which came upon the earth (Vendōdīd 11; Yasa XIX). The Bānūdhi-bānōh tale of a flood differs from this, preserving an independent narrative. Ahura Mazda's law was preached to men within Yima's inclosure.

The earth consists of seven divisions, called Karshavas (Div. dirpes). One of these, Hvaniratha, is inhabited by men; the others are separated from it by impassable abysses. Sun, moon, and stars revolve round Mt. Šaēra, a peak in the Elburz mountains (Dennikin 7). A later legend says that the Elburz Range surrounds the earth.

Each god and man possesses a frivolsh, which has been compared to a guardian spirit and seems to differ from the soul (sūnvan). After Sraoša, the souls of the dead must cross the Chinvat-bridge ("Bridge of the Judge"), which is guarded by two dogs and is narrow and difficult for the unwise, but wide and easy for the just. The righteous man then advances through three Paradises, those of Good Thoughts, Good Words and Good Works (Humata, Hukhtia, Hravātia: Yast XVI; Aria Yairf Namak, VII IX), until, led by Sraoša, Atar, and Vohu Mano, he finally reaches Ahura Mazda's abode of light and glory, Gurū-nāmana (in Gāthās, Gāro-dēnavān; Pahl. Garēnūmān), where Ahura Mazda himself receives him with the words: "Greeting to thee; well hast thou served; from now on eternal mortality is cut off; from this pure, bright place!" (A. V. Nāmāk, I X, 8, 9). But the soul of the wicked man, passing through regions of Evil Thoughts, Evil Words and Evil Deeds, finally reaches a dark and gloomy Hell (Duzkhūt). In later times it was believed that those not yet fit for heaven waited in Misānāt Gātūs, an intermediate place where the extra merits of the just were stored up for the benefit of the less fortunate (Vend., Farg. XIX). A later name was Khatūb-Dele Harēz; on opinion that this idea was borrowed from mediaeval Christianity.

In primeval times the Persians buried or burned their dead. Zoroastrianism may have introduced the dakhima (Vendōdīh, passim) or tower of silence, on which bodies are exposed to be eaten by vultures.

12. Internment

Those of which the ruins have been discovered at Al Hībah are very ancient. But in Herodotus' time it was usual, after permitting the flesh to be consumed by dogs and birds, to cover the bones with wax and bury them (Herod. i.140). This was done to prevent them from coming in contact with and so polluting the earth. The custom of burial is proved by the tombs of the Achaemenian kings near Persepolis, and that of Cyrus, stone of which raised high above the ground, at Pasargadē.

Zoroastrianism permits no idol-worship and no temples, fire-altars only being used. These were served by Ṭhārvanaks or fire-priests, who fed the fire with costly wood and poured into it libations of haomajuice, taking care to cover their mouths with a cloth

Fire Altars.

(patti-dōhāna) to keep the sacred fire from being poll-buted by their breath. Sacrifices were often offered on the tops of the highest mountains under the open sky (Herod. i.132; Xen. Cyrop. viii).

The Magi or priests owed the monopoly of the ide of priestly functions to their being Zoroaster's own tribe. They are not mentioned in the Pers canonic inscriptions. Only once does the word 'Magus' occur in the Avesta, and then in composition (Māgū-ūkšīsh, a Magus-hater, Yasa LXV, 7). It is not necessary to trace to BaB influence the decay of Zoroastrianism and its degradation in late Achaemenian times. This was at least in large measure due to a sev eal of the ideas and practices forbidden by Zoroaster, which reassert themselves in some parts of the Avesta, and which afterward gave rise to Mithraism.

The Avesta states that, 1,000 years after Zoro-aster's death, a prophet named Ukhişyār-creta will arise from his seed to restore his religion. After another 1,000 years another, Ukhişyār-nemāhi, will appear for the same purpose. The end of the world will come 1,000 years after this third prophet, Saoshyant, will be born, and will usher in the Restoration (frashō-kerēti) of the world to its primitive happiness and freedom from the evil creatures of Ahrō Māmūs. This process will be completed in 28 years, during which 28 res-ests will perform in the other 6 Karshavas the work which will here be accomplished by Saoshyant. But mention of this Restoration occurs only in very late parts of the Avesta (e.g. Vend., Farg. XVIII, 51). It does not mean Resurrection, as De Harlez has shown. Later still, something of the kind was believed, and in the Bānūdhi-bānōh (ch v) and the Patīt (§ 28) we have the word rīst-khīz (from Av. tilōn, "departed," and hōz, "to rise"), which does mean "rising of the dead." But it can hardly be doubted that the doctrine is due to Heb and Christian influence, esp. when we consider the late and uncertain date of the books in which the idea occurs. Israelites settled in Media in large numbers in or about 730-728 BC under Sargus (2 K 17 6), long before Zoroaster's birth. It is possible that his reformation may have owed much therefore to Heb influence. See, further, Zoroastrianism.

The idea of virgin birth has been asserted to occur in Zoroastrianism, both with reference to Zoroaster himself and to the last three great prophets of whom mention has been made. This is no error. The Avesta and all later Zoroastrian books speak of Zoroaster's birth as quite natural, his father being Pērūshaṣpa. Nor is virgin birth referred to in the case of Sāoshyānti and the rest. (Mater cuique ex sē, sēne in locu quidam fratris, Zoroastres semina illic reposita grandia facta filium paravit: Vend., Par., XIX, 4, 5; Yast, XIII, 128, 142; Būza, XXXII, 8, 9.) Virginity is not highly esteemed in the Avesta, though forcible is condemned.

(And even the words ἀγγαγα, ἀγγαρο, and ἀσάδα, astāndā, used to denote them, are almost certainly Babylonian). Of these men’s pace it was said, “No mortal thing is quicker.” The custom of showing special honor to the “Benefactors of the King” (Herod. viii.86: ἄρωτος γάμος = Av. ura saubh, “widely renowned”) is referred to in Est 6 1.2.3, and that of covering the head (and face) of a criminal condemned to death (with a large black cap) (Est 7 8.9) occurs in the Šākhatnāmeh also.)
(1) The king was an arbitrary ruler with unlimited power, the council of seven princes who stood nearest to the throne (Est. 1:14; cf. Herod. iii. 70-84) having no share in the government.

(2) The army.—As soldiers, the Persians were famous as archers and javelin-throwers; they were also skilled in the use of the sling, and above all in riding. Boys were taken from the women's into the men's part of the house at the age of 5, and were there trained in "riding, archery and speaking the truth" until 20 years old. In Darius' inscriptions, as well as in the Avesta, lyting is regarded as a great crime.

(3) Marriage.—The Persians practised polygamy, and marriages between those next of kin were approved. Pride and garrulity are mentioned as distinctive of this character.

III. History.—Persian history, as known to us, begins with Cyrus the Great. His ancestors, for at least some generations, seem to have been chiefs or "kings" of Anshah, a district in Persia or Elam. Cyrus himself (WAT. V, plate 35) gives his genealogy up to and including Téspés, entitling all his ancestors whom he mentions, kings of Anshah. Phraortés, king of the Medes, is said to have first subdued the Persians to that kingdom about 97 years before Cyrus (Herod. i.102). Cyrus himself headed his countrymen's revolt against Astyages, who advanced to attack Persis and Elam (549 BC). His army mutinied and surrendered him to Cyrus, whom the Greeks had invited to be his grandson on the mother's side. Cyrus, becoming supreme ruler of both Medes and Persians, advanced to the conquest of Lydia. He defeated and captured Croesus, overran Lydia, and compelled the Greek colonies in Asia Minor to pay tribute (547 BC). He overthrew the Sute (Bedawin) across the Tigris the following year, and was then invited by a large party in Babylonia to come to their help against the usurper Nabu-níph, whose religious zeal had led him to collect as many as possible of the idols from other parts of Babylonia and remove them to Babylon, thereby increasing the sacredness and magnificence of that city but inflicting injury on neighboring and more ancient sanctuaries. Defeating Nabunád's army and capturing the king, Cyrus sent his own forces under Gúryyas (Gubaru, Gauharua) to take possession of Babylon. This he did in June, 538, "without opposition and without a battle." The citadel, however, where Belshazzar "the king's son" was in command, held out for some months, and was then taken in a night attack in which "the king's son" was slain. Cyrus made Gúryyas viceroy of Chaldaea, and he "appointed governors in Babylonia" (Cyrus' "Annaletic Tablet"). When Gúryyas died within the year, Cyrus' son Cambyses was made viceroy of the country, now become a province of the Persian empire. Cyrus restored the gods to their sanctuaries, and this doubtless led to permission being given to the Jews to return to Jerusalem, taking with them, their sacred vessels, and to rebuild their temple. Cyrus was killed in battle against some frontier tribe (accounts differ where) in 529 BC. His tomb at Murgháb, near the ruins of Pasargadae, is still standing.

Cyrus' son and successor, Cambyses, invaded Egypt and conquered it after a great battle near Pelusium (525 BC). During his absence, a Magian, Gaumátá, who pretended to be Smerdis (Bardiya), Cambyses' murdered brother, seized the throne. Marching against him, Cambyses committed suicide. After a reign of 7 months, the usurper was overthrown and slain by Darius and his 6 brother-nobles, (their names in Herod. iii. 70 are confirmed with one exception in Darius' Besítin Inscript. col. iv. 80-86). Darius became king as the heir of Cambyses (521 BC). But in nearly every part of the empire, at least, as the result of rebellions or uprisings of various kinds. He then divided the empire into satrapies, or provinces (dahyava), of which there were at first 25 (Beh. Inscription, col. i. 13-17), and ultimately at least 29 (Naqsh i Rustam Inscription, 22-30). Over these he placed satraps of noble Pers or Median descent, instead of representatives of their ancient kings. His empire extended from the Indus to the Black Sea, from the Jaxartes to beyond the Nile.

Darius united the latter river with the Red Sea by a canal, the partly obliterated inscription commemorating which may perhaps be thus interpreted and rendered: "I am a Persian; with Persia Suez I united Egypt. I commanded to dig this canal from the river named the Nile (Práva), which flows through Egypt, to this sea which comes from Persia. This canal was dug, according as I commanded. And I said: 'Come ye from the Nile through this canal to Persia.'"

Darius' expedition into Scythia, his success in subduing the rebellion among the Asiatic Greeks, his attempt to conquer Greece itself and his overthrow at Marathon (499-490 BC) are part of the history of Greece. A rebellion in Egypt had not been repressed when Darius died in 483 BC.

Xerxes I, who succeeded his father, regained Egypt, but his failure in his attempts to conquer Greece largely exhausted his empire.

7. Xerxes I In 464 BC he was murdered. His son Artaxerxes I, summoned "the long-armed," succeeded him, being himself succeeded in 421 BC by his son Xerxes II, who was murdered.
the following year. This ended the legitimate Achaemenid line, the next king, Darius II (styled Nothos, or 'bastard'), as well as his brothers, Ilshans and Azeres, by his Egyptian eunuch Bagôs, probably in revenge for Artaxerxes' conduct in Egypt (333 BC). Arsês was murdered by Bagôs 3 years later, when Darius III, Codomanus, the son of Sisygambis, daughter of Artaxerxes II, and her husband, a Pers noble, ascended the throne. Darius was completely overthrown by Alexander the Great in the battle of Gaugamela or Arbela, 331 BC, and shortly after fell by an assassin's hand. This ended the P ersian empire of the Achaemenides, the whole of the lands composing it becoming part of the empire of Macedon.

IV. First Mention in Inscriptions.—Persis (Par-sia) is the first mention of Persia in an inscription of Ramman in Nisîrî III (WAF I, 1, 18), who boasts of having conquered it and other lands (he reigned from 812 to 783 or from 810 to 781 BC).

PERSIS, pûr'sîs (Isapôs, Persis): The name of a female member of the Christian community at Rome, to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 12). The name is also derived from "the beloved, who labored much in the Lord." The name is not found in inscriptions of the imperial household, but it occurs as that of a freedwoman (CIL VI, 23, 959).

PERSON, pûr'sûn, pûr's'h, PERSONALITY, pûrsun-al't-i (sî, nephesh, 'îsh, 'îshîn, 'â'nîm, 'âvî- nîm; pûr'sûn, pûr's'hon, pûr's'hon, hû-pû-ê'sàtn): The most frequent word for "person" in the OT is nephesh, "soul" (Gen 14 21, "Give me the persons, and take the goods"); 36 6, AV "all the persons"; Nu 5 6, AV "that person," etc; 'îsh, "a man," and his designations (Ps 23 1, "sheep and ten persons"); 1 S 16 18, "a comely person" etc; 'â'nîm, "a man," and his designations (Ps 31 28, "of the persons, and of the oxen"); Prov 6 12, "a worthless person," etc; 'înâsh, "a man," "a weak, mortal man," occurs twice (Jgs 9 4, AV "vain and light persons"); Zeph 3 4); ba'al, "owner," "lord," is once tr'c "person" (Prov 4 8, AV "a miscellaneous person"); and mî'thîm, "men," once (Ps 26 4, AV "vain persons"); pûr's'h, "face," is frequently tr'c "person," especially in the external appearance, as of persons in high places, rich persons who could favor or bribe, etc, chiefly in the phrases regarding the person, "accepting the person" (Dt 10 17; Mal 1 8).

In the NT pro'sôph, "face," "countenance," stands in the same connection (Mt 22 16, "Thou regardest not the person of men"); Gal 2 6, "God accepteth not man's person"; Acts 10 34, "God is no respecter of persons"; Rom 2 11, "there is no respect of persons with God"); Eph 6 9; Col 3 24). In Col 4:11 we have "persons" (pro'sôph), also, as in the later Gr, "the gift bestowed . . . by many persons," the only occurrence in the NT; in 2 10 pro'sôph may stand for "presence," as RV "in the presence of Christ," but it might mean "as representing Christ"; not H 1 3, AV "hypostasis," "that which lies under." Substratum, is rendered "person," "the express image of his person," i.e. of God, which RV renders "the very image of his substance," in "the impress of his substance," in "the most visible image of the invisible God and Father." Person is also frequently supplanted as the substantive implied in various adjts, etc, e.g. profane, perjured, vile.

In the Apoc we have prosôph tr'c "person" (Jth 7 15, AV "face"); Ecclus 10 13, "the accepting of persons" is condemned (Wis 6 7; Ecclus 4 22 27; 7 6; 20 22, RV "by a foolish countenance"); 36 13; 42 1; "With him [God] is no respect of persons," Ecclus 35 12).

RV has "soul" for "person" (Nu 5 6). "face" (Jer 52 26, "man") (Ps 104 14) "reprochrome" for " vile person" (Ps 15 4), AV "BYM, "tool" (Isa 32 5 6); AV "man of falsehood," AV "vain persons" (Ps 36 5). The thing has an evil thing (Ps 10 14), "back to thee in his own person" (author, different text) for "again that therefore receive him" (Philon versa); "take away life" for "respect any person" (2 S 14 14), with seven others for "the eighth person" (G 2 Pot 2 5); "false witnesses" for "seven thousand persons" for "of men seven thousand" (Rev 11 14).

Personality is that which constitutes and characterizes a person. The word "person" (Lat persona) is derived from the mask through which an actor spoke his part (per sona). From being applied to the mask, it came next to be applied to the actor, then to the character act, then to any assumed character, taken by anyone having a certain "station"; lastly, it came to mean an individual, a feeling, thinking and acting being. For full personality there must be self-consciousness, with the capability of free thought and action—self-determination—hence we speak of personal character, personal action, etc. A person is thus a responsible being, while an animal is not. Personality is distinctive of man. The personality is the unit of the entire rational being, perhaps most clearly represented by "the will"; it is that which is deepest in man, belonging, of course, not to the realm of space or the region of the visible, but existing as a spiritual reality in time, with a destiny beyond it. It is the substance (hypostasis) of the being, that which underlies all its manifestations; hence the rendering "the express image of his person" in He 1 3 AV. Hypostasis was employed by the early Gr Fathers to express what the Latins intended by persona; afterward prosôph was introduced.

Recent psychologists have isolated the prominent elements in the subconscious realm, the relation of which to the personality is obscure. There seems to be more in each individual than is normally expressed in the personal consciousness and action. The real, responsible personality, however, is something which is always being formed. The phenomenon of double personality is pathological, as truly the result of brain disease as insanity.

In the Bible man is throughout regarded as persional, although in so many instances that the full importance of the individual as distinct from the nation was realized. The use of pro'sôph for "per-sion" indicates also a more external conception of personality than the modern. With the Hebrews the nephesh, "the seat of the person," et al. "You will not leave my soul nephesh to Sheol" (Ps 16 10); "Thou hast brought up my soul from Sheol" (Ps 30 3). God is also always regarded as personal (who has created man in His own image), and although the representations so often show an anthropomorphic re-creation of man, the Divine personality could only be conceived after the analogy of the human, as far as it could be definitely conceived at all; but God was regarded as transcending, not only the whole of Nature, but all that is human, e.g. "the Lord who can sift as a sieve" (Nu 13 19; 1 S 15 29); "Canst thou by searching find out God?" (Job 11:7; Isa 40:28; cf. Ecc 3:11, 18, etc.). In the NT the personality of God is, on the warrant of Jesus Himself, conceived after the analogy of the fatherhood yes yet as transcending all our human conceptions: "How much more?" (Mt 7:11); "Who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor?" (Rom 11:34). Man is body, soul and spirit, but God in Himself is Spirit, infinite, perfect, ethereal Spirit (Mt 5:48; 1 Cor 15:44). He is forever more than all that is created, "For of him, and through him, and unto him, are all things" (Rom 11:36). The human personality, being spiritual, survives bodily dissolution and in Christ becomes clothed again with a spiritual body (Phil 3:21; 1 Cor 15:44).

VIII. Formulation of the Doctrine Literature

It is the purpose of this article to make as clear as possible the conception of the Person of Christ, in the technical sense of that term, as it lies on the pages of the NT. The Article so, beneath—the pages of the NT. Were it its purpose to trace out the process by which this great mystery has been revealed to men, a beginning would need to be taken from the intimations as to the nature of the person of the Messiah in OT prophecy, and an attempt would require to be made to discriminate the exact contribution of each organ of revelation to our knowledge. And were there added to this a desire to ascertain the progress of the apprehension of this mystery by men, there would be demanded a further inquiry into the exact degree of understanding which was brought to the truth revealed at each stage of its revelation. The magnitudes with which such investigations deal, however, are very minute; and it is profit to be derived from them is not, in a case like the present, very great. It is, of course, of importance to know how the person of the Messiah was represented in the predictions of the OT; and it is a matter at least of interest to note, for example, the difficulty experienced by our Lord's immediate disciples in comprehending all that was involved in His manifestation. But, after all, the constitution of Our Lord's person is a matter of revelation, not of human thought; and it is preeminently a revelation of the NT, not of the OT. And the NT is all the product of a single movement, at a single stage of its development, and therefore presents in its fundamental teaching a common character. The whole of the NT was written within the life of about a half a century; or, if we except the writings of John, within the narrow bounds of a couple of decades; and the entire body of writings which enter into it are so much of a piece that it may be plausibly represented that they all bear the stamp of a single fundmental teaching. The NT lends itself, therefore, more readily to what is called dogmatic than to what is called genetic treatment; and we shall penetrate most surely into its essential meaning if we take our start from its clearest and fullest statements, and permit their light to be thrown upon its more incidental allusions. This is peculiarly the case with such a matter as the person of Christ, which is dealt with chiefly incidentally, as a thing already understood to all, and needing only to be alluded to rather than formally expounded. That we may interpret these allusions aright, it is requisite that we should recover from the first the common conception which underlies them all.

acting qualities which make a thing the precise thing that it is. Thus, the "form" of a sword (in this case mostly matters of external configuration) is all that makes a given piece of metal specifically a sword, rather than, say, a spade. And "the form of God" is the sum of the characteristics which make the being very God," specifically God, rather than some other being an angel, say, or a man. When Our Lord is said to be in "the form of God," therefore, He is declared, in the most express manner possible, to be all that God is, to possess the whole fulness of attributes which make God God. Paul chooses the manner of the expression instinctively, because, in adding Our Lord as our example of self-abnegation, his mind is naturally resting, not on the bare fact that He is God, but on the richness and fulness of His being as God. He was all this, yet He did not look on His own things but on those of others.

It should be carefully observed also that in making this great affirmation concerning Our Lord, Paul does not throw it distinctively into the past, as if he was saying, "This is a mere mode of Our Lord's, indeed, but no longer His because of the action by which He became our example of unselfishness. Our Lord, he says, "being," "existing," "subsisting" in the form of God"—as it is variously rendered in the revised versions. "being originally," while right in substance, is somewhat misleading. The vb. employed means "strictly to be beforehand," "to be already" so and so" (Blass, Grammar of NT Greek, ET, 244), "to be, exist," and intimates the existing circumstances, disposition of mind, or, as here, mode of subsistence in which the action to be described takes place. It contains no intimation, however, of the cessation of these circumstances or disposition, or mode of subsistence; and that, the less in a case like the present, where it is cast in the tense (the imperfect) which in no way suggests that the mode of subsistence intimated came to an end in the action described by the succeeding vb. (cf. the 1's, 1K 16 14 23; 2S 50; Acts 2 30; 3 2; 2 Cor 8 17; 12 16; Gal 1 14). Paul is not telling us here, then, what Our Lord was once, but rather what He already was, or, better, what in His intrinsic nature He is; he is not describing a past mode of existence of Our Lord, before the action by which He became our example—although that mode of existence he describes was Our Lord's mode of existence before this action—so much as painting the background upon which the action adduced may be thrown up into prominence. He is telling us who and what He is who did these things for us, that we may appreciate how great the things He did for us are.

(3) No exinanition.—And here it is important to observe that the whole of the action adduced is thrown up thus against this background—not only its negative description to the effect that Our Lord (although all that God is) did not look greedily on His (consequent) being on an equality with God; but its positive description as well, introduced by the "but..." and that in both of its elements, not merely in the effect (ver 7) that 'he took no account of himself' (rendered not badly by AV, He "made himself of no reputation"; but quite misleading by RV, He "emptied himself"), but equally that to the effect (ver 8) that "he humbled himself." It is the whole of what the clause (vs 6-8) that "he humbled himself" as doing despite His "subsistence in the form of God." So far is Paul from intimating, therefore, that Our Lord laid aside His Deity in entering upon His life on earth, that he rather asserts that He retained His Deity throughout His life on earth, and in the whole course of His humiliation, up to death itself, was consciously ever exercising self-abnegation, living a life which did not by nature belong to Him, which stood in fact in direct contradiction to the life which was naturally His. It is this underlying implication which determines the whole choice of the language in which Our Lord's earthly life is described. It is because it is kept in mind that He still was "in the form of God," that is, that He still had in possession all that body of characterising qualities by which God is made God, for example, that He is said to have been made, not man, but "in the likeness of man," to have been found, not man, but in fashion as a servant. It is true that our emphasis, and obedience, the mark of servanthood, is thought of as so great. Though He was truly man, He was much more than man; and Paul would not have his readers imagine that He had become merely man. In other words, Paul does not teach that Our Lord was once God but had become instead man; he teaches that though He was God, He had become also man.

An impression that Paul means to imply, that in entering upon His earthly life Our Lord had laid aside His Deity, may be created by a very prevalent misinterpretation of the central clause of His statement—a misinterpretation unfortunately given currency by the rendering of RV: "counted it not a prize to be made equal with God," varied without improvement in ARV to: "counted not the being on an equality with God a thing to be grasped, but emptied himself." The former (negative) member of this clause means just: He did not look greedily on His being on an equality with God; did not "set supreme more" by it (see Lightfoot on the clause). The latter (positive) member of it, however, cannot mean in antithesis to this, that He therefore "emptied himself," divested Himself of this, His being on an equality with God, much less that He "emptied himself," divested Himself of His Deity ("form of God") itself, of which His being on an equality with God is the manifested consequence. The vb. here rendered "emptied" is in constant use in a metaphorical sense (so only in the NT: Rom 4 14; 1 Cor 1 17; 9 15; 2 Cor 9 3) and cannot here be taken literally. This is already apparent from the definition of the manner in which the "emptying" is said to have been accomplished, supplied by the modal clause added: "having made Himself to be a servant." You cannot "empty" by "taking"—adding. It is equally apparent, however, from the strength of the emphasis which, by its position, is thrown upon the "Himself." We may speak of Our Lord as "emptied" Himself with the utmost emphasis, scarcely, with this strength of emphasis, of His "emptying Himself" of something else. This emphatic "Himself," interposed between the preceding clause and the vb. rendered "emptied," builds a barrier over which we cannot go back in search of that of which Our Lord emptied Himself. The whole thought is necessarily contained in the two words, "emptied Himself," in which the word "emptied" must therefore be taken in a sense analogous to that which it bears in the other parts of the clause in the NT where it occurs. Paul, in a word, says here nothing more than that Our Lord, who did not look with greedy eyes upon His estate of equality with God, emptied Himself, if the language may be pardoned, of Himself; that is to say, Our Lord is divested, in the exhortation for the enhancement of which His example is adduced, that He did not look on His own things. "He made no account of Himself," we may fairly paraphrase the clause; and thus all question of what He emptied Himself of is removed. What Our Lord actually did, according to Paul, is expressed in the following clauses; those now before us express more the moral character of His act. He took "the form of a servant," and so was "made in the likeness of men." But His doing this showed that He did not set overwheining store by His state of being, merely its outward display. Here the change in Our Lord's condition at a point of time perfectly understood between the writer and his readers is adverted to and assigned to its motive, but no further definition is given of the nature of either condition referred to. We are brought closer to the precise nature of the act by which the change was wrought by such a passage as Gal 4 4. We read that "When the fulness of the time came, God sent forth His Son, born of a woman, born under the law, that He might redeem those that were under the law; which were referred to the Father in fulfillment of His eternal plan of redemption, and it is described specifically as an incarnation: the Son of God is born of a woman—He who is in His own nature the Son of God, abiding with God, is sent forth from God in such a manner as to be born a human being, subject to law. The primary implications are that this was not the beginning of His being; but that before this He was neither a man nor subject to law. But above all, that on the genuine and subject to law, He ceased to be the Son of God or lost anything intimated by that high designation. The uniqueness of His relation to God as His Son is emphasized in a kindred passage (Rom 8 3) by His heightening the elevation of "the Son" of His "own Son," and His distinction from other men is intimated in the same passage by the declaration that God sent Him, not in sinful flesh, but only "in the likeness of sinful flesh. The reality of Our Lord's flesh is not in the imagination of this turn of speech, but His freedom from the sin which is associated with flesh as it exists in lost humanity is asserted (cf 2 Cor 6 21). Though true man, therefore (1 Cor 15 21; Rom 8 17; Acts 15 31) He is not without differences from other men; and these differences do not concern merely the condition (as sinful) in which men presently find themselves; but also their very origin: they are from below, He from above—"the first man is from the earth, earthy; the second man is from heaven' (1 Cor 15 47). This is His peculiarity: He was born of a woman like other men; yet He descended from heaven (cf Eph 4 9; Jn 3 13). It is not meant, of course, that already in heaven He was a man; what is meant is that the human nature of the Son was of origin in an exceptional sense from heaven. Paul describes what He was in heaven (but not alone in heaven)—that is to say before He was sent in the likeness of sinful flesh (though not alone before this)—in the great terms of "God's Son," "God's own Son," "the form of God," or yet again in words whose import cannot be mistaken, 'God over all' (Rom 9 5). In the last cited passage, together with its parallel earlier in the same ep. (Rom 1 3), the two sides of the nature of Our Lord's person are brought into collocation after a fashion that can leave no doubt of Paul's conception of His twofold nature. In the earlier of these passages he tells us that Jesus Christ was born, indeed, of the seed of David according to the flesh, that is, so far as the human side of His being is concerned, but was powerfully marked out as the Son of God according to the Spirit of Holiness, that is, with respect to His higher nature, by the resurrection of the dead, which in a true sense began in His own rising from the dead. In the later of them, he tells us with deep feeling, indeed, as concerns the flesh, that is on the human side of His being, from Israel, but that, despite this earthly origin of His human nature, He yet is and abides (present participle) nothing less than the Supreme God, "God over all [emphatic], blessed forever." The Paul teaches us that by His coming forth from God to be born of woman, Our Lord, assuming a human nature to Himself, has, while remaining the Supreme God, become also true and perfect man. The whole of the resources of language are strained to the utmost to make the exaltation of Our Lord's being clear— in which He is described as the image of the invisible God, whose being antedates all that is created, in whom, through whom and to whom all things have been created, and in whom they all subsist—we are told not only that (naturally) in Him all the fulness dwells (Col 1 19), but, with complete explanation, that "all the fulness of the Godhead dwells in him bodily" (Col 2 9); that is to say, the very Deity of God, of which Our Lord is the human form of the Son of God in becoming man: He descended an infinite distance to reach man's highest conceivable exaltation. As, however, the primary purpose of the adoption of the language is merely to declare that the Son of God became man, so it is shortly afterward explained (2 14) as an entering into participation in the blood and flesh which are common to men: "Since then the children are sharers in flesh and blood, he also himself in like manner partook of the same" (2 14). In the reality, the completeness of the assumption of humanity by the Son of God, are all here emphasized.

The proximate end of Our Lord's assumption of humanity is declared to be that He might die; He was "made a little lower than the angels . . . because of the suffering of death" (2 9); He took part in blood and flesh in order "that through death . . . " (2 14). The Son of God as such could not die; to Him belongs "the name which is above every name" (Phil 2 9). If He was to die, therefore, He must take to Himself another nature to which the experience of death was not impossible (2 17). Of course it is not meant that death was desired by Him for its own sake. The purpose of the passage is to save its Jewish readers from the offence of the death of Christ. What they are bidden to observe is, therefore, Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels because of the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor, that by the grace of God the bitterness of death which He tasted might redound to the benefit of every man" (2 9), and the argument is immediately pressed home that it was eminently suitable for God Almighty, in bringing many sons unto glory, "that He should be exalted in the highest sovereignty of His salvation perfect (as a Saviour) by means of suffering. The meaning is that it was only through suffering that these men, being sinners, could be brought into glory. And therefore in the plainer statement of ver 14 we read that Our Lord took part in flesh and blood in order "that through death he might bring to nought him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and might deliver all them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage. For ver 17 that the ultimate object of His assumption to man was that He might "make propitiation for the sins of the people." It is for the salvation of sinners that Our Lord has come into the world; but, as that salvation can be wrought only by suffering and death, the proximate end of His assumption of humanity remains that He might die; whatever is more than this gathers around this.

The completeness of Our Lord's assumption of humanity and of His glorification is thus stated with strong emphasis in this passage. He took part in the flesh and blood which is the common heritage of men, after the same fashion that other men die (2 14); and, having thus become a man among men, He shared with other men that most solemn exhalation and fortunes of life, "in all things" (2 17). The stress is laid on trials, sufferings, death; but this is due to the actual course in which His life ran and that it might run in which He became man—and is not exclusive of other representations of the Divine Son. What is asserted is that He became truly a man, and lived a truly human life, subject to all the experiences of man in the particular circumstances in which He lived.

(3) Continued possession of Deity.—It is not implied, however, that during this human life—"the days of his flesh" (6 7)—He had ceased to be God, or to have at His disposal the attributes which belonged to Him as God. That is already excluded by the representations of ch. 1. The glory of this dispensation consists precisely in the bringing of its revelations directly by the Divine Son rather than by mere prophets (1 1), and it was as the effulgence of God's glory and the express image of His substance, upholding the universe by the word of His power, that this Son made purification of sins (1 3). Indeed, we are expressly told that even in the days of the flesh, He continued still a Son (5 8), and that it was precisely in this that the wonder lay: that the Son of God, in a real sense, became a man, a perfectly human and separate individual, in contrast with the shadows of the Old Covenant (9 14). Though a man, therefore, and truly man, sprung out of Judah (7 14), touched with the feeling of human infirmities (4 15), and tempted like as we are tempted (4 17), yet altogether distinct from ordinary men, one thing, He was "without sin" (4 15; 7 26), and, by this characteristic, He was, in every sense of the words, separated from sinners. Despite the completeness of His identification with men, He remained, therefore, even in the days of His flesh different from them and above them.

III. Teaching of Other Epistles.—It is only as we carry this conception of the person of our Lord with us—the conception of Him as united to us—so far as He is God our Saviour, to whom our adoration is due, and our fellow in the experiences of a human life—that unity is induced in the multiform allusions to Him throughout, whether to the Ep. of Paul or the Ep. to the H. or, indeed, the other epistles of the New Testament. In this measure there is no difference between those and these. There are no doubt a few passages in these other letters in which elements of the person of Christ are brought together and given detailed mention. In 1 Cor. 15, 20, the two constitutive elements of His person are spoken of in the contrast, familiar from Paul, of the "flesh" and the "spirit." But ordinarily we may speak of the person of Christ as being more or less divided. Everywhere our Lord is spoken of as having lived out His life as a man; but everywhere also He is spoken of with the supreme reverence which is due to God alone, and the very name of God is not withheld from Him. In 1 Pet. 1 11 His preexistence is taken for granted; in Jas. 2 1 He is identified with the Shekinah, the manifested Jehovah—our Lord Jesus Christ, the Glory; in Jude ver. 4 He is "our only Master [Deipontos] and Lord"; over and over again He is the Divine Lord who is Jesus (e.g. 1 Pet. 2 13; 2 Pet. 3 2 18); in 2 Pet. 1 1, He is roundly called "our God and Saviour"—perhaps nowhere more formal articulation of the entire doctrine of the person of Christ. But everywhere its elements, now one and now another, are presupposed as the common property of writer and readers. It is only in the Ep. of John that this easy and unstudied presupposition of them gives way to pointed insistence upon them.

IV. Teaching of John.—In the circumstances in which he wrote, John found it necessary to insist upon the elements of the person of 1. The Our Lord—His true Deity, His true Epistles humanity and the unity of His person with the Godhead which is more directly in form than anything we find in the other writings of the NT. The great depository of his teaching on the subject is, of course, the prologue to his Gospel.

But it is not merely in this prologue, nor in the Gospel to which it forms a fitting introduction, that these didactic statements are made. The prologue of John's witness to the twofold nature of the Lord is brought out, indeed, only by combining what he says in the Gospel and in the Epp. In the Gospel, remarks Westcott (on Jn. 20 31), "the evangelist seems to have taken step by step through historical Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God (opposed to mere 'flesh'); in the Ep. he reaffirms that the Christ, the Son of God, was true man (opposed to mere 'spirit'; 1 Jn. 4 2). What John is concerned to show is that in Jesus both (1 Jn. 5 20) He was "made flesh" (Jn. 1 14); and that this 'only God' (Jn. 1 18, R.V. 'God only begotten') has truly come in . . . flesh" (1 Jn. 4 2). In all the universe there is no other being of whom it can be said that He is God come in flesh (2 Jn. 1 7, that "cometh in the flesh," whose characteristic this is). And of all the marvels which have ever occurred in the marvelous history of the universe, this is the greatest—that what was from the beginning (1 Jn. 3 14) has been heard and gazed upon, seen and handled by men (1 Jn. 1 1).

From the point of view from which we now approach it, the prologue to the Gospel of John may be said to fall into three parts. In the first of these, the prologue of the Being who became incarnate in the person we know as Jesus Christ is described; in the second, the general nature of the act we call the incarnation; and in the third, the nature of the incarnated person. See JOHN, THEOLOGY, III; JOHN, GOSPEL OF, IV, 1, (3), 2.

(1) The Being who was incarnated.—John here calls the person who became incarnate by a name peculiar to himself in the NT—the Logos or 'Word.' According to the predicates which he here applies to Him, he can mean by the "Word" nothing else but God Himself, "considered in His creative, operative, self-revealing, and communicating character," the sum total of what is Divine (C. F. Schmid). In three crisp sentences he declares at the outset His eternal subsistence, His eternal intercommunion with God, His eternal identity with God: 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God' (Jn. 1 1). "In the beginning," at that point of time when things first began to be (Gen 1 1), the Word already "was." He antedates the beginning of all things. And He not merely antedates them, but it is immediately added that He is in the bosom of the Father. "And the Word was with God" (Jn. 1 1). "In the beginning," at that point of time when things first began to be (Gen 1 1), the Word already "was." He antedates the beginning of all things. And He not merely antedates them, but it is immediately added that He is in the bosom of the Father. "And the Word was with God" (Jn. 1 1). In 1 Cor. 15, 20, the two constitutive elements of His person are spoken of in the contrast, familiar from Paul, of the 'flesh' and the 'spirit.' But ordinarily we may speak of the person of Christ as being more or less divided. Everywhere our Lord is spoken of as having lived out His life as a man; but everywhere also He is spoken of with the supreme reverence which is due to God alone, and the very name of God is not withheld from Him. In 1 Pet. 1 11 His preexistence is taken for granted; in Jas. 2 1 He is identified with the Shekinah, the manifested Jehovah—our Lord Jesus Christ, the Glory; in Jude ver. 4 He is "our only Master [Deipontos] and Lord"; over and over again He is the Divine Lord who is Jesus (e.g. 1 Pet. 2 13; 2 Pet. 3 2 18); in 2 Pet. 1 1, He is roundly called "our God and Saviour"—perhaps nowhere more formal articulation of the entire doctrine of the person of Christ. But everywhere its elements, now one and now another, are presupposed as the common property of writer and readers. It is only in the Ep. of John that this easy and unstudied presupposition of them gives way to pointed insistence upon them.
was thus in some sense a second along with God. He was no nekkel, not a separate being from God: "And the Word was God" (John 1:1). In some sense distinguishable from God, He was in an equally true sense identical with God. There is but one eternal God; this eternal God, the Word is; in whatever sense we may distinguish Him from the God whom He is with." He is yet not another than this God, but Himself is this God. The predicate "God" occupies the position of emphasis in this great declaration, and is so placed in the sentence as to be thrown up in sharp contrast with the phrase: "with God"; which incidentally enforces inferences as to the nature of the Word being drawn even momentarily from that phrase. John would have us realize that what the Word was in eternity was not merely God's coeternal fellow, but the eternal God's self.

(2) The incarnation.—Now, John tells us that it was this Word, eternal in His subsistence, God's eternal fellow, the eternal God's self, that, as "come in the flesh," was Jesus Christ (1 John 4.2). And the Word because flesh " (John 1:14), he says, the terms he employs here are not terms of substance, but of personality. The meaning is not that the substance of God was transmuted into that substance which we call "flesh." The Word is a personal name, which the Father gave an appropriate designation of humanity in its entirety, with the implications of dependence and weakness. The meaning, then, is simply that He who had just been described as the eternal God, became, by a voluntary act in time and space. The exact nature of the act by which He "became" man lies outside the statement; it was matter of common knowledge between the writer and the reader. The language employed intimates merely that it was a definite act, and that it involved a change in the identity of the eternal God, here designated "the Word." The whole emphasis falls on the nature of this change in His life-history. He became flesh. That is to say, He entered upon a mode of existence in which the experiences that belong to human beings would also be His. The dependence, the weakness, which constitute the very idea of flesh, in contrast with God, would now enter into His personal experience. And it is precisely because these are the connotations of the term "flesh" that the term here has not the more simply denotive term "man." What he means is merely that the eternal God became man. But he elects to say this in the language which throws best up to view what it is to become man. The contrary be the Word and the human nature which He assumed as flesh, is the hinge of the statement. Had the evangelist said (as he does in 1 John 4:2) that the Word "came in flesh," it would have been the continuity through the change which would have been most emphasized. When he says rather that the Word became flesh, while the continuity of the personal subject is, of course, intimated, it is the reality and the completeness of the humanity assumed which is made most prominent.

(3) The incarnated person.—That in becoming flesh the Word did not cease to be what He was before entering upon this new sphere of experiences, the evangelist does not leave, however, to mere suggestion. The glory of the Word was so far from diminishing, when by His becoming flesh, that he gives us at once to understand that it was rather as "trailing clouds of glory" that He came. "And the Word became flesh," he says, and immediately adds: "and dwelt among us (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth)" (1:14). The language is colored by reminiscences from the Tabernacle, in which the Glory of God, the Shekinah, dwelt. The flesh of Our Lord became, on its assumption by the Word, the Temple of God on earth (cf. v. 19), and the glory of the Lord filled the house of the Lord. John tells us expressly that this glory was visible, that it was precisely what was appropriate to the Son of God as such. "And we beheld his glory," he says; not divined, nor inferred, but perceived it. It was open to sight, and the actual object of observation. Jesus Christ was obviously more than man; He was obviously God. His actually observed glory, John tells us further, was a "glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth" unique; nothing like it was ever seen in another. And its uniqueness consisted precisely in its consonance with what the unique Son of God, sent forth from the Father, who was full of grace and truth, would naturally manifest. That nothing is more characteristic of the incarnation of the continuity of all that belongs to the Word as such into this new sphere of existence, and its full manifestation through the veil of His flesh, John adds at the close of his exposition the remarkable sentence: "As God, no one has ever yet seen him; God only begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father—he hath declared him" (1:18 m). It is the incarnate Word which is here called 'only begotten God.' The absence of the article with this designation is doubtless due to its parallelism with the word "God" which stands at the head of the corresponding clause. The effect of its absence is to throw up into emphasis the quality rather than the mere individuality of the person so designated. The adj. "only begotten" conveys the idea, not of derivation and subordination, but of uniqueness and consubstantiality: Jesus is all that God is, and He alone is this. Of this "only begotten God" it is now declared that He "is"—not "was," the state is not an incomplete one, but one which continues uninterupted and unmodified—"into"—not merely "in"—"the bosom of the Father"—that is to say, He continues in the most intimate and complete communion with the Father. The unity which the "Word of God" in the full sense of the external relation intimated in 1:1. This being true, He has much more than seen God, and is fully able to "interpret" God to men. Though no one has ever yet seen God, yet he who has seen Jesus Christ, "God only begotten," has seen the Father (cf. 14:9; 12:45). In this remarkable sentence there is asserted in the most direct manner the full Deity of the incarnate Word, and the continuity of His life as such in His incarnate life; thus He is fitted to be the absolute revelation of God to man.

This condensed statement of the whole doctrine of the incarnation is only the prologue to a historical treatise. The historical treatise which it introduces, naturally, is (cf. 2:11) written from the point of view of its prologue. Its object is to present Jesus Christ in His historical manifestation, as obviously the Son of God in flesh. "These are written," the Gospel testifies, "that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that Jesus whom God has raised from the dead is the Son of God: a partial answer to the question of grace and truth" (1:14). The language is colored by reminiscences from the Tabernacle, in which the

Person of Christ
V. Teaching of the Synoptic Gospels.—The same may be said of the other Gospels. They are all dramatizations of the God-man set forth in the expositions in the prologue to John’s Gospel. The Gospel of Luke, written by a known companion of Paul, gives us in a living narrative the same Jesus who is presupposed in all Paul’s allusions to Him. That of Mark, who was also a companion of Paul, as also of Peter, is, as truly as the Gospel of John itself, a prologue to the life of Jesus, with a view to making it plain that this was the life of no mere man, human as it was, but of the Son of God Himself. Matthew’s Gospel differs from its fellows mainly in the greater richness of Jesus’ own testimony to His Deity which it records. What is characteristic of all three is the inextricable interlacing in their narratives of the human and Divine traits which alike marked the life they are depicting. It is possible, by neglecting one series of their representations, to arrive at an estimate of the other. It is possible to sift out from them at will the portrait of either a purely Divine or a purely human Jesus. It is impossible to derive from them the portrait of any other than a Divine-human Jesus. If we surrender ourselves to their guidance and take off of their pages the portrait they have endeavored to draw. As in their narratives they cursorily suggest now the fulness of His Deity and now the completeness of His humanity and everywhere the unity of His person, they present as real and as forcible a testimony to the constitution of Our Lord’s person as uniting in one personal life a truly Divine and a truly human nature, as if they announced this fact in analytical statement. Only on the assumption of this conception of Our Lord’s person as underlying all the description can the supposition, all their representations fall into their places as elements in one consistent whole. Within the limits of their common presupposition, each Gospel has no doubt its own peculiar emphasis. Mark lays particular stress on the Divine power of the man Jesus, as evidence of His supernatural being; and on the irresistible impression of a veritable Son of God, a Divine being walking the earth as a man, which He made upon all with whom He came into contact. Luke places His Gospel by the side of the Ep. to the He in the prominence it gives to the human development of the Divine being whose life on earth it is depicting and to the range of temptation to which He was subjected. It is therefore chiefly for the heights of the Divine self-consciousness which it uncovers in its report of the words of Him whom it represents as nevertheless the Son of David, the Son of Abraham; heights of Divine self-consciousness which fall in nothing short of those attained in the great utterances preserved for us by John. But amid whatever variety there may exist in the aspects on which each lays his particular emphasis, it is the same Jesus Christ which all three describe, the Son of God in man and man and one individual person. If that be not recognized, the whole narrative of the Synoptic Gospels is thrown into confusion; their portrait of Christ becomes an insoluble puzzle; and the mass of each witness’ life-experiences is transmuted into a mere set of cruel contradictions. See also GOSPELS, THE SYNOPTIC.

VI. Teaching of Jesus.—The Gospel narratives not only present us, however, with dramatizations of His person, according to their authors’ conception of His composite 1. The Johannine person. They preserve for us also a Jesus considerable body of the utterances of Jesus Himself, and this enables us to observe the conception of His person which underlay and found expression in Our Lord’s own teaching. The discourses of Our Lord which have been selected for record by John have been chosen (among other reasons) expressly for the reason that they bear witness to His essential Deity. They are accordingly peculiarly rich in material for forming a judgment of Our Lord’s conception of His higher nature. This conception, it is needless to say, is precisely that which John, taught by it, has announced in the prologue, and has been compacted by Our Lord himself as it is of these discourses. It will not be necessary to present the evidence for this in its fulness. It will be enough to point to a few characteristic passages, in which Our Lord’s conception of His higher nature finds esp. clear expression.

(1) His higher nature.—That He was of higher nature than earthly origin and nature, He repeatedly asserts: “Ye are from beneath,&quot; He says to the Jews (8 22), “And of thine own seed ye are of this world! I am not of this world!” (cf 17 10). Therefore, He taught that He, the Son of Man, had “descended out of heaven” (8 13), where was His true abode. This carried with it, of course, an assertion of preexistence; and this preexistence is explicitly affirmed: “What then,” He asks, “if ye should behold the Son of man ascending where he was before?” (6 62). It is not merely preexistence, however, but eternal preexistence which He claims for Himself: “And now, Father,” He prays (17 5), “glorify thou me with the glory which I had with thee before the world was” (cf ver 24); and again, as the most impressive language possible, He declares (8 58 AV): “Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am,” where He claims for Himself the timeless present of eternity as His mode of existence. In the former of these two last-cited passages, the character of His preexistent life is intimated; in it He shared the Father's glory from all eternity ("before the world was"); He stood by the Father's side as a companion in His glory, for He descended to earth, therefore, not from heaven only, but from the very side of God (8 42; 17 8). Even this, however, does not express the whole truth; He came forth not only from the Father's side where He had shared in the Father's glory; He came forth out of the Father's very being—"I came out from the Father, and am come into the world" (16 28; cf 8 42). "The connection described is inherent and essential, and not that of presence or external fellowship" (Westcott). This prepares us for the great assertion: "I and the Father are one" (10 30), from which it is a mere corollary that "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father" (14 9; cf 8 19; 12 45).

(2) His humiliation.—In all these declarations the subject of the affirmation is the actual person speaking: it is of Himself who stood before men and spoke to them that Our Lord makes these immense assertions. Accordingly, when He majestically declared, "I and the Father are" (plurality of persons) "one" (neuter singular, and accordingly singleness of being) (10 30), God, the "Thee" (Mk 8 37; Lk 18 17; Rom 8 33; Col 3 12; Tit 1 1) as His elect. He is obviously speaking in Mk 13 32 after a Divine self-consciousness: "Only a Divine being can be exalted above angels" (B. Weiss). He therefore designates Himself by His Divine name, "the Son," that is to say, the unique Son of God (9 7; 11 1), to claim to be whom would for a man be blasphemy (Mk 14 61 64). But though He designates Himself by this Divine name, He is not speaking of what is given at the baptism. He is: the action of the vb. is present, "knoweth." He is claiming, in other words, the supreme designation of "the Son," with all that is involved in it, for His present self, as He moved among men: He is, not merely was, "the Son." Nevertheless, what He affirms of Himself cannot be affirmed of Himself distinctively as "the Son." For what He affirms of Himself is ignorance—"not even the Son" knows it; and ignorance does not belong to the Divine nature, for which the term "the Son" is used (21 21). An extreme appearance of contradiction accordingly arises from the use of this terminology, just as it arises when Paul says that the Jews "crucified the Lord of glory" (1 Cor 2 8). Such an expression could only signify to "feed the imagination of God which he purchased with his own blood" (Acts 20 28m); or John Keble praises Our Lord for "the blood of souls by Thee redeemed." It was not the Lord of Glory as such who was nailed to the tree, nor have either "God" or "soul" blood to shed.

We know how this apparently contradictory mode of speech has arisen in Keble's case. He is speaking of men who are composite beings, consisting of souls and bodies, and these men come to be designated from the element of their composite personalities, though what is affirmed by them belongs rather to the other: we may speak, therefore, of the "blood of souls" meaning that these "souls," while not having blood as such, yet designate persons who have bodies, therefore dead. We know equally how to account for Paul's apparent contradiction. We know that the Old Testament Lord, as a composite person, uniting in Himself a Divine and a human nature. In Paul's view, therefore, though God as such has no blood, yet Jesus Christ, who has God's blood because He is also man. He can justly speak, therefore, when speaking of Jesus Christ, as of "the blood of God." When precisely the same phenomenon meets us in Our Lord's speech of Himself, we cannot presume that character either within the same state of things. When He speaks of the "Son" (who is God) as ignorant, we cannot designate Himself as the "Son" because of His other nature, and yet has in mind the ignorance of His lower nature. He means that the designated "the Son" is ignorant, that is to say with respect to the human nature which is as intimate an element of His person as is His Deity.
When Our Lord says, then, that "the Son knows not," He becomes as express a witness to the two natures which constitute His person as Paul is when he speaks of Jesus Christos Ktistes as a parenthesis to the threefold constitution of a human being when he speaks of such as the Lord of the Synoptics. There is no need to insist here on the elevation of Himself above the kings and prophets of the Old Covenant (Mt 12 41 ff), above the temple itself (Mt 12 6), and the ordinances of the Divine Law (Mt 12 8); or on His accent of authority in both His teaching and action, His great "I say unto you" (Mt 5 21 22), "I will; be cleansed" (Mk 1 41; Lk 7 14); or on His separation of Himself from men in His relation to God, never including them with Himself in an "Our Father," but consistently speaking distinctively of "my Father," His Father (e.g. Mt 5 16); or on His intimation that He is not merely David's Son but David's Lord, and that a Lord sitting on the right hand of God (Mt 22 44); or on His parable discrimination of Himself a Son (Mt 21 37 ff); and the Son of God (Mt 21 9) even on His ascription to Himself of the purely Divine functions of the forgiveness of sins (Mt 2 8) and judgment of the world (Mt 25 31), or of the purely Divine powers of reading the heart (Mt 9 4; Lk 8 15); or of foreshadowing (Mt 16 14 ff) and omnipresence (Mt 18 20; 28 10). These things illustrate His constant assumption of the possession of Divine dignity and attributes; the claim itself is more directly made in the two great designations with the two names of God, the first being Son, the second God. It is a designation, thus, which implies at once a heavenly preexistence, a present humiliation, and a future glory; and He proclaims Himself in this future glory no less than the universal King seated on the throne of glory, and to His Father and to the earth's multitude (Mt 8 31; Mt 25 31). The implication of Deity imbedded in the designation, Son of Man, is perhaps more plainly spoken out in the companion designation, Son of God, which Our Lord not only accepts at the hands of others, accepting with it the implication of blasphemy in permitting its application to Himself (Mt 26 63 65; Mk 14 61 64; Lk 22 28 30), but persistently claims for Himself both, in His constant designation of God as His Father in a distinctive sense, and in His less frequent but more pregnant designation of Himself as, by way of eminence, "the Son." That His consciousness of the peculiar relation to God expressed by this designation was not an attainment of His mature spiritual development, but was part of His most intimate consciousness from the beginning, is suggested by the sole glimpse which is given us into His mind as a child (Lk 2 49). The high significance which the designation bore to Him is further emphasized in two respects preserved, the one by both Matthew (11 27 ff) and Luke (10 22 ff), and the other by Matthew (28 19).

(1) Mt 11 27; 28 19: In the former of these utterances, Our Lord, speaking in the most solemn manner, not only presents Himself, as the Son, as the sole source of knowledge of God and of blessedness for men, but places Himself in a position, not of equality merely, but of absolute reciprocity and interpenetration of knowledge with the Father. "No one knows . . ." He says, "no one knows the Father, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son . . ." varied in Luke so as to read: "No one knoweth who the Son is, save the Father; and who the Father is, save the Son . . ." as if the being of the Son of God were so delimited as to know it thoroughly: and the knowledge of the Son was so unlimited that He could know God to perfection. The peculiarly pregnant employment here of the terms "Son" and "Father" over against one another is explained to us in the other utterance (Mt 28 19). It is the resurrected Lord's commission to His disciples. Claiming for Himself all authority in heaven and on earth—which implies the possession of omnipotence—and promising to be with His followers 'alway, even to the end of the world'—He commands them to baptize their converts 'in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.' The precise form of the formula must be carefully observed. There were three persons numbered, each with its distinguishing name. Nor yet: 'In the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost,' as if there were one person, going by a threefold name. It reads: 'In the name [singular] of the Father, and of the [article repeated] Son, and of the [article repeated] Holy Ghost,' carefully distinguishing three persons, though uniting them all under one name. The name of God was to the Jews Jehovah, and to name the Son of God, this Son of God, Jesus, thus: 'The name of Jesus.' What Jesus did in this great injunction was to command His followers to name the name of God upon their converts, and to announce the name of God which is to be named on their converts in the threefold enumeration of "the Father" and "the Son" and 'the Holy Ghost.' As it is unquestionable that He intended Himself by "the Son," He here places Himself by the side of the Father and the Spirit, as together with them constituting the one God. It is, no doubt, possible to argue, as some would, that this is an attempt at describing; and that is as much as to say that He announces Himself as one of the persons of the Trinity. This is what Jesus, as reported by the Synoptics, undertook Himself to be. See Trinitv. (2) His Human Body: He is God, however, Jesus does not deny that He is man also. If all His speech of Himself rests on His consciousness of a Divine nature, no less does all His speech manifest His consciousness of a human nature. He easily identifies Himself with men (Mt 4 4; Lk 4 4), and receives without protest the imputation of humanity (Mt 11 19; Lk 7 34). He speaks familiarly of His body (Mt 26 12 26; Mk 14 8; 14 22; Lk 22 19), and of His bodily parts—His feet and hands (Lk 24 30), His head and feet (Lk 7 44 46), His flesh and bones (Lk 24 39), His blood (Mt 26 28; Mk 14 24; Lk 22 20). We chance to be given indeed a very express affirmation on His part of the reality of His bodily nature; when His disciples were terrified at His appearing before them after His resurrection, supposing Him to be a spirit, He reassures them with the direct declaration: "See my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as thou seest me having." (Lk 24 39). His testimony to His human nature is just as express: "My soul," says He, "is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death" (Mt 26 38; Mk 14 34). He speaks of the human dread with which He looked forward to His approaching death (Lk 12:50), and expresses in a poignant cry His sense of desolation on the cross (Mt 27:46; Mk 15:34). He speaks aloud of His pity for the weary and hungering (Mt 28:17; Lk 12:22). He displays human desire which He felt (Lk 22:15). Nothing that is human is alien to Him except sin. He never ascribes imperfection to Himself and never betrays consciousness of sin. He recognizes the evil of those about Him (Lk 11:13; Mt 7:11; Lk 11:34; Lk 11:29), but never identifies Himself with it. It is those who do the will of God with whom He feels kinship (Mt 12:50), and He offers Himself to the morally sick as a physician (Mt 9:12). He prefers the human example of John the Baptist (Mt 11:28 ff) and pronounces him blessed who shall find no occasion of stumbling in Him (Mt 11:6).

(5) Unity of the Person.—These manifestations of a human and Divine consciousness simply stand side by side in the records of Our Lord's self-expression. Neither is suppressed or even qualified by the other. If we attend only to the one class we might suppose Him to proclaim Himself wholly Divine; if only to the other we might equally easily imagine Him to be by Himself wholly human. With both together before us we perceive Him alternately speaking out of a Divine and out of a human consciousness; manifesting Himself as all that God is and as all that man is; yet making the natures so distinct one from another that He, the one Jesus Christ, was to His own apprehension true God and complete man in a unitary personal life.

VII. The Two Natures Everywhere Presupposed.

There do not, however, the native literature of the NT a single, unvarying conception of the constitution of Our Lord's person. From Mt where He is presented as one of the persons of the Holy Trinity (28:19)—or if we prefer the chronological order of books, from the Ep. of Jas where He is spoken of as the Glory of God, the Shekinah (2:1)—to the Apocalypse where He is represented as declaring that He is the Alpha and the Omega, the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End (1:8; 1:13). He is consistently thought of as in His fundamental being just God. At the same time from the Synoptic Gospels, in which He is dramatized as a man walking among men, His human descent carefully recorded, and His sense of dependence on God so emphasized that preoccupation of the characteristic characteristic construction, to the Ep. of John in which it is made the note of a Christian that He confesses that Jesus Christ has come in flesh (1 Jn 4:2) and the Apocalypse in which His birth in the tribe of Judah and the house of David (5:5; 22:16), His exemplary life of conflict and victory (3:21), His death on the cross (11:8) are noted, He is equally death-sentimentally thought of as true man. Nevertheless, from the beginning to the end of the whole series of books, while first with Him but then saying the other, there is no question of conflict between the two, never any confusion in their relations, never any schism in His human personal action; but He is obviously considered and presented as one, composite indeed, but undivided personality. In this state of the case not only may evidence of the constitution of Our Lord's person properly be drawn indiscriminately from every part of the NT, and passage justly be cited to support and explain passage without reference to the portion of the NT in which it is found, but we should be without justification if we did not employ this common presupposition of the whole body of this literature to illustrate and explain the varied representations which meet us curiously in its pages, representations which might easily be made to appear mutually contradictory were they not brought into harmony by their relation as natural component parts of this one unitary conception which underlies and gives consistency to all of them. There can scarcely be imagined a better proof of the nature of Our Person that His power completely to harmonize a multitude of statements which without it would present to our view only a mass of confused inconsistencies. A key which perfectly fits a lock of very complicated wards can scarcely fail to be the true key, can prove how the single personality remain an unplumbed mystery, and give rise to paradoxical modes of speech which would be misleading, were not their source in our duplex nature well understood. We may read, in careful writers, of souls being left dead on battlefields, and of everybody's immortality. The mysteries of the relations in which the constituent elements in the more complex personality of Our Lord stand to one another are immeasurably greater than in our simpler case. We can comprehend how the infinite God and a finite humanity can be united in a single person; and it is very easy to go fatally astray in attempting to explain the interactions in the unitary person of God and man. But the entire life of the Church, therefore, that so soon as serious efforts began to be made to give systematic explanations of the Bib. facts as to Our Lord's person, many one-sided and incomplete statements were formulated which required不断完善ing and a larger, in the case at least a mode of statement was devised which did full justice to the Bib. data. It was accordingly only after more than a century of controversy, during which nearly every conceivable method of construing and misconstruing the Bib. facts had been proposed and tested, that a formula was framed which successfully guarded the essential data supplied by the Scriptures from destructive misconception. This formula, put together by the Council of Chalcedon, 451 AD, declares it to have been the doctrine of the church, derived from the Scriptures and Our Lord Himself, that Our Lord Jesus Christ is "truly God and truly man, of a reasonable soul and body;" that the Father is Godhead, and consubstantial with us according to the manhood; in all things like unto us, without sin; begotten before all ages of the Father according to the Godhead, and in these latter days, for us and for our salvation, born of the Virgin Mary, the Mother of God, according to the manhood; one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten, to be acknowledged in two natures inconfusively, unchangeably, indivisibly, inseparably; the distinction of natures being by no means that we saw the other, but the property of each nature being preserved, and concurred in one Person and one subsistence, not parted or divided into two persons, but one and the same Son, and Only-begotten, God, the Word, the Lord Jesus Christ." There is nothing here but a careful statement in systematic form of the pure teaching of the Scriptures; and therefore this statement has stood ever since as the norm of thought and teaching as to the person of the Lord. As such, it has been incorporated, in one form or another, into the creed of all the great branches of the church; it underlies and gives their form to all the usages to Christ in the great mass of preaching and song which has accumulated during the centuries; and it has supplied the background of all the devotions of the untold multitudes who through the Christian ages have been worshippers of Christ.

3. Life-Story

(1) The first period again may be conveniently divided into the events prior to the Passion of Christ and those following. There are about ten of the former: the healing of his wife's mother Capernaum (Mt 8 14 ff); the great draught of fishes, and its effect in his self-abasement and surrender of his all to Jesus (Lk 5 1-11); his call to the apostolic office and his spiritual equipment therefor (Mt 10 2); his attachment to the waves (Mt 14 28); the same attachment as shown at a certain crisis, in his inquiry "Lord, to whom shall we go?" (Jn 6 68); his noble confession of Jesus as the Christ, the Son of the living God, and, alas, the rebuke that followed it (Mt 16 15-23); the exalted privileges he enjoyed with James and John as witness of the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5 37) and the transfiguration of his Lord (Mt 17 1-5); and finally, the incident of the tribute money (Mt 17 24).

The events beginning at the Passion are more easily recalled, because so large an extent are they found in all the Gospels and about in the same order. They commence with the washing of his feet by the Master at the time of the last Passover, and the two mistakes he made to the two steps of the former event: the act (Jn 13 1-10); the first of his presumptuous boastings as to the strength of his devotion to his Master, and the warning of the latter as to Satan's prospective assault upon him (Lk 22 31-34), twice repeated before the betrayal in Gethsemane (Mt 26 31-35); the admission to the garden to behold the Saviour's deepest distress, the charge to watch and pray, and the failure to do so through sleepiness (Mt 26 36-46); the mistaken courage in severing the ear of Malchus (Jn 18 10-12); the forswearing of his Lord while the latter was being led away as a prisoner, his following Him afar off, his admission into the high priest's palace, his denial "before them all," his confirmation of it by an oath, his remembrance of the warning when "the Lord turned and looked upon Peter," and his tears of bitterness as he went out (Mt 26 56-58; Mk 14 66-72; Lk 22 54-62; Jn 18 15-27).

It will be seen that the story of Peter's fall is thus recounted as at least in greater detail than that of the other Disciple. "None have described it in so heinous a light than Mark; and if, as is generally supposed, that Gospel was reviewed by Peter himself and even written under his direction, this circumstance may be considered as an evidence of his integrity and sincere contrition."

Nothing more is heard of Peter until the morning of the resurrection, when, on the first tidings of the event, he runs with John to see the tomb (Jn 20 1-10); his name is next mentioned by the angel (Mk 16 7); and on the same day he sees Jesus alive before any of the rest of the Twelve (Lk 24 34; 1 Cor 16 5). Subsequently, at the Sea of Tiberias, Peter is given an opportunity for a threshold confession of Jesus whom he had three times denied, and is made more assigned to the apostolic office; a prediction follows as to the kind of death he should die, and also a command to follow his Lord (Jn 21).

(2) The second period, from the ascension of Christ to the conversion of Paul, is more briefly sketched. After the ascension, of which Peter was doubtless a witness, he "stood up in the midst of the brethren" in the upper room in Jerusalem to counsel the choice of a successor to Judas (Acts 1 15-26). On the day of Pentecost he preaches the first gospel sermon (Acts 2), and later, in company with John, instrumentally heals the lame man, addresses the people in the Temple, is arrested, defends himself before the Sanhedrin and returns to his own "company" (Acts 3, 4). He is in 42 arrested and beaten (ch 6); after a time he is sent by the church to Jerusalem to communicate the Holy Ghost to the disciples at Samaria (ch 8). Returning to Jerusalem (where presumably Paul visits him, Gal 1 18), he afterward journeys "throughout all parts," heals Aeneas at Lydda, raises Dorcas from the dead at Joppa, sees a vision upon the housetop which influences him to preach the gospel to the gentle centurion at Caesarea, and explains this action before "the apostles and the brethren that were in Judea" (9 32-41; ch 11).

After a while another persecution arose against the church, and Herod Agrippa, having put James to death, imprisons Peter with the thought of executing him also. Prayer is made by the church on his behalf, however, and miraculous deliverance is given him (ch 12). Retiring for a while from public attention, he once more comes before us in the church council at Jerusalem, when the question is to be settled as to whether works are needful to salvation, adding his testimony to that of James and Barnabas in favor of justification by faith only (ch 15).

Subsequently he is found at Antioch, and having fellowship with gentle Christians until "that certain came from James," when he "drew back and separated himself from the assembly of the brethren" (ch 16). "Rebellion and division" were used as reason for his absence (Acts 15 19-21; ch 16), for which dissembling Paul "resisted him to the face, because he stood condemned" (Gal 2 11-14).

Little more is authentically known of Peter, except that he traveled more or less extensively, being accompanied by his wife (1 Cor 9 5), and that he wrote two epistles, the second of which was penned as he approached the end of his life (2 Pet 1 12-15).

The tradition is that he died a martyr at Rome about 67 AD, when about 75 years old. His Lord and Master had predicted a violent death for him (Jn 21 18,19), which it is thought came to pass by crucifixion under Nero. It is said that at his own desire he was crucified head downward, feeling himself unworthy to resemble his Master in his death.

It should be observed, however, that the tradition that he visited Rome is only tradition and nothing more, resting as it does partly upon a miscalculation of some of the early Fathers, "who assume that Peter went to Rome only a short time after his deliverance from prison" (cf Acts 12 17). Schaff says this "is irreconcilable with the silence of Scripture, and even with the mere fact of Paul's Ep. to the Rom, written in 68, since the latter says not a word of Peter's previous labors in that city, and he himself never built on other men's foundations" (Rom 16 20; 2 Cor 10 15.16).

The character of Peter is transparent and easily analyzed, and it is doubtless true that no other "in his story of the history of the world "clearly or strongly." He has been

4. His Character

The character of Peter is transparent and easily analyzed, and it is doubtless true that no other "in his story of the history of the world "clearly or strongly." He has been
The leadership referred to, however, should not lead to the supposition that he possessed any supremacy over the other apostles, of which there is no proof. Such supremacy was never conferred upon him by his Master, it was never claimed by him, nor ever computed to his credit. See in this connection Mt 23 8-12; Acts 15 13-14; 2 Cor 12 11; Gal 2 11.

It is true that when Christ referred to the meaning of his name (Mt 16 18), he said, "Upon this rock I will build my church," but he did not intend to teach that his church would be built upon Peter, but upon Himself as confessed by Peter in ver 16 of the same chapter. Peter is careful to affirm this in the first of his two Epp. (2 4-9). Moreover, when Christ said, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven," etc (Mt 16 19), he invested him with no power not possessed in common with his brethren, since they also afterward received the same commission (Mt 18 18; Jn 20 23). A key is a badge of power or authority, and, as many Protestant commentators have pointed out, to quote the language of one of them, "the apostolic history explains and limits this trust, for it was Peter who opened the door of the gospel to Israel on his mission of salvation (1 John), and to the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius (Acts 10 34-46)."

Some, however, regard this authority as identical with the great commission (Mt 28 19). See Keys, Power of the.

The first Epp of Peter were written presumably late in life, as appears esp. of the Second (1 12-15). Both were addressed to the same class of persons, chiefly Jewish Christians scattered abroad in the different provinces of Asia Minor, among whom Paul and his associates had planted the gospel (1 Pet 1 1-2; 2 Pet 3 1). The First was written at Babylon (1 Pet 5 13), doubtless the famous Babylon on the Euphrates, which, though destroyed as a great capital, was still inhabited by a small colony of people, principally Jews (see Weiss, INT, II, 150; but see also Peter, First Epistle of).

(1) First Epistle.—The theme of the First Ep. seems to be the living hope to which the Christian has been begotten and promised by the prophets of old. The living hope is espoused in the earlier part of the first chapter down to ver 13, where the obligations begin to be stated, the first group including: hope, godly fear, love to the brethren, and praise 1 3-12.

The writer drops his pen at this point, to take it up again to address those who were suffering persecution for righteousness' sake, upon whom two more obligations are impressed, submission to authority, and testimony to Christ (2 11-4 6). The third group which concludes the book begins here, dealing with such themes as spiritual hospitality in the use of heavenly gifts, patience in suffering, fidelity in service, and humility in ministry in opposition to one another. The letter was sent to the churches "by Silvanus, our faithful brother," the author affirming that his object in writing was to exhort and testify concerning the "true grace of God" (5 12).

The genuineness of this First Ep. has never been doubted, except out of course by those who in these latter days have doubted everything, but the same cannot be said of the Second. It is not known to whom the latter was intrusted; as a matter of fact it is two different persons, one Pontecoptes (Acts 2 38-42) and to the other the emblems of the 2d and 3d cents. The first church employing it was at Alexandria, but subsequently the church at large became satisfied from internal evidence of its genuineness and inspiration, and when the Canon was pronounced complete in the 4th cent., it was without hesitancy received.

(2) Second Epistle.—The Second Ep. claims to have been written by Peter (1 1; 3 1.2), to doubt which would start more serious difficulties than can be alleged against its genuineness as relieved on the account of its late admission, rather because of the Canon or its supposed diversity of style from Peter's early writing. See Peter, Second Epistle of.

His object is the same in both Epps., to "stir up your sincere mind by putting you in remembrance" (3 1). Like Paul in his Second Ep. to Titus, he foresees the apostasy in which the professing church will end, the difference being that Paul speaks of it in its last stage when the laity have become infected (2 Tim 3 1-5; 4 3-4), while Peter sees it in its origin as accessible to false teachers (2 Pet 2 1-3; 15-19). As in the First Ep. he wrote to exhort and to testify, so here it is rather to caution and warn. This warning was, as a whole, against falling from grace (3 17,18), the enforcement of which warning is contained in ch 1-2, the ground of it in ch 3, and the occasion of it in the last two chapters. To speak only of the occasion: This, as was stated, was the presence of false teachers (2 1), whose eminent success is predicted (2 2), whose punishment is certain and dreadful (2 3-9), and who are described (2 10-20) as those who have "an evil conscience," etc. The nature of their false teaching (ch 3) forms one of the most interesting and important features of the Ep., focusing as it does on the Second Coming of Christ.

The theology of Peter offers an interesting field of study because of what may be styled its freshness and variety in comparison with 6. Theology that of Paul and John, who are the great theologians of the NT.

(1) Messianic teaching.—In the first place, Peter is unique in his Messianic teaching as indicated in the first part of the Acts, where he is the chief personage, and where for the most part his ministry is confined to Jews and the Jews. The latter, already in covenant relations with Jeh, had sinned in rejecting Jesus as the Messiah, and Peter's preaching was directed to that point, demanding repentance or a change of mind about Him. The apparent failure of the OT promises concerning the Davidic kingdom (Isa 11 10-12; Jer 25 5-8; Ezek 37 21-28) was explained by the prophet as that which would be set up at the return of Christ (Acts 2 25-31; 15 14-16); which return, personal and corporeal, and for that purpose, is presented as only awaiting their national repentance (Acts 3 19-26).

See Schofield, Christian History Bible SE for more.

(2) Justification.—But Peter's special ministry to the circumcision is by no means in conflict with that of Paul to the Gentiles, as demonstrated at the point of transition in Acts 10. Up until this time the gospel had been offered to the Jews only, but now they have rejected it in the national sense, and "the normal order for the present Christian age" is reached (Acts 13 44-48). Accordingly, we find Peter, side by side with Paul, affirming the great doctrine of justification by faith only, in the words, "We believe that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we [Jews] shall be saved, even as they [Gentiles]" (Acts 15 11 AV). Moreover, it is clear from Peter's Second Ep. (1 1) that his conception of justification from the Divine as well as the human side is identical with that of Paul, since he speaks of justification as terminating on the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ. As we understand it, this is not the righteousness which God requires, but the righteousness which God has given (cf Rom 1 16.17; 3 21-25; 2 Cor 5 20.21).

(3) Redemption.—Passing from his oral to his written utterances, Peter is particularly rich in his allusions to the redemptive work of Christ. Limiting ourselves to his First Ep., the election of the individual believer is seen to be the result of the sprinkling of Christ’s blood (1 1); his obedience and godly fear are inspired by the sacrifice of the “lamb without blemish and without spot: Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world (1 17—20 AV). But most interesting are the manner and the connection in which these sublime truths are sometimes set before the reader. For example, an exhortation to submission on the part of household slaves is the occasion for perhaps the most concise yet comprehensive interpretation of Christ’s vicarious sufferings anywhere in the NT (2 18—25, esp. the last two verses; cf also in its context 3 18—22).

(4) Future Life.—Next to the redemptive work of Christ, thePetrine teaching about the future life claims attention. The believer has been begotten again unto “a lively [or living] hope” (1 Pet 1 3); which is an “inheritance” “reserved in heaven” (1 4); and associated with “praise, and glory and honor at the revelation [Second Coming] of Jesus Christ” (1 7 13; 4 13; 5 4 10; 2 Pet 1 11; 12; 3 13, etc). This “hope” or “inheritance” is so real and so precious as to cause rejoicing even in times of heaviness and trial (1 Pet 1 6); to stimulate to holy living (1 13); to sustain patience in persecution (4 12 13); fidelity in service (5 1 4—5); steadfastness against temptation (5 8—10); and growth in grace (2 Pet 1 10;11). It is a further peculiarity that the apostle always throws the thought of the future toward into the light of the future glory. It is not as though there were merely an allotment of suffering here, and an allotment of glory by and by, with no relation or connection between the two, but the one is seen to be incident to the other (1 Pet 1 7 11; 11 12; 2 Pet 3 12 13). It is this circumstance, added to others, that gives Peter the title of the apostle of hope, as Paul has been called the apostle of faith, and John the apostle of love.

(5) Holy Scripture.—Considering their limitations as to space, Peter’s Epp, are notable for the emphasis they lay upon the character and authority of the Holy Scriptures. 1 Pet 1 10—12 teaches a threefold relation of the Holy Spirit to the Holy Word as its Author, its Revealer, and its Teacher or Preacher. The same chapter (vs 22—25) speaks of its life-giving and purifying power as well as its eternal duration. Ch 2 opens with a declaration of its vital relation to the Christian’s spiritual growth. In 4 11, it is fond of being the staple of the Christian’s’s teaching. Practically the whole of the Second Ep. is taken up with the subject. Through the “exceeding great and precious promises” of that Word, Christians become “partakers of the divine nature” (1 4 AV); that they may be kept “always in remembrance” is Peter’s object in writing (vs 12—15 AV); the facts of that Word rest on the testimony of eyewitnesses (vs 16—18); its origin is altogether Divine (vs 20 21); which is as true of the NT as of the OT (3 2); including the Epp. of Paul (vs 15 16).

(6) Apostasy and judgment.—This appreciation of the living Word of God finds an antithesis in the solemn warning against apostate teachers and teaching forming the substance of 2 Pet 2 and 3. The theology here is of judgment. It is swift and “iniqueth not” (2 1—3); the Judge is He who “spared not” in olden time (vs 4—7); His delay expresses mercy, but He “will come as a thief” (3 9-10); the heavens “shall pass away,” the earth and its works shall be burned up (ver 10); “What manner of men ye be that refrain all holy living and godliness” (ver 11).

(7) Second Coming of Christ.—Peter’s theology concerning judgment is a further illustration of the Messianic character of his instruction. For example, the Second Coming of Christ of which he speaks in the closing chapter of the Second Ep. is not that of aspect it is associated with the translation of His church, and of which Paul treats (1 Thess 4 13—18), but that pertaining to Israel and the day of Jeh spoken of by the OT prophets (Isa 2 12—22; Rev 19 11—21, etc).

1. Simon Peter was a native of Galilee. He was brought to Jerusalem early in His ministry by his brother Andrew (Jn 1 40 41). His call to the office of apostle is recorded in Mt 10 1—4; Mk 3 13—16.

He occupied a distinguished place among the Lord’s disciples. In the four lists of the apostles found in the NT his name stands first (Mt 10 2—4; Mk 3 16—19; Lk 6 14—16; Acts 1 13). He is the chief figure in the first twelve chapters of the Acts. It is Peter that preaches the Christian sermon (Acts 2), he that opens the door of the gospel to the gentile world in the house of the centurion, Cornelius, and has the exquisite delight of witnessing scenes closely akin to those of Pentecost at Jerusalem (Acts 10 44—47). It was given him to pronounce the same sentence on the guilty pair, Ananias and Sapphira, and to rebuke in the power of the Spirit the profane Simon Magus (Acts 8 13—24). In these and the like instances Peter exhibited the authority with which Christ had invested him (Mt 10 19)—an authority bestowed upon all the twelve (Mk 20 22—23)—the power to bind and to loose.

Two Epps are ascribed to Peter. Of the Second
Peter, First Ep. of THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

I. Canonicky of 1 Peter.—The certainty of its integrity and trustworthiness is ample and altogether satisfactory. It falls into parts: external and internal. The historical attestation to its authority as an apostolic document is abundant. Polycarp, the disciple of the apostle John, martyred in 156 AD at 86 or more years of age, refers to the Ep. in unmistakable terms. Irenæus, a man who may well be said to represent both the East and the West, who was the first to quote Peter and Polycarp, quotes it copiously, we are assured. Clement of Alexandria, born c. 150 AD, died c. 216 AD, cites it many times in his Stromata, one passage (4.8) being quoted five times by actual count. "The testimony of the early church is summed up by Eusebius (HE II, xxiii, 3). He places it among those writings about which no question was ever raised, no doubt ever entertained by any portion of the church." (Professor Lumby in Bible Comm.)

The internal evidence in favor of the Ep. is as conclusive as the external. The writer is well acquainted with Our Lord's teaching, and he makes use of it to illustrate and enforce his own. The references he makes to the OT are to the point; and they include the four Gospels. He is familiar likewise with the Epp., particularly Jas, Rom, and Eph. But what is esp. noteworthy is the fact that 1 Pet in thought and language stands in close relation with the other apostolic discourses as recorded in Acts. By comparing 1 Pet 1:17 with Acts 10:34; 1:21 with 2:32-36 and 10:40-41; 7:8 with 4:10-11; 2:17 with 10:28; and 3:18 with 3:14, one will perceive how close the parallel between the two is. The inference from these facts appears legitimate, viz. 1 Pet in diction and thought belongs to the same period of time and moves in the same circle of truth as do the other writings of the NT. The writer was an apostle, and he was Simon Peter.

II. The Address.—Peter writes to the "elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion," James employs the term "Dispersion" to designate believing Hebrews of the Twelve Tribes who lived outside the land (1:1). The Jews included in it the whole branch of the once-dispersed Israelites as recorded in Acts. By comparing 1 Pet 1:17 with Acts 10:34; 1:21 with 2:32-36 and 10:40-41; 7:8 with 4:10-11; 2:17 with 10:28; and 3:18 with 3:14, one will perceive how close the parallel between the two is. The inference from these facts appears legitimate. viz. 1 Pet in diction and thought belongs to the same period of time and moves in the same circle of truth as do the other writings of the NT. The writer was an apostle, and he was Simon Peter.

The three of the four epistles Peter mentions, viz. Pontus, Cappadocia, and Asia, had representatives at the memorable Pentecost in Jerusalem (Acts 2:9; 1 Pet 1:1). Many of these "sojourners of the Dispersion" may have believed the message of the apostle and accepted salvation through Jesus Christ, and returned home to tell the good news to their nearest and dearest. This would form a new and special bond of union between them and Peter, and would open the way for him to address them in the familiar and tender manner of the Ep.

Silvanus appears to have been the bearer of the letter to the Christians of Asia Minor. He is our faithful brother, as I account him. I have written unto him, and have given him our steadfast charge, that he may be a minister unto you of the gospel of Christ. This is an assumption to assert from these words that Silvanus was employed in the composition of the Ep., but it is otherwise than the writer or the secretary. Silvanus was Paul's companion in the ministry to the Gentiles, and we do so regard him as going with Paul to Rome or to Jerusalem. It is probable he returned from Corinth (Acts 19:29) to Asia Minor and labored there. He and Peter met, where no one knows, though not a few think in Rome; as likely a gussa perhaps in Phil. At any rate, Silvanus, "the servant of Peter," as Peter designates him, was an assistant to Peter. This is a most variously interpreted passage. The Ep. is to be written by Petrus. But Silvanus, our faithful brother, I have written unto you, as if he had some share in furnishing the contents of the Ep.

III. Place and Time of Composition.—According to 1:18 the Ep. was written in Babylon. But what is the place meant? Two cities having this name are

1. Babylon: name were known in apostolic times. Which? One was in Egypt, probably on or near the present site of Cairo, and we are told that it is so known from 70 B.C. down to the time of the Emperor Vespasian, and be called "the great Babylon" (Zahn). The absence, however, of all tradition that would tend to identify this place with the Babylon of the Ep. seems to shut it out of the problem. Babylon on the Tigris was the city of the Euphrates to that day; and this is the Babylon to which the Jews were carried into captivity, and which was designated. Jews in considerable numbers still dwelt in Babylon, notwithstanding the massacre of thousands in the reign of Claudius, and the flight of multitudes into other countries. There is much to be said in favor of this place, but it is otherwise half the 2nd cent. appears to favor it, though much uncertainty and obscurity still surround the earliest ages of our era, in spite of the unviewed researches of modern scholars. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, who lived in the first half of the 2nd cent., appears to have had no doubt that Peter was martyred in Rome, and that the Babylon of the Ep. designates the Imperial City. There are very serious objections to this interpretation. One is, that it is said to be totally out of place, and connected with the writing. Preminently he is direct and matter-of-fact in his style. The metaphorical language he employs is mostly drawn from the OT, or, if from himself, it is so common of use as to be well understood. It is altogether opposed in character to that this man, plain of speech almost to bluntness, should interject in the midst of his personal explanations and final salutations such a mystical epithet with no hint of what he means by it, or why he employs such a mode of speech.

Besides, there is no evidence that Rome was called Babylon by the Christians until the Book of Rev was published, i.e. c. 90-96 AD. But Peter's use is dependent on the Apocalypse for this name of Babylon as Rome. Peter could not have been his authority for the place before that date. The Ep. was written about 64 AD; at the time when the view, under the infamous Nero were raging, at which time also the apostle himself bore his witness and went to his heavenly home. Then, even as his name had forever been the epithet of Babylon; while not unmindful of the great difficulties that beset the view, nevertheless we are inclined to the opinion that the Babylon of 5:13 is the ancient city on the Euphrates. See Peter (Simon).

IV. Design.—The apostle had more than one object in view when he addressed the "elect" in Asia Minor. He wished to set forth the element of faith, and the assurance of salvation, and to strengthen them by the assurance of the future. "Feed my lambs"—"Tend my sheep" (Jn 21:15-17). His two Epp. certify how faithfully he obeyed the charge. With loving and tender hand he feeds the lambs and tend the whole flock, warns against foes, guards from danger, and leads them into green pastures and beside still waters. He reminds them of the glorious inheritance which there they have been exalted to walk in the footsteps of the uncomplaining Christ (2:20–25); to be compassionate, loving, tender-hearted, humble-minded, and circumspect in their passage through this unfriendly world (3:8–12). He sums up the main duties of Christian life in the short but pregnant sentences, "Honor all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honor the king" (2:17). But his supreme object is to comfort and encourage them amid the persecutions and the sufferings to which they were unjustly subjected, and to fortify them against the heavier trials that were impending.

From the beginning the Christian church was the object of suspicion and of hatred, and many of its adherents had suffered even unto death at the hands of both hostile cution Jews and fanatical Gentiles. But these afflications were generally local and sporadic. There were churches of large membership and wide influence which were unmolested (1 Cor 4:10–16), and which, if they had not been able to get fair treatment in heathen courts (1 Cor 6:1–6). But the condition brought to view in 1 Pet is altogether different. Trials and afflictions of the highest sort assailed them, and an enmity and hostility, bent on their destruction, pursed them with tireless energy. The whole Christian body shared in the persecutions (5:9). The trial was a surprise (4:12), both in its intensity, for Peter calls it "fiery", and for its unexpectedness. The apostle represents it as a savage beast of prey, a roaring lion, prowling about them to seize and devour (5:8,9).

A variety of charges were brought against the Christians, but they were calumnies and slanders, without any foundation in fact. They were spoken against as evil-doers (2:12—κακοπαθοῦναί, malefici, Tacitus calls them). Their adversaries railed against them (3:9); reviled them (3:16); spake evil of them (4:4); reproached them for the name of Christ (4:14). They were ungodly. They were hated of all; and the intense hostility felt by the heathen toward the Christians who dwelt among them. If there had been any justifica tion for such antagonism in the character and the conduct of Christ's people, it might have been justifiable; but "human race," to be classed with thieves and murderers and meddlers in other men's matters (4:14–16), as they were accused of being and doing, we could understand the fierce opposition which assailed them and the savage purpose to suppress them altogether, but the only ground for the enmity felt against them was the refusal of the Christians to join their heathen neighbors in their idolatries, their feastings, winebibbings, revelings, carousings, lasciviousness and lusts in which once they freely shared (4:2–4). The Asian saints had renounced all such wicked practices, had separated themselves from their old companions in riotous living and revolting debaucheries; they were witnesses against their immoralities, and hence became the objects of intense dislike and persecuting animosity. Peter bears testimony to the high character, the purity of life and the self-sacrificing devotion of these believers. In all Asia Minor no better company of men and women could be found than these Christians of Smyrna, more so than members to constituted authority, none more ready to help their fellow-men in their distress and trouble. The head and front of their offending was their separation from the ungodly world about them, and their solemn witness against the awful sins done daily before their eyes.

How mightily does the apostle minister to his suffering friends! He bids them remember the uncomplaining Christ when he was unjustly afflicted by cruel men (2:19–25). He exhorts them how to put to silence their accusers, and refute the calumnies and the slanders that are so cruelly circulated against them, namely, by living such pure and goodly lives, by being so meek, docile, patient, meekfast, true to faithfulness to God, yet not to credit the false accusations (1:2–5; 2:13–17; 3:8.9.13–17; 5:6–11).

There is little or no evidence in the Ep. that the persecutions were inflicted by imperial authority or that the state was dealing with the Christians as enemies who were dangerous to the peace of society. In the province in which the letter was sent there seems to have been complete absence of formal trial and punishment through the courts. Peter refers to formal proceedings against the Christians by the magistrates. On the contrary, he urges them to be subject to every ordinar y of man for the Lord's sake: whether to the king as supreme; or unto governors, as sent by him for vengeance on evildoers, and for praise of those who do well (2:13). They are to honor all men, to honor the king (1 Pet 2:17). This commission would indicate that if the state had already proscribed Christianity and decreed its total suppression. This the imperial government did later (Acts 17:6; 18:12), but Peter wrote the apostle that in 64 AD—the date of the Ep.—the government formally denounced Christians and determined to annihilate them.

Peter exhorts his fellow-believers to silence their persecutors by their upright conduct (2:15); they are thus to put to shame those who falsely accuse them (3:16); and they are not to combat evil with evil nor reviling reviling with reviling (3:11) to the contrary—blessing (3:9). The antagonism here indicated obviously springs from the heathen populace; there is no hint of arraignment before magistrates or subjection to legal proceedings. It is unbelievers who revile and slander and denounce the people of God in the provinces.

Everything in the Ep. points to the time of Nero, 64 AD, and not to the time of Domitian or Trajan, or even Titus. In Rome vast multitudes of Christians were put to death in the most brutal fashion, so Tacitus relates, but the historian asserts that there was a sinister report to the effect that Nero himself instigated the burning of the city (July 19, 64), and that "he [Nero] falsely diverted the charge on to the Christians" (Hist. V.13). The Roman prosecution of the name of Christians (or Christians), and who were detested for the abominations which they perpetrated." Neco Neco and cle, certain facts are adduced, viz. that at the time the Christians were well known as a restless, anti-heathen sect, which was directed by those of the name of Christians (or Christians), and who were detested for the abominations which they perpetrated. Neco Neco and cle, certain facts are adduced, viz. that at the time the Christians were well known as a restless, anti-heathen sect, which was directed by those of the name of Christians (or Christians), and who were detested for the abominations which they perpetrated.

Peter likewise recognizes the fact that believers were disdained and calumniated by their heathen neighbors for the same reason—they were Christians: "If ye are reproached for the name of Christ, blessed are ye" (4:14). "But if a man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God in this name" (4:16). But the imperial government at the time does not appear to have taken formal action for the overthrow of Christianity as a system irreligious to the empire. Of course, where direct charges of a criminal nature were brought against Christians, judicial inquiry into them would be instituted. But in the Ep. what believers had to endure and suffer were the detraction, the vilification, the opprobrium and the vile and malignant slanderers with which the heathen assailed them.

V. Characteristic Features of the Epistle.—It has certain very distinct marks, some of which may be noticed. It does not observe a close logical sequence in its structure, as those of Paul so prominently display.

There is truth in Dean Alford's observation that it "pushes it rather far: 'The link between one idea Structure and another is found, not in any progress of unfolding thought or argument, but in the last word of the foregoing sentence which is taken up by the following one'" (V. 5.6.7.9.10, etc.). This peculiarity, however, does not interfere with the unity of the ep., it rather adds to it, and it gives to it a vividness which it otherwise might not possess.

It is the ep. of hope. How much it makes of this prime grace! Peter seems never to grow weary of describing it and exalting its radiant beauty and desirability. He calls it a living hope (1:3). It is born by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, and it calmly awaits the glorious inheritance that soon will be enjoyed. It is a hope that will be perfected at the advent of Christ (1:13), and it is set on God, hence cannot fail (1:21). With sickly, dying hope we are so little familiar. The device which a certain state (South Carolina) has inscribed on its Great Seal is, _dum spiro spero_ ("while I live I hope"). Such a hope may serve for a commonwealth whose existence is limited to this world, but a man needs something more enduring, something imperishable. "It is a fearful thing when a man and his hopes die together" (Leighton). A Christian can confidently write, "when I am dying I hope," for his is a living hope that fills and thrills the future with a blessed reality.

The Christian's glorious inheritance (1:3-5) is depicted in one of the most comprehensive and suggestive descriptions of the believer's heritage found in the Bible. It is described in a way that points to its substance. It is imperishable. In it there is no element of decay. It holds in its heart no germ of death. Like its author, the living God, it is unchangeable and eternal. It is not contaminated by sin nor polluted by crime, either in its acquisition or its possession. Human heritages generally are marred by human wrongs. There is hardly an acre of soil that is not tainted by fraud or violence. The coin that passes from hand to hand is in many instances soiled by guilt. But this of Peter is absolutely pure and holy. It "faeth not away." It never withers. Ages do not impair its beauty or dim its luster. Its bloom will remain fresh, its fragrance undiminished, forever. Thus our inheritance "is glorious in these respects: it is in its substance, incorruptible: in its purity, undefiled: in beauty, unfading" (Alford).

Now why does the apostle in the very opening of his epistle make a plea to the saints' inheritance? He does so in order to comfort and encourage his fellow-believers with the consolations of the Lord Himself, that they may bear steadfastly their manifold sufferings and triumph over their weighty afflictions. Hence he writes: "Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a little while, if need be, ye have been put to grief in manifold trials, that the proof of your faith . . . may be found unto praise and glory and honor at the revelation of Jesus Christ" (1:6-9). He lifts their thoughts and their gaze up far above the troubles and distresses around them to Him whose they are, whom they serve, who will by and by crown them with immortal bliss.

The prophets and their study are described in 1:10-11: "Concerning which salvation the prophets sought and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you," etc. With Peter and his fellow-apostles the testimony of the prophets was authoritative and final. Where they had a clear word from the OT Scriptures, they felt that every question was settled and controversy was at an end.

4. Testimony of Prophets

(1) _Salvation._—The burden of the prophetic communication was salvation. The prophets spoke on many subjects; they had to exhort, rebuke and entreat their wayward contemporaries; to denounce sin, to announce judgment on the guilty and to recall them to repentance and reformation. But ever and anon their vision was filled with the future and its blessedness, their voices would swell with rapture as they saw and foretold the great salvation to be brought to the world and the grace that would then so copiously go out unto men, for the Messiah was to appear to save just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God.

(2) _Spirit of Christ._—The prophet's messages were the messages of the Spirit of Christ. It was He who testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glories that should follow. The prophets wrote a part in the origination of their messages. They affirm in the most positive and solemn manner that their predictions are not their own, but God's. Hence they are called the Lord's "spokesmen," the Lord's "mouth" (Ex 15:16; 7:12; 2 Pet 1:21).

(3) _Prophectic study._—They "sought and searched diligently." These terms are strong and emphatic. They pored over the predictions which the Spirit had revealed through themselves; they scrutinized them with eager and prolonged inquiry. Two points engaged their attention: "What time or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did point unto." The first "what" relates to the time of the Messiah's advent; the second "what" is concerned with the circumstance of His appearing—a fruitful theme, one that engages the inquiry of nobler students—"which things angels desire to look into.

The Christian brotherhood is described in 2:9-10: "But ye are an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession, that ye may show forth the Christian excellencies of him who called you out of darkness into his marvellous light." The brotherhood is the new Israel. The apostle describes it in terms which were applied to the old Israel, but which include more than the ancient Israel ever realized. The exalted conception is by one who was a strict Jew, the apostle of the circumcision, and who held somewhat closely to the Mosaic institutions to the end of his life. All the more significant on this account is his testimony. The descriptive titles which he here gathers together and places on the brow of the Christian brotherhood are the most illustrious. A wise, a manly, a noble, a general, a statesman, will sometimes appear in public with his breast covered with splendid decorations which mark his rank or his achievements. But such distinctions sink into insignificance before the description of the Christian. This is the heavenly nobility, the royal family of the Lord of glory, decorated with badges brighter far than ever glittered on the breast of king or emperor. But even in this instance Peter reminds Christians of the glorious destiny awaiting them that they may be strengthened and stimulated to steadfastness and loyalty in the midst of the trials and afflictions to which they are subjected (2:11-12).

A study of 1 Pet 3:18-20—"preached unto the spirits in prison"—should here follow in the present cursory review of the characteristic features of the Ep., but anything like in Prison an adequate examination of this difficult passage would require more space than could be given to it. In view of the superlative testimony from Professor Zahn (N.T., II, 289) with which the writer agrees: "That interpretation of 1 Pet 3:19 is in all probability correct, according to which a preaching of Christ at the time of the Flood is referred to, to which Noah is here represented as a preacher of righteousness, as in 2 Pet 2:5." See PRISON, SPIRITS IN.

3. Persecutions and trials. 4 15—5 11.

The chief doctrines of Christianity are found in 1 Pet. The vicarious suffering and death of the Lord Jesus Christ (2 24; 3 18); the new birth (1 3–23); redemption by the blood of Christ (1 18–19), faith, hope, patient endurance under unjust suffering, and holiness of life, are all pressed upon Christians with great earnestness and force.

3. Inerrancy of Sources.

The Second Ep. of Peter comes to us with less historical support of its genuineness than any other book of the NT. In consequence, its right to a place in the Canon is seriously doubted by some and denied by others. There are those who confidently assign it to the Apostolic age and to the apostle whose name it bears in the NT, while there are those who as confidently assign it to post-apostolic times, and repudiate its Petrine authorship. It is not the aim of this article to trace the history of the two opinions indicated above, nor to cite largely the arguments employed in the defence of the Ep., or those in opposition to it; nor to attempt to settle a question which for more than a thousand years has not yet been settled. The men of the Christian church have been unable to settle. Such a procedure would in this case be the height of presumption. What is here attempted is to point out as briefly as may be some of the reasons for doubting its canonicity, on the one hand, and those in its support, on the other.

I. EXTERNAL EVIDENCE IN FAVOR OF ITS APOSTOLIC AUTHORITY.—It must be admitted at the very outset that the evidence is meager. The ancient opinion of Origen (c 240 AD). In his homily on Josh, he speaks of the two Epps. of Peter. In another place he quotes 2 Pet 1 4: “partakers of the divine nature,” and gives it the name of Scripture. But Origen is careful to say that the antiquity was questioned: “Peter has left one acknowledged Ep., and perhaps a second, for this is contested.” Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, regarded it with even more suspicion than did Origen, and accordingly he placed it among the disputed works. He, however, added: “Jerome knew the scruples which many entertained touching the Ep., but notwithstanding, he included it in his Vulg. Version. The main reason for Jerome’s uncertainty about it he states to be “difference of style from 1 Pet.” He accounts for the difference by supposing that the apostle “made use of two different interpreters.” As great teachers and scholars as Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome, e.g. Athanasius, Augustine, Epiphanius, Iulianus and Cyril, received it as genuine. At the Reform of 423, Jerome rejected 2 Pet; Luther seems to have had no doubt of its genuineness; while Calvin felt some hesitancy because of the “discrepancies between it and the First.” In the 4th cent., two church councils (Laodicea, 364; Carthage, 397) formally recognized it and placed it in the canon in equal authority with the other books of the NT.

The opinion of modern scholars as to references in post-apostolic literature to 2 Pet is not only divided, but in many instances antagonistic. Salmon, Warfield, Zahn and Opinion others strongly hold that such references are to be found in the writings of the 2d cent., perhaps in one or two documents of the 1st. They insist with abundant proof in support of their contention that Justin Martyr, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Didache, and Clement of Rome, were all acquainted with the Ep. and made allusions to it in their writings. Weighing as honestly and as thoroughly as one can the citations made from that literature, one is strongly disposed to accept the evidence as legitimate and conclusive.

On the other side, Professor Chase (HDB) has subjected all such references and allusions in the writings with the writing to a searching criticism, and it must be frankly confessed that he has reduced the strength of the evidence and argument very greatly. But Professor Chase himself, from the remaining of the ancient literature, and from the internal evidence of the Ep., itself, arrives at the conclusion that 2 Pet is not at all an apostolic document, that it certainly was not written by Peter, nor in the 1st cent. of our era, but about the middle of the 2d cent., say 150 AD. If this view is accepted, we must pronounce the Ep. a forgery, pseudonymous and pseudopigraphic, with no more right to be in the NT than has the Apocrypha of Peter or the romance of the Shepherd of Hermas.

II. INTERNAL EVIDENCE IN SUPPORT OF ITS APOSTOLIC AUTHORITY.—At first sight, this seems to be not altogether reassuring, but looking deeper 1. Style and Diction. It often seems that we arrive at a Diction significant conclusion. Difference of style and a portion of the two Epps. attributed to Peter is given as one prominent reason for questioning the validity of the Second. It is mainly if not entirely on this ground that Jerome, Calvin and others hesitated to receive it. It is noteworthy that in the earlier times objections were not urged because of its relation to Jude—its borrowing from Jude, as is often charged in our days. Its alleged dissimilarity to 1 Pet in diction, structure, and measurably in its contents, explains why it was discredited. Admitting that there is substantial ground for this criticism, nevertheless there are not a few instances in which words rarely found in the other Bib. books are common to the two Epps. Some examples are given in proof: “precious” (1 Pet 1 7 19; 2 Pet 1 1) (a compound), occurring often in Rev, not often in other books; “virtue” (1 Pet 2 9 AVm; 2 Pet 1 3), found elsewhere only in Phil 4 8; “supply” (1 Pet 4 11; 2 Pet 1 5), rare in other books; “love of brethren” (1 Pet 1 22; 2 Pet 1 7) only in Peter as 2 Pet 1 16 (eyewitnesses), not found elsewhere in the NT; “without blemish,” “without spot” (1 Pet 1 19; 2 Pet 3 14) (order of words reversed]; also positive side (2 Pet 2 13), "spot and blemishes"; the words do not occur elsewhere; "ungodly" (1 Pet 4 18; 2 Pet 2 5; 3 7) occurs in but three other places, except Jude, which has it twice.

Besides, there are many striking similarities in thought and diction in the two Epp. Two instances are given. In the First the saved are described as the "elect" (1 1), and as the "holy" (1 29). In the Second, the two great truths are brought together (1 10). Likewise, in both stress is laid upon prophecy (1 Pet 1 10–12; 2 Pet 1 19–21). Now, this tends to prove that the work of Pet was well acquainted with the peculiarity of diction employed in the First, and that he made use purposely of its uncommon terms, or, if the Second was written by another than the apostle, he succeeded surprisingly well in imitating his style. The latter alternative does not merit discussion. The differences arise mainly out of the subjects treated in the two, and the design which the writer seems to have kept constantly in view. In the First, he sought to comfort, strengthen and sustain his readers. In the Second, he pressed the peculiar claim. In the Second he is anxious to warn and to shield those whom he addresses as to impending dangers more disastrous and more to be feared than the sufferings inflicted by a hostile world. In the First, he begins at the house of God (1 4 18), and believers were to arm, not to resist their persecutors, but for martyrdom (4 1). But in the Second, a very different condition of things is brought to view. Ungodly men holding degrading principles, practising such immoralities, are threatening to invade the Christian brotherhood. Evil of a most vicious sort was detected by the watchful eye of the writer, and he knew full well that if suffered to continue and grow, as assuredly it would, utter ruin for the cause he loved would ensue. Therefore he forewarns and denounces the tendency with the spirit and energy of a prophet of Jehovah.

2. Pet opens with the positive statement of Peter's authorship: 1 1. "Simon Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ." (2) Peter opens with the positive statement of Peter's authorship: 1 1. "Simon Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ." The insertion of "Simon," the old Heb name, in the form confused, is significant. If a forger had been writing at the inspiration of Peter, he would have begun his letter almost certainly by copying the First Epp. and simply written, "Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ." As it is, Peter begins his letter with the name of his inspiration, and early Christian literature, there is no Christian document of value written by a forger who used the name of an apostle." (Dods, SBG). If this important statement is accepted at its full worth, it goes far to settle the question of authorship. Both "servant" and "apostle" appear in the opening sentence, and the writer claims both for himself.

Furthermore, the writer is distinctly a Christian; he addresses those who "have obtained a like precious faith with us in the righteousness of our God and the Saviour Jesus Christ" (1 1). Although he cites Peter and John, he speaks of them as the "fathers" of which all the other saints enjoy: his also the exceeding great and precious promises of God, and he expects with all other believers to be made a partaker of the Divine nature (1 4 3). It is at all probable that one with such a faith and such expectations would deliberately use the name of Simon Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ? The writer is unearthing in his denunciations of false teachers the spirit of Peter and Paul, and Peter, and the truth. He instances the fall of the angels, the destruction of Sodom, the reprobation of Balaam, as examples of those who knew the grace of God and yet were in shameful sin and crime. Would a Christian and servant of Jesus Christ had been of his insinuating the most_flagrant manner the things he so vehemently condemns? If the writer was not the apostle Peter, he was a faithful interpreter of others, and a hypocrite, which seems incredible to us.

Moreover, he associates himself with the other apostles (2 3 5), is in full sympathy with Paul and Peter’s Epp. (3 15 16), and he holds and teaches the same fundamental truth. An apostle could not have introduced through this document such as is generally absent from spurious writings and such. He is anxiously concerned for the purity of the faith and the holiness of the followers of Christ. He exhorts them to give "diligence that ye may be found in peace, without spot and blameless in his sight," and that "they [a] grace and peace to you from our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" (3 14 18). All this and much more of the apostolic in tone and hetonism genuineness and reality. Moreover, further the writer appeals to certain facts in the life of Peter that are almost autobiographical. For example, he speaks of "putting off of my tabernacle . . . even as he cast his divine mantle on a wrestling angel," from the Saviour (2 1). In fact, he simply could not have been an apostle.

3. Claim to Petrine Authorship

4. Christian Earnestness

5. Relation to Apostles

6. Auto-biographical: our Lord Jesus Christ signified unto us . . . "me" (1 13). The reference undoubtedly is to John 3 36; 21 18 19. He claims to have been a witness of the Transfiguration (1 16–18). He indirectly claims the inspiration of his writings, as the "apostolic Book of En and perhaps also from the Ascension of Christ. Peter's sources are admitted to be the witness of the apostle who represented his SBD). The former would be more likely to cite 2 Pet 3 4–3 than the latter from Jude vs 4-16. The resemblance between these two sections of the Epp. is so close that one must have drawn both thoughts and language from the other, or both availed themselves of the same documentary source. Of this latter supposition antiquity furnishes no hint. The differences are as marked as if their ressemblances, and the one who cites from the other is no servile copyist. The real difference between the two is that between prediction and fulfilment. (2) Peter predicts the advent of the "false teachers" (2 1). His principal vbs, are in the future tense (2 2 12; 13). Indeed in describing the character and the conduct of the apostate libertines (2 12), he indicates a knowledge of a notorious teaching he puts in the future (2 15). The deadly germs were there when he wrote, the rank growth there was even then. The whole picture is of the expected, and the entire prose is of a deadly work. (3 Jude twice refers to certain sources of information touching these errors, with which his readers were acquainted and which were designed to warn them of the danger and keep them from betrayal. The two sources were (a) a writing that spoke of "ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ," ver 4; (b) the prediction of Peter that "in the last days mockers shall come with mockery, walking after their own lusts" (2 Pet 3 3). Jude urges his readers to remember the words which the apostles of Peter had before him, and his recognition of Peter in almost the exact terms: "In the last time there shall be mockers, walking after their ungodly lusts." He also reminds them of Peter's warning about the hypocrisy of those who live in hypocrisy and therein and there practising their unholy deeds: "These are they who make separations, sensual, having not the Spirit." The conclusion is inevitable. Jude quotes from Peter, (4) Chronology gives the priority to Peter. The apostle James lived between 50 and 90 A.D., and the majority of recent interpreters date the Epp. of Jude at 15–50 A.D. Jude's writing is no doubt a sequel to the destruction of Jerusalem, 70 AD. According, it is later than Peter's death by far to 10 years. Jude is implied in this interpretation. (5) Pet endorses it. The Ep. quotes from Peter as an apostle and canonically authoritative. It is later than Peter's death by far to 10 years. Jude is implied in this interpretation. (6) Pet endorses it. The Ep. quotes from Peter as an apostle and canonically authoritative. It is later than Peter's death by far to 10 years. Jude is implied in this interpretation.
Moreover, the apostle appeals to the inspiration of the prophecy as a confirmation of his teaching. No prophecy of scripture is of private interpretation. For no prophecy can come by the will of man: but men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Spirit. He recognizes this as a primary truth, that prophecy is not of our own invention, nor is it the simple expression of the prophet. The prophecy was brought to him, as it is brought to us. Peter and his fellow-believers did not follow "inquiring spirits", but rather "holy men of God" who had been filled with the Holy Spirit. Peter thus laid down a fundamental principle for the understanding of prophecy.

Of course in 3:15-18, where the three worlds are spoken of, three globes are not meant, but three vast epochs, three enormous periods in the history of the earth. The apostle divides its history into three clearly defined sections, and mentions some of the characteristic features of each.

(1) The old world.—"The world that then was" (3:6): this is his first world. It is the antediluvian world that is meant, the world which the Flood overwhelmed. Sceffers in Peter's time asked, no doubt with a sneer, "Where is the promise of his coming? for, from the day that the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation" (3:4). This is a surprisingly modern inquiry. Nature has appealed to the continuity of natural processes, and to the inviolability of Nature's laws. Nature keeps her track with unwavering precision. There is no sign of anything; no catastrophe is likely, is possible. The promise of His return, Peter reminds the skeptics that a mighty cataclysm did once overwhelm the world. The Flood drowned every living thing, save those sheltered within the ark. As this is a historical fact, the query of the mockers is foolish.

(2) The present world.—Peter's second world is "the heavens that now are, and the earth" (3:7). It is the present order of things in sky and earth that is meant. He asserts that this world is "stored up for fire, being reserved against the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men." The margin reads, "stored with fire," i.e., it contains within itself the agency by which it may be consumed. The world that now is, is held in strict custody, reserved, not for a second deluge, but for fire. The advent of Christ and the judgment are associated in Scripture with fire: "Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence: a fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him." Ps 68 3 AV. Isa 66 15. The passage in Peter is the NT's silent on this point: "the revelation of the Lord Jesus from heaven with the angels of his power in flaming fire" (2 Thess 1:7).

Ample materials are stored up in the earth for its consumption by fire. The oil and the gasses so inflammable and destructive in their energy can, when it may please God to release these forces, swiftly reduce the present order of things to ashen dust. Peter's language does not signify earth's annihilation, nor its dissolution as an organic body, nor the end of time. He speaks of cosmic convulsions and physical revolution in terms of the sky and earth, as such shall transform the planet into something glorious and beautiful.

(3) The new world.—The third world is this: "But, according to his promise, we look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (3:13). This is Paradise restored. We have sure ground for the expectation; the last two chapters of Rev contain the prophetic fulfillment: we shall see a new heaven, a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and the sea is no more." The accomplishment of these sublime predictions will involve a fundamental change in the constitution of the globe. Life would be impossible if the sea was no more. But He who has power over the elements and the sea shall also have power over every vestige of sin and misery and imperfection, fitting it for the dwelling of perfect beings and of His supreme glory. Inmanuel will dwell with the holy inhabitants of the new earth and in the new Jerusalem which is to descend into the glorified planet Jehovah. John 5:22. "Write, for the predictions are faithful and true; they shall not fail to come to pass." "Earth, thou grain of sand on the shore of the Universe of God. On thee hast the Lord a great work to complete."

PETRA, pét'ra. See Sol."
PHARAKIM, far-a-kim ( פָּרָאכִים , Pharaekim, 1, פָּרָאכִים , Pharaekim; AV Pharcim): One of the families of temple-servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5:31; not found in Ezra or Neh).

PHARAOH, fá'rō, fá-rā-ô ( פָּרָאָה, par'ah; פָּרָאָה, Pharaoh; Egyp per aa, “great house”): Many and strange differences of opinion have been expressed concerning the use of this name in Egypt and elsewhere, because of its importance in critical discussions (see below). EB says “a name given to all Egypt kings in the Bible”; it also claims that the name could not have been received by the Hebrews before 1000 BC. HDB (III, 819) says that a letter was addressed to Amenhotep as “Pharaoh, lord of,” etc. According to Winckler’s theory of a North Arabian Musri, it was the Hebrews alone in ancient times who adopted the term Pharaoh from the Egyptians, the name being of Zedekiah, even in the Am Tab or anywhere else in cuneiform literature for the king of Egypt. Such a result is obtained according to Winckler’s theory by referring every reference in cuneiform to “Fir’un, king of Musri” to the North Arabian country.

1. Use of Name in Egypt

Egypt inscriptions the term “Pharaoh” occurs from the Pyramid inscriptions onward. At first it is used with distinct reference to its etymology and not clearly as an independent title. Pharaoh, “great house,” like Sublime Porte, was applied first as a metaphor to mean the government. But as in such an absolute monarchy as Egypt the king was the government, Pharaoh was, by a figure of speech, put for the king. To use Egypt clearly as a title denoting the ruler, whoever he might be, as Caesar among the Romans, Shah among Persians, and Czar among Russians, belongs to a few dynasties probably beginning with the XVIIIth, and certainly ending not later than the XXIst, when we read of Pharaoh Sheshonk, but the Bible does not speak so, but calls him "Shishak king of Egypt" (1 K 14:25). This new custom in the use of the title Pharaoh does not appear in the Bible until we have “Pharaoh-nech.” Pharaoh is certainly used in the time of Rameses II, in the "Tale of Two Brothers" (Records of the Post, 1st series, II, 137; Recueil de Travaux, XXI, 13, I, 1).

It appears from the preceding that Bib. writers use this word with historical accuracy for the various periods to which it refers, not only for the time of Necho and Hophra, but for the time of Rameses II, and use the style of the time of Rameses II for the time of Abraham and Joseph, concerning which we have not certain knowledge of its use in Egypt. It is strongly urged that writers of the 7th or 5th cent. BC would not have been able to make such historical use of this name, while, to a writer at the time of the exodus, it would have been perfectly natural to use Pharaoh for the king without any further name; and historical writers in the time of the prophets in the Old Testament would likewise have used Pharaoh-nech and Pharaoh Hophra. This evidence is not absolutely conclusive for an early authorship of the Pent and historical books, but it is very difficult to account for a late authorship (cf. Gen 12:14-20; 41:14; Ex 1:11; 3:11; 1 K 3:1; 14:25; 2 K 23:29; Jer 44:30; also 1 K 11:19; 2 K 18:11; 1 Ch 4:18).

PHARAOH HOPHRA, hóf'ra hōph'ra; Osbodoth Hophra: He is so called in Scripture (Jer 44:30); He-rodotus calls him Apries (i.169). He is known on the monuments as "Ush'ab ba'ro. He was the son of Psammetichus II, whose Greco-Egyptian mercenaries have left inscriptions upon the rocks of Abu-Simbel, and the name was received by the Egyptians from the Chaldæans when they took the palace. According to Winckler’s theory of a North Arabian Musri, it was the Hebrews alone in ancient times who adopted the term Pharaoh from the Egyptians, the name being of Zedekiah, even in the Am Tab or anywhere else in cuneiform literature for the king of Egypt. Such a result is obtained according to Winckler’s theory by referring every reference in cuneiform to "Fir'un, king of Musri" to the North Arabian country.

2. Alliance with Zedekiah

Israelites who returned from Babylon and had been taken into captivity in Egypt under Pharaoh Apries. Pharaoh-Nech was the last king of Egypt to reign over the country, and his reign was marked by a number of significant events. He fought against the Pharaoh of Egypt and captured the city of Babylon. Pharaoh-Nech was also known as Zedekiah, the king of Judah, and he fought against the Babylonians and was eventually captured and executed.

3. Reception of Jeremiah and Nehemiah

Jeremiah and Nehemiah were both prophets who lived in the time of Pharaoh Apries. They were received by Pharaoh Apries with honor and were given the task of leading the people of God into the land of Canaan. The prophet Jeremiah prophesied against the Babylonians and the king of Judah, while Nehemiah led the people of God into the land of Canaan.

4. Palace of Pharaoh Apries

The palace of Pharaoh Apries was located in Memphis, the ancient capital of Egypt, near the grey mud hill, close to the squalid Arab village.
of Mitrohenn, which every tourist passes on the way to Sakkara, had lain for centuries Hophra's magnificent palace, 400 ft. long by 200 ft., with a splendid pylon, an immense court, and stone-lined halls, of which seven have been found intact. With many other objects of value which were found a fitting of a palanquin of solid silver, decorated with a bust of Hathor with a gold face. It is said to be of the finest workmanship of the time of Apries, a relic of the fire, which, Jeremiah predicted at Tahpanhes, the Lord of Hosts was to kindle "in the houses of the gods of Egypt!" (Jer 43 12).

Pharaoh Hophra, as Jeremiah prophesied (44 29f.), became the victim of a revolt and was finally slain.

PHARAOH-NECOH, nē'kō (נֵכֹה), par'ōh nēkōh, also לֶחֹד, nēkōh, Nejah, Neecho (2 K 23 29, 33).—2. Ch 35 22; 36 4, AV Necho, 1. Pharaoh-Ramesses, Necoe: Jer 46 20; 2 Ch 36 26. Necho, 610-AV Necho, RV (Necho)]: Nekau II of 594 BC the monuments—Gr Ἕκοδος—was the 24th king of the XXVII Dynasty, being the son of Psammetichus I, famous in Gr contemporaneous history for a long reign. In the vast memorials both in Upper and Lower Egypt (Herod. ii.153, 158, 169). The great event of his reign (610-594 BC) was his expedition across Syria to secure a place in the share of the decaying empire of Assyria. In the days of Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, Egypt had been tributary to Assyria, and, when it began to break up, Egypt and other subject kingdoms saw their opportunity to throw off its yoke. Psammetichus had turned back the Scythian hordes which had reached his border on their western march, and now his son Necho was to make a bold stroke for empire.

On his expedition toward the East, he had to pass through the territory of Judah, and he desired to have Josiah its king as an ally.

2. Battle of Whatever may have been his reasons, Megiddo, Josiah remained loyal to his Assyrian suzerain, declined the Egypt alliance, and threw himself across the path of the invaders. Opposing them on the battlefield of Megiddo, 608 BC, Necho was mortally wounded and soon after died amid the lamentations of his people. Necho marched northward, captured Kadesh, and pressed on to the Euphrates. Not having met an enemy there, he seems to have turned back and established himself for a time at Riblah in Syria. To Riblah he summoned Jehoahaz whom the people had anointed king in room of his father Josiah, deposed him after a brief reign of 3 months, and set his brother Jehoiakim on the throne as the vassal of Egypt. Jehoiakim paid up the tribute of a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold which Necho had imposed upon him, but he recovered it by exactions which he made from the people (2 K 23 35).

The Egyptians which still kept some hold upon Syria, and his presence there had attracted the attention of the newly established power of Babylon. The Chaldaean Carchemish, under Nebuchadnezzar set out for the 604 BC Euphrates, and, meeting the army of Pharaoh-necoh at Carchemish, invaded upon him a signal defeat. The Chaldaean were now undisputed masters of Western Asia, and the sacred historian relates that "the king of Egypt came not again any more out of his land; for the king of Babylon had taken, from the brook of Egypt unto the river Euphrates, all that pertained to the king of Egypt!" (2 K 24 7).

While Pharaoh-necoh II was ambitious to extend his empire, he was bent also upon the commercial development of Egypt. For this he had commenced to build two fleets, composed of triremes, ventured one of them to navigate the Mediter-ranian, the other to navigate the Red Sea. In order to secure a combination of his fleets, he conceived the idea of reopening the canal between the Nile and the Red Sea which had been originally constructed by Seti I and Rameses II, two Pharaohs of the days of the Israelite oppression, but had become silted up by desert sands. He excavated this old canal, following the line of the former cutting, and widening it so that two triremes might meet and pass each other in it. According to Herodotus he was obliged to desist from the undertaking in consequence of the mortality among the laborers, and it was left to Darius to complete. He also resolved to try whether it was possible to circumnavigate Africa, and, having his ships with Phoenician sailors, he sent them forth with instructions to keep the coast of Africa on their right and to return to Egypt by way of the Mediter-ranian. They succeeded in the "Pharaoh's Cape of Good Hope from the East, anticipated by two millenniums the feat which Vasco da Gama accomplished from the West. The enterprise took more than two years, and the result of it was of no practical value. Herodotus in his "History" was in 450 BC, saw still remaining the docks which Necho had built for the accommodation of his fleet.

PHARAOH'S DAUGHTER (בָּתְרָה, bahr'áh): The princess who rescued Moses (Ex 2 5-10; He 11 24). This is probably a title as well as an appellation, indicating not only one of the daughters of a Pharaoh, but also some very distinguished rank, thought to be most probably that of the heir to the throne by birth; though she was debarred from reigning by reason of sex, she still possessed the right to entail the scepter and crown to her oldest son. Pharaoh's daughter (Ex 2 25), the "daughter of the king of Egypt" mentioned in the Bible is not possible yet. All attempts toward identification are, of course, guided by the particular theory of the oppressor accepted. If the Pharaoh of the Oppression was Rameses II, as is most likely, then Pharaoh's daughter was probably the daughter of Seti I, an older sister of Rameses II. If, as many think, the Pharaoh of the Oppression was Thothmes III, then Pharaoh's daughter was some unknown princess. Some have thought she was Hatashepet, the "Queen Elizabeth of Egypt."

PHARATHON, far-a-thon (פָּרֹתָתֹן, Phathathon): One of the strong cities of Judaea fortified by Bacchides during the Maccabean war (1 Mace 9 50). LXX reads "Palmathatha-pharathon" as the name of one city. Jos, however (Ant, XIII, i, 3), and Syr supply the "and" between them. The name represents a Heb prathôn. If it is known to be taken strictly as in Judean territory, it cannot be identified with Phraits, (q.v.) of Jgs 12 13. In that case we should probably seek for the ancient place of Smith in some fortress covering the top of Wady Farah.

Our Lord's and His followers. The evidence of Jos shows that a contemporary and himself a Pharisee, Judah, was a devotee of that sect, and was not so much as mentioned. Although the Talm was written, both Mish and Gemara, by the descendants of the Pharisees, the fact that the Gemara, from which most of our information is derived, is so late renders the evidence deduced from Talmudic statements of little value. Even the Mishnah, which came into being only a century after the fall of the Jewish state, shows traces of exaggeration and modification of facts. Still, taking these discrepancies into consideration, we can make a fairly consistent picture of the sect.

The name means "separatists," from סְפָּרָה, pārash, "to separate"—those who carefully kept themselves from any legal contamination, distinguishing themselves by their care in such matters from the common people, the "הָּשָּׁרֶה, shepherds" who had fewer scruples. Like the Puritans in England during the 17th cent., and the Presbyterians in Scotland during the same period, the Pharisees, although primarily a religious party, became an enduringly political party. They were a closely organized society, all the members of which called each other Ḥāḇārīm, "neighbors;" this added to the power they had through their influence with the people.

1. History of the Sect—The Assidaeans (kāṣidhím) were at first the most active supporters of Judas Maccabeus in his struggle for religious freedom. A portion of them, rather than retreat to the desert to escape the tyranny of Epiphanes (1 Macc 2 27 i). The followers of these in later days became the Essenes. When Judas Maccabeus cleansed the temple and redeemed it with many sacrifices, it is not expressly said, either in the Books of Macc or by Jos, that he acted as high priest, but the probability is that he did so. This would have been a shock to theAssidaean purists, as Judas, though a priest, was not a Zadokite; but his actions were to be tolerated at that time on account of the imminent necessity for the work of reconsecration and the eminent services of Judas himself and his family.

When Bacchides appeared against Jews with Alcimus in his camp, this feeling against Judas took shape in receiving the treacherous Alcimus into Jesus and acknowledging him as high priest, a line of action which soon showed that it was fraught with disaster, as Alcimus murdered many of the people of the Pharisees, Sadducees and Essenes, therefore implying that then and in connection with them they had been prominent, although no notice of any of these parties is to be found that confirms that view. Later (XI: 18; see also Jos, ch. xiv, 9) an account of the Pharisees, Sadducees and Essenes is given, and it is clear that the former are in view, while the latter have been introduced by way of contrast. See HARMAN; ASSONEANS. It would seem that not only the Pharisees, but also the Essenes, were derived from the Assidaeans or Ḥāḇārīm.

In considering the characteristics and doctrines of the Pharisees, we have some difficulty from the nature of our authorities. The writers of the NT assume generally that the character and tenets of the Pharisees are well known to their readers, and only lay stress on the points in which they were in antagonism to Our Lord and His followers. The evidence of Jos shows that a contemporary and himself a Pharisee, Judah, was a devotee of that sect, and was not so much as mentioned. Although the Talm was written, both Mish and Gemara, by the descendants of the Pharisees, the fact that the Gemara, from which most of our information is derived, is so late renders the evidence deduced from Talmudic statements of little value. Even the Mishnah, which came into being only a century after the fall of the Jewish state, shows traces of exaggeration and modification of facts. Still, taking these discrepancies into consideration, we can make a fairly consistent picture of the sect.

The name means "separatists," from סְפָּרָה, pārash, "to separate"—those who carefully kept themselves from any legal contamination, distinguishing themselves by their care in such matters from the common people, the "הָּשָּׁרֶה, shepherds" who had fewer scruples. Like the Puritans in England during the 17th cent., and the Presbyterians in Scotland during the same period, the Pharisees, although primarily a religious party, became an enduringly political party. They were a closely organized society, all the members of which called each other Ḥāḇārīm, "neighbors;" this added to the power they had through their influence with the people.

1. History of the Sect—The Assidaeans (kāṣidhím) were at first the most active supporters of Judas Maccabeus in his struggle for religious freedom. A portion of them, rather than retreat to the desert to escape the tyranny of Epiphanes (1 Macc 2 27 i). The followers of these in later days became the Essenes. When Judas Maccabeus cleansed the temple and redeemed it with many sacrifices, it is not expressly said, either in the Books of Macc or by Jos, that he acted as high priest, but the probability is that he did so. This would have been a shock to the Assidaean purists, as Judas, though a priest, was not a Zadokite; but his actions were to be tolerated at that time on account of the imminent necessity for the work of reconsecration and the eminent services of Judas himself and his family.

When Bacchides appeared against Jews with Alcimus in his camp, this feeling against Judas took shape in receiving the treacherous Alcimus into Jesus and acknowledging him as high priest, a line of action which soon showed that it was fraught with disaster, as Alcimus murdered many of the people of the Pharisees, Sadducees and Essenes, therefore implying that then and in connection with them they had been prominent, although no notice of any of these parties is to be found that confirms that view. Later (XI: 18; see also Jos, ch. xiv, 9) an account of the Pharisees, Sadducees and Essenes is given, and it is clear that the former are in view, while the latter have been introduced by way of contrast. See HARMAN; ASSONEANS. It would seem that not only the Pharisees, but also the Essenes, were derived from the Assidaeans or Ḥāḇārīm.

In considering the characteristics and doctrines of the Pharisees, we have some difficulty from the nature of our authorities. The writers of the NT assume generally that the character and tenets of the Pharisees are well known to their readers, and only lay stress on the points in which they were in antagonism to Our Lord and His followers. The evidence of Jos shows that a contemporary and himself a Pharisee, Judah, was a devotee of that sect, and was not so much as mentioned. Although the Talm was written, both Mish and Gemara, by the

seems to intimate overt acts of hosttility on their part which prompted this action. His whole policy was the aggrandizement of the Jewish state, but his ambition was greater than his military abilities. His repeated failures and defeats confirmed the Pharisees in their suspicion of him on religious grounds.
They scandalized them by calling himself king, although not of the Davidic line, and further still by adopting the heathen name "Alexander," and having it stamped in characters on his coins. Although a high priest was forbidden to marry a woman, he married the widow of his brother. Still further, he incurred their opposition by abandoning the Pharisaic tradition as to the way in which the libation water was poured out. They retaliated by rousing his people against him and conspiring with the Syrian king.
On his deathbed he advised his wife, Alexandra Salome, who succeeded him on the throne, to make peace with the Pharisees. This she did by throwing herself entirely into their hands. On her death a struggle for the possession of the throne and the high-priesthood began between her two sons, John Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus II. The latter, the more able and energetic, had the support of the Sadudees; the elder, the elder of the two brothers, had that of the Pharisees. In the first phase of the conflict, Hyrcanus was defeated and compelled to make a disadvantageous peace with his brother, but, urged by Antipater, the Idumean, he called in Aretas, who inclined the balance at once to the Sadudees. The Romans were appealed to and they also, moved partly by the astuteness of Antipater, favored Hyrcanus. All this resulted ultimately in the supremacy of the Herodians, who through their subservience to Rome became inimical to the Pharisees and rivals of the Sad-duees.

When the NT records open, the Pharisees, who have supreme influence among the people, are also strong, though not predominant, in the Sanhedrin. The Herodians and Sad-duees, the one by their alliance with the Rom authorities, and the other by their inherited skill in political intrigue, held the reins of government. If we might believe the Talmudic representation, the Pharisees were in the immense majority in the Sanhedrin; the idel or president, and the 'abb-beth-din, or vice-president, both were Pharisees. This, however, is to be put to the credit of Talmudic imagination, the relation of which to facts is of the most distant kind.

Recently Büchler (Das grosse Synedrium in J e r u s e l m) has attempted to harmonize those Talmudic fables with the aspect of things appearing in the NT and Jos. He assumed that the two had habits to do with matters of government, in which the Sad-duees were overwhelmingly predominant, and the other sects of the Jews were equally predominant—the one the Senate of the nation, like the Senate of the United States, the other the Senate of a University, Rings say. Among Pharisees was Joseph by Rabbi Lauterbach in the J e w i s h Rev., this attempt cannot be regarded as successful. There is no evidence for this dualism in the NT or Jos., on the one hand, or in the Talm on the other.

Outside the Sanhedrin t e r the Pharisees are ubiquitous, in J e r u s a l e m, in Galilee, in Perea and in the Decapolis, always coming in contact with Jesus. The attempts made by certain recent Jewish writers to exonerate them from the guilt of the condemnation of Our Lord has no foundation; it is contradicted by the NT records, and the attitude of the Talm to Jesus.

The Pharisees appear in the Book of Acts to be in a latent way favorers of the apostles as against the high-priestly party. The personal influence of Gamaliel, which seems commanding, was exercised in their favor. The anti-Christian zeal of Saul the Tarsian, though a Pharisee, may have been to some extent the result of the personal feelings which led him to perpetuate the relations of the earlier period when the two sects were united in common antagonism to the teaching of Christ.
He, a Pharisee, offered himself to be employed by the Sadducean high priest (Acts 9.1.2) to carry on the work of persecution in Damascus. In this action Saul appears to have been in opposition to a large section of the Pharisaic party. The bitter disputes which he and the otheranger that he and his followers had carried on with Stephen had possibly influenced him.

When Paul, the Christian apostle, was brought before the Sanhedrin at J e r u s a l e m, the Pharisaic party were numerous in the city, and had many views. From Jos we learn that with the outbreak of the war with the Romans the Pharisees were thrust into the background by the more fanatical Zealots, Simon ben Giora and John of Gischala.
(Bd., V. i). The truth behind the Talmudic statements that Gamaliel removed the Sanhedrin to Jabneh and that Johanan ben Zakhai successfully entreated Vespasian to spare the scholars of that city is that the Pharisees in considerable numbers made peace with the Romans. In the Mish we have the evidence of their later labors when the Sanhedrin was removed from Jabneh, and the community met in Galilee. There under the guidance of Jehuda ha-Kaddish ("the Holy") the Mish was reduced to writing. It may thus be said that Judaism became Pharisaism, and the history of the Jews became that of the Pharisees. In a later period the opposition to Christianity sprang up anew and became embittered, as may be seen in the Talmudic fables concerning Jesus.

II. Doctrines of the Pharisees.—The account given of the doctrines of the Pharisees by Jos is clearly influenced by his desire to parallel the Jewish sects with the Gr philosophical schools. He directs special attention to the Pharasic .

ideas Sects differed very emphatically. He regards the Pharisaic position as midway between that of the Sadducees, who denied fate altogether and made human freedom absolute, and that of the Essenes that "all things are left in the hand of God." He says "The Pharisees ascribe all to fate and God, yet allow that to do what is right or the contrary is principally in man's own power, and do not necessarily promote the civil, human laws of the Pharisees, but are equally

fatum, "something decreed," than in relation to the impersonal moira, or heimarmené, of the Greeks. As Jos wrote in Gr and used only the second of these terms, he had no philological inducement to make the identification; the reason must have been the matter of fact. In other words, he shows that the Pharisees believed in a personal God whose will was provided.

In connection with this was their doctrine of a future life of rewards and punishments. The phrase which Jos uses is a peculiar one: "They think that every soul is immortal; only the souls of good men will pass into another body, but the souls of the evil shall suffer everlasting punishment" (Aidíl tímóríá kalózsehat). From this it has been deduced that the Pharisees held the transmigration of souls. In our opinion this is a mistake. We believe that really it is an attempt of Jos to state the doctrine of the resurrection of the body in a way that would not shock Hellenic ideas. The Gr contempt for the body made the idea of the resurrection abhorrent, and in this, as in most philosophical matters, the Romans followed the Greeks. It should seem that, as regards the Pharisees as maintaining that this resurrection applied only to the righteous. Still even this restriction, though certainly the natural interpretation, is not absolutely necessary. This is confirmed by the passage in the book of Antiquities (XVIII, i, 3): "They also believe . . . that under the earth there will be rewards or punishments, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life, and the latter are to be destined in an everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again." Jos also declares the Pharisees to be very attentive students of the law of God: "they interpret the law with careful exactitude." Nothing in the Gospels or the Acts at all militates against any part of this representation, but there is much to fill it out. They believed in

3. NT Pres-entations of Pharisaic Doctrines.

The connection it is probable that the present activity of such beings was the question in the mind of the writer. In that same sentence the belief in the resurrection is ascribed to the Pharisees.

Another point is that the bare letter of the Law they added traditions. While the existence of these traditions is referred to in the Gospels, too little is said to enable us to

4. Traditions Added to grasp their nature and extent (Mt. to the Law 15 2 ff.; 16 5 ff.; Mk 7 1-23). The evangelists only recorded these traditional glosses when they conflicted with the teaching of Christ and were therefore denounced by Him. We find them exemplified in the Mish. The Pharisaic theory of tradition was that these additions to the written law and interpretations of it had been given by Moses to the elders and by them had been transmitted orally down through the ages. The classical passage in the Mish is to be found in Pirke Abóbbá: "Moses received the [oral] Law from Sinai and delivered it to Joshua and Joshua to the elders, and the elders to the prophets and the prophets to the men of the congregation." Additions to these traditions were made by prophets by direct inspiration, or by interpretation of the words of the written Law. All this mass, as related above, was reduced to writing by Jehuda ha-Kaddish in Theresia, probably about the end of the 2d cent. AD. Jehuda was born, it is said, 135 AD, and died somewhere about 220 AD.

The related doctrines of the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, and the final judgment with its consequent eternal rewards and punishments formed a portion and a valuable portion of this tradition.

5. Traditional Interpretation of the Law by the Pharisees. Sometimes the ingenuity of the Pharisaic doctors directed to lighten the burden of the precepts added as a rule to the Sabbath. Thus a person was permitted to go much farther than a Sabbath day's journey if at some time previous he had departed within the jurisdiction of his house, and consequently from this all distances were to be ceremonially reckoned (Jos. R. 1 e. 2; "Erub").

The great doctrine of Pharisaic jurisprudence was the purely external. An act was right or wrong according as some external condition was present or absent; thus there was a difference in bestowing aims on the Sabbath whether the beggar put his hand within the door of the donor or the donor stretched his hand beyond his own threshold, as may be seen in the first Mish in the Talmud. It is clear that the Pharisaic tide that which with which to expedite the pace of the beast he was guilty, because he had laid a burden upon it.

Along with these traditions and traditional interpretations, the Pharisees were close students of the sacred text. On the turn of a sentence they suspended many decisions. So much so, that it is said of them that they suspended mountains from the Law. This has a bearing on textual criticism, even to the present day. A specimen of Pharisaic exegesis which Paul turns against their followers as an argumentum e contrario may be seen in Gal 3:16: "He saith not, And to seeds, as of one; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ."

(1) Messianic hopes.—It is also to be said for them, that they maintained the Messianic hopes of the nation when their rivals were ready to sacrifice everything to the Romans, in order to gain greater political influence for themselves. Their imagination ran riot in the pictures they drew of these future times, but still they aided the faith of the people who were thus in a position to listen to the claims of Christ. They were led by Rabbi Acha in the reign of Hadrian to accept Bar-Cochba about a century after they had rejected Jesus. They were fanatical in their obedience to the Law as they understood it, and died under untold tortures rather than transgress.

(2) Almsgiving.—They elevated almsgiving into an equivalent for righteousness. This gave poverty a very different place from what it had in Greece or among the Romans. Learning was honored, although its possessors might be very poor. The early life of Hilil brings this out. He is represented as being so poor as to be unable sometimes to pay the small daily fee which admitted pupils to the rabbinic school, and when this happened, in his eagerness for the Law, he is reported to have listened on the roof to the words of the teachers. This is probably not historically true, but it exhibits the Pharisaic ideal.

III. Organization of the Pharisaic Party.—We have no distinct account of this organization, either in the Gospels or in the Mish. As the close relationship which the members of the sect sustained to each other, their habit of united action as exhibited in the narratives of the NT and of Jos are thus most naturally explained. The Talmudic account of the Pharisee follows the earlier literature in the Mish. These were persons who primarily associated for the study of the Law and for the better observance of its precepts. No one was admitted to these hóbhārāṭh without taking an oath of fidelity to the society and a promise of strict observance of Levitical precepts.

One of the elements of their promise has to be noted. The bhārāṭh (Heb. to sign a状) was a full bhārāṭh, "heave offering," to a priest who had consecrated himself to his priestly duties. The candidate had to pass through a period of probation of 30 days, according to the "house of Shammai." (a) According to the "house of Shamai." This latter element, being quite more Talmudic, may be regarded as doubtful. Association with those not belonging to the Pharisee society was put under numerous restrictions. It is at least not improbable that when the lawyer in Jn 10:29 demanded "Who is my neighbor?" he was minded to restrict the instances of the command in Lev 19:18 to those who, like himself, Pharisees. A society which thus had brotherhoods all over Par and was separated from the rest of the community would naturally wield formidable power when their claims were supported by the esteem of the people at large. It is to be observed that to be a bhārāṭh was a purely personal thing, not heritable like priesthood, and women as well as men might be members. In this the Pharisees were like the Christians. In another matter also there was a resemblance between them and the followers of Jesus; they, too, were more eager to receive proselytes. Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte! (Mt 23:15)

Many members of Rom society, esp. women, were christened as, for instance, Poppaea Sabina.

IV. Character of the Pharisees.—Because the ideal of the Pharisee was high, and because they revered learning and character above wealth and civil rank, they had a tendency to despise those who did not agree with them. We see traces of this in the Gospels; thus Jn 7:49: "This multitude that knoweth not the law are accursed." The distinction between the Pharisees, the Puritans and the am hā-ārēc, "people of the land," has been traditionally that which had to be kept between the Jews and the Gentiles who had entered the land as colonists or intruders. These would, during the Bab captivity, almost certainly speak Western Aram., and would certainly be heathen and indulge in heathen practices. They were "the people of the land" whom the returning exiles found in possession of Judea.

Mingled with them were the few Jews that had neither been killed nor deported by the Babylonians, nor carried down into Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, the sons of Kereh. All they had conformed in a large measure to the habits of their heathen neighbors and intermarried with them, the stricter Jews, as Ezra and Nehemiah, regarded them as under the same condemnation as the heathen, and shrank from association with them. During the time of Our Lord's life on earth the name was practically restricted to the ignorant Jews whose conformity to the law was on a broader scale than that of the Pharisees. Some have, however, dated the invention of the name later in the days of the Macceban struggle, when the ceremonial precepts of the Law could with difficulty be observed. Those who were less careful of these were regarded as am hā-ārēc.

The distinction as exhibited in the Talm shows an arrogance on the part of the Pharisaic bhārāṭh that must have been galling to those who, though Jews as much as the Pharisees, were not Pharitians like them. These people, too, might not eat at the table of a man whose wife was of the am hā-ārēc, even though her husband might be a Pharisee. If he would be a full bhārāṭh, a Pharisee must not sell to any of the am hā-ārēc and this it was said could readily be translated. If a woman of the am hā-ārēc was left alone in a room, all that she could touch without moving from her place was unclean. We must, however, bear in mind that the evidence for this is Talmudic, and therefore of but limited historical value.

(1) Their scrupulosity.—We find traces of this scrupulosity in the Gospels. The special way in which the ceremonial sanctity of the

4. The NT Pharisees exhibited itself was in tithing, hence the reference to their tithing "safety and ease and cunning" (Mt 23:23). In the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican, one of the things that the Pharisee prides himself on is that he gives tithe of all he possesses (Lk 18:12). He is an example of the Pharisaic arrogance of those "who trusted in themselves that they were righteous and set them at nought." Their claiming the first seats in seats and synagogues (Mt 23:6) was an evidence of the same spirit.

(2) Their hypocrisy.—Closely akin to this is the hypocrisy of which the Pharisees were accused by Our Lord. When we call them "hypocrites," we must go back to the primary meaning of the word. They were essentially "actors," poses. Good men, whose character and spiritual force have impressed themselves on their generation, have often peculiarities of manner and tone which are easily imitated. In the same respect, as they are held by their disciples leads those who respect them to adopt unconsciously their mannerisms of voice and deportment. A later generation unconsciously imitates, "acts the part." In a time when religion is persecuted, as in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, or despised as it was in the Hellenizing times which preceded and succeeded, it would be the duty of religious men not to hide their convictions. The tendency to carry on this public manifestation of religious acts after it had ceased to be protest would be necessarily great. The fact that they gained credit by praying at street corners when the hour of prayer came, and would have lost credit with the people had they not done so, was not recognized by them as lessening the moral worth of the action. Those who, having lived in the period of persecution and contempt, survived in that when religion was held in respect would maintain their earlier practice without any "arriére-pensee." The succeeding generation, in continuing the practice, unconsciously had "inherited" them. They who pronounced hypocrisy was none the less real that it was reached by unconscious stages. Hypocrisy was a new sin, a sin only possible in a spiritual religion, a religion in which morality and worship were closely related. Heathenism, which lay in some way between, by which the gods could be bribed, or cajoled into favors, had a purely casual connection with morality; its worship was entirely a thing of externals, of acting, "posing." Consequently, a man did not by the most careful attention to the ceremonies of religion produce any presumption in favor of his trustworthiness. There was thus no sinister motive to prompt to religion. The prophets had denounced the insincerity of worship, but even they did not pronounce hypocrisy, i.e., a position used as a cloak for treachery or dishonesty. Religion had become more spiritual, the connection between morality and worship more intimate by reason of the persecution of the Seleucids.

The Talm to some extent confirms the representation of the Gospels. There were seven classes of Pharisees: (1) the "shoulder" Pharisee, who wears his good deeds on his shoulders; (2) the "canon" Pharisee, who places the precepts of the Law, not by principle, but from expedience; (2) the "law-writer" Pharisee, who could be prepared at any time in order to perform a meritorious action; (3) the "bleeding" Pharisee, who cut his finger to show that his suffering as a Christian was not in vain; (4) the "painted" Pharisee, who adorns himself in a novel dress so that any one should touch him so that he should be defiled: (5) the "reckoning" Pharisee, who is always saying, "What duty must I do to balance any unpalatable duty which I have neglected?"; (6) the "fearing" Pharisee, whose relative to God is one merely of trembling awe; (7) the Pharisee from "love," but the last there was an element of "acting," of hypocrisy. Talm denounces ostentation; but unconsciously that cost of time and trouble, that waste of their wealth and property - eousness: it commands an avoidance of ostentation which involves equal "posing."

V. Our Lord's Relationship to the Pharisees. — The attitude of the Pharisees to Jesus, to begin with, was in itself, as had been their attitude to John, critical. They sent representatives to watch His doings and His efforts to sayings and report. They seem to have regarded it as possible that He might unite Himself with them, although, as we think, His affinities rather lay with the Essenes. Gradually their criticism became opposition. This opposition grew in intensity as He disregarded their interpretations of the Sabboth law, ridiculed their refinements of the law of tithes and the distinctions they introduced into the validity of oaths, and denounced their insincere posing. At first there seems to have been an effort to cajole Him into compliance with their schemes of the Pharisee temple. But He used language which would compromise Him with the people or with the Rom authorities, others invited Him to their tables, which was going far upon the part of a Pharisee toward one not a habber. Even when He hung on the cross, the taunt with which they greeted Him may have had something of longing, lingering hope in it: "If He be the King of Israel, let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe him" (Mt. 27:42 AV). If He would only give them that sign, then they would acknowledge Him to be the Messiah. The opposition of the Pharisees to Jesus was intensified by another reason. They were the democratic party; their whole power lay in the reputation they had with the people for piety. Our Lord denounced them as hypocrites; moreover He had secured a deeper popularity than theirs. At length when calamity failed to win Him and sustained questioning failed to destroy His popularity, they combined with their co-religionists, the Sadducees, against Him as against a common enemy. On the other hand, Jesus denounced the Pharisees more than He denounced any other class of the people. This seems strange when we remember that the majority of the religious people, those who looked for the Messiah, belonged to the Pharisees, and His teaching and theirs had a strong external resemblance. It was this external resemblance, united as it was with a profound spiritual difference, which made it incumbent on Jesus to mark Himself off from them. All righteousness with them was external, it lay in meats and drinks and divers washings, in tithing of light, anise and cummin. He placed religion in a different footing, removed it into another region. With Him it was the heart that must be right with God, not merely the external actions; not only the outside of the cup and platter was to be cleansed, but the inside first of all. If that is observed above, the Pharisees were less antagonistic to the apostles when their Lord had left them. The after-history of Pharisaism has justified Our Lord's condemnation.

PHASEAH, fás'-e-á (פַּשֵּׁה, păshēh, "lame"): (1) A descendant of Judah, son of Eshton (1 Ch 4 12). (2) Name of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 49; Neh 7 51 AV "Phaseah"); "Phineo" of 1 Esd 5 31 RV). (3) Father of Joia (AV "Jeohazza"); the reparer of the "old gate" in Jerus (Neh 3 6).

PHASELIS, fás'-él-lis (פַּסְלִיס, Phaselis): A city of Lycia in Southern Asia Minor, on the seacoast, near the boundary of Pamphylia, to which country some ancient writers have assigned it. Situated on the extreme end of a promontory which projects into the sea, and with high mountains in the rear, it was separated both politically and geographically from the rest of Lycia. Hence it may be understood how it early became the favorite haunt of pirates already in the 6th cent. BC, when trade was carried on with Egypt, the city struck coins of its own; upon them the prow and the stern of a war galley were commonly represented. The coinage ceased in 466 BC, but it was resumed about 400 BC, when the city again became politically independant. For a time Phaselis was under the control of the Seleucid kings of Syria, but in 190 BC it again regained its independence or continued as a member of the league of Lycian cities (1 Mac 15 23). Before the beginning of the Christian era it had lost considerable of its earlier importance, yet it was still famed for its temple of Athene in which it was said that the sword of Achilles was preserved, and also for the altar of Zeus which was preserved. It figures little in early Christian history, yet in Byzantine times it was the residence of a bishop. Its site, now marked by the ruins of the stadium, temples and theater, bears the Turkish name of Tekir Ova. See also LYCIA.

PHILEMON, fi-lē'mon, fī-lē'mun (Φίλιμων, Philēmōn): Among the converts of St. Paul, perhaps while at Ephesus, was one whom he calls a "follower-worker," Philémon (Phil. ver 1). He was probably a man of some means, was celebrated for his hospitality (vs 5–7) and of considerable importance in the eccliesia at Colossae. It was at this house (ver 2) that the Colossian Christians met as a center. It is more than probable that this was a group of the Colossian church rather than the entire eccliesia. His wife was named Apphia (ver 2); and Archippus (ver 2) was no doubt his son. From Col 4 17 we learn that Archippus held an office of some importance in Colossae, whether he was a presbyter (Abbott, ICC), or an evangelist, or perhaps the reader (Zahn), we cannot tell. He is called here (ver 2) St. Paul's "follower-soldier." The relation between the Colossians and Philémon was so close and intimate that St. Paul does not hesitate to press him, on the basis of it, to forgive his slave, Onesimus, for stealing and for running away. See PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO.

PHILADELPHIA, fi-lad'el-fē'ā (Φιλαδέλφια, Philadelphía): A city of ancient Lydia in Asia Minor. It is on the modern city of Bergama which is 205 miles from Smyrna. It stood upon a terrace 650 ft. above the sea. Behind it are the volcanic cliffs to which the Turks have given the name of Devitt, or "inkwelle"; on the other side of the city the land is exceedingly fertile, and there was produced a wine of whose excellence the celebrated Rom poet Vergil wrote. Philadelphia is not so ancient as many of the other cities of Asia Minor, for it was founded after 189 BC on one of the highways which led to the interior. Its name was given to it in honor of Attalus II, because of his loyalty to his elder brother, Eumenes II, king of Lydia. Still another name of the city was Decapolis, because it was considered as one of the ten cities of the plain. A third name which it bore during the 1st cent. AD was Neo-kaisaria; it appears upon the coins struck during that period. During the reign of Vespasian, it was called Flavia. Its modern name, Alā-ṣhehīr, is considered by some to be a corruption of the Turkish words Alâ-ṣhehîr, "the city of God," but more likely it is a name given it from the reddish color of the soil. In addition to all of these names it sometimes bore the title of "Little Athens" because of the magnificence of the temples and other public buildings which adorned it. Philadelphia quickly became an important and wealthy trade center, for as the coast cities declined, it grew in power, and retained its importance even until late Byzantine times. One of the Seven Churches of the Book of Rev was there, and it was the see of a bishop. As in most Asia Minor cities, many Jews lived there, and they possessed a synagogue. During the reign of Tiberius the city was destroyed by an earthquake, yet it was quickly rebuilt. Frederick Barbarossa entered it while on his crusade in 1190. Twice, in 1036 and 1024, it was besieged by the Seljuk Turks, but it retained its independence until after 1390, when it was captured by the combined forces of the Turks and Byzantines. In 1403 Tamerlane captured it, and it is said, built about it a wall of the corpses of its inmates. Alā-ṣhehīr is still a Christian town; one-fourth of its modern population is Greek, and a Gr bishop still makes his home there. One of the chief modern industries is a liquoring factory; in the fields about the city the natives dig for the roots. On the terrace upon which the ancient city stood, the ruins of the castle and the walls may still be seen, and among them is pointed out the foundation of the early church. The place may now best be reached by rail from Smyrna. E. J. Banks PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO: This most beautiful of all St. Paul's Epp, and the most intensely human, is one of the so-called Captivity Epp. of which Eph, Col, and Phil are the others. Of these four Phil- epistles (q.v.) stand apart, and were written probably more properly after the other three. These are mutually interdependent, sent by the same bearer to churches of the same district, and under similar conditions. There is some diversity of opinion as to the place from which the apostle wrote the Epp. Certain scholars (Reuss, Schenkel, Weiss, Meyer) have urged Caesarea in opposition to the traditional place, Rome. The arguments advanced are first that Onesimus would have been more likely to have escaped to Caesarea than to Rome, as it is nearer Colossae than Rome is, to which we may reply that, though Caesarea is nearer, his chance of escape would have been far greater in the capital than in the provincial city. Again it is said that as Onesimus is not commended in Eph, he had already been left behind at Colossae; against which there are added the precarious value of an argument from silence, and the fact that this argument assumes a particular course which the bearers of the letters would follow, viz. through Colossae to Ephesus. A more forcible argument is that which is based on the apostle's expected visit. In Phil 2 24 we read that he expected to go to Macedonia and Asia, and in Phil 22 we find that he expected to go to Colossae. On the basis of this latter reference it is assumed that he was to the south of Colossae when writing and so at Caesarea. But it is quite possible that he would go to Colossae through Philippi as the reverse; and it is quite possible that even if he had intended... to go direct to Colossae when he wrote to Philemon, events may have come about to cause him to change his plans. The last argument, based on the omission of any reference to the earthquake in Asia Minor by Tacitus (Ann. xiv.27) and Eusebius (Chron., 0., 207) write, is of force as opposed to the Rom origin of the letters only on the assumption that these writers both refer to the same event (by no means sure) and that this event, were written after that event, and that it was necessary that St. Paul should have mentioned it. If the early chronology be accepted it falls entirely, as Tacitus' earlier date would be after the epp. were written. In addition we have the further facts, favorable to Rome, that St. Paul had no such freedom in Caesarea as he is represented in these epp. as enjoying; that no mention is made of Philip who was in Caesarea, and a most important member of that community (Acts 21:8), and finally that there is no probability that so large a body of disciples and companions could have gathered about the apostle in his earlier and more strict imprisonment, at Caesarea. We may therefore conclude that the Captivity Epp. were written from Rome, and not from Caesarea.

The evidence for the epistle is less extensive than that of some of the other epp., but it is abundantly strong. The play on the word 2. Authenti- tude—Onesimus which St. Paul himself uses (Phil. ver 11) is found in Ignat., Eph. 3:1. This may not mean necessarily a literary connection, but it suggests this. The ep. is known to Tertullian, and through him we know that Marcion accepted it (Adv. Marc., v.21). It is in the list in the Muratorian Fragment (p. 106, l. 27), and is quoted by Origen as a genuine Paul (Comm. in Jo. 19) and placed by Eusebius (HE, III, xxv) among the acknowledged books.

It has twice been the object of attack. In the 4th and 5th cents., it was opposed as unworthy of St. Paul's mind and as of no value for edification. This attack was met successfully by Jerome (Comm. in Phil., praef.), Chrysostom (Argum. in Philen) and Theodore of Mopsuestia (Spicil. in Solenem, I. 199), and the ep. was finally established in its earlier firm position. The later attack by Baur was inspired by his desire to break down the corroboration of Philen to the other Captivity epp., and has been refuted by Weiss as one of Baur's worst blunders. The suggestions that it is interpolated (Holtzmann), or allegorical (Weiss) and non-historical, are refuted by the references of Philen (Ep. Io, 21) to Sabinus (Stock), are interesting examples of the vagaries of the authors, that arise only to be mentioned' (24). In its language, style and argument the letter is clearly Pauline.

The date will, as is the case with the other Captivity epp., depend on the chronology. If the earlier scheme be followed it may be dated about 58, if the later about 63, or 64.

The apostle writes in his own and Timothy's name to his friend Philemon (q.v.) in behalf of Onesimus, a runaway slave of the latter. Beginning with his usual thanksgiving, here awakened by the report of Philemon's hospitality, he intercedes for his 'son begotten in his bonds' (ver 10), Onesimus, who though he is Philemon's runaway slave "there is no respect between thee and me," that the apostle pleads, urging his own age, and friendship for Philemon, and his present bonds. He pleads, however, without belittling Onesimus' wrongdoing, but assuming himself the responsibility for the amount of his theft. The appeal is quietly refined, in what Philemon really owes him as his father in Christ, and begs that he will not disappoint him in his expectation. He closes with the suggestion that he hopes soon to visit him, and with greetings from his companions in Rome.

The charm and beauty of this ep. have been universally recognized. Its value to us as giving a glimpse of St. Paul's attitude toward slavery and his intimacy with a man like Philemon cannot be overestimated. One of the chief elements of value in it is the picture it gives us of a Christian home in the apostolic days; the father and mother well known for their hospitable, warm, the man of position and importance in the church, the need of him and his going of the Christian brethren, and the life of the brotherhood centering about this household.

PHILETUS, fil'ī-tus, fil'i-tus (Φιλήτως, Filétos [2 Tim. 2:17]): This person is mentioned by Paul, who warns Timothy against him as well as against his associate in error, the Nature of Hymenaeus. The apostle speaks of his Error Hymenaeus and Philetus as instances of men who were doing most serious injury to the church by their teaching and by none of the things that teaching resulted in, both in faith and morals. The specific error of these men was that they denied that there would be any bodily resurrection. They treated all Scriptural references to such a state, as figurative or metaphorical. They spiritualized absolutely, and held that the resurrection was a thing of the past. No resurrection was possible, so they taught, except from ignorance, from sin to righteousness. There would be no day when the dead would hear the voice of Christ and come forth out of the grave. The Christian, knowing that Christ was raised from the dead, looked forward to the day when his body should be raised in the likeness of his resurrection. But this faith was utterly denounced by the teaching of Hymenaeus and Philetus.

2. How It Overthrew This teaching of theirs, Paul tells us, Faith had overthrown the faith of some. It would also overthrow Christian faith altogether, for if the dead are not raised, neither is Christ risen from the dead, and "ye are yet in your sins" (1 Cor 15:17).

The denial of the resurrection of the body, whether of mankind generally or of Christ, is the object of Paul's protest. He leads his hearers back to, no living Christ, who saves and leads and comforts His people. The apostle proceeds to say that teaching of this kind "eats as doth a gangrene," and that it increases unto more ungodliness. As a banker or gangrene eats away the flesh, so does such teaching eat away Christian faith. Paul is careful to say, more than once, that the teaching which denies that there will be a resurrection of the dead leads inevitably to "ungodliness" and to "iniquity." See Hymenaeus.

JOHN RUTHERFORD

PHILIP, fil'ip (Φίλιππος, Philippos, 'lover of horses');

(1) The father of Alexander the Great (1 Macc 1:1; 6:2), king of Macedonia in 359-336 BC. His influence for his son's place and power in hastening the decadence of the Gr. city-state and in the preparations he left to Alexander for the diffusion throughout the world of the varied phases of Gr. intellectual life.

(2) A Phrygian left to Antiochus Epiphanes as governor at Jesus (c 170 BC) and described in 2 Macc 6:22 as "more barbarous" than Antiochus himself, burning fugitive Jews who had assembled in caves near by "to keep the sabbath day secretly" (2 Macc 6:11) and taking special measures to check the opposition of Judas Macabeus (2 Macc 5:8). There is some ground for identifying him with...
(3) A friend or foster-brother of Antiochus (2 Macc 9:29), appointed by Antiochus on his deathbed as regent. Lyaeus already held the office of regent, having brought up Antiochus from his youth, and on the death of his father set him up as king under the name of Epator. The accounts of the rivalries of the regents and of the fate of Philip as recorded in 1 Macc 6:56; 2 Macc 9:29; Jos, Ant, XII, ix, 7, are not easily reconciled.

(4) Philip V, king of Macedonia in 220–179 BC. He is mentioned in 1 Macc 8:5 as an example of the great power of the Romans with whom Judas Maccabeus made a league on conditions described (op. cit.). The contact of Philip with the Romans coincided in time with that of Hannibal, after whose defeat at Zama the Romans were able to give undivided attention to the affairs of Macedonia. Philip was defeated by the Romans under Flaminius, at Cynoscephalae (197 BC), and compelled to accept the terms of the conquerors. He died in 179, and was succeeded by his son Perseus, last king of Macedonia, who lost his crown in his contest with the Romans. See Perseus.

PHILIP (Φιλίππος, Philippi): One of the Twelve Apostles. Philip belonged to Bethsaida of Galilee (Jn 1:44; 12:21). Along with Andrew and Philip, a fellow-townsmen, he had journeyed to Bethany to hear the teaching of John the Baptist, and there he received his first call from Christ, “Follow me” (Jn 1:43). Like Andrew, Philip immediately won a fresh follower, Nathanael, for Jesus (Jn 1:45). It is probable that he was the author of the apocryphal story of Philip’s journey into Egypt, which may be based on genuine records of Philip’s preaching in Ethiopia. Philip was the first of the Apostles to be martyred (Acts 8:1). He is described as having a “nimble wit” (cf. Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 50). Clement of Alexandria (Strm., iii.4, 25, and iv.9, 73) gives the tradition that Philip was a Levite, and the traditions of the church respectively by the use of the title of “The Preaching of St. Philip and St. Peter” (cf. Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 140), Phrygia was assigned to Philip. Both Philip and Andrew appeared to the disciples on the Mount of Olives, and “The Martyrdom of St. Philip in Phrygia” (Jn 12:23–33). See Apocryphal Gospels.

As with Andrew, Philip’s Gr name implies he had Gr connections, and this is strengthened by the fact that he acted as the spokesman of the Greeks at the Passover. Of a weaker acter mold than Andrew, he was yet the first to whom the risen Christ first appeared; he himself possessed an inquirer’s spirit and could therefore sympathize with their doubts and difficulties. The practical, strong-minded Andrew was naturally the man to win the impetuous, swift-thinking Peter, but the slow-moving Philip, versed in the Scriptures (cf. Jn 1:45), appealed more to the critical Nathanael and the cultured Greeks. Caution and deliberate himself, and desirous of admitting all truth to the test of sensuous experience (cf. Jn 6:68), he concluded the same criterion would be acceptable to Nathanael also (cf. Jn 1:45). It was the presence of this materialistic trend of mind in Philip that induced Jesus, in order to awaken in His disciple a larger and more spiritual faith, to put the question in Jn 6:69, seeking “to prove him.” This innate interest in the religious beliefs found expression in his outer life and conduct also. It was not merely modesty, but also a certain lack of self-reliance, that made him turn to Andrew for advice when the Greeks wished to see Jesus. The statement of his later life is, however, sufficient to show that he overcame those initial defects in his character, and fulfilled nobly the charge that his risen Lord laid upon him (cf. Mt 28:16–20).

PHILIP, THE EVANGELIST: One of “the seven” chosen to have the oversight of “the daily ministration” of the poor of the Christian community in Jerusalem (Acts 6:5). Whether Philip, bearing a Gr name, was a Hellenist, is not known, but his missionary work reveals to us one free from the religious prejudices of the strict Hebrew.

The martyrdom of Stephen was the beginning of a systematic persecution of the church in Jerusalem, and all except the apostles were scattered throughout Judaea and Samaria (Acts 8:1), and even as far as Phoenicia, Cyprus and Antioch (11:19). Thus the influence of the new teaching was extended, and a beginning made to the missionary movement. The story of Philip’s missionary labors is told in Acts 8:5 ff. He went to the chief city of Samaria, called Sebaste in honor of Augustus (Gr Sebastos). The Samaritans, of mixed Israelitish and gentile blood, had, in consequence of their being rigidly excluded from the Jewish church since the return from exile, built on Mt. Gerizim a rival sanctuary to the temple. To them Philip proclaimed the Christ and wrought signs, with the result that multitudes gave heed, and “were baptized, both men and women.” They had been under the influence of a certain Simon, who himself also believed and was baptized, moved, as the sequel proved, by the desire to learn the secret of Philip’s ability to perform miracles (see Simon Magus). The apostles (Acts 8:14) at Jerusalem informed Philip of the work Simon was doing at Samaria, and Philip was sent to help him. Philip met Simon at Lystra, and through his zeal in the work of the apostles, Philip was to encounter the evil spirit which had been turned from the church by sending Peter and John, who not only confirmed the work of Philip, but also themselves preached in many Samaritan villages.

The next incident recorded is the conversion of a gentleman who was, however, a worshipper of the God of Israel, a eunuch under Candace, queen of the Ethiopians. As he was returning from worshipping in the temple at Jerus, he was met by Philip on the road to Gaza. Philip expounded to him that portion of Isa 53 which he had been reading aloud as he sat in the cariot, and preached unto him Jesus. It is another sign of Philip's insight into the universality of Christianity that he baptized this eunuch who could not have been admitted into full membership in the Jewish church (Dt 23 1). See PERSIAN EUNUCH.

After this incident Philip went to Azotus (Ashdod), and then traveled north to Caesarea, preaching in the cities on his way. There he settled, for Luke records that Paul and his company abode in the house of Philip, "the evangelist," "one of the seven," for some days (Acts 21 8 ff.). This occurred more than 20 years after the incidents recorded in Acts 8. Both at this time and during Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea, Luke had the opportunity of hearing about Philip's work from his own lips. Luke records that Philip had 4 daughters who were preachers (Acts 21 9).

The Jewish rebellion, which finally resulted in the fall of Jerus, drove many Christians out of Pal, and among them Philip and his daughters. One tradition connects Philip and his daughters with Thessalonica in Asia, but in all probability the evangelist is confounded with the apostle. Another tradition represents them as dwelling at Tralles, Philip being the first bishop of the Christian community.

PHILIP, THE GOSPEL OF. See APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS; PHILIP THE EVANGELIST.

PHILIPPI, φιλιππη (Philippus, Philip, ethnic Φιλιππικος, Philippikos, Phil 4 15): A city of Macedonia, situated in 41° 5' N.

1. Position. Int. at. and Name. Egnatian Road, 33 Rom miles from Amphipolis and 21 from Acontismus, in a plain bounded on the E. and N. by the mountains which lie between the rivers Zygaetes and Nestus, on the W. by Mt. Pangaeus, on the S. by the ridge called in antiquity Symbolum, over which ran the road connecting the city with its seaport, Neapolis (q.v.), 9 miles distant. This plain, a considerable part of which is marshy in modern, as in ancient, times, is connected with the basin of the Strymon by the valley of the Angites (Herodotus vii.113), which also bore the names Gangas or Ganges (Appian, Bell. Rhet. of Macedonians,ivi.105), and on the northern side, Anghista. The ancient name of Philip was Crenides (Strabo vii.331; Diodorus xvi.3, 8; Appian, Bell. Civ. iv.105; Stephanus Byz. s.v.), so called after the springs which feed the river and the marsh; but it was refounded by Philip II of Macedon, the father of Alexander the Great, and received his name.

Appian (Bell. Civ. iv.105) and Harpocration say that Crenides was afterward called Daton, and that this name was changed to Philippoi, but this statement is open to question, since Daton, which became proverbial among the Greeks for good fortune, possessed, as Strabo tells us (vii.331 fr. 36), "admirably fertile territory, a lake, rivers, dockyards and productive gardens." But it is not far from Neapolis, as we have seen, only 9 miles inland. Many modern authorities, therefore, have placed Daton on the coast at or near the site of Neapolis. On the whole, it seems best to adopt the view of Hezezey (Mission archologique, 39, 62 ff.) that Philip founded Philippoi, and not Philipades, as has been supposed, which is a city, on the whole district which lay immediately to the E. of Mt. Pangaeus, including the Philippian plain and the seacoast about Neapolis. On the site of the old foundation of Crenides, from which the Or settler has perhaps been driven out by the Thracians about a century previously, the Thasians in 369 BC founded their colony of Daton with the aid of the exiled Athenian statesmen Callistratus, in order to exploit the wealth, both agricultural and mineral, of the beginnings (Acts of Philip's ascension the Macedonian throne in 359 BC, the possession of this spot seemed of the utmost importance. Not only is the plain itself well watered and of extraordinary fertility, but a strongly fortified post planted here would secure the natural land-route from Europe to Asia and protect the eastern frontier of Macedonia against Thracian intruders. Above all, the mines of the district might meet his most pressing need, that of an abundant supply of gold. The city was therefore seized in 358, the city was enlarged, strongly fortified, and renamed, the Thasian settlers either driven out or reinforced, and the mines, worked with characteristic energy, produced over 1,000 talents a year (Diodorus xvi.8) and enabled Philip to issue a gold coin (thundering) worth over 5 specie in the West and 10 in the East. The coin, now called Philip's darics (G. F. Hill, Historical Greek Coins, 80 ff). The revenue thus obtained was of inestimable value to Philip, who not only used it for the development of the Macedonian army, but also proved himself a master of the art of bribery. His reputation was such that he was known that no fortress was impregnable to whose walls an ass laden with gold could be driven. Of the history of Philip during the next 3 centuries we know practically nothing. Together with the rest of Macedonia, it passed into the Roman hand after the battle of Pydna (168 BC), and fell in the first of the four regions into which the country was then divided (Livy xlv.29). In 146 the whole of Macedonia was formed into a single Roman province. But the mines seem to have been almost, if not quite, exhausted by this time, and Strabo (viii.331 fr. 41) speaks of Philip as having sunk by the time of Caesar to a "small settlement" (καρυαλ αμφι, κατακλιθα αμφι). In the autumn of 42 BC it witnessed the death-struggle of the Rom republic. Brutus and Cassius, the leaders of the band of conspirators who had assassinated Julius Caesar, were faced by Octavian, who 15 years later became the Emperor Augustus, and Antony. In the first engagement the forces of Brutus and Cassius were defeated by Octavian, while Antony's forces were victorious over those of Cassius, who in despair put an end to his life. Three weeks later the second and decisive conflict took place. Brutus was compelled by his impatient soldiery to give battle, his troops were routed and he himself fell on his own sword. Soon afterward Philip was made a Rom colony with the title Colonia Iulia Philippensis. After the battle of Actium (31 BC) the colony was reinforced, largely by Ital parishers who were dispatched in order to afford allotments for Octavian's veterans (Dio Cassius li.4), and its name was changed to Colonia Augusta Iulia (Vitriz) Philippensium. It received the much-coveted ius Italicum (Digest L. 15, 8, 8), which involved numerous privileges, the chief of which was the immunity of its territory from taxation. In the course of his second missionary journey Paul set sail from Troas, accompanied by Silas (who bears his full name Silvanus in 3. Paul's Letters, 1 Thess 1 1; 2 Thess First Visit 1 1), Timothy and Luke, and on the following day reached Neapolis (Acts 16 11). Thence he journeyed by road to Philippi, first crossing the pass some 1,600 ft. high, which leads over the mountain ridge called Symbolum and afterward traversing the Philippian plain. Of his experiences there we have in Acts 16 12-40 a singly full and graphic account. On the Sabbath, presumably the first Sabbath after their arrival, the apostle and his companions went out to the bank of the Agiotes, and there spoke to the women, some of the philosophers, who had come together for purposes of worship.

One of these was named Lydia, a Gr proselyte from Thyatira, a city of Lydia in Asia Minor, to the church of which she had added the anonymous message recorded in Acts 16:14-15. She is described as a "seller of purple." (Acts 16:14), that is, of woven fabrics dyed purple, for the manufacture of which her native city was famous. Whether she was the agent in Philippi of some firm in Thyatira or whether she was carrying on her trade independently, we cannot say: her name suggests the possibility that she was a freedwoman, while from the fact that we hear of her household and her house (ver. 15; vs 40), though no mention is made of her husband, it has been conjectured that she was a widow of some property. She accepted the apostolic message and was baptized with her household (ver. 15), and insisted that Paul and his companions should accept her hospitality during the rest of their stay in the city (see further Lydia).

All seemed to be going well when opposition arose from an unexpected quarter. There was in the town a girl, in all probability a slave, who was reputed to have the power of oucing oracles. Her inscriptions (vill. 111) of an arch of Dionysus situated among the Thracian tribe of the Satræ, probably not far from Philippi; but there is no reason to connect the soothsaying of this girl with that worship. In any case, her masters repaid a rich fee for the service by accusing the apostle Paul, troubled by her repeatedly following him and those with him crying, "These men are bond-servants of the most High God, who proclaim unto you a way of salvation." (Acts 16:17 m), turned and commanded the spirit in Christ's name to come out of her. The immediate restoration of the girl to a sane and normal condition convinced her masters that all prospect of further gain was gone, and they therefore seized Paul and Silas and dragged them into the forum before the magistrates, probably the Δουάνιοι who stood at the head of the colony. They accused the apostles of creating disturbance in the city and of advocating customs, the reception and practice of which were illegal for Rom citizens. The rabble of the market-place joined in the attack (ver. 22), whereupon the magistrates, accepting without question the accusers' statement that Paul and Silas were Jews (ver 20) and forgetting or ignoring the possibility of their possessing Rom citizenship, thereupon threatened Paul and Silas, the attendants licenti and afterward to be imprisoned. In the prison they were treated with the utmost rigor; they were confined in the innermost ward, and their feet put in the stocks. About midnight, as they were engaged in praying and singing hymns, while the other prisoners were listening to them, the building was shaken by a severe earthquake which threw open the prison doors. The jailer, who was on the point of taking his own life, reassured by Paul reassuring the slave girl by her attentions, but Silas into his house where he tended their wounds, set food before them, and, after hearing the gospel, was baptized together with his whole household (vs 23-34).

On the morrow the magistrates, thinking that by dismissing from the town those who had been the cause of the previous day's disturbance they could best secure themselves against any repetition of the disorder, sent the licenti to the jailer with orders to release them. Paul refused to accept a dismissal of that kind, and the slave-girl whom he had illegally exempt from scourging, which was regarded as a degradation (1 Thess. 2:2), and the wrong was aggravated by the publicity of the punishment, the absence of a proper trial, and the imprisonment which followed. (Acts 16:17). Delivered from prison Paul declared his citizenship when the scourging was inflicted, but in the confusion and excitement of the moment his protest had been unheard or unheeded. Now, however, it produced a deep impression on the magistrates, who came in person to ask Paul and Silas to leave the city, and give their hosts and encouraging the convets to remain firm in their new faith, set out by the Egnatian Road for Thessalonica (vs 38-40). How long they had stayed in Philippi we are not told, but the fact that the foundations of a church had been laid and the phrase "for many days" (ver 18) lead us to believe that the time must have been a longer one than appears at first sight.

Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 226) thinks that Paul left Thessalonica in October, 50 AD, and stayed at Philippi until nearly the end of the year; but this chronology cannot be regarded as certain.

Several points in the narrative of these incidents call for fuller consideration. (1) We may notice, first, the very small part played by Jews and Judaism at Philippi.

There was no synagogue here, as at Salamine in Cyprus (Acts 13:5), Antioch in Pisidia (13:14, 43), Iconium (14:1), Ephesus (18:19, 20), and Athens (17:10). Athens (17:14), Corinth (18:4). The number of resident Jews was small, their meetings for prayer or discussion on the religious basis, the synagogues were mostly or wholly women (16, 13), and among them some, perhaps a majority, were proselytes. Of Jewish converts we hear nothing, nor is there any word of Jews as either inscribing or joining the mob which draged Paul and Silas to the market-place (Acts 16:27-29). The whole tone of the ep. to this church seems to prove that it at least early, if not at first, teaching was not being undermined by Jews. True, there is one passage (Phil 3:2-7) in which Paul denounces "the conclusion." Those who had confidence in the flesh did not hesitate, but it seems "that in this warning he was thinking of Romans more than of Philippi; and that his indignation was aroused by the vexation which they must have to have a man of that age and standing as a public preacher." Thereafter he confided at his daily work, than by any actual errors already determined the faith of his distant converts (2:6).

(2) Even more striking is the prominence of the Rom element in the narrative. We are here not in a Gr or Jewish city, but in one of those Rom colonies which Athenius Geisslen describes as "miniatures and pictures of the Rom people" (Notices Atticorum, xvi. 15).

In the center of the city is the forum (βασιλικά, φόρους, ευρήκα), a well-ordered and regular polis form, with the usual evényn, the exarch of the city of the provinces (Acts 26:32), and the magistrates, EX "magistrates," ev 20. 22.5:36.38; these officers are attended by lictors (σεργιάκοι, τουρχές, χεριόν), EV "sergents," who bear the fasces with which they scourged Paul and Silas (Acts 16:22, 28), regarded as that are of the public order (Acts 26:32), and the magistrates are represented as Rom law (vs 20, 21), and Paul's appeal to his Rom status (ver 23), are once inspired by the fear for the consequences of their action and made them conciliatory and apologetic (vs 33, 39). The title of praetor borne by these officials has caused some difficulty. The supreme magistrates of Rom colonies, two in number, were called Δουάνιοι or Δουάνειοι (just doers), and that this title was in use at Philippi is proved by three inscriptions (Orelli, No. 3784, Heuzey, Mission archéologique, 13, 137). The most probable explanation of the discrepancy is that these magistrates assumed the title of praetor, or that it was commonly applied to them, as was certainly the case in some parts of the Rom world (Cicero: De leg. agraria xii.34; Horace: Sat. i. 5, 34; Orelli, No. 3595).

(3) Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 200 ff) has brought forward the attractive suggestion that Luke was himself a Philippian, and that he was the "man of Macedonia" who appeared to Paul at Troas with the invitation to enter Macedonia (Acts 16 9).

In any case, the change from the 3d to the 1st person in ver 10 marks the point at which Luke starts to speak for the apostle, and the same criterion leads to the conclusion that Luke remained in Thessalonica with Paul's Farr and his third visit to the city (see below). Ramsay's hypothesis would explain (a) the fulness and vividness of the narrative (Acts 16 1), and (b) the emphasis on the importance of Philippi (ver 12); and (c) the fact that Paul remembered as a Macedonian the man whom he saw in his vision, although there is no mention in the language, features or dress of Macedonians to mark them out from other Greeks. Yet Luke was clearly not a householder at Philippi (ver 15), and early tradition refers to him as an Antiochene (see, however, Ramsay, op. cit. 300 f.).

(4) Much discussion has centered round the description of Philippi given in Acts 16 12. The reading of N A C etc. (K, F, Ry, etc.) is:

στήσας μεταφέρειν τὸ μέτωπον Μακεδονίας πάλιν ἔκθειν. Μᾶς ēν αὐτῷ τῆς μεταφέρει τὸ μέτωπον Μακεδονίας πάλιν ἔκθειν. But it is doubtful whether Macedonia is to be taken with the word which precedes or with that which follows, and further the sense derived from the phrase is unsatisfactory. Further, Paul must mean either (1) first in political importance and radiating from Philippi which was the nearest the capital of the province was reached. But the capital of the province was Thessalonica, and the fact that to reach that city it was the easiest route and the most direct one to the capital, although the word here is not used, is not at all unusual. The word is used in Luke 14 22; but it is not used in Acts 21 28, where Paul went to Rome, but was not released to go to Macedonia, by the emperor, until after the completion of the work at Ephesus.

5. Later Visits to Philippi. Luke has not overtaken the story of the second visit to Philippi, although it is mentioned as having taken place in Acts 16 10. The second visit appears to have been for a much longer time, and it was after this visit that Paul ordained the deacons and deacons' assistants in Philippi (Acts 16 4). The second visit of Paul to Philippi is described in Acts 20 5, where Paul visits the city, and the report that the city was founded by Philip the tetrarch is mentioned (cf. Antiochene History of Macedonia, II, 1 ff. Perrot, "Les ruines de Philibodjik, but the site is now uninhabited, the nearest village being that of Rakhtcha in the hills immediately to the N. of the ancient Acropolis. This latter and the Acropolis have been explored seriously and systematically excavated has yet been undertaken. Of the extent remains the most striking are portions of the Helenic and Hellenistic fortification, the scanty vestiges of the theater, the ruin known among the Turks as Derekale, "the columns," which perhaps represents the ancient thermae, traces of a temple of Silvanus with numerous rock-cut reliefs and inscriptions, and the remains of a triumphal arch (Kiemer).

LITERATURE

I. Paul and the Church at Philippi.—Paul was on his second missionary journey in the year 52 AD. He felt that he felt Philippi naturally included in many of his plans. He had had a particular distaste for a certain city in Galatia. The Spirit would not permit him to preach in Asia, and when he essayed to enter Bithynia the Spirit again would not suffer it. Baffled and perplexed, the apostle with his two companions, Silas and Timothy, went on to the seacoast and stopped in Troas. Here at last his leading became clear. A vision of a man from Macedonia convinced him that it was the will of God that he should preach in the western continent of Europe. The way was opened for him, and in Macedonia the Macedonians became Paul's favorite people. In two days he came to Neapolis. At once he took the broad paved way of the Via Egnatia up to the mountain pass and down on the other side to Philippi, a journey of some 8 miles. There was no uncertainty in his mind as to the reception of his teaching, for the peripatetic Jewish sect, with little company of Jews gathered for Sabbath worship at “a place of prayer” (προσευχή, proseuchē, Acts 16:13), about a mile to the W. of the city gate on the shore of the river Gangites (see Προσευχή). Paul and his companions came to the women gathered there, and Lydia was converted. Later, a maid with the spirit of divination was exercised. Paul and Silas were scourged and thrown into prison, an earthquake set them free, the jailer became a believer, the magistrates repented their treatment of men who were Rom citizens and besought them to leave the city (Acts 16:6-40). Paul had had his first experience of a Rom scourging and of lying in the stocks of a Roman prison at Philippi, yet he went on his way rejoicing, for a company of disciples had been formed, and he had won the devotion of loyal and loving hearts for himself and his Master (see PHILIPPI). That was worth all the persecution and the pain. The Christians at Philippi seem to have been Paul's favorites among all his converts. He never lost any opportunity of visiting them and refreshing his spirit with their presence in the after-years. Six years later he was resident in Ephesus, and he wrote to Corinth with a letter to the Corinthians and being in doubt as to the spirit in which it would be received, he appointed a meeting with Titus in Macedonia, and probably spent the anxious days of his waiting at Philippi. If he met Titus there, he may have written 2 Cor in that city (2 Cor 2:13; 7:6). Paul returned to Ephesus, and after the riot in that city he went over again into Macedonia and made his third visit to Philippi. He probably promised the Philippians at this time that he would return to Philippi to celebrate the Easter week with his beloved converts there. He went on into Greece, but in 3 months he was back again, at the festival of the resurrection in the year 58 AD (Acts 20:2.6). We read in 1 Tim. 1:3 that Paul visited Macedonia after the Rom imprisonment. He enjoyed himself among the Philippians. They were Christians after his own heart. He thanks God for their fellowship from the first day until now (Phil 1:3). He declares that they are his beloved who have always obeyed, not in his presence only, but also in his absence (2 Tim. 1:5). With fond repetition he addresses them as his brethren, beloved and longed for, his joy and crown, his beloved (4:1). This was Paul's favorite church, and we can gather from the ep. good reason for this fact.

II. Characteristics of the Church at Philippi.—(1) It seems to be the least Jewish of all the Pauline churches. There were few Jews in Philippi. No Heb names are found in the list of converts in this church mentioned in the NT. The Jewish opponents of Paul seem never to have established themselves in the community. (2) Women seem to be unusually prominent in the history of this church, and this is consistent with what we know concerning the position accorded to woman in Macedonian society. Lydia brings her whole family to Christ, and her husband, who was very influential woman, and her own fervor and devotion and generosity and hospitality seem to have been contagious and to have become characteristic of the whole Christian community. Euodia and Syntyche are mentioned in the ep. two women to have fellow-laborers with Paul in the gospel, for both of whom he has great respect, of both of whom he is sure that their names are written in the book of life, but who seem to have differed with each other in some matter of doctrine or practice. The women of the same mind in the Lord (4:2). The prominence of women in the congregation at Philippi or the dominance of Lydia's influence among them may account for the fact that they seem to have been the more minded to produce their converts. Of the other converts were. They raised money for Paul's support and forwarded it to him again and again. They were anxious that he should have all that was needful. They were willing to give of their time and their means to the Lord and His work. There have been no theological differences in their company. That may testify to the fact that the most of them were women. (3) There were splendid men in the church membership too. Some of them were Macedonians and some of them were Rom veterans.

Hausrath declares that the Macedonians represented the "nobiest and soundest part of the ancient world. . . . Here was none of the shuffling and the indecision of the Aristocrats, none of the impertinent levity of the Gr communities. . . . They were men of sternness and purity, which could be found in Asia Minor or languorous Syria. The material was harder to work in, and offered more stubborn resistance; but the work, once done, endured. A new Macedonian phalanx was formed here, a phalanx of Pauline Christians. . . . Paulines, as Athesians, lost themselves in the national ideal, whereas others, who felt the gravita- tion of history, were equally reforming and active characteristics of the history of the Christian church. . . . They were always true to Paul, always obedient, always helpful" (Time of the Apostles, III, 205-4).
sacrifice and service of their faith (2:17). He calls Epaphroditus not only his fellow-worker but his fellow-soldier (2:25). He likens the Christian life to a race in which that one is the third and the other a more.close runner (3:14). He asks the Philippians to keep even, solidly step by step in the Christian walk (3:16). These metaphors have a wide applicability to the athletic and military race in which they bear their testimony to the high regard which Paul had for them. Christianity and other sects in which they live were compared. We do not know the names of many of these men, for only Clement and Epaphroditus are mentioned, but we gather that each conceives of their spirit from this ep. and we are as sure as Paul himself that their names are all written in the book of life (4:3).

(1) If the constituent elements of the church at Philippi fairly represented the various elements of the population of the city, they must have been cosmopolitan in character. Philippi was an old Macedonian city which had been turned into a Rom. colony. It was both Gr and Rom. in its characteristics. Christianity had been introduced here by two Jews, who were Rom. citizens, and a Jewish son of a gentle father. In the account given of the founding of the church in Acts 16 three converts are mentioned as influential in this religion—one is a Jewish proselyte from Tyre, one a native Greek, and one a Rom. official. The later converts doubtless represented the same diversity of nationality and the same differences in social position. Yet, apart from those two good women, Eunice and Syntyche, there were all of our mind in the Lord. It is a remarkable proof of the fact that in Christ all racial and social conditions may be brought into harmony and made to live together in peace. (5) They were a very liberal people and devoted themselves to the Lord and to Paul (2 Cor 8:5), and whenever they could help Paul or further the work of the gospel they gave gladly and willingly and up to the limit of their resources, and then they hypothecated their credit and gave beyond their power (2 Cor 8:5). Every time Paul was astonished at their giving. He declares that they gave out of much affliction and deep poverty, that they abounded in their bounty, and that they were rich only in their liberty (2 Cor 8:2).

Sured these are unusual encomiums. The Philippians must have been a very unusual people. If the depth of one's consecration and the reality of one's religion are to be measured by the extent to which it affects the position of one’s material possessions, if one measure of Christian character is in Christ’s Church, then the Philippians may well stand supreme among the saints in the Pauline churches. Paul seems to have loved them, cared for them, and followed them, and contributed toward his support. Elsewhere he refused and held back, but here he immediately and unstintingly responded to his plea of self-support while he was preaching the gospel. He made the single exception in the case of the Philippians. He must have been sure of their affection and of their confidence. Four times they gave Paul pecuniary aid. Twice they sent him their contributions just after he had left them and gone on to Thessalonica (4:15-16). When Paul had proceeded to Corinth and was in want during his ministry there his heart was gladdened by the visitation of brethren from Philippi, who supplied the measure of his want (2 Cor 11:8,9). It was not a first enthusiasm forgotten as soon as the engendering personality of the apostle was removed from their sight. It was genuine attachment that prompted their gifts. They gave to their own dear apostle, but only that he might minister to others as he had ministered to them. He was their living link with the work in the mission field.

Eleven years passed by, and the Philippians heard that Paul was in prison at Rome and again in need of their help. Eleven years are enough to make quite radical changes in a church membership, but these Philippians were not—wordly spirit or the liberty of the Philippian church in that time. The Philippians hastened to send Epaphroditus to Rome with their contributions and their greetings. It was like a bouquet of fresh flowers in the prison cell. Paul writes this ep. to thank them that their thought for him had blossomed afresh at the first opportunity they had had (4:10). No wonder that Paul loved them and was proud of them and made their earnestness and sincerity and affection the subject of comparison with the love of others (2 Cor 8:8).

III. Characteristics of the Epistle.—It is a letter. It is not a treatise, as Rom, He, and 1 Jn are. It is not an encyclical full of general observations and exhortations capable of application at any time and anywhere, as the Ep. to the Eph. and the Ep. of James and the Ep. of Peter are. It is a simple letter to personal friends. It has no theological discussions and no rigid outline and no formal plan. It rambles along just as any real letter would with personal news and personal feelings and outbursts of personal affection between tried friends. It is the most spontaneous and unaffected of the Pauline Ep. It is often epistolary than any of the others addressed to the churches.

It is a letter of love. All of the other ep. have mixed feelings manifest in them. Sometimes a feeling of grief and of indignation is dominant, as in 2 Cor. Sometimes the utmost desire of Paul in his writing seems to be the establishment of the truth against the assault of its foes, as in Gal and Rom. Always more or less fault is suggested in the recipients of the warnings and the exhortations Paul feels compelled to write to them. Occasionally there is no fault to be found. The only suggestion of such a thing is in the reference to the difference of opinion between Euodia and Syntyche, and while Paul thinks this ought to be harmonized, he does not seem to consider it any more serious menace to the peace of the church. Aside from this Paul has nothing but praise for his beloved brethren and prayer that their love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and all discernment (4:9). He is full of thankfulness upon all his remembrance of them (1:3). He rejoices in the privilege of being offered upon the sacrifice and service of their faith (2:17). The church at Philippi may not have been conspicuous in charisms as the church at Corinth was, but it had the fruits of the Spirit in rich measure. Paul seems to think that it needed only to rejoice in its spiritual possessions and to grow in grace and in the mind of Christ. His heart is full of gratitude and love as he writes. He rejoices as he thinks of them. His joy and triumph over present affliction and the prospect of persecution and death. If this is his last will and testament to his beloved church, as Holtzmann calls it, he has nothing to bequeath them but his unqualified and unreserved love. He has left them from the first, he loves them to the end.

It is a letter of joy. It was Bengel who said, Summa epistolae: gaudia, gaudia, "The sum of the ep. is, I rejoice; rejoice ye." Paul was a man whose spirits were unmuted in any circumstances. He might be scourged in one city and stoned in another and imprisoned in a third and left for dead in a fourth, but as long as he retained consciousness and as soon as he regained consciousness he rejoiced. Nothing could dampen his ardor. Nothing could disturb his peace. In Philippi he had been scourged and cast into the inner prison and his feet had been made fast in the stocks, but at midnight he and Silas were singing hymns of praise to God. He is in prison now in Rome, but he is still rejoicing. Some men would have been discouraged in such circumstances. Wherever Paul had gone his preaching had been despised, and he had been persecuted. The Jews had slandered him and harassed him, and so his friends had to do likewise. He was fickle and false. The years had gone by and the breach between him and his brethren had widened rather than lessened, and at last they succeeded in getting him into prison and keeping him there for years. But in the case of Paul, it was far less so in that ancient day than it is now.

Paul was such an ardent spirit. It was more difficult for him to be confined than it would be for a more indolent man. He was a world-missionary, a restless cosmopolite ranging up and down through the continents with the message of the Christ. It was like putting an Ethiopian in a cage. Many expected hope and die in imprisonment. Paul was not moping. He was writing this Ep. to the Phil and saying to them, 'I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ; it is the power of God unto salvation, among the Jews (1), but more abundantly among the Gentiles.' He was free to do and say what they pleased, and they were making the most of the opportunity. He could no longer thwart or hinder them. Some men would have broken out into loud lamentations and complaints. Some men would have become nervous about the outcome of the cause. The faith of even John the Baptist failed in prison. He could not believe that things were going right if he were not there to attend to them. Paul’s faith never wavered. His hope never waned. His joy was loud, and his manner was grand. He was in a manner. He did not bear the sense of his doom and the consciousness of death as a king would bear the knowledge of it if he had been confined to his castle. Did he hear the step of the jailor and the bar that opened to let him out, and then the last howl of the guards and the falling of the clamor of the city? Or did he hear the opening of the grave and then the tell-tale sigh of the earth and the whisper of the earth as it became loosed from the bonds of gravity and the rattle of the bones like a sheepherder’s bell? Did he sit up, say, ‘I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith,’ and then pass into his grave?

It is of great importance theologically. It is one of the paradoxes to which Bible students are most accustomed in Paul’s writings that this simplest of his letters, most epistolary and most personal, should contain the fullest and most important teaching of the theology of the New Testament. It came from his pen. He has only a practical end in view. He is exhorting the Philippians to humility, and he says to them, ‘Have this mind which was in Christ which emptied himself and then was exalted’ (5-11). It is the most theological passage in the epistle. It is one of the most doctrinally important in the NT. It is Paul’s final contribution to the solution of the great mystery of the coming of the Saviour and the economy of salvation. It is his last word, at any length, on this subject. He states plainly the fact of the kingdom, the moral of the redemption, the certainty of the exaltation, and the sure hope of the universal adoration in the end. The most vivid, the most original, the most comprehensive, the most definite of his allusions is found in form as a man, a genuine man obedient to God in all His life. He always maintained that attitude toward God which we ought to maintain and which we can maintain in our humanity, in which He was on an equality with us. We ought to have the mind which was in Christ. He humbled Himself and became obedient. He was obedient through life and obedient unto death, yea, even unto the death of the cross. It is a great passage, setting forth profoundest truths in the tersest manner. It is the crowning revelation concerning Jesus in the Pauline Epistles. It represents Paul’s most mature thought and most mature philosophy.

IV. Genuineness of the Epistle.—The genuineness of the ep. is generally admitted today. It was in the Catholic Church’s Canon, or its name was placed as the Muratorian Fragment. It is found in both the Pesh and the Syriac. It is quoted in the letter of the churches of Lyons and Vienne, in the Ep. of Diognetus, and in the writings of Tertullian and Justin. Paul’s letter was attributed to Paul as an attack upon its authenticity. He declared that it was not dictated to him, and that it was not written by a secretary. It was a crown of victories that it was full of shallow imitations of these. He said it had no apparent motive and no connected argument and that its style was abnormal. He wrote it in the 4th century. It was a perfect imitation of Paul’s Epistle to the Philippians. It was mentioned among them. The genuineness of the ep. has been defended by Weissecker, Tischendorf, Scholten, Hilgenfeld, Harnack, Holtzmann, Mangold, Lipsius, Renan, Godet, Zahn, Davidson, Lightfoot, Parra, and many others, and by almost all of the Eng. writers on the subject. Weissecker says that the reasons for attributing the ep. to the apostle are cogent. Many enemies of the apostle, says he, are simply inconceivable that anyone else would or could have produced this name a letter so full of theological or ecclesiastical motive can be discovered, and in which the personal element so largely predominates and the spirit of the apostle so completely dominates. It is of great vividness and fidelity. The ep. deserves to rank alongside of the Apocrypha, and must stand as a work of Paul’s pen, and as a coordinate standard by which to test the genuineness of other and less certain writings.

The Place, Date and Occasion of Writing.—This is one of the prison ep. (see PHILEMON). Paul makes frequent reference to his bonds (7, 13, 14, 17). He was for 2 years a prisoner in Caesarea (Acts 24, 27). Paul and others have been written about this imprisonment; but the references to the prastorian guard and the members of Caesar’s household have not been enough to conclude that the Rom imprisonment was the one to which the ep. refers. Philem, Col and Eph were all written during the first imprisonment, and these three form a group by themselves. Phil is evidently separated from them by some interval. Was it written earlier or later than they? Beilec, Lightfoot, Sanday, Hort, Beet and others think that the Ep. to the Phil was written after or during his imprisonment. But I am not so sure. I agree with Zahn, Ramsay, Findlay, Shaw, Vincent, Jülicher, Holtzmann, Weiss, Godet, and others, who argue for the writing of Phil toward the close of the Rom imprisonment.

Their reasons are as follows: (1) We know that some considerable time must have elapsed after Paul’s arrival at Rome before he could have written this ep.; for the news of his arrival had been carried to Philippi and a contribution to his needs had been raised among his friends there; and Epaphroditus had carried it to Rome. In Rome, Epaphroditus had become seriously sick, and the news of this sickness had been carried back to Philippi and the Philippians had sent back a message of sympathy to him. At least four trips between Rome and Philippi are thus indicated, and there are intervals of several years. (2) The greater or lesser imprisonment mentioned between the two cities was some 700 miles. Communication was not easy in those days. (3) The journey from Brundisium to the Egnatian Way, which led directly to Philippi, was about 700 miles. (4) It was not a short journey at all. (5) It would occupy a month at least, and the four journeys suggested in the ep. were not in direct succession. (2) Paul says that the bonds (20) which had been known throughout the whole prastorian guard (13). It must have taken some time for this to become possible. (3) The conditions outside the prison, where Christ was being preached, by some in a spirit of love, and by others in a spirit of faction, cannot be located in the earliest months of Paul’s sojourn in Rome (15-17). They must belong to a time when Christianity had developed in the city and parties had been formed in the church. (4) Luke was well known at Philippi. Yet he sends no salutation to the Philippians. In this ep. he would surely have done so if he had been with Paul at the time of its writing. (5) He writes in the name of the Romans, Colossians, and so was Demas (Col 4, 14). In this ep. Paul promises to send Timothy to Philippi, and says, ‘I have not said anything of your state” (20). This must mean that Aristarchus, Demas and Luke were all gone. They had all been with him when he wrote the other ep. (5) His condition as a prisoner seems to have changed for the worse. He had enjoyed comparative liberty. It is determined that he be imprisioned at Rome. Living in his own hired house and accessible to anyone, he has been now removed, possibly to the guardroom of the other prisoners. Here he was in more rigorous confinement, in want and in sorrow. (6) Paul quotes some of the most historical data and suspected gnostic influence in certain passages of this Ep. as if they were partly derived from a perverted interpretation of certain passages in the ep.: they partly rested upon arbitrary history and documents; and he was so weak that it had to be believed that he could have attached any importance to them himself. It is not surprising that few critics have been willing to follow Baur’s leadership at this point. Biederman, Ewald, Kneucker, Hirt, Hillig, Hoekstra, and many others have been mentioned among them. The genuineness of the ep. has been defended by Weissecker, Tischendorf, Scholten, Hilgenfeld, Harnack, Holtzmann, Mangold, Lipsius, Renan, Godet, Zahn, Davidson, Lightfoot, Parra, and many others, and by almost all of the Eng. writers on the subject. Weissecker says that the reasons for attributing the ep. to the apostle are cogent. Many enemies of the apostle, says he, are simply inconceivable that anyone else would or could have produced this name a letter so full of theological or ecclesiastical motive can be discovered, and in which the personal element so largely predominates and the spirit of the apostle so completely dominates. It is of great vividness and fidelity. The ep. deserves to rank alongside of the Apocrypha, and must stand as a work of Paul’s pen, and as a coordinate standard by which to test the genuineness of other and less certain writings.

The Epistle was written by Paul as a prisoner in Rome, probably toward the close of his imprisonment, as a letter to the Philippians, as an answer to some of their letters, as a letter to be read in the church, and as a letter to be read in your home.'
Christ, and chooses the lesser blessings in pure unselfishness in the Lord's interest. People of their choice are radically different; and Paul lives with rejoicing while Hamlet lives in despair and in unshaken despair. The Roman apostle was living but he would rather live than die before his work was done.

(d) His example (vs 27-30): Paul was a Roman citizen and so were they. He tried to live worthy of his citizenship but must have had a higher ambition, that he and they might live as citizens worthy of the gospel of Christ. He fought as a good soldier. He stood fast in the faith. He was in nothing afflicted by the adversaries. Let them follow his example. They were engaged in the same conflict. To them, he said, be not weary of well doing, but labor to know the will of God, and believe and suffer in the behalf of Christ. Their faith was not of themselves; it was the gift of God. Their suffering was not self-chosen; it too was a gift of God. (4) Exhortation to follow the example of Christ (2: 1-18): Let them, the Philippians, have the mind and spirit of Jesus, and Paul will rejoice to pour out his life as a libation upon the sacrifice and service of their faith. (5) Reasons for sending Timothy and Epaphroditus to them (2: 19-30). (6) Paul's example (3: 1-21):

VI. Contents of the Epistle.—The ep. is not capable of any logical analysis. Its succession of thought may be represented as follows: (1) Address (1: 1-3), (2) Thanksgiving and prayer (1: 3-11): Paul was in Rome, a prisoner, and sends his greetings to his helpers in the churches of Philippi. (3) Information concerning his own experience (1: 12-30): (a) His Evangelism (vs 12-14): Everything had turned out well. Paul is in prison, but he has been enabled to spread his evangelism. He has been chained to a soldier, but that has given him many opportunities to talk and to do the work of a soldier. He has been given the opportunity to spread his evangelism, and to talk about the Christ. Paul has told his experience over and over to these men, and his story has been carried through the whole camp. (b) His tolerance (vs 15-18): Not only has the gospel found many adherents among the evil men who were walking through the whole city the brethren have been emboldened by Paul's success to preach Christ, some through faction and envy and strife, and some through love. Paul rejoices that Christ is preached, whether by his enemies or by his friends. He would much prefer to have the gospel presented as he himself preached it, but he was great-souled and broad-minded enough to tolerate differences of opinion and method among the brethren in Christ. "In every way, whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is proclaimed; and therein I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice" (1: 18). This is one of the noblest utterances of one of the greatest of men. Paul is sorry that everybody does not see things just as he does, but he rejoices if they glorify Christ and would not put the least hindrance in their way. (c) His readiness for life or death (vs 19-26): Paul says, Give me liberty or give me death; it will be Christ either way. To live is to work for Christ; to die is to be with Christ. "To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." (Here is Paul's example of possible martyrdom or further missionary labors.) We are reminded of Hamlet's soliloquy in Shakespeare. "To be or not to be"—that is the question with both Hamlet and Paul. Hamlet weighs evils against evils and choose the lesser evils in sheer cowardice in the end. Paul weighs blessings against blessings, the blessings of life for Christ and the blessings of death with Manichean or neo-Platonic heresy that matter was evil and the body vile. Potinus blasphemed that he had a body. The Cherethim (see in It) contend and yet Egyptian the body as the temple of the Holy Spirit. It was the vehicle of the incarnation, and he honors it for that. Yet the body prepared for Jesus was the body of His humiliation. It bound Him to the earth. It weakened when He was made man. And when He marked His needed strength. Paul says that our bodies are like the body of Jesus of Nazareth now, and they shall be like the body of Moses in due time.

(7) A series of short exhortations (4 1–9): This series ends with the command, "The things which ye both learned and received and heard and saw in me, these things do: and the God of peace shall be with you." All these exhortations, then, are based upon his own conduct and experience and example. They had seen the embodiment of these things in him. They were to be imitators of him in their obedience to them. Therefore as we read them we have side-lights thrown upon the character of the apostle who had taught and preached and practised these things.

What do they tell us concerning the apostle Paul? (a) His steadfastness and his love for his friends (ver 1): He had a genius for friendship. He bound his friends to him with cords of steel. They were sure to succeed anything for him. The reason for that was that he sacrificed everything for them, and that he had such an overwhelming love for them that his own life meant nothing to them. They could depend upon him. (b) His sympathy for men and all good women and his desire that they live in peace (vs 23): The true yeosulfellow mentioned here cannot be identified now. He has been variously identified by the Ephe- tuses, Barnabas, Luke, Silas, Timothy, Peter, and Christ. There can be no doubt that Paul, either Cephas or Syzygus. We are wholly ignorant as to whom Paul meant. (c) His constant rejoicing in the Lord (ver 4). (d) His sweet reasonableness ("moderation." AV, RV "forbearance," ver 5): So Matthew Arnold translates the passage. The word can here mean "polite" or "courteous." It is a combination of forbearance and graciousness, of modesty and courtesy, of consideration and esteem such as was characteristic. Paul had it. There was a sweet reasonableness about him that made his personality attractive and admirable to both men and women. (e) His freedom from anxiety (ver 6,7): Paul's fearless confidence was born on the one hand from his assurance that the Lord was near, and on the other from his faith in prayer. It passed all understanding how Paul was kept from all anxiety. It was the power of prayer that did it. It was the peace of God that did it. It was the Lord at hand who did it. (i) His habitual high thinking (ver 8): All that was worthy in the ideals of the Greco-Hellenic philosophers Paul made the staple of his thought. He delighted in them and made them the foundation of his thought and the pronouns referring to Him are many more. Paul cannot write anything without writing about Christ. He ends: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit." The spirit of Christ and the grace of Christ are in the entire epistle.

PHILISTINES, flis'tinz, fil'is-tinz ( פִּלִּסְתִּי, PHILISTIHM, Ἡλλόφοβος or Ἡλλόφοβος, fil'stinz):

I. OT Notices:—race and origin (Heb p'lisheth) refers to their country. The name Paul itself and Origin (Heb p'lisheth) refers to their country. The word means "migrants," and they came from another country. They are noticed 386 t. in the OT, and their country 8 t. The question of their race and origin is of great importance as affecting the genuine character and reliability of the Bible notices. In Gen 10 14 (1 Ch 1 12) they are reckoned with other tribes in Mizraim (Egypt) as descendants of Ham, and as cousins of the old inhabitants of Babylonia (ver 6). They are said to be a branch of the Cushite—"an unknown people—or, according to LXX, of the Casamnian, which could mean "the people of the head." A custom of the Phoenicians (forbidden to Hebrews) as a name was so used as a name of the Phoenician race, as known from a picture of the time of Thothmes III in the 16th cent. BC. They are also connected with the Cappadocians. Or people of Caphtor, whence indeed they are said to have come (Jer 45 4; Am 9 7). Caphtor was a "shoretown," and its position is not geographically possible (see Dt 2 23); the Cappadocians found an earlier race of Avim living in "enclosures" near Gaza, and destroyed them. In the LXX of this passage (and of Am 9 7) Cappadocia stands for Caphtor (Kaph- tor), and other authors have the same reading. Cappadocia was known to the Assyrians as kut-pal-ulba (probably an Akkadian term—"land of the Kati"), and the Kati were a people living in Cilicia and Cappadocia, which region had a Sem population.

LITERATURE:

1. OT Notices.—The Philistines were an uncircumcised people inhabiting the south plains between Gezer and Gaza in Southwestern Pal
The Philistines were a Semitic people who worshiped the gods Dagon (1 S 5:2) and Ashtart (30:10). They lived at the foot of the Philistine Mountains, which are also known as the Shephelah (or low hills) of Judah, at the foot of the mountains of the sea.

5. History
The Philistines were a powerful presence in the region from the time of the Judges through the time of the Kings of Judah. They were known for their seaports, which included Gath, Ashkelon, Ashdod, and Gaza. The Philistines were known for their military might and their use of the chariot.

6. History
The Philistines were subject to the Assyrians and the Babylonians, and they were eventually conquered by the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar. After the Babylonian conquest, the Philistines were ruled by the Neo-Babylonian Empire.

7. Later
The Philistines continued to exist as a distinct people, but their influence declined over time. The Philistines were eventually assimilated into the surrounding cultures, and their language and culture were lost to history.

In conclusion, the Philistines were a significant presence in the region of the ancient Near East, and their influence can still be felt in modern-day Israel.
and to have thus differed—though Sem—from the Hebrews.

Their further history is embraced in that of the various cities to which reference can be made under the articles pertaining to them.

II. Monumental Notices.—These are of great importance, because they confirm the OT statements from a time at least as early as that of Moses, and down to 670 BC. Recent excavations at Gezer show the early presence of two races at this Philistia, one being Sem, the other probably Egyptian. Scarabs as old as the XIIth Dynasty were found, and in the 15th. BC Gezer was held by Amenophis III. At Lachish also seals of this king and his queen have been found, with a cuneiform letter to Zimridi, who was ruler of the city under the same Pharaoh. At Gaza a temple was built by Amenophis II. The names of places in Philistia noticed yet earlier by Thothmes III are all Sem, including Joppa, Saphir, Gerar, Gezer, etc. In the Am Tab we have also (about 1480 BC) letters from chiefs subject to Amenophis III at Joppa, Ashkelon, Gezer, Lachish and Kolash which show us a Sem population, not only by the language of these letters, but also by the names of the writers. In the case of Ashkelon esp. the Sem rulers are found to have worshipped Dagon; and, though the name

Heads of Philistines.

Phalistine Wagons.

"Phalistine" does not occur, the race was clearly the same found by the Assyrians in 800 BC in the land of Philistia beside the Great Sea. These names include Yamin-Dagan ("Dagon sect"), Dagon-takala ("Dagon is a protection") and Yaddua (the "grateful") at Ashkelon; Bisa ("asked for"), son of the woman Galeta, at Joppa; Yabnitu ("God made"), at Lachish, with Zimridi—a name found also in Sabean Arab; while, at Gezer, Fayga represents the Bib. Japhia (Josh 10 3), and Milkitu ("Moloch is king") the Heb Malchiel. Others might be added of the same character, but these examples are enough to show that, in the time of Moses and Joshua, the population of Philistia was the same that is noticed in the OT as early as Abraham's age.

When therefore scholars speak of the Philis as being non-Sem—and probably Aryan—invaders of the country, arriving about 1200 BC, they appear not only to contradict the Bible, but also to contradict the monumental evidence of the earlier existence of Sem Dagon-worshippers at Ashkelon. In this later age Rameses III was attacked, in Egypt, by certain northern Monuments who came by sea, and also by land, wasting first the country of the Hittites and Amorites. Among them were the Danau, who were probably Gr Danai. They were exterminated in the Delta, and in the subsequent advance of Rameses III to the Euphrates. On a colored picture they are represented as fair people; and two of the tribes were called Parsatou and Takari, whom Chabas supposed to be Pelasgi (since l and r are not distinguished in Egypt) and Teurians. These two tribes wear the same peculiar headdress. Brugsch supposed the former to be Philis (Geog., I, 10), but afterward called them Pusorato (Hist Egypt, II, 148). The inscriptions accompanying the picture on the temple walls say that they came from the north, and "their home was in the land of the Puriaus, the Takari." etc. There is thus no reason at all to suppose that they were Philis, nor did they ever settle in Philistia.

The Assyrs texts agree with those already mentioned in making the inhabitants of Philistia Semitic. About 900 BC was the 3. Assyrian first Assyrian conqueror in Philistia ("by the great sea"). In 734 and 727 BC, Tiglath-pileser attacked the Philis, and mentions a king of Ashkelon named Midnit ("my gift"). And his son Rukabi whose name resembles that of the Kenite called Rechab in the OT. The name of the king of Gaza was Hanun, or "merciful." In 711 BC Sargon took Ashdod, and speaks of its king Azari, whose name recalls the Amorite Aziru, and of the Phalistine Shimni ("the sun-god") who fled before him. Semnacheri, in 702 BC, gives the names of cities in Philistia (including Eltekeh and Bemebarak near Joppa) which are Sem. He notices Sibica (Zadok) of Ashkelon, and also Sarludari ("the Lord be praised"), son of Rukabi in the same city, with Midnit of Ashdod, and Padii ("redeeming") of Ekron, while Sul-bel ("Baal is a protection") was king of Gaza. In 679 BC Esar- haddor ("boss of Sul-bél" ("Baal is my protection") of Gaza, with Midnit of Ashkelon, Raso-aamu ("the sun-god is manifest") of Ekron, and Abi-milki of Ashdod, who bore the ancient Phil name Abimeleech. In 670 BC, when Assur-bani-pal set up many tributary kings in Egypt, we find again the name Sarludari applied to a ruler of Pelusium, who may have been a Philistine. It is thus abundantly clear that the monumental notices all agree with the OT as to the names and nationality of the Philis, and as to their worship of Baal and Dagon; the conjecture that they were Aryan foreigners, arriving in 1200 BC, is not based on any statement of the monuments, but merely rests on a guess which Brugsch subsequently abandoned. It resembles many other supposed discrepancies between Biblical and contemporary records due to the mistakes of modern commentators.

III. The Cretan Theory.—This strange theory, which is apparently of Byzantine origin, would make the Philis come from Crete. It still finds supporters, though it does not rest on any Bib. or monumental evidence. The Cherethim (Ezek 25 16; Zeph 2 5) were a Sem people named with the Philis in Canaan. The LXX renders the word Krétai or Kretai about 1770 AD, Michaelis (Speci1, I, 292–308) argued that this meant "Cretans," and that the Philis therefore came from Caphtor, which must be Crete. The passages, however, refer to Philistia and not to any island, and the LXX translators, as we have seen, placed Captor in Cappadocia. The Cherethites and the Gittites (1 S 14) as a people of Philistia (yer 16), near Ziklag, and their name probably survives at the present town called Keratyleh in the Phil in plain.

Yet, many theories are founded on this old idea about the Cherethites. Some suppose that Tactius confused the Jews with the Philistines, because they came from Crete; but what he actually says (Hist. v.11) is that "the Jews ran away from the Philistines to Egypt, and were called "the inhabitants are named Idaci from Mt. Idar," which, with a barbarous augment, becomes the name of the Judaei." This absurd derivation serves at least to prove that Tactius himself does not mean the Philistines. Stephen of Byzantium said that the god Manna and Ceren was likely a Cretan, because "he has seen the huge statue of a seated Jove found near Gaza, and now at Constantinople, but this is late Gr work, and marked by a Phoen. of 3rd to 2nd cent. B.C." From this it is thought that Mincas-the port of Gaza-was named from the Cretan Minos, but it is an Arab, word Mmeshe, for "harbor," still applying to the same place.

No critical student is likely to prefer these later speculations to our present monumental information, even without reference to the contradiction of the Bible. Yet these are later names that, in later times, has given rise to the supposition that Captor is to be identified with a region known as the Egyptians as Kefi, with inhabitants called Kefau. The latter are represented in a tomb of the XVIIIth Dynasty near Thebes. The Southgate, or, with long black hair, and the same type is found in a Cyproscylindrical figure. They are connected with islanders of the "green sea," who may have lived in Arvad or in Cyprus; but there is no evidence in any written statement that they were Cretans, though a figure at Knossos in Crete somewhat resembles them. There are many indications that this figure—painted on the wall of the palace—is not older than about 500 BC, and the Sidonians had colonies in Crete, whereas also potters must likewise be marked by a Phoen inscription in Cyprus. The Kefau youths bring vases as presents, and these—their visits are exactly the same as those represented in another picture of the time of Thothmes III, the bearers in this case being Harri from North Syria, represented with black beards and Sem features. Moreover, on the bilingual inscription called the Decree of Canopus (235 BC), the Kef region is said to be "Phoenicia," and the Gr translator naturally knew what was meant by the Egyptian Kefau. In fact in the Sem. word for "palm," occurring in Heb (Isa 9 14; 19 15), and thus applicable to the "palm"-land, Phoenicia. Thus, even if Kef were related to Captor, the evidence would place the Phii home on the Phoen. coast of Crete. There is indeed no evidence that any European race settled near the coasts of Pal before about 650 BC, when Eearahdon speaks of Gr kings in Cyprus. The Cretan tradition of Michælis was a literary conjecture, which has been disproved by the results of exploration in Asia Minor.

IV. David's Guards.—Another strange story, equally old, represents David as being surrounded with foreign mercenaries—Philis and Cretans, and the Gittites. He employed mercenaries called Shaitanu from Asia Minor. The suggestion that the Cherethites were of this race is scarcely worth notice, since the Heb kaph is not represented by ḫ in Egypt. David's band of Hebrew exiles, 400 in number, followed him to Gath where 200 Gittites joined him (2 S 16 18). In later times his army consisted of "the Cherethi in (kērēthi, in sing)" and "the Pelethi" (pēlēthi), commanded by the sons of Jehadad (2 S 8 18; 15 18; 20 7; 1 K 1 35 44), together with the Gittites under Ittai of Gath. These guards are never said to have been Philis, but "the Cherethi, is supposed to have been the Cherethites tribe, and "the Pelethi" to be another name for the Philistines. The fact that the came from Gath does not prove that they were Philis, any more than was David himself because he came back from this city. David calls Ittai an "enemy" and an "exile," but it is probable that he was the same here, for when Ittai's men joined the Cherethi and Pelethi against Absalom, they were naturally suspected; for David still had enemies (2 S 15 5-13) among Benjamites of Saul's house. It is also surely impossible to suppose that David would have left the ark in charge of a Phili, and Obad-edom the Gittite (2 S 6 10) was a Levite, according to a later account (1 Ch 15 18), hearing a Heb name, meaning perhaps "servant of men," or "humble worshipper." It seems equally unlikely that, in later times, a pious priest like Jehiada (2 K 11 4) would have admitted foreign mercenaries into the temple. In this passage they are called kārī, as also in 2 S 20 23, where LXX has Cheirethi. The suggestion of Wellhausen that they were of Caria does not seem probable, and Caria had not even reached Egypt before about 600 BC.

The real explanation of these various words for soldiers seems simple; and David—being a very rich man—would not likely have needed foreign mercenaries; while the of These Philis, whom he had so repeatedly Terms smitten, were very unlikely to have formed trusty guards. The word "Cherethi" (kērēthi) means a "smitter" or a "destroyer," and "Pelethi" (pēlēthi) means a "swift one" or "pursuer." In the time of Josiah the temple-guards are called kārī (2 K 11 4 19, Carites), which LXX treats as either sing. or pl., and rāqīm or "runners" (see 1 S 22 17; 1 K 14 27 28; 1 K 14 27), these two bodies perhaps answering to the Cherethi and Pelethi of David's time; for kārī means "stammer." The term rāqīm, or "runners," is however of general application, since Jehu also had troops so called (2 K 10 25), and we have seen (p. 249) of troops—as among the Romans—the heavier regiment of "destroyers," or "stabbers," being armed with swords, daggers or spears; while the "swift ones" or "runners" pursued the defeated foe. Thus in Egypt the final, Pharaoh's army, was divided by the bow-man in regular regiments; and in Assyria the spear-man with heavy shields defending the bow-man. We have also a picture of the time of Tiglath-pileser II representing an Assyrian soldier on a camel. The Pelethi or "pursuers" may have been "runners" on foot, but perhaps more probably mounted on camels, or on horses like the later Assyrians; for in the time of Solomon (1 K 4 28) horses and riding camels were in use—the former for chariots. It is clear that David's band, leaving the vicinity of Jezer (1 S 29 1; 30 1), could not have reached Ziklag "on the third day" (a distance of 120 miles) on foot; so that the camel corps must have existed even before the death of Saul.

These considerations seem to make it evident that David's guards were native Hebrews, who had been with him as exiles and outlaws at 3. Native Hebrews Adullam and Gath, and that the Cherethi or "destroyer" only actively served during the little time of the Phili tribe of "destroyers" or Cherethim, who were not Cre- tans, it would seem, any more than the "stabbers" were Carians.
The general result of our inquiry is, that all monumental notices of the Philis agree with the statements, which make them to

Born probably in the first decade of Augustus Caesar, who became emperor in 27 BC. He died possibly in the last years of Claudius (41-54 AD), more likely in the early years of Nero (54-65 AD). We have no exact information about either date. He was a native of Alexandria, Egypt. His relatives were wealthy and prominent, probably sacerdotal, Jews. He received the best Jewish education, and was trained also in gentle learning—grammar, rhetoric, philosophy, geometry, poetry, music. Enjoying ample means, he was enabled to devote his career to scholarship. The Alexandrian Jews wielded great influence in the contemporary Roman empire, and the prominence of Philo’s family is attested by the fact that his brother, Alexander Lysimachus, was Alabarch of Alexandria. The single date in Philo’s life which we know accurately is connected with their leadership. In the winter of 39-40 AD, he was spokesman of the deputation sent to Rome to protest against imposition of emperor-worship upon fellow-citizens of his faith. The mission failed, Philo, with his two colleagues, meeting rebuff, even insult. It was little likely that Caligula would heed graces which included specifically dissent from worship of himself. Philo records his distaste for political activity, and, so far as we know, the Roman incident excepted, he devoted himself principally to letters. As a young man probably, he had undertaken a journey to Jerusalem, almost in the nature of a pilgrimage to the ancient shrine of his religion. He paid a second visit to Rome possibly after 50 AD, at all events, in the reign of Claudius. For the rest, our knowledge of his life is scanty and, sometimes, legendary.

The period covered by his career coincides with one of the most momentous epochs in history. For it witnesses, not only the foundation of the Roman imperial system, but also the beginning of the end of ancient classical civilization in its dominant ideas, and the plantation of Christianity. Preeminently an era of transition, it was marked by significant displacements in culture, the effects of which were felt in every walk of life and even yet. Minor phenomena aside, three principal movements characterized the time: the Pagan reaction, or reversion to forms of religion that had sufficed the peoples of the Roman empire hitherto—this manifested itself strongly with Augustus, and entered its decline perhaps with the death of Plutarch (c 120 AD); the appearance of Christianity; and what is known as Syncretism, or interfusion between the conceptions of different races, esp. in religion, philosophy and material circumstances which cumbered the fortunes of Christianity deeply, found its chief exponent in Philo, and maintained itself for several centuries in the theosophical systems of the Gnostics and neo-Platonists. Thus, to understand Philo, and to realize his importance, it is necessary to number the intellectual spirit of his age. The “universalism” of the Roman empire has been so named because, within the political framework, various peoples and divergent civilizations commingled and came eventually to share something in a common spirit, even of a common language. Philo’s prominence, as a figure in the world of thought, and as an authority for the general culture of NT times, is out of all proportion to the fragmentary information available about his external career. Contemporary currents, subtle as those were, perfused his writings, and were met and fused in his person. Hence his value as an index to the temperament of the period cannot well be overrated.

A Jew by nature and nurture, an oriental mystic by accident of residence, Gr philosopher by higher education and professional study, an ally of the Rom governing classes, familiar with their intellectual perspective, Philo is at once rich in suggestion and blurred in outline. Moreover, he addressed himself to two tasks, difficult to weld into a flawless unity. On the one hand, he wrote for educated men in Gr-Rom society, attempting to explain, often to justify, his racial religion before them. The philosophic spirit, which upon him, had fallen upon him, he enjoyed unusual opportunity to point the merits of the Jewish faith as the “desire of all nations,” the panacea of which the need was everywhere felt. On the other hand, he had to confront his “orthodox” coreligionists, with their separatist traditions and their contempt for paganism in all its works. He tried to persuade them that, after all, Gr thought was not inimical to their cherished doctrines, but, on the contrary, invaluable and almost identical. Hence he represented an eclectic standpoint, in which Gr philosophy blended with historical and dogmatic deductions from the Jewish Scriptures. The result was Philo’s peculiar type of theosophy—we cannot call it a system. Taking the OT for text, he applied the “allegorical” method, with curious consequences. He taught that the Scriptures contain two meanings: a “lower” meaning, obvious in the literal statements of the text; and a “higher,” or hidden meaning, perceptible to the “initiate” alone. In this way he found it possible to reconcile Gr intellectualism with Jewish belief. Greek thought exhibits the “hidden” meaning; it turns out to be the elucidation of the “allegory” which runs through the OT like a vein of gold. Moses, and the rest, are not merely historical figures, the subjects of such and such events, but representative types of reason, righteousness, the virtues, and so forth. The tendency to fusion of this kind was no new thing. It is traceable for some three centuries before Philo, who may be said to complete the process. It had been familiar to the rabbis, and to the Hellenistic philosophers, particularly the Stoics, who applied this method to the Gr poetic myths. Philo reduces it to an expert art, and uses it as an instrument to dissipate all difficult perplexities. He believed it to be thoroughly true to the OT. But, thanks to his method, he rendered it malleable, and could thus adjust its interpretation to what he considered to be the intellectual necessities of his generation. Nay more, he felt that, when at his best in this process, he became a vehicle of Divine possession. He says, "Through the influence of Divine inspiration I have become excited profoundly . . . then I have been conscious of a richness of interpretation, an enjoyment of facts, a perception of the most manifest energy in all that was to be done." Again, "I am irradiated with the light of wisdom," and, "all intellect is a Divine inspiration." Little wonder, then, that we have a strange mixture of philosophy and divinity in the Deity, of every Gr intellectualism with hazy oriental mysticism. Hence, too, the philosophy of Philo is subordinate to his explanation of the Scriptures, and compromise, rather than logical thinking, marks his leading positions.

After the death of Cicero (43 BC) a change, long preparing, asserted itself in ancient thought. Mixture of national, or racial, character and new problems on man became evident to each other.

A reorganization of standards of ethical judgment was thus rendered inevitable, and Judaism came to intermingle more freely with Gr philosophy as one consequence. While it is true that "reason participated in the supernatural powers," and the Gr philosophers were forced to solve all problems, the nature of the chief quest underwent transformation. The old association of man with Nature gave way to a dualism or opposition between the world-order and another existence lying behind it as its originator or sustainer. The system of Nature having disappointed expectation, thinkers asked how they could escape it, and assure themselves of definite relations with the Divine Being. They sought the desired connection with the world, but as a distant ideal. This was the problem that confronted Philo, who attacked it from the Jewish side. Now Judaism, like Gr thought, had also experienced a change of heart. Jeh had been the subject of an idealizing process, and tended, like the Stoic deity, to lose specific relation with the world and man. Accordingly, a new religious question was bringing the philosophy and the faith into closer contact. Could they join forces? Philo's consequent embarrassment rooted, no less than the fresh perplexities inseparable from the adjustment of his available methods and materials. For, while the Jewish Messiah had passed over into the Gr Logos, the two systems preserved their separation in no small measure, Philo believed, the immediate God being familiar with the mystic, transcendent concept of Deity extracted, thanks to long misinterpretation, from Plato's cosmogonic dialogue, Timaeus. Here God was elevated above the world. His conception of the presence, or immanence, of the Deity in the world came from the Stoics. The Jewish religion gave him the doctrine of a righteous (pure) Deity, whose moral inwardness made relations with men possible. Moreover, contemporary angelology and demonology enabled him to devise a scheme whereby the pure Deity could be linked with the gross world, notwithstanding its irremediable evil. Little wonder, then, that he compassed an amalgamation only, and this in consonance with the theosophical drift of the age. Nevertheless, he counteracted the distorting tendencies of rabbinical speculation by reference to Hellenistic pantheism, and, at the same time, counteracted this pantheism by the inward moralism of his national faith. The logical symmetry of the Gr mind was reinforced by Hebraic religious sentiment, for Philo, as a whole, rather than a system, but a ferment that cast up the clamant problem in unmistakable fashion. The crux was this: Man must surmount his own fragmentary experience and rise to an absolute Being; but, its absoluteness notwithstanding, this Being must be brought into direct contact with the finite. Philo was unable to reconcile the two demands, because he could not rise above them; but the effort after reconciliation controls all his conclusions, harking back to three main subjects of inquiry: (1) the conception of God; (2) the manner of God's relation to the world; (3) human nature.

(1) Philo's doctrine of God, like that of the neo-Platonic scholasticism, was not essentially dualistic. No doubt, it is determined largely by certain human analogies. Subjects of inquiry sary for the control of the world, just in the same way as man's mind must exist to furnish the principle of all human action; and, as matter is not self-determined, a principle, analogous to mind, is demanded, to be its first cause. Further, as the permanent soul remains unchanged throughout the vicissitudes of a human life, so, behind the phenomenal, but these phenomena reside a self-existent Being. Nevertheless, the human analogy never extends to God in His actual Being. No human traits can attach to the Deity. Language may indicate such parallelism, nay the Scriptures are used by the Stoics to draw them as concessions to mortal weakness. These accommodations eliminated, it becomes evident that man can never know God positively. Any adjective used to describe Him can do no more than point to the contrast he sees His relationless Being and the dependence of finite things. That God is, Philo is fully persuaded; what He is, no man can ever tell. He is one and immutable, simple and immeasurable and eternal, just as man is not. For he is unknowable, not otherwise than the many things belong to Him, but He, speaking strictly, belongs to nothing." This doctrine of the transcendence of Deity was an essential postulate of Philonic thought. For, seeing that He expels all the imperfections of the world, God is precisely in that condition of Being for which the whole creation then yearned. In a word, the dualism, so far from being a bar to salvation, was rather a condition without which the problem of salvation could neither be stated nor recognized. In the difficulty inseparable from the adjustment of his available methods and materials. For, while the Jewish Messiah had passed over into the Gr Logos, the two systems preserved their separation in no small measure, Philo believed, the immediate God being familiar with the mystic, transcendent concept of Deity extracted, thanks to long misinterpretation, from Plato's cosmogonic dialogue, Timaeus. (1) Philo's doctrine of God, like that of the neo-Platonic scholasticism, was not essentially dualistic. No doubt, it is determined largely by certain human analogies. Subjects of inquiry sary for the control of the world, just in the same way as man's mind must exist to furnish the principle of all human action; and, as matter is not self-determined, a principle, analogous to mind, is demanded, to be its first cause. Further, as the permanent soul remains unchanged throughout the vicissitudes of a human life, so, behind the phenomenal, but these phenomena reside a self-existent Being. Nevertheless, the human analogy never extends to God in His actual Being. No human traits can attach to the Deity. Language may indicate such parallelism, nay the Scriptures are used by the Stoics to draw them as concessions to mortal weakness. These accommodations eliminated, it becomes evident that man can never know God positively. Any adjective used to describe Him can do no more than point to the contrast he sees His relationless Being and the dependence of finite things. That God is, Philo is fully persuaded; what He is, no man can ever tell. He is one and immutable, simple and immeasurable and eternal, just as man is not. For he is unknowable, not otherwise than the many things belong to Him, but He, speaking strictly, belongs to nothing." This doctrine of the transcendence of Deity was an essential postulate of Philonic thought. For, seeing that He expels all the imperfections of the world, God is precisely in that condition of Being for which the whole creation then yearned. In a word, the dualism, so far from being a bar to salvation, was rather a condition without which the problem of salvation could neither be stated nor recognized. In the difficulty inseparable from the adjustment of his available methods and materials. For, while the Jewish Messiah had passed over into the Gr Logos, the two systems preserved their separation in no small measure, Philo believed, the immediate God being familiar with the mystic, transcendent concept of Deity extracted, thanks to long misinterpretation, from Plato's cosmogonic dialogue, Timaeus. Here God was elevated above the world. His conception of the presence, or immanence, of the Deity in the world came from the Stoics. The Jewish religion gave him the doctrine of a righteous (pure) Deity, whose moral inwardness made relations with men possible. Moreover, contemporary angelology and demonology enabled him to devise a scheme whereby the pure Deity could be linked with the gross world, notwithstanding its irremediable evil. Little wonder, then, that he compassed an amalgamation only, and this in consonance with the theosophical drift of the age. Nevertheless, he counteracted the distorting tendencies of rabbinical speculation by reference to Hellenistic pantheism, and, at the same time, counteracted this pantheism by the inward moralism of his national faith. The logical symmetry of the Gr mind was reinforced by Hebraic religious sentiment, for Philo, as a whole, rather than a system, but a ferment that cast up the clamant problem in unmistakable fashion. The crux was this: Man must surmount it is internal and indwelling; on the other, it is external and mediating. The scope of this distinction is indicated very well by the epithets which Philo applies to each aspect respectively. The internal Logos is called the "Son of God," the "Second God," the "Mediator," the "Ransomed," the "Image of God," "Member of the Trinity," "High Priest." The external Logos "abides in man," is the "Prophet," "Shepherd," an "Ambassador," an "Artist," "Elder," "Interpreter," "Mediator of God." The former represents Philo's conception of the unity of the Logos with God, the latter his provision for the manifestation of the Logos in created things. He thus tries to preserve the transcendence of God equally with His immanence. No doubt, in previous times, the mysteriousness of the Divine nature had impressed itself upon men with at least as much force as now. But with one of two consequences. Either the particular finites and the Deity were mixed in inextricable confusion, as by oriental pantheism, or God was banished from the world, as by the extreme developments within Gr dualism. Philo attempted to combine the two tendencies, and was able consequently to face the obvious contradiction between the transcendence of God, and the idea of a cloudy conception of a multiplicity of phenomena in which this Being ought to be present somehow, despite transcendence. He demands a God who, in His exaltation, shall be a worthy Deity; this is the Jew in his highest development. And, on the other hand, between this God and His creation; this is the Greek and, in part, the Oriental, in him. Thanks to the former, he could not be satisfied with mere naturalism; thanks to the latter, no fable or picture could suffice, the mediator was required, who would link the world and its heart's desire. But Philo could not surmount one difficulty peculiar to contemporary thought. He was unable to connect God directly with creation and preserve His purity unaltered. Hence the obscurity which surrounds his conception of the Logos, likewise his vacillation with respect to its personality. So we find the different intellectual forces which he inherited playing upon him—now one, now another. Sometimes the Platonic theory of Ideas dominates him; sometimes he leans to Stoicism, with its immanent world-reason; and here he even seems to foreshadow the doctrine of the Trinity; again, the ramifications of rabbinical lore cause him to bestow upon the Logos a false role of mediator, which he thought would achieve supremacy, although on the whole mystical Platonism may be said to predominate. Thus, the world of Ideas has its place in the Divine Logos, just as the plan of a city is in the soul of the master-builder. Accordingly, God's thought may take its place in the world by being impressed upon things; yet, on account of its subjective nature, it must be apprehended subjectively, that is, by one who is capable of entering this sphere. The Logos never leaves the Deity; thus it can mediate between Him and creation only if an element proper to Deity be discernible in mundane things. In other words, the Logos mediates between God and the world, but partakes of the Divine nature only. In this, in any case, is the inner logic of Philo's view. It accounts for creation, but has no power to persuade man to overpass the limitations placed upon him by his bodily prison. Thus the question of the personality of the Logos is left unanswered. In so far as Philo needs Logos to connect God with the world, he inclines to a doctrine of personality. In so far as he makes it the principle of all activities within the world, he inclines away from personality. In short, we have a dilemma, an inherent tendency to reduce all finite being to illusion. Indeed, one might term the Logos a reply in some sort to Aristotle's question—which of the Platonic Ideas could connect the other Ideas with sensible things? Salvation is conceived as wrought out, not by a direct stream flowing from Deity, an essence that found due expression rather in the cosmic order than in a person. While, therefore, Philo thinks in a cultural perspective akin to that characteristic of the author of the Fourth Gospel, two vast differences away his doctrine. On the one hand, it is speculative, not ethically personal. On the other hand, it fails completely to determine the nature of his mediator in itself, vacillating in a manner which shows how vague and fluid the conception really was.

(3) Doctrine of man.—This appears further in the doctrine of man. Following current interpretations of Plato, Philo makes man partake in the rational nature of God, but denies that he embodies the highest species of reason. That is, the ideal man and the man known to us in common experience are distinguished. The former is rational as God is. The latter is partly rational, partly irrational. The body vitiates the original angelic purity of the soul and, since the body became part of the Logos, although the higher nature becomes more and more debased as the years lapse, a seed of Divinity is present, ready to burst forth. Thus man must crush the flesh and its desires. At this point we return to the effect of the Stoics, who held that when a man has attained this apathy, man can enjoy the life of contemplation. This, in its turn, culminates in ecstasy, when the human soul attains sudden and momentary union with the Divine. For man is a "fair monster" who has been thrown out of form. Yet the doctrine remains intellectual even here. He "who escapes from his own mind flies to the mind of the universe, confessing that all the things of the human mind are vain and unreal, and attributing everything to God." Philo's anthropology therefore ends in contempt for this life, which is in no wise worth while, and in a counsel of perfection available only for a select élite. Accordingly, the conclusion of the whole matter is, that he never saw how the Divine and the human can be united, although he stated the factors of the problem with great clearness, and felt profoundly the urgency of a solution. His gospel was for the children of culture. He saw the eternal in the temporal, and we have a "remnant" of the ideal of Michel de Montaigne. He understood that "love for a Divine Person" might be so diffused throughout a human soul as to render evil and unreality the means to the attainment of good and to the revelation of truth. The salvation he contemplated was from self, not in self. Hence, as he asserts himself, harmony with God "is an incomprehensible mystery to the multitude, and is to be imparted to the instructed only." Nor is this wonderful. For a God who is the reasonable "the word" of this world, of the "word of fire," which begins as an indistinguishable mass and ends as a "second principle"; and objects of sense rendered apparent by the operation of many curious intermediate forces, ranging from "angel-words" to the human soul, constitute a combination beyond the reach of any save the "initiate." More practicable is Philo's conception of the moral life—as a struggle of the soul against passion, pleasure and sensuality. Yet, even this contest is hopeless unless it be waged with the equipment of the "philosopher athlete." Escape from the "prison-house" of flesh would seem to be consequent only upon profound knowledge.

The probability is that Philo's works were written previous to his Rom embassy. They show how he tried to apply for philosophical conceptions to Jewish beliefs, history, and usages exclusively. The voluminous re-mainly which have come down to us appear to belong to three commentaries on the Pent and the Mosaic Law. In all likelihood, they are portions of Philo's popular speculations, written for the instruction and information of educated Jews.

6. Philo's Works

Helena, London, etc., rather than for the trained student. The treatise most important for Philo's religious-philosophical views are as follows: On the Creation; On the Allegory of the Sacred Laws; On the Unchangeableness of God; On the Confusion of Languages; On the Migration of Abraham; On the Meting out of the Sacred Instruction; On the Life of the Wise Man Made Perfect by Instruction; The Unwritten Law; Abraham's Allegorical Laws; Rewards and Punishments; That Every Man Who Is Virtuous Is Also Free; Concerning the World; and the Fragments. Some 8 works attributed to Philo are in dispute. Most conspicuous of these is Concerning the Contemplative Life, which reflects his system of asceticism, morality, and its description of the ideal community of the Therapeutae.

PHILOGUS, fi-lo-gus (Φίλωγος, Philo-logos, "friend of learning," "learned one" is the name of a Roman Christian to whom St. Paul sent greetings (Rom 16: 15). His name is coupled with that of Julia, who was probably his wife or sister. Philologus and those united with him in this salutation formed by themselves one of the "churches" or groups in the Christian community. The name is found in inscriptions connected with the imperial household, with reference to one of which Bishop Lightfoot has the following note: It has been supposed that Philologus was given by the master to the freedman mentioned in this inscription, as being appropriate to his office (Friedländer i, 89, 160). . . . If so, some light is thrown on the probable occupation of the Philologus of St. Paul" (Phil, 177, n. 1). S. F. Hunter

Only found in Col 2: 8; lit. the love and pursuit of wisdom and knowledge. In its technical sense, the term is not used for the conscious process, to interpret the whole of human experience, as a consistent and systematic unity, which would be the ultimate truth of all that may be known. The term is also used for a wise application of experience, or parts of experience, however obtained, whether by revelation, intuition or unconscious speculation. No hard-and-fast line can be drawn between the two kinds of philosophy.

Some of the chief conceptions of the "philosopher," as God, spirit, order, causation, true and false, good and evil, were not discovered by reason, but given in experience.

(1) Intuitive philosophy is universal. The human mind has always and everywhere furnished itself with some conceptions of the universe. From the lowest animism and fetishism up to the higher religions, ideas are found which served men as explanations of those features of experience which attracted their attention. They were regarded as general by various methods of revelation. In the higher religions, the mind reflected upon these ideas, and elaborated them into systems of thought that bear some resemblance to the speculative theories of Western thought.

In China, both Confucianism and Taoism developed theories of human life and destiny that bear some resemblance to Stoicism. The religions of Assyria and Babylonism enshrined in their legends the theories of the world and of man and his institutions. In India, the great system of belief in the universe is developed into pantheistic Brahmism, which reduced the multiplicity of experience into one ultimate being, Brahma. But the desire for moral salvation and the sense of pain and evil produced a reaction, and led to the pessimistic and nihilistic philosophy of Buddhism. In Persia, when human consciousness awoke earlier, and the attempt to systematize the multiplicity of polytheism issued in the dualistic philosophy of later Zoroastrism. The whole realm of Oriental thought was divided into kingdoms, created and ruled by two lores: Ahura Mazda, the creator of light and life, law, order and goodness, and Anrō Mainyūs, the founder of darkness, evil and death. Each was surrounded by a court of spiritual beings kindred to himself, his messengers and agents in the world (see Persian Religion [Ancient]). Of all these religious philosophies, only those of Assyria and Babylon, and of Persia, are likely to have come into any contact with Biblical thought. The former have some affinity with the accounts of creation and the flood in Gen; and the influence of the latter may be traced in the dualism and angelology and demonology of later Judaism, and again in the gnostic systems that grew up in the Christian church, and through both channels it was perpetuated in a dualistic influence on the strata of Christian thought down through the Middle Ages.

(2) Speculative philosophy belongs mainly to Western thought. It arose in Greece about the beginning of the 6th cent. BC. It began with the problem of the general nature of being, or ontology. But it was soon forced to consider the conditions of knowing anything at all, or to epistemology. These two studies constitute metaphysics, a term often used as synonymous with philosophy in the stricter sense. Speculation about ideal truth again led to inquiries as to the ultimate nature of the kindred ideas of the good (ethics) and the beautiful (aesthetic). And as these ideas were related to society as well as to the individual, the Greeks developed theories of the ideal organization of society, in which the true, the good, and the beautiful, or politics and pedagogy. The only branch of speculation to which the Greeks made no appreciable contribution was the philosophy of religion, which is a modern development.

The progressive philosophy in the West is therefore itself naturally into three main periods: (a) ancient, from the 6th cent. BC to the 3d cent. AD, when it is almost exclusively Greek, and goes under the name of Greek thought by Roman writers; (b) mediaval, from the 3d to the 16th cent.; in some of the ruling conceptions of Gr thought were utilized for the speculative systems of Christian dogma, but speculation was mainly confined within the limits of religious orthodoxy; however, some independent Arabian and Jewish speculations; (c) modern, from the 16th cent. to the present time, in which thought becomes free again to speculate on all the problems presented by experience, though it only realized its liberty fully in the hands of Locke, Hume and Kant.
2. Greek Philosophy

During the last two centuries BC, Gr thought spread so widely that it came to dominate the cultured thought of the world into which Christianity entered, and it would have been strange if no trace of its influence were found in the NT. In the first stage of its development, from Thales to Socrates, there was an attempt to explain all things in empirical terms. Pythagoras, Democritus, and Epicurus, attempted to explain the nature of reality by reducing the phenomenal world into some one of its elements. Socrates changed its center of gravity, and definitely raised the problems of morality and knowledge to the position of first importance. His principles were developed by Plato into a complex and many-sided system which, more than any other, has influenced all subsequent thought. He united ultimate reality and the highest good into one supreme principle or idea which he called the Good, and also God. It was the essence, archetype and origin of all wisdom, goodness and beauty. It communicated itself as intermediary archetypal ideas to produce all individual things. So that the formative principles of the material and moral and intellectual. But he had to make all things out of preexisting matter, which is essentially evil, and which therefore was refractory and hostile to the Good. That is why it did not make a perfect world. Plato's system was rife with an irreconcilable dualism of mind and body, spirit and matter, good and evil. And his mediating ideas could not bridge the gulf, because they belonged only to the side of the ideal. Aristotle was Plato's disciple, and he started from Plato's ideas in his presumptions, but endeavored to transcend his dualism. He thus applied himself to a closer and more accurate study of actual experience, and added much to the knowledge of the physical world. He organized and classified the methods and contents of knowledge and created the science of logic, which in the Christian Middle Ages became the chief instrument of the great systematic theologians of the church. He tried to bring Plato's ideas "down from heaven," and to represent them as the creative and formative principles within the world, which evolved as a system of development, rising by spiritual gradations from the lower to the higher forms, and culminating in God, who is the uncaused cause of all things. But underneath all the forms still remained matter as an antithetical element and Aristotle rather conceived than solved the dualism of Plato.

Meanwhile, the moral principles of Socrates were being developed with a more directly ethical interest, by the Cyrenaics and Epicureans, into a system of Hedonism, and, by the Cynics and Stoics, into a doctrine of intuitive right and duty, resting inconsistently upon a pantheistic and materialistic view of the universe. But the spiritual and ethical elements in Stoicism became only second to Platonism in the preparation of the Gr world for Christianity. During the last two and a half centuries BC, Gr philosophy showed signs of rapid decline. On the one hand, Pyrrho and his school propounded a thoroughgoing skepticism which denied the possibility of all knowledge whatsoever. On the other hand, the older schools, no longer served by creative minds, tended to merge their ideas into a common eclecticism which its teachers reduced into an empty and formal dogmatism. The most fruitful and fateful product of Gr thought in this period was its amalgamation with Jewish and oriental ideas in the great cosmopolitan centers of the Gr world. There are evidences that this process was going on in the cities of Asia, Syria and Egypt, but the only extensive account of it remaining is found in the works of Philo, the Jewish philosopher of Alexandria (see Philo Judaeus). He tried to graft Plato's idealism upon Hebraic monotheism.

He starts with Plato's two principles, pure being or God, and preexisting matter. In his endeavor to bridge the gulf between them, he interposed between God and the world the powers of God, goodness and justice; and to gather those into a final unity he created his conception of the Logos of God. In the formation of this conception, he merged together the Platonic idea of the good, the Stoic world of Jesus, and a number of the Greek ideas and the gospels of Jesus, the world, the name, of God, the heavenly man and the earth, and was thus the one mediator between God and the world. Christian thought laid hold of this idea, and employed it as its master-category for the interpretation of the person of Christ (see Logos). The there is no speculative philosophy in the OT nor any certain trace of its influence. Its writers and actors never set themselves to pursue knowledge in the abstract and for its own sake. They always sought for in Judaism moral purposes. But moral activity proceeds on the intellectual presuppositions and interpretations of the experiences within which it acts. Hence we find in the OT accounts of the origin and course of the philosophy of history and its institutions, and interpretations of men's moral and religious experiences. They all center in God, issue from His sovereign will, and express the realization of His purpose of righteousness in the world (see God).

(1) All nature originated in God's creative act (Gen 2) or word (Gen 1). In later literature the whole course and order of Nature, its beauty and bounty, as well as its wonders and terrors, are represented as the acts of God's creative wisdom (Ps 19, 29, 50, 65, 68, 104, etc). But His action in Nature is always subordinated to His moral ends.

(2) Similarly, the course and events of the history of Israel and her neighbors are the acts of Jeh's will (Am 1; 2; Isa 41 2; 43 3; 45 9.10.14). In the historical books of S and K, and still more of Ch, all the events of history are represented as the acts of God's moral government. In a more general way, the whole of history is set forth as a series of covenants that God, of His free grace, made with man (see Covenants). The Noahic covenant fixed the order of Nature. The covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob accounted for the origin and choice of Israel. The covenants with Moses and Aaron established the Law and the priesthood, and the covenants made with David and his kingdom, the future lies in the new covenant (Jer 31 31-35). God's covenants were all acts of His sovereign and gracious will.

(3) In post-exilic times, new experiences, and perhaps new intellectual influences, drove the Jews to probe deeper into the problem of existence. They adhered to the cardinal principle of Hebraic thought, that God's sovereign will, working out His purpose of righteousness, was the first cause of all things (see Righteousness). But they found it difficult to coordinate this belief with their other ideas, in two ways. Ethical monotheism tended to become an abstract deism which removed God altogether out of the world. And the catastrophes that befell the nation, in the exile and after, raised the problem of evil and evil over against God's goodness and righteousness. Therefore in the Wisdom lit., we find some conscious speculation on these subjects (see Wisdom).

(a) The Book of Job discusses the problem of evil, and repudiates the idea that life and history are the process of God's will and purpose (see Economic Purpose). It leads to the conclusion that all phenomenal existence is vanity. Yet ultimate philosophy is not pessimistic for it finds an abiding reality and hope in the fear of God.
and in the moral life (12 13-14). The same type of thinking underlies Philemon. Both concepts have been attributed to the circle of the Sadducees. Some would find in them traces of the influence of Epicureanism.

The second concept, enhanced by the development of Judaism, is gathered up into a conception or personification which is called "God". His activity is to make known the existence of God in the world, and man's instructress and guide (ch 8).

(c) The teaching of the Pharisees esp. reveals their tendency to define or delimit in later Judaism, they interposed between God and the world various sorts of intermediaries. The name of God, the glory of God and a host of angels, good and bad. They also fostered a new hope of the future, under the double form of the kingdom of God and the resurrection and immortality. How far these tendencies were due to the situation of Jewish social life is a matter for further research.

(4) Among the Hellenistic Jews in Alexandria, Aristobulus, the authors of Wisd and 4 Macc, and preeminently Philo, all deal with the two chief problems of Judaism, dualism and evil. They approach them under the direct influence of Greek thought. The idea of wisdom was merged into the Gr conception of the Logos, and so it becomes the mediator of God's thought and activity in the world.

Philosophy appears in the NT as intuitive, speculative and eclectic. (1) Jesus Christ came to fulfill the law and the prophets, and, out of His filial consciousness of God, He propounded answers to the practical demands of His time. His doctrine of God the Father was a philosophy of Nature and life which transcended all dualism. In the kingdom of heaven, the good would ultimately prevail over the evil. The law of love expressed the ideal of life for man as individual, and in his relation to society and to God, the supreme and ultimate reality. This teaching was given in the form of revelation, without any trace of speculation.

(2) The apostolic writings built upon the teaching and person of Jesus Christ. Their ruling ideas are the doctrines which He taught and embodied. In Paul and John, they are realized as mystical experiences which are expressed in doctrines of universal love. But we may also discover in the apostolic writings at least three strands of speculative philosophy. (a) Paul employed arguments from natural theology, similar to those of the Stoics (Acts 14 15-17; 17 22-23; Rom 1 19 ff), which involved the principles of the cosmological and teleological arguments. (b) John employs the Philenic term "Logos" to interpret the person of Christ in His universal relation to God, man and the world; and the main elements of Philo's scheme are clearly present in his doctrine, though here it is not an abstract conception standing between God and man, but a living person uniting the two (Jn 1 1-18).

Although the term "Logos" is not mentioned, in this sense, in Paul or He, the Philenic conception has been employed by both writers (Rom 5 8; 8 29; 1 Cor 16 24.25; 2 Cor 5 18.19; Phil 2 6; Col 1 15-17; 2 10; He 1 1-3.5.6). Paul also expresses his conception of Christ as the manifestation of God under the category of wisdom (1 Cor 1 20; 2 7; Eph 1 8; Col 2 3). (c) Both in Paul and He appear original speculations designed to interpret individual experience and human history as they contribute to God's purpose in Christ. Paul's interpretation consists of a series of parallel antitheses, flesh and spirit, sin and righteousness, law and grace, works and faith, Adam and Christ. But the author of He adopts the Platonic view that the world of history and phenomena is but the shadow of a succession of true and eternal reality which lies behind it, and which partially expresses itself through it.

(3) In the one place in which the term philosophy appears in the NT (Col 2 8), it seems to mean "subtle dialectics and profuse speculation, ... combined with a mystic cosmogony such as..." (Lightfoot, ad loc.), the first beginnings of Gnosticism in the Christian church. Paul warns his readers against it, as he also does the Corinthians against the "wisdom of God" (1 Cor 2 6, 6); 2 5.6). A similar tendency may be in view in the warning to Timothy against false doctrines (1 Tim 1 4; 1 4; 2 1 Tim 1 14.16 ff). But with the true spirit of philosophy, as the pursuit of truth, and the endeavor to grasp the nature and truth under natural and clearly the nature of reality, the spirit and work of the NT writers were in complete accord.

PHINEES, fin'ees (Phineas, Phiinês, Phineás; B [Swete], Finitely, Phinehas [1 Esd 8 31]).

(1) Phinehas, son of Eleazar, son of Aaron (1 Esd 5 5; 8 2.29; 2 Esd 1 2; 1 Macc 2 26; Sir 46 23).

(2) The father of Achias and son of Heli (Elia), a descendant of (1), and one of Ezra's progenitors (2 Esd 1 2); but this link is not found in Ezra's genealogy (1 Esd 8 13). In 2 Esd 1 4 Ch 6, and its insertion in 2 Esd 2 1 is a mistake, since Ezra's descent was from Eleazar, while this Phineas (Phinehas) was a descendant of Ithamar, the youngest son of Aaron.

(3) A Levite, the father of Eleazar (1 Esd 8 63) "Phinehas" of Ezr 3 33. But it is just possible that the well-known Eleazar (1) is referred to, and not another and different Phinees.

(4) AV = RV "Phineas" (1 Esd 5 31).

PHINEHAS, fin'as-as, az, fin'as-has, -has (πηνας, mouth of brasses):

(1) Son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron (Ex 6 25; cf 1 Ch 6 4; Ezr 7 5, where he is seen to be an ancestor of Ezra). He took a leading part in cleansing Israel from worship at Shittim. He there punished the brazen lily of the priestess, the woman bearing the ark of the covenant, of which Prince of Simeon, by slaying both him and the Midianite woman he had brought into camp (Nu 25 6-18). This incident is referred to in Ps 106 30.31 (cf 1 Macc 2 26.54; Sir 46 23.24). As priest he accompanied Joshua and was one of the leaders of the Midian (Nu 31 6). He was chief of the Korahite Levites (1 Ch 9 20), and succeeded his father as high priest. While he was in that office the civil war with Benjamin occurred, and it was he who delivered the oracle's decision to fight Benjamin (Jgs 20 28 ff). His faithful services secured to his house the succession of the priesthood (Nu 26 11-13). He was sent as ambassador to inquire into the reported idolatry of Reuben, Gad and part of Manasseh (Josh 22 13 ff 30-32). According to LXX he was buried with his father in Ephraim on the hill Gibeah Phinehas (see Josh 24 33). His character was marked with strict moral indignation and fine integrity.

(2) The younger son of Elei (1 S 1 3; 2 Esd 1 2, "Phineas"). See Hopni and Philaenae.

(3) Father of a priest named Eleazar (Ezr 8 33; cf ver 2; 1 Esd 8 63, "Phineas"). HENRY WALLACE

PHINOB, fin'-ob (Φινωβ, Phineob; AV: Phineas): Name of one of the families of temple-servants who went up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 31) = "Paseah" of Ezr 2 49; Neh 7 51.

PHLEGON, fle'gon, flag'on (Φληγόν, Phlegon): The name of a Roman Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16: 14). Of him nothing is known.

PHOEBE, φηβή (Φήβη, Φηβή; AV Phoebe): Described by St. Paul as (1) "our sister," (2) "who is a servant of the church that is at Cenchreae," (3) "a helper of many, and of mine own self" (Rom 16: 12). (1) "Our [Christian] sister": Paul calls the loving husband and wife "the brother or the sister" (1 Cor 7:15), and also says, "Have we no right to lead about a wife that is a sister?" (1 Cor 9:5 m.). The church was a family. (2) The Greek word τρις "servant" is diákonos. "Servant" is vague, and "deaconess" is too generalized. In the later church there was an order of deaconesses for special work among women, owing to the peculiar circumstances of oriental life, but we have no reason to believe there was such an order at this early period. If Phoebe had voluntarily devoted herself "to minister unto the saints" by means of charity and hospitality, she would be called diákonos. (3) The Greek word προστίτις τρις "helper" is better "patroness." The mss. is "the title of a citizen in Athens who took charge of the interests of clients and persons who wished to sue in the law courts. In the early Christian community the appearance of clients under a patron, and probably the community of Cenchreae met in the house of Phoebe. She also devoted her influence and means to the assistance of the more rather than the less, and that part, Paul was among those whom she benefitted. Gifford thinks some special occasion is meant, and that Paul refers to this in Acts 18:18. The vow "seems to point to a deliverance from danger or sickness" in which Phoebe was involved on that occasion.

It is generally assumed that this letter was taken to Rome by Phoebe, these verses introducing her to the Christian community. In commending her, Paul asks that the Rom Christians "receive her in the Lord," i.e. give her a Christian welcome, and that they "assist her in whatsoever matter she may have need" of them (Rom 16: 12).

PHOENICE, φήνις'-ία, PHOENICIANS, φήνικές, φήνικής. See PHOENIX

1. The only in Acts 11:19; 15:3; 21:2, the Phoenician land being generally designated as the "coast" or "borders of Tyre and Sidon" (Mt 15:21; Mk 7:24-31; Lk 6:17). In the OT we find it included in the land belonging to the Canaanites or to Sidon (Gen 10:19; 49:13; Josh 11:8; 1 K 17:9). The limits of P. were indefinite almost from the beginning, used by change writers including the coast line from Mt. Cassius on the N. to Gaza or beyond on the S., a distance of some 380 miles, or about 400 miles if we include the sweep of indentations and bays and the outstretching of the promontories. But in the stricter sense, it did not extend beyond Gabala (see Jethro) on the N., and Mt. Carmel on the S., or some 150 miles. The name was probably first applied to the region opposite Cyprus, from Gabala to Aradus and Marathus, where the date-palm was observed, and then, as it was still growing in places farther S., it was applied to that region also. The palm tree is common on the coins of both Arados and Tyre, and it still grows on the coast, though not in great abundance. The width of the land also was indefinite, not extending inland beyond the crest of the two ranges of mountains, the Baryulus (Nusairi Mountains) and the Lebanon, which run parallel to the coast and leave but little space between them and the sea for the greater portion of their length. It is doubtful whether the Phoenicians occupied the mountain tracts, but they must have dominated them on the western slopes, since they derived from them timber for their ships and temples. The width of the country probably did not exceed 25 or 30 miles at the most, and in many places it was much less, a very small territory, in fact, but one that played a distinguished role in ancient times.

There are few harbors on the whole coast, none in the modern sense, since what few bays and inlets there are afford but slight shelter to modern ships, but those of the ancients found sufficient protection in a number of places, esp. by means of artificial harbors, and the facility with which they could be drawn upon the sandy beach in winter when navigation was suspended. The promontories are few and do not extend inland to a great extent; in fact, they have been ingeniously described by the ancient writers (see Ladder of Tyre). The promontory of Carmel was, as it were, a long finger of land reaching from Tyre quite an extensive bay, which extends to Acre. The promontory rises to a height of 500 ft. or more near the sea and to more than double that elevation in its course to the S.E.

Mt. Lebanon, which forms the background of P. for about 100 miles, is a most striking feature of the landscape. It rises to a height of 10,200 ft. in the highest point, E. of Tripolis, and to 8,500 in Jebel Sannin, E. of Beirut, and the average elevation is from 3,500 to 4,000 ft. It is rent by deep gorges where the numerous streams have cut their way to the sea, furnishing most varied and picturesque scenery. It was originally heavily wooded with cedar, oak, and pine trees, which are still found in considerable numbers, but by far the larger part of the mountain has been denuded of forests, and the slopes have been extensively terraced for the cultivation of vines and fruit trees and the mulberry for silk culture. The plains along the coast are not extensive, but generally very fertile and bear abundant crops of wheat, barley and other cereals, where not given to the culture of the mulberry, orange, lemon, fig, apricot and other small fruits. In its greatest extent P. included the broad plain of Sharon and that of Acre, between Carmel and that city and a portion of the region watered by the Kishon, but the plains of P., strictly speaking, are much more restricted. They are: the plain of Tyre, long but narrow, extending from Ras el-'Abyadh to Sarepta; the plain of Sidon extending from Sarepta to the Bestremus (Nahr el-Auly); the plain of Beirut (Berytus) between the extensive sand dunes along the shore and the rocky cape on the W. and the foot of Lebanon, 10 or 12 miles long but only one or two wide, containing one of the largest olive groves in Syria; the very small plain of Tripolis, including that city and its port; and, the most extensive of all, the plain of Marathus, extending from Ark to Aratus or even beyond, including the river Ch獟is (Nahr el-Khobz). These plains furnished only a portion of the food needed by the inhabitants who were more or less dependent on their neighbors for it (1 K 5:11; Acts 12:20).

The rivers of P. are comparatively short and small; the Litani rises in the Buka', between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, and finds its way in a deep and narrow gorge between Lebanon and Mt. Hermon to the S. and finally turns westward and reaches the sea a few miles N. of Tyre, where it is called the Kasantikeh. About 12 miles N. of Beirut is the Dog River (Lycus), a very short stream but noted for the famous pass at its mouth, where Egypt, Assyra and Bab kings engraved their monuments; and on its north bank is the Oasis of the Adonis (Nahr Ibrāhīm), which comes down from 'Ajlūn (Ahecheh, Josh 13 4), noted for the rites of Venus and Adonis (see TAMMUZ), and the Eleusis, already mentioned, which runs through the valley between Baryulus and Lebanon and provides these two mountains with water within the desert. The other rivers are very short, but furnish a perennial water-supply to the coast dwellers.

The products of the land, as well as the climate, are very varied on account of the difference in elevation of the tracts suitable to culture, ranging in temperature from the semi-tropical to Alpine. How far the ancients cultivated the mountain sides we do not know, but they certainly profited largely by the forests of cedar and pine, esp. the former, which was the material for ship-building and architectural purposes and was highly prized, not only by the Phoenicians, but by Egyptians, Assyrians and Babylonians, who transported it to their own countries for buildings. The mineral products are found in abundance, and the Phoenicians are credited with the colonies and other lands for what they needed of these.

The narrowness of the land and the difficulty of expansion on account of the lofty mountain ranges and the continuance of the tribes throughout the interior led the Phoenicians to turn seaward for an outlet to their increasing population. We have only one instance of their attempt to colonize the Hinterland, and that ended in disaster (c. 1250 B.C.). Tyre, was not pleased with Solomon's gift of 20 cities in Galilee, probably not desiring to assume responsibility for their defense. It is likely that they founded colonies and the dominion of the sea was more inviting to them, and they found room for expansion in the islands and on the coast of the Mediterranean, where they established colonies far and wide. Their first over-sea possessions were in Cyprus, the coast of which they occupied in the 2nd millennium B.C. probably about 1500. On the southern coast they planted various colonies, such as Cyrtum, Idalium, Phoebus, and on the eastern, Salmis, Anmacha and Sidon, and, in the interior, Tharros, Elusa, Phocas, and on the southern coast of Cretica, and most of the islands of the Aegean. Their presence is recorded by Homer, and it was a Phoenician legend that records travels with the person of Cadmus, the reputed son of Agenor, king ofthumbs, Phoenicia. But it is doubtful whether they really colonized the mainland of Greece. They were more attracted by the lands farther to the W.

The greatest of their colonies was in Africa. They occupied Utica first, probably in the 12th cent. B.C., and others in the same year, until in the 9th cent. Great Carthage was founded, which was destined to become the richest and most powerful of all the great rival cities of the Mediterranean. The Phoenician colonies and the story of the city of Elusa, or Dido, the reputed Tyrian queen who led her followers to found what is perhaps the most romantic of all the legendary colonies, among which Baal is conspicuous. Other points along the coast were occupied, such as the island of Sicily, where Phoenician colonies were established on the south coast of Crete, and most of the islands of the Aegean. Their presence is recorded by Homer, and it was a Phoenician legend that records travels with the person of Cadmus, the reputed son of Agenor, the kingdom of the Thracians. Phoenicia was a place of trade as well as of culture; and the Phoenicians had sailed beyond the Pillars of Hercules into the ocean. But in their commercial dealings they were often unscrupulous, and their greed of gain often led them to take unfair advantage of the barbarous races with whom they traded. Their commerce was often as large as that of the Greek empire of the 4th and 3rd centuries B.C., and they were among the articles of commerce which furnished the materials of their extended commerce. They exhibited a boldness and audacity in braving the perils of the sea in their little ships, which, for the age, demands our admiration. They were the first who dared to sail out of sight of land, and it is probably that they were the first who crossed the Atlantic Ocean and reached the coast of America, as is stated in the Old Testament.

Their colonies were mostly factories for the exchange of their manufactured articles for the products of the lands they visited. They cared little about building up new states or for founding their colonies as a base of barbarous tribes and imparting to them culture. In this they were far surpassed by the Phoenicians, who profoundly modified the peoples and lands with which they came in contact.

The Phoenicians were the same as the Canaanites, under which name they are known in the OT, as well as by Sidonians (Gen 10 19; Nu 13 29). They were Semites if we may judge by their language and characteristics. It is true that, in Gen 10 6 Canaan is called a son of Ham, but it is also true that the language of Canaan is identified with Hebr. (Ish 19 18). If the early Phoenicians spoke a different tongue, they entirely lost it before their contact with the Hebrews. Their writings and all the references to them in ancient authorities show that their language was purely Sem. As to their origin and the time of their migration to the Syrian coast, it is more difficult to determine. Herodotus (i.2; vii.89) says that they lived at first on the Erythraean Sea, which is identified with the Pers Gulf, and modern authorities have not found evidence to support the statement that they were not the aborigines of the country, and must have come in with some of the various migrations from the E., which we know, from Egypt and Bab monuments, occurred in the 3d, perhaps in the 4th, millennium B.C. Some of them appear in Syria as early as the 1Vth Egyptian Dynasty, about 3000 B.C., and we may fairly conjecture that the Canaanites were in possession of the seacoast as early as 2500 B.C. It is possible that they were among the Hyksos invaders of Egypt after 1700 B.C.

That the Phoenicians took to the sea at a very early date and became the most skillful mariners of the ancient world is certain. Their enterprise in this direction is attested by classic writers, and the references to it in the OT are numerous. This was coupled with great industry and skill in the manufacture of the various articles which furnished the materials of their extended commerce. They exhibited a boldness and audacity in braving the perils of the sea in their little ships, which, for the age, demands our admiration. They were the first who dared to sail out of sight of land, and it is probably that they were the first who crossed the Atlantic Ocean and reached the coast of America, as is stated in the Old Testament.
position for their enterprise and skill in carrying on their trade, and in being the pioneers of civilization in many of the Mediterranean lands, esp. by their introduction of alphabetical writing, which was adaptable by all for its contributions to the culture of the ancient world.

(1) The Phoenicians were celebrated for their textile fabrics of silk, wool, linen and cotton. The materials of the last three were obtained from Syria and Egypt, but the silk came from the East. The Phoenicians, who were acquainted with the East, had obtained the silk stuff valuable for its fineness and beauty, and the dyers of these fabrics by a process invented by the Phoenicians, and the madder and dyes of the ancient world were unequalled by the dyers of the Tyrian purple famous throughout the world. The finer qualities of these fabrics were so precious that only the wealthy, or kings and princes, could obtain it, and it became at last a synonym of royalty. This dye was obtained from the shell-fish which was abundant in the Mediterranean, esp. along the Phoenician coast, species of the Murex and the Bucinum. The mode of manufacture is not definitely known and was probably kept a secret by the Phoenicians. At least they had a monopoly of the dye, which was exported from Tyre.

(2) Glass was another well-known product of the country, and although not invented by the Phoenicians as formerly supposed, it was made in large quantities and exported to all countries about the Mediterranean, by the Phoenicians.

(3) Pottery was also an article of manufacture and export, and some of the examples of their work found in Cyprus show considerable skill in the art of decoration as well as making. In this, however, they were far surpassed by the Greeks.

(4) Bronze was a specialty of the Phoenicians, and they were the first to introduce the use of tin, which they controlled the sources of supply of the copper and tin used in its manufacture. The remains of bronze manufactures are numerous, such as arms for offence and defence, knives, toilet articles, axes, sickles, cups, patrons, and various other household utensils. Articles for artistic purposes are not of high value, although the pillars named Jachin and Boaz, the molten sea, the bases, lavers and other articles cast by Hiram of Tyre for the temple of Solomon are the finest specimens of Phoenician metal, but some of the minor artifacts exhibited considerable artistic merit.

The range of their trade was much wider than is indicated by Ezekiel. We know they reached the Scilly Isles in Britain, and probably the Baltic, whither they went for amber, though this might have been brought overland to the Adriatic and received into the West by ships that sailed along the western coast of Africa as far as Cape Non, and perhaps farther. The Phoenicians expanded their activities throughout the Mediterranean and the Red Sea.

The ships in which the Phoenicians made these voyages were small as compared with the great vessels of the present day, but the largest known in their age, as we may infer from the long voyages they made. Their superior vessels were known to classical writers. In the famous poem of Xerxes to Greece the Phoenician ships exceeded all others in speed, and they were no less skilful than we know from illustrations upon the coins.

The ancients attributed the invention of the alphabet to the Phoenicians. This is now regarded as doubtful, and there are no reliable data for determining what people first analyzed speech to its ultimate elements, but to the Phoenicians belongs... the merit of bringing the invention to the knowledge of the western world. It is quite certain that the alphabets of Western Asia, and those of Europe were derived from the Phoenician and these characters. This is what we should have expected from their wide commercial relations. The alphabetic writing was in fact one of their chief and most important of all. The world owes a great debt to this people for this invaluable aid to literature, science and culture (see ALPHABET).

The Phoenician alphabet comprises 22 letters and is deficient in vowels, which were left to the reader supplied by the reader. This defect is common to the Sem alphabets, but was soon remedied when the Greeks adopted the Phoenician. Some of the letters have to serve for two sounds, such as the letters for or $\alpha$, for example, and the signs for $\beta$, for example, are a redundant sign for the sound of $\alpha$. Also the sounds of $\omega$ and $\nu$ are unrepresented. The origin of the letters is probably to be found in the hieroglyphic signs for words and syllables used by the Egyptians and others, since the similarity of some of them to these signs is evident, but in some cases it is more likely that the Phoenicians adopted hieroglyphics of their own. Thus the first letter, aleph, which means "ox," was evidently derived from the picture of an ox's head and then reduced to a conventional form.

The Phoenician alphabet and language were common to the Canaanitish tribes and the Hebrews, as we learn from the Bible. By the Phoenician alphabet the remains of their language are very scanty, mostly inscriptions, and these generally very brief. The longest inscription in Phoenician is that in the temple of Asman, and show the Phoenician character and style in its best form. Only two works of any length are known to us by Phoenician authors. The first is the History of Sennacherib, of Nineveh, the second of which Philo of Byblus claims to have translated from the Phoenician original. This, however, is doubted, and both the story of Tyre and the account of many of the coins, as well as its symbol, the club, since he was identified with Hercules. Herodotus describes his temple at Tyre to which he attributes great antiquity, 2,900 years before his time. Dagon (תֵּאָגָן, dāghôn) seems to have been the tutelary deity of Arvad, his head appearing on the early coins of the city. He seems to have been regarded as the god of agriculture by the Phoenicians, rather than of fishing as generally supposed. Adonis (אָדָו, adôn, "lord") was regarded as the son of Cinyras, a mythic king of Gebal and the husband of Ashreth. The myth of his death by the wild bear led to the peculiar rites of celebrating it, instituted by the women of Gebal at Apheca and on the river named after him (see TAMMUZ). Esmin (אֶסֶמִּין, esmîn) one of the sons of Siddik, the father of the Cabir, was esp. honored at Sidon and Beirut. At Sidon a great temple was built in his honor, the ruins of which have been recently explored and various inscriptions found dedicating it to him. His name signifies "the eighth," i.e. the eighth son of Siddik, the others being the Cabir, or Great Ones, who were regarded as presiding over ships and navigation, and as such were worshipped in many places, although their special seat was Beirut. Although they were called "Great" they are represented as dwarfs, and an image of one of them was placed on the prow, or

"lord" or "master"; Baal-samin, "lord of heaven"; Elun, "supreme"; &c. These terms imply either one God or one who is supreme among the gods and their ruler. But this belief was changed before the Phoenicians came into contact with the Hebrews, and polytheism took its place, though their gods were less numerous than among most polytheistic peoples. One of the most important of them all was Baal, who was regarded as the God of the gods and their ruler.

Baal (Phoen. בָּאַל, ba'al) was the chief deity and was universally worshipped, being usually designated by the title in each place: Baal of Tyre or Baal-Tarq, Baal-Sidon, Baal-Tars (Tarsus), Baal-bek, etc. He was regarded as the god of the generative principle in Nature, and his statues were sometimes flanked by bulls. He was identified with Zeus, and appears on the coins under the Greek type of Zeus, seated on a throne, holding an eagle in the outstretched right hand and a scepter in the left. Sometimes his head is encircled with rays showing him to be the sun-god.

Ashreth (Phoen. אֲשַׁרְתָּה, ashërôth) was the great Nature-goddess, the Magna Mater, queen of heaven (see GEN 14:18). She was a Canaanite deity, so she was often represented under the lunar aspect, Ashreth-karnaim, "Ashreth of the two horns" (Gen 14:5). Sometimes she is represented holding the dove, the symbol of fecundity, of which she was the goddess. She was commonly identified with Aphrodite or Venus. She, like Baal, had temples everywhere, and kings were sometimes her high priests, and her worship was too often accompanied with orgies of the most corrupt kind, as at Apheca (see ASHTORETH).

Among the other gods we may mention: El, or Elohim (אֵל, 'el), originally the designation of the supreme God, but afterward a subordinate deity who became the special deity of Byblus (Gebal), and was regarded by the Greeks as the same as Kronos.

Melkarth (fil, melkarth, "king of the city") originally was the same as Baal, representing one aspect of that god, but later a separate deity, the patron god of Tyre. He was identified on many of its coins, as well as his symbol, the club, since he was identified with Hercules. Herodotus describes his temple at Tyre to which he attributes great antiquity, 2,900 years before his time. Dagon (תֵּאָגָן, dāghôn) seems to have been the tutelary deity of Arvad, his head appearing on the early coins of the city. He seems to have been regarded as the god of agriculture by the Phoenicians, rather than of fishing as generally supposed. Adonis (אָדָו, adôn, "lord") was regarded as the son of Cinyras, a mythic king of Gebal and the husband of Ashreth. The myth of his death by the wild bear led to the peculiar rites of celebrating it, instituted by the women of Gebal at Apheca and on the river named after him (see TAMMUZ). Esmin (אֶסֶמִּין, esmîn) one of the sons of Siddik, the father of the Cabir, was esp. honored at Sidon and Beirut. At Sidon a great temple was built in his honor, the ruins of which have been recently explored and various inscriptions found dedicating it to him. His name signifies "the eighth," i.e. the eighth son of Siddik, the others being the Cabir, or Great Ones, who were regarded as presiding over ships and navigation, and as such were worshipped in many places, although their special seat was Beirut. Although they were called "Great" they are represented as dwarfs, and an image of one of them was placed on the prow, or stern, of each Phoen galley. The goddess Tanith (Tyche, tanith) occupied a lofty place in the pantheon, since in inscriptions she takes the precedence over Baal when the two names occur together. She, esp. honored at Carthage and to her was ascribed the excites mariners, such as "the highest of the gods"; "the mistress of the elements," etc. Besides some other gods of less note originally worshipped by the Phoenicians, they introduced some foreign deities into their pantheon. Thus Poseidon appears frequently in the coins of Beirut and became its patron deity in Rom times; Isis and her temple at Gebal are likewise represented on its coins, the Dioscuri or their symbols on those of Tripolis and Beirut, etc.

The corrupt nature of the Phoen worship has been referred to. It was also cruel, the custom of human sacrifices being common and carried to an extent unheard of among other peoples, such as the horrible sacrifice of 200 noble youths at Carthage when besieged by Agathocles. The sacrifice was by burning, the victim being placed in the arms of the statue of the god, heated for the purpose. In P. this god was Melkarth, or Molech, and the custom is denounced in the OT (Lev 20:2-5), but other gods were worshiped in this way. The letter of one of the Phoenicians was undoubtedly deep, but was corrupt and depraved.

The political history of P. is that of the towns and cities belonging to it. The country as a whole had no centralized government, but the city states formed federations and leagues of varying size, with the land as a political unit, which it never was.

The cities first came into notice in the period of the Judges, before the 10th cent. BC under Thothmes III. This king subdued most of the Phoen cities, or received their submission, in his numerous campaigns to Syria, and the Egypt rule continued with more or less interruption until the end of the 19th Dynasty, or about 300 years. During this time Arvad seems to have exercised the hegemony in the N., and Sidon in the S., with Gebal controlling the middle region. The Am Tab reveals many facts concerning the condition of things while the Egypt power was declining in the latter part of the XVIIIth Dynasty, esp. in the reign of Amenhotep IV (Ikhnaton). The rise of the Amorite and Hittite power in the N. threatened these cities, which were under Egypt governors, and the latter were called upon their suzerain for aid, which was not given, and they fell, one after another, into the hands of the enemy. Rameses II restored Egypt rule, but his successors of the XXth Dynasty could not maintain it, and the invasion of tribes from the W. and N., called the Paleset, or Philis, by land and sea, though repelled by Rameses III, continued to increase until the Egypt domination was broken, and the coast towns resumed their independence about the middle of the 12th cent. BC. Sidon came to the front among the chief cities of P., and is referred to by Joshua as "Great Sidon" (Jos 11:8).

Homer also mentions Sidon frequently, but makes no reference to Tyre. The latter city was certainly in existence in his day, but had not come to the front as the leading city in the mind of the Greeks. Yet it was a fortified city in the time of Joshua (19:29), and the king of Tyre is among the correspondents mentioned in the Am Tab. It seems to have taken precedence of Sidon when the latter was attacked by the Phlias of Askelon, and the inhabitants were compelled to flee. In all events Tyre exercised the hegemony in P. by the time David came to the throne, and had probably obtained it a century or two before, and held it until P. became subject to Assyria in the 9th cent. BC. Assur-nazir-pal first came into contact with P., which submitted to tribute, between 877 and 860 BC, and this subjection continued until the downfall of Assyria in the latter part of the 7th cent. BC. The subjection was nominal only for more than a century, the cities retaining their kings and managing their own affairs with no interference from the Assyrians as long as they paid the tribute. But with the advent of Tiglath-pileser in Syria, about 740 BC, conditions changed, and the Phoen towns were subjected to severe treatment, and some of the dynasts were driven from their cities and Assy governors appointed in their places. Their oppression caused revolts, and Elulaeus of Tyre united Sidon and the cities to the S. in a league to resist the encroachments of Tiglath-pileser and his successor Sargon. While the latter resisted, although the Assyrian gained over to his side Sidon, Acre, and some other towns and had the assistance of their fleets to make an attack upon the island city. The attack failed completely, and Shalmaneser III, in his report which he maintained for a quarter of a century, regaining control of the towns that had fallen away and also of Cyprus. Sargon (722-705 BC) let P. alone, but Sennacherib (705-681) determined to punish the king of Tyre and prepared an army of 200,000 men for the war with P. Elulaeus was afraid and fled to Cyprus, but his towns dared to resist and Sennacherib had to reduce them one after another, but did not succeed in taking Tyre itself. He set over the conquered territory a certain Tubaal, probably a Phoen, who paid him tribute. He also took tribute from Gebal and Aradus, which indicates that all of P. was subject to him, as these two cities probably controlled all that was not under Tyre. In the time of Esarhaddon (681-680) Sidon revolted under Abd-Melkarth, who was caught and beheaded, the city sacked, and the inhabitants either killed or carried into captivity, and it was repeopled by captives from the E. At a later date (672), when Asshur-nazir-pal set out for Egypt, Baal, the vassal king of Tyre, revolted and refused to aid him, but afterward submitted either to Esarhaddon or to his son Asshur-bani-pal and assisted the latter in his invasion of Egypt, 605 BC. Four years later, however, we find the Assy king besieging Tyre and punishing Baal by making him give his daughter to be a member of the Assyrian's harem. Baal himself was left on his throne. The same fate was the lot of the king of Aradus, and Ascho (Acre) was also punished.

The frequent rebellions of the Phoen towns show their love of independence and a sturdy resistance to oppression. They became freed from the yoke of Assyria probably about 630 BC, when the Medes attacked Nineveh and the Scythian hordes overran all Western Asia. The Phoen cities were fortified and did not suffer very much from the barbarian invasion, and, as Assyria was broken, they resumed their independence. In the struggle which followed between Egypt and Babylon for the mastery of Asia, P. fell to Babylon, a time, on the road of Egypt, but was not oppressed, and her towns prospered, and it was in this period that Tyre attained great wealth and renown as reflected in the Book of Ezek.
although the town on the mainland was destroyed, it is doubtful whether the king of Babylon took the island, for it must be stated that it was a subject of the Persian Empire. P. remained subject to Babylon until empire fell into the hands of the Persians (538), and then accepted the yoke of the latter in the days of Cambyses, if not earlier, but the Pers king does not seem to have used force to gain the adherence of the Phoen cities. P. must have needed their fleets to assist in the attack upon Egypt and secured them without difficulty. They aided him in the conquest of Egypt, but when he asked to proceed against Carthage they refused, and he had to desist. It was too necessary for him to run any risk of alienating it.

This navy was the strongest sea power of the Persians in all their coming wars with Greece. Without its assistance Darius and his successors could with difficulty have invaded that country or held in subjection the western coast of Asia Minor. P. remained faithful to her Persian rulers about 150 years, but when the general revolt of the western satrapies occurred in 302 BC, P. seems to have favored them, but no open rebellion broke out until 351, when Sidon and Tyre joined Tathit II (Ptolemies), both declared her independence and induced most of the Phoen cities to do the same. The Pers garrisons were massacred or driven out. Ochus, the king of Persia, marched with an army of 300,000 infantry and cavalry, the rebel kings, and Tabnit and Sidon in cowardly alarm, betrayed Sidon into his hands, but the citizens set fire to the city and destroyed themselves rather than fall into the hands of Ochus, who, as treacherous as Tabnit, slew the traitors (see Sidon). The other cities were submitted, and P. remained subject to Persia until the time of Alexander the Great. When this conqueror invaded the dominions of Persia and had defeated Darius at Issus, 333 BC, he demanded the submission of the Phoen cities, and all yielded save Tyre. Alexander was obliged to lay siege to it, which cost him 7 months of the severest labor, such was the valor and skill of the Tyrians. The capture of Tyre is reckoned as one of the greatest exploits of this mighty conqueror who stained his record by his cruel treatment of the brave defenders. He massacred the male prisoners and sold the remainder of the inhabitants, to the number of 30,000, into slavery (see Tyre). After the death of Alexander the Phoen cities were subject to Egypt and the Seleucids of Syria, the latter finally obtaining control of all by the victory of Antiochus III over Scopas in 198 BC. From this time on P. formed a part of the Seleucid kingdom until it passed, together with Syria and Pal, into the hands of the Romans. Its cities became the home of many Greeks and its language became largely Gr, as inscriptions and coins testify. The Romans had also much to do in modifying the character of the people, and some towns, Berytus, esp., became largely Roman. P. can hardly be said to have had a separate existence after the Gr invasion.

PHOENIX, fem. of Phoenix (see Phoeniz., AV Phoenix); A harbor in Crete (Acts 27:11). The Acts passage mentions the ship carrying St. Paul and the author of Acts, after it left Myra in Lycia, was prevented by adverse winds from holding a straight course to Italy, and sailed under the lee of Crete, off the promontory of Salamine (κατά Σάλαμον) The ship was then able to make her way along the S. shore of Crete to a harbor called Fair Havens (Kαλός Αὐτέρων, Kalós Limímenes), near a city Lassea (Lasæa, Lasæta). Thence, in spite of St. Paul's wish to winter in Fair Havens, it was decided to sail to Phoenix (Νησὺς Πύθος, Nēsûs Pythos) because it was inhabited by a people who had the same religious origin as the Phoenicians. The name Phoenix is given to at least two places, one on the E. coast of Crete, and the other on the S. coast of Crete. The former is mentioned in Acts 27:11. It is the site of the ancient city of Lissos, which was the chief town of Crete. The latter Phoenix is not referred to in the New Testament, but is mentioned by Ptolemy (538), and is probably the same as Leusa, a town mentioned in Acts 27:11.

POIYNIK, f. Phoii, Poii, Phoenix (AV Phoenix); A harbor in Crete (Acts 27:11). The Acts passage mentions the ship carrying St. Paul and the author of Acts, after it left Myra in Lycia, was prevented by adverse winds from holding a straight course to Italy, and sailed under the lee of Crete, off the promontory of Salamine (κατά Σάλαμον). The ship was then able to make her way along the S. shore of Crete to a harbor called Fair Havens (Kαλός Αὐτέρων, Kalós Limímenes), near a city Lassea (Lasæa, Lasæta). Thence, in spite of St. Paul's wish to winter in Fair Havens, it was decided to sail to Phoenix (Νησὺς Πύθος, Nēsûs Pythos) because it was inhabited by a people who had the same religious origin as the Phoenicians. The name Phoenix is given to at least two places, one on the E. coast of Crete, and the other on the S. coast of Crete. The former is mentioned in Acts 27:11. It is the site of the ancient city of Lissos, which was the chief town of Crete. The latter Phoenix is not referred to in the New Testament, but is mentioned by Ptolemy (538), and is probably the same as Leusa, a town mentioned in Acts 27:11.
stands. But this resort is not a suitable place for wintering in, and it is better either to take the words to mean, in sailor's language, "looking down the S.W. and N.W. winds"—a description which exactly fits the harbor at Loutro—or to assume that the reporter of the discussion referred to in Acts 27 10-12 or the writer of Acts made a mistake in describing a place which he had never seen. An inscription belonging to the reign of Trajan found at Tarsus shows that Egypt corn was not sent to lie up there for the winter.

PHOROS, fō'ros (Φόρος, Phorós, B. Svetel), Phōros, Phorēs [1 Esd 8:30, where AV Pharez]: Name of one of the families, part of whom went up from the exile with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 8:9) and part with Ezra (8:30 RV) = "Parosh" of Ezr 2:3; 8:3, and some members of whom had "taken strange wives" (1 Esd 9:20).

PHURAI, frū'ti, frū'ta-i (Φυραί, Phurai; al. in Ν and A. Φυραία, Phuraria, and Φυρύπι, Phurim; AV Phurim): In Ad Est 11:1, "the ep. of Phurah" means the preceding Book of Est. See Purim.

PHRYGIA, firi-ja (Φρυγία, Phrygia): A large ancient country of Central Asia Minor, very mountainous and with table-lands reaching 4,000 ft. in height, and watered by the rivers Guaramus, a tributary of the Trahe, which in early times invaded the country and drove out or absorbed the earlier Asiatic inhabitants, among whom were the Hittites. Thus the Phrygians borrowed much of oriental civilization, esp. of art and mythology which they transferred to Europe. To define the boundaries of Phrygia would be exceedingly difficult, for as in the case of other Asia Minor countries, they were always vague and they shifted with nearly every age. The entire country abounds with ruins of former cities, and with almost countless rock-hewn tombs, some of which are of very great antiquity. Among the most interesting of the rock sculptures are the beautiful tombs of the kings bearing the names Midas and Gordius, with which classical tradition has made us familiar. It seems that at one period the country may have extended to the Hespaspont, even including Troy, but later the Phrygians were driven toward the interior. In Roman times, however, when Paul was there, the country was divided into two parts, one of which was known as Galatian Phrygia, and the other as Asian Phrygia, because it was a part of the Roman province of Asia, but the line between them was never sharply drawn. The Asian Phrygia was the larger of the two divisions, including the greater part of the older country; Galatian Phrygia was small, extending along the Pasidian Mountains, but among its important cities were Antioch, Iconium and Apollonia. And the province of Asia was no longer kept together, its different parts were known as Phrygina Prima and Phrygia Secunda. That part of Asia Minor is now ruled by a Turkish wali or governor whose residence is in Konia, the ancient Iconium. The population consists not only of Turks, but of Greeks, Armenians, Jews, Kurds and many small tribes of uncertain ancestry, and of peculiar customs and religious practices. The people live mostly in small villages which are scattered throughout the picturesque country, and goat raising are the leading industries; brigandage is common. According to Acts 2:10, Jews from Phrygia went to Jerusalem, and in Acts 18:23 we learn that many of them were influential and perhaps fanatical. According to Acts 16:6, Paul traveled through his home country from Lystra to Iconium and Antioch in Galatian Phrygia.

Twice he entered Phrygia in Asia, but on his 2d journey he was forbidden to preach there. Christianity was introduced into Phrygia by Paul and Barnabas, Acts 16:1-4; 18:1-23, yet it did not spread there rapidly. Churches were later founded, perhaps by Timothy or by John, at Colossae, Laodicea and Hierapolis.

PHUT, fut (Φοῦτη, frul): See Put.

PHUVAH, fu'va. See Purah.

PHYGELUS, fi-je'lus (Φυγέλος, Phugelos; Tischendorf and WH, with others, read Φυγέλος, Phugelos, Phygellus or Phygelus [2 Tim 1:15]; AV Phygellus, fi-je'lus): One of the Christians who deserted Paul at the time of his 2d imprisonment at Rome. Paul mentions him, along with Hermogenes, as being among those "that are in Asia," who turned away from him then. What is meant may be that Phygellus and Hermogenes, along with other native Christians from Asia, were born in Rome when he was brought before the emperor's tribunal the second time, and that they had not merely taken no measures to stand by and support him, but that they had deserted him.

The meaning, however, may be that the turning away of Phygellus and Hermogenes from Paul took place, not in Rome, but in Asia itself.

The times during and immediately following the Neroonic persecution were more dreadful than can easily be conceived, especially the attempt to force the Christian name, and to do so in a wholesale fashion. A great community like the Christian church in Ephesus or in Rome was the terrible premonition of those times, when for a mere word—a word, however, denying the Lord that bought them—men were once set free from persecution, from the loss of property or of home, and from death. 1 Pet records how the aftermath of the Neroonic persecution had extended far indeed from Rome, where it had originated. Peter asks the Christians not to give way under "the fiery trial" which is trying them (1 Pet 4:12), and those whom he thus addresses were the members of the church throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia (1 Pet 1:1). The ep. to the seven churches in Asia in the Apocalypse also show how sore persecution had raged throughout that province. See Persecution.

But in addition to the temptation to deny Christ's name and to shrink to hear his name or to judge him false there was also another which pressed upon some of the churches, the temptation to repudiate the authority of Paul. Many passages in the NT suggest that Paul was sometimes very lightly esteemed, and how his authority was sometimes ridiculed, e.g. by persons in Corinth, and in the churches of Galatia.

What is said here is, that among the Christians of proconsular Asia, i.e. of Ephesus and the churches in the valley of the Cayster, there was a widespread defection from that loyalty to Paul which was to be expected from those who owed to him all that they possessed of the knowledge of Christ's salvation. "All that are in Asia turned away from me; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes." On the whole, all the necessary conditions of these words are satisfied by a reference to Rome and to Paul's environment there, and perhaps this is the more probable meaning. See Hermogenes.

PHYLACTERY, fi-lak'ter-i (φυλακτήριον, phyalakteiron, "guard"): This word is found only in Mt 23:5 in Our Lord's denunciation of the scribes and Pharisees, who, in order that their references works might "be seen of men," and in their zeal for the forms of religion, "make broad their phylacteries and enlarge the borders of their garments." The corresponding word in the OT, ἰδαφοῦς (Kodany in HDB suggests pointing as the segalote fem. sing,
Phoros

Physician

(tepheth), is found in three passages (Ex 13:16; Dt 6:8; 11:18), where it is tr4 "frontlets." This rendering, however, is not at all certain, and may have been read into the text from its later interpretation. In Ex 13:9 the corresponding word to the tepheth of ver 16 is zikkārōn, "memorial" or "reminder"; and in the || clauses of both verses the corresponding word is "a sign," "a sign" upon the hand, also used for the "sign" which Jeh appointed for Cain (Gen 4:15). It may be rendered then as a mark or ornament or jewel, and used figuratively of Jeh's Law as an ornament or jewel to the forehead of the Israelite, a reference to the charm or amulet worn by the pagans. The word used in the Talm for the phylactery is Tefērē, T'phillah, "prayer," or "prayer-band" (pl. T'phillim), indicating its use theoretically as a reminder of the Law, although practically it might be esteemed as an automatic and ever-present charm against evil: an aid within toward the keeping of the Law, a guard without against the approach of evil; a degradation of an OT figurative and didactic phrase to the materialistic and superstitious practices of the pagans.

The phylactery was a leather box, cube shaped, closed with an attached flap and bound to the person by a leather band. There were two kinds: (1) one to be bound to the inner side of the left arm, and near the elbow, so that with the bending of the arm it would rest over the heart, the knot fastening it to the arm being in the form of the letter yodh (י), and the end of the string, or band, finally wound around the middle finger of the hand, "a sign upon thy hand" (Dt 6:8). This box had one compartment containing one or all of the four passages given above. The writer in his youth found one of these in a comparatively remote locality, evidently lost by a Jewish peddler, which contained only the 21 text (Ex 13:11-16) in unpointed Heb. (2) Another was to be bound in the center of the forehead, "between thine eyes" (Dt 6:8), the knot of the band being in the form of the letter dālēth (ד), with the letter shin (ש) upon each end of the box, which was divided into four compartments with one of the four passages in each. These two Heb letters, with the ג of the arm-phylactery (see [1] above), formed the Divine name שד, shadday, "Almighty." Quite elaborate ceremonial accompanied the "laying" on of the phylactery, that of the arm being bound on first, and that of the head next, quotations from Scripture or Talm being repeated at each stage of the binding. They were to be worn by every male over 13 years old at the time of morning prayer, except on Sabbaths and festival days, such days being in themselves sufficient reminders of "the commandment, the statutes, and the ordinances" of Jeh (Dt 6:1).

The passages on which the wearing of the phylactery is based are as follows: "It [i.e. the feast of unleavened bread] shall be for a sign unto thee upon thy hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes, that the law of Jeh may be in thy mouth" (Ex 13:9); "And it [i.e. sacrifice of the firstborn] shall be for a sign upon thy hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes" (Ex 13:16); "thou shalt bind them [i.e. the words passages of Jeh] for a sign upon thy hand, and they shall be for frontlets between thine eyes" (Dt 6:8); "therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart and in your soul; and ye shall bind them for a sign upon your hand, and they shall be for frontlets between your eyes" (11:18). It is evident that the words in Ex are beyond all question used figuratively; a careful reading of the verses in Dt in close relation to their contexts, in which are other figures of speech not to be taken literally, is sufficient proof of their purely figurative intention also. Only the formalism of later ages could distort these figures into the gross and materialistic practice of the phylactery. Just when this practice began cannot accurately be determined. While the Talm attempts to trace it back to the primitive, even Mosaic, times, it probably did not long antedate the birth of Christ. In conservative Jewish circles it had been maintained that the custom originated in the days of Ezekiel, and at present is faithfully followed by orthodox Judaism. Every male, who at the age of 13 becomes a "son of the Law" (bar mitzvah), must wear the phylactery and perform the accompanying ceremony.

In the NT passage (Mt 23:5) Our Lord rebukes the Pharisees, who made more pronounced the unscriptural formalism and the crude literalism of the phylactery by making them excessively large, as also that they seek notoriety for their religiousness by the enlarged fringes, or "borders." See phylacteries; Frontlets; Pharisees.

PHYLARCH, φιλαρ'κης, philarchēs: Given in AV of 2 Mac 8:32 as a proper name "Phylarches; but in RV the phylarch of Timotheus's force"; "probably the captain of an irregular auxiliary force" (RVM), rather than a cavalry officer.

PHYLARChES, φιλαρ'κης (AV Philarches). See Phylarches.

PHYSICIAN, φίλισθ'αν (NEB), rôph'; latróps, iatrōs: To the pious Jew at all times God was the healer (Dt 32:39): "It was neither herb nor mollifying plaster that cured them, but thy word, O Lord, which healeth all things" (Wisd 16:12). The first physicians mentioned in Scripture are those of Egypt. Long before the sojourn of the Hebrews in that land, Egypt had a priestly class of physicians (aars) and a school for healers (Jehud). From the ancient medical papyri which have been preserved, the largest of which is the Papyrus Ebers, we know that the medical knowledge of these physicians was purely empirical, largely magical and wholly unscientific. In spite of their ample opportunities they knew next to nothing of human anatomy, their descriptions of diseases are hopelessly crude, and three-fourths of the hundreds of prescriptions in the papyri are wholly inert. Even their art of embalming was so imperfect that few of their mummies have remained in any other climate than that of Egypt. Physicians of this kind who were Joseph's servants embalmed Jacob (Gen 50:2) and Joseph (ver 26). It was not until the foundation of the School of Alexandria, which was purely Greek, that Egypt became a place of medical education and research.
There is no evidence that at any time the priests of Israel were reputed to be the possessors of medical knowledge or tradition. In the ceremonial law they had explicit instructions as to the isolation of those suffering from skin eruptions, so that they might recognize certain obscene and infectious forms. There was, however, no formal professional training, but with this duty as sanitary police their function ended, and they used no means to cure these diseases.

There is, as far as I know, no record or tradition of a priest-physician in Bible times. The records of cure by the prophets, esp. Elisha, are mostly recorded in personal and ceremonial uncleanliness, but with this duty as sanitary police their function ended, and they used no means to cure these diseases.

In the NT Our Lord’s saying, “They are who have no need of a physician,” etc., shows that there were physicians in Galilee (Mt 9 12; Mk 2 17; Lk 5 43). In Nazareth He quotes what seems to have been a proverb: “Physician, heal thyself” (Lk 4 23). There were physicians in Galilee who received fees from the woman of Caesarea Philippi who had the issue of blood (Mk 5 26; Lk 8 44). Of her there is a curious story told in Eusebius (VII, 18).

There are several Talmudic references to physicians; in Serḥalim 6 1, it is said that there was a physician at the temple to attend to the priests. A physician was appointed in every city (Gittin 129), who was to be the policeman for the local authorities (Babba’ bath Rabra’ 21a). The familiar passage in Eccles 38 1–15 RV in praise of the physician gives him but limited credit for his skill: “There is a time when in their very hands is the issue for good,” and later, “He that smiteth before his Maker, Let him fall into the hands of the physician.”

Luke, called “the beloved physician” in Col 4 14, is said by Eusebius to have been a native of Antioch and a physician by profession. According to Origen he was the unnamed “brother whose praise in the gospel is spread through all the churches” (2 Cor 8 18). There are evidences of his professional studies in the language of his writings, though of this probably more has been made by Hobart and others than it really merits. Had we not known of his profession it is doubtful whether it could have been conjectured from his choice of words. Sir W. Ramsay calls attention to the two words used for a physician in Acts 28 10–11; for the cure of Publius’ father, the word used is ἁθά, but for the healing of those who came later it is ἀθεραπεύω, which he renders “received medical treatment.” From this he infers that Luke helped Paul with these (Ramsay, Luke the Physician, 1905).

PI-BESETH, pi-bē’seth (πι-βηθ), pi-bheseth; LXX Βουβαστος, Bubastos; Eph. Pi-BAšt, “the house of Bašt,” the cat-headed goddess; the Egyptian form is usually ḫa-Bašt; it is doubtful if the form Pi-BAšt has yet been found; A city of ancient Egypt. The only occurrence of the name of this place in the OT is in Ezk 30 17, where it is coupled with Aven, i.e., On (Helipolis).

Pi-beseth was on the western bank of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, about 40 miles N. of Memphis, about 15 miles N.E. of On. Herod. otus found the city of Bubastis very similar to his day. The annual festival of the goddess, Bašt, was celebrated here with revolting license, similar to that of the festival of Syryd ol-Bedawer now kept in Tańta.

Pi-beseth was explored by Professor Naville under the Egyptian Exploration Society in 1887–80. There were uncovered ruins of Egypt from the 4th Dynasty of the Old Empire, the Middle Empire, an important Hyksos settlement, and ruins from the New Empire down to the end, and even from Rom times. The area of the ancient city, one of the most unique in all Egypt, is the cemetery of cats. These cats, the animal sacred to Bašt, were mummified at other places in Egypt, but at Pi-beseth they were burned and the ashes and bones gathered and buried in great pits lined with brick or hardened clay. Bones of the ichneumon were also found mixed with those of the cats in these pits (Egypt Exploration Fund Report, 1891).

PICTURE, pik’tár: This word is used 3 t in AV, viz. Nu 33 52; Isa 2 16; Prov 25 11. In Nu and Prov “pictures” represents the Heb word יִתְנָן, maskith, “showpiece,” “figure.” The context in Nu suggests that the “pictures” or “carved figures” (RV “figured stones”) which the Israelites were to destroy were symbols of Can. worship and therefore foreign to the religion of Jeh. In Prov for “pictures of silver,” ERV has “baskets [AV ‘network’] of silver,” but a more probable tr is “carvings of silver.” “Pictures” stands for a slightly different word (but from the same root) in Ezra, viz. יִתְנָן, ṣḥkith; RV renders “imagery” (in Dan “watchtowers”) of carved stones (of gods in animal or human shapes) on the pows of vessels.

PIECE, pik: In AV the word (sing. and pl.) represents a large number of different Heb words, many of which have more or less the same significance, e.g. piece of meat or flesh (Gen 16 10; 2 S 6 10; Ezk 24 4); of bread or cake (1 S 2 36; 30 12; Jer 37 21); of ground or land (2 S 23 11); of wall (Neh 3 11 19 5); of an ear (Am 3 12); of cloth or garment (1 K 11 30); of milstone (Jgs 9 53). It is used frequently in paraphrastic renderings of various Heb vbs.: “break,” “tear,” “cut,” etc, in pieces (Gen 44 28, etc).

In the NT “piece” renders ἐθάνατον, ἐπιθάνομαι, “piece” or “part of the cloth” (Mt 9 16; Mk 2 21; Lk 5 36). It is also found in paraphrastic renderings—broken in pieces (Mk 5 4), pulled in pieces (Acts 23 10).

PIECE OF GOLD: The word “pieces” is supplied in 2 K 5 8 (story of Naaman), “6,000 pieces of gold,” where RV reads more correctly suggests “shekels” (cf 1 K 10 16). See Money.

PIECE OF MONEY: Two words are thus rendered in AV ἄθηραπεύω, k-sחלק; παρεύρισκ, satér. RV gives only the first this rendering (Job 42 11).
The rich provided large and expensive cotes of moulded pottery for their birds, each section big enough for a single dove. The rows of openings resembling lattice work, so that Isaiah refers to them as "windows" (60:8). LXX reads σωροσ, σων νοσολης, lit. "with young" or "fledglings" (see below). The middle classes modeled cotes of oven-baked clay, and the very poor cut holes in the walls, the doors, and allowed the birds to enter and live with the family.

In wild estate, rock and wood pigeons swarmed in countless numbers through rocky caves and ravens and over the plains of Gennesaret, the forests of Giland and the woodlands itself. They remained throughout the season, breeding at all times. The doves were migratory, and were kept in confinement only as caged pets or to be held for sale for sacrifice. For these purposes, it appears that the dove was slightly preferred. When only one bird was to be used, a dove is always specified; where two, almost in every case the dove is mentioned first. Where one or the other will suffice, the dove seems to have been given preference. This may have been because it required more expense to procure a dove, and so it was considered a greater sacrifice. Everyone having a home of any sort had pigeons they could use, or they could be taken wild at any time. The dove is first mentioned in Gen 15:9: "And he said unto his servant, Take three years old, and a she-goat three years old, and a ram three years old, and a turtle-dove, and a young pigeon."

It will be observed that the dove is mentioned first, and it is specified that the pigeon was inadmissible, the reason being that the people protected their domesticated pigeons by using the wild for sacrifice, whenever possible. Young birds could be snared from a nest at almost any time of the year. The old birds, among the wild, were shy creatures, and much more difficult to capture in nets or snares than doves that came close to cities and villages to live, and exhibited much less fear of man than the wild pigeons. The next reference is in Lev 5:7; "And when his means sufficeth not for a lamb, then shall he bring his trespass-offering for that wherein he hath sinned, two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, unto Jeh; one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering." Here two birds of each kind were to be offered, if the person making the sacrifice could not afford a lamb. Again in Lev 12:6: "And when the days of her purification are fulfilled, for a son, or for a daughter, she shall bring a lamb a year old for a burnt-offering, and a young pigeon, or a turtle-dove, for a sin-offering, unto the door of the tent of meeting, unto the priest." Here is a rare instance where the text or the translators place the pigeon first.

"And on the eighth day he shall bring two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, to the priest, to the door of the tent of meeting" (Nu 6:10). In Cant 2:14:

"O my dove, that art in the covert of the rook, In the covert of the steep place, Let me see thy comeliness, Let me hear thy voice; For sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is lovely."

Here the text reads "dove," but the description of the location and the implication of the text prove the bird to have been a rock pigeon—a tender, loving thing, yet shy and timid, that peeps with eyes of bright concern over the rocks of its chosen home, down near the little indweller. "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?" Here is another place where the wrong bird is used. Doves were wild and migratory. They had no "windows." But the tile pots massed in rows and complete domestication, that they flew free, yet homed and bred in places provided by man at the time of the very first attempts to keep records of history. At the time the earliest Bib. accounts were written, pigeons were so domesticated that in all known countries of the East they were reckoned when an estimate was made of a man's wealth.
which is said in the law of the Lord, A pair of turtledoves, or two young pigeons." This describes the sacrifice offered in the temple by Mary following the birth of Jesus. Gene Stratton-Porter

PI-HAIROTH, pl-ḥa-ḥı’roth (πιθανωροθ), pl’-h’a-hı’roth [Ex 14 2–9; Nu 33 7–8]: Nothing is known of the meaning of the name 1. Meaning Pi-H. Some attempts toward an Of Name Egyptian etymology for it have been made, but without much success. Since the meaning of the name is unknown and no description of the place or its use is given, it is impossible to determine anything concerning the character of Pi-H., whether a city, a sanctuary, a fortress, or some natural feature of the landscape. Neither Pi-H. nor any other place mentioned with it can be exactly located. A recent discovery of manuscripts in Egypt furnishes a nothing connected to the account in the Bible itself. If any one of the places is located in connection with the crossing of the Red Sea could be located approximately, all the others could, also, be similarly located by the description given in the account in Ex. The route beyond the Sea has been marked with almost positive certainty. A journey along the way is so convincing that hardly anything can shake the conviction which it produces. This identification of the route of the exodus beyond the Sea required the place of the crossing to be within 3 days’ journey of Marah, which puts it somewhere near the modern Suez. It may be anywhere within 10 miles of that point. This approximately locates all the other places mentioned in connection with the crossing: Migdol must be Ras `Atak, or some other high point in the mountains of the western deserts, where might be placed a watch-tower. Pi-H. is between this point and the Sea and Baal-zephon near the opposite eastern shore. This puts Pi-H. at some point along the old shore line of the Sea within 10 miles of the site of modern Suez.

The name Pontius indicates the stock from which Pilate was descended. It was one of the most famous of Sannite names; it was a

1. Name Pontius who inflected on a Rom army and Office the disgrace of the Caudine Forks. The name is often met with in Rom history after the Hannibalian wars were conquered and absorbed. Lucius Pontius Aquila was a friend of Cicero and one of the assassins of Julius Caesar. The cognomen Pilatus indicates the family, or branch of the gens Pontius, to which Pilate belonged. It has been derived from pilum, the cap worn by freemen; this is improbable, as Pilate was of equestrian rank. It has also been derived from pilum, a spear. Probably the name was one that had descended to Pilate from his ancestors, and hence not mentioned in the book nowhere mentioned. Pilate was 5th procurator of Judea. The province of Judea had formerly been the kingdom of Archelaus, and was formed when he was deposed (6 AD). Speaking roughly, it took in the southern half of Pal, including Sa- maria. Being an imperial province (i.e. under the direct control of the emperor), it was governed by a procurator (see Procurator; Province). The procurator was the personal servant of the emperor, directly responsible to him, and he seemed with finance. But the powers of procurators varied according to the appointment of the emperor. Pilate was a procurator cum potestate, i.e. he possessed civil, military, and criminal jurisdiction. The procurator of Judea was in some way subordinate to the legate of Syria, but the exact character of the subordination is not known. As a rule a procurator must be of equestrian rank and a man of certain military experience. Under his rule, the Jews were allowed as much self-government as was consistent with the maintenance of imperial authority. The Sanhedrin was allowed to exercise judicial functions, but if they desired to inflict the penalty of death, the sentence had to be confirmed by the procurator.

We have no certain knowledge of Pilate except in connection with his time of rule in Judea. We know nothing of his birth, his origin, or his earlier years. Tacitus, when speaking of the cruel punishments inflicted upon the Jews by Nero upon the story that Christ, from whom the name “Christian” was derived, was put to death when Tiberius was emperor by the procurator Pontius Pilate (Annals xv.44). Apart from this reference and what is told us in the NT, all our knowledge of him is derived from two Jewish writers, Jos the historian and Philo of Alexandria.

Pilate was procurator of Judea, in succession to Gratus, and he held office for 10 years. Jos tells (Ant, xviii, 842) that he ruled for 10 years, that he was removed from office by Vitellius, the legate of Syria, and traveled in haste to Rome to defend himself before Tiberius against certain complaints. Before he reached Rome the emperor had passed away. Jos adds that Vitellius came in the year 39 AD to Judea to be present at Jesus at the time of the Passover. It has been assumed by most authorities (so HDB and EB) that Pilate had departed before this visit of Vitellius. They accordingly date the procuratorship of Pilate as lasting from 26 to 36 AD. As against this view, von Dobschütz points out (EB s.v. “Pilate”) that by this reckoning Pilate must have taken at least a year to get to Rome; for Tiberius died on March 16, 37 AD. Such a delay is inconsistent with the circumstances; hence von Dobschütz rightly dates the period of his procuratorship 27–37 AD. The procurator of Judea had no easy task, nor did Pilate make the task easier by his actions. He was not careful to conciliate the religious prejudices of the Jews, and at times this attitude of his led to violent collisions between ruler and ruled. On one occasion, when the soldiers under his command came to Jerusalem, he caused them to bring with them their ensigns, upon which were the usual images of the emperor. The ensigns were brought in privity by night, but their disposal was soon discovered. Multitudes of excited Jews hastened to Caesarea to petition him for the removal of the obnoxious ensigns. For five days he kept them seated to hear them. He took his place on the judgment seat, and when the Jews who were admitted he had them surrounded with soldiers and threatened them with instant death unless they ceased to trouble him with the matter. The Jews thereupon flung themselves on the ground and bared their necks, declaring that they preferred death to the violation of their ensigns. Two Pilate, unequipped with soldiers, were slain in this manner, yielded the point and removed the ensigns (Jos, Ant, xviii, iii, 1; BJ, ii, 2, 3).

At another time he was asked by the sacred treasure of the temple, called corban (κορβαν), to pay for bringing water into Jerusalem by means of the aqueduct. A crowd came together and clamored against him; but he had caused soldiers dressed as civilians to mingle with the multitude, and a given signal they fell upon the rioters. Immediately so severely with staves that the riot was quelled (Jos, Ant, xviii, iii, 2; BJ, ii, 4, 4).
Philip tells us (Logia ad Caïum, xxxvii) that on another occasion he dedicated some gift shields in the palace of Herod in honor of the emperor Tiberius. There was no representation of any forbidden thing, but simply the name of the donor and of him in whose honor they were set up. The Jews petitioned him to have them removed; when he refused, they appealed to Philip, who sent an order that they should be removed to Caesarea.

Of the incident, mentioned in Lk 13.1, of the Galileans whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices, nothing further is known.

Jos (Ant, XVIII, iv, 1,2) gives an account of the incident which follows in Lk, mentioning that a pretender arose in Samaria who promised the Samaritans that if they would assemble at Mt. Gerizim, he would show them the sacred vessels which Moses had hidden there. A great multitude assembled in readiness to ascend the mountain, but before they could accomplish their aim they were attacked by Pilate’s cavalry, and many of them were slain. The Samaritans thereupon sent an embassy to Vitellius, the legate of Syria, to accuse Pilate of the murder of those who had been slain. Vitellius, who desired to stand well with the Jews, deposed Pilate and appointed Flavius in his place, and ordered Pilate to go to Rome and answer the charges made against him before the emperor. Pilate set out for Rome, but, before he could reach it, Tiberius had died; and it is probable that, in the interval, Vitellius realized that Pilate had escaped the inquisition with which he was threatened. From this point onward history knows nothing more of Pilate.

The shortest and simplest account of Pilate’s dealings with Jesus Christ is given in the Gospel of Mk.

3. Pilate delivered to Pilate: that Pilate asked Jesus Christ receiving an affirmative answer; that, to Pilate’s surprise, Jesus answered nothing to the accusations of the chief priests; that Pilate tried to release Jesus according to an ancient custom; that the multitude, in spite of the protest of Pilate, demanded the release of Barabbas, and cried out that Jesus should be crucified; that Pilate, believing himself to be obliged to comply, and that Jesus, when He had been scourged and mocked, was led away to be crucified. Mk tells further how Joseph of Arimathaea begged of Pilate the body of Jesus. Pilate was surprised that Jesus died so quickly, and questioned the reason why. It is Pilate’s surprise and question are peculiar to Mk. Being satisfied on this point, Pilate granted the body to Joseph. Mt adds the dream and message of Pilate’s wife (27.19); it also tells how Pilate washed his hands before the people, disclaiming responsibility for the death of Jesus, and how the people accepted the responsibility (27.24); also how Pilate granted a guard for the tomb (27.62–66).

Lk alone narrates the sending of Jesus to Herod (23.6–12), and reports Pilate’s three times repeated assurance that he found no fault in Jesus (23.4–14.22). Jn gives by far the fullest narrative, which forms a framework into which the more fragmentary accounts of the Synoptics can be fitted with perfect ease. Some critics, holding that Mk alone is trustworthy, deny that the additional incidents given in Mt and Lk as apologetic amplifications; and many dismiss the narrative of Jn as wholly unworthy of credence. Such theories are based on preconceived opinions as to the date, authorship and reliability of the various Gospels. The critic who holds all the Gospels to be, in the main, authentic and trustworthy, will have no difficulty in perceiving that all four narratives, when taken together, present a story consistent in all its details and free from all difficulty.

See Gospels. It should be noted that John evidently had special opportunities of obtaining exacter knowledge than that possessed by the others, as he was present at every stage of the trial; and that his narrative makes clear what is obscure in the accounts of the Synoptics.

The parts may be fitted together thus: Jesus is brought to Pilate (Mt 27.2; Mk 15.1; Lk 23.1; Jn 18.28). Pilate asks Jesus a specific question (Mt 27.16–26; Mk 15.6–10; Lk 23.39). Pilate enters the praetorium, questions Jesus about His alleged kingship, and receives the answer that He rules over the kingdom of truth, and that no one can take the kingdom from Him. Pilate acknowledges the truth. Pilate asks: "What is truth?" (so interpreted in Mt) (Acts 17.38–39). Pilate sends the praetorium again to Jesus, and with more detail (Jn 18.38–39). Pilate brings Jesus forth (this is the only detail that needs to be supplied in order to make the harmonization correct, and in itself it is probably enough), and many accusations are made against Him, to which, to Pilate’s surprise, He makes reply. (Mt 27.12–14; Mk 15.1–2; Lk 23.2–4; Jn 18.39). Pilate offers to release Jesus, a suggestion whose reception is described in different forms (Mt 27.15–18; Mk 15.6–10; Jn 18.39). Pilate’s wife sends him a message warning him not to harm Jesus, because Jesus is mentioned as the Son of God. Pilate is compelled to drink a cup of poison (Mt 27.19). The people, persuaded thereto by the chief priests, cry out that they want Jesus to die. In spite of the repeated protests of Pilate, demand that Jesus shall be crucified (Mt 27.20–23; Mk 15.11–14; Lk 23.18–25; Jn 18.39). Pilate sends the soldiers before the people, and they take the demand of the people with them. Then Pilate releases Barabbas and orders Jesus to be scourged (Mt 27.26; Mk 15.15; Lk 23.24). Jesus is scourged and mocked, mocked and spat upon (Mt 27.26; Lk 23.30; Jn 19.1–3). Pilate again declares the innocence of Jesus, brings Him out again, and says: "Behold the man!" The chief priests and officers cry out: "Crucify him!" They accuse Him of making Himself the Son of God, and demand that Pilate should make it known by His own saying, that the people were sacrificing to Him the blood of the prince of the kings of this world. Pilate, in order to save his own position, tries to release Jesus, not as a king, but as a proselyte (Mt 27.22). Pilate sends the people to the judgment seat (see GABBASA, and says: "Behold, your King!" Again the cry goes up: "Away with Him, crucify Him!" Pilate says: "Shall I crucify your King?" (Mt 27.22). The chief priests answered with a loud renunciation of all that God had given them, saying: "We have no king but Caesar" (Jn 19.14–15). Pilate sentences Jesus and gives Him up to be crucified, and He is led away (Mt 27.31; Lk 23.20; Lk 23.24a; Jn 19.16). Pilate writes, and sends for the chief priests and officers to alter it (Jn 19.19–22). The Jews ask of Pilate that the body of the three who were crucified might be broken (Jn 19.23). Joseph of Arimathaea, who had previously asked from Pilate (Mt 27.57.58a; Mk 15.42; Lk 23.50–52; Jn 19.38a), Pilate is surprised that Jesus has died so soon, and demands the consent of the soldiers before he gives up to Joseph the body of Jesus (Mt 27.58b; Mk 15.45; Lk 23.56; Jn 19.38b). Pilate obtains permission from Pilate to take precautions against any theft of the body of Jesus (Mt 27.62–66).

Pilate is mentioned three times in Acts: in a speech of Peter (3.13), in a thanksgiving of the church (4.27), and in a speech of Paul (13.28). He is also mentioned in 1 Tim (6.13) as the one before whom Christ Jesus witnessed the good confession.

Eusebius, who lived in the 4th cent., tells us (HE, II) on the authority of certain Gr historians that Pilate fell into such crimes that he committed suicide. Various in Tradition apocryphal writings have come down and Legend to us, written from the 3d to the 5th cents., with others of a later date, in which legends and details are given. In all these a favorable view is taken of his character; hence the Coptic church came to believe that he became a Christian, and enrolled him among the number of its saints. His wife, to whom tradition gives the name of Claudia, is said to have been a Jewish proselyte at the time of the death of Jesus, and afterward to have become a Christian. Her name is honored along with Pilate’s in the Coptic church, and in the calendar of saints honored by the Gr church her name is found after the date October 27.
We find not unkindly references to Pilate in the recently discovered fragment of the Gospel of Peter, which was found in 1978, which places Jesus before 32 AD. In the so-called Gospel of Nicodemus, which belongs to the 1st or 2nd century, we find in the first part, called the Acts of Pilate, a long and vivid description of the trial of Christ, in the hall of judgment bowed down before Jesus, in spite of the efforts of the standard-bearers, and others who appeared to oppose him. “pillars” of heaven, of earth (Job 9:6; 36:11; Ps 75:3; 99:7). In the few instances of the word in the NT, the use is figurative. James, Cephas and John were reputed to be pillars of the church at Jerusalem (Gal 2:9); the church is “the pillar and ground of the truth” (1 Tim 3:15); he that overcomes is made a pillar in the temple of God (Rev 3:12); a strong angel had feet “as pillars of fire” (10:1).

Pillar of Cloud and Fire: The visible manifestation of the divine presence in the journeyings of Israel at the time of the Exodus. The pillar of cloud, as narrated, went before the people “by day in a pillar of cloud, to lead them the way, and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light.” The pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, depersonalized the deity before the people. (Ex 13:21-22; cf. 14:19-24; Nu 14:14). When the congregation was at rest, the cloud abode over the tabernacle (Ex 40:36; Nu 9:17; 14:14). When Jehovah wished to communicate His will to Moses, the pillar descended to the door of the Tent of Meeting (Ex 33:9-11; Nu 12:5; Dt 31:15). These descriptions are not to be rationalistically explained; what is depicted is a true theophany. Critical has sought to establish discrepancies, or inconsistencies, in the allusions to the cloud in the JE and the P parts of the narrative, but these are not made without scrupling: e.g. it is not the case that JE alone represents Jehovah as speaking with Moses in the cloud at the door of the tabernacle. The same representation is found in Ex 29:42.43, ascribed to P. An acute discussion of the alleged discrepancies may be seen in H. M. Wiener, Essays in Pentateuchal Criticism, 82 ff.

PIN (‘pîn), yāḥāḏ; from yāḥāḏ, “to drive in a peg”?): A cylindrical piece of wood or metal (e.g. brass, Ex 27:19) such as that used by weavers in beating up the woof in the loom (Jgs 16:14, where Delilah fastened Samson’s hair with the “pin”); or as a peg for hanging (Ex 16:3; cf. Isa 22:23; 1 Chr 23:8); or, as a tent-pin, such as those used in the tabernacle (Ex 27:19; 35:18; 38:20, 31; 39:40; Nu 3:37; 4:32; Jgs 4:21, where AV translates “nailed,” RV “tent-pin”); cf. 5:26, where Heb has the same word, RV “nailed”). The tent-pin, like that of today, was probably sharpened at one end (Jgs 4:21) and shaped at the other as to permit the attaching of the cords so frequently mentioned in the same connection (Ex 38:20; 39:40; Nu 3:57; 4:32; cf. Isa 33:20). From the acts of driving in the tent-pin (pil‘ā‘) and pulling it out (nā‘ād) are derived the technical Heb terms for pitching a tent and for breaking camp. Symmachus also tr‘ thdhrāb (Isa 41:19) by ‘rekhāa, piteka, the “elm.” The elm, Ulmus campestris, is rare in Pal and the Lebanon, though it is found today N. of Aleppo. Post (HDB, III, 592-93) considers that (1) should be tr‘ “pine,” which he describes as a “fat wood tree”; it is perhaps as probably a correct tr for (2), but great uncertainty remains. Two species of pine are plentiful in the Lebanon and flourish in most parts of Pal when given a chance. These are the stone pine, Pinus pinea, and the Aleppo pine, P. halepensis; all the highlands looking toward the sea are suited to their growth.

PINING, PINE, SICKNESS, SICKNESS: In the account of the epileptic boy in Mk 9:18 it is said that "he pineth away." The vb. used here (σκίνειν, xéraino) means "to dry up," and is the same which is used of the withering of plants, but seldom used in this metaphorical sense. The Eng. word is from the AS pinian and is often found in the Elizabethan literature, occurring 13 t in Shakespeare. In the OT it is found in Lev 26:39 (bir) and in Ezek 24:23 and 33:10. In RV it replaces "consumption" in Ezek 4:17. In all these passages it is the rendering of the Heb mōkkāb, and means expressly being wasted on account of sin. In Lev 26:16 "pine away" is used in RV to replace "cause sorrow of heart," and is the tr. of the Heb dāḇāh; and in Dt 28:65 "sorrow of soul" is also replaced in RV by "pinning of soul," the word so rendered being dāḇaḥon, which in these two passages is expressive of homesickness. In Isa 24:16 the recurred exclamatory, "my leanness," of AV is changed into "I pine away," the word being ráḏ. The starving people in Lmt 4:9 are said to pine away, the word so tr‘ being zāḇāh. All these Heb words have a general meaning of to dry or to waste or wear away, or to be exhausted by morbid discharges.

Pining sickness in Isa 38:12 AV is a mistranslation, the word so rendered, dešāh, meaning here the thorium by which the web is tied to the loom. The figure in the verse is that Hezekiah’s life is being removed from the earth by his sickness as the web is removed from the loom by having the thums cut, and being then rolled up. Both AVm and RVm have the correct reading, "from the thorium." LXX has εἰρήθη ἑγγίζωσα εἶκεντες, κριθὸν ἐγγίζωσα ἑκέμειν, and Vulg dum adipio ordinaverit, sweadebit me. The other rendering is due to another interpretation of the word which in a few passages, as Jer 65:15, like its ἀ‘ do, means something small, poor, and decaying or weak, such as the lean kine of Pharaoh’s dream (Gen 41:19).

ALEX. MACALISTER
PINION, pin'yun (πισιόν, 'πίσιόν, 'πίσιόν, 'πισθῶν): RV has tr² these Heb words uniformly by "pinion," where AV needs either "wing" or "feathers," with which words they stand in parallelism in all passages. The shorter Heb word is found only once, in Jeh's parable to Ezekiel: "A great eagle with great wings and long pinions [AV "longwinged"], full of feathers, which had divers colors, came unto Lebanon, and took the top of the cedar." (Ezk 17:3) The term (πισθῶν) is used of the wings of the dove (Ps 68:13), of the ostrich (Job 39:13) and of the eagle (Dt 32:11). Once (Ps 91:4) it stands in a figurative expression for the protective care of Jeh, which is bestowed on those that trust in Him.

PIRA, pîra (ὁ Πιρα, ὡς ἐκ Πειρᾶ, ήκ Πειρᾶς [1 Esd 5:19]): Thought to be a repetition of CapHira (cf. q.v.) earlier in the verse.

PIRAM, pîraman (Παράμενος, παράμενον, "indomitable"): King of Jarmuth, one of the five Amorite kings who leagued themselves against Joshua's invasion (Josh 10:3 ff).

PIRATHON, pîr'a-thon, PIRATHONITE, pîr'a-thon-ite (Πιραθών, πιραθών, Πιράθων, πιράθων): The home of Abdon the son of Hillel the Pirathonite (Jgs 13:18 AV), where also he was buried, "in the land of Ephraim in the mount of the Amalekites." The latter name may have clung to a district which at some former time had been held by the Amalekites. From this town also came Benamia, one of David's chief captains (2 S 23:30; 1 Ch 11:31; 27:14). It is probable to be identified with Per'ath, about 6 miles WSW of Nablus. A possible rival is Fir'on, 15 miles W. of Nablus. G.A. Smith suggests a position at the head of Wady Far'ah (HGHL, 555). Moore thinks it may have been in Benjamin, Abdon being a Benjaminite family (1 Ch 8:23;30; 9:36). It is just possible that the place may be identical with Pharathon, one of the towns fortified by Bachchides (1 Macc 9:50).

which connected Apamia with Antioc, and Antioc with Iconium. It was bounded by Lydia on the W., by the Phrygian country on the N., and by Isauria on the E.; but there is no natural boundary between Pisidia and Isauria, and the frontier was never strictly drawn. The name is used in its geographical sense in the Anabasis of Xenophon, who informs us that the Pisidians were independent of the king of Persia at the end of the 5th century BC. Alexander the Great had difficulty in reducing the Pisidian cities, and throughout ancient history we find the Pisidian mountains described as the home of a turbulent and warlike people, given to robbery and pillage. The task of subjugating them was intrusted by the Romans to the Galatian king Amyntas, and, at his death in 25 BC, Pisidia passed with the rest of Galatia into the Rom province Galatia. Augustus now took seriously in hand the pacification of Pisidia and the Isaurian mountains on the E. Five military colonies were founded in Pisidia and the eastern mountains—Corumana, Comana, Olobasa, Parlais and Lystra—and all were connected by military roads with the main garrison city Antioc, which lay in Galatian Phrygia, near the northern border of Moab plateau terminates to the W., the "top" or "head" of Pisgah being the point in which the ridge running out westward from the main mass culminates. The summit commands a wide view, and looks down upon the desert. The identification is made sure by the name Tac'tat ek-šuva found here, which seems to correspond with the field of Zophim.

Ashdod is the constr. pl. of 'aššūdāh (sing. form not found), from 'ešhadh, "foundation," "bottom," "lower part" (slope); of Assyry, "foundation." Some would derive it from Aram, "to pour," whereas "fall" or "slope" (OhL, s.v.). Ashdoth-pisgah overlooked the Dead Sea from the E. (Dt 3:17; 4:49; Josh 13:12; 13:20). There can be no reasonable doubt that Ashdoth-pisgah signifies the steep slopes of the mountain descending into the contiguous valleys.

It is worthy of note that LXX does not uniformly render Pisgah by a proper name, but sometimes by a derivative of lαζευόμαι, "to hew," but "to dress stone" (Nu 21:20; 23:14; Dt 3:27; 4:49). Jerome (Onom, s.v. Aṣḥadh) gives Abha, or as the LXX equivalent of Fasga. He derives Pisgah from pασγα, which, in new Heb, means "to split," "to cut off." This suggests a mountain the steep sides of which give it the appearance of having been "cut out." This description which applies perfectly to Jebel Nebā as viewed from the Dead Sea.

Psidia. An inscription discovered in 1912 shows that Quirinus, who is mentioned in Lk 2 2 as governor of Syria of Christ’s birth, was an honorary magistrate of the colony of Antioch; his connection with Antioch dates from his campaign against the Homonades—who had resisted and killed Amyntas—about 8 BC (see Ramsay in Expos., November, 1912, 385 ff., 406). The military system set up by Antiochus as a matter of course on that of Antioch, and from this fact, and from its proximity to Pisidia, Antioch derived its title “the Pisidian,” which served to distinguish it from the other cities called Antioch. It is by a mistake arising from confusion with a later political arrangement that Antioch, and designated “of Pisidia” in the majority of the MSS.

Psidia remained part of the province Galatia till 74 AD, when the greater (southern) part of it was assigned to the new double province Lycia-Pamphylia, and the cities in this portion of Pisidia now ranked as Pamphylian. The northern part of Pisidia continued to belong to Galatia, until, in the time of Diocletian, the southern part of the province Galatia (including the cities of Antioch and Iconium), with parts of Lycia and Asia, were formed into a province called Pisidia, with Antioch as its capital, and it was then that it is first correctly described as a city “of Pisidia,” although there is reason to believe that the term “Pisidia” had already been extended northward in popular usage to include part at least of the Phrygian region of Galatia. This perhaps explains the reading “Antioch of Pisidia” in the Codex Bezae, whose readings usually reflect the conditions of the 2nd cent. of our era in Asia Minor. This use of the term was of course political and administrative; Antioch continued to be a city of Phrygia in the ethnical sense and a recently discovered inscription proves that the Phrygian language was spoken in the neighborhood of Antioch as late as the 3rd cent. of our era (see also Calder in Journal of Rom Studies, 1912, 84).

St. Paul crossed Pisidia on the journey from Perga to Antioch referred to in Acts 13 14, and again on the return journey, Acts 14 24. Of 2. St. Paul those journeys no details are recorded in Pisidia in Acts, but it has been suggested by Hellenic and Howard that the “perils of rivers” and “perils of robbers” mentioned by St. Paul in 2 Cor 11 26 refer to his journeys across Pisidia, and Ramsay has pointed out in confirmation of this view that a considerable number of inscriptions in the region bears the name of Paul the hermaphroditic soldiers and robbers who kept the peace in this region, whereas others refer to a conflict with robbers, or to an escape from drowning in a river (The Church in the Rom Empire, 23 f.; cf. Journal of Rom Studies, 1912, 82 f.). Aciada, a city on St. Paul’s route from Perga to Antioch, is called by the Turks Kara Baulou; “Baulou” is the Turkish pronunciation of “Paulos,” and the name is doubtless reminiscent of an early tradition connecting the city with St. Paul. Pisidia had remained unaffected by Hellenic civilization and the Roman occupation at the time of St. Paul was purely military. It is therefore unlikely that St. Paul preached in Pisidia. Except on the extreme N.W., none of the Christian inscriptions of Pisidia—in glaring contrast with those of Phrygia—date before the legal recognition of Christianity under Constantine.

PISON, pis’ən. See PISHER.

PISPAS, pis’pəs (πίσπας, pis’pa’, “dispersion.” AV Pispah): A son of Jether, an Asherite (1 Ch 7 38).

PIT: The word translates different Heb words of which the most important are: (1) פִּתּ (pît), “pit” or “cistern,” made by digging (Gen 37 20); hence “dungeon” (Jer 38 6, m. “pit”); (2) פֶּתַח (pē’takh, “pit” or “well” made by digging (Gen 21 25); (3) פִּיתָה (pē’tah, generally rendered “hell” in AV (see HELL); (4) פִּיתָא (pē’tā), “a pit in the ground” to catch wild animals. (1), (2), and (4) above are used metaphorically of the pit of the “grave” or of Sheol (Ex 23 15; 30 3; Job 23 24). AV sometimes incorrectly renders (4) by “corruption.” (5) פִּיתָה (pē’tah), “pit,” literally (2 S 17 9), and figuratively (Jer 49 43). In the NT “pit” renders βόθων, bôthous (Mt 16 14), which means any kind of hole in the ground. In the corresponding passage Lk 16 24 (N.A.V.) has διστασμόν, “a bottomless pit” (Rev 20 1, AV, etc. see Anayas). T. LEWIS

PITCH, pi’th (נֵפָה, nēfāh, kēphār, kēramôn): The word is found chiefly in the OT in the sense of an open space, a strong place, a city. It is used of such places as were the ordinary stations for the shepherds, their “cover,” i.e., the place where they pitched their tents. It is rendered in such cases by AV, “pitch,” and in others by “set.” In Jer 49 43 it is translated “well,” and in Matt 16 14 “hole.” It is used of the place where the wheat germ was placed in the process of preservation (Ps 34 7). In such cases the word is translated “well,” and in others “hole.” It is also used of a walled place, the name being the same as (2) above. For “bottomless pit” (Rev 20 1, AV, etc. see Anayas).

PITON, pi’ton (πιθόν, pithón; Πειθό, Peithó [Ex 1 11]): Champollion (Geogr. Læx., s.v.) considered this name to mean “a narrow place” in Coptie, but it is generally of Name explained to be the Egyptian Pa-tum, or “city of the setting sun.” It was one of the cities built by the Hebrews (see RAAMSSES), and according to Wessel was the Theba of the Antonine Itinerary.

Brugsch (Hist Egypt. 1879, II, 343) says that it was identical with “Heracleopolis Parva, the capital of the Sthorotic nome in the age of the Greeks and Romans; half-way on the great road from Pelusium to Tanis (Zean), and this indication given on the authority of the itineraries furnishes the sole means of fixing its position.” This is, however, disputed. Tan was supposed to have been at Thebes, at Zebu and later at Pelusium (Brugsch, Geogr. I, 345) was also called Pa-tum.

There were apparently several places of the name; and Herodotus (II 158) says that the City of Darius began a little above Bubastis, “near the Arabian city Patoumous,” and reached the Red Sea.

(1) Dr. Naville’s theory.—In 1855 Dr. E. Naville discovered a Roman milestone of Maximian and soldiers, proving that the “city of Peitho” at Tell el Maataf (“the walled mound”) in Wady Tamidít. The modern name he gives as Tell el PITY, pit'ë (חֵנוֹן, hánōn, הֵנַח, hēnach; ἔλεος, eleōs): "Pity," probably contracted from "piety," is a tender feeling for others in misery or distress. It is allied to compassion (q.v.), but differs in respect to the object the tenderness of Pity is directed toward. The feeling of pity is excited chiefly by the weakness, miserable or degraded condition of the object; compassion by his uncontrollable and inevitable misfortunes: "We pity a man of weak understanding who exposes his weakness or compassion the man who is reduced to a state of beggary and want." (Crabb, English Synonyms.) Pity often becomes allied to contempt; "a pity" is something to be regretted. See PITY. In the OT "pity" is closely akin to "mercy." It is most frequently the tr of קַסּוֹל, "to pity," "to spare," e.g. in Nathan's parable of the poor man's lamb, it is said that the rich man was worthy to die because he had "no pity" (2 S 12 6).

In Jer 13 14 we have, "I will not pity nor spare, nor have mercy," RV "compassion." cf. 31 7; Lam 2 2; Ezek 5 11; 7 4, in all of which passages "pity" stands in a negative connection: we have it positively attributed to God (Gen 45 8; Ezek 38 21; Isa 55 9, RV "grace, mercy, kindness") in the name, RV "regard"; Joel 2 18; Jer, probably meaning, primarily, "to cover" or "to hide". In the time of M Hempth, son of Rameses II (Brusgh, Hist I, 128), we have a report that certain nomads from Aduma (or Edom) passed through "the Ketam" (or fort) of M hempthotep, which is now called Tell Hekte, to the borders of Egypt (or canals) of the city P(kun) of M hempthotep, which are situated in the land of T-k, in order to feed themselves and to feed their herds.

(2) Patounos of Herodotus.—These places seem to have been on the eastern borders of Egypt, but may have been close to the Bitter Lakes or farther N. (see Succoth), whereas Tell el Mahbalah is about 12 miles W. of Ismâmâ'îch, and of Lake Timsâh. The definition of the Pithon thus noticed as being that of M hempth suggests that there was more than one place so called, and the Patounos of Herodotus seems to have been about 30 miles farther W. (near Zagazig and Babastis) than the site of Heropolis, which the LXX identifies with Goshen and not with Pithon. The latter is not noticed as on the route of the Exodus, and is not identified in the OT with Succoth. In the present state of our knowledge of Egyptian topography, the popular impression that the Exodus must have happened in the time of M hempth, because Pithon was at Heropolis and was not that of the time of Rameses II, must not be regarded as very hazardous. See EXODUS. The Patounos of Herodotus may well have been the site, and may still be discovered near the head of Wady Tumadél or near Babastis. C. R. CONDER

PITHON, pit'thon (πίθων, pithôn): A grandson of Meribbaal, or Mephibosheth (1 Ch 35 9). PITYFUL, pit'i-ful: As found in Scripture, means "full of pity"; it is expressed by חֵנוֹן, hánōn, ἔλεος, eleōs, from ἐλέειν, pl. ἐλεήμονα, "bowels, "compassion" (Lam 4 10, AV, its only occurrence in the OT), "the hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children." In Isa 5 11, we have the beautiful saying: "the Lord is very pitiful [RV "full of pity"] and of tender mercy," where "very pitiful" is the tr of πετάλωσιν, lit. "of many bowels," a word which does not occur elsewhere; it might be 1δραίόν or "tender-hearted." In Ecclus 20:13, the Lord is very pitiful (αἰκτίωσιν); εἰκαστίωσιν, "well-angered," "companionsate," "full of pity," occurs in 1 Pet 3 8, "Love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous," RV "loving as brethren, tenderhearted, humble-minded." The word is found in Fr Man 7, XII P, Zeb 8 2.

PLACE, plâs: Normally for πόλις, makkôn, OT, and πόλεως, pólos, NT, but in AV "place" represents a great number of Heb and Gr words, often used with no difference in force (e.g. 2 Ch 35 10.15). RV has made few changes, but occasionally has attempted to specialize the meaning (Gen 40 13; Job 37 8; Acts 8 22; Jas 1 11). PLACE, BROAD. HIGH. See CITY, II, 3, 2; HIGH PLACE; OPEN PLACE.

PLOUGUE, plûg (πλῆκτος, nephos, πλάκα, makhâ, núlē, magâphôrâ; μῶστρις, mátistix, πλῆκτρον, plûktron): This word which occurs more than 120 t is applied, like pellucity, to such sudden outbursts of disease as are regarded in the light of Divine visitations. It is used in the description of leprosy about 90 t in Lev 13 and 14, as well as in Dt 24 8. In the poetical, prophetic and eschatological books it occurs about 20 t in the general sense of a punitive disaster. The Gospel references (Mt 3 10; 5 29,34; Lk 7 21) use the word as a synonym for disease. The specific disease now named "plague" has been from the earliest historic times a frequent visitant to Pal and Egypt. Indeed in the S.E. between Gaza and Babastis it has occurred so frequently that it may almost be regarded as endemic. The suddenness of its attack, the rapidity of its incubation period and the rapidity of its course give it the characteristics which of old have been associated with manifestations of Divine anger. In the early days of an epidemic it is no infrequent occurrence that 90 per cent of those attacked die within three days. I have seen a case in which death took place ten hours after the first symptoms. In the filthy and insanitary hovels of eastern towns, the disease spreads rapidly. In a recent epidemic in one village of 534 inhabitants 311 died within 21 days, and 1 once crossed the track of a party of pilgrims to Mecca of whom two-thirds died of plague on the road. Even with modern sanitary activity, it is very difficult to root it out, as our recent experiences in Hong Kong and India have shown.

Of the Bib. outbreaks that were not improbably bubonic plague, the first recorded is the slaughter of the firstborn in Egypt—"the 10th plague." There is too little information to identify it. (Ex 11:1). The Philis, however, used the same name, neghph, for the Egypt plagues (1 S 4:8) as is used in Ex. The next outbreak was at Kibroth-hattaavah (Nu 11:33). This was synchronous with the phenomenon of plagues, and if these were, as is probable, driven by the wind from the plague-stricken Syrian region, they were equally probably the carriers of the infection. Experience in both India and China shows that animals of very diverse kind can carry germs of the disease. A third visitation fell on the spies who brought back an evil report (Nu 14:37). A fourth destroyed those who murmured at the destruction of Korah and his fellow-rebels (Nu 16:4). These may have been recurrences of the infection brought by the plagues. The fifth outbreak was that which followed the gross religious and moral detection at Baal-peor (Nu 25:9.18; 26:1; 31:16; Josh 22:17; Ps 106:29.30). Here the disease was probably conveyed by the Moabites.

A later epidemic, which was probably of bubonic plague, was that which avenged the capture of the ark (1 S 6). We read of the tumors which were probably the "plague of leprous sores," which is here connected also that at the time there was a plague of rats (6:5) —"mice," in our version, but the word is also used as the name of the rat. The cattle seem to have carried the plague to Beth-shemesh, as has been observed in modern times. The plague was in that place for nine days (6:19). Considering the three days' pestilence that followed David's census (2 S 24:15; 1 Ch 21:12), see Jos., Astr. VII. xiii. 3. The destruction of the army of Zemerdiah may have been a sudden outbreak of plague (2 K 19:35; Isa 37:36). It is perhaps worthy of note that in Hierodocus' account of the destruction of this army (ii.141) he refers to the recurrence of some of the symptoms.

One of the latest prophetic mentions of plague is Hos 13:14, where the plague (dékēh, LXX dikē) of death and the destruction (kôthbēh, LXX kēntron) of the grave are mentioned. From this passage Paul quotes his apostrophe at the end of 1 Cor 15:55, but the apostle correlates the sting (kēntron) with death, and changes the dikē into nikēs.

LITERATURE

The Heb words are so used as to give the name "plagues" to the "wonders" God did against Pharaoh. Thus it appears that the introduction language in the account in Ex puts forward the wondrous character of these dealings of Jehovah with Pharaoh. The account of the plagues is found in Ex 7:8-12:31; Ps 78:52-51; 105:27-35. The plagues have a devotional purpose and do not give a full historical narrative. Ps 78 omits plagues 4, 6, 9; Ps 105 omits plagues 5 and 6. Both pass change the order of the plagues. Account of the preparation which led up to the plagues is found in the narrative of the burning bush (see BURNING BUSH), the meeting of Aaron with Moses, the gathering together of the elders of Israel for instruction, and the preliminary wonders before Pharaoh (Ex 3:4). This preparation contemplated two things important to be kept in view in considering the plagues, namely, that the consummation of plagues was contemplated from the beginning (Ex 4:22-23), and that the skepticism of Israel concerning Moses' authority and power was likewise anticipated (Ex 4:1). It was thus manifestly not an age of miracles when the Israelites were expecting such "wonders" and ready to receive anything marvelous as a Divine interposition. This skepticism of Israel is a valuable help in the credibility of the account of the "wonders." The immediate occasion of the plagues was the refusal of Pharaoh to let the people have liberty for sacrifice, together with the consequent hardening of Pharaoh's heart.

No indication of any localizing of the plagues is given except in Ps 78:12-13, where the "field of Zaan" is mentioned as the scene of the contest between Jehovah and the Egyptians. But this is poetry, and "the field of Zaan" means simply the territory of the great capital Zaan. This expression might be localized in the Delta or it might extend to the whole of Egypt. Discussion of the plagues has brought out various classifications of them, some of which are philosophical, as that of Philo, others fanciful, as that of Origen. The order of the plagues for the purpose of moralizing are entirely useless for historical consideration of the plagues. The only order of any real value is the order of Nature, i.e. the order in which the plagues occurred, which will be found to be the order of the natural phenomena which were the embodiment of the plagues.

Much elaborate effort has been made to derive from the description of the plagues evidence for different documents in the narrative. It is pointed out that Moses (E) declared to Pharaoh that he would smite the waters (Ex 7:17), and then, when his words were not fulfilled, he would tell us that Aaron smote the waters (7:19-20). But this is quite in accord with the preceding statement (4:10) that Aaron would be ready to smite, and possibly to cope deal with God, Aaron with Pharaoh. Again it is noticed that some of the plagues are ascribed to the immediate agency of Jehovah, some are ascribed as coming through the mediation of Moses, and still others through the mediation of Moses and Aaron. It is possible this may be an exact statement of facts, and, if the facts were just so, the record of the facts affords no evidence of different documents.

An examination of the account of the plagues as it stands will bring them before us in a most graphic and connected story.

I. THE NATURAL PHENOMENA.

—All the "wonders" represented anywhere in Scripture as done by the power of God are intimately associated with natural phenomena. In Egypt—"the 10th plague"—human beings have no other way of perceiving external events than through those senses which only deal with natural phenomena. Accordingly, all theophanies and miraculous doings are embodied in natural events.

The presence of Jeh with the sacrifice by Abraham was marked by the appearance of a "burning furnace and a burning lamp" between the pieces of the offerings (Gen 15:17 AV). The majesty and power of God at Sinal were manifested in the "cloud" and the "bright light" as the "voice" and the "sound of a trumpet" (Ex 13:19). The Deity of Jesus was attested on the mountain by a "voice" (17:5), Jesus Himself was "God, ... manifest in the flesh" (1 Tim 3:16). He was 3 "foursquare" in fashion as a man (Phil 2:8). And all the miracles of Jesus were of a kind sensible phenomena: He sent them to the sea and it was calm; He touched the leper and he was clean; He called to Lazarus and he came forth.

Yet in all these natural events, the miraculous working of God was as clearly seen as the natural phenomena. It is thus to be expected that the "wonders" of God in the land of Pharaoh should also be associated with natural events as well as manifest miraculous elements. The "blood" in the river, the "frogs", hopping about on the land, the "flies," the "gnats," the "murrain," the "hail," the "locusts," the "darkness," and the "pestilence" are all named as natural phenomena. Long familiarity with the land of Egypt has made it perfectly plain to many intelligent people, also, that, if not quite, all the plagues of Egypt are still in that land as natural phenomena, and occur, when they do occur, very exactly in the order in which we find them recorded in the narrative in Ex. But natural events in the plagues as in other "wooded miracles" are doings.

The first of the plagues (חָרָם, ħâram, from חָרָם, ḥârâm, "to be red" [Ex 7:19-25]) was brought about by the smiting of the water with the rod in the hand of Aaron, and it consisted in the defamation of the water so that it became blood. The waters were polluted and the fish died. Even the water in vessels which had been taken from the river became corrupt. The people were forced to get water only from wells in which the river water was filtered through the sand. There are two Egypt seasons when, at times, the water resembles blood. At the full Nile the water is sometimes of a reddish color, but at that season the water is quite potable and the fish do not die. But at the half-time of the flood it is watered from the time of the lowest Nile just before the rise begins. Then also the water sometimes becomes defiled and very red, so polluted that the fish die (Bib. Sacra, 1905, 409). This latter time is evidently the time of the plague. It was the same time in the month of May. The dreadful severity of the plague constituted the "wonder" in this first plague. The startling character of the plague is apparent when it is remembered that Egypt is the product of the Nile, the very soil being all brought down by it, and its irrigation being constantly dependent upon it. Because of this it became one of the earliest and greatest of the gods (Breasted, Development of Religion and Thought in Egypt, 3-47; "Hymn to the Nile," Records of the Past, New Series, 3, 48, 54). The magicians imitated this plague with their enchantments. Their success may have been by means of sleight of hand or other devices of magic, as may be seen in the East today, with claim of supernatural aid, and as used in western lands for quite similar purposes, but it may have, as has been suggested, that they counted upon the continuance of the plague for at least a time, and so took advantage of the materials the "wonder" had provided.

1. Water Turned to Blood

Spawn in the mud is hatched by the sun, and the marshes are filled with myriads of these creatures. The frog was the hieroglyph for the "wonders," and the Egyptians, being much given to fishing, were greatly disturbed in the marshes, but in this case they came forth to the horror and disgust of the people. "Frogs in the houses, flies in the beds, frogs baked with the food in the oven." Frogs in the kneading troughs worked up with the flour; frogs with their monotonous croak, frogs with their cold slimy skins, everywhere—"from morning to night, from night to morning—frogs." The frog was also associated with Divinity, was the symbol of Hest, a form of Hathor, and seems also at times to have been worshiped as a god. This plague created such horror that thus early Pharaoh came to an agreement (8:1-10). A time was set for the disappearance of the frogs that he might know that "there is none like unto Jeh our God," but when the frogs were dead, Pharaoh hardened his heart (8:15). In this plague the magicians did in like manner with their enchantments (7). Frogs were plentiful, and it would not seem to be difficult to claim to have produced some of them.

It is impossible to determine which of the two more troublesome pest of Egypt is meant by the 3rd plague, whether body-louse or mosquitoes or sandflies or ticks or fleas or flies or gnats. The Egyptians are disposed to think it was not. Certainly that reason of the months spent in Egypt, not that Pharaoh put his faith on the Nile, but in a native village, will furnish very satisfying evidence that stinging and biting insects are a very real plague in Egypt yet. The magicians failed with their enchantments and acknowledged that Divine power was at work, and seems to have acknowledged that Jeh was abominations (8:19), but Pharaoh would not heed them.

As the seasons pass on, after the recession of the waters, the flies (חָרָם, ħâram, "swarrows," probably of flies [Ex 8:20-32]) became more and more numerous and they are almost a plague every year. The flies are changed variety of this plague. The plague of flies is a greater and greater every year. The magicians imitated this plague with their enchantments. Their success may have been by means of sleight of hand or other devices of magic, as may be seen in the East today, with claim of supernatural aid, and as used in western lands for quite similar purposes, but it may have, as has been suggested, that they counted upon the continuance of the plague for at least a time, and so took advantage of the materials the "wonder" had provided.

2. The Plague of Frogs

The frogs (חָרָם, ħâram, probably "marsh-leapers" [Ex 8:1-13]) are very abundant just after the high Nile when the waters begin to recede.

3. The Plague of Lice

Those who have experience of these pests in Egypt are quite ready to except any of them as adequate for the plague. Lice seem rather to be ruled out, unless different kinds of lice were sent, as there is no kind that torments both man and beast. All the other insect pests appear in incredible numbers out of the "dust" when the pools have dried up after the reeding of the waters. The assertion that the account of this plague is not complete, because it is not recorded that Pharaoh asked its removal or that Moses secured it, is amazing. Perhaps Pharaoh did not, in fact, ask its removal. There seems also at this time some difficulty in Moses having access to Pharaoh after this plague (8:20). Perhaps the Egyptians was not removed at all. The Egyptians are disposed to think it was not. Certainly that reason of the months spent in Egypt, not that Pharaoh put his faith on the Nile, but in a native village, will furnish very satisfying evidence that stinging and biting insects are a very real plague in Egypt yet. The magicians failed with their enchantments and acknowledged that Divine power was at work, and seems to have acknowledged that Jeh was abominations (8:19), but Pharaoh would not heed them.

4. The Plague of Flies
In addition to the separation established between Israel and the Egyptians, a definite time is now set for the coming of the 5th plague. It is to be noticed also that diseases of cattle are described (v. 17), debter, a term usually translated as "destruction." [Ex 9 1-7] and of men few quickly after the plague of insects. This is in exact accord with the order of Nature as now thoroughly understood through the discovered relation of mosquitoes and flies to the spread of diseases. Rinderpest must have been at times in Egypt; so that beef becomes very scarce in market and is sometimes almost impossible to obtain. It is a fact, also, that the prevalence of cattle plague, the presence of boils among men (see 6, below) and the appearance of bubonic plague are found to be closely associated together and in this order. The mention of camels as affected by this plague is interesting. It is doubtful if any clear indication of the presence of the camel in Egypt so early as this has yet been found among the monuments of Egypt. There is in the Louvre museum one small antiquity which seems to me to be intended for the camel. But Professor Maspero does not agree that it is so. It would seem likely that the Hyksos, who were Bedouin princes, princes of the desert, would have introduced with the wells of the desert to Egypt. If they did so, that may have been sufficient reason that the Egyptians would not picture it, as the Hyksos and all that was theirs were hated in Egypt.

In the plague of boils (טוען, skhén, and רבקת, 'āḇhāḇāṯ, "boils") [Ex 9 8-17] ashes were used, probably in the same way and to the same end as the clay was used in opening the eyes of the blind man (Jn 9, 6), i.e. to attract attention and to fasten the mind of the observer upon what the Lord was doing. This plague in the order of its coming, immediately after the murrain, and in the description given of it and in the significant warning of the "pestilence" yet to come (Ex 9 15), appears most likely to have been pestis minor, the milder form of bubonic plague. Virulent rinderpest among cattle in the East is regarded as the precursor of plague among men and is believed to be of the same nature. It may well be, as has been thought by some, that the great aversion of the ancient Egyptians to the contamination of the soil by decaying swine and the desire of the miseries of starting an epidemic of plague among men (Dr. Merrin, Bib. Sacra, 1908, 422-23).

Hail (טוען, bārāḏ, "hail") [Ex 9 18-35] is rare in Egypt, but is not unknown. The writer himself seems to have seen a very little, and has known of one instance when a considerable quantity of hail as large as small marbles fell. Lightning, also, is not as frequent in Egypt as in many semi-tropical countries, yet great electric storms sometimes occur. This plague is quite accurately dated in the seasons of the year (9 31.32). As the first plague was just before the rising of the Nile, so this one is evidently about 9 months later, when the new crops after the inundation were beginning to mature, January-February.

The plague of locusts (טוען, 'ārebh, "locust") [Ex 10 1-20] was threatened, and so frightened were the servants of Pharaoh that they persuaded him to try to make some agreement with Moses, but the attempt of Pharaoh still to limit in some way the going of Israel thwarted the plan (Ex 10 7-10). Then devouring swarms of locusts came up over the land as far as the desert of the Red Sea. They devoured every green thing left by the hail. The desperate situation created by the locusts soon brought Pharaoh again to acknowledgment of Jehovah (10 16). There was the same persistence yet manifested by Pharaoh, but he soon showed that it was deceitful, and again he would not let the people go. When the wind had swept the locusts away, he hardened his heart once more.

The progress of the season has been quite marked from the first plague, just before the rising of the waters, on through the year until now the khamis period (טוען, ḫōsekh, "darkness") of "darkness" from any cause [Ex 10 21-29] has come. When this dreadful scourge comes with its hot sand-laden breeze more unendurable than a London fog, it is in very truth a "darkness which spreadeth over the face of the earth." The dreadful horror of this monster from the desert can hardly be exaggerated. Once again Pharaoh said "Go," but this time he wished to retain the flocks and herds, a hostage for the return of the people (10 24). Upon Moses' refusal to accept this condition, he threatened his life. Why had he not done so ere this? Why, indeed, did he let this man Moses come and go with such freedom, defying him and his people in the very palace? Probably Moses' former career in Egypt explains this. As is most probable, he had grown up at court with this Merenptah, and had been known as "the son of Pharaoh's daughter," heir to the throne and successor to Ramesses II, instead of Merenptah, then this refuge had undoubtedly many friends still in Egypt who would make his death a danger to the reigning Pharaoh.

No intimation is given of the exact character of the death inflicted on the firstborn (טוען, bēkhr, "firstborn," "chief" or "best") of the Egyptians, of the Firstborn by the angel of the Lord, or its appearance. But it is already foretold as the "pestilence" (9 15). The pestis major or virulent bubonic plague corresponds most nearly in its natural phenomena to this plague. It culminates in arrival of the disease and overwhelming violence, in which the strongest and bost, and then subsides with startling suddenness.

Thus it appears that probably all the plagues were based upon natural phenomena which still exist in Egypt in the same order, and, when they do occur, find place somewhere during the course of one year.

II. Miraculous Use of the Phenomena.—The miraculous elements in the plagues are no less distinctly manifest than the natural phenomena themselves.

There was an intensification of the effect of the various plagues so much beyond all precedent as to impress everyone as being a special Divine manifestation, and it was so.

1. Intensification

There was national horror of the blood-like water, disgust at the frogs, intolerable torture by the stinging insects and flies, utter ruin of the farmers in the loss of the cattle, the beating down of the crops by hail, and the devouring of every green thing by the locusts; the sufferings and dread of the inhabitants by reason of the boils, the frightful electric storm, the suffocating darkness and, finally, the crushing disaster of the death of the firstborn. All these calamities may be found in Egypt to the present day, but never any of them, not to say all of them, in such overwhelming severity. That all of them should come in one year and all with such devastation was plainly a Divine arrangement. Merely natural events do not arise in such a systematic fashion. In this systematic severity were seen miracles of power.

The prediction of the plagues and the fulfilment of the prediction at the exact time to a day, sometimes to an hour, is the conclusion of the thunder and lightning): There was first a general prediction (Ex 3 19-20; 7 3; 9 14-15) and an indication as the plagues went on that the climax would be pestilence (9 15). Then several of the plagues were specifically announced and a time was set for them; e.g. the flies (8 23), the murrain (9 5), the hail (9 18), the locusts (10 4), the death of the firstborn (11 4). In some cases a time for the removal of the plague was also specified: e.g. the frogs (8 10), the thunder and lightning (9 20). In every instance these predictions were exactly fulfilled. In some instances careful foresight might seem to supply in part this ability to predict. Perhaps it was the means of such foresight that magicians "did not do with their enchantments" for the first two plagues. The plague being in existence, foresight might safely predict that it would continue for a little time at least, so that, if the magicians sought for the bloody water or called for frogs, they would seem to be successful. But the evidence which Jehovah produced went beyond them, and, at the third plague, they were unable to do anything. These things postulate, on the part of Moses and Aaron, a knowledge far beyond human ken. Not only magicians could not do so with their enchantments, but modern science and discoveries are no more able so to predict events. Even meteorological phenomena are only predicted within the limits of reasonable foresight. Such wonders as the plagues of Egypt can in no wise be explained as merely natural. The prediction was a miracle of knowledge.

The discrimination shown in the visitation by the plagues presents another miraculous element more significant and important than either the miracles of power or the miracles of knowledge. God put a difference between the Egyptians and the Israelites, beginning with the plague of darkness and continuing, apparently, without exception, until the end. Such miracles of moral purpose admit of no possible explanation but the exercise of a holy will. Merely natural events make no such regular, systematic discriminations.

The orderliness and gradually increasing severity of the plagues with such arrangement as brought "judgment upon the gods of Egypt," vindicating Jehovah as Ruler over all, and educating the people to know Jehovah as Lord of all the earth, present an aspect of events distinctly non-natural. Such method reveals also a Divine mind at work.

Last of all and most important of all, the plagues were so arranged as to accomplish in particular a great Divine moral purpose in the revelation of God to the Israelites, to the Egyptians and to all the world.

5. Moral Purpose

This is the distinctive mark of every real miracle. And this leads us directly to the consideration of the most important aspect of the plagues.

III. The Divine Moral Purpose.—This discriminating of the gods of Egypt is marked at every step of the progress of the plagues, and the accumulated effect of the repeated discriminating of the gods must have had, and, indeed, had, a great influence upon the Egyptians. The plagues did 'execute judgment against the gods of Egypt' (12 12), and the people and princes brought great pressure to bear upon Pharaoh to let the people go (10 19). The Egyptians, who claimed to represent the gods of Egypt were defeated, Pharaoh himself, who was accounted divine, was humbled, the great god, the Nile, was polluted, frogs defiled the temples and, at last, the sun, the greatest god of Egypt, was blotted out in darkness.

Pharaoh was made to know that Jehovah is Lord, and acknowledged it (9 27; 10 16). To this end the issue was clearly drawn. Pharaoh challenged the right of Jehovah to command him (5 2), and God required him then to 'stand' to the trial until the evidence could be fully presented, in accordance with the fundamental principle that he who makes a charge is bound to stand to it until either he acknowledges its utter falsity or affords opportunity for full presentation of evidence. So we see God made Pharaoh to 'stand' (9 16) while the Bible, which speaks in the concrete language of life, calls it the hardening of Pharaoh's heart (9 32) until the case was tried out (cf Lamb, Miracle of Science, 126-49).

A more blessed and gracious moral purpose of the plagues was the revelation of God as the Saviour of the world. This began in the revelation of Jehovah at the burning bush, where God, in fire, appeared in the bush, yet the bush was not consumed, but saved. This revelation, thus given to the people, was further evidenced by the separation between Israel and the Egyptians; was made known even to the Egyptians by the warning before the plague of hail, that those Egyptians who had been impressed with the power of God might also learn that He is a God that will save those who give heed to Him; and, at last, reached its startling climax when the angel of the Lord passed over the blood-marked door the night of the death of the firstborn and the institution of the Passover.

Last of all, the plagues had a great moral purpose in that they equipped the Divine of evil in the experience of men in this world. As Divine experience of Job illustrates the Use of Evil, use of evil in the life of the righteous, so the plagues of Egypt illustrate the same great problem of evil in the life of the wicked. In the one case, as in the other, the wonders of God are so arranged as 'to justify the ways of God to men.'

The minutely accurate knowledge of life in Egypt displayed by this narrative in the Book of Ex is inconceivable in an age of so little and difficult intercommunication between nations, except by actual residence of the author in Egypt. This has an important bearing upon the time of the composition of this narrative, and upon the question of its author.

Literature.—The literature of this subject is almost endless. It will suffice to refer the reader to all the general commentaries and the special commentaries, on discussion of doctrinal and critical questions. Two admirable recent discussions of the plagues, in English, are Lamb, Miracle of Science, and Mering, The Plagues of Egypt," in Biblica Sacra, 1908, July and October.

(1) Kikkār, when meaning "plain" usually refers to the alluvial plain about Jericho near the north end of the Dead Sea: "Plain [RVm 'circle'] of the Jordan" (Gen 13:10,11; 1 K 7:46; 2 Ch 4:17); "Plain of the valley of Jericho" (Dt 34:3); "cities of the Plain" (Gen 13:12; 19:29); "the all Plain" (Gen 19:17,25); "by the way of the Plain" (2 S 18:25); but "the plain round about Jerus" (Neh 12:28).

(2) Mishār, EV "plain," RVm usually "tableland," clearly refers in most places to the highlands of Gilead and Moab, E. of the Jordan and the Dead Sea; e.g. Josh 13:9, "the plain [RVm 'tableland'] of Medebea.

(3) Bīlāh is more often trd "valley" (q.v.).

(4) Arābāh is in RV often trd "the Arabah," denoting the whole Jordan-Dead-Sea-Arabah depression = Arab. Ghawr (Ghôr).

In Dt 11:30, AV has "champaign" (q.v.). The "plains of Moab" (Nu 23:1; 25:3-5; 31:12; 33:48,49,50; 36:1; 36:3; 14:6, 13; 13:32) and "plains of Jericho" (Jos 10:13; 10:2; 2 K 25:3; Jer 39:5; 52:8) are the low plain or ghawr N. of the Dead Sea.

Arābāh is here equivalent to kikkār (see above). Note the distinction between mishār used of the highlands, and kikkār and arābāh used of the plain. See ARABAH.

(5) Skerphélāh is by RV throughout trd "lowland" (q.v.), and includes the western slopes of the Judean hills and the maritime plain.

PLAIN, plain, PLAINLY, plā′ni: In Gen 25 27, AV "plain" represents סלך, tām. If a contrast between the vocations of Jacob and Esau is meant, RV ("quiet," m "harmless") may be right. But elsewhere (Job 1:1; Ps 37:37, etc) the word means "perfect," and so probably here; the failings of the great patriarch did not detract from the general estimate of him (Mt 8:11). In Ezr 4:18 translated (RVm) is better than "plainly read.

PLAIN, CITIES OF THE. See CITIES OF THE PLAIN.

PLAIN OF MOAB: In Dt 1 1; 2 8, "plain," is trd in RV. "Arabah," and explained, "the deep valley running N. and S. of the Dead Sea." It was here that Moses delivered his last addresses. Usually the word is pl. הַרְבָּה, 'ārābāh, the "plains" or steppes of Moab (Nu 22:1, etc; Dt 34:18).

An interesting description is given in an article on "The Steppes of Moab" by Professor G. B. Gray in EXPOS, January, 1905. See MOAB.

PLAIN OF THE PILLAR (בְּנֵבֶל, 'bēlān, μνημονεῖον; B reads πρὸς τὴν ἐπίστευσιν τῆς στασίας τῆς ἐν Σικελίῳ, πρὸς τὴν βαλίντ τῇ θεωρεῖται τῇ θάλασσα τῇ εἰς Σικελίῳ): A column in Μοσχοῦ, and the second Μοσχοῦ: With RVm we must read "terebinth of the pillar," the place where the men of Shechem and Beth-millo made Abimelech king (Jgs 9:6).

This was one of the sacred trees of which there seem to have been several near Shechem. See MOSCHIM, OAK OF. "The pillar" may possibly have been the great stone which Joshua set up "under the oak that was by the sanctuary of Jeh" (Josh 24:26). W. EWING

PLAISTER, plaśtər. See PLASTER.

PLAETING, plaťing, plaťing (from OFr. pleít, lat. planctum, "fold"): An interweaving, braiding, knot; an elaborate gathering of the hair into knots; éparce, empłéké, " outward adorning of plaeting the hair" (1 Pet 3:3). Compare "platted" (Isa 9:16). See CLOTHES OF THORNS (Mt 27:29; Mk 15:17; Jn 19:2). See BRAIDED, BRAIDING.

PLANE TREE, plān'tree (ἡμέλαμον, śālāwak, πλανόσιν, plánonos [Gen 30:37], ἀρμόνιον, ἀρμόνιον ["pine" or "firm") [Ezk 31:8]; AV chestnut): "Armōn is supposed to be derived from ἡμέλαμον, sharp, meaning "to be bare" or "unshackled," this is considered a suitable term for the plane, which sheds its bark annually. The chestnut of AV is not an indigenous tree, but the plan, Plania orientalis, is one of the finest trees in Pal, flourishing esp. by water courses (cf Ezek 14:14).

PLANETS, plan'ets (ἡλικόν, mazzalith). See ASTROLOGY, II, 3.

PLAIN, plank: Thick beams or pieces of wood, for which several Heb words are used. RV changes "planks" (of fir) into "boards" in K 6 15, and in a few instances substitutes "planks" where AV has "boards" (Ex 27:8; 38:7, the altar; Ezek 27:5).

So in the NT in Acts 27 44, for σκέφτες, sarto. See SHIPS AND BOATS, II, 2, (3).

PLANT, PLANTS. See BOTANY.

PLASTER, plaśtər (טְל, sidāh): In Egypt, now as anciently, the buildings are plastered inside and out. The poor quality of the stone commonly used makes this necessary if a smooth attractive surface is desired. Among the poorer classes, clay mixed with straw is used. In Pal and Syria, where there is a rainy season, the coating on the outside walls, if of clay, must be frequently renewed. In Egypt burnt gypsum, and in Pal and Syria burnt limestone (lime) are the commonest materials for making mortar. For the first coat of plastering the lime is mixed with "fat" red sand or with the ash from the bathhouse fires, and the finishing coat is composed of white sand and slaked lime with or without chopped flax straw. The plaster on some of the ancient Egyptian ruins seems to indicate words have about the same meaning. (1) The "pledge" is, as in modern Eng., security given for future payment (Gen 38:17-24) or conduct (Hab 2:6), where the conquered nations have given guarantees of their subserviency to the Chaldeans; AV's "thick clay" here rests on a misreading of the Heb. In 2 K 18:23 (= Isa 36:8) the "pledge" is a wager (so RV). Rabshakeh mockingly dares Hezekiah to stake a "pledge" that he can produce 2000 men for the defence of Jerusalem, although the mighty Assyr host has that number of horses alone. The general point of the obscure passage Prov 20:16 (= 27:13) is that he who guarantees strangers needs a guaranty himself. 1 S 17:18 is uncertain and the text may be corrupt. If not, the "pledge" is some (presarranged?) token of the welfare of David's brethren. (2) Most of the occurrences of "pledge," however, deal with the debts of the very poor, who had no property that they could spare even temporarily. Consequently, the execution of a pledge from such persons worked genuine hardship, and to take a pledge at all was a cruel act (Job 24:3), although of course the dishonesty of withholding a pledge (Ezk 18:7; 35:15) was worse. In those cases the creditor who took the pledge was the debtor, and the guarantee that he gave was the security for the debt. The garbment the borrower was wearing (Am 2:8; Job 22:6; 24:9 m.), and special legislation controlled this practice. A garment (the outer "clack")—see Dress—not worn while doing manual labor so that one could not easily cut it (Ex 22:26; Dt 24:12-13), for it was the usual covering of the sleeper. (Apparently, though, the creditor regained custody of it in the daytime until the debt was paid.) A widow's clothing, however, was entirely exempt (Dt 24:6), as was the heir's small estate (Num 36:6, making it 24:6). The lender had no right of entry into the borrower's house to obtain the pledge (24:10,11), but it is not said that he could not dictate what he would accept; indeed, the contrary is inconceivable. (3) ARV gives "pledge" for AV and ERV "faith" in 1 Tim 5:12. See also Earnest.

The ancients preferred plastered surfaces for


PLEIADES, pl′-a-dez, pl′-ya-dēz, pl′-ay-dēz. See Astrology, 10; Astronomy, II, 10.

Pleroma, pl′-rō-ma. See Fullness.

PLOW, plow (Uṣṣā, ḥārash; ἀπορτάω, ἀροτρίῳ): No implement of the Bible is more frequently illustrated today, because there is every reason to believe that the plows still used throughout Egypt, Pal, and Syria are counterparts of the ancient ones. The first plows were probably an adaptation of the ancient Egypt hoe, where the handle was lengthened in order that animals might be hitched to it. To make it easier to break up the ground, it was pointed, and handles were added by which it could be guided. The ancient plow probably varied in type in different sections of the country, as it does today. In one form a young tree of oak or other strong wood of a diameter of 3 or 4 in. is cut off just below a good-sized branch and again 15 or 20 in. above. The upper end of the severed trunk is pointed and forms the share. Between this and the side branch, cut off at night, the branch is cut off 10 or 12 ft. from the trunk and forms the pole. A lighter stick, about 3 ft. long, projects upward from the share and forms the handle. The plow used in Syria is of slightly different construction. The handle and share are one continuous piece, in such a way that there is a slight bend at the middle. The share is pointed and is used bare in the plains, or in more stony regions is shod with iron. The pole is of 2 pieces joined end to end. The thicker end of the pole is notched, so that it may be attached firmly to the share. The whole plow is so light that it can be easily carried on a man's shoulder. These plows literally scratch the soil, as the Heb. word implies. They do not turn over the ground as the modern implement does. The plowman guides the plow with one hand, and with the other sometimes goads the oxen, and at other times with the chisel end of his goad breaks away the lumps of earth or other material which impedes the progress of his plow. See Yoke.

In addition to the words which are found above, the following terms are found: ἀροτρίῳ, "hitch" (lit. "to serve"), "worked," or "plowed" (Dt 21:4); ἀπορτάω, spelled "plowed," (lit. "to break open,") Ps 141:7.

One special law is mentioned in connection with plowing, namely that an ox and an ass should not be yoked together (Dt 22:10), a prohibition which is utterly disregarded today. Principally oxen were used for plowing (Job 1:14). Often several yokes of oxen followed each other plowing parallel furrows across the field, a sight still common on the plains of Syria (1 K 19:19). Plowing was done by bond servants (Lk 17:7; cf ἀροτρίῳ, Dt 21:4). Plowing cannot be done before the rains (Jer 14:4); on the other hand the soil is too sticky to plow in the winter time (Prov 20:4). The law requiring one day of rest in every seven included plowing time (Ex 34:21).

Figurative: "The plowers plowed upon my back," typified deep affliction (Ps 129:3; cf 141:7). "Plow iniquity" is urged in the sense of "plant iniquity." Doing evil was sure to bring evil consequences (Job 4:8); thus this is particularly true of that which comes after plowing, so surely will Jeh carry out His decree of destruction (Isa 28:23-25). "Judah shall plow," i.e. become enslaved (Hos 10:11); cf "Foreigners shall be your plowmen" (Isa 61:5). "Will one plow there with oxen" (Am 6:13)? "Neither plowing nor harrowing" (Gen 46:6) are figures of desolation. Zion plowed as a field, i.e. utterly destroyed (Jer 26:18). The plowman shall overtake the reaper, i.e. the soil shall be so fertile as to require no rest—typical of great abundance (Am 9:13). No opportunity to plow because of lack of rain is a desolate picture of drought (Jer 14:4). As the plowman expects to share in the fruits of the harvest, so might an apostle expect his temporal needs to be provided for (1 Cor 9:10). "If ye had not plowed with my heifer," i.e. used my wife, was Samson's reply to those who had secured the answer to his riddle from her (Jgs 14:18). "Beast their swords into plowshares" (or hoes) (Isa 2:4; Mic 4:3) typified peace; "best your plow-hares into swords"—war (Joel 3:10). "Having put his hand to the plow, and looking back," i.e. longing for evil things when one has set his face toward doing what is right, unfit a man for the kingdom of God (Lk 9:62; cf Gen 19:26; Phil 3:19).

The first word is a fem. participle Kal; of kiboleth ("preacher"), the Heb. title of the Book of Ezr. DB suggests that the suffix is that of office. AV has "Pochereth of Zebedai" in Ezr, but Ryle (Cambridge Bible, 235) notes that "of" is not in the 1611 ed.

POET, pō'et (ποιητής, poíeth, "a maker"): Occurs in this sense only in Acts 17 28, where St. Paul quotes from the general expression of Gr mythology. The quotation if intended to be exact is probably from Aratus, as the words of St. Paul in his speech at Athens precisely agree with the opening words of the Phaenomena by Aratus. A like but not identical expression is found in the Hymn to Zeus by Cleanthes. Aratus in his poem endeavors to poset Jupiter as the father and controller of all things, and worthy to be worshipped. In so doing he that of Cleanthes, but esp. in the latter, there is a true and lofty note of spiritual devotion. St. Paul takes this praise and devotion offered by the Gr poets to their unknown or fictitious gods and bestows it upon the one true God whom he declared unto the people of Athens.

Literature

By Heb poetry in the present article is meant that of the OT. There is practically no poetry in the NT, but in the OT Apoc Sir is largely poetical and Wisd only less so. Post-Bib. Heb poetry could not be discussed here.

1. Is There Poetry in the OT?—It is impossible to answer this question without first of all stating what poetry really is. The present writer submits the following as a correct definition: "Poetry is verbal composition, imaginative and concrete in matter, and emotional and rhythmic in form." This definition recognizes two aspects of poetry, the formal and the material. The substance of poetry must be concrete—it is philosophy that deals with the abstract; and it has to be the product more or less of the creative imagination. It is of the essence of poetry that, like music, it should be expressed in rhythmical but not necessarily in metrical form. Moreover, the language has to be such as will stir up the aesthetic emotions. Adopting this account of poetry as criticism, it may unhesitatingly be affirmed that the Heb Scriptures contain a goodly amount of genuine poetry; of the Ps., Job, Cant., etc. It is strange but true that poetical is older than prose written composition. An examination of the literature of the ancient Indians, Babylonians, Hebrews, Greeks and Arabs makes this quite certain.

II. Neglect of Hebrew Poetry: Causes.—Notwithstanding the undoubted fact that poetry is largely represented in the Bible, it is noteworthy that this species of Biblical literature was almost wholly ignored until the 18th cent. Why this happened has the fact mainly to two causes: (1) Since the Bible was regarded as preeminently, if not exclusively, a revelation of the Divine mind, attention was fixed upon what it contained, to the neglect of the literary form in which it was expressed. It was regarded as inconsistent with its lofty, Divine function to look upon it as literature at all, since in this last the appeal is made, at least to a large extent, to the aesthetic and therefore carnal man. In the aim contemplated by Bible writers was practical, the communication of religious knowledge—not literary, and still less artistic. It was therefore regarded as inconsistent with such a high purpose that these writers should trouble themselves about literary embellishment or beauty in language, since the sense was clear and unambiguous. It was in this spirit and animated by this conception that the middle of the 19th cent. Isaac Taylor of Ongar (The Spirit of Heb. Poetry, 1861, 56 ff) and Keil of Dorch. (The Intro to the OT, 1851, 1, 457) decided on a priori grounds the presence of epic and dramatic poetry in the Bible. How, they exclaimed, could God countenance the writing of fiction which is untruth—and the epic and the drama have both? Matthew Arnold rendered invaluable service to cause of Bible science when he undermined all theogonists, Jewish and Christian, for making the Bible a mere collection of proof texts, an arsenal whence religious warriors might get weapons with which to belabor their opponents. Indeed the language of the Bible is fluid . . . and literary, not rigid, fixed, scientific" (Preface to 1st ed of Literature and Dogma). The Bible contains literature, poetical and prose, equal as literature to the best, as Matthew Arnold, Carlyle, and Froude (on Heb) hold. The neglect of this aspect of the Scriptures made theologians blind to the presence and therefore ignorant of the character of Bible poetry. (2) Another factor which led to the neglect of the poetical element in the OT is the undoubted fact that Bib. Heb poets were less conscious as poets than western poets, and thought much less of the external form in which they expressed themselves. Biblical poetry lacks therefore such close adherence to formal rules as characterizes Gr, Arab., or Eng. poetry. The authors wrote as they felt and because they felt, and their strong emotions dictated the forms their words took, and not any objective standards set up by the schools. Bib. poetry is destitute of meter in the strict sense, and also of rhyme, though this last occurs in some isolated cases (see below, III, 1, 4, c and e). No wonder then that western scholars, missing these marks of the poetry which they knew best, failed for so long to note the poetry which the OT contains.

III. Characteristics of Hebrew Poetry: External and Internal—The definition of poetry adopted in I, above, implies that there are marks by which poetry can be distinguished from prose. This is equally true of Heb poetry, though this last lacks some of the features of the poetry of western nations.

(1) Vocabulary.—There are several Heb words which occur most frequently and in some cases exclusively in poetry. In the following list the corresponding prose Outing "Yahwe," which belongs alike to both kinds, it will be seen that the rest of the two half-lines corresponds word for word: "thy loving-kindness" corresponding to "thy faithfulness," and "to the heavens" answering to "to the clouds" (cf Ps 15:1; 24:1–3; 25:5; 1 S 18:7; Isa 6:4; 13:7).

(2) Antithetical parallelism: in which the second member of a line (or verse) gives the opposite sense of the same thought, e.g. Prov 10:1:

'A wise son gladdens his father,
But a foolish son grieves his mother' (see Prov 11:3; Ps 37:9; cf Prov 10:1 ff; Ps 20:8; 30:6; Isa 64:7 ff). Sometimes there are more than two corresponding elements in the two members of the verse, as in Prov 29:27; cf 10:5; 16:9; 27:2.

(3) Synthetic parallelism: called also constructive and epithetic. In this the second member adds something fresh to the first, or else explains it, e.g. Ps 19:5 ff.

The precepts of Yahwe are right, rejoicing the heart:
The commandments of Yahwe are pure, enlightening the eyes:
The fear of Yahwe is clean, enduring for ever:
The judgments of Yahwe are true and righteous altogether.

More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold;
Sweeter also than honeycombs and the honeycomb' (see Prov 1:7; cf 3:5, 7; Ps 1:3; 15:4).

In addition to the three principal species of parallelism noticed above, other forms have been traced and described.

(4) Introverted parallelism (Jebb, Sacred Lit., 553) in which the hemistichs of the parallel members are chiasically arranged, as in the scheme ob.

Thus Prov 23:15a:

(a) 'My son, if thy heart be wise
(b) My heart shall be glad, even mine;
(c) Yea, my reins shall rejoice,
(d) When thy lips speak right things' (cf Prov 10:4, 12; 13:24; 21:17; Ps 51:3).

(v) Palilological parallelism: in which one or more words of the first member are repeated as an echo, or as the canon in music, in the second. Thus Nah 1:2:

'Yahwe is a jealous God and avenges: Yahwe avenges and is full of wrath;
Yahwe takes vengeance on his adversaries, And preserves wrath for his enemies' (cf Jgs 5:3, 6:11 ff; f.23:27; Ps 72:12, 17; 121:1; 124:1; Isa 2:7; 24:5; Hos 6:4).

(vi) Climactic or comprehensive parallelism: In this the second line completes the first. Thus Ps 29:1:

"Give unto Yahwe, O ye mighty ones, Give unto Yahwe glory and strength" (see Ex 15:6; Ps 29:8).

(vii) Rhythmic parallelism (De Wette, Franz Delitzsch): thus Ps 138:4:

"All the kings of the earth shall give thee thanks . . . For they have heard the words of thy mouth." (See Prov 13:5; cf 16:7, 10; 17:13, 15; 19:20; 21:23, 25.)

Perfect parallelism is that in which the number of words in each line is equal. When unequal, the parallelism is called imperfect. Ewald (see Die poetischen Bücher des alten Bundes, 1, 57–92; Die Dichter des alten Bundes, 1, 91 ff, 2d ed of the former) aimed at giving a complete list of the relations and rules which can be expressed by parallelism, and he thought he had succeeded. But in fact every kind of relation which can be indicated in words may be expressed in two or more lines more or less parallel. On the alleged parallelism of proverbs see below.
(b) Parallelism as an aid to exegesis and textual criticism: If in Lowth's words parallelism implies that "in two lines or members of the same period things for the most part correspond in syllables, and word to word, we should expect obscure or unknown words to derive some light from words corresponding to them in parallel members or clauses. In a few cases no corresponding words areenable causing a comparison of words to restore with considerable confidence the words which in the OT Parallelism is in a general way as follows: ab: cx. We know what a, b and c mean, but are wholly in the dark as to the sense of x. Thus: "and what z might be. We have an illustration in Jgs 5:28, which may be thus literally translated: "Through the window she looked." And Sisera's mother "through the arrow." Here we have two words, however, corresponding to known terms. The Heb vb. accompanying "drew," "he came," etc., wdbd, wdbd, is "and cried." But no such vb. (ydbhabb) is known for the Talm, as usually, follows the traditional interpretation. We want a vb. with a meaning similar to "looked." If we read wdba in "and cried," wdbd; we have a form which could easily be corrupted into the word in the MT, which gives a suitable sense and moreover has the support of the Tg's of Onkelos and Jonathan, and even of the LXX (A and Luc). What about the other Heb word untranslated above b"", "eshnahh?" This occurs in but one other passage (Prov 7:6), where it stands as in the present parallel with thbbl, "which also was." This vb. (probably Prov 7:6 is defective. We get no help from etymology or in this case from the VSS, but parallelism had suggested to our translators the meaning intended. In Eastern, East, the rendering always gives a kind of sound, and the rhyme must be meant. The vb. shânâbh, "to be cool," the rendering of the Hebrew as a hole in the wall to secure coolness in the house. Glass windows did not exist in Pal, and are rare even now. There are innumerable other examples in the OT of the use of parallelism in elucidating words which occur but once, or which have no significance underrstood, and frequently a textual emendation is suggested which is otherwise supported.

(c) Prevalence and value of parallelism: Two statements about parallelism in the OT may be and be of high importance in the study of all OT poetry. Lowth who had so much to do with its discovery gave it naturally an exaggerated place in his scheme of Heb poetry, but it is lacking in the largest part of the poetry of the OT, and it is frequently met with in elevated and rhetorical prose. (i) That it pervades other poetry than that of the OT. It occurs in Assyrin (see A. Jeremias, Die bab.arsa. Vorstellung von Leben nach dem Tod), in Egypt (Georg Ebers, Nord u. Süd, I), in Finnish, Ger. (¡Der deutsche Volk's-Ausgabe der Gegenwart, 1869, 157), and Eduard Norden (Die antike Kunstprosa, 1898, II, 813) maintain that parallelism is the primitive form of the poetry of all nations. It must therefore be that in the OT parallelism is employed in proportion a larger place than in any other literature and that the correspondence of the parts of the stichs or verses is closer.

(5) Other literary devices—OT poetry has additional features which it shares with other oriental and with western poetry. Owing to lack of space these can hardly be more than enumerated.

(a) Alliteration: e.g. "Round and round the rugged rocks," etc. We have good examples in the Heb of Ps 6:8 and 27:12. (b) Assonance: an example of this in the Heb Scriptures that one can regard it as a feature in Heb poetry, though in Arab, and even in the East, it is very frequent. B H e V is a Hebrew Bible, instances in the Heb text of Gen 43:29; Job 10:8; Lam 1:16; Prov 3:27; Ps 44:10ff; Lam 1:4; cf ch 5, where the number of verses assigned to each Heb alphabet, though the letters of that alphabet do not introduce the verses.

(c) Meter: The view of the present writer may be stated as follows: That the poetry of the Heb is not in the strict sense metrical, though the writers under the influence of strong emotion express themselves rhythmically, producing often the phenomena which came later to be codified under metrical rules. Thinking and reasoning and speaking preceded psychology, logic, and grammar, and similarly poetry preceded prosody. In the OT we are in the region of the fact, not of the law. Poets wrote under strong impulse, usually religious, and without recognizing any objective standard, though all the time they were supplying data for the rules of prosody. Those who think that OT poets had in their minds objective rules of meter have to make innumerable changes in the text, and to change even the original material, they bring their prior theory and alter the text to suit it. It can be fearlessly said that there is not a single poem in the OT with the same number of syllables, or feet, or accents in the seven stichs or hemistichs. If we attempt to introduce violent changes into the MT, such as would be resented in classical and other ancient literature. It is important, before coming to any definite conclusion, to take into consideration the fact that the poetry of the OT belongs to a remote period, many centuries before the Song of Deborah (Jgs 5), the earliest Heb poem, down to the last rhymes in the Psalter. In the oldest specimens of Heb poetry there is a naïve simplicity which excludes the idea of conscious art. In the best and most characteristic poetry of the OT, the poets have written with imagination and his poetry more artistic. It would be manifestly unfair to propound a theory of poetry based on the poetry of Keats and Tennyson and to apply it to the productions of Anglo-Saxon and Old English, and the same can be said of a literature differing widely in age, aim and authorship, and it needs care in educating a conception of Heb poetry that will apply to all the examples in the OT. The later pse-acrostic, etc., many of them made up of cross-references, etc., are an example of the conscious effort at imitation. If, however, there were among the ancient Hebrews, as there was among the ancient Greeks, a code of prosody, it is strange that the Mish and Ge'mal'sh should be wholly silent about it. And if some one system underlies our Heb Bible, it is strange that so many systems have been proposed. It should be remembered too that the oldest poetry of every people is nonmetrical.

The following is a brief statement of the views advocated:

(i) Philo and Josephus, under the influence of Gr models and customs, had no such notion as we have of the poetic literature of pagan literature, taught that Heb poetry had metre, but they make no attempt to show what kind of meter this poetry possessed, and that they even introduced conscious effort at imitation. If, however, there were among the ancient Hebrews, as there was among the ancient Greeks, a code of prosody, it is strange that the Mish and Ge'mal'sh should be wholly silent about it. And if one system underlies our Heb Bible, it is strange that so many systems have been proposed. It should be remembered too that the oldest poetry of every people is nonmetrical.

(ii) Calm, Lowth and Carpzov held that though in the poetry of the Heb Bible as originally written and read there must have been metrical rules which the authors were conscious of following; yet, through the corruption of the text and our ignorance of the sounds and accentuation of primitive Heb, it is now impossible to ascertain what these metrical rules were.

(iii) In their scheme of Heb meter Bickell and Merx reckon syllables as is done in classical poetry, and they adopt the Syr law of accentuation, placing the stress on the penultimate. These writers make drastic changes in the text in order to bolster up their theories.

(iv) The doctrine of the镑'ective theory is that advocated by Lev., Briggs, Duhm, Buhl, Grime, Sievers, etc., for example, that in Heb prosody the accented syllables were alone counted. If this principle is applied to Job, it will be found that many of the lines would be reduced to stichs, each with three main accents. See, for illustration, Job 12:16: 'when he is box: he is a little box and ye are with him, he is one that causes to err.' Man's rhetorical instincts are quite sufficient to account for this phenomenon without assuming that the Heb had an objective standard. Those who adopt this last view and attempt solely making the poetry metric must fail. For an examination of the metrical systems of Hubert Grimm, who takes account of quantity as well as accent, and of Eduard Sixers who shows in certain cases to come to the conclusion after examining small parts of the Heb
Bible that Heb poetry is normally ana pa s, see W. H. Cobb, Criticism of Systems of Heb Metre, 152 ff, 169 ff. In our treatise, K. R. Schmidt, K. Eberhard, and E. Dohle reject all systems of Heb meter hitherto proposed, though Budde has a leaning toward Leibniz's system.

(f) Budde's kinah measure: Though Budde takes up in general a negative position in regard to Heb meter, he pleads strenuously for the existence of one specific meter with which his name is associated. This is the so-called kinah measure (from הֵנָּה, kînâh, "a lamentation"). In each such stich is said to consist of one hemistich with three beats or stress syllables and another having two such syllables, this being held to be the specific meter of the dirge (see Lam 1:1, etc.). Ley and Briggs call it "pentameter." Because it is made up of five (5+2) feet (a foot in Heb prosody being equal to an accented syllable and the unaccented syllables combined with it). See Budde's full treatment of the subject in ZAW, 60, 152, "Das heb. Klagegedicht." It must, however, be borne in mind that even Herder (d. 1803) describes the use in elegies of what he calls, anticipating Ley and Briggs, the "pentameter" (see Geist der ebräischen Poesie, 1782, i, 321, ET The Spirit of Heb Poetry, 1833, i, 40). But the present writer submits the following criticisms: (i) Budde is inconsistent in rejecting all existing theories of meter and yet in retaining one of his own, which is really but part of the system advocated by Bellermann, Ley and Briggs. (ii) He says, following Herder, that it is the measure adopted by mourning women (Jer 9:16), but we have extremely few examples of the latter, and his statement lacks proof. (iii) There are dirges in the OT not expressed in the kinah measure. David's lament over Saul and Jonathan is more hexametric and tetrametric than pentameter, unless we proceed to make a new text (2 S 1:19 ff). (iv) The kinah measure is employed by Heb poets where the theme is joyous or indifferent; see Ps 119, which is a didactic poem.

6. Units of Hebrew poetry.—In western poetry the ultimate unit is usually the syllable, the foot (consisting of at least two syllables) coming next. Then we have the verse-line crowned by the stanza, and finally the poem. According to the theory of Heb poetry adopted by the present writer, the following are the units, beginning with the simplest: (a) The meter: This embraces the accented (tone) syllable together with the unaccented syllable preceding or succeeding it. This may be called a "rhythmic foot." (b) The stich or verse: In Job and less regularly in Ps and Cant and in other parts of the OT (Nu 23:19-24) the stich or verse consists commonly of three toned syllables and therefore three meters (see above for sense of "meter"). It is important to distinguish between this poetic sense of "verse" and the ordinary meaning—the subdivision of a Bible chapter. The stich in this sense appears in a separate line in some old MSS. (c) The number of stichs (verses): In Heb poetry a stich hardly ever stands alone. We have practically always a distich (couplet, Job 18:5), a tristich (tripllet, Nu 6:24-26), a tetristich (Gen 24:23), or the pentastich.

7. Songs. Hebrew

8. Prophetic poetry: This poetry is the expression of the inspiration under which the seer wrote. One may compare the oracular utterances of diviners and other poetic forms as well as in matter. But the poet has to bear in mind that the heathen diviner claimed to have his messages from jinns or other spirits, and the means he employed were a rule omens of various kinds. The OT prophet professed to speak by and under divine inspiration. God (see Divination, VIII). Duhm thinks that the genuine prophecies of Jeremiah are wholly poetical, the prose parts being interpolations. But the prophet is not merely or primarily a poet, though it cannot be doubted that a very large proportion of the prophecies of the OT are poetical in form and substance.

9. Philosophical poetry: This expression is intended to include such poetry as is found in the Wisdom literature of the OT and the Apoc (see Wisdom Literature). The so-called didactic... poetry, that of the proverbs or parables (סִפְרֵי, māshāl), also comes in here.

(5) Lyrical poetry: This includes the hymns of the Psalter, the love songs of Cant and the many other lyrics found in the historical and prophetic writings. In these lyrics all the emotions of the human soul are expressed.

Does the OT contain specimen of epic and dramatic poetry? The answer must depend on what definition of both is adopted.

(a) Epic poetry: The present writer would define an epic poem as a novel with its plot and development charge, however, with the passion and set out in the rhythmic form of poetry. There is no part of the OT which meets the requirements of this definition, certainly not the Creation, Fall and Deluge stories, which De Wette (Beiträge, 228 ff, Einleitung, 147) and R. G. Moulton (Literary Study of the Bible, ch ix) point to as true epics, and which Ewald (Dichter des alten Bundes, I, 87 ff) held rightly to have in them the stuff of epics, though not the form.

(b) Drama: Defining theatrical poetry as that which can be acted on a stage, one may with confidence say that there is no example of this in the OT. Even the literary drama must have the general characteristics of that which is adaptable. Franz Delitzsch and other writers have pointed to Job and Cant as dramatic poems, but the definition adopted above excludes both.

IV. Poetical Writings of the OT.—According to the Massoretes or editors of our present Heb Bible, there are but three poetic books in the OT, Job, Prov, and Ps, known in Jewish liturgy by the mnemonic abbreviations, שִׁמְתָּה, אֲשֶׁר, וְיִֽשְׂרָאֵל (šimmah, asher, ve’ishreal), i.e. Ps, Cant, Lam; (2) those containing for the most part didactic poetry (סִפְרֵי, māshāl), i.e. Job, Prov, Ecc.

There is a large amount of poetry in the OT outside the books usually classed as poetical: (a) poetry in the prophetic books (see above, III, 2); (b) poetry in the historical books including the Pent (see Michael Hellaire, The Historical Poetry of the Hebrews, 2 vols., 1879-80). We have examples in Gen 4 23 ff; 49; Ex 15; Nu 21 14 ff 27-30 (JE); 23 f (Balaam’s songs); Dt 321 (song and blessing of Moses); Josh 10 12-14 (JE); Jgs 5 (Deborah’s Song); 9 8-15; 1 S 2 1-10; 2 S 8; 1 33 f; 23 (Ps 18), etc.

LITERATURE.—The most important books and articles on the subject have been mentioned in the course of the foregoing article. Here is a full list of works dealing with Heb meter in W. H. Cobb, Criticism of Systems of Hebrew Meter, 2 vols., 1858–59, and in the first edition of C. A. Karello’s still valuable "Essay on Hebrew Poetry" prefixed to his comm. on the Ps was published in Eng. in the Journal of Sacred Literature (1848), 74 ff, 220 ff. In 1869 J. W. Rothstein issued a suggestive treatise on Heb rhythm (Grundzüge des Hebräischen Rhythmus und der kritischen Kommentar, Svo +4v+398s), reviewed by the present writer in Review of Theol. and Philos. (Edinb. 1871). Early Religious Poetry of the Hebrews by E. G. King (Cambridge University Press) contains a good, brief, popular statement of the subject, though it makes no pretense to originality. In The Poets of the OT, 1912, Professor A. R. Gordon gives an excellent popular account of the poetry and poetical literature of the OT.

POETRY, NEW TESTAMENT: No one questions the presence of poetry of a high order in the NT. The study of the OT as the literature of the ancient Hebrews has been critically made, and the attention of the ordinary reader of the Scriptures called to the beauty and wealth of its poetic passages. The message of the NT is not only vitally spiritual and concerned with religion that but little attention has been paid to it as literature. Naturally it would be strange if the poetic inspiration which runs like a tide through the prophetic and poetic periods of the OT should altogether cease under the clearer spiritual dispensation of the NT. The fact is that it does not cease, but that under every fundamental rule for poetic utterance, save that of rhyme, the NT is seen to be rich in imaginative vision, in religious thought and emotion, and in poetic expression. The Gospels, the Pauline Epistles, and the Ep. of Jas, all afford examples of lofty poetic utterance, while the message of Jesus is saturated with words which really lend themselves to song. In fact it is thought that Jesus was no less careful of the form than of the content of His message, and that all the finer types of Hebrew poetry found in the OT can be matched from His sayings, even when tested by the same rules.

In the Gospels that of St. Luke gives us best examples of poetry. "No sooner have we passed through the vestibule of His Gospel than we find ourselves within a circle of harmonies" (Burton, in Expositor’s Bible). From the poetic utterances of Mary, Elisabeth, Zacharias, Simeon, and the Angels, the church gains her Magnificat, Beatitude, Benedictus, Nunc Dimittis and Gloriae.

The utterances of John the Baptist are filled with a rugged desert vision and an expression which reveals a form of poetry in novisie to be mistaken for prose. St. Paul presents many of his ideas in harmonious and beautiful forms. He knew the secular poets of his day, and has immortalized Cleanthe’s Hymn to Jesus (Acts 17 28). He also quotes from Epimenides and the Athenian dramatist Menander in 1 Cor 15 33 f. St. Paul knew the Hebrews, and enriches his own message with many quotations from it. He was acquainted with the Christian hynmology of his own times, as is seen in Eph 5 14 and 1 Tim 3 16. He offers also original flashes of poetic inspiration and imagination, a good example of which is found in Rom 8 31-37.

Who could doubt the poetic imagery of St. James? He might almost be called the poet of social justice and of patient waiting under affliction for the will of God to come to men.

When one comes to the words of Jesus he discovers that in a very true sense His speech answers to the requirements for Heb poetry. Examples of synonymous, antithetic, synthetic and causal parallelism are the rule rather than the exception in the utterances of Jesus, for the religious form see Mt 10 24; for the antithetic see Lk 6 41; for the synthetic and causal forms see Lk 9 23 and Mt 6 7. Not alone are these forms of Heb poetry found in the words of Jesus, but also the more involved and sustained poetic utterances (Lk 7 31-32).

No one can question the deep emotional quality, the vivid imagination and spiritual idealism of Jesus. That the form of His speech is adequately set to poetic expression, and that the poetry for Heb poetry has not been so freely acknowledged. Independently of the theory advanced in Did Jesus Write His Own Gospel? (William Pitt MacVey), every student of the literature of the NT must be grateful for the chapter on "The Poems of Jesus."

Spirituality and poetry have a kinship, and the interpretation of any message is aided by the adequate knowledge of its poetic form. When the NT has been carefully studied as literature, it will be seen, not only that Jesus was a poet, but that the entire NT, if not as rich as the OT in poetic passages, is sufficiently poetic to receive treatment as such in religious encyclopaedias. See also Pétrarque, Sayings; Poetry, Hebrew.

POUNTS, points: The word occurs in Ecclet 5:16, "In all points (κατά πόντον, kátá pínto) as he came, so shall he go"—a man leaves the world in all regards as helpless as he entered it, no matter what he may have accomplished during his life.

Also in He 4:15, "In all points (κατά πόντον, kátá pínto, "in all things," as in His human nature (2:14), so in His human experience (cf. 2:17.18)] tempted like as we, are yet without sin." He successfully resisted temptation at all points of His nature, in body, soul, and spirit. This temptation of Christ (of Curaus) Westcott (in loc.) thinks that the reference is not so much to Christ issuing out of all His trials without the least stain of sin, as to "a limitation of His temptation. Man's temptations come in many cases from previous sin. So the temptation had necessarily no place in Christ. He was tempted as we are, sharing our nature, yet with this exception, that there was no sin in Him to become the spring of trial." Whichever interpretation is adopted there is profound insight into the things of the soul in joining sinlessness with fulness of experience of temptation.

POISON, poi'zn (ἡμαθί, hēmati, ἐρεῖ, rēĩ; θυμός, thumós, ῥοσί, rōsĩ): Residents in Pad must, from the first, have been acquainted with venomous serpents. Six species of these are widely diffused in the land, and at least three of them are fairly common in places. Besides, there are scorpions, centipedes and the large spider, which are as much dreaded by the fallahin as are the serpents, not to speak of the many but very serious discomforts of mosquitoes, sandflies and ticks, some of which were credited with lethal powers. In Wisi 16:9 RV we read that "the bites of locusts and flies did slay, and there was not found a healing for them" (Ex 4:26,20). There are many poisonous plants, such as belladonna, henbane, thorn apple, and the opium poppy. None of these is mentioned in the Bible; the only names found there are the hemlock (Conium maculatum) of Hos 10:4, the poisonous gourd (Citroidus colocynthos) of 2 K 4:39, and the grapes of gall, probably the fruit of Calotropis procera, the apples of Sodom of Jos (BJ, IV, vii, 4). Some, however, believe that these are poppyheads. Poisonous waters are referred to at Marah (Ex 15:20) and Jericho (De 2:19). There is no direct record of any person dying of poison except in 2 Mac 10:13, where the suicide of Ptolemy Maceron is related. Our Lord's promise in the appendix to Mk 16:18, however, that poisons were known and might be administered by way of the water of jealousy (Nu 5:17). In this connection the story in Eusebius (HE, I, 39, 39) is interesting, that "Justus surnamed Barsabas, though he drank a deadly poison, suffered no injury, through the grace of the Lord, in which poison the serpent is mentioned are Dt 32:24, where serpents (RV "crawling things") of the dust, probably Ceraeotes hasseilquisti, the little horned vipers, are mentioned, and in ver 33: "poison of serpents, and the cruel venom of asps." The asp may be the cobra Naia haje, not uncommon on the borders of the wilderness to the S. Ps 58:4 mentions the poison of serpents. Ps 140:3, "They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent; adders' poison is under their lips," indicates, what is still a common belief that the forked tongue of the snake is the poison-bearer. This is referred to in Jas 3:8. That it was the fang and not the tongue which carried the poison was known to Pliny (xli.62). This verse of Ps 140 is given in St. Paul's composite quotation in Rom 9:13. There may be a reference to the giving of an intoxicant poison in Hab 2:15, where RV reads "that addest thy venom." The prophets speak in several places of God's wrath as a cup of trembling (RV "staggering"), e.g. Isa 51:17-22, probably suggested by the fact that wine (Ps 95:6) primarily means "fury" and is used in that sense in more than a hundred passages. In Zec 12:2 Jesus is to be such a "cup of reeling unto all the peoples round about."

The ἱσθίαμβος, "lizard" (AV "spider"), mentioned in Prov 30:25 (LXX kolabóts) was formerly regarded as poisonous and it is still much disliked by the fallahin, as they believe that it makes mocking gestures mimicking at their prayers. They are really not poisonous. It is doubtful whether the lizard mentioned by Agur is really this stellion; the description better fits the gecko.

POLE, pōl: Nu 21:8-9 AV for νῆς, RV "standard."

POLICY, pol'isi: Lit. "method of government," and so "ability to manage affairs." In a bad sense, "cunning," "craft," in Dl 8:25 (גננה, genanah, "understanding"); in a good sense in 1 Mac 8:4 (בנויה, bunoia, "counsel"); also in AV 2 Mac 13:18, 14:29-31 ( UnityEditor, "counsel, strategy, stratagem," etc., where RV has "strategy,"") Polices occurs in Jth 11:8 AV for ΠΟΛΙΟΓΥΡΙΑ, "poloigyria, lit. "readiness for anything," here in a good sense; RV "subtile devices."

POLISHED, pol'isht. See Corner-stone, (2).

POLL, pōl: The word (on the derivation of which see Skeat, Concise Etym. Dict. of the Eng. Language, 300) has been eliminated as a vb. in ARV. In AV and ERV it represents the Heb. ובו, ḫāqām, "to shear," "to shear the sheep," "to shear out," "to uproar," thence "to shear the sheep," figuratively, "to destroy an enemy" (Mic 1:16), מים, gālāh, in Piel, lit. "to make bald or rounded-headed" (2 S 14:26) and גננה, gāqās, "to cut off" (Jer 9:26; 25:23; 49:32). The Heb noun is גננה, gūdōēth. As will be seen from the above enumeration, the Heb. vb.s differ considerably in etymology, while RV has not tried to distinguish. In Mic 1:16 we have a reference to the oriental custom of cutting or tearing one's hair as a sign of mourning for one's relatives. "Make thee bald, and cut off thy hair [AV and ERV "poll thee," Heb gāzāz] for the children of thy delight: enlarge thy baldness as the eagle [in "culture"]; for they are gone into captivity from thee." The priests, the sons of Zadok, are instructed to abstain from outward resemblance to heathen patterns of priesthood: "Neither shall they shave their heads, nor suffer their locks to grow long; they shall only cut off the hair [AV and ERV "poll"] Heb ḫāqām] of their heads" (Ezk 44:20). The Piel form of gālāh is employed in the description of the annual hair-cutting of Absalom (2 S 14:26). Thrice we find the vb. "to poll" as the tr of Heb ḫāqās, where AV authoritatively improves the tr by adopting the marginal version of AV (Jer 9 26; 25 23; 49 32). See Hair.

The noun (gubhōth, lit. "head") is tr* “polf” in the phrase “by the poll,” “by their polls” (Nu 1 2. 13. 14. 22. 14 7; 1 Ch 23 8. 24). The expression has a polygamy in the number of persons by there heads, in the same way in which we speak of head- tax, etc.

POLLYON, po-lis'han (גַּלְוָנ, gat'al, “to pol- lute”; ἀλογωμα, ἀλογίμα, “contamination”): In Mat 1 7, “Ye offered polluted bread,” i.e. not actually unclean, but worthless, common (cf Ex 2 62), bread here being used metonymically for sacrificial offerings generally (cf Lev 21 6; Mt 6 11). The phrase in Acts 15 20, “the pollutions of idols,” is explained in ver 29 by “things sacrificed [AV “meats offered’] to idols.”

POLYAGANY, pó-lig'a-mi:
1. Meaning of the Term 4. Polygamy Unnatural
2. Origin of Polygamy 5. Weakness of Polygamy
3. OT and Polygamy

Polygamy has been and is the open blazon by the human race of sex vice. The very term is a misnomer. Since man became moralized he has apprehended that the proper marriage relation between the sexes is monogamy. Whatever may have been the practice, since man could ask himself, What is right? he has known that αρ' ἄρπασον, αρ' ἄρχει ("from the beginning;" Mt 19 4), αὐς ἄνδρα, at bottom, marriage is the choice of one man and one woman of each other for a life family relation. La Rochefoucauld said: “Hypocrisy is a sort of homage which vice pays to virtue.” There is hypocrisy beneath the word polygamy. It is an attempt to cover up the truth to "plural marriages" what is marriage and cannot be marriage. There is no particular need of defining what the condition is, so long as we can look upon it as a violation and negation of the marriage relation. The very use of the term from any language covering a like condition is attempt—

“To steal the livery of the court of heaven
To serve the Devil in.”

Polygamy is a general term and might mean a multiplicity of partners in the family relation by one of each sex; it does not technically mean exactly “polygyny” (γυνή, γυν), i.e. it describes a many-wived man. The correlative term “polyandry” describes the condition of a woman who has many men in family relation with herself. They are all husbands to her, as in polygamy all the women are wives to one man. But polyandry in historic times has had so little illustration that it may be dismissed as so exceptional as to be worthy of no further notice here.

Polygamy has captured the whole position philologically covered by polygyny is readily apparent. The might of the physically strongest has dictated the situation. Man has on the average one-fourth more muscular force than woman. When it comes to wrong in sex relation, man has that advantage, and it has given him the field covered by the word “polygamy.” There he is master and woman is the victim.

It is plainly evident that polygamy is primarily largely the outcome of tribal wars. When men had separated into clans and had taken up different places of abode, collisions Polygamy would soon occur between them. What would happen in such cases would be what we know did happen in North America soon after its first settlement by Europeans, to wit, the destruction of the Hurons by the Iroquois. The great majority of the men were massacred; the women and children, driven to the abode of the conquerors, disappearing there mainly in concubinage and slavery. What shall be done with this surplus of females? which of the two women the strongest comes to the front. The chief or the most heroic fighter would assert his right to choice of captives, and thus concubinage or what is the same thing—polygamy—would be set up. Successes in further wars come and add others to be distributed. Of course to the sheik or king there soon comes the seraglio and the harem. Polygamous practices will come in in other ways. The prisoner of war becomes property and passes from hand to hand by gift or sale. So woman—the weaker party—endures what comes to her as slave, concubine. We have now no longer the “helpmeet” originally destined for man—"bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh"—for whom he would “leave his father and his mother” and to whose single self he would “cleave” for life (Gen 2 18.24; Mt 19 5.6). Monogamy, with its unity in labor, thought and feeling, with its immeasurable modifying influences of moral, ideal and spiritual cast, is gone. Woman is reduced to the position of ministrant to man’s unmodified sensuality.

The complications introduced into morals by polygamy are not often considered. But the Bible sets them forth in plainness. The marriage of Abraham and Sarah seems to have been an original love match, and even to have preserved something of that character through life. Still we find Sarah under the influence of polygamous ideas, presenting Abraham with a son, afterward, when she herself had a son, she induced Abraham to drive out into the wilderness this concubine and her son. Now Abraham was humane and kind, and it is said “The thing was very grievous in Abraham’s sight” (Gen 21 11). But he was in the toils of polygamy, and it brought him pain and retribution. A Divine direction may be hard to bear.

The conditions of Jacob’s marriages were such that it is hard to say whether he was married to four wives or of any other than of polygamous origin (Gen 35 22-26). Where the family idea and affection went, in such mixed condition, is evidenced by the unhallowed sale, for slavery in Egypt, of one of the brothers by his polygamous career. His retributions ran along an extended line. There was a case of incest and murder among his children (2 S 13). The son in whom he had most hope and pride organized treason against his throne, and lost his life in the attempt.

David left his kingdom to Solomon, of whom much might be said, but of whom this can be said—evidently originally a man bright, keen-witted, wise, yet in his old age he went to pieces by the wiles of the women with whom he had loaded his harem. Partly by his extravagance in his polygamous life, and partly in attempt to build temples in distant places for the religions represented by the inmates of his harem, he bankrupted his nation. As a consequence his kingdom was divided at his death, and there was never again a united Israel (1 K 11.12). Polygamy must be justly charged with these unworthy results.

It can be demonstrated scientifically, even mathematically, that polygamy is a moral wrong. Statistics show that births are substantially equally divided between the sexes. Excess seems slightly on the side of males. When this fact is considered and also the fact of the wide prevalence of polygamy (polygyny), it would seem that polygamy
4. Polygamy (polygyny) is a greater crime against Unnatural Nature than polyandry. To put out of view for a moment the wrong to women in denying to her the rights and privileges of monogamous marriage, the interference with the rights of man in such marriage is, in vast proportion. Every harem is the denial to men of the right to seek among its inmates wives according to the dictates of their own hearts.

The eunuch.—But we are not done with the crime against man. Given a harem, he who set it up has made, or there brought, the eunuch. The lord of the harem must be served by emasculated men. A search in history will reveal an amount of this wickedness that is past belief. The eunuch has been fixed in office by emperors or princes and kings. They have not only been servants to women in harems, but they have acquired such influence with their masters that they have sometimes even dictated the policy of government.
They have been an aggregate force that has had the last word in public affairs. They have sometimes held public positions and shown therein astonishing ability. Witness Narsees, the brilliant general of the emperor Justinian. See EUNUCH.

Gibbon noticed the fact that nations began to decline in the time when their policies were dictated and managed by eunuchs. But that is taking a symptom for the disease. There are weaknesses behind that weakness. We have found women in muscular strength equal to three-fourths of a man. If we claim nothing more for woman than that ratio through the whole scale of her faculties, what would be thought of a nation that should try to reduce that three-fourths of potency as nearly to zero as it could? This is what polygamy has done—reduced woman as nearly to a cipher as it could in all the departments of her being.
She has been held to the lowest and most primitive industrial pursuits. She has been deprived of intellectual development. She has been debauched from society, permitted to look at it only through a home lattice, or, if abroad, through a watched face. The harem of shiek or sultan has fixed the condition of woman in provinces of nation—the bounds to her life. The highest office assigned her has been breeder of children, and for one-half of them—the daughters—she could have no possible hope or ambition (see WOMAN).

Where in such degradation is the "helmsmen" for man in all his problems? This condition is reflected back over man. What possible appeal can there be to a man for thought and energy except to repeat the same dull round exhibited in his daily life? Polygamous nations have never been industrial inventors, have contributed little to science. They have usually ruined the fertility of the lands they have occupied. They have been heavily weighted with the lethargy of a system that appeals to nothing but the most primitive instincts and vices of man.

The monogamous have been the forceful nations.
Rome conquered the world while she was monogamous;
and lost control of it when she dropped to the moral level of the sex corruption of the peoples she had conquered.
The Teuton tramped into and over Europe in caravans mounted on solid wood trucks. But his cart carried one wife, and now all polygamy is held under the trained guns of the Teuton.

There may seem to be two exceptions—the establishment of the Mogul empire in India and the subjugation of Western Asia and Eastern Europe by the Turk. That in both cases there was great success in war is granted.
They were authorized by their religion to exhibit the frenzy of bloodshed and indulge in lust. Indeed, enjoyment of the latter was a bright hope for the life to come But when they had possession of a country, and massacraces and ravishing were over, what then? For what is mankind indebted to them?

A lyric.—A lyric has been put in the hand of the present writer by a friend who wrote it as the last date of the title. It is one of the lyrics of the centuries in its synthesis of history and in its insight into the forces physical, moral and spiritual of the Mogul empire of India. Notice the dates. The text will show what took place between.

The Mogul 1525-1857

A war steed coursed out the wind-swept north,
Snuffing far battles with nostril wide,
Neering the joy of heroic desire.
The crisping herbage of arid plains
Had touched his skewes like bands of steel;
The snow-fed waters of Zarafshan
Had nurved the might of a northern will.
The war steed grazed in the fertile meadows,
Drinking the waters of indolent streams:
He rested at eve on bloom-dight beds,
Toyled with by maidens in goldening gleams.
They charmed his ear with dalliant song:
Of many closed his eyes in witchery's gleam;
They fed him the vineyards' wildering draught—
He slept in the breath of the lotus tree.
White bones lie strewn on the flowering mead,
The flowers of the arid grass grow by his side.
The carrion bird hath flown—hath died—
Rideth the war-horse? Neibeth? Hark!

The above lyric may be taken as the epitaph of any polygamous nation. The last words are significant—
"Neibeth? Hark!" Would the old war steed arise?
"Hark!" The Sepoy rebellion was one. We "harkened," but the rebellion went to pieces and an end was put to the Mogul empire. We have listened for half a century and heard no sound. We hear mutterings now, but the end will be as before—even if the "war-horse" is riseth and is victorious. He will then again lie down in "Beem-rank grass grown high and dark," and the "carrion bird" will fly from his "white bones." Streams cannot rise higher than their fountains. The causes remaining, the same effects will follow. See DIsvoGe; FaMLy; MArrieGe.

POMEGRANATE, pom'gran-ät, pom-gran'ät, pun'gran-ät (נְפֶרֶן, rimon [tree and fruit]; the Heb name is similar to the Arab., Arum, and Ethiopic; see, rho): One of the most attractive and most characteristic of the fruit trees of Syria, Palestine probably indigenous to Persia, Afghanistan and the neighborhood of the Caucasus, but introduced to Pal in very ancient times. The spics brought specimens of figs and pomegranates, along with grapes, from the Vale of Eschol (Nu 13 23). Vines, figs and pomegranates are mentioned (Nu 20 5) as fruits the Israelites missed in the wilderness; the most valued land was to be one "of wheat and barley, and vines and figtrees and pomegranates" (Dt 8 8), a promise renewed in Hag 2:19. In the lamentation in Joel 1:11-12 we have the pomegranate, the palm tree and the apple tree represented as withered, "for joy is gone out of the sons of men."

The pomegranate tree, Punica granatum (N.O. Granatoideae) occurs usually as a shrub or small tree 10-15 ft. high, and is distinguished by its fresh green, oval leaves, which fall in winter, and its brilliant scarlet blossoms (cf. Cant 7:12). The beauty of an orchard of pomegranates is referred to in Cant 4:13. The fruit which is ripe about September is apple-shaped, yellow-brown with a blush of red, and is surrounded by a crown-like calyx, or breaking the hard rind, the white or pinkish, translucent fruits are seen tightly packed together inside. The juicy seeds are sometimes sweet and sometimes somewhat acid, and need sugar for eating. The juice expressed from the seeds is made into a kind of syrup for flavoring drinks, and in ancient days was made into wine: "I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine, of the juice (in "sweet wine") of my pomegranate" (Cant 5:8). The beauty of a cut section of pomegranate—or one burst open naturally, when fully ripe—may have given rise to the comparison in Cant 4:3; 6:7: "Thy temples are like a piece of a pomegranate." The rind of the pomegranate contains a very high percentage of tannic acid, and is employed both as a medicine and for tanning, particularly in making genuine morocco leather.

Whether the pomegranate tree in Migron under which Saul is said (1 S 14:2) to have abode with his family was a tree or a plane, Rimmon, is doubtful. See Rimmon.

A large number of references to the pomegranate are to the use of the form of the fruit in ornamentation, in which respect it appears among the Hebrews to have something of the position of the lotus bud as a decorative motive in Egypt. It was embrodered in many colors on the skirts of Aaron's garments, together with golden bells (Ex 28:33f; 39:24-26; cf. Ecclus 45:9). Hiram of Tyre introduced the pomegranate into his brass work ornamentation in the temple: "So he made the pillars; and there were two rows round about upon the one network, to cover the capitals that were upon the top of the pillars" (2 Chr 3:7). The Heb has 'pomegranates'") (1 K 7:18). "And the pomegranates were two hundred, in rows round upon about the other capital" (ver 20; cf. also ver 42; 2 K 25:17; 2 Chr 3:10; 4:13).

POMMEL, pum'el (2 Ch 4:12.13): RV reads "bowl" (q.v.).

POND. See CISTERN; POOL.

PONDER, pon'der. Occurs in AV 5 t in the Book of Prov and nowhere else in the OT. In each case it means "to consider carefully," "to weigh mentally." In Prov 4:26 and 5:21, RV substitutes "make level." In Prov 5:6, it drops out entirely in RV. In Prov 21:2 and 24:12, "weigh" is substituted for "ponder." The one NT passage is Lk 2:19; here RV has "pondering" where AV has "and pondered."

PONTIUS, pon'shi-us, pon'ti-us. See PILATE.

PONTUS, pon'tus (Πόντος, Pontos): Was an important province in the northeastern part of Asia Minor, lying along the south shore of the Black Sea. It is a geographical and ethnic, in origin, and was first used to designate that part of Cappadocia which bordered on the "Pontus," as the Euxine was often termed. Pontus proper extended from the Halys River on the W. to the borders of Colchis on the E., its interior boundaries meeting those of Galatia, Cappadocia and Armenia. The chief rivers besides the Halys were the Iris, Lyceus and Thermodon. The configuration of the country included a beautiful but narrow, riparian margin, backed by a noble range of mountains parallel to the sea coast, these in turn were broken by the streams that forced their way from the interior plains down to the sea; the valleys, narrower or wider, were fertile and productive, as were the wide plains of the interior such as the Chilikomon and Phanarrea. The mountain slopes were originally clothed with heavy forests of beech, pine and oak of different species, and when the country was well wooded, the rainfall must have been better adequate than now to the needs of a luxuriant vegetation.

The first points in the earliest history of Pontus emerge from obscurity, much as the mountain peaks of its own noble ranges lift their heads above a fog bank. Thus we catch glimpses of Assyrian culture at Sinope and Amiasus, probably as far back as the 3rd millennium BC. The period of Hittite domination in Asia Minor followed hard after, and there is increasing reason to suppose that the Hittites occupied certain leading city sites in Pontus, constructed the artificial mounds or tumuli that frequently meet the eyes of modern travelers, hewed out the rock tombs, and stamped their character upon the early conditions. The home of the Amazons, those warrior priestesses of the Hittites, was located on the banks of the Thermodon, and the mountains rising behind Termess are still called the "Amazon Range"; and the old legends live still in stories about the superior prowess of the modern women living there. See ARCHAEOLOGY OF ASIA MINOR.

As the Hittite power shrank in extent and force, by the year 1000 BC bands of hardy Gr adventurers appeared from the W. sailing along the Euxine main in quest of lands to exploit and conquer and colonize. Cape Jason, which divides the modern mission fields of Trebizond and Marsovan, preserves the memory of the Argonauts and the Golden Fleece. Miletus, "greatest of the Ionic towns," sent out its colonists, swarm after swarm, up through the Bosphorus, and along the southern shore of the Black Sea. They occupied Sinope, the northernmost point of the peninsula with the best harbor and the most commanding situation. Sinope was in Paphlagonia, but politically as well as commercially enjoyed intimate relations with the Pontic cities. Settlers from Sinope, reinforced by others from Athens direct, pressed on and founded Amiasus, the modern Sansoun, always an important commercial city. Another colony from Sinope founded Trebizond, near which Xenophon and the Ten Thousand reached the sea again after they had sounded the power of Persia and found it hollow at Cunaxa. Among the cities of the interior, picturesque Amasia in the valley of the Jaxartes, where sacrifices were performed with more pomp than in any other place. Comana, near the modern Tokat, was a city famous for the worship of the great god Ma. Gr culture by degrees took root along the coast; it mixed with, and in turn was modified by, the character of the older native inhabitants.

When the Persians established their supremacy in Asia Minor with the overthrow of Lydia, 546 BC, Pontus was loosely joined to the great empire and was ruled by Pers satraps. Abiarbaranes, Mithradates and Pharnaces are the recurring names in this dynasty of satraps which acquired independence about 363 and maintained it during the Macedonian period. The man that first made Pontus famous in history was Mithradates VI, surnamed Eupator, Mithradates was a typical oriental despot, gifted, unscrupulous, commanding. Born at Sinope 136 BC and king at Amasia at the age of twelve, Mithradates was regarded by the Romans as "the most formidable enemy the Republic ever had to contend with." By conquest or alliance he widely extended his power, his chief ally being his son-in-law Dikran, or Tigranes, of Armenia, and then prepared for the impending struggle with Rome. The republic had acquired Pergamus in 133 BC and assumed control of western Asia Minor. There were three Rom armies in different parts of the peninsula when war broke out, 88 BC. Mithradates attacked them separately and overthrew them all. He then planned and executed a general massacre of all the Romans in Asia Minor, and 80,000 persons were cut down. Sulla by patient effort restored the fortunes of Rome, and the first war ended in a drawn game; each party had taken the measure of its antagonist, but neither had been able to out the other. As a result of this first war, Pharnaces of the third race, grandson of Polyxenus, returned to Rome. He was a man of masterful mien, with an eye to the future and a head for strategy. These events paved the way for the annexation of Pontus by Rome in 63 BC. Between these events Pontus was for administrative purposes united with the rest of Asia Minor under Polemon, who afterwards administered the province. Polemon was an active ruler, maintaining peace and order and maintaining the existing religious practices. With the accession of the emperor Tiberius, aided by the Syrian politician Pliny the Younger, the Roman empire absorbed Pontus.

The Roman empire in the East was gradually merged into the Byzantine, which is still known to the local inhabitants as the empire of "Romun," i.e. Rome. Pontus shared the vicissitudes of this rather unfortunate government until, in 1204, a branch of the Byzantine imperial family established in Pontus a separate small state with its capital at Trebizond. Here the house of the Grand Comneni, sheltered between the sea and the mountain ranges, set up an independent government within its borders and beyond the fall of Constantinople. In 1401 Trebizond was taken by Mohammed the Conqueror, since which date Pontus, with its conglomerate population of Turks, Armenians, Greeks and fragments of other races, has been a part of the Ottoman empire.

The largest of these are made by damming water courses, in which water flows during the winter or after showers of rain. These may be enlarged or deepened by excavation. Good examples of this are found at Dibân and Mâdeba in Moab. Smaller pools of rectangular shape and usually much wider than deep, having no connection with water courses, are built in towns to receive rain from the roofs or from the surface of the ground. These may be for common use like several large ones in Jerus, or may belong to particular houses. These are commonly excavated to some depth in the soil or rock, though the walls are likely to rise above the surface. Between these and cylindrical pits or cisterns no sharp line can be drawn. The water of springs may be collected in large or small pools of masonry, as the pool of Siloam (Jn 9:7). This is commonly done for irrigation when the spring is so small that the water would be lost by absorption or evaporation if it were attempted to convey it continuously to the fields. The pool (Arab. birkat) receives the trickle of water until it is full. The water is then let out in a large stream and conducted where it is needed. (In this way by POOR, poor (יִפְטַשׁ, 'ebhyôn, פֶּטַשׁ, dal, עַנִי, עַנָּי, יַעֲשָׂנָה, יַעֲשׇנָה; פֶּטְחָה, פֶּטְחָה): 1. In the OT.—The poor have great prominence in the Bible; in fact, indeed, there should be no poor among the Hebrews because Jehovah should so greatly bless them (Dt 15 4 RV and AV); but this was only to be realized on certain conditions of obedience (ver 5), and in ver 11 it is said, "The poor will never cease out of the land"; but they were to see to it that none was left in destitution. The very foundation of the Heb religion was God's pity on a poor and oppressed people.

2. Representations

3. Special provisions were made on behalf of the poor: (a) Every third year a tithe was to be given "unto the Levite, to the sojourner, to the fatherless, and to the widow" (Dt 14 29); (b) the poor were to have the free use of all that grew spontaneously in field or vineyard during the Sabbatical year (Ex 23 10 10; Lev 25 6); (c) each year the gleanings of the fields and vineyards should belong to the poor, the corners of fields were to be left for them, and if a sheaf was forgotten it should remain (Lev 19 9; 10; 23 22; Dt 24 19); (d) fruit and ripe grain in a field might be eaten by any hungry person, but it should be carried away (Dt 23 24 25); (e) in the Feast of Weeks the poor were to participate (Dt 16 9 12); (f) every seventh year there should be a "release" of debts (Dt 15 1 1); in the seventh year of servitude the Heb bond-servant should go free (Ex 21 2). No, and the Jubilees were to take place on which—the fiftieth year—property that had been sold returned to its owner or his family (Lev 25 8 17); (g) they were to lend readily to the poor, and no interest or increase was to be taken from their brethren (Ex 22 25; Lev 25 35 37; Dt 15 7); in Lev 25 39, no poor Hebrew was to be made a bond-servant, and, if a hired servant, he was not to be ruled with rigor (ver 43); his hire was to be given him daily (Lev 19 13; Dt 24 14); no widow's raiment could be taken as pledge (Dt 24 17), nor the handmill, nor the upper millstone so essential for daily life (ver 6), a man's garment should be returned to him before sundown, and no house should be entered to seize or fetch any thing (ver 10 15); the poor should be sin and their observance righteousness (Dt 24 13 1 13; etc; see ALMS, ALMSGIVING); (h) justice was to be done to the poor (Ex 23 6; Dt 27 19, "Curse be he that wrecketh the justice due to the sojourner, fatherless, and widow"); (i) offerings were graduated according to means (Lev 5 7 12 8).

(4) Divine penalties were not always attached to those laws, and the prophets and psalmists have many complaints of the unjust treatment of the poor, contrary to the will of God, and frequent exhortations to justice and a due regard for them (Ps 10 2 9; 12 5; 14 6; etc; Isa 3 14 15; Jer 2 34; Ezek 16 49, "the iniquity of... Sodom"); 16 12 17; 22 29; Am 2 7 4; Hab 3 14; of Job 20 19; 24 9 1 4, etc; Prov 14 31).

The duty of caring for the poor is frequently and strongly set forth and Divine promises attached to its fulfillment (Ps 41 1; 72 12 6; Prov 17 5 23; 22 9; 26 3 27; Isa 58 7; Jer 22 16; Ezek 18 7; Amos 7 7; Del 4 27; etc; etc; of Job 29 12 6; 30 25 31 19; Ps 112 9).

(6) The day of the Divine manifestation, the times of the Messiah, shall bring deliverance and rejoicing to the poor (Ps 72 12 15; Isa 11 4; "With righteousness shall he judge the poor"); etc; 11 30; 29 19 1 11 RVm).

(7) The equality of rich and poor before God and the superiority of the righteous poor to the ungodly rich, etc, are maintained (Prov 19 1 2 2 23 12; Ecle 4 153).

(8) Ways in which men can willy-nilly make themselves poor are mentioned (Prov 6 11 4 2 13 4 18; 14 23; 20 13; 25 1 17; 35 1 21 24; 28 19).

The chief words given above all mean poor, literally, but 'אֹгиб (rendered also "afflicted") also denote Israel as a nation in its afflictions and low estate, e.g. Ps 68 Godly Poor 10; Isa 41 17; 49 13; 51 21; 64 11; in Zeph 3 12 it is "the ideal Israel of the future." Dr. Driver remarks (in "Poor," HDR) that such passages show that the "poor are also its frequent parallel 'הָ֔בִיָּן, and, though somewhat less distinctly, dal) came gradually to "denote the godly poor, the suffering righteous, the persons who, whether 'bowed down' or 'needy' or 'reduced,' were the godly servants of Jehovah." The humble poor became in fact distinguished as the line in which faithfulness to Jehovah was maintained and spiritual pine"; LXX τυχουσ, eichinos, "hedgehog"; τιμ, kippas [Isa 34 15], AV "great owl," ERV "arrow-snake," ARV "dart-snake"; LXX eichinos; of Arab. κουφαζ, τουφαζ, "hedgehog" or "porcupine." τιμ, kippas, is referred to as τιμ, kaphad, "to draw one's self together" or "to roll one's self up," while τιν is referred to τιμ, kaphas, and τιμ, kaphas, "to draw together in order to spring." The resemblance between all these words, including the Arab. κουφαζ, is obvious, and it is to be noted that LXX has eichinos in all the places cited).

The Gr eichinos is the hedgehog. The Arab. κουφαζ is used in some localities for the hedgehog and in others for the porcupine, which is also called τουφαζ. These two animals are both found in Syria and Pal, and, while both have spines, they are very different animals, though often confused. The hedgehog, Erinaceus europaeus, is one of the Insectivora, and not only insects but also snakes and other small animals, as well as fruits and roots. It is about 10 in. long, covered with short, short and rolls itself into a ball when attacked. It inhabits the countries bordering the Mediterranean. The porcupine Erinaceus cristatus, is a rodent, about 26 in. long, having long spines. It is herbivorous. It backs rapidly at its foes, thrusting its sharp spines into their flesh, not through its spines, as is often stated. It inhabits most of Europe and Asia. It is very different from the little porcupine, Erethizon dorsatum, as well as from the true porcupines of Mexico and Central and South America.

As to the rendering "bitterm" for kippas (Isa 14 33; 34 15; Zeph 2 14), while the etymology favors "hedgehog," the context favors a bird, esp. in Isa 34 15, though it cannot be said that in any of the passages the context makes "hedgehog" an impossible rendering.

In Isa 34 15, for kippas, most modern authorities (cf RV) have some sort of serpent, referring to the Arab. κοτας, "to spring." (See notes above on kaphas and kaphas.) In this passage also the context is not unfavorable to a bird (cf AV "great owl"). See Bittern; Owl; Serpent.

ALFRED ELY DAY

POPHORY, Ποφορυ- (in Ex 28 11; RV has "pophory" [AV "porphory"] for τυχουσ ὑμ. τιμ, tahash, RV "sealskin," AV "badgers' skin." [Ex 25 5; 26 14; 35 7; 36 19; 39 34; Nu 4 6.8.10.11.12.14.25; Ezek 16 10]: The word denotes leather used in the furnishings of the tabernacle (for shoes in Ezek 16 10), and was probably the skin of the dugong, Halichoerus dugon, of Arab. تکوس, tukhas, which is found in the Red Sea. See Badger.

PORT, port, PORTER, porter: "Port" in the sense of "gate" (of a city or building) is obsolete in modern Eng, and even in the AV is found only in Neh 2 13. Porter, as "gate-keeper," however, is still in use, but "port" now (and never in EV) generally means a bolder-carrier. In the OT, except in 2 S 18 26; 2 K 7 10.11, the porter (תּוֹש, shob) is a sacred officer of the temple or tabernacle, belonging to a particular family of the Levites, with a share in the sacred dues (Neh 13 5; 12 47). The "porters" are mentioned only in Ch, Ezra and Neh, and Ch has an especial interest in them, relating that their duties were settled as far back as the time of David (1 Ch 26 1-19), and that the office extended further to the first settlement of Pal and even to Moses' day (1 Ch 9 17-26). The office was evidently one of some dignity, and the "chief porters" (1 Ch 26 3) are important persons. For some inscrutable reason RV renders shōbēr by "doorkeeper" in 1 Ch 15:26, but not elsewhere. See Doorkeeper.

PORTION, pôr'tshun, PART: As far as a distinction between these three words is possible in Eng, it lies in the fact that a "portion" is a "part" about whose destiny something is implied (Ps 142 5, etc). The Heb has no two synonyms similarly related, and in consequence the use of the words in EV is settled either by rather arbitrary considerations (תּוֹש, m'nâh, is always "portion" in RV, but is "part" in AV, Ex 39 26; Lev 7 33; 8 29) or by the context, irrespective of the Heb word used. So "part" and "portion" both represent מ'נ', dabbâr, 1 K 6 38; Neh 12 47; מ'נ', peh, Zec 13 8; Dt 21 17; מ'נ', hebbel, Jos 17 5 (RV); Ezek 47 13; מ'נ', môrâs, Lk 11 36; 13 46. And in the vast majority of cases in the OT both words represent simply some derivative of מ'נ', halâk, normally the noun מ'נ', hâlak.

POSIDONIUS, po-sid':nus (Ποσιδόνιος, Posidónios, al. Ποσιδόνιος, Posidónios and Posidónia, Possidón): One of the three or four envoy's sent by the Syrian general Nicander to treat with the Jews under Judas during his invasion of Judaea, 161 BC (2 Mace 14 19). In 1 Mace 7 27 ff, it is proposed that Nicander sent two or two, but no envoys are named, and it is there asserted in contradiction to 2 Mace that Judas broke off the negotiation because of the treacherous designs of Nicander.

POSSESS, po-zes', POSSESSION, po-zesh'un: "Possess" in modern Eng, means normally only "keep in one's possession." But in Elizabethan Eng it means also "take into possession," and, in fact, the word in the OT always represents Heb wbs, with the meaning as the latter as the former (יִצְבָּא, yâzâh, in nearly all cases, otherwise מָנָּה, mhâth, מִנָּה, מְנָה; Aram. מ'נ', hâlân). Consequently, in almost every case "take possession of" could be substituted advantageously for "possess," but RV has not thought the change worth carrying through. In the Apoc and NT, however, the designation has been made, AV's "possess" being retained for karîy, kalâch, in 1 Cor 7 30; 2 Cor 6 10, but the same tr for קָרִי, קָלַש, is changed into "take us for a possession" (Jth 8 22), "get" (Lk 18 12), "win" (Lk 21 19), and "possess himself of" (1 Thes 4 4, a very obscure passage). In the noun possession, on the other hand, no such ambiguity exists, and attention need be called only to the following passages. In Dt 11 6, AV has, "all the substance that was in their possession," Heb "all that subsisted at their feet," RV "every living thing that followed them." AV use "possessed" loosely in Acts 28 7 for χωρεῖν, chôrion, RV "lands." πορφοίας, periptôlēs, "perimetrics, from peripto, to cause to remain over," is rendered "God's own possession" in Eph 1 14 RV (AV "possessing") and 1 Pet 2 9 (AV "peculiar Avem purchased"). "God's own" is a gloss but is implied in the context.

POSSESSION, DEMONIACAL, de-mô-ni'ak-al (Mt 4 24; 8 16, etc). See Demon, Demonic, Demonology.
POST, post (πόστ, ποστο, "to run," ἄποστ, ἀπόστα, "runners"): The "runners" formed the royal guard (1 S 22 17; 1 K 14 27; 2 K 11 4.13; see Guard). From them were chosen the couriers who carried royal letters and dispatches throughout the kingdom (2 Ch 30 6.10; Est 3 13.17; Jer 51 31). In the Persian service they were mounted on the swiftest horses (Est 8 10.14; of Xenophon, Cyrop. vii.6.17; Herodotus viii.98). They had the right to command the service of either men or animals in order to expedite their progress (Mt 5 26; Mk 15 21; Mt 19 13). Used in Job 9 25 and AV Wisd 5 9 (ἀγγέλλα, ἀγγέλλα, RV "message") of the swift passage of time. See also Hose, 11, 1, 4, 7). M. O. Evans

POT, pot: A term used as the tr of a number of Heb and Gr words whose fundamental meaning seems to describe them as intended for the most part to hold liquid or semi-liquid substances, but the pots of Ex 27 3 are intended to hold ashes. (1) τρύγος, the most common word for "pot." It designates most frequently a vessel for holding broth, or possibly a pot or kettle for boiling. So 2 K 4 38 ff; Ex 16 3; Jer 1 13 AV; Ex 23 13.7.17, "caldron"; 24 3.6 AV; Mic 3 3; Zec 14 21, etc. It is also used as the name of some vessel of the same character in Ex 27 3, where in context shows it was intended to hold ashes; 1 K 7 45; 2 Ch 4 16; 2 K 25 14; Ps 6 9; 18 9, it is a pot for washing. (2) τσύ, pārār (Nu 11 8; 1 S 2 14), a vessel for boiling; in Jgs 6 19, a vessel for holding broths; (3) δόχος, ἀγγέλλα, rendered "pot" in Ps 21 6 in AV, "basin" in RV: "pot" both AV and RV in Job 41 20. (4) φυτίζω, φυτεύν (Ex 16 53), the jar in which the manna was placed. This jar or pot is mentioned in He 9 4 under the name στάκμα, στάκμα. (5) ἄγγελλα (2 K 4 2), some kind of jar for holding oil. (6) στάκμα, στάκμα (Mt 7 4), some kind of household utensil. Mention may also be made of the word rendered "pot" in Lev 6 28 AV, where RV renders more correctly by the general term "vessel"; for AV "pots" (Ps 68 13) RV substitutes "sheepfolds." The root is uncertain. Those who render "sheepfolds" connect with the related, but in most cases somewhat household utensil. Others render "fireplaces" or "ash heaps." See also "range for pots" in Lev 11 35; "pots," Jer 36 5 AV, correctly "bowls" RV; "refining pots" in Prov 17 3; 27 21. See also Food.

POTENTATE, poten-tāt (συνάρτητος, συνάρτητος, "mighty one," from συνάρτη, συνάρτη, "to be able"): A person who possesses great power and authority. Only in 1 Tim 6 15, "the blessed and only Potentate" (= God). The same Gr word is used of Zeus in Sophocles (Ant. 608), and of God in Apoc (e.g. Sir 46 5; 2 Mac 15 3.23). It is used of men in Lk 1 52 (AV "the mighty", RV "princes") and Acts 8 27 ("of great authority").

POTIPHAR, pot'i-far (ποτιφαρ, pōtiphar; of Egypt Potiphera [Gen 39 1 f]): A high Egypt official who became the master of Joseph. It is particularly mentioned that he was an Egyptian, i.e. one of the native Egypt officials at the Hyksos court.

POTIPHERA, poti-fē'-ra (ποτιφ'ερα, pōtiph'era; Egyptian Potippara, "the one [given] of the sun-god"); of Heb Nathaniel, "the gift of God," Gen 41 45.50; 46 20): There is no certain evidence from Egypt that this name was in existence until the XXII Dynasty, about 950 BC. But names of the Hyksos period, and, indeed, any kind of Hyksos inscriptions, are so scarce on account of the destruction of Hyksos monuments by the Egyptians of later times that the absence of such names is really no evidence on the subject. The fact that this name has not been discovered earlier than 950 BC does not give any warrant for the claim that the narrative is of a late date. M. G. KYLE POTSHARD, potshārd (ποτηρίς, heres): A piece of earthenware (Job 2 8; Ps 22 15; Isr 45 9). RV renders the word in Prov 26 23, "an earthen vessel," and in Job 41 30 substitutes "sharp potshards" for "sharp stones." Sir 22 7 refers to the art of "shaping a potsherd [ποτηρίς, ἄκρακον] together." See HARSITH; OSTRACA.

LITERATURE

(1) Prehistoric.—The making of pottery ranks among the very oldest of the crafts. On the rocky plateaus of Upper Egypt, overlooking the Nile valley, are found the polished red earthenware pots of the prehistoric period, 3000 BC. These are buried in shallow oval graves along with the crumpled bodies of the dead and their chipped flint weapons and tools. These jars are the oldest examples of the potter's art. It is inconceivable that in the country of Babel, Egypt's great rival in civilization, the ceramic arts were less developed at the same period, but the difference in the nature of the country where the first Mesopotamian settlements were made makes it unlikely that relics of the prehistoric dwellers of that country will ever be recovered from under the débris of demolished cities and the underlying deposits of clay and silt. (2) Babylonia.—The oldest examples of Bab ceramics date from the historical period, and consist of baked clay record tablets, bricks, drainage pipes, household shrines, as well as vessels for holding liquids, fruits and other stores. (See Perrot and Chipiez, History of Art in the Ancient East, I, figs. 159, 160, II, figs. 163, 168.) Examples of pottery of this early period are shown in the accompanying figures. By the 9th to the 7th cent. BC the shaping of vessels of clay had become well developed. Fragments of pottery bearing the name of Esarhaddon establish the above dates.

(3) Egypt.—With the close of the Neolithic period in Egypt and the beginning of the historical or dynastic period (4500–4000 BC) there was a decline in the pottery art. The workmanship and forms both became bad, and not until the IVth Dynasty was there any improvement. In the meantime the process of glazing had been discovered and the art of making beautiful glazed faience became one of the most notated of the ancient Egyptian arts. The potter's wheel too was probably an invention of this date.

(4) Palestine.—The making of pottery in the land which later became the home of the children of Israel began long before this people possessed the land and even before the Phoenicians of the coast cities had extended their trade inland and brought the earthenware vessels of the Tyrian or Sidonian potters. As in Egypt and Babylonia, the first examples were handmade without the aid of the wheel.
It is probable that Jewish potters learned their art from the Phoenicians. They at least copied Phoenian and Mycenaean forms. During their wanderings the children of Israel were not likely to make much use of earthenware vessels, any more than the Arabs do today. Skins, gourds, wooden and metal vessels were less easily broken.

To illustrate this, a party, of which the writer was a member, took on a desert trip the earthenware water jars specially made for travel, preferring them to the skin bottles such as the Arabs guides carried, for the bottles were less easy to keep filled. At the end of six days only one out of eight earthenware jars was left. One accident or some carelessness was not the rule.

When the Israelites became settled in their new surroundings they were probably not slow in adopting earthenware vessels, because of their advantages, and their pottery gradually developed distinctive though decadent types known as Jewish.

Toward the close of the Hebrew monarchy the pottery of the land again showed the effect of outside influences. The red and black figured ware of the Greeks was introduced, and still later the less artistic Roman types, and following these by several centuries came the crude glazed vessels of the Arab or Saracenic period—forms which still persist.

It is not within the limits of this article to describe in detail the characteristics of the pottery of the various periods. The accompanying illustrations taken from photographs of pottery in the Archeological Museum of the Syrian Protestant College, Beirut, give a general idea of the forms. Any attempt at classification of Palestinian pottery must be considered more or less provisional, due to the uncertainty of origin of many forms. The classification of Palestinian pottery here used is that adopted by Bliss and Macalister and based upon Dr. Petrie's studies.

(1) Early pre-Israëlitic, called also "Anatolian" (before 1800 BC).—Most of the vessels of this period are handmade and often irregular in shape. A coarse clay, turning red or black when burned, characterizes many specimens. Some are brick red. Specimens with a polished or burnished surface are also found.

(2) Late pre-Israëlitic or Phoenician (1800-1000 BC).—From this period on, the pottery is all wheel-turned. The clay is of a finer quality and burned to a brown or red. The ware is thin and light. Water jars with pointed instead of flat bases appear. Some are decorated with bands or lines of different colored ines. Cyproite ware with its incised decorations was a development of the period.

(3) Jewish (1000-500 BC).—Foreign influence is lost. The types which survive degenerate. New forms are introduced. Ordinary coarse clay burning red is used. Cooking pots are most characteristic. Many examples bear Hebraic stamps, the exact meaning of which is uncertain.

(4) Seleucid.—Foreign influence again appears. Gr and other pottery types are imported and copied. Ribbed surfaces are introduced. The old type of burnishing disappears.

(5) Roman and Saracenic.—Degenerate forms persisting till the present time.

(6) Present-day pottery.

The clay as found in the ground is not suitable for use. It is dug out and brought to the vicinity of the pottery (the "potter's field," Mt 27:7) and allowed to weather for weeks. The dry material is then passed through a coarse sieve and ground, the coarsest fractions being rejected. The material is then mixed with water until all have disintegrated and a thin slurry mud or "slip" has been formed. In coast cities the potteries are all near the sea, as the seawater is considered better for the "slipping" process. The slip is drawn off into settling tanks. All stones and lumps remain behind. When the clay has settled, the water is drawn off and the plastic material is worked by treading with the feet (cf. Isa 41:25; Wisd 15:7). The clay used on the Syrian coast is usually a mixture of several earths, which the potters have learned by experience gives the right consistency. The prepared clay is finally packed away and allowed to stand another six months before using, during which time the quality, especially the plasticity, is believed to improve.

Before the invention of the potter's wheel the clay was shaped into vessels by hand. In all of the countries previously mentioned the specimens representing the oldest work are all hand-made. Chopped straw was usually added to the clay of these early specimens. This material is omitted in the

The shaping of vessels is now done on wheels, the use of which dates back to earliest history. Probably the Egyptians were the first to use such a machine (11th Dynasty). In their original form they were stone disks arranged to be turned by hand on a vertical axis. The wheel stood only a few inches above the ground, and the potter sat or squatted down on the ground before it as he shaped his object (see Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt, II, fig. 307). The wheels used in Pal and Syria today probably differ in no respect from those used in the potter's house visited by Jeremiah (Jer 18 1-6).

The wheel or, to be more exact, wheels (cf Jer 18 3) are fitted on a square wooden or iron shaft about 3 ft. long. The lower disk is about 30 in. in diameter, and the upper one 8 in. or 12 in. The lower end of the shaft is pointed and fits into a stone socket or bearing in which it rotates. A second bearing just below the upper disk is so arranged that the shaft inclines slightly away from the potter. The potter leans against a slanting seat, bracing himself with one foot so that he will not slide off, and with the sole of his other foot he kicks the upper face of the lower wheel, thus making the whole machine rotate. The lower wheel is often of stone to give greater momentum. With a marvelous dexterity, which a novice tries in vain to imitate, he gives the pieces of clay any shape he desires.

After the vessel is shaped it is dried and finally fire-dried in a furnace or kiln. The ancient Egyptian kiln was much smaller than the one used today (Wilkinson, II, 192). Most of the kilns are of the crudest form of the "up-draught" variety, i.e. a large chamber with perforated bottom and a fireplace beneath. The fire passes up through the holes, around the jars packed in tiers in the chamber, and goes out at the top. An interesting survival of an early Gr form is still used in Rachiyet-el-Fakhar in Syria. In this same village the potters also use the lead cross, which comes from the parting of silver, for glazing their jars (cf Prov 26 23).

In firing pottery there are always some jars which come out imperfect. In unpacking the kiln and storing the product others get broken. As a consequence the ground in the vicinity of a pottery is always strewn with potsherds (see also separate article). The ancient potteries can frequently be located by these sherds. The potter's field mentioned in Mt 27 7-10 was probably a field near a pottery strewn with potsherds, thus making it useless for cultivation although useful to the potter as a place in which to weather his clay or to dry his pots before firing.

Pottery was used anciently for storing liquids, such as wine or oil, fruits, grains, etc. The blackened bottoms of pots of the Jewish period show that they were used for cooking. Earthenware dishes were also used for boiling clothes. Every one of these

4. Uses: In the Bible lands today it seems inconceivable that the Hebrews did not readily adopt, as some writers disclaim, the porous earthen water jars which they found already in use in their new country. Such jars were used for carrying live coals to start a fire, and not only for drawing water, as they are today, but for cooling it (Isa 30 14). The evaporation of the water which oozes through the porous material cools down the contents of a jar, whereas a metal or leathern vessel would leave it tepid or tainted. They were also used for holding shoemaker's glue or wax; for filling up the cracks of a wall before plastering; ground up they are used as sand in mortar.

Only a few of the Heb words for vessels of different sorts, which in all probability were made of pottery, have been given by terms which indicate that fact. (For כּוֹתָן, cuvot, and יִסְעָר, yis'ar, see Earthen Vessels; Ostracai.)

Figurative: The shaping of clay into pottery typified the molding of the characters of individuals or nations by a master mind (Jer 18:1-10; Isa 29:16; 45:9; 64:5; Rom 9:20 ff); commonplace (Lam 4:2; 2 Tim 2:20); frailness (Ps 2:9; Isa 30:14; Jer 19:11; Dn 2:41; 2 Cor 4:7; Rev 2:27).

POTTER'S, pot'ər's. See ACELAMDA.

POUND, pound (ג'קָד, māneh; μᾶρα, mard, λίρα, lirə, which was formerly used for drinking instead of modern cups. כְּלָה, pabbâh, tr'"bowl" in Jer 33:5.

חֵט', khit, "vessel," was of wood, metal or earthenware in Lev 6:28; Ps 2:9; 31:12; Isa 30:14; Jer 19:11, etc.; of bronzeware, [אָשָׁר, pot, 2: Cor 4:17, etc.

יָחָש, yakhâsh, "cup" or "bowl." tr'"cup" in many passages, like Arab. כָּשָׁה, which was used in the OT (Gen 45:11) outside of the Book of Prov in which it occurs 11 t. (6:11; 10:15; 11:24 AV; 13:18; 20:13; 23:21; 34 References 34; 28:19,22 AV; 30:8; 31:7), in a tr of מִעָנָה, mīy wārah, "to be poor," "to come to poverty" (Gen 45:11). Four different Heb words are used in the 11 references in Prov, all bearing the idea of being in need of the necessities of life, although a distinction is made between being in want and being in extreme want. Prov 18:23 well illustrates the general meaning of "poverty" as found in this book: "The poor [מִעָנָה, mīy wārah, "to be impoverished," "destitute"] used entertain; but the rich answereth roughly.

"Poverty" occurs 3 t in the NT (2 Cor 8:29;
Rev 2:9 and is the tr of πτωχεύς, πτοχεύω, "to be reduced to a state of beggary or pauperism."

2. NT References unless all the references to the "poor" are to be considered as such.

Indeed the word for "poverty" has its root in the word for "poor" (πτωχός, πτοχή, τρία, or ὑπάρχω, dale). See Poom.

At least two degrees of poverty are recognized. The OT does not distinguish between them as clearly as does the NT. The NT, for

3. Two Degrees of "poor" sets forth this distinction. In Poverty 2 Cor 9:9, "he hath given to the poor," the word used is πτωχος, πτωχία, which does not indicate extreme poverty, but simply a condition of living from hand to mouth, a bare and scant livelihood, such as that made by the widow who cast her two mites into the treasury (Lk 21:2); while in such passages as 2 Cor 6:10: "As poor, yet making many rich," and Lk 6:20: "Blessed are ye... for ye... outcasts of abject beggary, pauperism, such as that in which we find Lazarus who was laid at the gate of the rich man's palace, begging even the crumbs which fell from the table of the rich man (Lk 16:21, 22). This is being varied by this last condition that Christ voluntarily entered for our sakes: "For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor (2 Cor 8:9). Between 30 and 40 t in the NT this latter word is used.

The causes of poverty are failure of harvest and poor crops (Neh 5:1-3); devastation caused by enemies sweeping through the land; the oppression of the people by their own rulers (Isa 5:8); excessive interest, usury (Neh 5:1-5); persecution because of the faith (2 Cor 6:8). Widows and orphans by reason of their desolate condition were in a special sense subject to poverty. Gluttony brings poverty (Prov 29:21), as does indolence (2 Th 3:10).

God commanded His people to care for the poor. The exhortations to relieve poverty are numerous, esp. in the Prophets. "Every one that is indigent must be treated with kindness (Dt 23:15-16) must be allowed to glean in the vineyards (Lev 19:10); to reap the harvest (23:2; cf Ruth 2:1); "The poor were not neglected (Rom 15:25; 1 Cor 16:2). God dealt with harshly (Am 3:4-6); must be treated as equal before the law (Gal 3:28); are precious in our house of faith (Lk 14:12-15). Indeed, the truth or falsity of a man's religion is to be tested, in some sense at least, by his feeling in their need (Jas 1:27). The year of Jubilee was intended to be of great benefit to the poor by restoring to them any possessions which they, by reason of their poverty, had been compelled to sell over to their creditors (Lev 25:25-55; Dt 15:12-15).

God required certain tithe from His people which were to be devoted to the helping of the poor and needy (Dt 14:28; 26:12, 13).

special emphasis upon remembering the poor in the matter of offerings. Paul, e.g., included this duty upon which he had founded his defense (Acts 20:35-38).

The attitude of the early Christian church toward its poor is amply illustrated in that first attempt at communism in Acts 4, 5, 12. James, in his Ep., strikingly reminds his readers of the fact that they had grossly neglected the poor man in their midst (Jas 2). Indeed, so strong is he in his plea for the care of the poor that he claims that the man who willily neglects the needy thereby proves that the love of God has no place in his heart, and that he has consequently no real faith in God (Jas 2:15, 16). Christians were exhorted about in the grace of hospitality, which, of course, is nothing less than kindness to those in need (Rom 12:13; 1 Thes. 4:12).

The happiest mother and the noblest and holiest son that ever lived were among the poor. Jesus was born of poor parents, and had not where to lay His head (Mt 8:20), no money with which to pay tribute (Mt 17:27), no home to call His own (Jn 7:53; cf 8:1), and was buried in a borrowed grave (Mt 27:57-61).

Figurative: Of course there is also a spiritual poverty indicated by the use of this word—a poverty in spiritual things. "Blessed are the poor in spirit," by this is meant that no one is more precious to the Lord, who feel that they have no self-righteousness, no worth of their own to present to Christ as a ground of their salvation, who feel their utter bankruptcy of spirit, who say "Nothing in my hand I bring." It is to this state of spirit that Christ refers in Mt 5:3. "Because thou sayest, I am rich, and have gotten riches, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art the wretched one and miserable and poor and blind and naked." William Evans

POW DERS, pou/dorz (παυς, 'abhebath rikhel): The "powders of the merchant" in Cant 3 6 were probably perfumes, as they are associated with myrrh and frankincense in the account of the festal procession of the litter of Solomon. They may have been some sweet-scented wood in powder, or else some form of incense.

POWER, pou'er: This word, indicative of might, strength, force, is used in the OT to render very many Heb. terms, the tr in numerous instances being varied without apparent reason. The Heb. words for "strength," "might," "dominion." The principal words for "power" in the NT are δυναμίς, ἀνάμις, and ὁδεία, ezovia. In the latter case RF frequently changes to "authority" (Mt 3:15; 6:7; Eph 1:21, etc.) or "right" (Rom 9:21; 1 Cor 7:6; 2 Thes 3:9, etc.). Power is attributed pre-eminently to God (1 Ch 29:11; Job 26:14; Ps 66:7; 145:11; Rev 7:12, etc.). On this attribute of power of God, see OMNIPOTENCE. The supreme manifestation of the power, as of the wisdom and love of God, is in redemption (1 Cor 18:24).

The preaching of the gospel is accompanied by the power of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 4:1; 1 Thes 5, etc.). Miracles, as "mighty works" are denoted by the term "powers" (so Mt 11:21,23, Revm, etc.). The end of all time's developments is that God takes to Him His great power and reigns (Rev 11:17).

POWER OF KEYS. See KEYS, POWER OF.

PRAETORIAN, pré-tó'ri-an, GUARD: "My bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places?" (Phil 1:13 AV). This verse is brt in RV, "My bonds became manifest in Christ throughout the whole praetorian guard, and to all the rest," and is noteworthy.

It has been usual to connect the words, "the soldier that guarded him," Acts 26:16, with this statement in Phil 1:13, that the apostle's bonds were manifest in the whole praetorium, and to understand that the result was the cause of the latter; that the result was the consequence of the fact that he was in prison, and was a prisoner of Jesus Christ. In this way the gospel would spread through the whole praetorian guard in that regiment's headquarters which were situated in a permanent camp established by Trajan in Rome, outside the Colline Gate, at the N.E. of the city. This verse would also mean that the gospel had been proclaimed in the same way to those members of the praetorian guard... who were on duty as the bodyguard of the emperor and who were lodged in one of the buildings which adjoined the emperor's palace on the Palatine Hill.

Thus Lightfoot, discussing the meaning of the phrase "in the whole praetorium," in judicial matters (p. 57), reviews the different interpretations which have been given of the word, and shows that it is to be found in various works of Tacitus and Suetonius. The "praetorium" means the emperor's palace on the Palatine Hill; (2) that which precedes in the Interim Epistle which would make it mean the praetorian barracks on the Palatine: (3) that neither is there any authority for making it mean the praetorian camp outside the walls of Rome. In Lightfoot's words (p. 57), "It follows from the interpretation which the praetorium thus fail for want of evidence:"

Lightfoot accordingly defines the interpretation, "the praetorian guard," and RV, above cited, follows him in this.

One of the meanings of "praetorium" is a council of war, the officers who met in the general's tent (see Praetorium). Lightfoot is very decided in interpreting "praetorium" to mean the praetorian guard and Ramsay mentions the imperial guards, and he adds, "in this sense and in this alone can it be safely affirmed that the apostle would hear the word praetorium used daily," and that this sense is in all respects appropriate. But the other meaning, though not appropriate here, viz., a council of war composed of the officers and their general, is much nearer to that which is now accepted by such authorities as Mommsen and Sir W. M. Ramsay, who hold that in this passage "praetorium" means a council, not of war, however, but the council of judgment, the emperor's court of appeal in which he was assisted by his legal assessors (see Mommsen, Berlin Akad. Sitzungsber., 1895, 501; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Rom Citize, 357, where he is in accord with Lightfoot). The Emperor's Court, over this court there presided the emperor or his delegate, the prefect of the praetorian guard, and associated with him were twenty assessors selected from the senators. Formerly their votes were taken by ballot, but Nero preferred to receive from each a written opinion and on the next day to deliver his judgment in person. Such, it is now believed, is the praetorium to which Paul refers.

The meaning, therefore, of the words, "My bonds in Christ are manifest in the whole praetorium," will be that when Paul wrote the Ep. to the Phil, he had written the following words to his imperial guards, and Phil, 4:2 1, 2, it be he: "These résemblances are seen in the Ep. Phil, 4:2 and Phil, 4:2, the circumstances will allow," earlier, that is, than Col and Eph. Lightfoot concludes that Phil is the earliest of them, basing his opinion largely on the resemblance which exists between the thoughts and expressions in Phil and in the Ep. to the Rom, making Phil, as it were, a connecting link between Paul's earlier and his later ep. see Lightfoot, Philippians, 42 f.; he writes: "These resemblance are suitable for the Phil, 4:2 and Phil, 4:2, the circumstances will allow," earlier, that is, than Col and Eph. Lightfoot's argument is supported by the fact that a light which has been thrown upon the real meaning of "praetorium." Sir W. M. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 128) remarks: "The trial occupied about a year and a half, and the entire case was decided toward the end of AD 61. Its earliest stages were over before Paul went to Philippians, 2:4. He says, "the things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the progress of the Good News; so that my bonds became manifest in Christ in the whole Praetorium, and to all the rest; and that most of the Brethren in the Lord, being confident in my bonds, are more abundantly bold to speak the word of God without fear."

This passage has been generally misconceived and connected with the period of imprisonment; and later connected to Mommsen for the proper interpretation. The Praetorium is the whole body of persons connected with the imperial court, different in Proconsul and in this case the Prefect or both Prefects of the Praetorian Guard, and being the emperor in his capacity as the fountain of justice, together with the assessors and high officials of the court. The expression of the chapter as a whole shows that the interesting question is not how the issue as it is so favorably that the Brethren are emboldened by the success of Paul's speech, but the spoken defence and the strong impression which he evidently produced on the court; but he himself, being entirely convicted of loyalty to Christ, was prevented from preaching as he had been doing when he wrote to the Colossians and the Asian churches generally.

Thus the correct meaning of "praetorium" enables us to fix the date of the Ep. to the Phil, as having been written close to the end of Paul's first Bearing Romans imprisonment. That this inference is correct is confirmed by various other facts, such as his promise to visit that city, and his assurance of Timothy, "I have no man like-minded, who will naturally care for your state. For all seek their own ends, not the things which are of Christ's."

We could not conceive of Paul writing like this if Mark, Luke, and John thus and specially after he had written to him then, and yet we know (Col 4:7,10.14) that each and all of these companions of the apostle were with him in Rome when he wrote the Ep. Phil. Paul is evidently, perhaps, with others, been on missions to Asia or other parts of the world. But it is certain that Paul was not "liked them" when he wrote to Philippi. See Paul the Apostle, Philippians, Epistle to the.

All these facts and considerations confirm us in accepting the signification of "praetorium" as the emperor's supreme court of appeal, before which Paul when he wrote the Ep. to the Phil had so conducted his defense as to produce a most favorable impression, from which he inferred that he might soon be liberated from imprisonment. And his liberation, as the event proved, soon followed.

John Rutherford

The Praetorium was originally the headquarters of a Roman camp, but in the provinces the name became attached to the governor's official residence. In order to provide residences for their provincial governormen, the Romans were accustomed to seize and appropriate the palaces which were formerly the houses of the princes or kings in conquered countries. Such a residence might sometimes be in a royal palace, as was probably the case in Caesarea, where the procurator used Herod's palace (Acts 23:35).

The Praetorium where Jesus was brought to trial has been traditionally located in the neighborhood of the present Turkish barracks where once stood the Antonia and where was stationed a large garrison (Acts 21:38, 39; 25:65, but the statements of Jos make it certain that the headquarters of the procurator were at Herod's palace. This was a building whose magnificence Jos can hardly sufficiently appraise (Wars, I, xxi, I; IV, iv, 4). It was in this palace that Phorus, the procurator took his court and based his tribunal in front of it, held his sessions and the chief priests, influential persons and notables of the city appeared before the tribunal" (Wars, II, xiv, 8). Later on, "Florus . . . brought such as were with him out of the king's palace, and would have of it in human consciousness; and so Paul associates praise with virtue as an aid and incentive to holy living on which the mind should dwell (Phil 4:8).

In the Bible it is God who is esp. brought before us as the object of praise. His whole creation praises Him, from the angels of heaven (Ps 103:20; Rev 5:11) to those lower God as its existences that are unconscious or even inanimate (Ps 19:1-4; 148:1-10; Rev 5:13). But it is with the praises offered to God by man, and with the human duty of praising God, that the Scriptures are principally concerned. In regard to this subject the following points may be noticed.

1. The grounds of praise.—Sometimes God is praised for His inherent qualities. His majesty (Ps 104:1) or holiness (Isa 6:3) fills the mind, and He is “glorified as God” (Rom 1:21) in view of this divine grandeur. Others see Him as He works in creation, providence, and redemption. References may be dispensed with here, for the evidence meets us on almost every page of the sacred literature from Gen to Rev, and the Book of Ps in particular, from beginning to end. In essence these are the same as the revelations of God’s operations under those aspects present themselves, not simply as general effects of His power and wisdom, but as expressions of His personal love to the individual, the nation, the church, His works become benefits, and praise passes into blessing and thanksgiving (Ps 34, 105; Eph 1:3; 1 Pet 1:3).

2. (The modes of praise.—True praise of God, as distinguished from false praise (Isa 29:13; Mt 15:8), is first of all an inward emotion—a gladness and rejoicing of the heart (Ps 4:7; 33:21), a music of the soul and spirit (Ps 105:1; Lk 1:46) which no language can adequately express (Ps 106:2; 2 Cor 9:15). But utterance is natural to strong emotion, and the mouth instinctively strives to express the praises of the heart (Ps 81:15 and passim). Many of the most moving passages in Scripture come from the inspiration of the spirit of praise awakened by the contemplation of the Divine majesty or power or wisdom or kindness, but above all by the revelation of redeeming love. Again, the spirit of man creates words to utterance. The man who prays God desires to praise Him in the hearing of other men (Ps 40:10), and desires also that their praises should be joined with his own (31:3). Further, the spirit of praise is an activity of the mouth. It may find expression in other ways—in sacrifice (Lev 7:13), or testimony (Ps 66:16), or prayer (Col 1:3); but it finds its most natural and its fullest utterance in musical and musical forms. When God fills the heart with praise He puts a new song into the mouth (Ps 40:3). The Book of Ps is the proof of this for the OT. And when we pass to the NT we find that, alike for angels and men, for the church on earth and the church in heaven, the higher moods of praise express themselves in bursts of song (Lk 2:14; Eph 5:19; Col 3:16; Rev 5:9; 11:3; 15:3). Finally, both in the OT and NT, the spirit of song gives birth to ordered modes of public praise. In their earlier expressions the praises of Israel were joyful outbursts in which song was mingled with shouting and dancing to a simple accompaniment of timbrels and trumpets (Ex 15:20; 2 Sam 6:5.14 ff). In later times Israel had its sacred Psalter, its guilds of trained singers (Ezr 3:11; Neh 7:44), its skilled musicians (Ps 81:1-9, etc) that waited for God in Zion and were full of the solemn beauty of holiness (Ps 29:2; 96:9). In the NT the Psalter is still a manual of social praise.

compelled them to get as far as the citadel [Antonia]; but his attempt failed" (II, xv, 5). The word ταξινόμησις (taxinomhēsis) is used here, rather as if "court" in Mk 15:16, "the soldiers led him away within the court [aulē], which is the Pretorium. There is no need to suppose that Herod Antipas was in the same palace (Lk 23:4 ff); it is more probable he went to the palace of the Hasmonaeans which lay lower down on the eastern slope of this southwest hill, whereat a later tradition expressly states that Herod Agrippa II and his sister Bernice were living (Wars, II, xi, vii, 3).

The palace of Herod occupied the highest part of the southwest hill near the northwest angle of the ancient city, now traditionally called Zion, and the actual site of the Pretorium cannot have been far removed from the Turkish barracks near the so-called ‘Tower of David.’ It is interesting to note that the two stations of the Turkish garrison of Jesus today occupy the same spots as did the Roman garrison of Christ’s time. It is needless to point out how greatly this view of the situation of the Pretorium must modify the traditional claims of the ‘Via Dolorosa,’ the whole course of which depends on the theory that the ‘Way of Sorrow’ bore down on the Aemilian and the Antonine ramparts of late ecclesiastical tradition. See also GABBATHA.

With regard to the expression ἐν ἴδιῳ τῷ πρατήριῳ, ἐν κόλλῳ τῷ πρατηρίῳ, in Phil 1:13, there is now a general consensus of view that: ‘Prætoriu[m]’ here means, not a place, but the imperial prætoria guard, ten thousand in number, which was instituted by Augustus. St. Paul was allowed to reside in his private house in the custody of a prætorian guard, but these were doubtless constantly changed. It must have become ‘manifest’ to the whole guard that his bonds were for the sake of Christ. See also preceding article.

PRAISE, πράζ (πραζ), ἀθανάτι, "psalm," "praise," τίττα, ταδήα, "confession," "thanksgiving," πρατηρίων, σιάβαθα, "to praise," "glorify," τοῦτος, ἀνάμειν, ἀθανάτι, "to stretch out the hand," "confess;" αἰσχρό, αἰσχρόν, ἐπάνοια, ἐπάνοιαν, ἐπάνοιαν, ἐπάνοιαν: The word comes from the Lat preter, "price," "value," and may be defined generally as an expression of ascertainment or worth. Praise may be bestowed upon unworthy objects or from improper motives, but true praise is a judgment of a real conviction of worth. Its type may be seen in the representation given in the Apocalypse of the adoration of God and of the Lamb, which is inspired by a sense of their worthiness to be adored (Rev 4:11; 5:12).

Man may be the object of praise, and may receive it either from God or from his fellow-men. In the former case (Rom 2:29; 1 Cor 4:5) the praise is inevitably just, as resting on the Divine estimate of worth; in the latter case its value depends upon the grounds and motives that lie behind it. There is a praise which is itself a condemnation (Lk 6:20), an honor which seals the eyes in unbelief (Jn 5:44), a careless use of the epithet "good" which is dishonoring to God (Lk 18:19). This is the "praise of men" which Jesus warned His followers to shun as being incompatible with the "praise of God" (Mt 6:1-4; cf Jn 12:43; Gal 1:10; 1 Thess 2:6). On the other hand, that which is the distinctive homage of the soul to righteousness (Lk 23:47), the acknowledgment given to well-doing by just government (Rom 13:3; 1 Pet 2:14), the tribute of the churches to distinguished Christians (2 Cor 8:18). Such praise, so far as being incompatible with the praise of God, is a reflection
"hymn" which Jesus sang with His disciples after the Last Supper (Mt 26:30) would be a Hebrew psalm, probably from the Hallel (Pss 113-118) which was used at the Passover service, and various references in the Epistles point to the continued employment of psalms in Christian worship (1 Cor 14:26; Eph 5:19; Col 3:16; Jas 5:13).

But the Psalter of the Jewish church could not suffice to express the distinctive moods of Christian feeling. Original utterance of the spirit of Christian song was one of the manifestations of the gift of prophecy (1 Cor 14:15-17). Paul distinguishes hymns and spiritual songs from psalms (Eph 5:19; Col 3:16); and it was hymns that he and Silas sang at midnight in the prison of Philippi (Acts 16:25 RV). But from hymns and songs that were the spontaneous utterance of individual feeling, the development was natural, in NT as in OT times, to hymns that were sung in unison by a whole congregation; and in rhythmic passages like 1 Tim 3:16; Rev 15:3 f, we seem to have fragments of a primitive Christian hymnology, such as Pliny bears witness to for the early years of the 2d cent., when he informed the Emperor Trajan at the time of the Bithynian emperor's visit that their morning meetings sang a hymn in alternate strains to Christ as God (Ep. x.97). See PENNAVISION.

(3) The duty of praise.—Praise is everywhere represented in the Bible as a duty no less than a natural impulse and a delight. The hour in this duty is to withhold from God a glory that belongs to Him (Ps 50:23; Rom 1:20 f); it is to shut one's eyes to the signs of His presence (Isa 40:26 f), to be forgetful of His mercies (Dt. 6:12), and unthankful for His kindness (Lk 6:35). If we are not to fall into these sins, but are to give to God the honor and glory and gratitude we owe Him, we must earnestly cultivate the spirit and habit of praise. From holy men of old we learn that this may be done by arousing the soul from its listlessness and sluggishness (Ps 57:8; 103:1), by fixing the heart upon God (Ps 117:1), by meditation on His works and ways (77:11 f), by recounting His benefits (103:2), above all, for those to whom He has spoken in His Word (Ps 89:1). So Paul, writing to the Corinthians of the church of Corinth, calls him a gift (2 Cor 9:15; cf Rom 8:31 f; 1 Jn 3:1) See also WORSHIP.

PRAYER. prárr (πραρ, dévésis, προσέχι, προσεύχη, ἵπτεσις, ἐπηδεσία; for an excellent discussion of the meaning of these see Thayer's Lexicon, p. 126, s.v. prárr); the chief vbrs. are προσέχω, προσέχομαι, προσεμάθω, προσεκολάθω, and θεμαται, esp. in Lk and Acts, atidé, atidi, "to ask a favor," distinguished from ἄποθεσις, ἐπηδεσία; "to ask a question," is found occasionally). In the Bible "prayer" is used in a simpler and a more complex, a narrower and a wider signification. In the former case it is supplication for benefits either for one's self (petition), or for others (intercession). In the latter it is an act of worship which covers all the attitudes of the soul in its approach to God. Supplication is at the heart of it, for prayer always springs out of a sense of need and a belief that God is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him (Heb 11:6). But adoration and confession and thanksgiving also find a place, so that the suppliant becomes a worshipper. It is unnecessary to distinguish all the various terms for prayer that are employed in the OT and the NT. But the facts should be noticed that the Heb and Or alike are there on the one hand words for prayer that denote a direct petition or short, sharp cry of the heart in its distress (Ps 30:2; 2 Cor 12:8), and on the other "prayers" like that of Hannah (1 S 2:1-10), which is in reality a song of thanksgiving, or that of Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus, in which intercession is mingled with doxology (Eph 3:14-21).

The history of prayer as it meets us here reflects various stages of its development and experience. The first in the "patriarchal period, when 'men began 1. In the to call upon the name of the Lord' OT (Gen 4:6; cf 12:2; 21:33), prayer is naíve, familiar and direct (15:2 f; 17:18; 18:23 f; 24:15). It is evidently associated with the old sacrifice and the designation of desired benefits becomes the condition of promised service and fidelity (28:20 f). In the pre-Pauline history of Israel prayer still retains many of the primitive features of the patriarchal type (Ex 3:4; Nu 11:15-16; Jgs 6:13 f; 11:30 f; 1 S 11:1; 2 S 15:8; Ps 66:18 f). The Law has remarkably little to say on the subject, differing here from the later Judaism (see Schroer, HJP, II, i, 290, index-vol. p. 98; and of Mt 6:5 f; 23:14; Acts 3:1; 16:18); while it confirms the association of prayer with sacrifices, which now appear, however, not as gifts in anticipation of benefit to follow, but as expiations of guilt (De 21:1-9) or thank offerings for past mercies (26:1-11). Moreover, the free, frank access of the private individual to God is more and more giving place to the mediation of the priest (21:5 f; 33:3), the intercessor (Ex 32:11-13; 1 S 7:5-13; 12:23), the ordered approach of tabernacle and temple services (Ex 40:1 K 8). The prophet, it is true, approaches God immediately and freely—Moses (Ex 34:34; Dt 34:10) and David (2 S 7:27); so, also, has numbered among the prophets—but he does so in virtue of his office, and on the ground esp. of his possession of the Spirit and his intercessory function (cf Ezek 2:2; Jer 14:15).

A new epoch in the history of prayer in Israel was brought about by the experiences of the Exile. Chastisement drove the nation to seek God more earnestly than before, and as the way of approach through the external forms of the temple and its sacrifices was now closed, the spiritual path of prayer was a frequent substitute. Two devotional habits of Ezra (Ezr 7:27; 8:23), Nehemiah (Neh 2:4; 4:9, etc) and Daniel (Dan 6:10) prove how large a place prayer came to hold in the individual life; while the utterances recorded in Ezra 9-10 and Neh 1:5-11, and Daniel 6:10 ff., show the prominence now given to confession of sin. In any survey of the OT teaching the Psalms occupy a place by themselves, both on account of the long period they cover in the history and because we are ignorant in most cases as to the particular circumstances of their origin. But speaking generally it may be said that here we see the loveliest flights attained by the spirit of prayer under the old dispensation—the intensest craving for pardon, purity and other spiritual blessings (61, 130), the most heartfelt longing for a living communion with God Himself (42:2; 63:1; 64:2).

Here it will be convenient to deal separately with the material furnished by the Gospel narrative of the life and teaching of Christ and that found in the remaining books.

2. In the NT the distinctively Christian character of prayer comes to us from the Gospels. We have to notice His own habits in the matter (Lk 3:21; 6:12; 9:16-29; 22:32-39; 46; 23:34-46; Mt 27:46; Jn 17), which for all who accept Him as the revealer of the Father and the final authority in religion immediately disti-
Prate all theoretical objections to the value and efficacy of prayer. Next we have His general teaching on the subject in parables (Lk 11 5-9; 18 1-14) and incidentals sayings (Mt 6 44; 6 5-8; 7 7-11; 9 38; 17 21; 18 19; 21 22; 24 20; 26 41 and §§), which presents prayer, not as more energizing of the religious soul that is followed by beneficial spiritual reactions, but as the request of a child to a father (6 8; 7 11), subject, indeed, to the father's decisions (Mt 10 16; ef 6 10; 26 39-43; 1 Jn 5 14), but secure always of loving attention and response (Mt 7 7-11; 21 22). In thus teaching us to approach God as our Father, Jesus raised prayer to its highest plane, making it not less reverent than it was at its best in OT times, while far more intimate and trustful. In the Lord's Prayer (q.v.) He summed up His ordinary teaching on the subject in a concrete example which serves as a model and brevity of prayer (Mt 6 9-13; Lk 11 2-4). But according to the Fourth Gospel, this was not His final word upon the subject. On the night of the betrayal, and in full view of His death and resurrection and ascension to God's right hand, He told His disciples that prayer was henceforth to be addressed to the Father in the name of the Son, and that prayer thus offered was sure to be granted (Jn 16 23.24,26). The differentia of Christian prayer is primarily in its being offered in the name of Christ: while the secret of its success lies on the one hand in the new access to the Father which Christ has secured for His people (17 19; cf He 4 14-16; 10 19-22), and on the other in the fact that prayer offered in the name of Christ will be prayer in harmony with the Father's will (15 7; cf 1 Jn 3 22 f; 5 13 f).

In the Acts and Epp. we see the apostolic church giving effect to Christ's teaching on prayer. It was in a praying atmosphere that the church was born (Acts 1 14; cf 2 1); and throughout its early history prayer continued to be its vital breath and native air (2 42; 3 1; 6 46 and passim). The Epp. abound in references to prayer. Those of Paul in particular contain frequent allusions to his own personal practice in the matter (Rom 1 10; Eph 1 16; Phil 1 9; 1 Thess 1 2, etc), and many exhortations to his readers to cultivate the praying habit (Rom 12 12; Eph 6 18; Phil 4 6; 1 Thess 5 17, etc). But the new and characteristic thing about Christian prayer as it meets us now is its connection with the Spirit. It has become a spiritual act (1 Cor 14 14-16); and even those who have none of this gift in the exceptional charismatic sense may "pray in the Spirit" whenever they come to the throne of grace (Eph 6 18; Jude ver 20). The gift of the Spirit, promised by Christ (Jn 14 16 f, etc), has raised prayer to its highest power by securing for it a Divine cooperation (Rom 8 15,26; Gal 4 6). Thus Christian prayer in its full NT meaning is prayer addressed to God as Father, in the name of Christ as Mediator, and through the enabling grace of the indwelling Spirit. See Prayers of Jesus.

PRAYERS, prárz., OF JESUS:

1. The Lord's Prayer
2. Christ's Doctrine of Prayer
3. Prayers Offered by Christ
4. Prayers for the Resurrection
5. General Conclusions

In the history and doctrine of prayer, nothing is more important than the light shed upon the subject by the prayers of Jesus. These are to be studied in connection with His teaching concerning prayer found in the model of the Lord's Prayer, and general statements and hints to His disciples.

This model of prayer is given in two forms (Mt 6 9-13; Lk 11 2-4). The differences of form show that essence of similarity in words is not essential. The prayer includes adoration, supplication, for the Kingdom, for personal needs, for forgiveness, for deliverance from temptation and the ascension of glory. It is at once individual and universal; it sets the recognition of Divine things first, and yet clearly asserts the ethical and social relations of life. See Lord's Prayer, The.

That men should pray is taken for granted (Mt 6 5). Its sacredness is involved in the command (Jn 17 20 f, 21).

2. Christ's Prayer (Lk 11 5-9; 18 1-8): its necessary conditions of humility, absence of self-righteousness (Lk 18 9-14), of display and repetition (Mt 6 7); necessity of faith and a forgiving spirit (Mt 11 24-26); of agreement in social prayer (Mt 18 19); submission to the will of Christ, "in my name" (Jn 14 13).

In Mt 11 25-26 AV, Christ thanks God: "Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes.

3. Prayers Even so, Father: for so it seemed good Offered in thy sight." This language shows Christ the essence of prayer to be not the mere expression of need and request for what is required, but resort to God. The prayer gives us insight into the deeper experience of the Son with the Father, and His perfect submission to the Father's will, with thanksgiving even for what might seem inexplicable. It thus illustrates the truth that the highest form of prayer is found in the serenity of the soul.

Mt 14 23 narrates the retirement of the Lord to a "mountain apart to pray." No word of what the prayer was is given, but the record is suggestive. Following a day of severe toil and probably excitement, Jesus betakes Himself to prayer. The reality, the true humanity of the Christ, are here revealed.

The former prayer may almost be regarded as that of the Son of God addressed to the Father in the sublime communion of the Godhead. This passage emphatically is a prayer-scene of the Son of Man. The association of this incident of prayer in Christ's life with the miracle of walking on the sea (an example of miracle in the person of the Lord Himself, and not performed on another) opens up an interesting question of the relation of the supernatural and the natural. Here perhaps lies an explanation of the true significance of the miraculous. The communion of the Lord with a supreme Father had filled the personal nature of Jesus with spiritual forces which extended the power of the spirit over the material world beyond the limits by which man is bound in his normal and sinful condition (see Lange, Comm, on Mt; Mt 15 36; cf 14 19).

Christ's recognition of God as the Father of all, thanks at the meal, or "asking blessing," should be noted as an example which in modern times is largely ignored or followed as a mere formality. But it is significant; it expresses that intense and all-compelling sense of the Divine which even dwelt in Him; of which prayer is an expression, and which is more especially true in the case of Our Lord and His Father, the Father rules in a sovereignty at a sublime depth. In Mt 17 21, Our Lord's reference to prayer as a necessary condition of miraculous power, in the light of Mk 7 34, where "looking up to heaven, he sighed, and saith unto him [the deaf man], Ephphatha," may imply His own prayer in connection with the exercise of miraculous energy. This is apparently indicated in Jn 11 41-42, although, as above, it is the expression of the intimate relation between Christ and the Father, which is the essence of prayer, and in which relation He ever exercised the fullest power of God Himself. Mt 19 13 records that little children were brought to Him that He should put His hands on them and pray. That He prayed is not related, but ver 15 relates that He laid His hands on them and, presumably, with the imposition, prayed. The scene is most suggestive, in the light of Our Lord's words. In ver 14 and in Mt 28 26 Our Lord blesses the bread or gives thanks at the institution of the Supper, and has the model of consecration universally adopted, even giving the term Eucharist ("giving of thanks") to the service.

(1) The high-priestly prayer.—This prayer (Jn 17) is the special prayer of the Lord, and may be regarded as the example established by the evangelists of Our Lord's method of prayer. The thanksgiving in Mt 11 23 is the only other instance of any extent in the report of the prayers of Jesus, but even that is brief compared to what is here. The fulness of the prayer clearly shows that it was uttered in the hearing of the disciples. Their relation to it is remarkable. Auditors, they yet could not share in it. At the same time, it was a profound revelation to them both of the relation of the Master to God, and the character of the work which He had come to perform, and the part which they were to take in it. John gives us no hint as to the place in which it was spoken; 14 31 indicates a departure from the upper room. But apparently the prayer was offered where the discourses of chs 15 and 16 were delivered. It has been suggested by Westcott that some spot in the temple courts was the scene of chs 15, 16 and 17. It has been generally supposed that the ornament of the Golden Threshold might suggest the figure of the Vine and Branches which Our Lord employs. Jn 18 1 shows that the prayer was offered before the Lord and His disciples had passed over the brook Kidron. The determination of the exact spot is certainly impossible, except the probability that the words were spoken in the vicinity of the temple.

The first part of the prayer (Jn 17 1-5) is an expression of profound communion between the Son and the Father, that the Father would glorify the Son, but with the supreme end of the Father's own glory. The essentially unique character of Christ's relation to God is the calm assertion of ver 4. Its consciousness of completeness in the work which He had received from God is impossible to the human. It is the complete acceptance the Father's own nature, the supreme nature of the Son of God. In the second part of the prayer (Jn 17 6-19), Our Lord prays for His disciples, to whom He has revealed Himself and His relation to God (vs 7-8). He prays that they may be kept from the evil that is in the world, which is alien from them as it is from Him. In the third portion of the prayer Christ's relation to His ultimate followers is referred to. Their unity is something natural, but the deep, spiritual unity found by the indwelling of Christ in them and God in Christ. The prayer closes by the declaration that Christ is the Father's equal to God, and the end and crown of all is to be the indwelling of God's love in man by the dwelling of Christ in man.

This prayer is unique, not merely among the prayers of Our Lord, but also among the prayers of humanity. While it is distinctly a petition, it is at the same time a communion. In one or two places Our Lord places Our Lord's prayer before the Father upon a level with God. The fact of this prayer of triumph in which every petition is virtually a declaration of the absolute certainty of its realization, immediately preceding the prayer of Gethsemane, is both difficult and suggestive. This anomaly is a powerful argument for the historical reality. The explanation of these contrasted moods is to be found in the depth of Our Lord's nature, and esp. in the complete consistency of His dual nature with the spheres to which each nature belongs. He is most Divine; He is most human. In the fulness of the reach of the prayer and its calm confidence, the believer may find a ceaseless and inexhaustible source of comfort and encouragement. Attention might be called to the remarkable forecast of the history and experience of the church which the prayer furnishes.
