(2) The prayer in Gethsemane.—This is recorded by the three Synoptics (Mt 26 36-44; Mk 14 22-41; Lk 22 39-46), and is probably referred to in Jn 17 11. Our Lord's most clearly recognition of God's infinite power, a clear object sought by the prayer, and perfect submission to God's will. All the elements of prayer, as it can be offered by men, are here except the prayer for forgiveness. It is to be noted that the prayer was three times repeated. This is not to be regarded as inconsistent with Our Lord's prohibition of repetition. It was vain repetition which was forbidden. The intensity of the prayer is expressed by the threefold utterance, "Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass from me." (Paul's prayer in regard to the thorn in 2 Cor 12 8).

(3) The prayers on the cross.—In Mt 27 46; Mk 15 34, Christ uses the prayer of Ps 22 1. In the moment of complete desolation, the Sufferer claims His unbroken relationship with God. This is the victory of the atoning sacrifice. Lk 23 34 records the prayer of intercession for those who crucified Him; in ver 46 is the calm committal of His spirit to the Father. Prayer here again assumes its highest form in the expression of all that is left of man. Thus the three prayers on the cross not only reveal the intimate relation of Our Lord to the Father, but they also illustrate prayer such as man may offer. They represent supplication, intercession, communion. Each is thus expressive of man's needs to others, to ourselves; our trust, our love, our need. In all things He was made like unto His brethren, except without sin (see Points). His prayers on the cross illustrate His high-priestly office. It rises to that intense crisis to its supreme manifestation and activity.

(4) Prayer after the resurrection.—It is to be observed that after His resurrection there is no record of any prayer offered by Christ. In the supper at Emmaus He "blessed" the bread (Lk 24 35); and the ascension took place in the midst of blessing (Lk 24 51), suggestive of the course of the church as ever beneath the benediction of the Lord, to be ended only at the final consummation. The act of eating the fish and honeycomb (Lk 24 40) seems to have been unaccompanied by any act of specifically religious form. Mk, with characteristic regard to details, records Christ's "looking up to heaven" (Mk 6 41; 7 34); Jn 11 41 refers to a similar act, and holds the Lowest of the services that God had heard Him (see also Jn 13 3), but it is not in usual association with Christ's prayers; it is appropriate and suggestive. Lk narrates that Christ prayed at His baptism (Lk 3 21); that He spent a night in prayer before choosing the Twelve (Lk 6 12-15); that the transfiguration was preceded by of the church in whose name he has been set apart to proclaim the gospel. Both the personal and representative or official are united in him and his preaching.

His work is always to be related to the OT and NT. His sermon is under the creed of his church as the creed is under the word. The preacher is a man with a message, and the preacher who has no message of the particular kind indicated above is in no true sense a preacher. It has been well expressed in one of the valuable Yale series of lectures on the subject, "Every living preacher must receive his divine communication and the constant purpose of his life must be to receive it uncorrupted and to deliver it without addition or subtraction." When he presents the message of his Divinely appointed ambassadorship in its integrity, he speaks with that peculiar kind of "authority" which has been pronounced "the first and indispensable requisite" in giving a message from God. He manifests thereby a "high celestial dogmatism," and "human weakness becomes immortal strength." The true preacher proclaims a Divine impulse. He says with Paul, "Necessity is laid upon me; for wo is unto me, if I preach not the gospel!" (1 Cor 9:16; cf. Jer 20:9). He says with Peter, "Whether it is right in the sight of God to hearken unto you rather than to God? yea: for we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard!" (Acts 4:19-20). The message of the preacher is greater than the man, because it is from God. It largely makes the man who preaches it in his fullness, and the message of the preacher is a message not of his own gifts or whatever the alleged gift conferred in the laying on of hands, without the sense of the message he is not chosen of God to proclaim His word. Destitute of that, he does not have the sustaining impulse of his vocation to enlist his entire personality in his work and give him mastery over the minds and hearts of men.

No agency of religion is older than preaching. It is as old as the Bible itself (2 Pet 2:5). It is a necessary adjunct of a religion that is communicated to man by means of an objective and authoritative revelation, such as we have in the sacred Agency Scriptures. It is an entirely natural agency, the form and manner in which is found in the OT and NT. It is strictly in harmony with those ideas that obtain in both testaments regarding the method of propagating the faith, set forth through the agency of holy men who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. That faith is disseminated by means of teaching through argument, explanation, motive and exhortation. The agency for the spread of a religion of persuasion must be preaching.

In the Bible, usage of the terms which have reference to the subject, preaching means the proclamation of religious truth. It is that continuous and public testimony which the church is always giving, through their mean discourses, by men set apart for such work, to her own living faith as that faith is rooted in and sustained by the written word of God. In this sense "to call," "proclaim," "cry aloud" are used frequently of the prophet's message under the various aspects of its denunciation, as in Jon 1:2, of the role of the Divine, as in Jer 11:6, and of Messianic promise, as in Isa 61:1. The term for "preaching" is also used to designate a political propaganda set forth by the prophet (Neh 6:7). In two passages (Ps 68:11, "publish, O mouth of God", Isa 61:1) the word means "to declare good news." In the case of Jonah's preaching at Nineveh, the word used to prayer (Lk 9:29); and records the prayer in the garden (Lk 22:41-45). The third evangelist thus in addition to the notes of Our Lord's prayers in retirement, which the other evangelists record, adds these instances of the special relation of prayer to events of critical importance.

(5) General conclusions.—The following conclusions as to prayer may be drawn from the records of Christ's prayer: (1) Prayer is the highest exercise of man's spiritual nature. (2) It is natural to the soul even in perfect accord with God. (3) It is not only the expression of need, the supply of which is sought of God, but by the example of Christ it is the highest expression of trust, submission and union with God. (4) It is to be used both in solitude and in society; it is personal and intercessory. (5) It may be accompanied by the plea of Christ's name, and for Christ's sake. These are the laws which should direct it; that is to say, it should be based upon the merits of Christ the intercession of Christ, and should be addressed to God under the limitations of the Kingdom of the Lord and His purposes for good, both for the interest of the supplicant and others, under the conditions of the interest of the whole Kingdom.

In the NT sense a preacher is a man who has the inner call from the Holy Ghost and the external call from the church, the witnessing body of Christ on earth, as it has been duly set apart as an accredited and qualified teacher of the Christian religion. His vocation is that of addressing the popular mind and heart on religious truth, as that truth is set forth in the sacred Scripture, for the spiritual profit of the hearer as its end. The preacher, recognized as such by the church, speaks as a personal witness of God's saving truth, explaining it and applying it as the circumstances of the people and the time may require. The gravity and importance of this vocation, as set forth in the sacred Scriptures and amply illustrated in the history of the church, surpass those of any other calling among men. Luther said, "The devil does not mind the written word, but he is put to flight whenever it is preached about." The preacher, in the sense indicated above, is with all other Christians a sharer in the freedom that is in Christ. But as a recognized teacher and leader of the church, he is not an unshackled and entirely unbridled teacher. He is not to speak as his own, but as the mouthpiece of the church whose apprehension of the gospel he has voluntarily confessed. The faith of the church is, by his own assent, his faith, and her doctrine is his doctrine, provided he is not expected to give his own, as distinct from or opposed to the faith of designate what it was means strictly "proclamation" and corresponds to the NT word used to define Our Lord's "proclamation" as a herald of the Kingdom (Mt 3 17), in which its initial stages particularly was closely associated with the preaching of John the Baptist (Mt 3 1 2).

Thus while preaching belongs esp. to Christianity, it has well-defined antecedents in the OT. Under both the OT and the new dispensation the subject takes the church for granted and utters the truth in the name of a solitary believer, but of a Divinely founded society, whether it be of Jews or Christians.

6. The Jehovah Prophets

The OT books in the canon have them the beginnings and some of the features of the preacher's office and of the high function preaching. In these we find a special class of men set apart and separated unto that particular work, as we find in the Christian church, from its beginnings, the same Divinely instituted office. The Heb prophet had a message direct from God, which frequently came with supernatural knowledge in the power of prediction. The mission of the prophet, however, was not simply or chiefly to forecast the future, but to declare a present message from the Lord to the people. The prophet of the OT was the forerunner in office and the prototype of the messenger of Christ. The development of the synagogue as the center of Heb worship, as well as as interpretation of the Law became essential.

Moses, the most commanding figure in Heb history, was the great prophet. Many messages in the OT are mingled with power, sublimity and pathos than those usual elsewhere. He was the great law-giver, Israel, not so much by his rod as by the word he delivered to the people. There are numerous indications that after Moses there was a continuous class of religious teachers whose work was to instruct men and inspire the people, as is indicated in the case of Joshua, in the history of Deborah and Barak, and in the days of solemn assembly which are inconceivable without men who spoke and others who listened. At the time of Semeuel there was a distinct advance made in the work of the prophetic office. The Heb church became a real institution. There were schools of the prophets at Bethel, Jericho and Gilgal, the very seats of heathen idolatry. Under their dispensation the whole course of progress was toward presenting Divine truth in its simplicity and power, by bringing it to bear upon the popular mind and heart. One of the marks of the new era beginning with John the Baptist was a revival of prophetic preaching (Mt 11 9), which again resumed its old character and meaning. See PROPHECY AND PROPHETS.

The words meaning "to proclaim as a herald" and "preaching," are frequent in the NT. The mission of Our Lord was essentially 7. Christ as one of proclaiming good tidings or a preacher cerning the Kingdom of God (Mt 4 17). He at once, on His entrance upon His mission, gave to preaching a spiritual depth and practical range which it never had before. At that time preaching had manifestly become a fixed part of the synagogue worship, and was made one of the chief instruments in the spread of the gospel. Our Lord constantly taught in the synagogue (Mt 4 23; Mk 1 21; Jn 6 59). He thus read and interpreted and applied the Law and the Prophets (Mk 1 39; Lk 4 16). Christ's testimony about Himself was that He came "to bear witness to the truth." The spoken word became His great power in His life and ministry. Throughout His life Jesus was above all things a preacher of the truths of His kingdom. Telling men what He was in Himself, what in His relation to man and His salvation and what to God the Father, formed a large part of His public work.

The preaching of the apostles was essentially prophetic in character, and bore testimony concerning the resurrection of Jesus and His early return to judgment (Acts 2 Apo'shes 21 52 36; 1 Cor 15 15). The sermons of the apostles which are reported with their names are those of Peter on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2), his address in the house of Cornelius at Caesarea (Acts 10), and the counsels of James to the brethren at Jesu, as to what ordinances should be imposed on gentile Christians. In the early church preachers were first of all witnesses to Jesus and His deeds and words, and to the significance to be attached to the great facts of the redemptive history. With the spread of the gospel and the passing of time, this office was taken up by others, esp. as such as endowed with "the word of wisdom" and "of knowledge" (1 Cor 12 8).

Upon the basis of what is taught in the word of God there are two fundamentally important postulates concerning preaching and the 9. Funda- mental Postulates of preaching is that it be the word of God (2 Tim 4 2). Out of the Bible must the life of every generation of Christians be fed. To Holy Scripture, therefore, ought the pulpit text in its integrity. In the exercise of his preaching duties, the preacher fulfills his double office of edifying believers and subjugating the world to Christ. There must always be an organic connection between the word in the text and the sermon.

(2) "He is an ambassador."—The work of preaching is the fulfillment of a Divinely instituted ambassadorship (2 Cor 5 20). The gospel is put into the hands of men for a distinct purpose, and is to be administered in accordance with the plan of its author. The preacher is in a very distinct sense a trusted ambassador. But even as we have been approved of God to be intrusted with the gospel, so we speak; not as pleasing men, but God who proveth our hearts" (1 Thess 2 4). Those who have accepted the responsibility imposed upon them by this Divine commission are enjoined to exercise their office so as to warrant the appointment. He who has appointed them to a special work. The homiletic practice of taking the theme of every sermon from a passage of Holy Writ has been an almost invariable rule in the history of the church. It is the business of the preacher to present the truth embodied in the text in its integrity. In the exercise of his appointed ambassadorship he is to administer God's word revealed to Christian faith, not human opinions or speculations.

The literal and the moral sense are both included in the expression, "knowing that ye were redeemed, not with corruptible things, . . . but with precious blood" (1 Pet 1

Literature

Predestination can be, and has sometimes been, regarded as a philosophical question rather than a Biblical one. It is with predestination as a Biblical question, however, that we are here mainly concerned.

1. As a Biblical Question

It is possible to urge, and it has been urged, that the philosophical question —whether all that occurs is decided before it ever happens—is not discussed and decided by Scripture. Theology, starting from God in its interpretation of all things, has arrived at universal foreordination by a species of deductive reasoning. But we must not argue the matter from any abstract principles, but deal with the actual facts as set forth in Scripture and as found, inductively, in the experience of man.

It must first be asserted, however, in view of much loose medieval thinking, that predestination is a category of religious thought of fundamental importance. No category of religious thought could go deeper, for it reaches down to the Infinite Will in relation to the universe of finite wills, and lays stress on will as the core of reality. The philosophy of our time may be said to have received, from the time of Schopenhauer, an impact toward will-emphasis, alike in respect of will as of knowledge. But the relation of the Absolute Will to the universe, and to mankind, is precisely that with which we are concerned in predestination.

Predestination is that aspect of foreordination whereby the salvation of the believer is taken to be effected in accordance with the will of God, who has called and elected him, in Christ, unto life eternal. The doctrine Divine plan of salvation must certainly be conceived under this aspect of individual reference. To understand and set forth the nature, and ethically justifiable character, of such a foreordination to life eternal, is our purpose. For the doctrine has need to be purified of the historic inconsistencies, and fatal illogicalities, with which, in its older form, it presented itself, it was often infected. This, esp., in order that the doctrine may appear as grounded in reason and righteousness, not in absoluteness and almighty caprice.

To begin with, it must be said that there seems to be no evading the doctrine by election by grace, as found both in the letter and the spirit of Scripture. The idea of the Doctrine in predestination is set forth, with great power and clearness, in Rom 8:29-30, and with the elements of parts articulated in natural and striking form. The idea recurs in Eph 1:5, where it is finely said (vs 4.5) that God hath chosen us in Christ "before the foundation of the world," having predestinated or foreordained us unto adoption as sons according to the predestination of God, and where it is said, further, that our salvation imports "the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure" (ver 9), which He purposed in Christ. This "eternal purpose to save men through Christ" is in reference to in Eph 3:11. This helpful mode of viewing predestination is in Christ, and never outside Him, had a place in religious thought at the Reformation time, as the famous "Formula of Concord," to be referred to below, shows. The predestined certainty of God's gracious work in Christ was not meant to overbear men, but to encourage and reassure all who trust in His grace. In Rom 9:14-25, the absolute sovereignty of God is put in a form whereby election is made to originate in the Divine will apart from all human merit, whether actual or foreseen. But from this assertion of God's free supremacy we can derive no concrete theodicy, or do more than infer that God is just and wise in His exercise of free grace, even when His doings are most perplexing to us.

The needful thing is to understand, so far as may be, the nature of the cooperation which takes place between the Divine and the human —whether factors or elements, which latter fac-

The theology of the Reformed church adopted the Calvinistic doctrine of the decree of predestination and election. Calvin, however,

7. Predestinanation in the Reformed Theology

Zwingli, it must be remembered, was, even before Calvin, of consistent deterministic leanings, as part of his large speculative views, which were not without a tendency to universalism. Salvation was, to Calvin, the execution of a Divine decree, which was supposed to fix the extent and conditions of such salvation.

(1) Calvin’s definition.—Reprobation was, for Calvin, involved in election, and Divine foreknowledge and predestination are taken to be identical. Calvin’s mode of defining predestination was as the eternal decree of God, by which He has decided with Himself what is to become and every individual. For all, he maintains, are not created in the same condition; but eternal life is fore-ordained for some, eternal condemnation for others. Calvin confesses that this is “a horrible decree,” and it is not surprising to find competent theologians in our time denying such a form of predestination any place in the teachings of St. Paul, who never speaks of reprobation.

(2) Theology advanced by Calvin.—It is generally overlooked, however, that the theological advance registered by Calvin is to be seen by study of the views of the Middle Ages, and on to the Reformation, not by viewing Calvinism in our post-Reformation lights. It was love—“the fatherly love of God,” as he terms it—the efficiency of saving love—which Calvin insisted upon, above all, in his teachings about God. But Calvin also heightened men’s ideas as to the certitude of personal salvation. It is but fair to Calvin to remember—for superficial acquaintance with his teachings is far from rare—that he, in the strongest manner, maintained Divine sovereignty and its absolute, righteous, holy, and love, and expressly rejected the notion of absolute power as, in this connection, a heathenish idea. The Calvinistic doctrine was not absolute, but mediated in Christ, and conditioned upon faith.

Luther and the Lutheran church at first shared the doctrine of predestination and election. Luther in his treatment of free will reproducing the Augustinian form of the doctrine in a strict sense of it predestination of Luther and Melanchron proceeded, not from their conception of God, but rather from the doctrine of sin and grace. Melancho lin was less disposed than Luther to press the doctrine of absolute predestination, and, in his “synergistic” tendencies, laid increasing stress on human freedom, until he at length rejected the doctrine of absolute predestination. He was blamed by strict Lutheranism for yielding too much to Pelagianism, but the Lutheran “Formula of Concord,” in 1577, was not a very logical and consistent presentation of the case, for, opposed at points to Augustinianism, it fell back, in the end, on election in the Augustinian spirit. Or, to put the matter in another form, the “Formula of Concord” may have differed by maintaining a universal call along with a particular election, and it rejected the decree of reprobation. Later Lutheranism adopted a moderate form of the doctrine, which became, in its metaphysical principle, the fundamental position of the whole Reformed theology after the Reformation.

    lin was less disposed than Luther to press the doctrine of absolute predestination, and, in his “synergistic” tendencies, laid increasing stress on human freedom, until he at length rejected the doctrine of absolute predestination. He was blamed by strict Lutheranism for yielding too much to Pelagianism, but the Lutheran “Formula of Concord,” in PREÉMINENCE, pré-ên's-ns: Superiority, esp. in noble or excellent qualities; the word stands for:

(1) ἐπιτροπή, “what is over and above,”
“excellence”; (2) ἐπιμέτρησις, “to make above”; “That in all things he [= Christ] might have the preéminence” (Col 1 18); (3) ἐπικαιρία, “to be first”; (4) ἐπικράσία, “that is, above,”
“to be first”; (5) ἐπικράσιος, “whosoever loved to have the preéminence,” lit. “who loved to be first” (of Diotrephes, 3 John v 19).

PREFER, pré-fūr': Does not always have the general meaning “to choose before another.” In Ps 137 6, it does have this sense and the two VS agree; in Ew text RV has “preferred” where AV has “preferred”; in Dtl 6 3, “distinguished” takes its place; in Jn 1 15, 30, “become,” “is substituted for “preferred”; in ver 27, “preferred” drops out entirely; in Rom 12 10, the VS agree.

PREPARATION, pré-ar-ā'shūn: The concordances indicate that the word “preparation” occurs only twice in the OT, once in 1 Ch 22 5, where it is used in the ordinary sense “to make preparation,” and once in Nah 2 3, “in the stand of his preparation,” both of them translating the same Heb root and requiring no special elucidation.
In Eph 6 15 the apostle speaks of the equipment of the Christian as including the “feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace,” which means, according to Thayer, “with the shoe made and alacrity which the gospel produces.”

The word occurs with technical significance ("the Preparation") in the gospel narratives of the cruci-fixon, translating the Gr παρασκευή, paraskewa (Mt 27 62; Mk 15 42; Lk 23 51; Jn 19 14, 31, 43, 45).
It is used as a technical term indicating the day of the preparation for the Sabbath, that is, the evening of Friday. This is its use in Jos, Ant, XVI, vi, 2, and presumably in the Synoptics. Later its use seems to have been extended to denote regularly the 6th day (Friday) of each week. So in Did., viii and the Martyrologium of Polycarp, vii.

The addition of the phrase τῶν παρασκευῶν, τοῦ πασχα,
“of the passover,” in Jn 19 14, and of the phrase “for the day of that sabbath was a high day,” in 19 31, seems to indicate that the author of the Fourth Gospel regarded the crucifixion taking place on the Sabbath in the year of the crucifixion.
This is clearly the natural interpretation of the words of John's Gospel, and if it were not for the seeming contradiction to the narrative of the Synoptics it would seem quite probable whether this other story would ever have been put upon them. This question is discussed in the articles on the date of the crucifixion and the Lord's Supper, and it will be necessary only to allude to it here.

It is possible that the phrase the "Preparation of the passover" in the day (Friday) of the Passover week (see Andrews, Life of Our Lord, 451 ff., and most recently Zahn, Das Evangelium des Johannes, 1909, 657 ff.). This method of harmorizing seems to the present writer to be forced, and therefore seems wise to give to the words of Jn 19 14 their natural interpretation, and to maintain that, according to the author of the Gospel, Jesus did not cease to be celebrated as the time of the crucifixion. There seems to be reason to believe that the ordinary view is that the Lord's Supper was in connection with the Passover, based upon the narrative in Mark (14 12 f.), does not have the unanimous sup-sport of the synoptic gospels.

both AV and RV. But the original Gr also appears in Lk 22 66, in RV tr:t4
"the assembly of the elders," in AV simply "the elders;" and in Acts 22 5, tr:t in EV "the estate of the elders;" in both of which occurrences the word might more accurately be translated "elders," just as it is in 1 Tim 4 14. Besides these three occurrences of the neuter sing. presbiterion, the masc. pl. presbiteroi, always tr:"elders," is often used to indicate the same organization or court as the former, being applied earlier in the Jewish Synagogue (Mt 27 11; 28 12; Lk 9 22; Acts 5 5), and later in the development of the church to its governing body, either in general (Acts 15 4-6,22), or locally (Acts 14 23; 16 4; 20 17; 1 Tim 5 17; Tit 1 5, etc.). It is sometimes used of the body, or succession, of religious teachers and leaders of the nation's past (Mt 15 2; He 11 2).
The word "presbyter" has been contracted by later ecclesiastical usage into the title "priest," although in the NT they are by no means identical, but on the contrary are always explicitly distinguished (Mk 14 43; Acts 23 14).

The local synagogue of the Jewish church was under the care and control of a body of representative men called "the elders" (Lk 7 3).

The local Jewish church was lines of the synagogue, took over the eldership into its own organization (Acts 11 30; 15 2; 1 Pet 5 1, etc.), so also in all the cities where the Christian the apostles made church organization necessary, the local synagogues readily suggested and supplied a feasible plan for such organization (Acts 14 23; Tit 1 5). The mother-church at Jerusalem, formed after the pattern of the synagogue, might well have offered to the churches formed elsewhere under apostolic preaching the only conceivable plan. We know from the NT passages how NT elders were selected; we must infer that they were elected by the membership of the churches, as under the synagouge plan; they were then installed into their office by apostles (Acts 14 23), or by apostolic helpers (Tit 1 5), or by "the presbytery" (1 Tim 4 14), or by both together (2 Tim 1 6; cf 1 Tim 4 14). So early as the Pauline letters the office of presbyter seems already to have borne the distinction of two functions: teaching and ruling (1 Tim 1 21; cf Acts 20 17 28; 1 Thess 5 12; 1 Pet 5 2).

In the NT history and epistle, it does not appear that the various churches of a district were already organized into an ecclesiastical body known as "the presbytery," having found in some basis of representation from the NT constituent churches. But the absence of such mention is far from being final proof that such district organizations did not exist; little dependence can be placed on mere negative argument. Moreover, the presence of apostles and elders in Jesus, to which Paul and Barnabas appealed (Acts 15), is positive evidence of the principle of representation and central authority. The various district organizations would quickly follow as a natural development and judicial needs were demanded; such development came early in the growth of the church, so early that it is unmistakably present in the post-apostolic age.

In Rev the 24 elders occupy a conspicuous place in the ideal church (Rev 4 10; 5 1 etc), sitting for those they represent, as an exalted presbytery, close to the throne of the Eternal One. "The four and twenty elders occupying thrones (not seats) around the throne are to be regarded as representatives of the glorified church; and the number, twice twelve, seems to be obtained by combining the number of the patriarchs of the ON with that of the apostles of the NT" (Milligan on Rev 4 4 in Expositor's Bible).

Presbytery is the court, or representative body, in the Presbyterian Church next above the Session of the local church. The Session is composed of the ruling elders of a church, with the minister as moderator or presiding officer. The Presbytery is composed of the ordained ministers, teaching elders, and one ruling elder from each church in a given district or community. To it now, as in NT times (1 Tim 4 14), is committed the power of ordination: as to diaconal and ruling elders, it has the supervision of the affairs which are general to the churches in their sphere of power; the power of retention in all matters concerning the local churches (see Form of Gov, Presby. Church in U.S.A. ch xi). The Presbytery elects the representatives composing the General Assembly, which is the highest court of the Presbyterian Church.

In ecclesiastical architecture the presbytery is that part of the church structure which is set apart for the clergy, usually the space between altar and choir, sometimes composed of the whole choir space, but ordinarily the word is more restricted in its meaning. See further, Bishop; Church; Elders; Governor.

PRESENCE, presence: In the OT nearly always the rendering of נין י, תיינו, תיינו (Gen 3 8; Ex 33 14 18; Ps 95 2; Isa 69 3, etc.) occasionally of פ, "ayin, 'eye" (Gen 23 11; De 25 9; Jer 11 1.11); and in 2 K 8 22; Prov 14 7, "the presence of" renders the prep. נ, נלנ, nbhcl, "before," cf also Aram. ל, קד, imd in Dn 2 27 AV (RV "before"). In "Gr," presence has an exact equivalent in πρώτη, πρώτος, but this word is rendered as administrative and judicial προς, προσ, προς. Elsewhere προστρατί is rendered "coming," but always with "presence" in the m. Otherwise in the NT "presence" represents no particular word but is introduced where it seems to suit the context (cf Acts 3 13 AV and 10 19). See Parousia.

PRESENT, present-ent. See Gift.

PRESENTLY, presently-ly: The strict meaning is of "those at the present moment," "at the present time," and the modern force "after a short interval" is due simply to the procrastinating habits of mankind; hence RV modifications of the AV use of the word into "immediately" (Mt 21 19), "even now" (Mt 26 53), and "forthwith" (Phil 2 23). In Prov 12 16, the uncertainty of the meaning (in "openly," Heb "in the day") has led to the retention of the AV word.

President, prez'int-ent. See prez/int-ent.

PRESS, press: As a vb. is used in RV as a tr of no less than 13 Gr and Heb words (rather more in AV). All the RV uses are modern. In AV may be noted Wsd 17 11, "pressed with conscience," RV "pressed by conscience"; Joh 19 41, "pressed on every side" (RV "surrounded by foes"); Acts 18 5, "pressed in the spirit" (RV "constrained by"). As a noun, AV uses "press" in Mk 2 4 for δ, κλος, κλος, "crowd" (so RV). For wine press see Vine; Wine.

PRESUME, presup'm, presumptuous, pr'zump'tus, presump'tus, PRESUMPTUOUS, pr'zump'tu'lous: To "presume" ("to take or go beforehand") is to speak or act without warrant or proudly. In the OT the words are for the most part the of ט, צדיק, and צדיק, "to boil up" (as water), and derivatives; hence to act proudly, to speak without authorization, etc (Dt 18 20 22, of the prophet; Ex 21 14; Dt 1 43; 17 12 13; Ps 19 3, "presumptuous sins" [צדיק, "prudent"]; cf Ps 86 14; 119 21, etc; Prov 21 24, etc). Other words are מיל, "to fill," to be full" (Est 7 5, "presume"); מיל, "to lift oneself," not noted elsewhere; נֵּּב, מנה, "with a high hand" (Nu 15 30, RV "with a high hand"); in 2 Pet 2 10 המטה, "bold," "daring," is tr "presumptuous," RV "daring;" in 2 Mace 3 24; 5 15 we have הערת, this is rendered "presumption" in 2 Mace 6 18, RV "daring deed."

PREVENT, pre'vent (ז, קד, קדם, prophec, φθάνει, φθάνω, φθάνει), "Prevent" occurs in AV in the literal but obsolete sense of "to come or go before." To anticipate, not in the sense of "to hinder." It is the tr of קדם, "to be sharp, "to be in front," "to be beforehand" (2 S 22 6, RV "came upon"); Job 3 12, RV "receive"; 30 27, "are come upon"; 41 11, "first given," Ps 58, "are come upon"; 21 3, ARV "meetest"; 59 10, ARV "meet"; 79 8, ARV "meet"; 88 13, "come before"; 119 147 148, ARV "anticipated"; Isa 21 14, "did meet"; Am 9 10, ARV "meet." In the NT prophec, with same meaning, is tr "prevent" (Mt 17 25, "Jesus prevented him," RV "spake first to him"); φθάνω (1 Thess 4 15, "shall not prevent," RV "shall in no wise precede"). "Prevent" in the above sense occurs in Wis 6 13, RV
"forestalleth" (plēthō) ἀναμφίσπευτος, ἀναρρήτως, ἀναλογία; 15 28, "we must prevent the sun to give thee thanks," RV "rise before."

PREY, πρᾶ (πρᾶ, βάρ, τερέψ, πάρεν, σάλλμπ): 'Priest' is frequent in the OT, chiefly as the τρ of baz, 'spoil' (Deu 14 33; Dt 3 9; Isa 10 6, etc); of terēψ, 'prey of wild beasts,' torn thing (Gen 49 9; Nu 33 24; Job 4 11, etc); of mālēkōr, 'a taking' (Nu 31 11, etc; Isa 49 24 25; of shālām spoil' or 'booty' (Jgs 5 50 8; Ex 13 14; Isa 10 2, etc). Maher-shalal-hash-baz (AV "The spoil speedeth, the prey hasteth") was the symbolical name given to a son of Isaiah (Isa 8 1 3). 'Prey' does not occur in the NT, but is found in the Apoc: 1 Esd 8 77, "for our sins...up...for a prey (pronome); Jth 9 4; 16 5; 1 Macc 7 47; Eccles 27 10 (thēra); Jth 5 24 (katēdroma).

In RV shālām is generally trd "spoil" (Jgs 5 30; 8 24 25; Isa 10 2, etc), while, conversely, 'prey' (noun and vb.) is occasionally substituted for 'spoil,' "booty" (Nu 31 92, etc). See Boovry; Spoil.

W. L. WALKER

PRICE, πρᾶσ: Represents various words in the OT: ὁτὲ, τιμῶν, τίμησι, is the usual Gr word for 'price' in the AV. 'Price' is παρακλήσας, παρακλήσας, in Mt 13 46, and πτωκήσας, πτωκήσας, in 1 Pet 3 4.

The vb. occurs in Zec 11 13 AV and ERV as "preyed." The spelling "prized" in ARV and some ed. of AV is due to a confusion with "prize." For "price of a dog" (Dt 23 18 AV) see Dog.

PRIEST, πρές (πρῆ, κόη, "priest," "prince," "minister;" ἱερεῖς, ἱερέως, ἱερεῖας, archiereis; for ἱερεῖς μέγας, κυριαρχίας, Vulg compungo; cf. Eng. word "compunction").

LITERATURE

A priest is one who is duly authorized to minister in sacred things, particularly to offer sacrifices at the altar, and who acts as mediator between man and God. In the NT the term is applied to priests of the Gentiles (Acts 14 15), to those of the Jews (Mt 8 4), to Christ (He 5 5 6), and to Christians (1 Pet 2 9; Rev 1 6).

The office of priest in Israel was of supreme importance and of high rank. The high priest stood next the monarch in influence and dignity. Aaron, the head of the priestly order, was closely associated with the great lawyer, Moses, and shared with him in the government and guidance of the nation. It was in virtue of the priestly functions that the chosen people were brought into near relations with God and kept therein. Through the ministrations of the priesthood the people of Israel were instructed in the doctrine of sin and its expiation, in forgiveness and worship. In short, the priest was the indispensable source of religious knowledge for the people, and the channel through which spiritual life was communicated.

1. Nature of the Priestly Office.—The Scriptures furnish information touching this point. To them we at once turn. Priesthood implies choice. Not only was the office of Divine institution, but the priest himself was Divinely appointed thereto. "For every high priest, being taken from among men, is appointed for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both the gifts and sacrifices of men, that are offered according to the Law; but of which there is no mention neither among the sacrifices of clean beasts, nor of blood, nor of any offering made with blood, which could make him perfect, who goeth not into the holy place, but into the temple, even into the holy of holies, where the San be effected by means of sacrifice, blood-shedding (He 5 1; 8 3). He would be no priest who should have nothing to offer. It was the high priest who carried the blood of the sin offering into the Most Holy Place and sprinkled it seven times on and before the mercy-seat, thus symbolically covering the sins of the people from the eyes of the Lord who dwelt between the cherubim (Ps 80 1). It was he also who marked the same blood on the horns of the altar of burnt offering in the Court of the Tabernacle, and on those of the golden altar, that the red sign of propitiation might thus be lifted up in the sight of Jah, the righteous Judge and Redeemer.

It implies intercession. In the priestly ministry of Aaron and his sons this function is not so expressly set forth as are some of their other duties, but it is certainly included. For intercession is grounded in atonement. There can be no effective advocacy on behalf of the guilty until their guilt is righteously expiated. The sprinkling of the blood on the mercy-seat served to cover the guilt from the face of God, and at the same time it was an appeal to Him to pardon and accept His people. So we read that after Aaron had sprinkled the blood he came forth from the sanctuary and blessed Israel (Lev 9 22-24; Nu 6 22-27).

II. The Two Great Priests of the OT.—These were Melchizedek and Aaron. No others that ever bore the name and Aaron or discharged the office rank with these, save, of course, the Lord Jesus Christ, in whom they were distinguished types. Of the two, Melchizedek was the greater. There are two reasons why they are to be considered priests: first, because they are the representatives of the Mediator, whose position was not only the head of his order, but he had no successor. The office began and terminated with him (He 7 3). The ordinary priests and the Levites depended for their official existence on Aaron. Apart from him they would not be priests. Second, the priesthood of Christ was typified by both. The office is summed up and completed in Him. They were called and consecrated that they might be prophecies of Him who was to come and in whom all priesthood and offering and intercession would find its ample fulfilment. In the Ep. to the Hebrews of both these men is combined and consummated in Christ. But let it be noted that while He is of the order of Melchizedek He exercises the office after the pattern of Aaron. He perfects all that Aaron did typically, because He is the true and the real Priest, while Aaron is but a figure.

III. Priestly Functions and Character.—These are minutely prescribed in the Law. In the institution of the office the Lord's words to Moses were, "Take thou unto thee a religious order of Aaron thy brother, and his sons with him, from among the children of Israel, that he may minister unto me in the priest's office" (Ex 25 1 AV). Their duties were strictly religious. They had no political power conferred upon them. Their services, their dependent position, and the way in which they were sustained, i.e. by the free gifts of the people, precluded them from exercising any undue influence in the affairs of the nation. It is true that in process of time the high office degenerated, and became a thing of barter and sale in the hands of unscrupulous and corrupt men, but as originally appointed the priesthood in Israel was not a caste, nor a hierarchy, nor a political factor, but a Divinely appointed medium of communication between God and the people.

high priest must not. For he was the representative of life. Death did not exist for him, in so far as he was a priest. God is the Ever-Living, the Life-Giving; and His priest, who had "the crown of the anointing oil of his God upon him," had to do with life alone.

Adolph Saphir believes there is deep significance in the miracle of Aaron's rod that budded and bare almonds (Nu 17). It was a visible sign of the legitimacy of Aaron's priesthood and a confirmation of it, Aaron's Rod and a symbol of its vitality and fruitfulness. The twelve rods of the tribes were dead sticks of wood, and remained dead; Aaron's alone had life and produced blossoms and fruit. It was the emblem of his office which correlated itself with life, and had nothing to do with death.

IV. Consecration of Aaron and His Sons (Ex 29; Lev 8).—The process of the consecration is minutely described and is worthy of a more detailed and careful study than can here be given it. Only the more prominent features are noticed.

(1) Both the high priest and his sons were to get water to wash in (Ex 29.4). But when this was done, the high priest parted company with his sons. (2) Next, Aaron was arrayed in the holy and beautiful garments, with the breastplate over his heart, and the holy crown on his head, the mitre, or bonnet, with its golden plate bearing the significant inscription, "Holy to Jehovah." This was Aaron's investiture of the high office. (3) He was then anointed with the precious oil. It is noteworthy that Moses poured the oil on his head. When he anointed the tabernacle and its furniture, he sprinkled the oil, but in Aaron's case there was a profusion, an abundance in the anointing (Ps 133.2). (4) After the anointing of the high priest the appointed sacrifices were offered (Ex 29.10ff.). Up to this point in the ceremony Aaron was the principal figure, the sons having no part save in the washing. But after the offerings had been made the sons became prominent participants in the ceremonies, sharing equally with the high priest therein.

(5) The blood of the offering was applied to the person of father and sons alike (Ex 29.20–21). On the tip of the right ear, on the thumb of the right hand, and on the great toe of the right foot was the consecrating blood-mark set.

1. Symbol of Consecration

The significance of this action should not escape the reader. It is the whole person and career of the priest were thus brought under power of the blood. He had a bloodstained body that he might execute, rightly and efficiently, the services of the sanctuary and the duties of his great office. He had likewise a blood-stained foot that he might walk in the statutes and commandments of the Lord blameless, and tread the courts of the Lord's house as the obedient servant of the Most High. Sacramental blood, the blood of atonement, is here, everywhere, the foundation for saints and sinners, for priesthood alike in all their relations with God.

The priests of Israel were but dim shadows, obscure sketches and drafts of the one Great Priest of God, the Lord Jesus Christ. Without between the type and the archetype, sum up in a few brief sentences the perfection found in the priestly character of Christ: (1) Christ as Priest is appointed of God (He 5.5). (2) He is consecrated with an oath (He 7.20–22). (3) He is sinless (He 7.26). (4) His priesthood is unchangeable (He 7.24). (5) He offers a perpetual and final (He 9.25–28; 10.12). (6) His intercession is all-prevailing (He 7.25).

As God and man in one Person He is a perfect Mediator (He 1, 2). See Christ, Offices of, V.

LITERATURE

1. Institution of the High-Priesthood.—Temples with an elaborate ritual, a priesthood and a high priest were familiar to Moses. For a millennium or two before his time these had flourished in Egypt. Each temple had its priest or priests, the larger temples and centers having a high priest. For centuries the high priest of Amon at Thebes stood next to the king in power and influence. Many other high-priesthoods of less importance existed. Moses' father-in-law was priest of Midian, doubtless the chief or high priest. In founding a nation and establishing an ecclesiastical system, nothing would be more natural and proper for him than to constitute a priestly system with a high priest at the head. The records give a fairly full account of the institution of the high-priesthood.

Aaron, the brother of Moses, was chosen first to fill the office. He was called "the priest" (ha-kohen) (Ex 31.10). As the office was to be hereditary and to be preserved in perpetuity in the family of Aaron (Ex 29.9.20), he is succeeded by his son Eleazar (Nu 20.28; Dt 10.6), and he in turn by his son Phinehas (Nu 25.11). In his time the succession was fixed (Nu 26.12.13). In Lev 4 3.5.16; 6 22 he is called "the anointed priest." Three times in the Pent he is spoken of as "great priest" or "high priest" (Lev 21.10; Nu 35.25.28).

The first of these passages identifies him with the anointed priest.

The ceremonies by which he was installed in his office are recorded in Ex 29.20ff. Seven days of special solemnities were spent. The first consecration was by Moses; it is not said who performed the others. There was special washing and anointing with oil (Ps 133.2). Much new high priest must wear the holy garments, as well as be specially appointed (Lev 21.10).

Every day a libation for a sin offering must be offered for atonement; the altar also must be cleansed, anointed for,

Besides the twenty prescribed dress of the priests, the high priest must wear the robe of the ephod, the ephod, and the breastplate upon the more headcloth (Lev 8:7–9). The robe of the ephod seems to have been a sleeveless tunic, made of blue, purple, and fine linen interwoven with gold (Ex 25:6–8; 39:2–5). This distinguishing sign of the high priest, fastened at the shoulders by two clasps of sheshbon stone, upon each of which was engraved the names of six tribes of Israel (Ex 28:9–14). Over the ephod and upon his breast he wore the breastplate, a four-cornered kohen tishah suspended by chains. Set in it were twelve precious stones, having engraved upon them the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. This breastplate must have contained a pock of some kind inside, for in it were deposited the Urim and Thummim, which seemed to be fabled objects of some kind (Ex 39:8–21). The mitre or headress was of fine linen, the plate of the crown of pure gold, and inscribed upon it the words, "Holy to Jehovah." (Ex 28:36–38; 39:36–31). When entering the Holy of Holies he must be dressed wholly in linen, but in his ordinary duties in the dress of the priests; only when acting as high priest he must wear special robes. See Priest.

In addition to his regular duties as a priest, the high priest was to enter the Holy of Holies on the day of atonement (Lev 16:8–15, 33).

1. Duties (34). He must also officiate at the of the High-ceremony of the two goats, when one Priesthood is sent into the wilderness to Azazel, and the other slain to make atonement for the sins of all the people (Lev 16:8–10; 19:7). He alone could make atonement for the sins of the people, and his own house (Lev 4:3ff; 9:8ff; 16:6; Nu 15:25). He must offer the regular meal offering (Lev 6:15). He must share with the people the fat of the sacrifice and the fat of the breast (Ex 27:21). He must assist in arranging the shewbread (Ex 25:30). When he carried the breastplate with the names of the tribes inscribed thereon he acted as mediator between Israel and God (Ex 28:29). He alone could consult the Urim and Thummim before Jeh, and according to his decision Israel must obey (Nu 27:21).

An office so important required certain special regulations. He must be free from every bodily defect (Lev 21:6–15). He must not marry only a virgins of Israel, not a widow, nor a divorced woman, nor a loose one (Lev 21:14). He must not observe the external signs of mourning for any person, and never to the same table with a news carrier, the death of even a father or mother (ver 10–12). He must not dye the beard or the hair of his person, or his hair grow long or rend his clothes as a sign of mourning (ver 13). If he should bring guilt upon the people he must present a special offering (Lev 4:3ff). Sins affecting the priesthood in general must be expiated by the other priests as well as himself (Nu 18:1). He must eat nothing that died of itself or was torn by beasts (Lev 22:8). He must wash his feet and hands when he went to the tabernacle of the congregation and when he came near to the altar to minister (Ex 30:19–21). If first Aaron was to burn incense on the golden altar every morning when he dressed the lamps and every evening when he lighted them (Ex 27:21), but in later times the common priests performed this duty. He must abstain from any uncleanness (Lev 22:1–3), or if he should become leprous (ver 4ff). He was to eat the people’s meat offering with the inferior priests in the holy place (Lev 22:10). He must ascend to judge the cases of leprosy in the human body and garments (Lev 13:2–69) and in adjudicating legal questions (Dt 17:12). When there was no Divinely inspired leader, the high priest was the chief ruler till the time of David and again after the exile. See Priest.

The emoluments were not much greater than those of the priests in general. He received no more inheritance among the tribes than any other Levite, but he and his family were maintained upon certain fees, offerings, and perquisites which they enjoyed from the common fund. In Nu 18:28 the priests were to receive a tithe of the tithe paid in to the Levites. Jos says this was a common fund (Ant, IV, iv, 4), but the high priest was probably charged with the duty of distributing it. In general the family of the high priest was well-to-do, and in the later period became very wealthy. The high priest and his family were among the richest people of the land in the time of Christ, making enormous profits out of the sacrifices and temple business.

The importance of the high priest’s office manifested itself first. The high priest Eleazar is named in the first rank with Joshua, the prince of the tribes and successor of Aaron. His sons were regarded as belonging to the people (Lev 4:32). He acted with Moses in important matters (Nu 26:1; 31:29). The whole congregation must go or come according to his word (Nu 27:20ff). His death was a national event, for then the manslayer was free to leave the City of Refuge (Nu 35:25,58). He had no secular authority, but was regarded generally as the leading religious authority. Later, he became also the leading secular authority in the land (Mal 4:5).

II. History of the High-Priesthood in Israel.—In general the present writer accepts the historical records of the OT as true and rejects the critical views of a fictitious or fabricated history (20:30–31; Lev 16:8–10). There are subjective reasons to support them and are based upon a naturalistic evolutionary view of the development of Israel’s religion. As Moses was the founder of the high-priesthood in Israel he anticipated a perpetuation of the office throughout the history (Dt 26:3). The high priest appears frequently. Eleazar officiated with Joshua in the division of the land among the twelve tribes (Josh 14:1). The law of the man-slayer shows that he was an important personage in the life of Israel (Josh 20:6). He seemed to have the power to distribute the offices of the priests to those whom he would, and poor priests would appeal to him for positions (1 S 2:36). The office seems to have been confined to the family only. Eleazar was the son of Eli, when, because of the wickedness of his sons, the family was destroyed and the position passed into the family of Ithamar (1 S 21–34). A descendant of that family officiated at Nob in the times of Saul and David (1 S 26), and who a priest, Abiathar, escaped from the slaughter, and later seems to have succeeded his father and to have been chief priest throughout David’s reign (1 S 26:20–23; 29:5; 30:7). Zadok seems to have had almost equal privilege (2 S 17; 1 Ch 18:16; 24:6 almost certainly by eunuchs’ error, transpose Abiathar and Ahimelech; Mk 2:26 may be based on this reading. See Abiathar, etc). Because he joined the party of Adonijah rather than that of Solomon, Abiathar was deposed and banished to Anathoth, where he spent all the days of his days (1 K 2:26,27). Zadok was put in his place (ver 35). He seems to have been a descendant of Eleazar. Under Jehoshaphat, Amariah was high priest (2 Ch 13:11) and was the leading authority in all religious matters. In the time of Athaliah, during the minority of Josiah and almost his entire reign Jehoahaz was high priest and chief adviser. He seems to have been the most influential man in the kingdom for more than half a century (2 K 11:4ff; 12:1–26; 2 Ch 24:4–27). Zadok was made high priest in the days of Uzziah and Hezekiah (2 Ch 26:20; 31:10; Urijah in the reign of Ahaz (2 K 16:10–16), and the latter priest seems to have been a friend of Isaiah (Isa 8:2). Hilkiah held the office in the days of Josiah when the Book of the Law was discovered (2 K 22 4; 23 4; 2 Ch 34 9); Zephaniah in the time of Jeremiah (Jer 29 25 f); Serahiah in the days of Zechiah, who was put to death at Riblah by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25 18; Jer 52 24). At the time, mention is made of a priest of the second rank (2 K 23 4; 25 18) and Zephaniah fills that office (Jer 52 24). It is doubtful whether this is the same Zephaniah mentioned in Jer 29 25. This 'second priest' was doubtless a deputy or assistant to take the high priest's place in case anything should prevent his performing the duties of the office. Lists of high priests are given in 1 Ch 6 1–15; 6 50–53. The first of these gives the line from Levi to Jehozadak who was carried away in captivity under Nebuchadnezzar. The second traces the line from Aaron to Ahimaz, and is identical so far with the first list.

There could have been no place for the functions of the high priest during the captivity, but the family line was preserved and Joshua the son of Jehozadak was among those who first returned (Ezr 3 2). From this time the high priest becomes more prominent. The monarchy is gone, the civil authority is in the hands of the Persians, the Jews are no longer independent, and hence the civil power tends to center in the high-priesthood. Joshua appears to stand equal with Zerubbabel (Hag 1 12.14; 2 24; Zec 3 18; 4 14; 6 11–13).

He is distinctly known as high priest (hasō-kōhen ha-sadōk). He takes a leading part in establishing the ecclesiastico-civil system, particularly the building of the temple. In the vision of Zechiah (Zec 3 1–5) Satan accuses the high priest who is here the representative proper of the nation. The consummation of the Messiah could not be completed without the cooperation of the high priest who is crowned with Zerubbabel, and sits with him on the throne (Zec 6 13). The prophet makes him to be "the man of the sign," alluding to the coming Messiah who is to be taken away from one day (Zec 3 9 f). The promise is made to Joshua that if he will walk in Jehovah's ways and keep his house, he shall judge Jehovah's house, i.e., Israel, keep his court and have a place to walk among those who stand before Jehovah (3 7). He is appointed equally with the prince of the royal line, for the two sons of oil (4 14) almost certainly refer to the royal Zerubbabel and priestly Joshua who are to be joint inspirers of Israel in rebuilding the temple.

This exaltation of the high priest is very different from the state of things pictured by Ezekiel (Ezk 40–42). In that picture no place is left for a high priest; the prince seemed to be the chief personage in the ecclesiastical system. Ezekiel's vision was immediately secular, and the institutions and conditions of the past were carried out rather than the visions of the prophet. In the time of Nehemiah, Eliashib was high priest (Neh 3 120). For abusing his office by using a temple chamber in the interests of his family he was reprimanded (13 4–9). The list of high priests from Joshua to Jaddua is given in Neh 12 10. According to Jos (Ant. XII, viii, 5) Jaddua was priest at the time of Alexander the Great (332 BC), but it is practically certain that it was Judas Maccabaeus' grandson, Simon, who was then priest (see W. J. Beecher, Reasonable Bib. Criticism, ch xviii). Thus is preserved the unbroken line from Aaron to Jaddua, the office still being hereditary. No essential change can be found after this. The Book of Baruch was written in or some time during this period, uses the three names, ha-kōhen, ha-kōhen ha-ro'ah, ha-kōhen ha-gadalōh. The word rō'ah ("prince") is also used, and he is called "the ruler of the house of God" (1 Ch 9 11). This same term is used in the later Jewish writers to denote any person invested with power. Usually the Chronicler in both Ch and Neh uses the term "the priest." The line of Eleazar doubtless continued until the time of the Maccabees, when a decided change took place. The Syrian Antiochus deposed Onias III and put his brother Jason in his place (174 BC), who was soon displaced by Menelaus. About 153 BC Jonathan the Hasmonean was appointed by King Alexander, and thus the high-priesthood passed to the family of the Maccabees, the last of whom reigned to 1 Mac 18–21. Whether the family of Joiarib was a branch of the Zadokites or not cannot be determined. After the appointment of Jonathan, the office became hereditary in the Hasmonean line, and continued thus until the time of Herod the Great. The latter set up and destroyed the high pile at his pleasure. The Romans did the same, and changed so frequently that the position became almost an annual appointment. Though many changes were thus made, the high priest was always chosen from certain priestly families. From this group of deposed priests arose a class known as "chief priests." The anointing prescribed in the law of Moses was not always carried out in later times, and in fact was generally omitted. The Mish speaks of high priests who were installed in office simply by putting on their special robes (Schürer, II, i, p. 217, note 24).

In NT times the high priest was the chief civil and ecclesiastical dignitary among the Jews. He was chairman of the Sanhedrin, and the head of the political council of the Rom government. It is not clear just how far he participated in the ceremonies of the temple. No doubt he alone entered the Holy of Holies once a year on the Day of Atonement, and discharged the duties of the week. What other part he took in the work was according to his pleasure. Jos says that he officiated at the Sabbath, the New Moon and yearly festivals. The daily min'ah (Lev 12 f) of which he was often charged was offered by the high priest in person, but he was required to defray the expense of it. This was a duty which, according to Ezekiel's vision, was to be performed by the prince. The Jews had many contentions with the Romans as to who should keep the garments of the high priest. When Jesus fell into the hands of the Romans, the robe of state also fell into their hands.

In the time of Christ, Annas and Caiaphas were high priests (Lk 2 2; 7 15), in the apostolic times, Caiaphas alone acted as such. Annas had probably been deposed, yet retained much of his influence among the priestly families. For particulars see AHNAYAH; JEHOSADAK; JESUS CHRIST. These two were also the chief conspirators against Jewish liberty. In the case of the council Caiaphas doubtless advised them to put to death the prophet for the sake of "saving the nation" (Jn 11 51). He was also chairman of the council which tried Jesus (Lk 22 53; Mt 27 1; Mk 14 61.53.66.63.65; Lk 22 53; Jn 12 14-19; 24.28). They were also leaders in the persecution of the apostles and disciples after Pentecost (Acts 4 6; 5 17; 21). Saul sought letters from the high priest to Damascus to give him authority to bring any Christians he might find there bound to Jerusalem (Acts 9 2). He presided at the council which tried Paul (Acts 25 11; 22 21). See PAUL, THE APOSTLE.

In the Ep. to the Hebrews the doctrine of the priesthood of Jesus is fully and carefully elaborated. Jesus is here called the great High Priest, as well as priest. The opening words of the Ep. contain the essential thought: "When he had made purification of sins" (1 3). The title of high priest is first introduced in 1 2, 3 a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God; and in 5 1, "the high priest of good things confirmed." Having thus fairly introduced his great theme, the writer strikes the keynote of his great argument. Having thus paved the way, he now proceeds to state his qualifications: (1) He is appointed by God to His office (5 1). (2) He is well fitted for the office by His experiences and participation (Lk 4 15–22; 2 Cor 4 6–18). (3) He undergoes a Divine preparation (5 7–9). The subject of qualifications is then continued. It is after the order of Melchizedek (10 10). This is an eternal one (6 20); royal or kingly (7 1–3); independent of birth or family (ver 3); it is timeless (ver 5); superior to that of Levi (vs 4-10); and new and different from that of Aaron (vs 11-13). It is also indissoluble (ver 16); immutable (ver 24); with all the general and special qualifications He is completely fitted for His work (ver 26). That work consists in offering up Himself a sacrifice for the sins of the people (ver 27); entering within the veil as a forerunner (ver 28); presenting a sacrifice in the presence of God (ver 27); thus obtaining eternal redemption (ver 12); ratifying the new covenant (ver 15-22). The result of this high-priestly work was a change from all sin (ver 9); a possibility of full consecration to God and His service (ver 10); an ultimate peace being made (ver 14); and full access to the throne of grace (ver 10, 21, 22). See Christ, Offices of; Priest; Priesthood in the NT.

PRIESTHOOD, priesthood:

1. Priesthood an Office
2. In the OT
3. Hereditary Priesthood
4. In the NT
5. Conclusions

LITURGY: Liturgy is of the same order as the priestly office.

All worship is based on priestly service, for the priestly office is an essential part of salvation. Christianity itself has its glorious Priest, the Lord Jesus Christ, and it is through His one supreme offering that we are brought into saved relations with God and enjoy fellowship with Him. The priesthood of Christ, as the representative of God to men, its mighty influence in the body of Christ, and the high priestly offices of the Epistle to the Hebrews, are here called out from the various passages of Scripture.

Priesthood is a real office, definite and specific. It is not for us to say on this fact, for the noun word "priest", has been misappropriated and misapplied, so that its intrinsic import has been impaired. There is a certain literary slang indulged in by some who talk of the "priesthood of art", and similar abstractions. The idea of priestly office has any definite meaning, can have no place in literature or science or art or in anything of the kind. For it belongs to the realm of grace, pertaining as it does to the Divine purpose to remove it. Hugh Martin writes that He "would as soon transfigure the language of geometry and of algebra to botany and talk of the hypothesis of a flower and the square root of a tree, or the differential coefficient of a convolvulus, as to speak of the priesthood of nature or letters." Priesthood is an office, embracing very specific duties and functions.

Priesthood in some form appears to have existed from the earliest times, even from the beginning of the history of our race. In patriarchal times the office was held and its duties were discharged by those who occupied some sort of headship, and particularly by the father or the chief of the family and of the tribe. Thus Noah in his capacity as priest and in behalf of his household "built a altar unto Jeh, and took of every clean beast, and of every clean bird, and offered burnt-offerings on the altar" (Gen 8 20). Abraham offered the ram "for a burnt-offering in the stead of his son" (Gen 22 13). In like manner Job offered burnt offerings for his children, and likewise by Divine direction for the three "carrion eaters" when the great trial passed (Job 1 5; 42 8). In these and the like instances there was priestly action no less certain than in that of Aaron or of any regularly appointed priest in Israel. Melchizedek was "priest of God Most High" (Gen 14 18), Isaac "blessed an altar there and called upon the name of Jehovah" (Gen 26 25), as did Jacob (Gen 33 20). In these cases priestly acts were performed by the patriarches in their capacity as fathers of the family or heads of clans. From the beginning, priesthood with its acts of expiation and mediation was organized as a Divinely instituted office. But in pre-Mosaic times there was no special class of priests recognized.

Regular priestly succession in a single family was established by Moses (Ex 29 1-6). From this point of time onward the priesthood in Israel was confined to the family of Aaron. No hereditary priesthood seems to have prevailed in patriarchal times. According to the Ep. to the He, Melchizedek, a priest of the highest rank, had neither predecessor nor successor in his great office. By Divine direction Moses designated the Aaronic family as the priestly family in Israel, and he prescribed the garments they should wear, the sacrifices they should offer both for themselves and for the congregation, their maintenance, their domestic relations, and their conduct toward their fellow-Hebrews.

In the appointment of the priest there is no trace of Egyptian influence. Yet we know that Joseph married the daughter of the priest of On (Gen 41 50). But this fact had no bearing on the selection of Israel's priestly family. The Aaronic priesthood had nothing in common with that of Egypt; it claimed to be of God's origin and not a successor to old oracles and powers in no way contradict the claim. The witness of an Egyptian archaeologist (Dr. M. G. Kyle) may be here introduced touching one essential element in the duties of the priestly office, viz. the sacrifices. It is not claimed that the whole of worship was thus retained, but that the whole or nearly the whole of the sacrifice was retained, and this because the order of sacrifice of the ancient Egyptians was derived from that of the Hebrews. Thus did Gideon in a time of great straits in Israel (Jgs 6 24-26); thus the men of Beth-shemesh (1 S 6 14,15); the prophet Samuel (1 S 7 9); David (2 S 6 13,17); Elijah (1 K 18 22-32). The chosen people appear to have felt free to offer sacrifices and to engage in priestly functions when occasion required, until the central sanctuary was established on Mt. Moriah. When the Temple was built and dedicated, priestly action was confined to Jesus and to the regularly priestly household. When Pharisaism, with its rigid legalism, with its intolerable burdens, became dominant, all liberty of worship and spontaneous service largely disappeared. The religious life of Israel stiffened into a dreadful monotony.

All priesthood reaches its climax in that of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is because of the perfection of His person that the "priesthood of the many" under Melchizedek and Aaron was effective, and fulfilled the end for which it was appointed. The one and the other was a type and antitype, as prediction and fulfillment. Christ's priesthood is insisted upon to us in the Ep. to the He (3 14, 18: 4 14-16: 5 1-10; 7 9,10,18). Two fundamental truths touching His priesthood are made very prominent in the Ep.: the He is High Priest, and the He is the one Perfect Priest. By the order is meant the rank or grade of the Priest, and by the duties the various functions of His ministry. Christ's order as Priest is that of Melchizedek, not at all that of Aaron: He 7:27 makes this fact perfectly clear. Likewise above Melchizedek, He is Priest, having no predecessor in the great order. Herein He stands absolutely alone, peerless and perfect forever. He executes the duties or functions of it after the pattern of Aaron, as He 9:11 clearly espouses. The priest and the high priest are functions of Jesus only.

The point is raised and discussed with some keenness in our day. Did Christ execute the office of priest during His earthly ministry? It would be strange if He has exercised the office only in heaven? A full discussion of this interesting subject would be inappropriate. However, let it be noted (1) that the Lord Jesus appointed a Priest no less certainly than was Aaron (He 5:4). In the words, "Thou art holy, and I have not seen thee," there appears to be a reference both to His incarnation (Lk 1:32; He 1:2) and also to His resurrection (Ac 13:31). In He 2:17 we are told that it was "unto all things to be made like unto his brethren, that he might have compassion on the sins of the people." The assumption of human nature was needful that He might be such a priest. John the Baptist saw this truth, and said, "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world" (Jn 1:29).

There was certainly priestly action in His death. Twice we are told that He "offered up himself" (He 7:27). "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." For all this, when He offered Himself. This strong term, "offered," is sacrificial and indicative of the office here described for the benefit of the people. His own action in it must not be overlooked; it was He Himself who presented the offering; He was the Priest and put it forth as a martyr and humble offering. Nothing could escape the doom that came upon Him—nay, He Himself offered Himself in He 9:14 we find these significant words: "How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without spot unto God, ... shed for sin?" No one can escape the consequences of his actions, and if any one have sincerely sought to escape the consequences of sin, he has made himself altogether worse off. Another thing to remember is that Christ did not change in the action of His great offering. He was at once both sacrifice and priest. Never was there anything more solemn than the act of our Lord in giving His life for His people.

It is worth while to remind ourselves that the words employed in Scripture to express theoffice of His being the Priest are those which denote the person of the priest. In Old Testament times, Matthew has, He "yielded up [dismissed] his spirit" (Mt 27:50). He was "gave his spirit" (Lk 23:46). He was "gave up the ghost" (Jn 19:30). Mk 15:37 and Lk 23:46 both have the same words: He "gave up the ghost." He died, not because He was mortal as we are, nor because He could not deliver Himself, but because He gave Himself for our sins that we might be forgiven and saved (Jn 10:18). The voluntary act of His offering is the very essence of His priestly act. See Christ, OFFICER, V.

Priesthood springs out of the deepest need of the human soul. Men universally feel that somehow they have offended the Power to whom they are responsible, to whom they give account for their deeds.

They long to appease their offended Lord, and they believe that one who is authorized and qualified to act in their behalf may secure for them the abrogation of penalty and the pardon they seek. Hence priesthood connects itself most closely with guilt and its removal. The heart craves the intervention and intercession on their behalf of one who has liberty of access to God, and whose ministry is acceptable. In short, the priest is the representative of the sinners, the sin offerings pertaining to God. He is the mediator whose office it is to meet and satisfy the claims of God upon those for whom he acts, and who secures the pardon and the favor which the offender must have, if he is to enjoy fellowship with God. An offender, and more than that, the ransom in our Great High Priest, the Lord Jesus Christ.

PRIESTHOOD IN THE NT:

1. The Jewish Priesthood

2. The Priesthood and High-Priesthood of Jesus Christ

3. The Priesthood of Believers

In the NT ἱερεύς, hierévous (1 Pet 2:5,9), "priesthood," is not found with reference to the Jewish priesthood, but ἵερος, hieréros, and ἅρπιερος, archiereís, "high priest," frequently occur. As until the fall of Jesus the activities of the priests were carried on in careful accordance with the Priesthood OT, there is nothing new or striking in the numerous NT references to their work. Perhaps the information of the greatest interest is found in Lk 1 5-9 to the effect that Zacharias was of the course of Abijah, the 8th of the 24 courses into which the priests were divided (cf 1 Ch 24:7-18), and that in these courses the priests divided their work by lot. In the Gospels the archiereis are mentioned oftener than are the hieréous, the power of the priesthood seeming to have been absorbed by a sort of priestly aristocracy. As under the political pressure of that time the office of high priest could seldom be retained until the death of the holder, there might even be several lives at the same time who had for a while held this office which made a man the head of the nation, not only ritually, but also politically, since the high priest was ex officio presiding officer of the Sanhedrin. Not only would these ex-high priests retain the title belonging to their former dignity, but probably the name had come to include as well other members of the same families or of families of equal position, so that it seems that "chief priests" is a more exact tr of ἱερεῖς than ἱερέων. Of course, the reference of archiereus is usually, if not invariably, to the individual who at the time given was holding the unique office of high priest. The word hieréus is of course employed in its ordinary signification, the word hiero being used in the NT to corresponding ministers of other religions, as to the priest of Zeus (Acts 14:13) and also to Melchizedek (He 7:1).

Only in He is the activity of Jesus set forth as priestly and high-priestly, but in this Ep, great emphasis is laid on these aspects of His work. Interpreters seldom distinguish between these two aspects of His work, and it is plain that sometimes at least the author himself made no effort sharply to distinguish them. Christ

But certain considerations make it probable that they were not really confused or even accounted for by the author himself. For example, it is to be noted that the priesthood of Jesus is declared to be after the order of Melchizedek, and consequently radically unlike that of the Levitical priests. On the other hand, the Aaronic high-priesthood is regarded as having been analogous to that of Jesus, so that in spite of its inferiority, comparison is frequently made with it. It is readily seen that the work of the high priest, both because of his entry into the Most Holy Place and because he bore the sin offerings, did not find a parallel in Israel in the breastplate of judgment for a memorial before Jeh continually, far more suitably than that of the ordinary priests typified the atoning and intercessory work of Jesus (Ex 28:12).

Attempting then to treat separately the priestly and high-priestly functions of Jesus, we note that most of what is said of the priestly functions is involved in the declaration that He is a priest after the order of Melchizedek, and this thought is handled in He 7 in such a way as to make plain the superiority of the priestly functions of Melchizedek, and thus to confirm the superiority of Christianity over Judaism, the great theme of the book. Historically the blessing bestowed upon Abraham and the reception of tithes from him prove the superiority of Melchizedek. Lev 27:30-36 will more to the priestly descendants of Levi (7:4-10).
Further, Jesus became priest not on the ground of a "carnal commandment," i.e. in an order based on descent and inheritance, but by "the power of an endless life" (7 16), of which fact Melchizedek reminds us, since Scripture is silent alike as to his birth and his death. Again, unlike the Levitical priests, Christ is inducted into his office by the oath of God (7 20; 21; cf Ps 110 4). Finally, while the priests of the Levitical line were hindered from permanence in office by their death, Jesus holds His priesthood untransmitted and intransmissible (7 23-24). This discussion of the priesthood of Christ "after the order of Melchizedek" occupies almost all of ch 7, but at ver 25 His high-priesthood is suddenly introduced, and after that point, while His work is more than once contrasted with that of the temple priests (8 4-5; 9 6; 10 11), no further reference is made in any way made to Melchizedek.

After having twice merely given the title of high priest to Jesus (2 17; 3 1), the writer of the Ep. to the He at 4 14 begins a statement of the resemblance between Jesus and the Jewish high priest, such "as was Aaron," finding the resemblance to reside (1) in His Divine appointment to His work (5 3), (2) in His experience of suffering (6 7-8; of 4 15; 6 2), and (3) in His saving work suggested by the Levitical sacrifice (6 9), which, however, it far transcends in value and effect. But (4) later the work of the high priest and that of Jesus are contrasted as to place where done, the high priest going into the second tabernacle, i.e. the Holy of Holies (7 9), while Christ passes through the greater and more perfect tabernacle, "heaven itself" (9 11.24). A similar contrast is (5) drawn between the sacrifices respectively offered, the ancient sacrifices being the blood of sin "offered without blemish unto God" (8 9), "his own blood" (9 12), "the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish unto God" (9 14). The author also accepts and urges without argument or even explanation (6) the truly sacrificial character of this self-immolation of Jesus. Nor is this fact nullified by the emphasis which once is laid on doing God's will in an antithesis copied from the Ps (10 5-9; cf Ps 106 6). For here the contrast drawn is not between sacrifice and obedience on the one hand, but rather between the sacrifice of animals dying involuntarily and wholly unconscious of the sacrificial significance of their death, and the offering of Jesus for the people. It is an intelligent purpose to carry out the will of God, by which means the body of Jesus Christ is the only acceptable offering (10 10). Further the author urges (7) the actual effectiveness of Christ's work, his argument being that it had already been repeatedly performed if this single offering had not been sufficient for all time, "once for all" (7 27; 9 26). Finally is asserted (8) the intercessory work of Christ, which, though not explained, seems to be a figurative presentation of his idea that men are blessed because Christ died, i.e. this was an indispensable condition of God's manifestation of His merciful love, and that the grace consequent on the death of Christ does not merely grow out of a fact, but self-sacrificial activity of Christ, and providence for believers are exercised, neither automatically or impersonally, but in virtue of a constant personal sympathy for varying temptations and needs, a sympathy intensified by the earthly experience, temptation, suffering of Him who had been and is, not only the Divine Son, but the Son of Man. Thus the salvation of the believer is certain and complete, and the priestly and high-priestly work of Jesus reaches its consummation.

The priesthood of believers is an idea which finds formal expression less frequently in the NT than has been the case in Protestant theology. But it does not follow that there has been a corresponding divergence from the thought of the apostles. It only shows that a thought which is accorded to the apostolic teaching has been taken by successive generations of Christians, and which, if not constant, yet sufficiently clear expression in this figurative fashion, has, in consequence of errors which have developed, to receive in the controversies of later centuries stronger emphasis than it did at first. It may well be noted first that this conception of the priesthood of believers, standing by itself, is in no way related to the various priestly activities which are also figuratively attributed to them. The writer of the Ep. to the He, who does not speak of the priesthood of believers, knowing no Christian priesthood but that of Jesus Himself, yet calls "praise," "to do good and to communicate, sacrifices" (13 15). So Paul bids the Romans present their bodies "a living sacrifice" (Rom 12 1), and Peter calls Christians "a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices" (1 Pet 2 5). But this figurative usage is entirely distinct from the subject of the present paragraph. Also the conception of the Christian priesthood has the NT attaches itself merely to the ministry of the Christian church, whatever may be held as to its orders or tasks. In no sense has the church or any church an official priesthood. Nor is it any part of the NT conception of the priesthood of believers that any individual should act in any respect for any other. Though the intercessory supplication of believers in behalf of other persons has of late often been represented as a priestly act, as being, indeed, that activity which is especially essential to the establishment of believers, (Consult 10 19), the NT thought is quite different, and is to be thus conceived: In ancient times it was held that men in general could not have direct access to God, that any approach to Him must be mediated by some member of the class of priests, who alone could approach God, and who must accordingly be employed by other men to represent them before Him. This whole conception vanishes in the light of Christianity. By virtue of their relation to Christ all believers have approach to the Father, and consequently, as this right of approach was formerly a priestly privilege, priesthood may now be predicated of every Christian. That none needs another to intervene between his soul and God; that none can thus influence the Father that only his own soul may and must stand for itself in personal relation with God—such are the simple elements of the NT doctrine of the priesthood of all believers. In some Mosaic inscriptions found at El-Old, dating back about 1200-500 BC (Hommel in Hilpich, Explorations in Bible Lands, 719), certain priests and priestesses of the god Wadd are designated by the term lavit, fem. lavit'at (op. cit., 740). It is generally known whether this is due to Jewish influence.

1. Different Views of the History.—There are great divergences of opinion among modern writers as to the true course of history and the manner in which the various documents were taken as literal history, correctly representing the true meaning of the complete law. See Criticism.

The old belief was that the whole of the Pentateuchal laws were the work of Moses, that the account of the subsequent history given in the Books of Ch was correct, that Ezekiel's vision, if taken literally, could not be reconciled with the other known facts and was inexplicable, and that in the case of all other discrepancies harmonistic explanations should be adopted.

The modern critical school have traversed every one of these beliefs. The Chronicler is declared to be in constant and irreconcilable conflict with the older authorities, harmonicistic explanations are uniformly rejected, the Pent is denied to Moses and split up into a variety of sources of different ages, and Ezek gains a place of honor as representing a stage in a continuous and normal development. The subject is thus inextricably linked with the Pentateuchal problem, and reference must be made to the art. P. von Rad (afterward Wellhausen) for an explanation of the supposed documents and a consideration of the analysis with its nomenclature. On the other hand the present article and the art. S. q.v. explain and discuss the most widely held theory of the historical development into which the history of the supposed Pentateuchal sources has been fitted.

The dominant theory is that of Wellhausen. According to this, °Levite° was originally a term denoting professional skill, and denoted the tribe of the Levites, but professional priests. Anybody could sacrifice. For a simple altar no priest was required, but only for a house which contained a sacred image; this demanded watching and attendance (see B.C.L.E. 147). The whole Levitical Law was unknown and the distinction between priests and Levites unheard of. There were few great sanctuaries and one influential priesthood, that of Shiloh (afterward at Nob). With the monarchy the priesthood became more important. The royal priests at Jerus grew in consequence and influence until they overshadowed all the others. Dt recognized the equal priestly rights of all Levites, and Josiah's reformation placed the sons of Zadok, who were the priests of Jerus, and not the descendants of Aaron, in a position of decisive superiority. Then Ezek drew a new and previously unknown distinction between the °priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok° who are °keepers of the charge of the altar,° and the other Levites who were made °keepers of the charge of the house° as a punishment for having ministered in the high places. The PC takes up this distinction and represents it as being of Mosaic origin, making of the sons of Zadok °sons of Aaron.° In this way arose the sequence of Josiah's reformation, the distinction between priests and Levites. With Ezek this distinction is still an innovation requiring justification and sanction; with the PC it is a °statute forever,° although even yet not absolutely undisputed, as appears from the priestly version of the story of Korah's company. For all Judaism subsequent to Ezra, and so for Christian tradition, the PC in this matter also has been authoritative. Instead of the Deuteronomistic formula °the priests the Levites,° the Chronicler uses °the priests the Levites,° particularly in Ch° (op. cit., 147). From that time onward the priests and Levites are two sharply distinguished classes. It is an essential part of this theory that the Chronicler meant his work to be a literal history, correctly representing the true meaning of the complete law. See Criticism.

There have been various attempts to construct less thoroughly theories on the same data. As a rule these views accept in some form the documentary theory of the Pentateuchal Views and seek to modify the Wellhausen theory in two directions, either by attributing earlier dates to one or more of the Pentateuchal documents—esp. to the PC—or else by assigning more weight to some of the statements of Ch (interpreted literally). Sometimes both these tendencies are combined. None of these views has met with any great measure of success in the attempt to make headway against the dominant Wellhausen theory, and it is likely that all later attempts will make shipwreck on certain portions of the evidence.

The independent investigations on which the present article is based have led the writer to a view that diverges in important particulars from those of these, and it is necessary to state it briefly before proceeding to the evidence. In one respect it differs from all the rival schemes, not merely in result, but also in method, for it takes account of all evidence and of the state of the texts. Subject to this it accepts the Mosaic authenticity of all the Pentateuchal legislation and the clear and consentent testimony of the Law and the Prophets (i.e. of the two earlier and more authoritative portions of the Heb Canon), while regarding Ch as representing a later interpretation, not merely of the history, but also of the legal provisions. In outline the story of the priesthood is then as follows: Moses consecrated Aaron and his sons as the priests of the desecrated tribe of Levi, because of the tribe of Levi as a body of sacred porters for the period of wanderings, but in the legislation of Nu he made no provision whatever for their performing any duties after the sanctuary obtained a permanent localization. For this reason much of the priestly teaching requiring for its administration in settled conditions a numerous and scattered body of priests, such as the house of Aaron alone could not have provided immediately after the entry into Canaan. To meet this, Dt—the last legislative work of Moses—contains provisions enlarging the rights and duties of the Levites and conferring on them a priestly position. The earlier distinction was thus largely obliterated, though the high-priestly dignity remained in the house of Aaron till the time of Solomon, when it was transferred from the house of Eli to that of Zadok, who, according to Ezekiel's testimony, was a Levite (but see below, IV, 1). So matters remained till the exile, when Ezekiel put forward a scheme which together with many ideal elements proposed reforms to ensure the better application of the Mosaic principle of the distinction between holy and profane to greatly altered circumstances. Taking his inspiration from the wilderness, he constitutive a fresh division in the tribe of Levi, giving to the sons of Zadok a position similar to that once held by the sons of Aaron, and degrading all other Levites from the priesthood conferred on them by Dt to a lower rank. The duties now assigned to this class of °keepers of the charge of the house° were never even contemplated by Moses, but Ezekiel applies to them the old phrases of the Pentateuch which he invests with a new significance. As a result of his influence, the distinction between priests and Levites makes its appearance in post-exilic times, though it had been unknown to all the writers of the second division of the Heb Can. At the same time a meaning was read into the provisions of the Law which their original author could not have contemplated, and it was this interpretation which is presented (at any rate to some extent) in ch. 33, and has given us the current tradition. Many of the Chronicler's statements are, however, not meant to be taken literally, and could not have been so taken by his original public.

II. The Data of P in the Pentateuch.—To arrive at an objective conclusion it is necessary, in the first instance, to examine the facts

1. The Levites—without such bias as any view put forward by any author, ancient or modern, sacred or profane, might impart. Every legislator is entitled to be judged on his own language, and where he has, so to speak, made his own dictionary, we are compelled to read his meaning into the terms used. The very first of the material references to the Levites drives this truth home, viz: "The Levites shall bear the tabernacle, and over all the furniture thereof" (Nu 3, 30). It is necessary to consider whether such expressions are to be read in a wide or a narrow sense. We learn from 13, 3 that death would be the result of a Levite's bearing any of these vessels, and it therefore appears that these words are meant to be construed narrowly. "They shall bear the tabernacle, and all the furniture thereof; and they shall minister unto it," are the next words (150). Every legislator is entitled to the words who were to bear it that "they shall not touch the sanctuary, lest they die" (15). This shows that the service in question is strictly limited to a service of portership after the articles have been wrapped up by Aaron and his sons. By no possibility could it include such a task as cleaning the vessels. It is then further directed that the Levites are to take down and set up the dwelling and camp round about it. All these are desert services and desert services only. But some phrases are so used as to make them appear to have a significance which is not in such words. (1) Technical phrases.—We hear that the Levites are "to serve the service of the tent of meeting," and this looks as if it might refer to some general duties, but the context and the kindred passages always forbid this interpretation. Nu 7, 5ff is an admirable instance. Six wagons are there assigned to the Levites for this service, two to the Gerizimites and four to the Merarites. "But unto the sons of Kohath it was given none, because the service of the sanctuary belonged unto them; they bare it upon their shoulders." Here service is transport and nothing else. Again we read of the charge of the Levites in the tent of meeting, e.g. 425ff. If we look to see what this was, we find that it consisted of transporting portions of the tent that had been packed up. The "in" of EV does not represent the meaning of the Hebrew fairly; for the context makes it clear that the legislator means "barring none." "But they shall not go in to the sanctuary even for a moment lest they die" (20). In Eng. idiom we cannot speak of the transport of portions of a dismantled tent as service in that tent. One other expression requires notice, the phrase "keep the charge" which is distinguished in 36 from "doing service." The exact meaning cannot be determined. It appears to denote something kindred to service, but of a less exacting nature, perhaps the camping round the tent and the guardianship of the articles on the march. We shall see hereafter by comparison with other books that in Ps it does not bear the same meaning as elsewhere. (2) Other legal provisions.—The Levites were to act under the orders of Aaron and his sons, who were to assign to each man his individual functions (Nu 3, 4, etc). They were to undergo a special rite of purification (3, 4, 8), but the law of consecration which they were to undergo in the case of the firstborn (Nu 3). The age for beginning service is given in ch 4 as 30 years, but in 24 as 25, if the text be sound. The age for ceasing to serve was 50. In many passages the VSS suggest that a good many phrases are textually doubtful, and it is probable that when a critical text of the Pent is formed on scientific principles, a good many superfluous expressions will be found not to be original; but there is no reason to suppose that any real difference in the meaning of the passages would be revealed by such a text.

The story of Korah is easily misunderstood. It appears from Nu 16, 3 that his real object was to put himself on an equality with Moses and Aaron, and this is what the Levites contended (Nu 15, 3). The scene is repeated again in Nu 16, 27-30. Nu 18 reinforces the earlier passages. It is noteworthy as showing that in the conception of the legislator the Levites were not to come near the vessels or the altar (ver 3). The penalty is death for both Levites and priests.

(3) Contrast with Ezek and Ch. —The impression as to the meaning of P which may be gathered from the examination of its statements is powerfully reinforced when they are tested by reference to Ezek and Ch. For instance, Ch. 43, 18—39, 9-15 tells us that the Levites some service as gatekeepers, the slaying of burnt offering and sacrifice for the people and a keeping of "the charge of the house, for all the service thereof," which in the light of vs 7f appears to mean in his terminology, not a service of transport, but an entry into the house and the performance of certain duties there. P, on the contrary, knows nothing of gatekeepers, guards the slaying of the burnt offering and sacrifice as the duty of the individual sacrificant (Lev 1, 4), and—if, as Wellhausen thinks, it really refers to the temple—visited with death a Levite who was present in the places in which Ezek requires him to minister. Similarly for the Levites being 'for the service of the house ... and the courts and the chambers, and over the cleansing of every holy thing' (1 Ch 23, 28, but P knows nothing of any chambers, would not have allowed the Levites to touch (much less clean) many of the holy things, and regarded service simply as portership. In 1 Ch 23, 31 the Levites are to offer burnt offerings on certain occasions; in P their approach to the altar would have meant death both to themselves and the priests (Nu 19, 3). Other instances will be found in Ps, 281f.

(4) What the foregoing proves.—In view of these facts it is impossible to hold that the Levites in P represent a projection of the Levites of the second temple or any post-Mosaic age into the desert period. To P they are a body of sacred porters. The temple of course could not be carried about, and it cannot be asserted that in this respect the legislation mirrors later circumstances. Secondly, the net result of such a scheme would be to create a body of Levites for use during the desert and weavings and never thereafter. As soon as the desert age was over the whole tribe would find their occupation gone. How can we conceive that any legislator deliberately sat down and invented such a scheme centuries after the epoch to which it relates, well knowing that in so far as his scheme purported to be a narrative of events it was fictitious from beginning to end and would meet with acceptance only. Thirdly, P neither embodies the views of Ezek nor finds an accurate reflection in Ch. The facts are such as to enable us to say definitely that P is not in line with them. It is impossible to assume that he accentuated the duty for certain acts if performed by Levites because he must have used the Levites to perform those acts" (PS, 241 f).

P also speaks of Aaron the priest and the sons of Aaron the priest. It is doubtful whether the expression "the sons of Aaron the priests," which occurs frequently in the and His Sons expression is nowhere supported by all the authorities. "The phrase 'Aaron the high priest' is entirely unknown to P. Where the high priest is mentioned the only qualifying apposition possible in his usage is 'the priest.' Aaron and his sons, unlike the Levites, were consecrated, not merely purified. At this point two features only of the legislation need to be considered: the make-up of the staff to post-conquest conditions and the signs of date. For example, the leprosy laws (Lev 13 f) postulate the presence of priests to inspect and isolate the patient. 'Remembering that on the critical theory P assumes the capital at Jerusalem as self-evident, we must ask how such provisions were to work after the conquest. During the desert period nothing could have been simpler, but what was to happen when the Israelites dwelt all over Canaan from Beersheba to Dan?" (PS, 246). The difficulty is immensely increased if we postulate an exilic or post-exilic date, when the Jewish center of gravity was in Babylonia and there were large colonies in Egypt and elsewhere. And 'What are we to say when we read of leprosy garments (Lev 13 f)? Was a man to make the pilgrimage from Babylonia to Jerusalem and consult a priest about a doubtful garment? And what about the leper's offerings in ch 14? Could they conceivably have been meant to be made in a tent? The case is no better with the law of leprous houses, which is expressed to apply to the post-conquest period (Lev 14 33-53). The notification to the priest and his inspections require a priesthood scattered all over the country, i.e. a body far more numerous than the house of Aaron at the date of the conquest. Such instances could easily be multiplied from the legislation; one more only will be cited on account of its importance to the history of the priesthood. According to P the individual virtual sacrifice is to kill the victims and flay the burnt offerings. How could such procedure be applied to such sacrifices as those of Solomon (1 K 8 63)? With the growth of luxury the sacrifices would necessarily become too large for such a ritual, and the wealth would grow in refinement and object to performing such tasks personally. This suggests the reason for later abuses and for the modifications of Ezek and the representations of the Chronicler.

The evidence.—Thus the evidence of P is unfavorable alike to the Wellhausen and the mediating views. The indications of date are consistent Moses, and it seems impossible to fit the laws into the framework of any other age without reading them in a sense that the legislator can be shown not to have contemplated. On the other hand P is a torso. It provides a large body of Levites who would have nothing to do after the conquest, and a corpus of legislation that could not have been administered in settled conditions by the house of Aaron alone.

III. The Other Portions of the Pentateuch.—In Ex 19 22-24 we read of priests, but a note has come down to us that in the first of those verses Aquila had "elders" not "priests," and this appears to be the correct reading in both places, as is shown by the prominence of the elders in the early part of the chapter. In Hebrew the words differ by only two letters. It is said by Wellhausen that in Ex 33 7-11 (E) Joshua has charge of the ark. This rests on a mistranslation of Ex 33 7, which should be rendered (correcting EV), 'And Moses used to take a [or the] tent and pitch it for himself without the camp.' It is inconceivable that Moses should have taken the tent of the ark and removed it to a distance from the camp for his private use, leaving the ark barred and ungarded. Moreover, if he had done so, Joshua could not have been in charge of the ark, seeing that he was in this tent while the ark (ex hypothes) remained in the camp. Nor had the ark yet been made. In fact a priest or the guardian of the ark in E: (1) in the Book of Jos E knows of priests who carry the ark and are quite distinct from Joshua (3 f); (2) in Dt 31 14 (E) Joshua is not resident in the tent while the ark is present in E: (3) in Ex 32 26-29, and the Levitical priesthood is the only one recognized (Dt 33 10); (4) there is no hint anywhere of Joshua's discharging any priestly duty whatsoever. The whole case rests on his presence in the tent in Ex 33 7-11, supposing a Pentateuch (q.v.), this passage should stand after Ex 13 22.

Then it is said that in Ex 4 14; Jgs 17 7, 'Levite' denotes profession, not ancestry. In the latter passage the youth whom Micah made a priest was of Levitical descent, being the grandson of Moses (Jgs 17 13), and the case rests on the phrase, 'of the family of Judah.' Neither of the Septuagintal translations had this text (Field, Hexapla, ad loc.), which therefore cannot be supported, since it cannot be suggested that Moses belonged to the tribe of Judah. As to Ex 4 14, the phrase "Aaron thy brother the Levite" is merely an adaptation of the more usual, "Aaron, son of Amram, the Levite," rendering a phrase for the brother Moses is the person addressed. The Wellhausen theory here is shown to be untenable in PS, 250 and KE, XI, 418.

Ex 32 26-29 foreshadows the sacred character of Levi, and Dt 10 6 (E) knows the hereditary Aaronic priesthood. In D the most important passage is Dt 13 6-8. In ver 7 three Septuagintal MSS omit the words 'the Levites,' and if this be a gloss, the whole historic sense of the passage is changed. It now contains an enactment that any Levite coming to the religious capital may minister there as "all his brethren do, who stand there," etc. i.e. like the descendants of Aaron. "The Levites" will then be the explanation of a glossator who was imbued with the latest post-exilic ideas, and thought that "his brethren" must mean those of his fellow-Levites who were not descended from Aaron. The passage is supplemented by 21 5, giving to the Levites judicial rights, and 24 8 assigning to them the duty of teaching the leprous regulations. In Lev 27 together with 32 30 (E), 'they gave to Jacob and the law to Israel: they shall put incense in thy nostrils and whole burnt-offering on thine altar,' these passages complete the provisions of P in giving to the Levites an occupation on place of the daily burnt offering.
when the Israelites were no longer massed together in a single camp, but scattered over the country. We shall see in the next section that this view of the meaning of the Law was taken by every writer of the second part of the Canon who touched on Levitical matters. Everywhere we are confronted with the legitimacy of a Levitical priesthood; nowhere is there any mention of an exclusive Aaronic right. Smaller points which cannot be discussed here are examined in PS. It only remains to notice that the LXX fully explains the frequent Deuteronomic locution, "the priests the Levites." One other remark must be made. Though it is not expressly stated, we may assume that consecration would be necessary in the case of any Levite acting on the provisions of Josh 18:16-18. And was not mentioned because in Heb antiquity it went without saying that every priest must be consecrated (cf Jgs 17).

IV. From Moses to Malachi.—Josh adds but little to our information. In 18 7 the priesthood is called the inheritance of the Levites, and it is singular that the Wellhausen sources do not redact, though such a writer as Josiah might be jealous Prof. Pritchard withheld the priesthood from the Levites. It is very interesting to find that in Josh 3, 4, all the different critical documents speak in exactly the same terms of the priests that bear the ark. The priestly writer, as we shall see, on the Wellhausen theory, to have said "the Levites." The expression "the priests the Levites" is found alternating with the expression "the priests." All this points to the construction put upon these phrases by the preceding section, and finds fresh confirmation in Jgs, where we see Micah rejoicing at having a Levite as a priest (17 13), thus showing that the sacred character of the tribe was recognized in the earliest periods of Moses. The lay sacrifice in this and the following books are explained under SACRIFICE (q.v.).

The period of the early kings shows us kings blessing the people (e.g. 2 5 6 18). It is claimed that this is the priestly blessing, but without evidence of which we have no more reason to see special priestly rights here than in David's blessing his household (2 5 20), or the frequent blessings of the Bible (e.g. Gen 49:12, esp. "in thee will God be established"). In 49 6 the priestly blessing is read, but it seems that we actually have the words of the blessing delivered on one of these occasions by Solomon, and it is quite unlike the blessing of the priests (Nu 6 22 ff).

Textual criticism disposes of the supposed priesthood of certain non-Levitical persons. In 2 S 18 the MT makes David's sons "priests," but this reading was unknown to the LXX, Symmachus and Theodotion (Field, ad loc.). The LXX has "ushers," i.e. chamberlains. That this represents a different Hebrew word is proved by the Septuagint text of 2 K 24 6 (not in extant in Heb), where we read that Benoah, son of Jehohada, was "over the armoury and over the brick-making." It cannot be suggested that this represents an original Heb "over the priesthood and over the brick-making" if we must exclude the existence of some secular court office which was rendered by this Gr phrase. Hoffig and Cheyne conjecture that "priest in the temple" should be read for "ushers; kohanim. This word gives the sense required (see 1sa 22 15, RV "steward"). In 1 20 26 we read that the priest "of the side that was set forward by lot of the sanctuary" was a priest and the SYR supported by Lucian and 23 reads עמד, ha-malakh ("the man that stood forward") In 1 K 8, Nathan's son is described as "priest friend of the king," but LXX reads only "friend of the king" (of esp. 1 Ch 23 31). And another period Nathan's son held the kindred secular office of king's counsellor (1 Ki 21 10, a task that is certainly unfavourable to the view that he ever held priestly office). There can therefore be no doubt that the word "priest," kohanim, has arisen through diglossy of the preceding word "ushers, kohanim, Nathan.

Various dealings with the ark in the age of Samuel require notice. As a boy Samuel himself is given into the service of Eli. It has been argued that he really officiated as a priest, though probably not (if the Chronicler's data are sound) of Levitical descent. The answer is to be found in his age. Weaning sometimes took place at as late an age as three, and accordingly the boy may have been as much as four years old when he was taken to Shiloh (1 S 1 24). That we do not mind him used the cloak (1 S 2 19) every year, and this notice also shows his extreme youth. In view of this it cannot seriously be contended that he performed any priestly service. He must have been a sort of page, and he performed some duties as the door-keeper of the temple of the years at Shiloh (1 S 3 15).

(1) The custody of the ark.—When the ark was captured by the Philistines, it was in the charge of priests. When David brought it to Jerusalem, it was again placed in priestly custody, but there is an interregnum of some 20 years (1 S 7 2).

It must be remembered that whatever may have happened during this period of great national confusion, the possession of all records of history and the ark for 700 years, is uniform and would far outweigh any irregularities during so short and troubled a period.

(6) On the Levites.' The difficulty arises on 1 S 6 14 15. In the second of these verses the Levites come up after the ark was lost. It is finished, and, in Wellhausen's words, "proceeded as if nothing had happened, lift the ark from the now no longer existing cart, and set it up again. If the sacrifice is already burning" (Prolegomena, 125). It is therefore suggested that ver 13 is a gloss. But there is difficulty in ver 14 which tells of the breaking up of the cart, etc., without explaining what happened to the ark. The trouble was not met by a change, but by a gloss: "’Aa And the cart came into the field, . . . . and stood there, there was a great stone: 14b and the Levites took down the cart, etc., and put them on the great stone: 14c and clave the wood of the cart,' etc., followed by 15a This makes perfect sense.

(5) In Abinadab's house.—The second difficulty is made by 1 S 6 20, where we read that the ark was brought to the house of Abinadab and Eleazar his son they sanctified to guard it'. Its old abode, the house at Shiloh, had apparently been destroyed (Jer 7 12 14, 26 6 9). There it enjoyed considerable importance, for Pools is unquestionably right in identifying the Gilbeah of God (1 S 10 6) with the Gilbeah (hill of the ark, thus there was a high place there and a Philist garrison over 1 S 13 3, where LXX and TS have "Gilbeah"). There remains the difficulty caused by the guardianship of Eleazar. Pools may be right in reading "כָּהָנִים", we 'eth דָּקַד, "and Eleazar his son," but in the entire absence of information, alike as to Eleazar as to Eleazar's son, 1 K 24 6 8 nothing can be said to be definite. The narratives of the slaughter among the Beth-shemith and the fate of Uzzah make it certain that the temple's custody could not be separated from its respectful distance from it. When David took the end of this period removed the ark, it was first taken in a cart. This proved fatal to Uzzah, and the ark was deposited in the house of Obed-edom the Gittite. The text of 8 knows nothing of any guardianship of the ark by Obed-edom. Probably he took very good care not to run near it in view of Uzzah's fate. Then it was transported to Jerusalem by bearers (2 S 6 13)—presumably of Levitical descent. No further irregularities are to be found.

More important is the change of priesthood; 1 S 2 27 36 clearly threatens Eli, whose house had been chosen in Egypt, with a transference of the high-priesthood to another line. Careful comparison with 1 K 2 27 makes it certain that the prophecy was fulfilled when Zadok was placed by Solomon in the place of Abiathar. Who was Zadok? According to Ch (1 Ch 6 5 33; 24 3; 27 17) he was descended from Aaron through Eleazar, and this is accepted by Orr, Van Hoozacker and many others, who take him as having a priestly sense. According to Ezek he was a Levite (40 46; 44 19), and it is noteworthy that throughout the prophetic books we always hear of the Levitical priesthood, not the Aaronic (see esp. 1 K 12 31; Jer 33 18 22; Mal 2), and the "father's house" of 1 S 2 27 36 that was chosen in Egypt could only be the house of Aaron, not of Ithamar, if the passage is to be taken in its natural sense. On this view Zadok's appointment could only have fulfilled the prophecy if it terminated the Aaronic succession. It would seem therefore that the high-priesthood was transferred to a family of non-Aaronic Levites. For the alternative view see Zadok.

The prophet's speech in 1 S 2 27-36 is also important for the light it throws on the organization of the priesthood. The high priest has in his gift a number of priestly offices with pecuniary and other rewards. This postulates a far more advanced hierarchy than that of P.

The reference to "the priests and the Levites" in 1 K 8 4 was unknown to the LXX, but in other passages the Books of K show further advances in hierarchical organization. There is not merely the high priest—generally like Aaron in P called "the priest," but sometimes the high priest—but also the second priest (2 K 25 18; Jer 52 24; 2 K 23 4, according to the Tg), three keepers of the threshold (sbi supra, and 2 K 12 10) and "elders of the priests" (2 Ch 13 11; "elders" or "chiefs" of the Levites, perhaps also Jer 19 1). See also Jer 20 1 f.; 29 26 for priestly organization and jurisdiction in the temple precincts. All this contrasts strikingly with the simplicity of the Pentateuchal organization.

Ezekiel is entirely in line with the other sources for the period: he seeks to institute certain reforms. He writes, "Her priests 2. Ezekiel have done violence to my law, and have profaned my holy things: they have made no distinction between the holy and the common, neither have they caused men to discern between the unclean and the clean," etc (Ezk 22 26). If these words have any meaning they signify that he was acquainted with a law which followed the very words of Lev 10 and other passages of P, and was intended to reach the people through the teaching of the priests. In chs 40-48, there is a vision of the future which stands in the closest relation to the Pent. Three views have been held of this. The old view was that Ezek could not be reconciled with the Pent at all, and that the difficulties presented were insoluble. Wellhausen and his followers maintain that the prophet is prior to P, and here introduces the distinction between priests and Levites for the first time. The thing shown is that Ezekiel was familiar with P and drew from it the inspiration to make a fresh division among the Levites, giving the sons of Zadok a position similar to that occupied by the sons of Aaron in the wilderness period, and reenacting with slight modifications the legislation applicable to the sons of Aaron, this time applying it to the sons of Zadok. The crucial passage is 44 6-16, from which it clearly appears that in Solomon's temple aliens had performed sundry tasks that should have been performed by men of holy persons, and that Ezekiel proposes to degrade Levites who are not descended from Zadok to perform such tasks in the future as a punishment for their misdirections to idols in high places. Either of the two latter views would explain the close connection that evidently exists between the concluding chapters of Ezek and P, and, accordingly, in choosing between them, the reader must consider four main points: (1) Is P shown on the internal evidence to be early or late? Is it desert legislation, or is it accurately restored to its point at which it has already been discussed in part and is further treated in Pentateuch (q.v.)? (2) Is the theory of the late composition of P psychologically and morally probable? On this see Pentateuch and POT, 292-99. (3) Is there any evidence of the existence of institutions of P that are held by Wellhausen and his followers to be late—e.g. more national offerings than the rituals allow? On this see EPC, 200 ff., and passim; POT, 305-15, and passim; SBL and OP passim, and art. Pentateuch. (4) Does Ezekiel himself show acquaintance with P (e.g. in 22 26), or not? On this see SBL, 96; PS, 291 f.

With regard to the non-mention of the high-priesthood and certain other institutions in Ezekiel's vision, the natural explanation is that in the case of these the prophet did not desire to institute any changes. It is to be noted that Ezekiel does not codify and consolidate all existing law. On the contrary, he is rather supplementing and reforming it. In his temple the prince is to provide the statutory national offerings (45 17), i.e. those of Nu 28, 29. Apparently the king had provided these earlier (2 K 15 13). But in addition to these there has grown up a "king's offering," and it is probably to this only that 45 22 ff.; 46 2-15 relate. In 46 13 LXX, Syr, Vulg, and some Heb MSS preserve the reading 'he' for "thou." V. Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles.—Whatever theodian view, there is general agreement that in these books a distinction between priests and Levites is established (see e.g. Neh 10 37 f.; 12 1 f). We also find singers and porters (Neh 13 6, etc), Nethinim and the sons of Solomon's servants (Ex 28 7 f.; 29 20; 31 3, etc). It must not be assumed that these classes were new. The story of the Gibeonites (Josh 9) gives us the origin of some of these grades, and the non-mention of them in many of the earlier books is easily explained by the character of those books. We know from such passages as Am 5 23 that there were musical services in far earlier times (e.g Neh 12 42).

Ch presents an account of the earlier history of the priests and Levites that does not tally with the older sources. Many modern writers think that the author's views of the past were colored by the circumstances of his own day, and that he had a tendency to carry back later conditions to an earlier period. On the other hand it is impossible to deny fairly that he used some sources which have not been preserved to us elsewhere. Again, there is good evidence to show that his work is by no means that of a single hand, but seems to have been taken for history and would not have been so regarded by his contemporaries. Talmudic authorities held some such view as this. The historical value of his work has yet to be appraised in more critical and impartial spirit than is possible in any of the current discussions. For the present purpose it is only possible to notice the effect of some of his statements, if interpreted literally. As there are passages where he has clearly substituted Levites for the less holy personages of the older sources (contrast e.g. 2 K 11 4-12 with 2 Ch 23 1-11), it may be that Levites have also been substituted by him for other persons in notices of which no other version has survived.

2. His Data vites were divided into courses (1 Ch 25 6) and were rendered liable to service from the age of twenty by his enactment (ver 27). There were also 24 courses or divisions of priests, 16 of the sons of Eleazar and 8 of the sons of Ithamar (ch 24). The courses were divided by lot. In Neh 12 1-7 we read of "chiefs of the priests," but these are only 22 in number, while the number of priests is 281 in the version of John (ver 30). But not much importance can be attached to such lists, as names could easily fall out in transmission. According to 1 Ch 9 26 the four chief porters were Levites, and Levibred were also over the things baked in pans and the shewbread (vs 31 f.). This of course is not in accordance with the Law, but is found elsewhere in Ch. In 1 Ch 23 the Levites from 30 years of age and upward, of whom 21,000 oversee the work of the house of the Lord, 6,000 were officers and judges, 4,000 were doorkeepers and 4,000 were musicians. David altered the age of beginning service to 20, and an account of their functions is given in 1 Ch 23:27-32 (see, further, Music). All these arrangements were confirmed and enforced by Solomon (2 Ch 8:14 ff). There is often uncertainty as to whether the Chronicler identifies priests and Levites in particular cases or not, e.g. in 2 Ch 30.27, "the priests the Levites" bless the people according to the ordinary text, but many authorities read "the priests and the Levites." Hezekiah appears to have undertaken some reorganization (2 Ch 29-31), but the details are not clear. Jehoshaphat established in Jerus a court composed partly of Levites and priests (19:8-11). Previously he had sent priests and Levites and others to teach the Law in Judah (ch. 17). In 29:34 it is clearly the duty of the priests to flank burnt offerings (Lev 1). It is impossible to draw any consistent picture from the Chronicler because he gives different data for different periods; it is doubtful whether he meant his statements to be taken as historical, e.g. in 1 Ch 26 we find Levites whose names (= "I have dedicated") are really words forming part of a prayer, and it is difficult to believe that either the Chronicler or his public intended this chapter to be interpreted in any but a spiritual sense (see Ps 284-56).

In Ezra 2:40 the number of Levites who returned with Zerubbabel is given as 71, against 973 priests (ver 36), 128 singes (ver 41), 139 children of the porters (ver 42), 392 Nethinim and children of Solomon's servants (ver 58), and the figures are the same in Neh 7, except that there the singers number 148 (ver 44) and the porters 138 (ver 45). When Ezra went up, he was at first joined by no Levites (8:15), but subsequently gathered 38 Levites and 220 Nethinim (vs 18-20). We get glimpses of the organization in Neh 12:44-47 and 13:10 ff. It appears that in this period genealogies were carefully scrutinized in the case of doubtful claims to priestly descent (Ezr 2:61 ff; Neh 7:60 ff). In Ezra 6:19 ff the Levites are represented as killing the Gibeonites.

Of these books no satisfactory account can be given in the present state of textual criticism and Bib. science generally. Some writers, e.g., hold that the Chronicler had before him a source to which the Levites were entirely unknown, others that he invented freely, again others that he reproduces trustworthy preexisting information. The student has only an assortment of theories from which to choose. The bedrock fact is that the stories reflect the beliefs of their natural meaning, convey an entirely different impression from the statements of the earlier books construed similarly. Modern research has not yet been seriously addressed to the question whether all the statements were really intended to be interpreted as mere history.

VI. Legal Provisions.—Aaron and his sons underwent consecration to fit them for their duties. Ex 28 ff prescribes their garments and consecration (see DRESS; BREASTPLATE; EMBROIDERY; ROBE; COAT; MITRE; GIRDLE; URIM AND THUMMIM), and the account of the latter may be read in Lev 8 f. In individual sacrifices brought to the religious capital the priests performed the part of the ritual which related to the altar (sprinkling, burning, etc) (Lev 1:1-17). A priestly function was the duty of teaching the people the law of God (Lev 10:11; 14:54-57; Dt 24:8; 33:10; cf Ezk 44:23; Hos 4:1-6; Hag 2:11 ff, and many passages in the Prophets). The priests were subject to special laws designed to keep their purity (Lev 21 f.; cf Ezk 44). The rules aim at preventing defilement through mourning (save in the case of ordinary priests for a near relation) and at preventing those who were physically unfitness from performing certain functions, and who were for any reason unclean from approaching the holy things. See further STRANGER. They performed several semi-judicial functions (Nu 5:5 ff). etc; see JUDGE. They also blessed the people (Nu 6:25; cf Dt 10:8, etc.) See Blessing. PRIMOGENITURE, pri-mó-jen-tür (Gr. πρότοκος, prótokos). The right of the firstborn to inherit the headship of the family, carrying with it certain property rights and usually such titles as those of the high-priesthood or kingship. The writings of the Hebrews take for granted the recognition of a doctrine of primogeniture from the earliest times. In the most ancient genealogies a distinction is drawn between the firstborn and the other sons (Gen 10:15; 22:21; 25:13; 35:23; 36:15). In the bestowal of parental blessings in patriarchal times great importance was attached to preferring the firstborn (Gen 25:31; 27:29; 48:15; 49:3). The feud between Jacob and Esau (Gen 27:1-28:21) grew out of the stealing of the firstborn's blessing by the younger brother. Joseph was displeased when, in his blessing, Jacob seemed to prefer Ephraim to Manasseh, his other son. The father in such cases seems to have had the right to transfer the birthright from one son to another, from the days of Abraham in the case of Ishmael and Isaac, through those of Jacob in the matter of Reuben and Joseph and in the matter of Ephraim and Manasseh, down to the days of David in the selection of a successor to the kingship. Nevertheless the Mosaic code, which declared (rather than enacted) the law of primogeniture, prohibited the abuse of this parental privilege in the case of a younger son by a favorite wife (Dt 21:16 f). The manner of acknowledging the firstborn incidentally referred to in Dt is "by giving him a double portion of all that he hath" (Dt 21:17), that is to say, double the share Double of each of the other brothers. Jewish Portion tradition (Brkho, 46a, 47b, 61a, 51b; Ballah' Bathah' 122a, 122b, 123a, 124a, 142b) accepts and elaborates on this right of the firstborn son. Thus, it applies to the paternal and not the eldest surviving son; it does not apply to daughters; it has reference only to the paternal estate and not to the inheritance left by a mother or other relative, nor to improvements or acquisitions made to an estate after the death of the father.
The object of the doctrine may be that the eldest son might be enabled to preside over the affairs of family with proper dignity, or that he might assume additional responsibilities such as this sort of unnatural care of his younger sisters. Hence one’s birthright could be waived or sold (Gen 25:31).

On the other hand it may be based in the ultimate analysis on the primitive feeling of favoritism for the firstborn reflected in the disappointment of Jacob, when he speaks of Reuben as his firstborn, his mind, and the beginning of his strength (כָּחֲלָה הַנַּע, Gen 49:3; cf. Deut 21:17). This theory would be in accord with the right of the parent to transfer the right to a younger son. The suggestion of favoritism conveyed by the Heb בְּקָהוֹר is manifested in its figurative use of: Israel (Ex 4:22), of Ephraim (Jer 31:9), of one dearly beloved (Zec 12:10); (cf. figurative usage in the NT; Rom 8:29; He 12:23; 1:6; Rev 1:5).

Light is thrown on the attitude of the ancient world toward the firstborn, and hence on the history of primogeniture, by the language used in connection with the plague of the firstborn: “from the first-born of Pharaoh’s house even unto the first-born of the maid-servant that is behind the mill” or “the captive that was in the dungeon.”

Apparent no more dreadful catastrophe for a class of society could be thought of than this slaying of the firstborn (Ex 11:5; 12:29). The misguided fervor of the ancient Semites who offered their firstborn as the thing most dearly beloved as a sacrifice to their gods must be understood in this light, whether it appears among the Moabites, the Phoenicians or the Hebrews themselves (Jer 32:35; Ezek 20:26-31; 2 Ch 28:3). It is difficult to predicate a connection between the basis of the doctrine of primogeniture and that of the Redemption of the Firstborn, other than that both are ultimately based on the importance of a firstborn son and the fondness of his parents for him. It is interesting to note, however, that the tradition of redemption and the law of primogeniture are kept so distinct that, while the latter has reference only to the firstborn of a father, the former has reference only to the firstborn of a mother (בְּקָהוֹר, viii, 1, 46a; cf. peter rehen, whatsoever openeth the womb, Ex 13:2). In a polygenrous society such as the Israelites, that is, it is natural to suppose that the distinction between paternal and maternal primogeniture would be clearly before the minds of the people. See Birthright; Firstborn.

NATHAN ISAACS

PRINCE, prinṣ: This word occurs quite frequently in our Eng. Bible, mostly in the OT. While it is never used to denote royal parentage (cf 1 Ch 29:24), it often indicates actual royal or ruling power, together with royal dignity and authority. As a rule, the name is prefixed to it and so distinguished that, while the latter has reference only to the firstborn of a father, the former has reference only to the firstborn of a mother (בְּקָהוֹר, viii, 1, 46a; cf. peter rehen, whatsoever openeth the womb, Ex 13:2). In a polygenrous society such as the Israelites, that is, it is natural to suppose that the distinction between paternal and maternal primogeniture would be clearly before the minds of the people. See Birthright; Firstborn.

In Mt 2:6 the word rendered “princes” might be tr in “princely cities”; at least, this seems to be implied. Here the term is rendered הָגִים, הָגִים, “leader,” “ruler,” “prince,” is used, undoubtedly to hint at the fact that Bethlehem was the native city of a great prince. In the other NT passages the word ἀρχήν, ἀρχήν, “a potentate,” “a person in authority,” “a magistrate,” often with some additional attribute, is used. 11:9 12:24; 20:25 [RV “ruler”]: Mk 3:22; Jn 12:31; 14:30; 16:11; 1 Cor 2:6.8 AV; Eph 2:2; Rev 1:5 [RV “ruler”]. In most of these instances the term “prince” refers to the devil.

In Acts 5:15; 5:31, the word ἀρχήν, ἀρχήν, “leader,” is employed referring to Christ as the author of life and salvation (cf He 12:2, where the term ἀρχής is rendered “author” [RV] or “captain” [RVm]).

The OT contains a number of different words mostly rendered “prince” or “princes” in the KJV. (1)נָר, nari: In Josh 5:14 the mysterious armed stranger seen by Joshua near Jericho calls himself the “prince of the host of Jeh”; a high military title applied to a superhuman being. In Isa 9:6, the name is given to the child representing the future Messiah. The term “Prince of Peace” denotes the eminent position and the peacefounder of the Messianic king: the highest human title in its most ideal sense. Dn 8:11: here, again, as in Josh 5:14, occurs the phrase “prince of the host.” In Dn 8:25 “the prince of princes” refers to God Himself: the highest human title in its absolute sense applied to God. Dn 10:21: “Michael your prince.” Michael the archangel is here called the prince of the Jewish people. He is the prince representative of God’s people in the sight of God, a royal title suggesting high power and alliance with God in the divine struggle with evil. Dn 12:2: “the prince of Persia” (cf ver 20, “the prince of Persia,” “the prince of Greece”), the expression is used in the same general sense as in Dn 10:21. Each individual nation is represented as guided by a spiritual being that may or may not be an ally of God in His combat with the devil. In the majority of cases, though, the term sar is applied (a) to men exercising royal or ruling power; Prov 8:16: “By me princes [in or “rulers”] rule”; Isa 32:1: “Behold, a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in justice.” Judicial power is included (cf Ex 2:14: “Who made thee a prince and a judge over us?” and Ps 148:11: “princes and all judges of the earth”). In some passages the word sar, having been rendered “prince,” stands for “chief” (cf Jgs 8:14; 1 S 29:4; 2 S 10:3, etc). (b) To royal officers of a high rank: Gen 12:15: “the princes of Pharaoh” (cf 2 K 24:14: “Jerus and all the princes of the land”) 1 Ch 29:29; Jer 36:21; 52:10; Hos 5:10, etc. “Ambassadors” (Jer 36:14): “governors” (1 K 20:14: “By the young men [in or, servants]” of the princes of the provinces); cf Est 3:14, the seven princes”); “the chief of the eunuchs” (Dn 6:3, the chief eunuch), “priest” (Jer 51:59): “Seraiah was chief chamberlain” (in or, quartermaster). AV renders it “a quiet prince,” i.e. a prince having rest, instead of procuring rest (םָנָשַׁי לֵו, sar me’alakh, “a sar of rest”). In post-exilic times: Ezr 9:1: “The princes drew near unto me.” They were the political leaders of the people (cf Isr 1:23: “the princes and the elders”); Neh 9:38: “our princes, our Levites, and our priests”; Neh 11:1: “the princes of the people dwelt in Jerusalem”; Neh 13:31: “the princes of Judah.” Of course, they were all subject to the authority of the high priests. (c) To the priesthood: 1 Ch 24:5: “princes of the sanctuary, and princes of God” (cf Isa 43:28). (d) On account of great achievements: 2 S 3:38: “know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?”—an honorary title generally speaking, a prince is a wealthy man (cf Job 34:19: “That respecteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor”), and he is a prominent man embodying true, although mortal, manhood (of Ps 82:7: “Nevertheless ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes).
(2) נָאָשׁ, nāsh: usually derived from נָאשּׁ, nāš, "to lift," hence "exalted"; otherwise: a "speaker."
(a) An honorary title (cf Gen 23:6: "Thou art a prince of God among us."). The distinction is conferred upon Abraham by the children of Heth.
(b) A name given to the heads of the Israelitic tribes, from which they held the title "prince," e.g.: "the prince of the fathers' house of the Gershonites" (cf vs 30. 35); 3:32: "Eleazar . . . shall be prince of the prince of the Levites, and have the oversight of them that keep the charge of the sanctuary"; Nu 4:14: "the prince of the congregation. They are to be identical with the "rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens" (cf Ex 18:21; Nu 16:2). 7:2: "the princes of Israel, the heads of their fathers' houses, and the princes of the tribes" (cf 17:26; 34:18; Josh 22:41; 1 Ch 4:38).
(c) Equivalent to chief or king: Gen 17:20: "Twelve princes shall he beget" (cf 15:16); Gen 34:2: "Shechem the son of Hamor the Hivite, the prince of the land". Nu 25:15: "Cain, the daughter of the prince of Midian" (cf Josh 13:21); 1 K 11:34: "I will make him prince all the days of his life." This was said of Solomon, which shows the term equivalent to king. Of special note is the use of the word nāsh in Ezek. The name is given to the Jewish king (cf 12:10: "This burden concerneth the prince in Judah"). Then, again, it is applied to the future theocratic king (cf 34:24; 37:25, etc., and esp. chs 45, 46). It is also used of foreign potentates and high officers (cf 25:16: "the prince of the sea"; 28:2: "the prince of Tyre"); 30:13: "a prince from the land of Egypt"); 32:29: "Edom, her kings and all her princes and, likewise, of high Jewish officers (51:12)." (d) A title bestowed upon Shebah-bazzar (Est 1:8).
(3) נָזִי, nāziḥ: 1 S 2:8: "To make them sit with princes" (cf Ps 113:8). The original meaning of the term is willing or obliging; then generous ("liberal"); cf Prov 19:6: "Many will entreat the favor of the liberal man"; yet, it might safely be rendered here "prince" (mil) or noble-minded; a gentleman, a nobleman, a person of rank, a prince. Job 13:21: "He poureth contempt upon princes" (cf Ps 107:40); Job 21:28: "Where is the house of the prince? whose dwelling is in the north where the wicked dwell?" The context here suggests the thought of a wicked prince, a tyrant. Ps 47:9: "The princes of the peoples are gathered together" (cf Ps 115:9; 146:3; Prov 17:7; 25:7; Cant 7:1).
(4) נָאָשׁ, nāsh: According to Gesenius, this term may be either a high-minded person (cf the preceding word, nāziḥ) or a speaker, a spokesman; then, a prince, a king. 1 S 13:14: "Jeh hath appointed him to be prince of his people" (cf 2 S 5:2). "Thou shalt be prince (RVA "leader") over Israel"; 6:21; 7:8; 1 K 1:35; 14:7; 16:2; Job 29:9; 31:37; Ps 76:12; Prov 28:16; Ezek 23:2: "prince of Tyre"); Dn 9:25: "the anointed one, the prince," AV the "Messiah the Prince"); Dn 9:26: "the prince that shall come"); the Roman emperor?); 11:29: "the prince of the covenant" (either a high priest or some Egyptian king, Ptolemaeus Philometor?).
(5), (6) נָזִי, nāziḥ, and נָאָשׁ, nāsh, "a high official," "a prince," usually associated with the word "king" or "judge." Prov 14:28: "In the multitude of people is the king's glory; but in the want of people is the destruction of the prince." (nāziḥ); 2 S 5:3: "Hear, O ye kings; give ear, O ye princes (nāziḥim); Prov 8:15: "By me kings reign, and princes (nāziḥim) decree justice." (cf 31:4; Hab 1:10; Isa 40:25: "that bringeth perdition upon nothing; that maketh the judgements of the earth as vanity."

(7) נָאָשׁ, nāsh, derived from נָאָס, nāš, "to install a king" (cf Ps 2:6); hence a prince: Josh 13:21: "the princes of Sihon" (cf Ps 83:11); Ezek 32:30: "the princes of the north"); Mic 5:5: RV "princely men." RVA "princes among men"); Dn 11:8: RV "molten images," RVA "princes.

(8) נָאָשׁ, nāsh: "a judge," "a military leader," "a prince"); Dn 11:18: "A prince [RV 'prince' (captain') shall cause the reproach . . . to cease" (probably a Rom consul; a Rom general).

(9) נָאָשׁ, nāsh: "shall cause the reproach . . . to cease" (probably a Rom consul; a Rom general).

(10) נָאָשׁ, nāsh: "a judge," "a military leader," "a prince"); Dn 11:18: "A prince [RV 'prince' (captain') shall cause the reproach . . . to cease" (probably a Rom consul; a Rom general).

PRINCES, prin'zes, eiz, THE SEVEN. See Prince, (1), (6).

PRINCESS, prin'ses: The Heb term is נָאָשׁ, nāshār (of src, prince, and "Sarah"); it means (1) a queen (Isa 49:23, AV and RV both "queen"); (2) the consort of a king contrasted with his concubines (1 K 11:3, "He had seven hundred wives, princes, and three hundred concubines"); (3) the wife of a prince (Est 1:18: "the "princesses of Persia and Media"); (4) it is metaphorically used of the city of Jerusalem (Jer 1:1).

PRINCIPAL, prin'si-pal: Appears in AV as a tr of nine Heb words (fewer in RV), in one case (Isa 28:25) being used quite wrongly and in 2 K 25:19 (Jer 52:25): 1 Ch 24:31 gives a wrong sense (all corrected in RV). In 1 K 4:5, "prince of officers" (AV "chief minister") is an arbitrary tr of קְלִיָּן to avoid "priest" (so ERV; cf 2 S 18:18).

PRINCIPALITY, prin'si-pal'i-ti: In the OT the word occurs but once (Jer 18:18: "principalities shall come down"). Here AVN "head tires" is properly preferred by RV for נָאָשׁ, נָאָשׁ, נָאָשׁ "hands, head, chief"

In the NT "principality" occurs for ἄρχων,ARCHê, "rule," generally in the pl., referring (a) to men in authority (Tit 3:1, "Put them in mind to subject [AV, 'in submission,' RV] to principalities [AV, rulers,' RV], and powers [AV: 'to authorities,' RV]); (b) to superhuman agencies, angelic or demonic (Rom 8:38; Eph 3:10; 6:12; Col 1:16; 2:10,15). Paul was keenly sensible of the dualism of mind and body and of the law in his members warring against the law of his mind (Rom 7:23), and of the temporary victory of the evil, residing in the flesh, over the good of the spirit (vs 14ff). This dualism was objectified in Zoroastrianism, and among the Babylonians the several heavenly bodies were regarded as ruled by spirits, some good, some evil. The same belief, appropriated by the Jews during the captivity, appears also in Gr thought, as e.g. in Plato and later in the Stoics. The higher spheres, which hold the even tenor of their way, were in general regarded as ruled by good spirits: but the sublunary sphere to which the earth belongs, ill-regulated motions prevail, which must be due to evil spirits. The perversities of human conduct, in particular, thwarting, as was thought, the simple, intelligible Divine plan, were held to be subject to rebellious powers offering de-PRINCIPIES, prin'si-plé: Found twice (He 5 12; 6 1). The Gr word στοιχεῖον, στοιχεῖα is also τέρας in AV as "elements" and "rudiments." As rendered in Hebrew, its meaning is clearly related to the elementary knowledge of Christian truth or doctrine. See Elements; Rudiments.

PRINT, print, PRINTING, prin'ting, PRINTED, prin'ted: Printing is the art of multiplying records—the "art of writing with many pens" (Jew Enc, XI, 295), or wholesale writing.

The art of making original records is writing. This, however, is a slow process. It involves tracing each letter and part of a letter through from beginning to end by the moving point of chisel, pen, or other instrument, and this process must be repeated with every copy. As soon, therefore, as occasion arose for frequently repeating the record, man develed the labor of forming each symbol separately. All these ways involve making a character or a series of characters on a single surface and transferring as a whole to another surface. Neither "pressure," as some say, nor "ink," as others, is essential to the process, for printing from a photographic negative takes no pressure, and printing for the blind takes no ink. Any process which transfers a whole surface is printing.

The earliest use of printing seems to have been for painting the face or body with ownership, tribal, trophy, or ceremonial marks for worship, war, mourning, etc. This paint might be temporary or pricked in by the tattoo process. Tattooing itself is rather a writing than a printing process, but may be distinguished according as the color is laid on by drawing or by the "pintadera." The "pintadera" or "stamp used to impress patterns upon the skin" is best known from the Mexican and South American examples, but in recent years it has been found in depots all over the Neolithic region (southern Italy, Austria, Hungary, Mycenae, Crete, Egypt) and in Borneo at least. Many of these specimens are from the Neolithic or Copper Age. Both in South America and in Neolithic Liguria, some of these stamps were cylindrical and "were used like a printer's roller" (Moses, The Dawn of Mediterranean Civilization, 254-61, with many illustrations, and Frobenius, Childhood of Man, fig. 31, "Dayak block for painting the body").

The invention of wove paper (Heb 19 28) is a tool ("print") is commonly, and probably rightly, in view of the Heb word, supposed to refer to the permanent marks of tattooing which may or may not have been made by this printing process. Job 13 27 AV, which speaks of printing upon the head or sole of the feet, has been quite widely in AV, and, if the idea is one of printing at all, it refers rather to branding than stamping with color.

The use of the inkhorn in setting the mark upon the forehead (Ex 9 4-6) certainly points to marking with color rather than branding. See Inhorn. This may, of course, have been drawing rather than printing, but, on the other hand, the sealing of the servants of God on their foreheads (Rev 7 4; 9 4) necessarily means printing rather than drawing, and probably printing rather than branding, for the use of the seal with color had long been common. The marks of the beast upon the forehead and upon the hand in Rev 13, 14, 16, 19 and 20, more likely refer to branding, as the Gr word pointed to labeling or marking rather than stamping. The stigmata of Gal 6 17 may also point to branding. Branding was at all events also a common method of printing characters on the flesh in Bib. times (Isa 3 24: perhaps Ex 21 25: a branding on the forehead, CH § 120; branding of a slave §§ 229, 232). The reference in Jn 20 25 is, of course, to the clearly visible marks or scars left by the nails in the hands. See Mark.

The use of seals is a true printing process, whether they are used with color, as they were both in Crete and Egypt almost from the beginning of history, or impressed on clay, wax, or other plastic substances. Mention of seals is frequent in the Bible (see Seal). A new interest has been given to this aspect of the matter by the sealings discovered in Ahab's palace and other excavations throughout Pal, which are forming one of the most useful classes of modern inscriptions.

Both stamp and seal were used throughout the Middle Ages, last in the latter abundantly, and the stamp at least occasionally, for stamping the capital letters in Bibh. and other MSS, as well as for various other purposes.

Modern printing begins with the carving of whole pages and books on blocks of wood (xylography), or metal plates for printing (chalcography). This method was quite early practised by the Chinese, and began to be common in Europe in the early 15th cent., most of the books printed by it having to do with Bibh. topics (Biblia pauperum, etc.).

It was only with the invention of movable type about the middle of the 15th cent. that the multiplying of books by writing began to come to an end. The printing with movable type is also closely associated with Bibh. study, the Gutenberg Psalter and the Gutenberg Bible standing with most for the very beginning of modern printing.

For the printed edd. of the Heb and Gr originals, and the various VSS, see arts. on TEXTUAL CRITICISM and allied topics in this encyclopedia, with their literature. The art, on "Typography" in Jew Enc is of unusual excellence, and the general literature of printing given in Enc Bril, at the end of the first part of the art, on "Typography," is full and good. Compare also Books on Engraving and Print-Making, esp. Hortzschansky, supplementing the bibliography of Enc Brit.

The earliest occurrence of the word “prison” in AV is found in the narrative of Joseph’s life in Egypt (J). The term used, viz. sōbar, means perhaps “round house” or “tower.” It seems probable that among the Hebrews there were no special buildings erected as “jails” in the pre-monarchical period, and perhaps not before the post-exilic period, when the adoption of the civic institutions and customs of surrounding nations prevailed. In Egypt and Assyria, on the contrary, there were regular public buildings corresponding to our modern jails. Among the Hebrews, rooms in connection with the royal palace or the residence of prominent court officials would be used for the purpose.

According to one narrative (J) in Gen, the prison in which Joseph was confined had a “keeper,” while according to another narrative (E) 3. Joseph, the offending members of the royal house, viz. the royal butler and the royal baker, were placed “in ward” with the “captain of the guard,” in charge, i.e. in some part of the royal palace. This is still more probable if, instead of “captain of the guard,” we should translate “chief of the cooks,” i.e. superintendent of the royal kitchen.

It was often necessary to restrict the liberty of individuals who for various causes were a menace to those in authority, without inflicting any corporal punishment, e.g. Joseph’s brethren were kept “in ward” three days (Gen 37 22); Scripture was forbidden to pass beyond the boundary of Judas (1 K 2 36); the person who caught gathering sticks on the Sabbath was put “in ward” pending his trial (Nu 15 34). In the monarchical period, prisoners were to be tried by a public judge, e.g. Micaiah by Ahab (1 K 22 27), Hanani by Asa (2 Ch 16 10). Hoshea, after his abortive effort to institute an alliance with So or Seve, king of Egypt, was shut up in prison by Shalmaneser (2 K 17 4); cf also 2 K 25 27 (Jehoiachin in Babylon); Jer 52 11 (Zedekiah in Babylon).

The Book of Jer throws considerable light on the prison system of Judas in the later monarchical period. The prophet was put “in ward” that were in the upper gate of Benjamin, which was in the house of Jehoiakim (20 2). Mere imprisonment was not adequate punishment for the prophet’s announcement of Judah’s doom; it was necessary to have recourse to the pillar. During the siege of Jerus Jeremiah was confined in the “court of the guard, which was in the king of Judah’s house” (32 2, etc.). The “court of the guard” was evidently the quarters of the sentries who guarded the royal palace. According to the narrative of 37, the prophet was arrested on a charge of treachery and put in prison “in the house of Jonathan the scribe” (37 15). This verse does not necessarily mean that a private house was used as a prison. The words are capable of another interpretation, viz. that a building known as the “house of Jonathan the scribe” had been taken over by the authorities and converted into a jail. We read in the following verse that the house had a “dungeon” (lit. “house of the pit”) and “cabins” or “cells.”

The data are not sufficient to enable us to give any detailed description of the treatment of prisoners. This treatment varied according to the character of the offence. The Treatment which led to incarceration. Samson of Prisoners during the period of his imprisonment was compelled to remain four years in the prison (Jgs 16 21). Gridding was the occupation of women, and marked the depth of Samson’s humiliation. Dangerous persons were subjected to various kinds of physical mutilation, e.g. Samson was deprived of his sight. This was a common practice in Assyria (2 K 25 7). The thumbs and great toes of Adoniabeez were cut off to render him incapable of further resistance (Jgs 1 6).

Various forms of torture were in vogue. Hanani the seer was put into the pillory by Asa (for “in a prison house” we should render “in the stocks,” see RVm). In Jer 29 26 for “prison,” we should render “stocks” (so RV) or “pillory,” and for “stocks,” “collar” (as in RVm). AV renders a different Heb word by “stocks” in Job (13 27; 33 11). There was a special prison (1 K 22 27), as well as a prison garb (2 K 25 29).

There are other Heb words rendered “prison” (sometimes incorrectly) in AV. In Ps 142 7, the word which is translated “prison” means “torture,” and is derived from a root which denotes, for instance, the isolation of the leper (Lev 13 5 c; cf Isa 34 22; 47 7). In Isa 43 8 “oppression” not “prison” is the correct rendering, while in Isa 61 1 “opening of the eyes,” rather than “opening of the prison.” Prisoners are promised “light after darkness, gladness after gloom.”

In the NT “prison” generally occurs for the Gr word φυλακή, phulakē, which corresponds to the Heb word מַפְרִיק, mishmār, referred to 8. In the 20 to above (Mt 5 25; Mk 6 17; Lk 3 20; NT Acts 5 19; 1 Pet 3 19). In Rev 18 2, AV renders this word by two different words, viz. “hold” and “cage”; RV employs “hold” in the case of Peter and “cage” in the case of Paul and Silas (Acts 16 20). But the more common term is also found in these narratives. In Acts 12 17 “prison” renders a Gr word which means “dwelling.” In Acts 5 18 AV, “prison” is the rendering for another Gr word, viz. τίθεσις, tithēsis, “watching,” or “ward” (RV “ward”). In Acts 4 3, AV employs “hold” as the rendering for the same word. This would correspond to the modern “police station” or “lock-up.” See also Punishments.

PRISON GARMENTS. See preceding article.

PRISON, SPIRITS IN: The phrase occurs in the much-discussed passages 1 Pet 3 18–20, where the apostle, exhorting Christians to endurance under suffering for well-doing, says: “Because Christ also suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh, but made alive in the spirit; in whom also he was made and predestined unto the spirits in prison, that aforetime were disobedient, when the longsuffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, where-in, few, that is, eight souls, were saved through water." It is plain that in this context "the spirits in prison" (τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασιν, τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ ψυχίσσαι) denote the generation who were disobedient in the days of Noah, while the words "spirits" and "in prison" may refer to their present disembodied condition in a place of judgment in the unseen world (cf 2 Pet 2 4-9). The crucial point in the passage lies in what is said of Christ's preaching to these spirits in prison. The interpretation which strikes one most naturally is that Christ, put to death in the flesh, and made alive again in the spirit, went in this spiritual (disembodied) state, and preached to these spirits, who once had been disobedient, but are viewed as now passed with many of His message. This is the idea of the passage taken by the majority of modern exegetists, and it finds support in what is said in 1 Pet 4 6. "For unto this end was the gospel preached even to the dead, that they might be judged indeed according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit." On this basis is now often reared a mass of doctrine or conjecture respecting "second probation," "restoration," etc.—in part going back to patristic times—for which the passage, even so taken, affords a very narrow foundation. In this respect the passage, while important in the spiritual world; the word "made alive" does not exegetically refer to a disembodied state, but to the resurrection of Christ in the body, etc. Another line of interpretation is therefore preferred by many, who take the words "in which also he went," to refer, not to a disembodied manifestation, but to the historical preaching to the antediluvian generation through Noah while they yet lived. In favor of this view is the fact that the apostle in 1 11 regards the earlier prophetic preaching as a testifying of "the Spirit of Christ," that God's long-suffering with Noah's generation is described in Gen 6 5, which Peter has doubtless in his mind, as a striving of God's Spirit, and that in 2 5 he uses another expression, and Noah is described as "a preacher of righteousness." The passage, 1 Pet 4 6, may have the more general meaning that Christians who have died are at no disadvantage in the judgment as compared with those who shall be alive at the Parousia (cf 1 Thess 4 15-18). (For an exposition of this view, with a full account of the interpretations and literature on the subject, of Salmond's Christian Doctrine of Immortality, 4th ed, 364-87.) PRIVY, priv'ī, PRIVILY, priv'i-li: These words are obsolete in modern Eng. and are replaced by "secret," "secretly," rather than by the cognates "private," "privately." RV usually has not altered AV's use of the word, but in Ps 112 2 has substituted "in darkness" and in Jgs 9 31 uses "craftily," in "in Tormah" (see TORMAH). In Ezek 21 14, AV "entereth into their privy chambers," "privity" is a gloss, omitted in RV. In Ps 48 11 (RV "a place of darkness"; Acts 2 28) is simply "to know it; in Wind 3 4, RV has changed the phrase into "be initiated into."
Under the Republic the influence of the equestrian class was chiefly exerted in the financial transactions of the companies which farmed the variable revenues. The importance of the publicani was greatly reduced under the Empire, but the emperors maintained the loss of opportunity by intrusting them with a great variety of administrative functions. Military service as prefect or tribune was the preliminary step in the official equestrian career. The highest positions held by members of the equestrian class were called préfectures, and included the prefecture of the guard, of Egypt, of the grain-supply, of the watchmen in Rome, and of the fleet. But between these extremes the title procurator was applied generally to the functionaries whose positions were of imperial origin.

The administration of the fiscus or imperial treasury at Rome and of the finances in the imperial provinces, as well as the collection of fiscal revenues in the senatorial provinces, was in the hands of procurators. They occupied many positions which, on account of their intimate relationship with the person of the monarch, could be safely intrusted only to those whose limited prestige precluded individual ambition. (Tiedemann, Geschichte Romes, 7th ed., Part I, 132-43.) Finally, several provinces, where the conditions were unfavorable to the introduction of the ordinary administrative system and Rom public law, were governed as imperial domains by officials of the equestrian class as the emperor's representatives. In Egypt the title prefect (praefectus) was employed permanently as the appellation of the viceregal, and while the same term may have been used originally to denote the governors of this class generally, when their titular capacity was creased into the civil functions, yet the designation procurator became at an early date the term of common usage to designate them (Hirschfeld, 382).

Mauretania, Rhnetia, Noricum, Thrace, Cappadooa, Judaea and some smaller districts were all, for a time at least, governed by procurators (Tacitus Hist. i.11; Dio Cassius lvi.17).

The question concerning the original title of the ROM governors of Judaea has arisen because the NT speaks of the governor (Acts xxvi.20; 13); Acts 26:20; 26:30), which corresponds with the Latin term praesidus, which might be considered synonymous with either procurator or praefectus (Hirschfeld, 354). There is in fact some historical evidence to establish the nomenclature of the rulers of Pal before the time of Vespasian, and Hirschfeld is of the opinion that a certain passage in Tacitus (Ann. xv.44) where Pilate is called procurator is not sufficient proof in view of this writer's carelessness in details of this sort. Josephus (Ant. XX, i., 2), however, employs epístrope (procurator) for the time of Claudius, and it is convenient to follow common usage and assume that this title was current from the time of Augustus. It was evidently the intention of Augustus that membership in the equestrian class should be a necessary qualification for the procurators who were appointed to govern provinces. But Claudius appointed a freedman, Antonius Felix, brother of the famous minister of finance, Pallas, as procurator of Judaea (Suetonius Claud. xxviii; Tacitus Hist. v.9). This remained, however, an isolated instance in the annals of Pal (Hirschfeld, 380), and it is evident, moreover, that Felix was raised to equestrian rank before the governorship was conferred upon him.

The following list of the procurators of Judaea is based on Marquardt (Romische Staatsverwaltung, I, 409, 412) and Schürer (Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes, I, 455-455)

PROFANE, pró-fān' (vb. ἁμαρτάνω, ἁμαρτάνω, ἁμαρτάνω, ἁμαρτάνω, ἁμαρτάνω); From profanus, "before [i.e. outside] the temple," therefore unholy, polluted, secular, is of frequent occurrence (vb. and adj.) in both the OT and the NT. It occurs as the tr of hōl in AV only in Ezek 16:22, 26, RV "common"; 42:20; 44:23; 48:15, RV "or (common use);" as the tr of ἐλεήμονας in Lev 21:7, 14, RV "polluted;" and Ezek 21:25, where, for AV "thou profane wicked prince of Israel," RV has "thou, O deadly wounded wicked one, the prince of Israel." "To profane" (ḥāleform is seen in Lev 18:11; 19:8; Neh 13:17, 18; Ps 89:39; Isa 43:28; Ezek 22:26, etc. "Profaneness" in Jer 23:15 (חָנַעְפָד) is in ARV "ungodliness." In the NT "profane" occurs in the sense of unholy, godless, regardless of God and Divine things (1 Tim 1:5; 4:7; 6:20; 2 Tim 2:16; He 12:16), and "to profane," or violate, in Mt 12:5; Acts 24:6. The vb. is frequent in Apc in 1 Macc 1:43-46:3; 3:34; etc. also in 2 Macc 8:2; 10:5; of 2 Esd 16:5; Jdt 4:3:12; 1 Macc 1:45; 2 Macc 4:13). In numerous cases RV substitutes "profane" for other words and phrases in AV, as for "to prostitute" (Lev 19:29), "an hypocrite" (Isa 9:17), "pollute" (Nu 18:32; Ezek 7:21), etc. W. L. Walker (Dtn 7:12; Yet their lives were prolonged,” AV “A prolonging in life was given them”), “Prolong” occurs in Exch 29:5, “prolong the time” (paraleksetai); 38:14, “prolong life,” RV “maintenance of life” (emboisin); 30:22, “prolongeth his days,” RV “length of days” (makroemereusa); 37:31, RV “shall prolong” (prostathe). PROFESS, prom'is (most frequently in the OT תָּרָא, dabbah, “speaking,” “speech,” and תָּרָא, dabbah, “to speak,” also תָּרָא, ἀμαρ, “to say,” once in Ps 77:8, ὀμηρ, “speech”; and in the NT ἐγγέγονα, epangegna, and the Heb. ἐγγέγονα, epangegnon, and compounds): Promise holds an important place in the Scriptures and in the development of the religion that culminated in Christ. The Bible is indeed full of “precious and extending great promises” (2 Pet 1:4), although the word “promise” is not always used in connection with them. Of the more outstanding promises of the OT may be mentioned: (1) the proto-evangelium (Gen 3:15); (2) the promise to Noah no more to curse the ground, etc (Gen 8:21, 22: 9-17; (3) most influential, the promise to Abraham to make him a great nation in whom all families of the earth shall be blessed, to give to him and his seed the land of Canaan (Gen 12:2, etc), often referred to in the OT (Ex 12:12; Dt 1:8; 11; 6:28; etc), the promise to David to make his house a throne (2 S 7:12,13.28; 1 K 2:24, etc); (5) the promise of restoration of Israel, of the Messiah, of the new and everlasting kingdom, of the new covenant and outpouring of the Spirit (Isa 2:2-5; 4:2; 56:5; 66:13; Jer 31:3; 33:10-12; 37:17-27; Ezk 36:24-32; 37:11; 39:25, etc). In the NT these promises are founded on, and regarded as having their true fulfillment in, Christ and those who are His (2 Cor 1:20; Eph 3:6). The promise of the Spirit is spoken of by Jesus as “the promise of my Father” (Lk 24:49; Acts 1:4), and this was regarded as fulfilled at Pentecost. The promise of a Saviour of the seed of David is regarded as fulfilled in Christ (Acts 13:23. 32:26; Rom 1:2; 4:13; 9:3). Paul argues that the promise to Abraham that he should be “heir of the world” (visualized to him before circumcision, is not confirmed to Israel, but is open to all who are children of Abraham by faith (Rom 4:13-16; cf Gal 3:16. 10:29). In like manner the writer to the Hebrews goes back to the original promises, giving them a spiritual and eternal significance (1:6, 17; 11, 9, etc). The NT promises include manifold blessings and hopes, among them “life,” “eternal life” (1 Tim 4:8; 6:19; 2 Tim 1:1; Jas 1:12), the “kingdom” (Jas 2:5), Christ’s “coming” (2 Pet 3:8, etc), “new heavens and a new earth” (2 Pet 3:13), etc. For “promised” and “promised” in AV, RV has frequently other terms, as “word” (Ps 105:42), “spake,” “spoken” (Dt 10:9; Josh 9:21; 22:4; 23:5, etc), “consented” (Lk 2:11, etc). References to the promises occur repeatedly in the Apro (Bar 2:34; 2 Mace 2:18; Wisl 12:21; cf 2 Esd 3:15; 5:29).

PROPER, prop'er; For AV “proper” (child), in Heb 11:23, RV substitutes “holyly,” in 1 Chr 29:3; 1 Cor 7:7, RV “own” is employed, and for the too emphatic “their proper tongue” in Acts 19 “their language” is written. But none of the AV forms are really obsolete.

LITERATURE

I. The Idea of Biblical Prophecy.

—According to the uniform teaching of the Bible the prophet is a servant of God, and speaks— but come from a higher source. For God he is at the same time, also, a seer, who sees things that do not lie in the domain of natural sight, or who sees things which human ears do not ordinarily receive: cf 1 S 9:9, where nabhah, “speaker,” and râ'eh, “seer,” are used as synonymous terms. Jer 23:16 and Ezek 13:2 are particularly instructive in this regard. In these passages a sharp distinction is made between those persons who only claim to be prophets but who prophecy “out of their own heart,” and the true prophets who declare the word which the Lord has spoken to them. In the latter case the contents of the prophetic speech are not originally in their own reflection or calculation; and just as little is this prophecy the product of their own feelings, fears or hopes, but, as something extraneous to man and independent of him, it has with a Divine certainty entered the soul of the prophet. The prophet has seen that which he prophesies, although he need not have seen it in the form of a real vision. He can also “see” words with his inner eyes (Isa 2:1, and often). It is only another expression for this when it is frequently said that God has spoken to the prophet. In this case too it is not necessary that there must have been a voice which he could hear phonetically through his natural ear. The main thing is that he must have been able sharply to distinguish the contents of this voice from his own heart, i.e., from his personal consciousness. Only in this way is he capable of speaking to the people in the name of God and able to publish his word as that of Jeh. In this case he is the speaker of Jeh (nabī',) or the mouth of the Lord (cf Ezek 7 1 with 4 16). Under these conditions he then regards it as absolute compulsion to speak, just as a person must be filled with fear when he hears a lion roar nearby (Am 3 8). The words burn in his soul until he utters them (Jer 20 7 9).

The Divine power, which comes over a human being and compels him to see or to hear things which otherwise would be hidden from him, is called by various terms expressive of inspiration. It is said that the Spirit of God has come over someone (Nu 24 2; or has fallen upon him (Ezk 11 5); or that the hand of Jeh has come over him and laid hold of him (2 K 3 15; Ezek 1 3; 3 14.22, and often; or that the Holy Spirit has been put on him as a garment, i.e., has been incorporated in him (1 Ch 12 18; 2 Ch 24 20; or that the Spirit of the Lord has been seised upon him (Nu 11 25 f; 2 K 2 15; Isa 11 2; 61 1); or that God has given this Spirit of His (Nu 11 29; Isa 42 1); or pours Him out upon man (Joel 2 28 f [Heb 3 1 f]). But this inspiration is not such that it assures the human consciousness of the recipient, so that he would receive the word of God in the state of sleep or trance. But rather the recipient is in possession of his full consciousness, and is able afterward to give a clear account of what happened. Nor is there the individuality of the prophet eliminated by this Divine inspiration; unconsciously this individuality cooperates in the formal shaping of that which has been seen and heard. In accordance with the natural peculiarity of the prophet and with the contents of the message, the psychological condition of the recipient may be that of intense excitement or of calmness. As a rule the inspiration that takes possession of the prophet is evidenced also by an exalted and poetical language, and an unusual and rhythmically characteristic form, but is not bound to a narrow and mechanical meter. It is, however, also possible that poetical utterances find their expression in plain prose. The individual peculiarity of the prophet is also an aspect of the revelation which comes to him. In the one prophet he may find a preponderance of visions; another prophet has no visions. But the visions of the future which he sees are given in the forms and the color which have been furnished by his own consciousness. All the more the form in which the prophet gives expression to his word of God is determined by his personal talents and gifts as also by his experiences.

In a certain respect the dream can be cited as an analogous phenomenon, in which also the ideas that are slumbering in the soul uninvited are put in their appearance without being controlled by consciousness and reason.

The other hand, prophecy differs specifically from dreams, first, because the genuine prophetical utterance is received when the prophet is clearly conscious, and, secondly, because such an utterance brings with it a much greater degree of certainty and a greater guaranty of its higher origin that the Spirit of God imparts by a dream, which seems to be prophetical. In Jer 23 25 f it is declared that these two are entirely dissimilar, and the relation between the two is compared to straw and wheat. The Moslem Arabs also put a much lower estimate on the visionary dream than on the prophetical vision in a waking condition.

Because this Spirit of God acts with full freedom, He can select His organs at will from among every station, age or sex. The Spirit is not confined to any priestly class or organization. In any case it was the case of a spiration times that a prophet gathered disciples around himself, who could themselves in turn also be seized by his spirit, although the transmission of this spirit was a difficult matter. Yet it may be supposed that this spiration continued to be at all times a free gift of the sovereign God. Amos (7 14 f) appeals expressly to this fact, that he did not himself choose the prophet's calling nor was the pupil of a prophetical school, but that he had been directly called by Jeh from his daily occupation as a shepherd and workman. In the same way we indeed find prophets who belonged to the priestly order (Jeremiah, Ezekiel and others), but equally great is the number of those who certainly did not belong. Further, age made no difference in the call to the prophetical office. Even in his earliest youth Samuel was called to be a prophet (1 S 3 1 f), and it did not avail Jeremiah anything when he excused himself because of his youth. Even the uninvited, who is not conscious that he is seiz

5. Supernatural teachers of religion and morals, as visions of the Future. The prophets are regarded as enthusiastic natural teachers of religion and morals, as warm patriots and politicians, to whom they ascribed nothing but a certain gift of the ability of guessing the future. But this was no explanation of the facts in the case. The prophets were themselves conscious of this, that they were not the intellectual authors of their higher knowledge. This consciousness is justified by the fact that they were, in a condition to make known things which lay beyond their natural horizon and which were contrary to all probability. These cases are particularly instructive in this respect which beyond a doubt were recorded by the prophets themselves. Ezekiel could indeed, on the basis of mere human and religious reflections, such as conviction that Zeckiah of Jerusalem would not escape his punishment for his political treachery and for his disobedience to the word of Jeh; but he could never from this source have reached the certainty that this king, as the prophet describes the case in 12 8 ff, was to be taken captive while trying to escape from besieged city and was then to be blinded and taken to Babylon. Just as little could he in Babylon know the exact day when the siege of Jerus began (24 2). If this prophet had learned of these things in a natural way and had afterward clothed them in the form of prophecy, he would have been guilty of a deception, something unhind-erable in the case of so conscientious a preacher of morality. But such cases are frequently met with. Jeremiah predicts to Hananiah, that he would die during the year (28 16), but it is not only such matters of detail that presuppose a extraordinary wisdom of the prophet. The whole way also in which Jeremiah predicts the destruction of Jerusalem, the Jerusalemites, and to the desires of his own heart, shows that he was speaking under Divine compulsion, which was more powerful than his own reflections and sympathies. On any other proposition his conduct would have been reprehensible cowardice. The case of Isaiah is exactly the same. We must yield to the word of God as a guaran- tpy that the Syrians and the Ephraimites would not capture Jerus (7 4 ff), and when he promises Hezekiah that the Assyrians would not shoot an arrow into the city, but would return without having ac-complished their purpose (22 ff). These things were so much in contradiction to all the proba-bilities of the course events would take that he would have been a frivolous adventurer had he not received his information from higher sources. Does it not seem that these predictions which estab-lished and upheld the influence of the prophets. Thus in the case of Amos it was his prediction of a great earthquake, which did occur two years later (1 1); in the case of Elisha, the prediction of the long dealth (1 K 17 1); in the case of Elisha, the undertaking of the enemies (2 K 6 12), and in other cases. It is indeed true that the contents of the prophetic discourses are not at all confined to the future. Everything that God has to announce to mankind, revelations concerning His will, admonitions, warnings. He is also to announce the message of the prophet. But His determinations with reference to the future as a rule are connected with prophetical utterances of the latter kind. The prophets are watchmen, guardians of the people, who are called to the nations. They see the dangers and the judgments approaching, which must put in their appearance if the Divine will is disregarded. The prophets interpret also for the people that which is happening and that which has occurred, e.g. the defeats which they have suffered at the hands of their enemies, or the gang-rif, pestilence (Joel), or a famine. They lay bare the inner reason for external occurrences and explain such events in their connection with the providential government of God. This gives to prophecy a powerful moral unity, notwithstanding the great differences of times and surrounding circumstances. It is prophecy which the Heb people must thank for their higher conception of history. This people know of a Highest Author of all things and of a plan, to which all things that transpire must serve. God's plan has for its purpose to bring about the complete supremacy of His will among the children of men.

In genuine prophecy, according to Bib. concep-tions, the form it takes constitutes an integral part. It is set up by Dt 18 21 f as a proof of the genuineness of a prophet-utterance. The prophetic word "falls to the ground" (4 3 19) if it is not "raised up" ('ποτερίζω, kēstīn, "fulfil," for which we more rarely find ιήσω, "fulfil," but regularly in the NT ποτερίζως, πληροισθαί, "being fulfilled") by the course of events. It would remain an empty word if it did not attain to its full content through its realization. In fact, in the case of a genuine prophet itself there dwells a Divine power, so that at the moment when he speaks the event takes place, even if it is not yet visible to man. This realization is also not infrequently represented symbolically by the prophet in confirmation of his prediction. Thus in a certain sense it is the prophet himself who through his word builds up and pulls down, plants and roots out (Jer 1 10; 25 15 ff). But the fulfilment can be judged by the contemporary, in the sense of extraordinary Divine vision of the prophet. The whole way also in which Jeremiah predicts the destruction of Jerusalem as inevitable, in direct contrast to the hopes of the Jerusalemites and to the desires of his own heart, shows that he was speaking under Divine compulsion, which was more powerful than his own reflections and sympathies. They lay bare the inner reason for external occurrences and explain such events in their connection with the providential government of God. On any other proposition his conduct would have been reprehensible cowardice. The case of Isaiah is exactly the same. We must yield to the word of God as a guaranto face” with Moses (Nu 12 6 ff; Dt 34 10; cf Ex 33 11). Moses was the permanent organ through whom Jeh brought about the Egypt plagues and through whom He explained what these meant to His people and also to the world. He led the people in their journey through the desert, with God as their leader. The voice of Moses too had to explain to them the Divine signs in the desert and communicate to them the commandments of God. The legislation of Moses shows that he was not only filled with the Spirit of God occasionally, but that he abode with God for longer periods of time and produced something that is a well-ordered whole. A production such as the Law is the result of a continuous association with God.

Since that time revelation through prophecy was probably never entirely wanting in Israel (Dt 18 15). But this fountain did not always flow with the same fulness or clearness. Yet Deborah enjoyed a high rank as a prophetess, and for a long time pronounced decisions of justice in the name of the Lord before she, through her prophets, publicly pronounced the people to rise up against their oppressors. What is said in 1 S 3 1 concerning the times of Eli can be applied to this whole period, namely that the word and vision of the prophet had become rare in the land. All the mouths of the people were turned to the affairs of Samuel, while yet a boy received Divine revelations (1 S 3 1 ff). He was by the whole people regarded as a “seer” whose prophecies were always fulfilled (3 19). The passage 9 6 ff shows that the people obeyed the prophets and the word of God. His spirit was thus a prophetic one, and we find the story of the prophet Samuel in the Bible. This is the case when the prophet was working in the court of David (1 S 10 20). The school of David was a real school of prophetic instruction and education. The prophets were a true school of religious knowledge and education. The prophet was not only a religious teacher, but also a moral guide and a political counselor. The prophet was a true school of religious instruction and education. The prophet was a true school of religious knowledge and education. are generally of a benevolent character. In connection with these he exhibits a remarkable degree of the gift of prophetical foresight (2 K 4 16; 5 26; 6 8 ff.; 7 1 ff.; 13 14-22; 19). Jonah, too, the son of Amittai, had at that time a favourable message for the Northern Kingdom (2 K 14 25).

However, the flourishing condition of the kingdom under Jeroboam II had an unfavorable influence on its spiritual development.

6. Amos, Soon Amos and Hosea were compelled to announce to this kingdom its impending destruction through a great world-power. These two prophets have left us books in which anticipation and necessities in written form had already been introduced before this. At any rate, many scholars are of the conviction that the prophecies of Obadiah and Joel belong to an earlier period, although others place them in the post-exilic period. In any case, the expectation of a day of settlement by Jeh with His people already was in the days of Amos common and current (5 18 ff.). As the writing of individual prophecies (Isa 8 1; 30 5; Hab 2 1 ff.) had for its purpose the laying of these words in a permanent and authentic form and to later on convince the reader of their wonderful fulfillment, the writing down of larger collections of prophecies had for its purpose to intensify the power of the prophetical word and to secure this as a permanent possession of the people (Jer 30 2; 36 1 ff.). Pupils of the prophets assisted them in this writing and in preserving their books (cf Jer 36 4; Isa 8 16).

It is to this custom that we owe our knowledge of the very existence of the utopian prophecies of many of the prophets of a later period. In addition to the larger books of Isa, Jer, Ezk, we have a number of smaller prophetic books, which have been united into the Book of the Twelve Prophets. These utterances as a rule exhibited an elevated form of language and are more or less poetical. However, in modern times some scholars are inclined to go too far in claiming that these addresses are given in a carefully systematized metrical form. Hebrew meter and ish is a freer form of expression than is Arabic or Sanskrit meter, and this is all the more the case with the discourses of the prophets, which were not intended for musical rendering, and which are expressed in a rhythmically unrhymed rhetoric, which appears now in one and then in another form of melody, and often changes into prose.

In the kingdom of Judah the status of the prophets was somewhat more favorable than it was in Ephraim. They were indeed forced to contend against the in Ephraim. They were indeed forced to contend against the injustices of the part of the ruling classes and against immorality of all kinds. But in this kingdom there were at any rate from time to time found kings who walked more in the footsteps of David. Thus Asa followed the directions of the prophet Azariah (2 Ch 15 1 ff.). It is true that the prophet Hanani censured this king, but it was done for a different reason. Jehoshaphat also regularly consulted the prophets. Among those who had dealings with him Elisha is also mentioned (2 K 3 14), as also some other prophets (cf 2 Ch 19 2; 20 14-37). The greatest among the prophets during the period of the Assyrian invasions was Isaiah, who performed the duties of his office for more than 40 years, and under the kings Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, and possibly too under Manasseh, through his word exercised a powerful influence upon the king and the nation. Although a preacher of judgments, he at critical times appeared also as a prophet of consolation.

Nor did he despise external evidences of his prophetical office (cf 7 11; 38 22, 8). His contemporary Micah is in full agreement with him, although he was not called to deal with the great of the land, with kings, or statesmen, as was the case with Isaiah. Nahum, Zephaniah and Habakkuk belong rather to the period of transition from the Assyrian to the Chaldaean periods. In the days of Josiah the prophetess Huldah had great influence in Jerus (2 K 22 14). Much more important under this same king was the prophet Jeremiah, who was called by God for a great mission. This prophet during the siege and destruction of Jerus and after that time spoke as an unyielding yet deeply feeling exponent of the prophetical utterances and called again and again to dash to the ground the false hopes of the patriots, whenever these arose. Not so firm was his contemporary and fellow-sufferer Uriah (Jer 26 20).

In the time of the exile itself we find the period of the activity of Ezekiel. It was significant that this prophet became the recipient of Divine revelations while on Bab territory. His work was, in accordance with the condition of things in the Babylonian captivity, that of a poet and a literary man. He seems also to have been a bodily sufferer. His abnormal conditions became symbolical signs of that which he had to proclaim. Deuter-Isaiah, too (Isa 40 ff.), spoke during the Babylonian Exile, as Hosea had done, and prepared for the return. The peculiar prophecies of Daniel are also accorded to a prophet living during the exile, who occupied a distinguished position at the court of the heathen rulers, and whose apocalyptic utterances are of a kind different from the discourses of the other prophets, as they deal more with the political condition of the world and the drama of history, in so far as this tends toward the establishment of the supremacy of Jeh. These prophecies were collected in later times and did not receive their final and present form until the Gr period at the beginning of the 2nd cent. BC.

After the return from Babylonia the Jews were exhorted by Hagga and Zechariah to rebuild their temple (about 520 BC). At that time there were still to be found prophets of the Exile who took a hostile attitude to the men of God. Thus Nehemiah (Neh 6 6–14) was opposed by hostile prophets as also by a prophetess, Huldah. In contrast to these, Malachi is at all times in accord with the canonical prophets, as he was an ardent advocate for the temple cultus of Jeh, not in the sense of a spiritless and senseless external worship, but as against the current indifference to Jeh. His style and his language, too, evidence a late age. The lyrical form has given way to the didactic. This is also probably the time when the present Book of Jonah was written, a didactic work treating of an older tradition. Malachi is regarded by the Jews as the last really canonical prophet. While doubtless there was not a total lack of prophetically endowed seers and speakers of God also in the closing centuries of the pre-Christian era, nevertheless the general conviction prevailed that the Spirit of God was no longer present, e.g. in the times of the Maccabees (cf 1 Mac 4 46; 9 37; 14 41). It is true that certain modern critics ascribe some large sections of these books to the work of later hands, even to a period as late as the Gr. But this is refuted by the fact mentioned in Eccles (beginning of the 2nd cent. BC) that in the writer’s time the prophetical Canon appeared already as a closed collection. Dnl is not found in this collection, but the Book of the Twelve Minor Prophets is. It was during this period that apocalyptic literature began to flourish, many specimens of which are found among the Apoc and the Pseudepigrapha. These books consist of eschatological speculations, not the product of original inspiration, but emanating from a store of the prophetic. The prophetic name Pseudepigrapha shows that the author issued his work, not under his own name, but under the pseudonym of some man of God from older times, such as Enoch, Ezra, Moses, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Baruch, and others. This fact alone proves the secondary character of this class of literature. See Apocalyptic Literature.

Malachi finds a successor in John the Baptist, whose coming the former had predicted. John is the greatest of the prophets, because

12. Prophecy
he could directly point to Him who completed the NT in the NT filled its promises. All that we know in addition concerning the times of Jesus shows that the prophetic gift was yet thought of as possibly dwelling in many, but that prophecy was no longer the chief spiritual guide of the people (cf. e.g., Jos, Ant,
XIII, xi, 2;
XX,
X, 5, among the Essenes, or in the case of Hyrcanus, op. cit.,
XIII, ii). Jos had to live with the prophetic gifts at times (cf.
Bd, III, viii, 9). He is thinking in this connection chiefly of the prediction of some details. Such "prophets" and "prophetic esse" are reported also in the NT. In Jesus Christ Himself the prophet office reached its highest stage of development, as He stood in a more intimate relation than any other being to His Heavenly Father and spoke His word entirely and at all times.

In the Christian congregation the office of prophecy is again found, differing from the proclamation of the gospel by the apostles, evangelists, and teachers.
In the NT the terms prophētēs, prophetēs, prophētēa, prophetēia, prophetēs, prophetēdua, signify speaking under the extraordinary influence of the Holy Ghost. Thus in Acts 11:27 (prophecy of a famine by Agabus); 21:10 f (prediction of the sufferings of Paul); 13:1 f (exhortation to mission work); 21:9 ff (prophetic gift of the daughters of Philip). Paul himself also had this gift (Acts 16:6; 18:11). See how all Jewish public services of the church, prophecy occupied a prominent position (see esp. 1 Cor 14:14). A prophetic book in a special sense is the Apocalypse of St. John. The gift of prophecy was claimed by many also in later times of the church, and more as the Christian church more and more developed on the historical basis of revelation as completed in Christ. Esp. in spiritually aroused eras in the history of the church, prophecy again puts in its appearance. It has never ceased altogether, but on account of its frequent misuse the gift has become discredited. Jesus Himself warned against false prophets, and during the apostolic times it was often found necessary to urge the importance of trying spirits (1 Jn 4:17; 1 Cor 12:10; 14:29).

III. Historical Development of Prophecy. —The contents of prophecy are by no means merely predictions concerning the future. That 1. Contents which is given by the Spirit to the spirit of prophecy can refer to the past and to the present as well as to the future. However, that which is revealed to the prophet finds its inner unity in this, that it all aims to establish the supremacy of Jeh. Prophecy views also the detailed events in their relation to the Divine plan, but for the latter has the absolute establishment of the supremacy of Jeh in Israel and eventually on the entire earth. We are accustomed to call those utterances that predict this final purpose the Messianic prophecies. However, not only those that speak of the person of the Messiah belong to this class, but all that treat of the coming of the kingdom of God.

The beginnings of the religion of Israel, as also the chief epoch in its development, emanated from prophetic revelations. The prophecy of the tribal religion into of the

a national religion, and at the same time taught the people to regard the religion of the fathers more ethically, spiritually and vitally. Samuel crowned the earthly form of theocracy in introducing an "Anointed of Jeh" in whom the covenant relation between Jeh and Israel was concentrated personally. The Anointed of the Lord entered into a much more intimate relationship to Jeh as His Son or Servant than it was possible for the whole people of Israel to do, although as a people they were also called the servant or the son of God (cf Ps 2 7ff; 110).
The Ps of David are a proof of this, that this high destiny of the kingdom was recognized. David himself became a prophet in those hymns in which he describes his own unique relation to Jeh. But the actual kings of history as a rule corresponded too imperfectly to this idea. For this reason the word "prophetic" already in David's time directs to the future and shall be more perfectly realized (2 S 7 12 ff; cf. David's own words, 2 S 23 4 ff). See Messiah.

Solomon completed the external equipment of the theocracy by the erection of the temple. But it was only a temporary thing, the turning-point, from which time on the Exile
the prophets begin to emphasize the judgment to come, i.e. the dissolution of the external existence of the kingdom of Jeh. Yet prophecy begins to prepare the way that a kernel of the Divine establishment on Zion remains intact. The Divine establishment of the sanctuary and the kingdom cannot be destroyed; all that is necessary is that they be restored in greater purity and dignity. This can be seen also in Amos, who predicts that the fallen tabernacle of David shall be raised up again (Am 9 11ff), which shall then be followed by a condition of undisturbed blessing. The same is found in Hosea, who sees how all Israel is again united under "David"
the king of the last times, when between God and the people, between heaven and earth, an unbroken covenant of love shall be made (Hos 2 1ff); and also in Isaiah, who predicts that during the |j| period of the country by the Gentiles a Son of David shall be born in a miraculous manner and attain supremacy (Isa 7 14; 9 2ff; 11 1ff), and who speaks constantly of that Divine establishment on Zion (cf the quiet waters of Shiloah, 8 6), the foundation stone that has been laid by Jehovah (28 16, etc.). Micah, his contemporary, does the same, and in an entirely similar manner predicts that the radical judgment of destruction which shall come over the temple and the royal palace shall be followed by the wondrous King of Peace from Bethlehem (5 1ff). Possibly even a little later, in the date Zec 9 9 described this future ruler in similar terms. In general it is not probable that Isaiah and Micah were the first to speak so personally of this King. They seem to presuppose that their contemporaries were acquainted with this idea.

In recent times scholars have pointed to the facthat in the old Orient, among the Egyptians, the Babylonians and elsewhere, the exppectation of a miraculously born King of, when this promise is to be more people and to all nations salvation and peace, was entertained at an early er period. Yet so much is certain, that Isaiah and Micah did not base their hopes on the vague dreams of the gentle world, but upon the prophetic establishment of a Divine sanctuary and kingdom of Zion. The personal figure of the Son of Man is not so much in the foreground as in the other prophets, and is brought down to the suffering Man, the exile. These prophets mention only casually the Good Shepherd, e.g. Jer 23 1 ff.; 33 12 ff.; Ezek 34 23 f. But after that time this Messianic expectation became a permanent element in the hopes of Israel. The Messianic, prophecy had thrown much light on the ways of God, which prepare for His kingdom on earth. Even long before Amos (5 18 ff.) the idea of a “day of Jehovah,” which was to be a day of revelation, on which God makes a settlement with the world, had already been known, since Amos is already compelled to protest against the abuse of this expectation. But hand in hand with this settlement we find also and at all times the expectation of the exaltation and of the salvation of Israel. Yet the prophets have all emphasized that Israel and Judah must first be thoroughly purified by a judgment, before the land could, through God’s grace, be glorified and richly blessed. The judgment which the preexilic prophets are continually predicting is, however, only a means to an end. This judgment is not the final word of the Lord, as Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah and Habakkuk constantly teach. They announce that return to Jehovah and obedience to His commandments is the way to salvation. Thus, Isa 40 1 ff., 24 f. However, the prophets know that the people will not turn again to God, but that first the Jewish state must be entirely overthrown (Isa 6). It is particularly deserving of notice, that believing trust in Jehovah is regarded as the pivot, if not the foundation (Isa 7 9; 30 15; Hab 2 4). It is through this that the ‘remnant’ of the faithful, “the kernel” of the people, is saved. Also in the case of Jeremiah, whose work it was to predict the immediate destruction of Judah, there is not about a kind of an esoteric book of consolation. His battle cry for the future is “Jehovah our righteousness” (23 6; 33 16). In his case we find a rich spiritualization of religion. The external customs, circumcision and the like, he declares, do no good, if the true state of the heart is lacking. Even the ark of the covenant is unnecessary and is discarded in the enlargement of the sanctuary. Ezekiel, who lays more stress on the external ordinances, nevertheless agrees with Jeremiah in this, that Jehovah together with this temporal destruction of the temple and the prophet in his spirit builds the sanctuary again; notwithstanding the external character of his restoration, there is yet found in his picture a further development of its spiritual character. The ethical rights and the responsibility of the individual are strongly emphasized (Ezek 18, 33). The land becomes transformed; the Gentiles are received into the covenant of God.

Deutero-Isa (Isa 40 66), during the time of the Babylon captivity, enriches prophecy in an extraordinary manner, through the figure of the true "Servant of Jehovah," who in a peaceful way, through his words of instruction and exhortation, his innocent sufferings and his vicarious deeds, converts Israel, the wicked, and the Gentile, and also wins over the gentile world to Jehovah. It was not possible that the picture of a suffering man of God, who through his death as a martyr attains to exaltation, should be suggested to the Jews by the altogether physical figure of a death and resurrection of a Judah God (Ezram zus-Adonai). Since the unjust persecutions of Joseph and David they were acquainted with the sufferings of the just, and Jehovah’s life as a prophet was a continuous martyrdom. But the writer of the second part of Isaiah had before his eyes a vision that far exceeded all these types in purity and in greatness to such a degree as did David’s Son in Isa and Mic surpass His great ancestor Hezekiah to a completion the kingdom of God through the resurrection and spiritualizes and attains to the glory of rulership. In this way He unites the offices of prophet, priest, and king.

After the exile prophecy continues its work. The Messianic expectations, too, are developed further in the meantime by Haggai, and still more by Zechariah.

6. After the Exile.

The Day of Jehovah excites before this a complete purification of the people of God. God Himself will come, and His kingdom will prove known. The last book of Daniel picture the transformation of the world into a kingdom of God. The latter will mark the end of the history of the world. It comes from above; the earthly kingdoms are from below, and are pictured as beasts; the Ruler of the kingdom of God is a Son of man. The latter comes with the clouds of the heaven to take possession of His kingdom (Dan 7 13 ff.). Then the judgment of the world will take place and intervene also each human being, who before the will bodily arise from the dead, in order to enter upon blessedness or condemnation. Here we find indicated a universal expansion of the kingdom of God extending over the whole world and all mankind.

If we survey the character of the kingdom of God and its Divinely blessed Ruler, the Messiah, from a Christian standpoint, we find that a grand Divine unity connects its different elements. The form of this connection is indicated by believers for the character of Prophecy. The prophets were compelled to speak so that their hearers could understand them. Only gradually do they come to be understood. Only gradually do they become spiritualized, e.g. the kingdom of God is still pictured by the prophets as established around the local center of Zion. Mt. Zion is in a concrete manner exalted, in order to give expression to its importance, etc. It is the NT fulfillment that for the first time gives adequate form to Divine revelation. At least in the person of Jesus Christ this perfection is given, although the full unfolding of this kingdom is yet a matter of the future.

A second characteristic feature of prophecy is the partial nature in which the individual utterances and prophetic pictures. One partial picture must be supplemented by the other, in order not to be misunderstood of Prophecy. Thus, e.g. according to Isa 66 13 14; Zec 9 13 ff., it appears that the kingdom of God was to be established by force of arms. But the same prophets show in other utterances (Isa 9 6 f; Zec 9 9 f) that these warlike expressions are to be understood figuratively, since the Messianic King is more than all others a Prince of Peace.

A third feature that deserves attention is the perspective character of prophecy. The prophet sees together and at once upon the surface of the pictures things which are to be fulfilled only successively and gradually. Thus, e.g. Deutero-Isa sees of Prophecy in the near future the return from captivity, and directly connected with this a miraculous glorification of the city of God. The return does not mean a literal fact take place soon afterward, but the glorification of the city in which Jehovah had promised to dwell was yet in the distant future. The succeeding prophets, Haggai and Zechariah, predict that this consummation shall take place in the future. Also in many predictions concerning the future made by Jesus and in the Apocalypse of St. John, these characteristics of prophecy, its contemporaneous and perspective and at times symbolic features, are not disregarded. The firm prophetic word is intended to give the congregation certain directive lines and distinctive guidance. But an adequate idea of what is to come the Christian church will become compelled to form for itself, when the fulfillment and completion shall have taken place.

IV. Analogous Phenomena among Gentiles—The uniqueness of the Bible, and God's grasp as fully only when we try to find analogies among the gentle peoples. Here we find everywhere the intent of soothsaying, the headquarters for which was Babylon. But with this art the prophecies of the OT stand out in bold contrast (cf. the prohibitions in Lev 19:26; Dt 18:10, prohibitions that refer to necromancy for the purpose of discovering the future). This art was practised through a medium, a person who had an 'abib (Bab. ucb), i.e. a spirit that brought forth the dead in order to question them. The spirits were thought to speak in mumurings or piping sounds (Isa 8:19), which could be imitated by the mediums (vocalist). And the mediums, which forbade this under penalty of death, Saul had tried to destroy those who practised incantations, who generally were women (1 S 28:9). This practice, however, continued to flourish. In addition, the Babylonians and other peoples had also a developed art of interpretation in order to find omens for the future. The was the examination of intestines practised by them. The liver of sacrificial animals particularly was carefully examined, and, from its condition, good or bad news were inferred (cf. Ezk 21:21). See Divination. This art passed over from the Babylonians to the seafaring Etruscans, and from these came to the Romans. But other phenomena also were by the different nations interpreted as prophetically significant and were by those skilled in this art interpreted accordingly. Among these were misarraigns by human beings and animals, the actions of men, horses, the flight of birds, earthquakes, forms of the clouds, lightning, and the like. Further, mechanical contrivances were used, such as casting of lots, stones, sticks, etc.

More spiritual and popular was the interpretation of dreams. It also was the case that mediums interpreted their prophecies into semi-waking trance. In this way the suitable mediums attained to a certain kind of clairvoyance, found among various peoples. This approaches the condition of an ecstatically aroused pseudo-prophet, of whom mention is made above. In Greece, too, oracles were pronounced by the Pythian prophetesses, who by vapors and the like was aroused to a practice of the mantic art. In Dojana it was the voice of the deity in the natural phenomena that were read in the rustling of the trees and the mumurings of the water. How uncertain these sources were was well known to heathen antiquity. The ancients complain of the enigmatical character of the Sibylline utterances and the doubtful nature of what was said. See Greece, Religion of. In contrast to this, Israel knows that it possesses in prophecy a clear word (Nu 23:23).

But the contents also of the Bible prophecies are unique through their spiritual uniformity and greatness. The oracle at Delphi, too, at times showed a certain moral elevation and could be regarded as the conscience of the nation. But how insignificant and meager is that which it offered to those who questioned it in comparison with the spontaneous utterances of the prophets of Israel! Also what has in recent times been said concerning the "prophetic texts" from ancient Egypt (Grasemann, Texte und Bilder, 1910) may, indeed show external similarity to the prophecies of Israel; but they lack the spiritual and religious depth and the strictly ethical dignity of the prophecies of the Scriptures, as also the consistency with which these from century to century reveal the thoughts of God and make known with constantly increasing clearness their purposes and goal.

PROPHECY, GIFT OF. See Spiritual Gifts.

PROPHESYING, prof'esi-ing, FALSE: The distinction between the true and the false prophecy and prophets is very difficult to state. Broadly speaking, the false prophesy, related itself to the national ideal independently by any spiritual equality, while the true prophecy ever kept uppermost the spiritual conception of the national life. Among those given to false prophecy were the ones who spoke after "the deceit of their own heart" (Jer 14:14). These were, in their desire to be in the crowd which the people desired, so in a measure as to be considered worthy of punishment and even death. There were, however, false prophecies by men who honestly believed themselves to have a message from Jeh. These prophecies from self-deceived prophets often led the people astray. The dream of national greatness was substituted for the voice of Jeh. It was against such prophesy, that the true prophets had to contend. The only test here was the spiritual character of the utterance, and this test divine power sought to give. Spiritual utterances and spiritual sense which the people did not always possess. Consequently, in times of moral darkness the false prophets, predicting smooth things for the nation, independent of repentance, consolation and the pursuit of spiritual ends, were looked above the true prophets who emphasized the moral greatness of Jeh and the necessity of righteousness for the nation. In NT times false prophecy did much injury in the church. See Prophecy.

PROPHET, THE OLD. See Old Prophet, THE.

PROPHETESS, prof'et-ës (προφήτις, nœghtês; profetèς, profétès): Women were not excluded from the prophetic office in the OT, and were honored with the right of prophetic utterance in the PROPITIATION, pro-pish'ah-šun: The word is Lat. and brings into its Eng. use the atmosphere of heaven for winning the favors, or averting the anger of the Deity, and in the OT it represents a number of Heb. words—ten, including derivatives— which are sufficiently discussed under ATONEMENT (q.v.), of which propitiation is one aspect. It represents in LXX the Gr. terms ἱλαστήριον, ἱλασις (like, hila, and καταλαγή, katalagē), with derivatives; in the NT only the latter, and is rarely used. Propitiation needs to be studied in connection with reconciliation, which is used frequently in some of the apocryphal sentences of the OT, esp. in the newer VSS. In Hebrew 2 17, ERV and ARV have both changed “reconciliation” of AV to “propitiation,” to make it correspond with the OT use in connection with the sacrifice on the Day of Atonement. Hebrew 8 13 (“God, our merci[m "the propitiator"] to me the sinner” [AVm]); Hebrews 11 12 (quoted from LXX); and Hebrews 10 22 (an idiomatical asseveration like Eng. “mercy on us”) will help in getting at the usage in the NT. In LXX hilastrarion in the same term for the “mercy-seat” or “lid of the ark” of the covenant which was sprinkled with blood on the Day of Atonement. It is employed in exactly this sense in Hebrew 9 5, where later VSS have in the “propitiatory.”

Elsewhere in the NT this form is found only in Romans 3 25, and it is here that difficulty and difference are found extensively in interpreting. Greek fathers generally and prominent modern scholars understand Paul here to say that God appointed Christ Jesus to be the “mercy-seat” for sinners. The reference, while primarily to the Jewish ceremonial in tabernacle and temple, would not depend upon this reference for its comprehension, for the idea was general in religious thought, that some place and method had to be provided for securing a friendly meeting with the Deity, offended by man’s sin. In Hebrews, particularly, as elsewhere generally, Jesus Christ is presented as priest and sacrifice. Many modern writers (cf Sanday and Headlam), therefore, object that to translate Him the “mercy-seat” here complicates the figure still further, and so would understand hilastrarion as “expiatory sacrifice.” While this is not impossible, it is better to take the word in the usual sense of “mercy-seat.” It is not necessary to complicate the illustration by bringing in the idea of priest at all here, since Paul does not do so; mercy-seat and sacrifice are both in Christ. Δωρεάν, δοσιμαζότος, is found in the NT only in 1 Corinthians 15 10. Here the idea is active grace, or mercy, or friendliness. The teaching corresponds exactly with that in Romans. “Jesus Christ the righteous” is our “Advocate [in ‘Helper’] with the Father,” because He is active mercy concerning (ἐμπιστεύεσθαι our sins and those of the whole world. Or (4 10), God “loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation [or ‘mercy-seat’] (as a necessary compensation to) our sins.” This last passage is parallel with Romans 3 25, the one dealing with the abstract theory, and so Christ is set forward as a “mercy-seat,” the other dealing with experience of grace, and so Christ is the mercy of God in a concrete expression.

The basic Heb. term is that of covering what is offensive, so restoring friendship, or causing to be kindly disposed. The Gr. terms lack the physical reference to covering but introduce the idea of clearing away sin, and so forgiveness would be natural; hence graciousness.

2. Theological

Propitiation: Naturally, therefore, the idea of expiation entered into the concept. It is esp. to be noted that all provisions for this friendly relation of the four fathers of God and offending man find their initiation and provision in God and are under His direction, but involve the active response of man. All heathen and unworthily conceptions are removed from the Christian notion of propitiation by the fact that God Himself provided, or ‘set forth,’ the gift. He was the one who did this in the supreme expression of ultimate love. God had all the while been merciful, friendly, “passing over” man’s sins with no apparently adequate, or just, ground for doing so. Now in the blood of Christ sin is condemned and expiated, and God is able to establish and maintain His character for righteousness, while He continues and extends His dealing in gracious love with sinners who exercise faith in Jesus. The propitiation originates with God, not to appease Himself, but to justify Himself in His universal kindness to men deserving harshness. Cf also as to reconciliation, as in Romans 5 11–12; 2 Corinthians 5 18 ff. See also JOHANNINE THEOLOGY, V. 2.

PROPORTION, pro-pör-shun: Occurs once in the sense of “space” as the tr of Heb. נפח as translated in 1 Chronicles 22 11 (KJV “the third part” or “open space”) (1 Chronicles 7 30, AVm “Heb. naktedness,” RV “space”); once in the obsolete sense of “form” as the tr of ארכה, “array,” or “row” (Job 41 12, RV “frame”); and once in the sense of “measure” as the tr of analogia, “proportion,” or “equality” (Romans 12 6, “the proportion of faith,” RV “the proportion of our faith”). “Proportionally” occurs in 1 Corinthians 13 5, analogia, RV “in like proportion,” m “correspondently.”

PROSELYTE, pro-sel-īt, pro-sel-īt-ēs, from prosērekhamō, “I approach”): For 4 1 in the NT. In the LXX it often occurs as the tr of γέρ, the Heb. vb. ger means “to sojourn,” ger accordingly means a stranger who has come to settle in the land, as distinguished on the one hand from ירוה, a “homeborn” or “native,” and on the other from נכרי or ben-vehikkar, which means a stranger who is only passing through the country. Yet it is to be noted that in 2 Chronicles 17 17 those of the native tribes still living in the land as Amorites, Hittites, etc., are also called gerim. In two places (Exodus 12 19; Isaiah 41 1) LXX uses ἀγηγόρας, which is derived from ἀγιορ, the Aram. equivalent for ger. LXX uses προσόκες (the Gr. equivalent for Heb תושב, “a settler”) for ger when Israel or the patriarchs are indicated (Genesis 16 13; 23 4; Exodus 8 22; 18 3; Deuteronomy 23 7; 1 Chronicles 29 15; Psalms 39 12; 119 19; Jeremiah 14 8), and in a few other cases. In Talmudic lit. ger always stands for proselyte in the NT sense, i.e., a Gentile who has been converted to Judaism. Onkelos, who was himself a proselyte, always translates the word in this way.

No difficulties were put in the way of those strangers who wished to settle down in the land of Israel. All strangers, the third generation of Egyptians and Edomites included, and only Ammonites and Moabites excluded, could enter “the congregation of God” without circumcision and without the obligation to keep the ceremonial law.

1. Ger in the OT

No mention is made of such a word in the OT.
The stranger within the gate was free to cut meat which was prohibited to the Israelite (Dt 14.21).
If, however, the stranger wished to take part in the Passover, he must be circumcised. The keeping of the Sabbath and other feasts was regarded rather as a privilege than as a duty (Ex 23.12; Dt 16.11.14); but according to Lev 16.29 the ġēr was obliged to keep the fast of Atonement. He was forbidden on pain of death to blaspheme (Lev 24.16) or to offer children to Moḥeš (Lev 20.2). If he desired to bring a burnt offering, the same law applied to him as to the Israelites (Lev 17.8; 22.18). To the Jewish law he was not a proselyte; and it was probably for this class that tablets of warning in the temple were inscribed in Gr and Lat.

Many gladly frequented the synagogues and kept some of the Jewish laws and customs. Among those were to be found the "men who feared God," spoken of in Acts. They were not called to dispense with the proselytizing propaganda of the Jew.

Many gladly frequented the synagogues and kept some of the Jewish laws and customs. Among those were to be found the "men who feared God," spoken of in Acts. They were neither called to dispense with the proselytizing propaganda of the Jew.

Among the converts to Judaism there were probably few who were circumcised, and most of those who were circumcised submitted to the rite in order to marry Jewesses, or to enjoy the rights and privileges granted to Jews by Syrian and Roman rulers (Jos, Ant, XIV, vii, 2; XX, vii, 1; cf XVI, vii, 6). It would appear from Christ's words (Mt 23.15, "one proselyte") that the number of full proselytes was not large. Hyrcanus forced the Edomites to adopt Judaism by circumcision (129 BC); and on other occasions the same policy of propaganda by force was followed. Jos tells an interesting story (Ant, XX, ii, 1) of the conversion of Queen Helena of Adiabene and her two sons. The conversion of the sons was due to the teaching of a merchant called Ananias, who did not insist on circumcision. Later, another Jew, Eliezer of Galilee, told the young princes that it was not enough to read the Law, but that they must keep it. This was the counsel of both the Pharisees and the Sadducees. From this it is evident that Jewish teachers of the gentile converts varied in the strictness of their teaching.

The word "proselyte" occurs 4 times in the NT; once in Mt (23.15), where Our Lord referred to the proselyting zeal of the Pharisees, and 3 in the NT Acts. Proselytes were present at Pentecost (Acts 2.10); Nicolas, one of the deacons appointed by the primitive church at Jerusalem, was a proselyte (6:5); and after Paul had spoken in the synagogue at Antioch of Pisidia, many devout proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas (13.43). It is to be noted in this last case that the proselytes are called sebōmenoi, a word generally reserved for another class. Certain people are spoken of in Acts as phōbōmenoi tōn theōn, "fearing God" (10:2:22.35; 13:16:26), and as sebōmenoi tōn theōn, "reverencing God," or simply sebōmenoi (13:50; 18:14; 17:4.17,14).

The proselytes were probably as fanatical opponents of Christianity as were the Jews.
From the old strict Pharisaic-Palestinian point of view, circumcision, with the addition of baptism and the offering of sacrifice, was indispensable (so to Paul every circumcised person was a Jew; cf Gal 5:3); and thus their converts had to submit to this whole burden of the Mosaic and traditional law. The rabbinic distinction between gĕr tōshābāh, "a settler," and gĕr ḍeqeṭ, "a proselyte of righteousness," is, according to Schürer, only theoretical, and arose at a later date (Babba' Ḍeqeṭ l. 2:3; Naḥaṭ r. 3 1, et al.).

While the gĕr ḍeqeṭ (or gĕr ḥabba'ah, "proselyte of the covenant") was considered as being in every respect a "perfect Israelite," the gĕr tōshābāh (or gĕr sha'ur, "proselyte of the gate"); cf Ex 20:10 only professed his faith in the God of Israel, and bound himself to the observance of the 7 Noahic precepts, abstaining from blood, idols, homicide, fornication, robbery, eating the flesh of an animal that had died a natural death, and disobedience to (Jewish) authority (Sanh. 56a; cf Acts 15:20,29; 21:23). He was considered more of a Gentile than a Jew.

Three things were required for the admission of a proselyte, circumcision, baptism, and the offering of sacrifice (Bab. Ḍeqeṭ l. 7: 3; Yebḥam. 45a, 45b, 46a, 75a, 'Abbaḥ ḍeqaṭ et al. ). In the case of women only baptism and the offering of sacrifice were required; for that reason there were more women converts than men. Jos (I, II, xx, 2) tells how most of the women of Damascus were addicted to the Jewish religion. Doubt has been expressed as to the necessity of proselytes being baptized, since there is no mention of it by Paul or Philo or Jos, but it is probable that a Gentile, who was unclean, would not be admitted to the temple without being cleansed.

The proselyte was received in the following manner. He was first asked his reason for wishing to embrace Judaism. He was told that Israel was in a state of affliction; if he replied that he was aware of the fact and felt himself unworthy to share these afflictions, he was admitted. Then he received an instruction in some of the "light" and "heavy" commandments, the rules concerning eating and tithe, and the penalties attached to the breach of these. If he was willing to submit to all this, he was circumcised, and after his recovery he was immersed without delay. At this latter ceremony two "disciples of the wise" stood by to tell him more of the "light" and "heavy" commandments when he came up after the immersion, those assembled addressed him saying: "Unto whom hast thou given thyself? Blessed art thou, thou hast given thyself to God; the world was created for the sake of Israel, and only Israelites are called the children of God. The afflictions, of which we spoke, we mentioned only to make thy reward the greater." After his baptism he was considered to be a new man, "a little child newly born" (Yebḥam. 22a, 47a, 48a, 97b); a new name was given him; either he was named "Abraham the son of Abraham," or the Scriptures were opened at hazard, and the first name that was read was given to him. Thenceforth he had to put behind him all his past; even his marriage ties and those of kinship no longer held good (cf Yebḥam. 22a; Sanh. 56a).

Although he was thus juridically considered a new man, and one whose praises were sung in the Talmudic literature, he was yet on the whole looked down on as inferior to a born Jew (Kid. 4:2; Shab. 10 9, et al.). Rabbi Chelbo said: "Proselytes are as a scum." (Yebḥam. 47b; Kid. 70b; cf Phil 3:5). See also STRANGER.

PROVE, prov, tôô, bâhôn, tôô; nāgâh; sok-im'ô, dokimâô, piwrâô, peîrâô: Means: (1) to test or try; (2) to establish, demonstrate; (3) to find by experience. It is for the most part in the first (original) sense that the word is found in Scripture. Where the OT it is found as πρὸς προσπελευθερωσάμενον τῶν ἀπαθῶν, primarily "to lift," hence to weigh (Gen 42:15,16, etc.) God is said to "prove" His people, i.e. to test or try them for their good (Gen 22:21; Ex 18:25; Dt 8:16, etc.). The Psalmist prays that God may prove him (Ps 25:2). The word is frequently rendered "tempt." See TEMPT.

The word bâhôn, primarily "to try by heat," has a similar meaning (Ps 17:3, the heart, like metal, purified from dross, Job 23:10; Ps 7:9; Mal 3:2, etc.). In the NT the word most frequently rendered "prove" (sometimes "try") is dokimâô (Lk 14:19; Rom 12:2; 2 Cor 8:22; 13:5; Eph 5:10; 1 Thess 5:21). Peîrâô, "to tempt," "to prove," used in both a good and a bad sense, frequentlytrs "tempt" (q.v.), is rendered "prove" in Jn 6:6, "This he said to prove him." Both Gr words occur frequently in Apoc (Wisdom and Esclus). RV has "prove" for "tempt" (Gen 22:1); for "make" (Job 24:25; Gal 2:18); for "manifest" (Ecc 3:18); for "amazement" (Cor 11:29); for "try" (I Cor 4:13; 1 Jn 4:1), etc.

II. Literary Development of the Proverbs

1. The Primitive Sense

The earliest cited proverb (I S 10 12, repeated with varied occasion, I S 19 24) seems to have risen spontaneously from the people's observation. That Saul the son of Kish, whose very different temperament everybody knew, should be susceptible to the wild ecstasy of strolling prophets was an astonishing thing, as it were a discovery in Israel. Just as it became a proverb, Is Saul also among the prophets?' A few years later David, explaining his eloquence in sparing the life of the king who has become his deadly foe, quotes from a folk fund of proverbs: I S 24 13. 'As saith the proverb of the ancients, Out of the wicked cometh forth wickedness; but my hand shall not be upon thee.' The prophet Ezekiel quotes a proverb which evidently embodies a popular belief: "The days are prolonged, and every vision falleth"; which he corrects to, "The days are at hand, and the fulfilment of every vision" (Ezk 12 22,23). Both Ezekiel and Jeremiah (Ezk 18 2; Jer 31 29) quote the same current proverb, 'The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge,' in order to announce that the time has come for its discontinuance. These last two examples are very instructive. They show how the body of the people put the inwards of their history into proverb form, as it were a portable lesson for the times; they show also how the prophets availed themselves of these floating sayings to point their own message. Ezekiel seems indeed to recognize the facility with which a situation may bring forth a proverb: Ezek 16 44, 'Every one that useth proverbs shall use this proverb against thee; that thy father and thy mother, and thy brethren and thy sisters, and thy kinsfolk and thy friends; saying, As is the mother, so is her daughter.'

One element of the proverb, which a wide-awake people like the Hebrews would soon discover, was its adaptability for personal portrayal and satire, like a ready-made thrust. Hence of Proverbs the popular use of the name mashal came to connote its animus, generally of sarcasm or scorn. The taunting verse raised against Heshbon, Nu 21 27-30, is attributed to them "that speak in proverbs" (mashalim); and Isaiah's taunt in his burden of Babylon (Isa 14 4-20) is composed in the proverb measure: "Thou shalt take up this proverb (mashal, AV "proverb") against the king of Babylon." Answering to this prevailing animus of them was the increasing susceptibility to their sting and rancle; they were the kind of utterance that most surely found the national and individual self-consciousness. To be a proverb—to be in everybody's mouth as a subject of laughter, or as a synonym for some awful atrocity—was about the most dreadful thing that could befall them. To be "a reproach and a proverb, a taunt and a curse" (Jer 24 9) was all one. That this should be the nation's fate was held as a threat over them by lawyer and prophet (Da 28 37; I K 9 7); and in adversities of experience, both individual and collective, the thing that was most keenly felt was to have become a byword (mashal) (Ps 44 14; 69 11).

II. Literary Development of the Proverb.

The rank of proverb was by no means attributed to every popular saying, however the people might set store by it. If its application was merely local (e.g. 2 S 4 14), or associated with a single individual (how Jeremiah and Ezekiel announce popular sayings as obsolete), it remained in its place and time. About the proverb, on the other hand, there was the sense of a value universal and permanent, fitting it for literary immortality. Nor was the proverb itself a run-wild thing, at the shaping of the crowd; from the beginning it was in the hands of "those who speak in mashalim," whose business it was to put it into skilful wording. The popular proverb, however, and the literate (proverb were and continued two different things. There came a time, in the literary development of Israel, when the value of the mashal as a vehicle of instruction came to be recognized; from which time a systematic cultivation of this type of discourse began. That type, which seems most probable, was the reign of King Solomon, when in a special degree the people awoke to the life and industry and intercourse and wealth of the world around them. The king himself was "large hearted" (I K 4 29), versatile, with literary tastes; "spake three thousand proverbs; and his songs were a thousand and five"; and his whole generation, both in Israel and surrounding nations, was engaged in a vigorous movement of thought and "wisdom" (see the whole passage, I K 4 29-34). For the unit and vehicle of this new thought the old native form of the mashal or proverb was chosen; it became the recognized medium of popular education and counsel, esp. of the young; and the mashal itself was molded to the classic form, condensed, pointed, aphoristic, which we see best exemplified in the Book of Prov 10-22 16—probably the earliest collection of this kind of literature. In this body of proverbs we see also them that instead of merely affirming or denying an assertion of the popular proverb, as it appears in I S 10 12; 24 13, these composers of literary proverbs borrowed the poetic parallelism, or couplet, which in two lines sets two statements in opposition, each with an antithesis or repetition, and cultivated this to its utmost extent in epigrammatic construction. Thus the mashal took...

Up to the time of this literary development a proverb was recognized simply as a proverb, with no identification of its form, source, or even of the name of its author. Under the generic term mashal, certain elements were differentiated; not, however, as we are wont to distinguish—parable, fable, apologue, allegory—these were undifferentiated. The most fundamental distinction of classes, perhaps, is given in Prov 1:6: “To understand a proverb, and a figure, the words of the wise, and their dark sayings.” Here it seems the word “proverb” (mashal) and “words of the wise,” paired off with each other, are the generic terms; the other two, the differentiating terms, name respectively the two fundamental directions of the mashal, toward the clear and toward the enigmatic. Both are essential elements. The word tr “figure” (מָשָׁל, mšlḥ) is rather “interpretation,” and seems to refer to the illuminative element of the mashal, and this was mainly analogical. Not only objects, phases of experience, contrasts were drawn in the mashal, to make analogies for life; Solomon’s use of plants and animals in his discourses (1 K 4:33) was not by way of natural history, but as analogies to illustrate his mšlḥim. The word tr “dark sayings” (מִשְׁרָל, mšrʾl) is the word elsewhere tr “riddle” (Samson’s riddle, for instance, was a k’thubh, Jgs 14:13.14), and refers to that quality of the proverb which, by challenging the hearer’s acumen, gives it zest; it is due to an association of things so indirectly related that one must supply intermediate thoughts to resolve them. All of this concurs to justify the proverb as a capital vehicle for instruction and counsel; it has the elements that appeal to attention, responsive thought, and memory, while on the other hand its basis of analogies makes it detached. This is Unit of a strain of literature. Until it reached its classic perfection of phrasing, say during the time from Solomon to

1. From Hezekiah, the formal development of Detachment the proverb was concentricative; the the proverb was concentricative; the subject craved further elucidation, and so a group of several couplets was sometimes necessary to present a case (cf. especially the sluggard, Prov 26:13–16). From this group of proverbs the transition was easy to a continuous passage, in which the snappy parallelism of the proverb yields to the flow of poetry; see e.g. Prov 27:23–27. This is due evidently to a more penetrative and analytic mode of thinking, which can no longer satisfy its statement of truth in a single illustration or maxim.

As the store of detached utterances on various phases of practical life accumulated and the task of collecting them was undertaken, it was seen that they had a common suffusion and bearing, that in fact they constituted a distinctive strain of literature. This field of literature was broad, and recognized (see Prov 1:1–5) as promotive of many intellectual virtues; but the inclusive name under which it was gathered was Wisdom (חכמה, ḫkbnah). Wisdom, deduced thus from a fund of maxims and analogies, became the Heb equivalent for philosophy. With the further history of it this article is not concerned, except to note that the mashal or proverb form held itself to a common frame wherein it extended discourse, or to hold itself in to the couplet form. As to illustrative quality, too, its scope was liberal enough to include a fully developed parable; see for instance Ezek 17:1–10, where the prophet is bidden to “put forth a riddle, and speak a parable (lit. mšlḥ) unto the house of Israel.”

The existence of so considerable a body of proverbs is a testimony to the Heb genius for sententious and weighty expression, a virtue

2. The Differenciation of wisdom the mashal form was borrowed by the later scribes and doctors of the law; we see it for instance in loose and artificial use in such books as Pirke ʿAboth, which gives the impression that the utterance was represented in the Solomonic proverbs had become decadent. It is in another direction rather that the virtues of the mashal reach their culmination. In the phrasal felicity and illustrative lucidity of Our Lord’s discourses, and no less in His parables, employed that the multitudinous “riddles” may see and yet not see (Mt 4:12), we have the values of the ancient mashal in their perfection, in a literary form so true to its object that we do not think of its artistry at all. The Scripture book which in both the Heb and the Gr arrangement of its words stands between the Pss and the Ps. The Heb Canon it stands second in the final or supplementary division called k’thubhīm (LXX Ἱαπαυσίαν, Paronomais), “writings”; placed there probably because it would be most natural to begin this section with standard collections nearest at hand, which of course would be psalms and proverbs. This book is an anthology of sayings or lessons of the sagas on life, character, conduct; and as such embodies the distinctly educational strain of Heb literature.

I. THE BOOK’S ACCOUNT OF ITSELF.

At the beginning, intended apparently to cover the whole work, stands the title: “The proverbs of Solomon the son of David, king of Israel.” It seemed good to the compilers, however, to retain an older heading, “The proverbs of Solomon” at ch 10, as in some special sense the collection there beginning deserved it; and at ch 26 still another heading occurs: “These also are proverbs of Solomon the son of David, king of Judah copied out.” All these ascribe the proverbs to Solomon; but the heading (30:1), “The words of Agur the son of Jakeh; the oracle,” and the heading (31:1), “The words of king Lemuel; the oracle which his mother taught him,” indicate that authorship other than that of Solomon is represented; while the mention of "the words of the wise" (1:6; 22:17), as also the definite heading, "These also are sayings of the wise" (24:23), ascribes parts of the book to the sages in general. The broadest possible use of the term "sages" is followed in the whole book. Then we set 7 lays down an initial point, or spiritual bedrock of Wisdom, the fear of Jehovah, a principle repeated toward the end of this introductory section (9:10), and evidently regarded as very vital to the whole Wisdom system; cf. Job 28:12; Ps 111:10. In what sense this book, with its composite structure so outspoken, can lay claim to being the work of Solomon, is hortatory; it is addressed to "my son" (1:8 and often) or "my sons" (4:1; 5:7; 7:24; 8:32), in the tone of a father or a sage, bringing stores of wisdom and experience to the young. The first six verses are preface, giving the purpose and use of the book, but the whole is a spiritual bedrock of Wisdom, the fear of Jehovah, a principle repeated toward the end of this introductory section (9:10), and evidently regarded as very vital to the whole Wisdom system; cf. Job 28:12; Ps 111:10. The most striking feature of the section, besides its general homiletic tone, is its personification of Wisdom. She is represented as calling to the sons of men and commending to them her ways (1:20-33; 8:1-21,32-36); she condescends, for right and purity's sake, to enter into rivalry with the 'strange woman,' the temptress, not in secret, but in open and fearless dealing (7:6-8; 9:1-6,13-18); and, in a supremely poetic passage (8:22-31), she describes her relation from the beginning with God and with the world. The son of man is thus presented as the Heb mind came to set upon the human embodiment of Wisdom. The Heb philosopher thought not in terms of logic and dialectics, but in symbol and personality; and to this high rank, almost like that of a goddess, his imagination has exalted the intellectual and spiritual powers of man. See WISDOM.

The section 10:1-22:16, with the repeated heading "The proverbs of Solomon," seems to have been the original nucleus of the whole collection, like all the other books. All the proverbs in this section, the longest section of the book, are moulded strictly to the couplet form (the one triplet, 19:7, being only an apparent exception, due probably to the loss of a line), each proverb a parallelism in condensed phrasing, in which the second line gives either some contrast to or some amplification of the first. This was doubtless the classic art norm of the Solomonic masha."

II. The Successive Compilations.—That the Book of Prov is composed of several collections made at different times is a fact that lies on the surface; as many as eight of these are clearly marked, and perhaps subdivisions may be made of each. The book was not originally conceived as the development of a theme, or even as a unity; whatever unity it has was an afterthought. That is true, however, for one homogeneous body of truth, and to receive a name and a degree of articulation as such, will be maintained in a later section (see III, below). Meanwhile, we will take the sections in order and note some of the salient characteristics of each. The introductory section, chaps. 1-9, marks the works of having been added later than most of the rest; and is introductory in the sense of concentrating the thought to the concept of Wisdom, and of recommending the spiritual attitude in which it is to be received. Its style—and in this it is distinguished from the rest of the book—is hortatory; it is addressed to "my son" (1:8 and often) or "my sons" (4:1; 5:7; 7:24; 8:32), in the tone of a father or a sage, bringing stores of wisdom and experience to the young. The first six verses are preface, giving the purpose and use of the book, but the whole is a spiritual bedrock of Wisdom, the fear of Jehovah, a principle repeated toward the end of this introductory section (9:10), and evidently regarded as very vital to the whole Wisdom system; cf. Job 28:12; Ps 111:10. The most striking feature of the section, besides its general homiletic tone, is its personification of Wisdom. She is represented as calling to the sons of men and commending to them her ways (1:20-33; 8:1-21,32-36); she condescends, for right and purity's sake, to enter into rivalry with the 'strange woman,' the temptress, not in secret, but in open and fearless dealing (7:6-8; 9:1-6,13-18); and, in a supremely poetic passage (8:22-31), she describes her relation from the beginning with God and with the world. The son of man is thus presented as the Heb mind came to set upon the human embodiment of Wisdom. The Heb philosopher thought not in terms of logic and dialectics, but in symbol and personality; and to this high rank, almost like that of a goddess, his imagination has exalted the intellectual and spiritual powers of man. See WISDOM.

The section 10:1-22:16, with the repeated heading "The proverbs of Solomon," seems to have been the original nucleus of the whole collection, like all the other books. All the proverbs in this section, the longest section of the book, are moulded strictly to the couplet form (the one triplet, 19:7, being only an apparent exception, due probably to the loss of a line), each proverb a parallelism in condensed phrasing, in which the second line gives either some contrast to or some amplification of the first. This was doubtless the classic art norm of the Solomonic masha. The section seems to contain the product of that period of poetic culture during which the poetic model was a little rigid and severe, not venturing yet to limber up the form. Signs of a greater freedom, however, begin to appear, and the possibility of the closed circuit of the thought. Out of 184 proverbs only 19 do not contain some form of contrast, and 19 of these are in ch.15. In 18-22 16, on the other hand, the prevailing form is the so-called synonymous or amplified couplet, which leaves the thought-circuit more open to illustrative additions. Out of 191 proverbs only 18 are antimetabole, and these contain contrasts of a more subtle and hidden suggestion. As to subject-matter, the whole section is miscellaneous; in the first half, however, where the antithetical proverbs, are the most elemental distinctions of life, wisdom and folly, righteousness and wickedness, industry and laziness, wise speech and foolishness, justice and iniquity, there is a decided tendency to go farther afield for subter and less obvious distinctions, to reflect a growing and refining literary development, the gradual shaping and accumulation of materials for a philosophy of life, as yet, however, not articulated or reduced to unity of principle.

In the short section 22:17-24:23, the prover literature seems for the first time to have become as it were self-conscious—to regard itself as a strain of wise counsel to be reckoned with for its educative value. See WISDOM. The section is introduced by a preface (22:17-21), in which these "words of the wise" are recommended to some person or delegation, "that thou mayest carry back words of truth to them that send thee" (22:21). The counsels seem intended for persons in responsible position, perhaps attached to the court (cf 23 1–3), who, as they are to deal officially with men and affairs, need the prudence, purity, and temperance which will fit them for their duties. As to form, the detached couplet appears only occasionally; the favorite form is the quatrains; but proverbs of a greater number of lines are freely used, and one, the counsel on wine drinking (23 29–35), runs to 17 lines. In tone and spirit the collection (chs 1–9), and provokes the conjecture that this latter section, as the introduction to a compiled body of Wisdom, was composed not long after it.

The little compilation (24:25–29) is headed, "These also are sayings of the wise." They refer to wise intercourse and ordered industry.

4. Some Left-over Precepts

The little poem on the sluggard (24:30–34), with its refrain (vs 33, 34), is noteworthy as being apparently one stanza of a poem which is completed with the same refrain in the introductory section (6:6–11). The stanzas are of the same length and structure; and it would seem the latter named was either discovered later or composed as a supplement to the one and supplied a key to the name of one of the descendants of Ishmael (Gen 25:14), presumably a tribal designation. The Heb sages from the beginning were in rivalry and fellowship with the sages of other nations (cf 1 K 4:30–31) and in the Book of Job, the supreme reach of Wisdom utterance, all of the sages, Job included, are from countries outside of Pal. King Lemuel, if an actual personage, was not a Jew; and probably Agur was not. The words of Lemuel are a mother's plea to her royal son for chastity, temperance and justice, the kingly virtues. The form is the simple Heb parallelism, not detached couplets, but continuous.

The Book of Prov ends in a manner eminently worthy of its high standard of sanity and wisdom. Without any heading (it may possibly belong to the "oracle that the mother of Lemuel taught her son") the last 22 verses of the Book, 31:10–31, constitute a single poem in praise of Israel, of her beauty, her excellence, esp. her household virtues.

In form these verses begin in the original with the successive 22 letters of the Heb alphabet; a favorite form of Heb verse, as may be seen in (the original) in several of the Psalms, notably Ps 115, and in chs 1–4 of the Book of Lam.

III. Movement toward a Philosophy.—It has been much the fashion with modern critics to deny to the Hebrews a truly philosophic mind; this they say was rather the distinctive gift of the Greeks; while for their solution of the problem of life the Hebrews depended on direct revelation from above, which precluded that quasi-abeyance of concepts, that weighing of cosmic and human elements, involved in the commonly received notion of philosophy. This criticism takes account of only one side of the Heb mind. It is true they believed their life to be in direct contact with the will and word of Jeh, revealed to them in terms which could not be questioned; but in the findings and deliverance of their own intellectual powers, too, they had a reliance and confidence which merits the name of an authentic philosophy. But theirs was a philosophy not of speculative world-making, but of conduct and the practical management of life; and it was intuitive and analogical, not the result of logical thinking. Hence its name wisdom, the solution itself, rather than philosophy, the love of wisdom, the search for solution. This Book of Prov, beginning with detached maxims on the elements of conduct, reveals in many suggestive ways the gradual emergence of a philosophy, a comprehensive wisdom, as it were, in the making; it is thus the pioneer book of that Heb Wisdom which we see developed to maturing things in the books of Job and Ecc. Some of its salient stages may here be traced.

We may first note it, or the literary preparation for it, in the opening of the third unit, ten verses of a thought, with added elements of illustration, explanation, amplification, a development that bears a close resemblance, in the opening section (the classic, nuce, sec. 2) at about ch 16. The proverbial and antithetic statements contrast a pair of two aspects of truth in such a way as to close the case; there was nothing for it but to go on. This had the good effect of setting over against each other the great element of righteousness and wickedness, of obedience and lawlessness, teachableness and perversity, industry and laziness, prudence and presumption, rectitude and prating, etc., and so far forth it was a matter of analysis of the essentials of individual and social conduct. As soon, however, as the synonymous and illustrative m'shāl prevails, we are conscious of a limbering up and greater penetrativeness of the range of thought: it is open to subtler distinctions and remoter discoveries, and the analogies tend to employ the less direct and less signifying cause and effect. This is increased as we go on, esp. by the greater call upon the imagination in the figurative tissue of the Hebrew section, and the more readily greater facility to the riddling and paradox element. The m'shāl increases in length, and, at the same time, in that by the prolonging of similar subjects and by the enlargement from the close and its quatrain and the developed poem. All this, while not yet a self-conscious philosophy, is a step on the way thereto.

One solid presupposition of the sages, like an axiom, was never called in question: namely, that righteousness and wisdom are identical, that righteousness of any sort is folly without, and righteousness delivereth from death (Prov 10 2). Thus from the outset is furnished an uncompromising background on which the fascinating allurements of vice, the crooked ways of injustice and dishonesty, the sober habits of goodness and right dealing, show for what they are and what they tend to. The sages thus put themselves, too, in entire harmony with what is taught by priests and prophets; there is no room for the law oracles to supply the third strand in the threefold cord of instruction (of Jer 18 18). From this basal presupposition other principles, scarcely less axiomatic, come in view: that the four and spring of wise living is reverence, the fear of Jehovah; that the earnestness of mind is teachableness, the precluding attitude of perverseness; that it is the mark of wisdom, or righteousness, to be fearless and above board, of wickedness, which is fully, to be crooked and secretive. These principles recur constantly, not as a system, but in numerous aspects and applications in the practical business of life. For their sanctions they refer naively to the Heb idea of rewards on the one hand—wealth, honor, long life, family (cf Prov 1 13)—and of destruction on the other; but these are emphasized not as direct bestowments or infusions from a personal Deity, rather as in the law of human nature. The law that evil works its own destruction, good brings its own reward, is bearing itself in men's reason as one of the fundamental concepts of which grew the Wisdom philosophy.

From times long before Solomon sagacity in counsel, and skill to put such counsel into maxims or paradoxes, gain the possession, whether man or woman, of a natural leadership in the local communities (cf 2 8 14 2; 20 16); and Solomon's exceptional endowment showed itself not merely in his literary tastes, but in his ability, much esteemed among Orientals, to determine the merits of cases brought before him for judgment (1 K 3 16 28), and to answer puzzling questions (1 K 10 1 67). It was from the Conception such estimate of men's intellectual powers, from the recognition of mental magnificence and of this application to the practical issues of life (of Prov 1 5), that the conception of Wisdom in its larger sense arose. As, however, the cultivation of such sagacity of utterance passed beyond the stage of time and of court speech (cf 1 29 34) into the hands of city elders and sages, it attained to greatly enhanced value; note how the influence of such a sage is idealized (Job 29 7 25). The sages had a definite calling and mission of their own, more potent perhaps than belonged to priests and prophets; the frequent reference to the young and the simple or immature in the Book of Prov would indicate that they were virtually the schoolmasters and educators of the nation. As such, working as they did in a fellowship and collaboration with each other, the subject-matter with which they dealt would not remain as casual and miscellaneous maxims, but would toward a center and system of doctrine which could claim the distinction of an articulated philosophy of life and the sages themselves would be identified with the great Heb ideal of righteousness and truth. We have already noted how this sense of the dignity and value of their calling manifested itself in the body of precepts sent in response to solicitation (as above), with its appendix (4 is loved (Prov 22 17 24 34). It was not long after this stage of Wisdom-culture, I think, that a very significant new word came into their vocabulary, the word tsithyth (תִּשִּׁית), a puzzle to the translators, variously rendered "sound wisdom," "effectual wisdom," and, correctly, "the exegesis," the technical term of the Wisdom literature," BDB, s.v.). Its earliest appearance, and the only one except in the introductory section (Prov 18 1), is where the man who separates himself from others' opinions and seeks his own desire is said to quarrel with all tsithyth. The word seems to designate Wisdom in its subjective aspect, as an authentic insight or intuition of truth, the human power to rise into the region of true revelation from below, as distinguished from the prophet, or the spirit of prophecy, identified from above. Outside of Prov and Job the word occurs only twice: once in Mic 6 9, and once in Isa 28 29, in which latter case the prophet has deliberately composited a passage (vs 23 29) in the chapter, and called by the designation the strain of insight to Jehovah. Evidently there came a time in the culture of wisdom when its utterances attained in men's estimate to a parity with utterances direct from the unseen; perhaps this explains why Agur's and Lemuel's words could be so highly ranked as oracles (see above, 6 and 7). At any rate, such a high distinction, an authority derived from intimacy with the creative work of Jehovah (8 30 31), is ascribed to Wisdom (kohinin, תִּשָּׁת) in the introductory section; "counsel is mine," Wisdom is made to say, and tisvith (Prov 8). Thus the Book of Prov reveals to us a philosophy, as it were, in the making and from scattered counsels attaining gradually to the summit where the human intellect could place its findings by the side of Divine oracles, together.

IV. Considerations of Age and Literary Kinship.—To get at the history of the Book of Prov, several inquiries must be raised. Were the proverbial compositions? The book, like the Book of Ps., is confessedly a product of the exilic or later accumulations, and both by style and maturing thought bearing the marks of different ages. When were the successive compilations made? And, finally, when did the strain of literature here represented reach that point of self-conscious unity and coordination which justified its being reckoned with as a strain by itself and choosing the comprehensive name Wisdom? What makes these inquiries hard to the fact that the proverbs are precepts for the common people, relating to ordinary affairs of the village, the market, and the field, and move in lines remote from politics and dynastic vicissitudes and wars. They are, to an extent far more penetrative and pervasive than law or prophecy, the educative literature on which, as on sturdy rank and file of the nation was nourished. Where there is no vision, the people let loose," says a Hezekian proverb (Prov 29:15); but they are also when there is no abiding tonic of social convention and principle. Precisely this latter it is which this Book of Prov in a large degree reveals; and in course of time its value was so felt that, as we have seen, it could rank itself as an asset of life by the side of vision. It represents, in a word, the human movement toward self-directiveness and self-reliance, without supine dependence on ruler or public sentiment (cf Prov 29:25,26). When and how was this same and wholesome communal fiber developed?

When Solomon and his court made the mashal an elegant fast, they builded better than they knew. There move on to the 1. Under the kings epigrammatic mold and polish, the éclat of a popular literature. This was done or at first (Solomon spoke his proverbs, 1 K 4.32-33); but the recording of such carefully expressed utterances could not be long delayed; perhaps this brief style coupé was the most natural early exercise in the new transition from the unyielding cuneiform to the use of papyrus and a more flexible alphabet, which probably the "men of Hezekiah" means just what is said; these men of letters were adding this supplementary collection (Prov 25-29) to a body of proverbs that already existed and were recognized as Solomon's. This would put the composition of the main body of the proverbs (chs 10-29) prior to the reign of Hezekiah. They represent therefore the chief literary instruction available to the people in the long period of the Kings from Solomon onward, a period which otherwise was very meagerly supplied. The Mos- saic Law as well as the Torah from the standpoint of the Law in the time of Josiah (2 K 22), was at best a sequestered thing in the keeping—or neglect—of priests and judges; the prophetic word was a specific message for great national emergencies; the accumu- lation that gives birth to the property of the temple and the cultus; what then was there for the education of the people? There were indeed the folk-tales and catechetical legends of their heroic history; but there were also, most influential of all, these wise sayings of the sages, groupe, bodies of persons resident in village centers, published in the open places by the gate (cf Job 29:7), embodying the elements of a common-sense religion and citizenship, and representing views of life which were not only Hebrew, but to a great extent international among the neighbor kingdoms. Understood so, these Solomonic proverbs furnish incomparably the best reflection we have of the religious and social standards of the common people, during a period otherwise meagerly portrayed. And from it we can understand that the property of character existed after all, and how well worth preserving for a unique mission in the world, in spite of the idolatrous corruptions that invaded the sanctuaries, the self-pleasing unconcern of the rulers and the pessimistic demoralization of the times.

For the point in the Heb literary history when these scattered Solomonic proverbs were recognized as a homogeneous strain of thought and the compilations were made and recommended as Wisdom, we can do no better, I think, than to name the age of Israel's literary prime, the age of Hezekiah. The "men of Hezekiah" did more than append their supplementary section (chs 25-29); the words "these also" (22:23), "gammel" in their heading imply it (see HEEZKIH, THE MAN OF). I apprehend the order and nature of their work somehow thus: I. The core of the Proverbs (II K 10-29) which was connected together as the proverbs most closely associated with Solomon, without much attempt at systematizing, substantially as these had accumulated through the ages in the rough order of their developing form and thought; II. The record of the search for the God in the past, the body of educational literature which lay nearest at hand, a body adapted especially, though not exclusively, to the inculcation of instruction and formation. This done, there next came to their knowledge a remarkable body of "words of the wise" (22:17-24, 25), which had been lost or did not come to light, so that a modelem was found for some persons in responsible position, and which were procured by a recommendation of them as "words of truth" designed to promote "trust in Jehovah" (22:19-21) which latter, as we know from Isaiah, was the great civic issue of Hezekiah's time. With this section naturally goes the little appendix of "sayings of the wise" (24:23-34), added probably at about the same time. These two sections, which seem to open the collection to matter beyond the distinctive Solomonic mashal, are, beyond the rest of the book, in the tone of the introductory section (chs 1-9), which latter, along with the Hezekian appendix of proverbs, constitutes partly as a new composition, partly as incorporating some additional findings (cf for instance the completion of the poem in the sluggard, 6:6-11). Thus, by the addition of this introductory section, the Book of Prov was recognized as a unity, probably not, with the initial proposition (1:1-6),7, and launched with such hortatory material as had already, on a smaller scale, been introduced there. Thus the whole of the book contains the praise of Wisdom as a human endowment, sharing in the mind and purpose of the Divine (8:22-31); but it has become aware also of the revelatory value of thehishlah (2:7; 3:21; 8:14), or chastened intuition (see above, III. 3), and dares to aspire, in its righteous teachableness, to the intimacy or secret friendship of Jehovah (3:34; 10:1); all this indicates the holy self-consciousness to which Wisdom has attained. I see no cogent reason for postponing the sub- stantial completion of the Book of Prov beyond the time of Hezekiah and perhaps of the King of Lemuel, with the final acrostic poem, may be later additions; but their difference in tone and work- shipmanship is just as likely to be due to the fact that while they are admitted, in the liberal spirit of the compiles, from foreign stores of wisdom. For spiritual clarity and intensity they do not rise to the height of the native Hev consciousness; and they incline to an artificial structure which suggests that the writer's interest is divided between sincere tshishlah and literary skill. For all the case of like something may be forgiven.

It is too early in the history of Wisdom to regard this Book of Prov as an articulated and coordinated system. It is merely what it purports to be, a collected body of literature having a common bearing and purpose; a literature of reverent and intelligent prophecy, involving the office of a Prophet.

3. Its Stage and Nature. Relations of life, and not assuming wisdom in Progressively to embody any mystic disclosures of truth beyond the reach of human reason. As such, it has a vocabulary and range of ideas of its own, which distinguishes it from another strain of literature. This is seen in those passages outside of the Book of Proverbs which deliberately assume, for some specific purpose, the Wisdom dialect. In Isa 28:23-29, the prophet, whom the perverse rulers have taunted with baby-talk (vs 9,10), appeals to them with the characteristic Wisdom call to attention (vers 23); and in illustrations drawn from husbandry proves to them that this also is from Jeh of hosts, 'who is transcendent in counsel, preeminent in tahshiyah,' (vers 29)—teaching them thus in their own vauanted idiom. In Mic 6:9-15, similarly, calling in tahshiyah to even the prophecy of prophecy ('in voice of Job), נְקֵי יְהוּדָה, מִשְׁרָראֶה, וּתָחֲשִׁיָּה (6:9), the prophet speaks of the natural disasters that men ought to derive from their abuse of trade relations, evidently appealing to them in their own favorite strain of thinking. Both these passages seem to reflect a time when the Wisdom dialect was prevalent and popular, although some are concerned to call in sound human intuition as an ally of prophecy. At the same time, as prophets have the right to do, they labor to give revelation the casting vote; the authentic disclosure of truth from Jeh is their objective, not the mere luxury of making clever observations on practical life. All this coincides in the Wisdom sphere, with what in Isaiah's and Micah's time was the supreme issue of state, namely trust in Jeh, rather than in crooked human devices (cf. Is 28:16; 29:15); and it is noteworthy that this is the venture of Wisdom urged by the editors of the Proverbs in their introductory exhortations (cf. 22:19; 3:5-8). In other words, these editors are concerned with inducing a spiritual attitude; and so in their literary strain they make their book an adjunct in the movement toward spirituality which Isaiah is laboring to promote. As yet, however, its findings are still in the periphrastic stage, stated as absolute and unqualified truths; it has not reached the sober testing of fact and interrogation of motive which it must encounter in order to become a seasoned philosophy of life. Its main pervading thesis—that righteousness in the fear of God is wisdom and bound for success, that wickedness is fatality and bound for destruction—is eternally sound; but it must make itself good in a world where so many of the enterprizes of life seem to come out the other way, and where there is so little appreciation of spiritual values. Nor is the time of preparation and rigid testing that is coming. Two psalms of this period (as I apprehend) (Pss 73 and 49) concern themselves with the anomaly of the successes of the wicked and the trials of the righteous; the latter pointedly adopting the Wisdom or mishabah style of utterance (Ps 49 3,4), both laboring to induce a more inward and spiritual attitude toward the problem. It remains, however, for the Book of Job to take the momentous forward step of setting wisdom on the unshakable foundation of spiritual integrity, which it does by subjecting its findings to the rigid test of fact and its motives to a drastic Sicanization. It is in the Book of Job thus in the Book of Job is followed by the Book of Ecc, that the Wisdom strain of literature, initiated by the Proverbs of Solomon, finds its OT culmination.

LITERATURE

1. Providence Defined.—The word "provides" (from Lut providere) means etymologically "to foresee." The corresponding word, προνοεῖν, means "forethought." Forethought and foreknowledge imply a future end, a goal, and a definite purpose and plan for attaining that end. The doctrine of final ends is a doctrine of final causes, and means that that which is last in realization and attainment is first in mind and thought. The most essential attribute of rational beings is that they act with reference to an end; that they act not only with thought but with forethought. As, therefore, it is characteristic of rational beings to make preparation for every event even as it is foreseen or anticipated, the word "providence" has come to be used less in its original etymological meaning of foresight than to signify that preparation, care and supervision which are necessary to secure a desired future result. While all rational beings exercise a providence proportioned to their powers, yet it is only when the word is used with reference to the Divine Being who is possessed of infinite knowledge and power that it takes on its real and true significance. The doctrine of Divine providence, therefore, has reference to that preservation, care and government which God exercises over all things that He has created, in order that they may accomplish the ends for which they were created.

"Providence is the most comprehensive term in the language of theology. It is the background of all the several departments of religious truth, a background mysterious in its commanded brightness and darkness. It penetrates and fills the whole compass of the relations of man with his Maker. It is unseen, and yet with the visible creation, and the visible creation with the work of redemption, and redemption with personal salvation, and personal salvation with the redemption of all things. It carries our thoughts back to the supreme purpose which was in the beginning with God, and forward to the forseen end and consummation of all things, while it includes between these the whole infinite variety of the dealings of God in the ages. (W. B. Pope, Compendium of Christian Theology, I, 456).

II. Different Spheres of Providential Activity Distinguished.—The created universe may be conveniently divided, with reference to Divine providence, into three departments: first, the ministrant or physical universe, which is composed or governed by God according to certain uniform principles called the laws of Nature; secondly, animate existence, embracing the vegetable and animal world, over which God exercises that providential care which is necessary to sustain the life that He created; and, thirdly, the rational world, composed of beings who, in addition to animate life, are possessed of reason and moral free agency, and are governed by God, not necessarily, but through an appeal to reason, having the power to obey or disobey the laws of God according to the decision of their own free will. This wise and broad care and supervision which God exercises over His created universe is commonly designated as His general providence, which embraces alike the evil and the good, in addition to which there is a more special and particular providence which He exercises over and in behalf of the good, those whose wills are in harmony with the Divine will.

III. Biblical Presentation of the Doctrine of Providence.—The word "providence" is used only once in the Septuagint, and 15 times in the Bible, viz., of man, in which sense it is now seldom used. (See also Rom 13 14, where the same Gr word is tr "provision." ) While, however, the Bib. use of the word calls for little consideration, the doctrine indicated by the term "providence" is one of the most significant in the Christian system, and is either distinctly stated or plainly assumed by every Bib. writer. The OT Scriptures are best understood when interpreted as a progressive revelation of God’s purposes. The Messianic expectations pervade the entire life and lit. of the Heb people, and the entire OT dispensation may not improperly be regarded as the moral training and providential preparation of the world, and even of the chosen people, for the coming in of the Messiah. In the apocryphal "Book of Wisdom" the word "providence" is twice used (14 3; 17 2) in reference to God’s government of the world. Rabbinical Judaism, according to Jos, was much occupied with discussing the relation of Divine providence to human free will. The Sadducees, he tells us, held an extreme view of human freedom, while the Essenes were believers in absolute fate; the Pharisees, avoiding these extremes, believed in both the overruling providence of God and responsibility of man (Ant, XIII, v, 9; XVIII, i, 3; BJ, II, viii, 14). See PHARISEES. The NT begins with the announcement that the "kingdom of heaven is at hand," which declaration carries along with it the idea of a providential purpose with reference to the final consummation of the dispersion that prepared for the Messiah’s coming. But the work of Christ is set forth in the NT, not only as the culmination of a Divine providence that preceded it, but as the beginning of a new providential order, a dispensation marked by the forethought and plan so comprehensive that it gives to the very idea of Divine providence a new, larger and richer meaning, both intensively and extensively, than it ever had before. The minutest want of the humblest individual and the largest interests of the world-wide kingdom of God are alike embraced within the scope of Divine providence as it is set forth by Christ and the apostles.

(1) Providence in the Pentateuch.—The opening sentence of the Scriptures, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," is a noble and majestic affirmation of God’s essential relationship to the origin of all things. It is followed by a God’s consequential utterance without the sacred volume that declare that He who created also preserves and governs all that He created. But the Israelitish nation was from the beginning of its history, in the Heb conception, the special object of God’s providence and care, though it was declared that Jeh’s lordship and government extended over all the earth (Ex 38 22). The Deuteronomist (10 14) uses language which implies that Divine possession of all things in heaven and earth carries along with it the idea of Divine prosperity and control; and he also regards Israel as Jeh’s peculiar possession and special care (32 8).

This special providence that was over the elect nation as a whole was also minute and particular, in that special individuals were chosen to serve in the affairs of the nation in the making of the nation, and were Divinely guided in the accomplishment of their providential mission. Thus Abraham’s providential place in history is set forth in Gen 7 8. Jacob acknowledges the same providential hand in his life (Gen 31 42; 45 15). The life of Joseph abounds in evidences of a Divine providence (Gen 39 5-7; 50 20). The whole life-history of Moses as it is found in the Pent is a study in the doctrine of Divine providence. Other lives as set forth in these early narratives may be less notable, but they are not less indebted to Divine providence for what they are and for what they accomplish for others. Indeed, as Professor Oehler emphatically states: "The whole system of revelation is nothing but the activity of that Divine providence which, in order to the realisation of the Divine aim, is at once directed to the whole, and at the same time proves itself efficacious in the direction of the life of separate men, and in the guiding of all circumstances" (OT Theology).

(2) The historical books of the OT.—In a sense all the books of the OT are historical in that they furnish material for writing a history of the people of Israel. See ISRAEL, HISTORY OF THE PEOPLE. The Pent, the Prophets, the Books of the Prophets, all furnish material for writing OT history; but there is still left a body of literature, including the books from Josh to Est, that may with peculiar fitness be designated as historical. These books furnish the interpretation and presentation of the facts of Heb history in their relation to Divine providence. The sacred historians undertake to give something of a Divine philosophy of history, in that they present the facts of history, to point out the evils of individual and national sin and the rewards and blessings of righteousness, and to show God’s ever-present and ever-governing hand in human history—that He is not a silent spectator of human affairs, but one in whom the whole history of the universe, to whom individuals and nations alike owe allegiance. To the Heb historian every event in the life of the nation has a moral significance, both because of its relation to God and because of its bearing on the providential mission and testing of Israel as the people of God through whom the Redeemer which covers the "dark ages" of Bible history, and is an enigma to many in the study of God’s hand in history, shows how far God must needs condescend at times in His use of imperfect and even sensual men to bring about even the most perfect and accomplish His work in the world. While therefore He condescends to use as instruments of His providence such men as Samson and Jephthah, it is never through these that He does His greatest work, but through an Abraham, a Joseph, a Moses, an Isaiah, through men of lofty moral character. And this is one of the most notable lessons of OT history if it be studied as a revelation of God's providential methods and instrumentality. Among these histories of great men we find growing clearer and stronger expression to God's providential relation to the physical world as its preserver and to the moral world as its Divine Governor than the author of Nehemiah. "Thou, even thou, art Lord alone; thou hast made heaven and heaven of heavens, with all their host, the earth, and all things that are therein, the seas, and all that is therein, and thou preservest them all. . . . Yet thou in thy manifold mercies forsookest them not in the wilderness; the pillar of the cloud departed not from them by day, to lead them in the way; neither of fire by night, to shew them light, and the way wherein they should go. Thou gavest also thy good spirit to instruct them" (9 6.19.20 AV). His words reflect the views that were entertained by all the OT historians of God in the government and guidance of the nation. Heb history, because of the Divine promises and Divine providence, is ever moving forward toward the Messianic goal.

(2) The Psalms.—The poets are among the world's greatest teachers, and the theology of the best poets generally represents the highest and purest faith that is found among a people. Applying this truth to the Heb race, we may say that in the Ps and the Book of Job we reach the highest points in the OT revelation as to the doctrine of Divine providence. The Psalmist's God is not only the Creator and Preserver of all things, but is a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God, a Being so full of tender mercy and loving-kindness that he will not fail to intercede for Him with the God whom Christ taught us to call "Our Father." Nowhere else in the entire Scriptures, except in the Sermon on the Mount, can we find such a full and clear exhibition of the minute and special providence of God over His faithful and believing children as in the Ps—notably such as Ps 91, 103, 104, and 139. Ps 106 traces God's hand in providential and gracious guidance through every stage of Israel's wondrous history. Thanksgiving and praise for past blessings and assistance abound in Ps 44, 66, 78, 85, 135. While the relation of God's power and providence to the physical universe and to the material and temporal blessings of life is constantly asserted in the Ps, yet it is the connection of inspired draughts of ethical and spiritual nature, with righteousness and faith and love, that marks the highest characteristic of the Psalmist's revelation of the doctrine of providence. That righteousness and obedience are necessary conditions and accompaniments of Divine providence in its moral aspects and results is evidenced by numerous declarations of the psalmists (1 6; 31 19.20; 74 12; 84 11; 91 1; 125 2). This thought finds happiest expression in Ps 37 23 AV: "The steps of a good man are ordered of the Lord, and he delighteth in his way." The inspired poets make it plain that the purpose of Divine providence is not merely to meet temporal wants and bring earthly blessings, but to secure the moral good of individuals and nations.

(4) The Wisdom Literature.—The doctrine of providence finds ample and varied expression in the Wisdom Lit. of the OT, notably in the Book of Prov. The power that preserves and governs and guides is also recognized as inseparable from the great events of history and human providence (Prov 3 21; 16 4). Divine providence does not work independently of man's free will; providential blessings are conditioned on character and conduct (Prov 26 10 AV; 2 7.8; 12 2.21). There cannot be, in OT terms of faith, any stronger statement of the doctrine of Divine providence than that given by the Wise Men of Israel in the following utterances recorded in the Book of Prov: "In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he will direct thy paths" (3 6); "A man's heart directs his steps" (16 9); "His lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of Jehovah" (16 33); "A man's goings are of Jehovah" (20 24); "The king's heart is in the hand of Jehovah as the watercourses; He turneth it whithersoever he will." (21 1); "The horse is prepared against the day of battle; but makes ready is of Jehovah." (3 21-26; 12 2.21). The conception of providence that is presented in the Book of Eccel seems to reflect the views of one who had had experience in sin and had come into close contact with many of life's ills. All things have their appointed time, but the realization of the providential purposes and ends of creaturely existence is, wherever human free agency is involved, always conditioned upon man's exercise of his free will. The God of providence rules and overrules, but He does not by His providence overcome and override man's true freedom. Things that are do not reflect God's perfect providence, but rather His providence as affected by human free agency and as marred by man's sin (Eccl 1 5-11). I know that there is nothing better for them, than to rejoice and to do good so long as they live. And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy good in all his labor, in the gift of God;" (vs 12.13; see also ver 14); "The righteous and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of Jehovah." (9 1); "The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong." (9 11). The same conclusion that the author of Eccel reached as to how human life is affected by Divine providence and man's sin has found expression in the oft-quoted lines of the great poet:

"There's a Divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew how we will."

(5) The Book of Job.—The greatest of all the inspired contributions to the Wisdom Lit. of the OT, the Book of Job, demands special consideration. It is the one book in the Bible that is devoted wholly to the subject of Divine providence. The perplexities of a thoughtful mind on the subject of Divine providence and its relation to human suffering have nowhere in the literature of the world found stronger and clearer expression than in this inspired drama of ethical and spiritual development. Job, the mighty and marvelous hero, Job represents not only a great sufferer, but an honest doubter: he dared to doubt the theology of his day, a theology which he had himself doubtless believed until experience, the best of all teachers, taught him its utter inadequacy to explain the deepest problems of human life and of Divine providence. The purpose of this book in the inspired volume seems to be to correct the prevailing theology of the day with regard to the subject of sin and suffering in the Book of Job to Divine providence. There is no more deplorable and hurtful error that a false theology could teach than that all suffering in this world is a proof of sin and a measure of one's guilt (see Affliction). It is hard enough for the innocent to suffer. To add to their suffering by teaching them that it is all God's will, that they are not, is to lay upon the innocent a burden too grievous to be borne. The value in the inspired Canon of a book written to reveal the error of such a false theology is greatly and easily be overestimated. The invaluable contribution which this book makes to the Bib. doctrine of providence is to be found, not in individual and detached sayings, striking and suggestive as some of these may be, but rather in the book as a whole. Statements concerning God's general providence abound in this inspired drama—such as these, for example: "...to all these, that the hand of Jeh hath wrought this, in whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind?" (Job 12:10); "Who hath given him a charge over the earth? or who hath disposed the whole world? He shall break in pieces mighty men without number, and set others in their stead" (Ps 13:24 AV).

But the special contribution of the Book of Job to the doctrine of Divine providence, as already indicated, is to set forth its connection with the fact of sin and suffering. Perplexed souls in all ages have been asking: Is God be all-powerful and all-good, why should there be any suffering in a world which He created and over which He rules? If He cannot prevent suffering, is He omnipotent? If He can, but will not prevent suffering, is He infinitely good? Does the book solve the mystery? We cannot claim that it does. But it does vindicate the character of God, the Creator, and of Job, the moral free agent under trial. It does show the power of a moral order, that is, of the free agents who are forming character; it does show that perfect moral character is made, not by Divine omnipotence, but by trial, and that physical suffering serves a moral end in God's providential government of men and nations. While the book does not clearly the problem of mystery, it does show how on the dark background of a suffering world the luminous holiness of Divine and human character may be revealed. The picture of this suffering man of Uz speaks with pathetic words of well-meaning friends, planting himself on the solid rock of his own conscious rectitude, and defying earth and hell to prove him guilty of wrong, and knowing that his Vindicator liveth and would come to his rescue—that is an inspiring picture that will make every innocent sufferer who reads it stronger until the end of time. (6) The prophetic writings.—Nowhere in all literature is the existence and supremacy of a moral and providential order in His universe clearly recognized than in the writings of the OT prophets. These writings are best understood when interpreted as the moral messages and passionate appeals of men who were not only prophets and preachers of righteousness, but who were the agents and teachers of the moral philosophy of history for the whole world. Each of the prophets is the voice of the King of the kingdom of God reveal a Divine providential plan for the world's redemption and education extending of necessity far into the future; and still beyond that, in His vision of Divine providence, evokes a day of final judgment, but students of Divine providence and reward, followed by a new and eternal order of things, in which the destiny of every man will be determined by his conduct and character in this present life. (See Our Lord's parable concerning the Kingdom: Mt 13:24–30; Mk 4:26ff; Lk 14:16ff; also Mt 24 and 25).

(2) The Johannine writings.—St. John's Gospel differs from the Synoptic Gospels in its mode of presenting the doctrine of providence chiefly in that it goes back to the mind and purpose of God in the very beginning (Jn 1:1–5), whereas the Synoptic Gospels simply go back to the Messianic prophecies of the OT. Both the Gospel and the Epp. of John in their presentation of Divine providence place the greater emphasis on Divine love and filial trust, the latter rising in many places to the point of positive assurance. The Book of Rev is a prophetic vision, in apocalyptic form, of God's providential purpose for the future, dealing not so much with individuals as with nations and with the far-reaching movements of history extending through the centuries. God is revealed in St. John's writings, not as an omnipotent and arbitrary Sovereign, but as an all-loving Father, who not only cares for His children in this life but is building for them a home to come a house of many mansions (Jn 14:1-20).

(3) The Book of Acts and other NT history.—The historical portions of the NT, as contained in the Acts, and elsewhere, while not eliminating or depreciating the element of human freedom in individuals and nations, yet recognize in human life and history the ever-present and all-controlling mind of that God in whom, it is declared, "we live, and move, and have our being" (Acts 17:28). The career of the first distinctive NT character begins with these words: "There came a man, sent from God, whose name was John" (Jn 1:6). But not only John, the forerunner, but every other individual, according to the NT conceptions, is a man "sent from God." The apostles conceive themselves to be such; Stephen, the martyr, was such; Paul was such (Acts 22:21). NT biography is a study in providentially guided lives, not omitting references to those who refuse to be so guided—for such the NT holds the human from generation, men who "are seen from God" refuse to go upon their Divinely appointed mission. The Day of Pentecost is the revelation of a new power in history—a revelation of the place and power which the Divine-human Christ and the Holy Spirit are to have henceforth in making history—in making the character of the men and the nations whose deeds are to make history. The most potent moral force in history is to be, from the day of Pentecost on, the ascended incarnate Christ, and He is to be all the more influencing in the life of man, because the work shall be done through the Holy Spirit. This is the historical view of providence as connected with the person of Christ, which the NT historians present, and which we, after 19 centuries of Christian history, are warranted in holding more confidently and firmly even than the Christians of the 1st cent. could hold it; for the Christian centuries have proved it true. What God is in Nature Christ is in history. All history was becoming Christian history. The NT conception of Divine providence in and through Christ.

(4) The Pauline writings.—No character of whom we have any account in Christian literature was providentially prepared for his life-work and providentially employed in illustrating that life-work more truly than was the apostle Paul. We find, therefore, as we would antecedently expect, that Paul's speeches and writings abound in proofs of his absolute faith in the ever-rolling providence of an all-wise God. His doctrine of predestination and foreordination is best understood when interpreted, not as a Divine power predetermining human destiny and nullifying the human will, but as a conception of Divine providence as the eternal purpose of God to accomplish an end contemplated and foreseen from the beginning, viz. the redemption of the world and the creation in and through Christ of a new and holy humanity. Every one of the Pauline Epistles bears witness to the author's faith in a Divine providence that overrules and guides the life of every soul that works in harmony with the Divine will; but this providence is working to secure as its chief end, not material and temporal blessings, but the moral and spiritual goods of those concerned. Paul's teaching concerning Divine providence in all concerns individuals, and is explicit when mentioned on character may be found summed up in what is perhaps the most comprehensive single sentence concerning providence that was ever written: "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose" (Rom 8:28 AV). Any true exposition of the NT doctrine of Divine providence that may be given can only be an unfolding of the content of this brief but comprehensive sentence. Paul the great teacher, that to the Rom, is a study in the divine philosophy of history, a revelation of God's providential purpose and plan concerning the salvation, not merely of individuals, but of the nations. These purposes, as Paul views them, whether they concern individuals or the entire race, are always associated with the mediatorial ministry of Christ: "For of him, and through him, and unto him, are all things. To him be the glory for ever" (Rom 11:36).

(5) The Petrine Epistles and other NT writings.—The Epistles of Peter, James, and Jude, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, are all in entire accord with the teachings of the other NT writings already considered. St. Peter, who at first found it so hard to see how God's providential purpose in and for the Messianic kingdom could be realized if Christ should suffer and die, came later to see that the power and the glory of Christ and His all-conquering gospel are inseparably connected with the sufferings and death of the Messiah (1 Pet 3:18). Concerning God's providence over the righteous can be clearer or stronger than the following utterance of Peter: "The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears unto their supplication. But the face of the Lord is against those that do evil. And who is he that will hurt you, if ye be zealous of that which is good?" (1 Pet 3:12-13). The purpose and end of Divine providence as viewed in the Epistle of James are always ethical: as conduct and character are the end and crown of Christian effort, so they are the end and conclusion, where Divine providence is concerned, of the character of God's servants in the world. And God's providence is a matter of the greatest interest to all the characters in it, whether they are God's people or God's enemies. In the case of the former, the mind of the character is greatly enriched by a more comprehensive study of the lessons of history that illustrate the workings and the retributions of the moral law under Divine providence than is found in the Epistle of Jude (see esp. vs. 5:7.11.14.15.24).

From this brief survey of the teachings of the OT and NT Scriptures concerning the doctrine of Divine providence, it will be seen that, while the NT reaffirms in most particulars the doctrine of Divine providence as set forth in the OT Scriptures, there are three particularly in which the points of emphasis are changed, and by which new and changed emphasis the doctrine is greatly enriched in the NT.

(1) The fatherhood and love of God in providence.—The God of providence in the OT is regarded as a Sovereign whose will is to be obeyed, and His leading attributes are omnipotence and holiness, whereas in the NT God is revealed not only as Father and His providence is set forth as the forethought and care of a father for His children. His leading attributes here are love and holiness—His very omnipotence is the omnipotence of love. To teach that God is not only revealed as Father and adored, but a tender and loving Father who is ever thinking of and caring for His children, is to make God lovable and turn His providence into an administration of Almighty love.
(2) The place of Christ and the Holy Spirit in providence. The doctrine of the Godhead in NT is connected with the person of Christ and the administration of the divine life in a manner that distinguishes it from the OT presentation of a personal God. One God who was there revealed in the simple unity of His three persons, to be prayed to as He be worshiped, as some theologians have taught, that "God the Father plans, God the Son executes, and God the Holy Ghost administers," is now evident if real work exclusively of Christ and the Holy Spirit: but this traditional division of work, however rational it be, cannot be accepted as an accurate statement of Bib. doctrine. The work of creation, of course, may be imagined as proceeding from a divine trinity, but the work both of creation and providence. Thus Paul: "For by him all things were created, that are in heaven and earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: and he is before all things, and by him all things consist." (Col. 1:16, 17 AV). Although this and other passages refer to Christ's relation to general providence, including the government of the physical universe, yet it is only when the Divine providence is concerned with the redemption of a lost world and the establishment of the Kingdom of God in the hearts and lives of men, that the full extent of the NT's interest in the function of the Holy Spirit is evident. The saving and perfecting of men is the supreme purpose of providence, if it be viewed from the NT standpoint, which was that of Christ's mediating activity.

(3) The new emphasis upon moral and spiritual blessings.—The NT not only subordinates the material and temporal aspects of providence to the spiritual and eternal more than does the OT, but Christ and the apostles, to an extent that finds no parallel in the OT, place the emphasis of the teaching concerning providence upon man's moral needs and eternal interests, and upon the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, the establishment of which in the hearts and lives of men is the one great object for which the heavenly Father and His children are ceaselessly working. To be free from sin, to be holy in heart and useful in life, to love and obey God as a Father, to love and serve men as brothers—this is the ideal and the end for which, according to the NT, men should work and pray, and this is the end toward which God is working by His ceaseless cooperative providence.

IV. Discussion of the Contents of the Biblical Doctrine.—There are four distinct conceptions of providence as it concerns God's relation to the ongoing life of the world and the views of man, the rational and moral free Providence agent whom He has placed upon it, viz. the atheistic, the deistic, the pantheistic, and the theistic or Bib. view. See also Ch. 4, p. 244. This framed view must be understood only when stated in comparison and contrast with these opposing views.

(1) Atheism, or materialism, stands at one extreme, affirming that there is no God, that the material universe is eternal, and that from material atoms, eternally endowed with certain properties, there have come, by a process of evolution, all existing forms of vegetable, animal and rational life. As materialism denies the existence of a personal Creator, it of course denies any and every part of divine providence.

(2) Pantheism stands at the other extreme from atheism, teaching that God is everything and everything is God. The proof that the universe is "the living garment of God," the soul of the world, the universe His existence, is not to be found in a personal God who can express His existence in terms of self-consciousness—i. Th., Thu. Providence, according to pantheism, is spiritual, the creative act of a personal God, differing from materialism only in the name which it gives to the infinite substance from which all things flow. The point of departure is, that there is one God, and that He created the world, but created things do not need His presence and the maintenance of His power in order to run their course. The material universe is placed under immutable law; while man, the responsible agent, is left free to do as he will. God sustains, according to deism, very much the same relation to the universe that the clockmaker does to his clock, and wound it up, he does not interfere with it, and the longer it can run without the maker's intervention the greater the evidence of wisdom and skill on the part of the maker. God is meant to be God, not that there is a supernatural revelation to the man. The only religion that is possible to man is natural religion; he may reason from his knowledge of God in nature up to a knowledge of God as the creator of the world. His subjective influence is of great importance; it helps us to answer our own prayers, to be assured that it be heard. If the Deity is a praying-hearing God, He is at least not a prayer-anwering God. The laws of Nature constitute God's general providence; but there is no other personal and special providence than this, according to deism. God, the deists affirm, is too great, too distant, too transcendental a Being to concern Himself with the details of creaturely existence.

(4) The theistic or Biblical conception of providence teaches that not only the Creator but the Preserver of the universe, and the wise government of the universe, no less than its creation, implies and necessitates at every moment of time an omnipotent and omnipresent personal Being. This world is not "governed by the laws of Nature," as deism teaches, but it is "governed by God, according to the laws of Nature." "Law," in itself, is an impotent thing, except as it is the expression of a free will or person back of it; "the laws of Nature" are meaningless and impotent, except as they are the expression of the uniform mode, according to which God preserves and governs the world. It is customary to speak of the laws of Nature as if they were certain self-existent forces or powers governing the world. But shall we not rather say that there is no law except what is created by the Divine will or created wills? If this be true, then it is inconsistent to say that God has contracted the government of the physical universe to "secondary causes"—that is, to the laws of Nature—and that these causes are not in themselves dependent upon Him for their efficiency. The omnipotent and ever-active God is the only real force and power and cause in the universe, except as created wills may be true and real causes within their limited bounds. This view of God's relation to the created universe serves to distinguish the Bib. doctrine of Divine providence from the teachings of materialists and deists, who eliminate entirely the Divine hand from the ongoing of the universe, and in its stead make a god of the "laws of Nature," and hence have no need for a Divine preserver. Bib. theism makes ample room for the presence of the supernatural and miraculous, but we must not be blind to a danger here, in that it is possible to make too much of the presence of God in this way of expressing His (revelation, inspiration, and miracle) as to overlook entirely His equally important and necessary presence in the natural—which would be to encourage a deistical conception of God's relation to the world and to exaggerate the expense of His immanence. That is the true theistic doctrine of providence which, while not undervaluing the supernatural and miraculous, yet steadfastly maintains that God is none the less present in, and necessary to, what is termed the "natural."
the created universe is defined as an act of “continuous creation.” By the Divine Immanence is meant something more than omnipresence, which term, in itself alone, does not affirm any causal relation between God and the world. Not present, whereas the term “immanence” does affirm such causal relation. By asserting the Divine Immanence, therefore, as the mode of God’s providential efficiency, we affirm that all created things are dependent upon Him for continued existence, that the laws of Nature have no efficiency apart from their Creator and Preserver, that God is to be sought and seen in all forms and phases of creaturely existence, in the natural as well as the supernatural and miraculous, that He is not only omnipresent but always and everywhere active both in the natural and the spiritual world, and that without Him neither the material atom, nor the living organism, nor the rational soul could have any being. He not only created all things, but “by Him all things consist,” that is, by Him all things are preserved in being.

What, then, let us ask, do the Scriptures teach as to the purpose and end of God’s providential care? Without a doubt, the Bible is mainly concerned with the highest and purest use of the Divine Providence. How should we understand the “final cause” of the Creator? If we can think God’s thoughts after Him and discover this “final cause” of creation, with even approximate accuracy, then we shall find a principle that will illuminate at least, if it does not fully explain, the methods and mysteries of providence. We venture to affirm that the controlling thought in the mind of God in establishing this order of things, of which we are a conscious part, was to create a race of beings who should find their highest happiness by being in the highest degree holy, and who should, in proportion as they attain their highest holiness and happiness, thereby in the highest degree glorify their Creator. The Creator’s highest glory can be promoted only by such beings as are at once rational, moral, free, holy. There are unconscious, unthinking, unmoral forms of existence, but the motive and meaning of the universe is to be found, not in the lower, the physical and animal, but in the highest, in the rational and moral. They are the most holy, the most blessed, the most holy. But creatures are the animal for the spiritual and moral. A being whose character is formed under the conditions and laws of intellectual and moral freedom is higher than any being can be that is what it is necessarily, that is, by virtue of conditions over which it has no control. Character that is formed freely under God’s government and guidance will glorify the Creator more than anything can which is made to be what it is wholly by Divine omnipotence. These things being true, it follows that God’s providence in the world will be directed primarily and ceaselessly toward developing character in free moral agents, toward reducing sin to the minimum and developing the government of holiness, in every way and by every means compatible with perfect moral freedom in the creature.

The possibility of sin in a world of free agents and in a state of probation is unavoidable, but to say that sin is possible does not mean that it is necessary. See Choose: Will. The final cause and end, the purpose and motive, of Divine providence, then, are not the temporal, material and earthly happiness of men, but the highest ultimate moral good of free beings whose highest happiness is to be found in their obedience to the holy will of God, as their Father, and secondly, loving and self-sacrificing service to their fellow-men. This ever-present and all-dominating moral purpose of Divine providence determines its methods and explains, in part at least, what would otherwise be its mysteries.

With this view of Divine Providence and the general trend of Bib. thought is in entire accord. In the light of Christ’s revelation of God as a holy and loving Father who regards all men as His children and whose chief concern is to develop holiness and love in those whom He loves, we may define Divine Providence as the infinite power to accomplish the ends of infinite holiness and love. The originating and determining cause of Divine providence is, in the NT conception of it, always to be found in the love of God, while the final cause is the glory of the Father as realized in the holiness and happiness of His children.

By the doctrine of special providence, according to the best use of that term in theological literature, is meant as already indicated, that minute care and ever-watchful supervision which God exercises over His obedient and believing children in times both small and great, which are designed to secure their ever-increasing holiness and usefulness. God’s general providence is said to be “omnipresent,” “omnipotent,” and “omnipotent,” to the minute details of creaturely existence— and is always, everywhere, and for all time, the “work of providence.” But the Scriptures teach that there is a more special care over and ordering of the lives of the spiritually good than pertains to the wicked. They have not the same eyes. The following Scriptures set forth in unmistakable terms the doctrine of a special providence exercised by the heavenly Father over His people: “A man’s goings are established of Jehovah; and he delighteth in his way” (Ps 37:23). “There shall be no mishap happen to the righteous” (Prov 12:21). “But I will make him first to inherit and to be full of honor; and all the days of the righteous: ‘A man’s goings are established of Jehovah; and he delighteth in his way’” (Prov 12:21).

The following points seem to be plainly involved in any statement of the doctrine of special providence that we claim to be from the inspiration of the Scriptures:

1. Spiritual, not material, good to man the end sought in special providence.—A mistaken and hurtful notion has long been prevalent to the effect that special providence is designed to secure the secular and earthly good, the material and temporal prosperity, of God’s children. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Material blessings may indeed come as a special providence to the child of God (Mt 6:31), but that “good” which all things work together for their secure, spiritual good, and not financial, or social, or intellectual, or temporal, is the ultimate spiritual good. Indeed, God’s special providence may take away wealth and bring poverty in its stead in order to impress the creature with the higher importance of the spiritual good, and not merely in order to make the creature suffer, but rather than further one’s worldly hopes and ambitions; may occasion sickness rather than health, and death instead of life—sometimes for a Christian to be increased in his faith by sickness or death than by health or continued life—and when that is the case, he shall be interpreted as special as a special providence. “Every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit.” Many of the O.T. promises do, it is true, seem to have special reference to material and temporal blessings, but we should remember that the best interpretation of these is to be found in the NT, where they are (as, for example, when quoted by Christ in the Temptation) interpreted to promote spiritual good (and, hence, to bring forth more fruit). When Our Lord speaks of the very hairs of our heads being numbered, and declares that if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without the Father’s notice, surely we, of whom more value than many sparrows, cannot drift beyond His love and care. He is interpreted as teaching that God will save us from physical suffering and death; but such is not His meaning, for in the very same context He speaks of how they to whom He thus pledges His love and care shall be persecuted and depressed for His name’s sake, and hence, put to death; indeed, His promise is true. God was with them in their physical suffering and death; but such is not their physical death, nor is God with them in their great blessing wherewith He blessed them was not physical but moral and spiritual.

2. Special Providence and “accidents.”—Another still more mistaken and hurtful notion concerning special providence is the association of it with, and the limitation of it largely to, those accidents, or what are called “accidents,” that are extraordinary and occasional occurrences which involve more than ordinary danger and annoyance. That special providence associates it with a happy escape from visible dangers and serious injury, when the house catches on fire, or the horses run away, or the train is wrecked, or the ship encounters an awful storm, or one comes in contact with contagious disease, or the terror of pestilence that walketh in darkness. A happy escape from injury thus occasioned is popularly designated as a "special providence," and this regardless of whether the individual thus escaping is a saint or a sinner, is strongly emphasized by the fact that God's special providence is not a capricious, occasional, and irregular intervention of His love and power in behalf of His peculiar children. It involves ceaseless, yet infinitely tender thought and care for those that love Him, everywhere and in every experience of life.

(3) Special providence as related to piously and prayer.—God's special providence is conditioned upon pious and prayerful habits. When we may properly pray for things pertaining to our temporal and physical life, there is no assurance that God will answer such prayers in so far as He deems best, yet the Scriptures encourage us to pray both for "all things," and for the special concerns of our prayers. "Seek ye first His kingdom, and His righteousness; this is the essence of the NT teaching on the subject, but we should overlook the fact that this Divine interposition is both preceded and followed by the strongest assurances of the most important and all-embracing provision for all our temporal and physical wants by the loving heavenly Father. Therefore take no thought saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? Wherewith shall we be clothed?.... For your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you. For where your mind is, there shall be your treasure also." (Matt. 6:25-33). The poet has written:

"Make you His service your delight; Your wants shall be His care." But while it is true that God has promised to make our wants and needs, and has reminded us that He has promised this only to that devout and godly number of pious, praying souls who "seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness," general providence is all-embracing, by which "he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." (Matt. 5:45). But, "As the Father hath power over all things, so doth the Son; therefore doth the Father love the Son, because he hath given him all power in heaven and on earth." (Matt. 28:18). And this is promised that "all things work together for good"—and the proof of love is not in one's profession, but in his obedience and service.

(4) Special providence as related to human cooperation.—To "works of love" and "concerning the heavenly Father's will" watchful and loving providence do not mean that the children become the agents in any sense, but only as thought of and charged with food and raiment, and labor daily to obtain the necessities of life. Labor, both mental and physical, is as much a duty as prayer. The prayer, "O give us this day our daily bread." does not render it unnecessary that they who offer it should work for their own daily bread. Nothing could be more hurtful to healthful Christian activity than to interpret Our Lord's instruction, in the Sermon on the Mount, as a command to live by the sweat of our brow. Nevertheless, the heavenly Father's watchful providence as a justification of our own cooperation is as "for our benefit" that it is simple to warn us against that needless and hurtful anxiety about the future which is not only unprofitable in God's sight, but which is utterly destructive of man's best efforts in his own behalf.

(5) General and special providence both equally Divine.—While the Scriptures appear to us to make a real and true distinction between God's natural and His supernatural order, and between His general and His special providence, yet to truly pious and wisely discerning souls all is alike Divine, the natural as well as the supernatural, general as well as special providence. So far as God's faithful and loving children are concerned, general and special providence are but one. The only real and important distinction between the two is that made by the free wills of men, by virtue of which some are in loving accord with the Divine plans concerning them, and others are at enmity with God and oppose the purposes of His love concerning them. If this love of the heavenly Father had and had always been, alike trustful and loving children of the heavenly Father, there would perhaps never have been any occasion for making a distinction between the general and the special providence of God. The only reason why it was expedient to refer to in that case would have been as to the varieties of Divine providence, in view of the fact that the all-loving Father would cause widely different events to happen to His different children. If anyone, therefore, is inclined to deny the distinction between the two, there have been made between general and special providence, and prefers to affirm that there is but one general providential order over mankind in the world, that the only thing that really "special" and out of the general order is the limit which sin imposes upon the workings of Divine providence in so far as the self-will and opposition of men prevent the realization of the providential purposes of God concerning them. But, unfortunately, sin is now, and has long been, so prevalent and dominant in the world that we have come to regard God's providence as affected and limited by it, as that which is regular and general, and His more perfect and complete providence in behalf of and over the good as the exceptional and special. But whether we call Divine providence, as related to believers, "general" or "special," is of little consequence, provided we believe that "the steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord." (Psa. 37:23 AV), that "all things work together for [spiritual] good to them that love God," and that to those who, duly subordinating the temporal to the spiritual, seek "first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," all things needful "shall be added unto [them]." (Matt. 6:33).

The problem of Divine providence has its utmost significance, not in its bearing on the laws of physical nature, but in that phase of it which concerns God's dealings with moral agents, where discretion, reason, and free will are factors of paramount importance.

Free Will—Will. God governs men as a father governs his children, as a king governs his free subjects; not as a machinist works his machine, or as a hypnotist controls his mesmerized victims. A father in his family and a sovereign in his realm may each do as he pleases within certain limits, and God infinitely more: "He doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand or say unto him, What dost thou?" (Dan. 4:35). He setteth up one and putteth down another. Nevertheless, even God acts within limits; He limited Himself when He created free agents. As a mere matter of power God could determine men's volitions and necessitate his acts, but He can do so only by making of him a kind of rational machine, and destroying his true freedom. But Scripture, reason and consciousness all unite in teaching man that he is morally free, that he is an agent, and not something merely acted on. God's providential government of men, therefore, is based on their freedom as rational and moral beings, and consists in such an administration and guidance by the Holy Spirit of the affairs of men as shall encourage free moral agents to virtue, and discourage them from sin. God's providence must needs work upon and with two kinds of wills—willing wills and opposing wills.

(1) Divine providence as related to willing wills.—The apostle declares that God works in believers "both to will and to do of his good pleasure." If God's special providence over and in behalf of His children may involve an intervention of His Divine power with regard to physical law, much more, it would seem, will it involve a similar intervention when the same power acts on free moral agents. The wise and holy use made of the human will. Spiritual guidance is one of the most precious privileges of believers, but it is difficult to conceive how the Holy Spirit can guide a believer without finding some way of controlling his will and determining his voluntary acts. While men of man's thoughts, emotions and volitions are self-determined in their origin, being due to their nature as self-determined, men of heart and will, yet there are also thoughts, emotions and volitions that are Divinely produced. Even a great deal of sin has its roots in the rights and emotions that are produced by the Holy Ghost. Much more harm has been done by Divinely produced thoughts and feelings than by the agency of moral free agency? We think not; it is no more subordinate to God that there should be evil than that there is a free moral agent.

But, one thing is evident, God is responsible for the exercise of a man’s volitions and secure a certain course of action than it is for one man effectively to influence another. No volition is effective, unless it be the conscience of a free moral agent; for moral volitions are such as are formed in the pursuit of most natural and common ends. The element of necessity and compulsion would destroy all true freedom, and moral accountability, for any prouctions of mind, if it were not for the voluntary nature of free beings as attributes of free beings would be thereby rendered impossible in men; for only such beings can put forth free holy volitions as can put forth free sinful volitions. If man had never sinned, there would probably have never been such a large providential use of natural or physical evil as at present prevails; and this because of the fact that an unfallen and holy race of beings would not have needed the presence of natural evil to secure their highest moral development. But, fast, though, the future does not seem to bring it back to God and to develop holy character and the highest moral service. It is not true that sin is now always or even generally the immediate cause of an individual’s sinning, but it is rather the result of that natural propensity, which is a proof of extraordinary sin.

"Master, who did sin, " asked the disciples, "this man, or his parents, that he was born blind?' Jesus answered, "Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God might be made manifest in him" (Jn 9:2-3 AV). Human suffering is for man’s spiritual good and for the Divine glory, as shown in working good out of evil—this is the explanation which the Master gives as to why natural evil is permitted or sent by God. It is not only a powerful, but in a world like ours, a necessary agency for the correction and cure of moral evil and for the spiritual development of fallen man. Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now I observe thy word... It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I may learn thy statutes" (Ps 119:67-71); "Every branch that beareth fruit, he cleanseth it, that it may bear more fruit" (Jn 15:2). The saintly and eminently useful men and women of history have, as a rule, had to undergo a severe discipline in order to keep them pure and were made perfect only by their sufferings. Divine providence thus turns much of the world’s natural and physical evil into moral good.

Many of the things that befall the children of God are directly due to the sins of other men. That good men, even the very best of men, suffer many things at the hands of wicked men admits of no questions; and not these are among the “all things” which are declared by the apostle to work together for good to them that love God. The good that may ensue to good men from the evil conduct of the wicked is certainly not due to the intrinsic power in sin to work good to those against whom it is maliciously directed; it can only be due to God directing and working good of the innocent. “As for you,” said Joseph, “ye meant evil against me; but God meant it for good” (Gen 50:20). 5. Divine Providence as Related to Natural and Moral Evil. For the existence of the world in moral evil (sin), man, the moral free agent, is wholly responsible. God could prevent moral evil from sinning only by not permitting them to work under their wills under irresistible Divine restraint and compulsion. But the latter method of controlling them would virtually destroy their real and true freedom; and if this were done, then man would be no longer a voluntary or vicarious agent.

here again to remark that it is not material and temporal, but spiritual good, that God has guaranteed to His holy, loving and faithful children. If sin had这话的'intoxicated power to work good, they would be right who maintain that the Church is their salvation, and one may do evil when good will come of it' (cf. Rom 3:8); and the right who maintain that God, as the author of evil, seeing that evil is, on that supposition, only disguised good—prophecies which are thoroughly vicious and ungodly, and which cannot be right in God. The Scriptures, rightly interpreted, nowhere lend themselves to establish the ungodly doctrine of Isa 45:19.

To what extent may we, having studied God's providential methods as revealed in the Scriptures, in Nature, History, and the life and personal experience, venture to interpret providence as it relates to the current events in our own lives and in the lives of others? Experience and observation will warn us both against haste and against too great confidence in our interpretations of providence. Hasty misinterpretations of providence in it we are on present passing events frequently become fruitful sources of sin to the future. Some people are much given to interpreting providence. Certain ills or misfortunes come to a bad man; they are quick to assert that it is a Divine judgment sent upon him in view of his sin. Certain blessings come to a good man; they are sure the blessings of heaven—sent in view of his extraordinary pieté. A whiskey merchant's store burns down: it is, say they, a Divine judgment, in view of his ill-gotten gains. But presently the property of an unquestionably pious and conscientious man is 攫取 away by a false claimant. When now is the providence? The 'oracles' fail to explain; and the set of the problem remains as hard to interpret as, for example, when two men, a saint and a sinner, are prostrated on beds of sickness. The former, in spite of prayer and penitence, grows worse, and finally dies; while the other, without prayer or penitence, is restored to health. God has not revealed his providence. And the providence for ourselves and our God, seeing that God has not furnished us with any means of absolving proving that what has happened to us might not have happened, under similar circumstances, even to sinful men. Many a Christian man to see that the goodness which has happened to him—the loss of property, the terrible ill of sickness, and the like—grows as time, he would not interpret as providential—are among the best things that were ever sent upon him, in that they made him holier and more useful (cf. Jts 13:7).

There are, however, many evident truths that it is large on the pages of history, to see the divine and human in the development of kingdoms and nations, who he who reads may read. And to him who truly believes in the God and Father of all men, Jesus Christ, and who will duly consider all the facts and lessons of life, in himself and others, in individuals and in collective life, he will patiently as the years come and go, it will be made plain that 'God's in His heaven—All's right with the world, and all that the providence together for the spiritual good of those who love God and who prove their love for Him by serving their fellow-men.

We conclude then, that there is, according the Scriptures, an ever-watchful providence exercised by the heavenly Father over His faithful and loving children, which is ceaselessly working to secure their ever-increasing holiness and usefulness here, and their perfect happiness in a future state of existence. To prepare rational and immortal free agents through holiness and usefulness here for happiness hereafter is the aim and end of this all-embracing providence of God, which includes within its loving care every human being, except such as get out of the way of God's holy, loving, and perfecting. There is no providential highway to a state here that is free from life's ills, and that abounds in temporal and earthly blessings to the good. But there is a royal and holy highway, along which moves a providential pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, leading the children of the covenant, through lives of loving service and sacrifice, to a holy land of promise, the goal of a gracious providence; and who they journey along this highway for this end: 'The Lord knoweth those that are his: And, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity' (2 Tim 2 19 AV). They who bear this seal are the Divinely chosen instruments and agents of that larger and wider providence that is ever working to effect the perfect kingdom of righteousness in the whole earth, that kingdom of God, to inaugurate which, in its Messianic form, Our Lord became incarnate, and to consummate which, in its final and perfect form, He reigns from heaven and will continue to reign until, having 'brought as under his feet,' He shall "deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father" when the poet's vision shall be realized of "That God who ever lives and loves: One God, one law, one element: And one far-off Divine event, To which the whole creation moves."

PROVINCIA, provins (7777), mhdlnâh, "jurisdiction"; επαρχία, eparchia [EV province] [Acts 23:34; 25:6];

1. Meaning of the Term
2. Roman Provincial Administration
3. Division of Provinces
4. Province of Judaea
5. Revenue
6. Literature

Province (provincia) did not originally denote a territorial insurrection; indeed, the name "province" of the provinces of the world was much more Meaning more ancient than any of the other parts of the Roman Empire outside of Italy.

In the most comprehensive official sense it signified a magistrature's sphere of administrative action, which in one instance might be the direction of jurisdiction at Rome, in another the management of military operations against a particular hostile community. When the imperium was conferred upon two consuls at the beginning of the Republic, and upon a praetor in 367 BC, and finally upon a second praetor in 241 BC, it became necessary in practice to define their individual competence which was unlimited in theory. When the Romans extended their control over lands situated outside of Italy, it became expedient to fix territorial limits to the exercise of authority by the magistrates who were regularly sent abroad, so that provincia signified hencethrough in an abstract sense the rule of the governor, and in a concrete sense the specified region entrusted to his care; and with the development and consolidation of the Roman system of administration, the geographical meaning of the word became more and more significant.

The history of Roman provincial administration in the more definite sense commences in 227 BC, when four praetors were elected for the first time, of whom two were assigned to the government of

THE PROVINCIAL ADMINISTRATION was for the government of the provinces by means of special procurators, or, in exceptional circumstances, by consuls, during their term of office. Accordingly, the number of procurators was increased from four in 227 BC to eight at the time of Sulla. A second point is that in accordance with the reforms of Sulla all the consuls and procurators remained at Rome during their year of office, and were entrusted with the administration of provinces a subsequent year with the title proconsul (pro consule) or procurator (pro procuratore). The procurators were sent to the more important provinces. The Senate determined the distinction between consular and praetorian provinces and generally controlled the assignment of the provinces to the ex-magistrates. Julius Caesar removed the praetors to sixteen, but Augustus reduced them to twelve.

3. Third period.—In 27 BC, Augustus as commander-in-chief of the Roman army definitely assumed the administration of all provinces which required the presence of the imperial forces and left the other provinces to the control of the Senate. There were then twelve imperial and ten senatorial provinces, but all provinces added after 27 BC came under imperial administration. The emperor administered through the agency of personal delegates, legati Augusti of senatorial, and praetors or procuratores of equestrian, rank. The term of their service was not uniform, but continued usually for more than a single year. The senatorial administration was essentially a continuation of the post-Sullan, republican régime. The senatorial governors were called proconsuls generally, whether they were of consular or praetorian rank; but Africa and Asia alone were reserved for consuls, the eight remaining senatorial provinces being attributed to ex-procurators. The financial administration of each imperial province was entrusted to a procurator, that of each senatorial province to a quaestor.

The provinces were divided into smaller circumscriptions (civitates) for the purposes of local government. In the older provinces these districts corresponded generally with Provinces the urban communities which had been established by the sovereigns before the advent of the Romans. Under Rom rule they were divided into different classes on the basis of their dignity and prerogatives, as follows:

1. Colonial: Procurators (see Procuratores) who resided at Caesarea (Jos, B.9, II, xv, 6; Acts 23 23.33; 25 1) in the palace of Herod the Great (Acts 23-35). The procurators of Judaea were subject to the authority of the imperial governors of Syria, as was also the province of Judaea. The Roman procurator at Jerusalem was Thaddeus, an intimate friend of Pontius Pilate by Vitellius (Jos, Ant, X VIII, iv, 2; Tac. Ann. vi.32). The procurator was competent to exercise criminal jurisdiction over the provincials in cases involving a capital sentence (Jos, B. 9, II, xii, 1). He was bound to present every non-Roman citizen for trial at Rome (Acts 25 11). A death sentence by the Sanhedrin required the sanction of the procurator, as appears in the process against the Saviour. Under Rom rule cities like Caesarea, Sebaste, and Aelia Corinth, became organs for local government, like the urban communities in other parts of the Empire.

The revenue of Pal under Claudius is said to have been 12,000,000 denarii (about $3,400,000, or £500,000; cf Jos, Ant, X IX, vii, 2). The revenue in addition to the amount of which is not known, a variety of indirect contributions were collected on auctions, salt, highways, bridges, etc, which constituted, no doubt, the field of activity in which the procurators gained their incomes.

PROVOCATION, prov-o-kä’shun, PROVOKE, prö-vök; "Provoke," lit. "to call forth," hence to excite or stir up, whether in a good or bad sense, appears frequently in the OT as the tr of Piel, or Hiph. of לֶאַב, kâ’as (noun, לֶאַב, kâ’as), in the sense of "to make angry" (Dt 4 23, 16 20; Isa 1 4); "provoked" (Dt 8 1); "provoketh" (Eph 4 3); cf (Prov. 8 16); with לֶאַב kâ’as, "to embitter" (He 3 16; cf in I Esd 6 15), and other Gr words. "Provocation" in He 3 15 (quoting Ps 95 8) is paropikrasmos, LXX for ἀτιασίαν. An example of the good sense of the word is in He 10 22, "Consider one another to provoke[lit. "to the provoking," here paroikramos] unto love and good works."

For "provoke" RV has "despise" (Nu 14 11; Dt 31 20), "rebel against" (Ps 78 40); for "provoked," "despised" (Nu 14 23; 16 20; Isa 1 4); "provoked" (Dt 32 16; I Ch 21, 1); "rebuked against" (Ps 78 56), were rebellious (106 33-35); for "provoking" (Ps 78 17), "to rebel against;" for "provoked" (2 Cor 9 2), "stirred up;" "provoked within" for "stirred in" (Acts 17 16); "provoked" for "limited" (Ps 78 41, "limited"); "provoked" for "embarrass;" (Job 16 3); instead of "Provoke not your children to anger" (Col 3 21). "Provoke not your children." W. L. Walker

PRUNDE, pröd’en, PRUDENT, pröd’ent: In the OT "prudence" is the tr of וּכַּלְכֶל, "orādāh (Prov 8 12); also in AV of וּכַּל, sekhel (2 Ch 2 12, RV "discretion"); and "prudent" is the tr of נַפְף" (Grum. "sensible" (Prov 12 16,23, 13 16, etc; cf Gen 3 1; Jer 5 12), and "wise" (Prov 8 12, RVm "skilful"); Prov 16 18, 15; Isa 55 21; 10 13, ARV "understanding," etc), with other words. In the NT "prudence" occurs once as the tr of προνοια, prōnōsia (Eph 1 8); "prudent" is in AV the tr of προνοια in 10 years later, changed in RV to "understanding" (Mt 11 23; Acts 13 14). But in 1 Cor 1 19, ARV has "the discerning," ERV retains "prudent." In its etymological sense of being foreknowledge (contraction of "providence"), "prudence" does not occur in the NT. As forethought, foresight, prudence was reckoned one of the cardinal virtues by the ancient ethical writers. See the remarks of Coleridge on its lower and higher character in his Aids to Reflection, Aphor. 29.

PSALMS, sâmâ, BOOK OF (פֶּסַלְמָי, pslâmîm), "praises," פֶּסַלְמָי כָּל, pslâmîm 'alîm, "book of praises"; פֶּסַלְמִי, pslâmîy, פֶּסַלְמִיתָן, pslâmîyôn, Psaltéron):

I. Introductory Topics.—The Heb title for the Psalter is sâpher pslâmîm, "book of praises." When we consider the fact that more than 20 of these poems have praise for their keynote, and that there are outbursts of thanksgiving in many others, the fitness of the Heb title dawns upon us. As Ker well says, "The book begins with benediction, and ends with praise—first, blessing on man, and then glory to God." Hymns of praise, though found in all parts of the Psalter, become far more numerous in Books IV and V, as if the volume of praise would gather itself up into a Hallelujah Chorus at the end.

In the Gr version the book is entitled in some MSS Psalmoi, in others Psaltéron, whence come our Eng. titles "Psalms," and "Psalter." The Gr word psalmoi, as well as the Heb mizmôr, both of which are used in the superscriptions prefixed to many of the separate pses, indicates a poem sung to a stringed instrument. The title mizmôr is found before 57 pses. The Psalter was the hymnal of the Jewish nation. To individual pses other titles are sometimes prefixed, such as shir, "song"; thullîm, "praise"; thullâh, "prayer," etc. The Psalter was both prayerbook and nuptial to the Jewish people. It was also a manual for the nurture of the spiritual life in private as well as public worship.

The Pses were placed in the ketübbîm or "Writings," the third group of the Heb Scriptures. As the chief book of the ketübbîm, the Psalter appears first in the great majority of German MSS through the Spanish MSS place Ps after Ch, and the Talmuts Ruth before Ps. There has never been any serious question as to the right of the Psalter to a place in the Canon of Scripture. The book is possibly more highly esteemed by Christians than by the Jews. If Christians were permitted to retain only one book in the OT, they would almost certainly choose Ps. By 100 B.C. a much earlier date than at a much earlier date, the Book of Ps was completed and recognized as part of the Hagiographa, the 3d division of the Heb Bible.

According to the Heb text, followed by modern VSS, there are 150 separate poems in the Psalms. The Gr version has an additional ps, in which David describes his victory over Goliath; but this is expressly said to be "aside", i.e., a ps added. As to the number, the LXX, followed by many VSS, Vulg, combined Ps 9 and 10, and also 114 and 115, into a single ps. On the other hand, they divide Ps 116 and 117 each into two poems.

Thus for the greater part of the Psalter the Heb enumeration is one number in advance of that in the Gr and Lat Bibles.

The existing division in the Heb text has been called in question at various points. Ps 42 and 43 are almost certainly one ps (see refrain), and it is probable that Ps 9 and 10 were originally one, as in LXX. On the other hand, it is thought by some that certain pses originally comprised of two different poems. We may cite as examples Ps 19.1–6; 7–14; 25.1–6; 82.1–6; 85.7–10; 119.97–106. It is evident that such combinations of two different poems into one may have taken place, for we have an example in Ps 68, which is composed of portions of two other pses (57.7–11; 60.5–12).

(1) Value of the superscriptions.—It is the fashion among advanced critics to waive the titles of the pses out of court as wholly worthless, and misleading. This method is as thoroughly unscientific as the older Text procedure of defending the superscriptions as part of an inspired text.

These titles are clearly very old, for the LXX, in the 2d cent. BC, did not understand many of them. The worst that can be said of the superscriptions is that they are guesses of Heb editors and scribes of a period long prior to the Gr version. As to the musical and liturgical titles, the best learning of Jews and Christian editors is unable to recover the original meaning. The scribes who prefixed the titles had no conceivable reason for writing nonsense into their prayerbook and hymnal. These superscriptions and subscriptions all had a worthy meaning, when they were first placed beside individual pses. This indisputable fact of the great antiquity of these titles ought forever to make it impossible for scientific research to ignore them. Grant, for the sake of argument, that not one of these either came from the pen of the writers of the Pses, but only from editors and compilers of eulogic or post-eulogic days, it would still be reasonable to give attention to the views of ancient Heb scholars, before considering the conjectures of modern critics on questions of authorship and date. Sources of information, both oral and written, to which they had access, have long since perished. In estimating the value of their work, we have a right to use the best critical processes known to us, but it is unscientific to overlook the fact that the attempt by the time of the composition of the Pses gave them an advantage over the modern scholar. If it be said by objectors that ancient scribes formed their conclusions by the study of the life of David as portrayed in the Psalter, the historian is ready to say that the reply is ready that several historical notices in the titles cannot be thus explained. Who was Cush? Who was Abimelech? (Ps 7 and 34). A careful weighing of the facts concerning the superscriptions will make it seem highly improbable that the earliest of these titles does not reach back into preëxilic times. We almost certainly have in them the results of the labors of Heb scribes and compilers stretching over several centuries. Some of the titles may have been appended by the psalmists themselves.

We are far from claiming that the titles are always intelligible to us, or that, when understood, they are always correct. The process of constructing titles indicative of authorship had not ceased in the 2d cent. BC. In the LXX, the editors added many to pses that were anonymous in the Heb. The view expressed nearly 50 years ago by Ferowne is eminently sane: "The inscriptions cannot always be relied on. They are sometimes genuine, and really represent the most ancient tradition. At other times, they are due to the caprice of later editors and collectors, the fruits of conjecture, or of dimer and more uncertain traditions. In short, the inscriptions of the Pses are like the subscriptions to the Epp. of the NT. They are not of any necessary authority, and their value must be weighed and tested by the usual critical processes.

(2) Thrill's theory.—J. W. Thrill (The Titles of the Psalms (1907) points to the hypothesis that the both superscriptions and subscriptions were incorporated in the Psalter, and that in the process of copying and transmission it was customary to fill up the subscription of a given ps and the subscription of the one immediately preceding it. When the first of these adjacent ps's were separated from one another, as in printed ed., the subscriptions and superscriptions of the intervening ps's were all set aside. Thus it came about that the musical subscription of a given ps was prefixed to the title of the immediately following ps, and vice versa. If the ps and the prayer, "The dithyrambic "For Two Sh'minith" The generally goodly always title, positively."

We know from 1 Ch 16:41: "37 that Jecoreus (q.v.) was a choir leader in the days of King David. Perhaps the authorship of the psalm has often been called attention to the fact that as a subscript to Ps 55 "the dove of the distant terebinth," or "the silent dove with its wings closely folded," and in comparison with Ps 55:6–8.

(2) Meholth (Ps 53). Meholth Ferzadah (Ps 88): Perhaps Thrill’s vocalization of the Hebrew consonants as meholath, "dancings," is correct. As a subscript to Ps 57, meholah may mean David’s joy at the bringing of the ark to Zion in 2 Sam 6:15.

(3) Meholath (Ps 52, 42:45, 52:55, 74, 75, 58, 89, 137): The exact meaning of this common term is not clear. Briggs suggests "a meditation." Thrill and others "a psalm instruction," or "an ancient Vedic reciter’s ps.

Some of the 13 ps's bearing this title are, plainly didactic, while others are scarcely to beclassed as "psalm instructions." Such ps's include Ps 65, 106, and 110.

(a) Mithkalm (Ps 81, 59–60): Following the rabbinical guess, some translate "a golden poem. The exact meaning is uncertain.

(b) Muth labbon: The title is generally supposed to refer to a companion ps, to "a companion ps," which is recognized by when the melody to which this composition was set was the tune of Ps 9, or is to be sung. Thrill translates "Thirtle's title" and regards it as a superscription to Ps 8, in celebration of the victory over the enemy. Perhaps the "title" was originally a superscription to Ps 3, 5, 54, 55, 60, 66, 75.

(2) Nhuloth (Ps 5): possibly a subscript to Ps 4, is supposed by some to refer to "wind instruments," probably literally.

(c) Selah, though not strictly a title, may well be discussed in connection with the superscriptions. It occurs 17 times in the Psalms, but is most common in Ps 44, 50, 64, 65, 96, and 97. In this sense it is a term of address, the same word as Selah in Ps 84:20. The LXX always renders the Hebrew by "theresonance of the harp," "the excellent harp," or other technical term of musical effect. The word was thus called "the title" of a psalm, or of the first couplet of a prosaic composition. Selah was probably the ancient Arab custom of inserting a word or phrase to mark the end of a psalm, or to indicate a pause in speaking, in place of the "Amen" of modern psalms.

(2) Shikhaloth (Ps 57): possibly a subscript to Ps 4, is supposed by some to refer to "wind instruments," probably literally.

(d) Shikhaloth (Ps 5): possibly a subscript to Ps 4, is supposed by some to refer to "wind instruments," probably literally.

(e) Shikhaloth (Ps 5): possibly a subscript to Ps 4, is supposed by some to refer to "wind instruments," probably literally.

(f) Shikhaloth (Ps 5): possibly a subscript to Ps 4, is supposed by some to refer to "wind instruments," probably literally.

(g) Shikhaloth (Ps 5): possibly a subscript to Ps 4, is supposed by some to refer to "wind instruments," probably literally.

(h) Shikhaloth (Ps 5): possibly a subscript to Ps 4, is supposed by some to refer to "wind instruments," probably literally.

(i) Shikhaloth (Ps 5): possibly a subscript to Ps 4, is supposed by some to refer to "wind instruments," probably literally.
1. The age of David offered fruitful soil for the growth of religious poetry.—(a) The political and religious reforms of Samuel created a new sense of national unity, and kindled the fires of religious patriotism. (b) Music had a large place in the life of the prophetic guilds or schools of the prophets, and was used in public religious exercises (1 S 10 5 f). (c) The victories of David and the internal expansion of the life of Israel would inevitably superimpose the instinct of worship and majesty of the Elizabethan age and the Victorian era in Eng. literature. (d) The removal of the ark to the new capital and the organization of the Levitical choirs would stimulate poets to compose hymns of praise to Jeh (2 S 6; 1 Ch 15, 16, 25).

It is the fashion in certain critical circles to blot out the Mosaic era as unhistoric, all accounts of it being considered legendary or mythical. It is easy then to isolate in the mind all the religious teaching attributed to Samuel. This leaves David "a rude knave, a semi-barbaric, a rustic" as the revered, versatile contritum, chattiet, and king. It would seem more reasonable to accept as trustworthy the undiluted tradition of Israel as it is given by the great writers, Moses, Samuel, and David, than to rewrite Israel's history out of the tiny fragments of historical material that are accepted by skeptical critics as credible. It is often said that late writers read into their accounts of early heroes their own ideas of what would be fitting. James Robertson's remark in reply has great weight: "This habit of explaining the early as the backward projection of the late is always liable to the objection that it leaves the late itself without explanation" (Poetry and Religion of the Ps., 352).

(2) David's qualifications for composing ps.—(a) He was a skilful musician, with a sense of rhythm and an ear for pleasing sounds (1 S 16 15–23). He seems to have invented new instruments of music (Am 6 5). (b) He is recognized by critics of all schools as a poet of no mean ability. The greatest and the most usual claim is to his authorship and his editorship (2 S 1 19–27) is commonly accepted; also his lament over Abner (3 33 f). In the elegy over Saul and Jonathan, David displays a magnanimity and tenderness that accord with the representations of S as to his treatment of Saul and of Jonathan. No mere rough border chieftain could have composed a poem full of the tenderest sentiment and the most exemplary attitude toward a persecutor. The moral elevation of the elegy has to be accounted for. If the author was a man enjoying the friendship of God, it is easy to account for the moral dignity of the poem. Surely it is only a step from the patriotism and magnanimity and devoted friendship of the elegy to the religious fervor of the Ps. Moreover, the poetic skill displayed cannot escape the reasonable objection that literary art in the days of David had not attained a development equal to the composition of poems such as the Ps. There is nothing more beautiful and artistic in the entire Psalter.

Radical critics saw the David of the Bible as a usurper. They have no right to object with the psalmist. Though willing to believe every statement that reflects upon the moral character of David, they consider the references to David as a writer of hymns and the organization of choirs as the pious imaginaries of late chronicles. Robertson well observes: "This habit of refusing to admit complexity in the capacities of Biblical characters is characteristic of primitive uneducated thought. We may believe that David could not have written even one string, but we have religious leaders who have united the most fervent spirituality with the most polished, or with the most worldly, forms of speech or with the most improved, or with the most diluted, forms of speech or with the most approved, or with the most despised, forms of speech. There are no exceptions to this universal law. The moral elements in the moral characters of all these gifted men. Of Constantine it has been said that his soul was: the doleful believer and the cruel despot, devotees and martyr, patron saint and avenging demon." David was a many-sided man, with a character often at war with himself, a man with conflicting impulses, the flesh lustful against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh. Men of flesh and blood in the midst of life's temptations have no difficulty in understanding the David of the Bible.

(c) David was a man of deep feeling and of imperial imagination. Think of his love for Jonathan, his grateful appreciation of every exploit done in his behalf, his mighty pride in the majesty of Saul, his manly courage, his thankfulness to God for victory over Absalom. His successful generalship would argue for imagination, as well as the vivid imagery of the elegy. (d) David was an enthusiastic worshipper of Jeh. All the records of his life agree in representing him as devoted to Israel's God and to Israel's life. His dangerous, his fears, his sorrows, his firm and noble spirit, his sense of life's dangers and disappointments, "David strengthened himself in Jeh his God!" (1 S 30 6). We should have been surprised had no trace of religious poetry come from his pen. It would be difficult to imagine Milton or Cowper or Tennyson as confining himself to secular poetry. "Comus," "John Gilmor," and the "Charge of the Light Brigade" did not exhaust their genius; nor did the elegy over Saul and Jonathan and the lament over Abner relieve David's soul of the poetry that clamped him for expression. The known facts of his life and times prepare us for an outburst of psalmody under his leadership. (e) The varied experiences through which David passed were of a character to quicken any latent gifts for poetic expression.

James Robertson states this argument clearly, and yet with becoming caution: "The vicissitudes and situations in David's life presented in these narratives are of such a nature that, though we can discern precisely that such and such a psalm was composed at such a time and such a time and place, yet we cannot say with certainty that it was written by David, or even that such a man has passed through certain experiences and borne himself in such wise that we are not surprised to receive a poem that is characteristic of him and the other ps. It is very doubtful whether we should tie down any psalm to the situation of Jonathan and David, or to the poet being like a painter, who, having found a landscape, sits down to transfer it to canvas. I do not think it likely that David, finding himself in some great perplexity or sorrow, called for writing materials in order to describe the situation or record his feelings. But I do think it probable that the vicissitudes through which he passed made such an impression on his sensitive heart, and became material, as it were, to the poetic and religious nature, that when he soothed himself in his retirement with his lyre, they came forth spontaneously in the form of a psalm or song or prayer, according as the recollection was sad or joyful, and as his singing mood moved him." (Poetry and Religion of the Ps., 353).

The Bib. writers, both early and late, agree in affirming that the Spirit of Jeh rested upon David, empowering him for service of the highest order (1 S 16 13; 2 S 23 1–3; Mt 22 43; Acts 2 29–31). The gift of prophetic inspiration was bestowed upon Israel's chief musician and poet.

(3) External evidence for the ps.—(a) In the NT David is named as the author of certain ps. Thus Ps 110 is ascribed to David by Jesus in his debate with the Pharisees in the Temple (Mt 27 41–45; Mk 12 35–37; Lk 20 41–44). Peter teaches that David prophesied concerning Jesus (Acts 1 16), and he also refers Ps 18 and 110 to...
David (Acts 2:25-34). The whole company of the disciples in prayer attribute Ps 2 to David (Acts 4:25 f ). Paul quotes Ps 32 and 69 as Davidic (Rom 4:6-8; 11:91). The author of He even refers Ps 95 to David, following the LXX (1 Sam 17). These chapters are unusual in that the scholars infer that any quotation from the Psyps might be referred to David as the chief author of the Psyps. Possibly this free and easy method of citation, without any attempt at rigorous critical accuracy, was in vogue in the 1st cent. AD. At the same time, it is evident that the view that David was the chief author of the Psyps was accepted by the NT writers.

In 2 Mace 2:13 (RV), in a letter purporting to have been written by the Jews of Palestine to their brethren in Egypt, about 144 BC, occurs the following: "And the same things were related both in the public archives and in the records that concern Nehemiah; and how he, founding a library, gathered together the books about the kings and prophets, and the books of David, and letters of kings about sacred gifts." We do not know the exact date of 2 Mace, but it was almost certainly in the 1st cent. BC. The author regards David as the author of books in the sacred library gathered together by Nehemiah. (c) The author of 2 Sam refers not later than 180 BC, and possibly a good deal earlier, thus describes David's contribution to public worship: "In every work of his he gave thanks to the Holy One Most High with words of glory; with his whole heart he sang praise, and loved him that made him" (Eccles 47:5f RV). David's fame as a psalmist and the organizer of choirs for the sanctuary was well known to Ben Sira at the beginning of the 2d cent. BC. (d) The author of Ch, writing not later than 300 BC, and probably much earlier, represents Ps 34 as a provision for a service of songs before the ark of God and in connection with its removal to the city of David (1 Ch 15:16). It seems to be imagined by some scholars that the Chronicler, whose historical accuracy is severely attacked by certain critics, is responsible for the idea that David was a great writer of hymns. On the contrary, he has less to say about David as a poet and psalmist than the author of S. Only in 2 Sam 2. 1-10 meet most of the standards of David the author of praises to Jehovah. The Chronicler speaks repeatedly of the instruments of David and of his organization of the choirs. And so in the kindred books of Ezr and Neh there is mention of the style of music employed by Jeh. (Am 6:5; 12:24,36). The author of the Book of K refers repeatedly to David as a model king (1 K 11:4; 2 K 14:3; 20:51f, etc.). He becomes a witness for the high reputation of David for uprightness and religious zeal. (e) Amos refers incidentally to David's great skill as an inventor of musical instruments (Am 6:5). The same prophet is a witness to the fact that songs were sung in worship at Bethel to the accompaniment of harps or viols (Am 5:23). (f) The earliest witnesses, or witnesses, if the narrative be composite, we find in 1 and 2 S. David is described as a wonderful musician, and as one on whom the Spirit of Jehovah rested mightily (1 S 16:13-23). He is credited with the beautiful cloy over Saul and Jonathan (2 S 1:17-27) and the brief lament over Absner (2 S 3:33). He is said to have danced with joy before the ark, and to have brought it up to Jerusalem with shouting and with sound of trumpet (2 S 6:12ff). He is credited with the pious wish that he might build a temple for Jehovah and the ark, and is spoken of forthwith as the man who was to build a temple to Jehovah for the perpetuation of a perpetual throne (2 S 7). David dedicated to Jehovah much wealth taken from his enemies (2 S 8:11). Both the good and the bad in David's life and character are faithfully set forth in the vivid narrative.

We come next to two statements that would settle the question of David's psalmist, if critics would only accept them as the views of an author living within a generation or so of the time of David. Unfortunately 2 S 21-24 is regarded by most critical scholars as an appendix to the early narrative of David, which would make the agreement as to the exact date of the composition of these chapters all but negligible. The scholar who criticizes the critic who tries to disintegrate a document, and suspicion of bias is inevitable. If by the disintegration he is able to escape the force of the conclusion, the effect is that, happily, we live in a free country, every man having a right to hold and to press his own opinion, for whatever it may be worth. It seems to the present writer that 2 S 21-24 may well have come from the pen of the early narrator who told the story of David in such a masterly fashion. Even if these chapters were added by a later editor as an appendix, the sufficient reason for putting this writer so late at the exile. His statements cannot be set aside as unreliable, simply because they run counter to the current theory as to the date of the Psyps. 2 S 22 purports to give the words of a song which David spoke to Jehovah, when he had been delivered from Saul and from all his enemies. Ps 18 is evidently a different reception of the same poem. The differences in the various edd of 'Rock of Ages.' Only the most critical is called conjectural. In fact, this glorious song, 2 S 23:1-7 must not be omitted, for here David claimed prophetic inspiration as the sweet psalmist of Israel. This original psalm is worthy of the brilliant royal bard. (6) The titles of the Psyps are external evidence of their value; and so are the date and authorship of the Psyps, and these ascribe 73 to David. A sweeping denial of all the forms of external evidence for Davidic authorship of the Psyps, by convincing arguments from internal evidence. Unverified conjectures will not answer.

(4) Internal evidence for Davidic psalm.—The fact that many of the Psyps ascribed to David correspond in tone and manner and in language and allusions to the incidents in his life, while not in itself convincing proof that David wrote them, certainly reinforces the external evidence in favor of Davidic psalm. We must refer the reader to the commentaries of Delitzsch, Kirkpatrick, Perowne and others for the evidence discovered in individual Psyps. In many of the Psyps the evidence is strongly in favor of the superscriptions, in which David is named as the writer. See esp. Ps 18, 22, 32, 3.

(5) Number of Davidic psalm.—Opinion varies among conservative scholars all the way from 3 or 4 to 44 or 45. It has come to pass that a critic who acknowledges even Ps 18 to be by David's hand is considered a conservative. In fact, the more radical critics regard a scholar as conservative if he assigns even a small group of psalm to the period before the exile. We must not allow any break in the succession of names from ascribing Ps 46 to David or Ps 90 to Asaph. He is a different mind and accepts the results of same criticism. W.T. Davidson (HBB) speaks out plainly and strongly for Davidic authorship of Ps 7, 11, 17, 18, 19, 119, 124 and a few other so or parts of so, though he makes large concessions to the present tendency to bring down the dates of the Psyps to a later date. He stands firmly for a large body of psalm as David assigned to David. Ps 3, 4, 7, 8, 11, 13, 14, 19, 24, 29, 32, 101 also 60 8-11 and 68 and 129. Hitzig ascribed to David Ps 3, 119, with the exception of 5, 126, and 14. It follows the critics in the Hebr text, except where internal evidence clearly contradicts the superscriptions, it would be rash to follow Delitzsch in attributing 44 or 45 psalm to David.

(1) Ps of Asaph (73-83, also 50).—The prophetic spirit thrives in most of the Psalms ascribed to Asaph (q.v.). God is pictured as a righteous Judge. He is also pictured as the Shepherd of Israel. Ps 73 holds forth God's righteousness in spite of the prosperity of the wicked. Ps 50, which is assigned by many to the time of Hosea and Isaiah, because of its powerful prophetic message, may well have come from Asaph, the contemporary of David's reign. The Psalms of the Asaph group, notably 74 and 79, belong to the period of the exile or later. The family of Asaph continued for centuries to lead in the service of God (2 Ch 35:15; Neh 7:44). Inspired poets were raised up from age to age in the Asaph guild.
(2) Psalms of the sons of Korah (42-49, 54, 85, 87).—This family of singers was prominent in the temple-worship in the days of David and afterward. Several of their poems in the Psalter are ascribed to members of this group (see Ps 42, 43, 45, 46, 49, 84). We are not to think of these poems as having been composed by a committee of the sons of Korah; no doubt each poem had an individual author, who was willing to sink his personality in the line he was composing. The privileges and blessings of social worship in the sanctuary are greatly magnified in this group of psalms.

(3) Psalms of Solomon (72, 127).—Even conservative critics are in doubt as to the Solomonic authorship of the two psalms ascribed to him by the titles. Perhaps assurance is not attainable in the present state of inquiry. Delitzsch well says: "Under Solomon psalmody already began to decline; all the productions of that period bear the stamp of thoughtless contemplation rather than of direct feeling, for restless yearning for higher things had given place to sensuous enjoyment, national concentration to cosmopolitan expansion."

(4) The era of Jehoshaphat.—Delitzsch and others regard the period of Jehoshaphat as one of literary decay. In Ps 76, 77 five psalms celebrate the deliverance from the great eastern invasion toward the close of Jehoshaphat's reign.

(5) The era of Hezekiah.—The latter half of the 8th century B.C. was one of literary vigor and expansion, esp. in Judah. Perhaps the great deliverance from Sennacherib's invasion is celebrated in Ps 46 and 48.

(6) The period of Jeremiah.—Ehret and some other scholars are inclined to attribute to Jeremiah a considerable number of psalms. Among those which have been assigned to this prophet may be named Ps 31, 35, 38, 40, 55, 69, 71. Those who deny the Davidic authorship of Ps 22 also assign this great poem to Jeremiah. Whether we are able to name definitely any ps of Jeremiah, it seems thoroughly reasonable that he should have been the author of certain of the plaintive poems in the Psalter.

(7) During the exile.—Ps 102 seems to have been composed during the exile. The poet pours out his complaint over the present distress, and reminds Jeh that he had previously suffered, and that his will be pity upon him. Ps 137 pictures the distress of the captives by the rivers of Babylon. The fire and fervor of the poem bespeak an author personally involved in the distress. No doubt other psalms in our collection were composed during the exile in Babylon.

(8) Post-exilic psalms.—As specimens of the joyous hymns composed after the return from exile, we may name Ps 85 and 126. Many of the liturgical hymns in the Psalter were no doubt prepared for use in the worship of the second temple. Certain recent critics have extended this class of hymns so as to include the greater part of the Psalter, but that is surely an extreme view. No doubt, the stirring times of Ezra and Nehemiah stimulated poets in Jerusalem forth thanksgiving and praise to Jehovah's God. Ewald taught that the latest psalms in our collection were composed at this time.

(9) Are there Maccabean psalms?—Calvin assigned Ps 44, 47 and 79 to the Maccabean period. If there are Maccabean psalms, Calvin has perhaps hit upon three of them. Hitzig assigns to the Maccabean period all the psalms from 73 to 150, together with a few in the earlier half of the Psalter. Among moderns, Delitzsch puts practically the whole Psalter in the period from 170 to 130 B.C. Ewald, Heinrich, and Dillmann, four of the greatest names in OT criticism, oppose the view that the Psalter contains Maccabean psalms. Most recent scholarship is opposed to each of these views of the Maccabean Psalms. The question may well be left open for further investigation.

III. The Growth of the Psalter.—In the Heb text as well as in RV, the Ps are grouped into five books, as follows: Book I, Ps 1-41; Book II, Ps 42-72; Book III, Ps 73-89; Book IV, Ps 90-106; Book V, Ps 107-150.

1. Division into Five Books

It is possible that this division into five books has been made on grounds similar to those which the Chronicler composed his history of Judah (cf 1 Ch 16:36 with Ps 106:48). At the end of Ps 72 it appears that the Psalms which were significant in the history of the Psalter. It is said in Ps 72:20: "The prayers of the righteous are Ps 51-70, however, to Ps 71:20; these psalms are ended." It would seem from this note that the editor who appended it meant to say that in his collection he had included all the psalms of David known to him. Similarly, enough, the subscript is attached to a psalm ascribed to Solomon. This is a further indication that the Second Book of Ps opens with nine poems ascribed to the sons of Korah and to Asaph. It is a very natural conjecture that these nine psalms were at one time united with Ps 73-83. With these removed, it would be possible to unite Ps 51-70 with Book I. Then the subscript to Ps 72 would be a fitting close to a roll made up of psalms ascribed to David. It is impossible at this late date to trace fully and accurately the history of the formation of the Psalter.

Within the Psalter there lie certain groups of psalms which have in a measure retained the form in which they were probably originally composed separately. Among these groups may be named the Psalms of Ascents (Pss 120-134), the Asaph group (Pss 73-83), the sons of Korah group (Pss 42-49, 84-85), a group of poems (Pss 56-60), a group praising Jehovah for His character and deeds (Pss 93-100), to which Ps 90-92 form a fitting introduction. Psalms 3-107 constitute another group of praise psalms, and Psalms 146-150 make a closing Hallel to the group.

The Psalter has had a long and varied history. No doubt the precentor of the temple choir had his own collection of hymns for public worship. Small groups of psalms may have been issued also for private use in the home. As time went on, collections were made on different organizing principles. Sometimes hymns attributed to a given author were perhaps brought into a single group. Possibly psalms of a certain type, such as Maskil and Miktam, were gathered together in small collections. How these small groups were partly preserved and partly broken up, in the history of the formation of our present Psalter, will, perhaps, never be known.

IV. The Poetry of the Psalter.—For general discussion of the form of Heb poetry, see Poetry. In the Psalms all this known and parsed in Hebrew. Reliably are exemplified. Among moderns, C. A. Briggs has made extensive research into the poetical structure of the Psalms. In summing up the result of his study of the various measures employed in the Psalms, he classifies 80 psalms or parts of psalms as trimeters, that is, the lines have three main accents; 22 psalms or parts he regards as tetrameters, each of the lines having four accentuated syllables; 25 psalms or portions are classed as pentameters, and an equal number as hexameters. He recognizes some variety of measure in certain psalms. There is coming to be agreement among Heb scholars that the rhythm of Heb poetry is largely determined by the number of accentuated syllables to the line. Some critics insist rigorously on perfect regularity, and therefore are compelled to resort to conjectural emendation. See Poetry, Hebrew.

Nine psalms are known as alphabetical poems, viz. Ps 9, 10, 11, 34, 37, 111, 112, 138, 139. The most elaborate of these is Ps 115, which is divided into 150 sections of two verses each. The letter of the Heb alphabet occurs 8 t in succession as the initial letter of the verses in its section. This so to strophical structure or stanza formation, there is evidence in certain psalms of such organization of the poems. The refrain with which strophes end often close form an easy guide to the strophical divisions in certain ps., such as Ps 42, 43, 46, 107. Among Eng. commentators, Briggs pays most attention to these. Many moderns hold that evidence of antiphonal singing in connection with the Psalter. It is thought by some that Ps 20 and 21 were sung by responsive choirs. Ps 24 and 118 may each be antiphonal.

V. THE SPEAKER IN THE PSS.—Smend, in ZATW, 1889, establishes and personifies the idea that the speaker in the Pss is not an individual, but a personification of the Jewish nation or church. At first he inclined to recognize an individual speaker in Ps 3, 4, 62 and 73, but one year later he interpreted these also as collective. Thus a one stroke individual religious experience is wiped out of the Psalter. A few scholars have accepted Smend's thesis; but the great majority of critics of every school have withheld their assent, and some of the leading harmonists have shown that the theory is wholly untenable.

Perhaps the best monograph on the subject, for the Ger. student, is one by Emil Bala, Das Ich der Psalmen. Bala's thesis is that the "I" pss., both in the Psalter, and in the other books of the OT, are always to be understood as individual, with the exception of those in which the idea of an individual in the position of the "I" is necessary. Of 100 pss. in which "I" occurs, Bala interprets; the remaining 29 there might be reasonable room for difference of opinion whether the ps was individual or collective.

Personification is largely used in all parts of the OT. There is no room for doubt that Ps 129, though using "I," "me," and "my," is the language of Israel as a people. The same is true of Ps 124. The author of Ps 126 likewise associates himself with his brethren. The author of Ps 122, however, is evidently speaking for himself individually, when he says in ver 8, "For my brethren and companions' sakes I will say peace; Peace be within thee."

A really intelligent reader usually has no difficulty in deciding, after a careful reading of a ps, whether the "I" refers to an individual Israelite or to the congregation of Israel. Some views on this subject are important and much as Smend's theory does violence to the strength and power of the individual religious experience of OT believers. In many portions of the OT, national duties are urged, and Israel is addressed as a whole. At the same time, it would be easy to demonstrate the relatively small place the individual religion occupies in the prophetic writings and in the Law. The Psalter absolutely refuses to be shut up in the molds of a rigid nationalism.

VI. THE GOSPEL IN THE PSS.—Christians love the Psalms, as the ancient Jews could possibly have done. On every page they discover elements of religious life and experience that are thoroughly Christian. In this respect the earlier dispensation came nearer to the perfection of Christian standards than in political and social organization. Along with the NT, the aged Christian saint desires a copy of the Ps. He passes easily from the Gospels to the Psalter and back again without the sense of shifting from one spiritual level to another. Religious experience was enjoyed and was portrayed by the ancient psalmists so well that no Christian book in the apostolic period was composed to displace the Psalter.

1. THE PSALMS ARE ALWAYS REVERENT IN THEIR APPROACH TO DEITY.—Jeh is infinitely holy (Ps 99:3). Ps 96-100 are models of adoration and worship.

2. SOUL'S THERThirsting FOR GOD.—Ps 42 and 43, which were originally one ps, voice with God the longing of the individual soul. Ps 42, and no other human composition has been able to express it.

3. PRaising GOD.—More than 20 pss. have for their keynote praise to God. See esp. Ps 8 1:9; 67:7-11; 74:24; 95:1-7. The first three vs. of Ps 33, 44, 46 and 105 reveal a rich vocabulary of praise for stammering human lips.

4. Joy in God's house.—Ps 84 and 122 are classic hymns expressive of joy in public worship in the sanctuary. Religious patriotism has never recovered a more striking expression than is found in Ps 137 5 ff.

5. PrACTISING THE PRESENCE OF GOD.—In Ps 91 and 23 the worshipping saint delights his soul with the sense of God's protecting presence. The Shepherd, tender and true, is ever present to shield and to comfort. The shadow of the Almighty is over the saint who dwells in the secret place of the Most High.

6. GOD IN NATURE.—The Psalmist did not go "through Nature up to Nature's God"; for he found God immanent in all things. He heard God's voice in the thunder; felt His breath in the twilight breeze; saw the gleam of His sword in the lightning's flash, and recognized His hand in every provision for the wants of man and the lower animals. See Ps 91:4, "Hymn of Creation", Ps 29, 115, 117, 139, 23, 105:2, 11:5. God is the God of the Psalms, and the first half of Ps 19, "the heavens are telling.

7. LOVE FOR GOD'S WORD.—Ps 119 is the classic description of the beauty and power and helpfulness of the Word of God. The second half of Ps 19 is also a gem. Ps 119 was happily named by one of the older commentators "a holy alphabet for Zion's scholars." The Psalmist sings the glories of God's Word as a lamp to guide, as a spring of comfort, and as a fountain of hope.

8. God's Care of all Things.—Faith in Divine Providence—both general and special—was a cardinal doctrine with the psalmists; yea, more, the very heart of their religion. Ps 66 sings of God's goodness in sunshine and shower, which clothes the meadows with waving grain. The river of God is always full of water. Ps 121, "Jeh thy Keeper," was read by David Livingstone at family worship on the morning when he left home to go out to Africa as a missionary.

9. GOD AND HUMAN VALUES.—The psalmists were fond of the figure of "taking refuge in God." Jeh was to them a rock of refuge, a stronghold, a high tower, an impregnable fortress. Ps 46, 61 and 62 exalt God as the refuge of His saints. His help is always easy to find. They might and do not, but we do not overthrow the inspired singers, but become a theme of devout and joyous contemplation.

Our Lord Jesus found in the Ps ps prophesies concerning Himself (Lk 24:44-47). (1) The suffering Saviour.—While 2. THE hanging on the cross, the mind of Our Messiah Lord turned to the Psalter. He voiced the terrible anguish of His soul in the opening words of Ps 22, and breathed out His spirit at the end with the truthful words of Ps 31 5. He also invited the fulfillment of a Messianic prediction in Ps 69 21 by saying, "I thirst." Isa and the Ps did not fail Him in the hour of His shame, when reproach broke His heart, and there was none to comfort Him. Only Isa 52 13—63 12 surpasses Ps 22 as a picture of Calvary and an interpretation of the significance of the cross. Whether Ps 22 is a direct prophecy of Christ, or only a typically Messianic ps., is in dispute. Every sentence can be applied to Jesus without straining its meaning.

If David or some other sufferer took up his horn to sing of his own sorrows, the Spirit of God guided him to describe those of a greater.

Rationalistic critics insist that to apply part of a ps to David and part to Christ introduces confusion. They ridicule the theory of a "double sense," and continue... that the language refers to the Psalmist and to him alone, and that the application of certain vs to Our Lord Jesus is only by way of accommodation. This theory ignores the presence of sin and the Holies as a place of exclusion and when men talk of "psychological impossibilities," this may be to them a mystery, for who of us can understand fully the psychological experiences of men while receiving revelations from God? The real author of the psalms was the Holy Spirit. This means that which the reverent interpreter most delights to find; and we have evidence that the OT writers did not fully comprehend their own psalms concerning Christ (1 Pet 1:10-12). We ought not to be surprised that the prophet was not able to explain the methods of the Holy Spirit's activity in guiding the thought of prophets and psalmists in their predictions of the sufferings of Jesus. Idolatry and persecution are the true fruits of the psalmist's sufferings.

(2) The conquering King.—Ps 2 and 110 (with which Ps 73 may be compared) describe the Messiah as Jeh's Son, a mighty Conqueror, who shall overwhelm all foes and reign supported by Jeh. Some will oppose the Messiah, and so perish; others will enter His army as volunteers, and in the end will enjoy the fruits of victory. "It is better to sit on His throne than to be His footstool."

(3) The growing kingdom.—There is room in the earth for no god other than Jeh, the Creator and Redeemer of mankind. Ps 47, 67, 99-100 and 132 are glorious assertions of the earthly and heavenly blessings of the Psalter. All nations are exhorted to forsake idols and worship Jeh. Ps 47 closes with a picture of the whole world united in the worship of the God of Israel. Ps 67 is a bugle call to all nations to unite in the worship of the true God. Ps 96-100 paint the character of Jeh as a basis of appeal to all nations to turn from idols and worship the God of Abraham. Ps 96 and 98 exalt His righteousness; Ps 97 His power and dominion; Ps 99 His holiness and His fidelity to Israel, while Ps 100 tells of His government for a thousand years before a God worthy of men's reverence and love.

The Psalter deals with man as a sinner. Seven of the best known poems in the collection are so charged with a sense of sin and of its deadly fruits that they have been well known for centuries as the Penitential Poems of Sin Ps (6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, 143). Besides these poems of penitence and confession, there are many passages elsewhere in the Psalter which depict the sinfulness of men, and yet there are assertions of personal innocence and righteousness in the Psalter that sound like the claims of self-righteous persons (7 3-9; 47 1-5; 18 20-24; 35 11-17; 44 17-22). The psalmists do not mean them to say that they are sinless before God. Rather they are righteous in comparison with their foes who are seeking to destroy them. Sometimes they plead for mercy in the same context. The honest exegete does not find the Pharisaic temper in these noble hymns, though he is quite willing to admit that the Christian cannot well employ some of the expressions concerning his own experiences. Jesus requires a humility deeper than that which was attained in OT times.

(1) Confessing sin.—(a) Individual confession. Ps 32 and 51, am notable example of individual confession. The cries of the penitent in Ps 51 have been repeated by thousands on bended knee as the best expression of their own sense of sin and yearning for forgiveness. (b) National confession (see esp. 78, 86 and 106). Ps 106 celebrates the praises of Jeh for His unfailing kindness to Israel; 106 tells the tale of Israel's repeated rebellion.

(2) Seeking forgiveness.—Ps 51 is the penitent's cry for mercy. Never did the soul of man plead more powerfully for forgiveness. God cannot despise a heart broken and crushed with the sense of sin and pleading like a lost child for home and mother.

(3) Conquering sin.—Ps 130 begins with a cry out of the depths and ends with a note of joy over redemption from sin. The penitent's redemption of which the Psalter so largely includes man's sin over sin in one's heart and life. The cries of the OT saints for victory over sin were not unheeded (139 23f; 19 13, 119 133). The author of Ps 84 truthfully depicts the life of Jeh's worshippers, "They go from strength to strength."

The ancient Hebrew seems to have had no temptation to atheism or pantheism. The author of the Ecles felt the pull ofagnosticism and atheism (Ecc 10-11) but in the end he rejected both (12 7-13 f). The ancient Hebrew found in the world about him one difficulty which seemed almost insuperable. He believed in the wisdom and power and justice of God. How then could it be possible, in a world over which a wise and just God presides, that the wicked should prosper and the righteous suffer? This is the question which is hotly debated by job and his three friends. A partial solution of the difficulty may be seen in Ps 37, the theme of which is the brevity of godless prosperity, and the certainty that well-doing will lead to well-being. A better solution is attained in Ps 73, which depicts God's attitude toward the wicked and toward the righteous. The wicked will be suddenly overthrown while the righteous will live forever in the enjoyment of communion with God. Not even death can sever him from God. The fleeting pleasures of proud scoffer pale into insignificance before the glories of everlasting fellowship with God.

(1) Out of the depths of persecution and slander the author of Ps 31 climbed into his refuge, as he exclaimed, "In the covert of thy presence with thy side from the plottings of men; Thou wilt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues." (2) Ps 77 is a stairway out of the depths of suspense and anxiety. The experience of the author well illustrates Macalur's epigram, "If out of the depths we cry, we shall cry ourselves out of the depths." (3) The author of Ps 116 looked into the jaws of death. Perhaps no other ps has so much to say of physical death. The singer is filled with gratitude as he reviews the day He, frail and sick, has saved him (4) Ps 18 is unique, because it is sad and plaintive from beginning to end. The singer has long cried for deliverance from bodily weakness and from loneliness. (5) Out of the depths of disaster and defeat the authors of Ps 60, 74, 79 and 89 cried to God. The Book of Psalms was a sore trial to patriotic Jews. They mourned over the destruction of their beautiful temple and the holy city in which their fathers had worshipped. The author of Ps 60 closes with hope and confidence (60 12).

"Unquestionably in the Ps we reach the high-water mark of OT practical piety, the best that the OT can exhibit of heart-religion." 5. Ethical Ideals (1) What sort of man, then, would the Ps accredit as good?—Ps 1 opens with a vivid contrast between the righteous and the wicked. Ps 15 is the most complete description of a good man to be found in the Psalter. The picture is drawn in answer to the question. What sort of man will Jeh receive as an acceptable worshipper? The morality of the Bible is rooted in religion, and the religion of the Bible blossoms and bears fruit in the highest ethical known to man. Ps 131 makes humility a prime quality of a real good man (Ps 133) and the best fruit of brotherly love. The social virtues had a large place in the psalmists' ideals of goodness. Humility and brotherly love are a guaranty of peace in the home, the church and the nation. Ps 24 4 is a compend of ethics in a single sentence.

(2) The ethics of speech.—Even a casual reading of the Ps must impress one with the fact that the psalms reflect a keen sense of the shunck God in the world to come. Life everlasting in the presence of Jesh is the prospect with which the author of Ps 16 refreshes himself (16 8–11). The vision of God's face after the sleep of death is better than worldly prosperity (17 13–15). The author of Ps 73 wins rest for his distressed soul in the assurance of fellowship with God that cannot be broken (73 23–26). God will finally take the singer to Himself. It has been well said that Ps 49 registers the high-water mark of OT faith in a future life. Death becomes the shepherd of the wicked who trusted in riches, while God redeems the righteous from the power of Sheol and takes the believing soul to Himself.

LITERATURE.—One of the most elaborate and informing articles on the history of the exposition of the Ps is found in the Intro to Delitzsch's Comm. (pp. 64–87, ET). Among the Fathers, Jerome, Chrysostom and Augustine are most helpful. Among the Reformers, Calvin, the prince of expositors, is most valuable. Among modern commentators, Ewald and Delitzsch are scholarly and sane. Their comments, accessible in Eng. trs, of Hupfeld is strong in grammatical exegesis. Among modern Hebrew scholars, B. Bloch and J. P. Dayan are helpful. Among recent Eng. and American commentators, the most helpful are D. A. North (1957) and J. C. H. Spalding (1966). M. I. G. Kay (1989–92), and Kirkpatrick in Cambridge Bible (1893–95). Briggs in ICC (1960) is learned; Davison, New Century Bible, is bright and attractive. Spurgeon, Treasury of David, is a valuable compilation, chiefly from the Puritan and Puritanic Commentaries. The Book of Ps (1882) and The Origin and Religious Contents of the Psalter (1891), is quite radical in his critical views. Binnie, The Psalms Their Origin, Teachings and Use (1880), is a fine introduction to the Psalter. Robertson, The Poetry and Religion of the Psalms, is an attractive and knowledgeable discussion of the Psalter. This last book constructs an able argument against recent radical views.

LITERATURE

The extravagant claims made by some writers for a fully developed system of Bib. psychology has brought the whole subject into disfavour. So much, indeed, has Schriftheorie (Schriftheorie) boldly asserted that Scope of "a system of Biblical psychology has been got together without any justifi- Psychology fiction for it in Scripture." At the Psychology outset, therefore, it must be borne in mind that the Bible does not present us with a systematized philosophy of man, but gives in popular form an account of human nature in all its various relationships. A reverent study of Scripture will undoubtedly lead to the recognition of a well-defined system of psychology, on which the whole scheme of redemption is based. Great truths regarding human nature are presupposed in and about the OT and the NT; hence there is some loose talk on other aspects of truth, unknown to writers outside of revelation, and presented to us, not in the language of the schools, but in that of practical life. Man is there described as fallen and degraded, but intended by God to be raised, redeemed, renewed. From this point of view Bib. psychology must be studied, and our aim should be "to bring out the views of Scripture regarding the nature, the life and life-destinies of the soul, as they are determined by the history of salvation" (Delitzsch, Bibl. Psych., 15).

As to the origin of the soul, Scripture is silent. It states very clearly that life was "inbreathed into man by God* (Pn. 3), "wawpyp'nu;* 2. Nature LXX eudvndaoj, eudvndaisen; Vulg. Vulg and Origin inspiravit. The human being thus inspired by God was thereby constituted a nephesh hayyâk ("living soul"), because the nishmath hayyim ("breath of lives") had been imparted to him (Gen 2 7). Beyond this the first book of the Bible does not go. In later books the life of the person is taught under one equal expression. Thus in the Book of Job: "The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty giveth me life" (Job 33 4). The difference in expression should be carefully noted. The "living soul* (LXX psuch Âi zoos) is made to depend upon, as it has its origin in, the "breath of life*" (LXX pnuk zoÂs). The nishmath ("breath") is characteristic of man—though it is very rarely, if ever, attributed to animals; man is described as a being "in whose nostrils is but a breath* (nishmath) ( Isa 2 22). That "breath" is "God's breath," as Job states it, is represented in Prov 20 27, "The spirit of man [nishmath] is the lamp of Jeh." In the NT Paul evidently refers to this view of man's origin in the statement that "the first man Adam became a living soul. The last Adam . . . a life-giving [quickening] spirit* (I Cor 15 45). This too agrees with what Christ has said: "It is the spirit that giveth life [quickeneth]" (Jn 6 63), and with what Paul, himself, has stated elsewhere in the Epistle to the Romans (8 2): "The Spirit of life who giveth life in Christ Jesus made me free from the law of sin and of death."

Scripture therefore repudiates all doctrines of emanation, by which is meant a natural, forth-flowing life from God. From this Jewish sphere, however, it teaches a doctrine of creation, wherever by Theories it declares that the Almighty acts with deliberation and design, in free choice, and not of necessity. "Let us make man* is the sublime utterance of Divine wisdom and power. Nor does Scripture teach the preexistence of the soul—a doctrine found in the extra-canonical, platonically inspired Book of Wisd (8 19 20), "For I was a child of parts, and a good soul fell to my lot; my father, being good, I came into a body undeftiled." This doctrine was well known to Jewish writers, and was taught in Talm and Kabbalâh.

"All souls were, according to the Talm, created and kept in secret from the first moment of creation. As creatures of the highest sphere they are omniscient; but at the moment of birth in a human body an angel touches the lips of the child, so that he forgets whatever has been (before the birth). At the Talm, however, must be a later importation into Jewish theology through the Fates and Elysium. It remains very vague (Bihl. et al., 15), who makes the souls—destined by the Fates to inhabit new bodies on earth—drink of the waters of Life and thus give us all remembrance of the joys of Elysium.

"The soul that dries up the flood."

According to the Kabbalâh, souls are supposed to have an ideal as a real preexistence: 'ideal as emanations from the infinite real, which are then called the infinite real, as having been 'created' at a definite time" (cf Eric Bischoff, De Kabbalah).

The doctrine with some modifications passed into the Christian church, was accepted by Justin Martyr, Theodoretus, Origen and others of the church Fathers, but became obsolete by the latter part of the 4th cent. (cf Shedd, Hist of Christian Doctrine, II, 9). It was formally condemned by a synod held at Constantinople in the 6th cent. In later times it was accepted in modified form by Kant, Schelling, and others. Defended by Julius Müller, who held that the soul had a timeless preexistence and underwent a fall before the final act, whereby it was united in time to the body as its temporary home (Ein ausser-ordentl. Rom. Cath. div. I). Reform orthodox is sometimes made to Jer 1 5, where Jeh addresses His servant: "Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee; and before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee; I have appointed thee a prophet unto the nations." There is no warrant to the doctrine as taught by the writers mentioned. All that may be conceded is, what Delitzsch has termed "an ideal preexistence," i.e. a preexistence, not only of man as such, but also of the individual soul, and of all created things, as a Divine knowledge, which precedes the existence in the individual consciousness* (Bibl. Psych.*, 46).

A new question arises at this point, viz. Is the soul a special creation? Is it derived from the parents? The Jews and Christians are agreed on this point. Many have supported the theory of Creationism, but it seems that in every instance where a new individual comes into being a soul is specially created by God, de nihilo out of the new-formed body. This view of the Jews is found generally in the church. It was dominant in the East and was advanced in the West. Jerome asserts that God quotidie fabricatur animas and cites Scripture in proof (Shedd, op. cit., II, 11). Scholastic theologians in the Middle Ages, Roman-Catholic divinity, and the Reform orthodox upheld the theory. Though finding little support in Scripture, they appealed to such texts as the following: "He fashioneth their hearts alike" (Ps 33 15 AV); Jeh: "formeth the spirit of man within him" (Zec 12 1); "The spirit of God moveth upon the face of the deep" (Gen 1 2); "God, the God of the spirits of all flesh" (Nu 27 16)—of which Delitzsch declared: "This is to nearly hardly be translated into the context for creationism" (Bibl. Psych., 157).

Trachemius Lapia has found real support in the Christian church. It declared that the parents were responsible, not merely for the bodies, but also for the souls of their children. (i.e. by direct derivation, in the ordinary way of propagation). Tradition was a strong witness for this: "The soul of man, like the shoot of a tree, is drawn out (deducta) into a physical progeny from Adam, the parent stock" (Shedd, Hist of Doctrine, II, 14). Jerome remarked that in his day it was adopted by maxima pars occidentalis ("the large majority of western theologians"). Leo the Great (d. 461) asserted that "the Catholic faith teaches that every man with reference to the substance of his soul as well as his body is born in the womb" (Shedd). Augustine, however, though doctrinally inclined to support the claims of the traditionists, kept an open mind on the subject: "You may blame, if you will, my hesitation," he wrote, "because I do not venture to affirm or deny that of which I am ignorant." And, perhaps, this is the safest attitude to assume; for there is little scriptural warrant for either theory. Birth is a mystery which does investigations, and Scripture throws no light upon that mystery. Yet some who have discussed this subject have tried actually to calculate the very day on which the soul is created or infused into the body, as it is being formed in the womb. This has led to the invention of the most feigned and unnecessary, and in girls on the 80th. This indeed is the reductio ad absurdum of the theory (Vercil, et al., 173).

Whichever theory we accept, the difficulties are great either way. For if God creates a soul that soul must be pure and single and stainless. But if it be said that man is "conceived" as well as "born in sin"? If then, sin-stained, sin-remaining soul, the pure, stainless soul by contact, why cannot the stainless soul disfigure the contaminated body? And again, if every individual soul is a special creation by direct interposition of the Almighty, what becomes of the union and solidarity of the soul? Is its connection with Adam then purely one of physical? Is it not a moral generation? Creationism cannot account for the birth of the soul. It is clear that both account equally for the origin, nor for the hereditary taint of the soul. It cannot be a hopeless dilemma. In the one case we fail to grasp the distinction of its individuality; in the other, we plunge into a materialism which is equally false. Becquerel, Laplace, Fries, and others, have been for the latter, viz., for the origin of the soul; and in infusing He creates). The problem is and remains insoluble.

Passing allusion may be made to another very curious theory, which reference is made by Martensen (Psychology, 4, I. 107). It bears upon human individuality, as impressed not only upon the soul, but upon the body. The soul and the body are represented as arising at the same moment, but the latter (not in regard to its physico-chemical composition, but in other respects) is the resultant of soul-influences, whatever these may be. The soul therefore exercises a formative influence upon the body, with which it is united. This theory had been accepted by E. Stahl, when he died in Berlin in 1734, as physician to the royal family. We are here in a region where the way is barred—a possible closure without the light of the Holy Spirit.

The next important question which has occupied many minds is equally difficult of solution—the theory of Tripartition. Is man composed of "body" and "soul" (dichotomy) only, or is there a third to be added to these two, so that both are constitutive elements in the constitution of the human nature (trichotomy)? Either theory is supposed to be supported by Scripture, and both have had their defenders in all ages of the church. Where the tripartite division has found favor, soul and spirit have been distinguished from each other, as man's lower is distinguished from his higher nature; where dichotomy prevailed, soul and spirit were represented as manifestations of the same spiritual essence. Under the influence of Platonist philosophy, trichotomy found favor in the early church, but was discredited on account of the Apollinarian heresy. The threefold division of human nature into ἄσωμα ("body"), ψυχή ("soul"), and ψυχήν ("soul") has always been understood. St. Ambrose, bishop of Laodicea (d. 382), attempted to explain the mystery of Christ's person by teaching that the Logos (or second person of the Trinity) had taken the place of the rational soul in Christ, so that the person of Christ on earth consisted of the Divine Logos, a human body, and a soul (psuchē) as the link between the two.

For the tripartite division of human nature two texts are specially brought into the discussion: 1 Thess 5 23, "May your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire, without blame."—a text which is popularly interpreted as conveying that "soul" stands for "our powers natural—those we have by nature," and that by "spirit" is meant "that life in man which in his natural state can scarcely be said to exist at all, but which is to be called out into power and vitality by regeneration" (F. W. Robertson, Sermons). There is very little warrant in Scripture for such interpretation. "The language does not require a distinction of organs or substances, but may be accounted for by a vivid conception of one substance in different relations and under different aspects. The two terms are used to give exhaustive expression to the whole being and nature of man" (Daivision, OT, Vol. I, p. 135). It has been evident that a distinction of organs here—viz. of a soul distinct from the body, and a body distinct from either. In his "fervid desire for the complete and perfect sanctification of his disciples, the apostle accumulates these terms in order to emphasize the doctrine of an entire renewal of the whole man by the working of the Holy Spirit. It has been pointed out (A. Knuyper, Het werk v. d. Heiligen Geest, III, 110) and this must be carefully borne in mind—that the "apostle does not use them as if all your parts and then summarize these parts in body, soul and spirit, but holoteles, a word that has no reference to the parts, but to the θέλων, the end or aim. Calvin interprets 'soul' and 'spirit' here as referring to our rational and moral existence, as thinking, willing beings, both modes of operation of the one, undivided soul.

The next text to which an appeal is made is Heb 4 12: "The word of God is living, and active, and sharper than any two-edged sword, and piercing even to the division of soul and spirit, of both joints and marrow, and quick to discern the thoughts and intents of the heart." Here spirit, soul and heart are brought into close correspondence, with heart evidently as the center of personality, manifesting itself in soul and spirit. The only question is, whether the dividing which takes place by the piercing word of God is one within the soul and spirit, causing a complete exposure of the inner man, a cutting asunder of all that composes his nature, or one between the soul and spirit, a division of one word of the spirit cuts through all obstacles, pierces the very heart, lays bare what hitherto was hidden to all observers, even to the man himself, and "discerns" the "thoughts and intents," which in the unity of soul and spirit have been kept in the background. "The meaning is rather, that the word of God pierces and dissects both the soul and spirit, separates each into its parts, subtle though they may be, and analyzes their thoughts and intents" (Davidson, op. cit. 187). At any rate, to found a doctrine of Trichotomy on an isolated, variously interpreted text is dangerous in the extreme. The language of metaphor is not the language of literal speech; and here evidently we are in the region of metaphor.

The ground is now cleared for a fuller investigation of the meaning of these terms:

6. Scrip- changeably, though they are not natural Terms synonymous. Lēḇāḇāḇ ("heart"), nēḇēḇ ("soul"), nēḇēḇ ("soul") are very closely connected in the OT. The heart is there represented as "the organ, the spirit as the principle, the soul as the subject of life" (Cremer, Lexicon). Hence we read that "out of it [the heart] are the issues of life" (Prov 4 23). Dying is represented as the surrender of soul (Gen 35 18; Job 11 20), but also of spirit (Ps 31 5; 146 4). The dead are called souls (Rev 6 9; 20 4), and also spirits (He 12 23; 1 Pet 3 19). In the last mentioned text the "spirits in prison" are also called "souls." The living are described as "disturbed" or "grieved" in soul (Jgs 10 16), "vexed" (Jgs 16 16), "discouraged" (Nu 21 4), "weary" (Zec 11 8); but also as in "an anguish of spirit" (Ex 6 9), "impatient in spirit" (Job 21 4, in the Heb), "straitened in spirit" (Mic 2 7). At part death the "spirit" departs (Ps 146 4, in the Heb), but also the "soul" (Gen 35 18). As in the OT so in the NT, Our Lord "sighed," or "was troubled in the spirit" (Jn 13 21); but we also read that His soul was "very sad" (Lk 22 44), and His body was "distressed" (Lk 26 38; Jn 12 27). See Spirit; Soul; Heart.

(2) And yet there is a distinction, whatever the real nature of it may be. In Mary's Magnificat, e.g., we find the two combined in an interesting manner: 'My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour” (Lk 1:46-47), the one clause "referring to the personal emotions of Mary, to her feeling as a woman and a mother, all of which find an outlet in adoration," the second clause “appearing to indicate the moment when, in the profoundest depths of her being, by the touch of the Divine spirit, the promise of the angel was accomplished in her” (Godet, in loc.). A like contrast meets us in the story of Gethsemane. The Master was “exceeding sorrowful in soul” (i.e. the emotional, sensitive center of His being was in deep sorrow), the disciples were ‘willing in spirit,’ but weak” (Mt 26:38-42). In the OT we find that when a man dies his "soul" departs, and when he is restored to life his "soul" returns (1 K 17:22); but when consciousness or life-power returns to one not dead, “soul” is used (Gen 45:27; Jps 15:19; 1 S 30:12; 1 K 10:5). Even in popular language the distinction is recognized: we speak of so many “souls,” not “spirits,” as having perished.

(2) From all this it would appear that philosophical distinction and scientific accuracy of expression is not met with in Scripture. Man is there represented as a unity, and the various terms employed to indicate that unity in its diversity of activities or passivities do not necessarily imply the existence of different essences, or of separate organs, through which these are realized. Psychical action is sometimes ascribed to the body, as well as to the soul; for soul and body are inextricably united to each other. It is the possession of a soul which makes the body what it is; and on the other hand, a soul without a body is unthinkable. The resurrection of the body therefore is no mere figment of the creed. The body is God’s work (Job 10:8), inseparable from the life of the soul. In the NT it is spoken of as “the house on earth” (epegeios oikias), that prepares a tent preparer for the occupant (skhuno) (1 Cor 12:18; 2 Cor 4:7; 5:1). In the OT "we have such metaphorical expressions as 'housea of clay'; or, as in post-Bib. writings, 'earthly tabernacle.' In the latest, we have words which suggest a hollow, a framework, or a sheath, favoring the Gr idea of the body as the husk or clothing of the soul” (LaIidlaw). Hence in Scripture, soul and spirit are interchangeably used by man for human nature in general, not as though indicating separate entities, but as denoting a parallelism which brings out the full personality of man. Soul and body are threatened with destruction (Mt 10:28); body without spirit is a corpse (Jas 2:26); soul and spirit are interchangeably united: "Stand fast in one spirit, with one soul striving, etc (Phil 1:27).

(4) Gathering all together, the Scriptural position seems to be as follows: The Divine Spirit is the source of all life, and its power is communicated in the physical, intellectual and moral sphere. That Spirit, as the spiritus Abissus, the inspirer of the spirit, by its very breath makes man a living soul: “The spirit [or breath] of God is in my nostrils” (Job 27:3); “Thou takest away their breath [rph, 'spirit'], they die, and return to their dust” (Ps 104:29). In the Psalms the term “God and the spirits of all flesh” (Nu 16:22; 27:16). Soul, though identical with spirit, has shades of meaning which spirit has not; it stands for the individual. "Man is spirit, because he is dependent upon God. Man has a soul, because unlike the angels, he has a body, which links him to earth. He is animal as possessing anima, but he is a reasoning animal, which distinguishes him from the brute” (Bavinck, Ger. Dogm., II, 628).

(5) In this connection stress may be laid upon some of the Greek terms. Paul exhorts the Philippians to “stand fast in one spirit [pneuma], with one soul [psuche] striving for the faith” (Phil 1:27). He exhorts them to be “of the same mind” (aimpsuchos, Phil 2:2); he hopes to have "good comfort" (eulogeth, Phil 2:20); expressions; he knows of "no man likened, [isapauchos], who would care truly for [their] state” (Phil 2:20). Everywhere therefore we have "soul" in various combinations to indicate the mental attitude, which in the "fellowship of the Spirit” he would assume toward his readers, and his readers would adopt toward himself. There cannot be therefore that subtle distinction which men have found in the terms "spirit" and "soul,” as though two separate essences were housed in one body. The body is not a refuge, the Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty giveth me life,” is the key to the whole problem. The spiritus spirans becomes the spiritus spirantis—the inspiring spirit becomes in man the life which is expired, outbreathed by man, in both soul and spirit. "Soul,” therefore, may well stand for the personal, living, animated being—the suffering, acting, thinking, reasoning, dying creature, "whose breath is in his nostrils.” Christ gave His "soul” (psuchas) for His sheen of the cross He Himself exclaimed: “Into thy hands I commend my spirit” (pneumatos) (Lk 23:46). Spirit may therefore indicate the all-embracing power, guiding the inward and the outward life—principium illud in animam ex quoe insinuatur (Boehmer) on Eph 2:2 (of Lk 9:55 AV: 4:30). Hence by an easy gradation it may stand for the abysmal depths of personality; while "soul” would express man’s individuality in general. See SOUL; SPIRIT.

Pauline phraseology has somewhat confused the issue; at any rate, new meanings, not obvious to the reader, have been assigned to various terms. Paul contrasts the psychical and the pneumatic, the man under the influence of the Divine pneuma, and the man as influenced by his own psyché. The psychical man is man in his natural, unregenerate state, psychical in this connection being almost equivalent to carnal; while the pneumatic man would be the man guided and directed by the Spirit from on high. Nature and grace are contrasted in the two terms as the first and second Adam are contrasted in 1 Cor 15:45—the first Adam being described as a living psyché ("soul”); the second as a life-giving pneuma ("spirits”). The psychical man intended, fitted to hear the pneuma, while the pneumatic body is evidently the body capable of hearing the pneuma. Hence the one is corruptible and weak, the other incorruptible and full of power. The soul confined to the carnal body uses it as an organ, till it falls into decay and no longer lends itself to such use. The spirit, in constant fellowship with the Divine Spirit, communicates its energy to a body fitted to be the bearer of this renewed life. When that organ, made of that body its docile instrument, enables the body to fulfill its wishes and thoughts, with inexhaustible power of action, “as we even now see the artist using his voice or his hand with marvelous freedom and thus foreshadowing the perfect spiritualizing of the body.”

Other questions call for discussion here: they may be briefly touched upon. Scripture acknowledges a dualism, which recognizes the separate existence of soul and body. It recognizes a "doublefaced unity” (Bain); or considers mind and body as equally unreal, and as "aspects,” "appearances," "sides” of one and the same reality (scientific monism). It knows nothing of monism (idealism, which makes mind the only reality, of which in text is a modification).
nor of materialism, which considers matter as that which alone is substantial, while mind is a mere product of the brain (Haeckel). It does not support the evil of human frailties—practabillia—pre-established harmony, whereby: because soul and body were united in harmonious action before the individual was called into active being, body and soul acting in harmony after creation like two clocks accurately regulated, pointing to the same hour on the dial plate, though driven by different springs (Leibnitz). Science has no theory of fact to answer any of these questions, as they bear upon the history of man’s sin and man’s redemption. It throws no light on many problems raised by science or philosophy. It does not discuss origins—the origin of evil, of matter, of mind. “All is of God” (Jn 11 12), in order to answer many questions. Thus the relation of mind to body is and remains a mystery—as great as the relation between the forces in Nature, to which the names of light and electricity have been given. Science has not explained that mystery and failed. The words of Shenstone (Cornhill Magazine, 1907) may be applied to all psychological problems, outside of Holy Writ, which by him were applied to those scientific questions which remain unanswered by all of our efforts at solution: "We are still very far from knowing definitely that atoms are composed entirely of electrons or that electrons are nothing else than electric charges; and though electrons have been shown to exhibit electric inertia, it has not been proved that the inertia of atoms also is electrical." The mystery of matter is great; that of soul is greater still.

“Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting,”

The next question which falls to be discussed is the influence of the fall of man upon his soul. Scripture is clear upon the point. Man’s fall from a primeval state of innocence is there told in unambiguous terms, though the word itself is not found in the narrative, except perhaps in Rom 11 12, where allusion is made to the fall of man (aparaphrasetically). With the origin of evil Scripture apparently does not concern itself, though it clearly states that man’s sinful condition stands in direct connection with the transgression of Adam, as in Rom 5 12, where the introduction of sin (and death into the world) is made of the act of one man (e.c. Adam), hæmosta being evidently taken as the boundary of all human life. The Fall allusion in Rom 6 7 can hardly be referred to Adam’s transgression; at any rate the reference is debatable, and the passage itself scarcely gives the term "covetous covenant," though the revisers have deemed that "the covenant of Adam has transgressed the covenant." The German and Dutch VSS give the same interpretation to the verse: "like Adam. The LXX takes the term to be equivalent (συνταγμα), but the Vulg refers the transgression to Adam (sine Adam transgressus est). The other allusions in the OT to this event are slight, as in Job 31:33; Ezek 28 13 15. In the NT, however, the references are much more frequent, esp. in the writings of John and of St. Paul. Paul of St. Paul of St. John 3 8: 1 (Jn 3 8); 2 Cor 11 3; 1 Tim 2 14. The striking parallelism between Adam and Christ in Rom 5 12-21, the obedience of the one bringing freedom, while that of the other brought woe, and the contrast in 1 Cor 15 22 between Adam and Christ throw sufficient light on the question at issue.

Modern science, under the influence of the evolutionary hypothesis, has eliminated or at least attempted to eliminate the factor of the Fall. That "fall" has been interpreted as a "rise," the "descent" is supposed to have been a real "ascent." Far down the ages, man has become more miserable, more degraded, naked and wretched, just emerged from the brutal condition, torn with fierce passions, and fighting his way among his companions with low-browed cunning (Orr, Christian View of God, 150) must have emerged somehow out of darkness, and yet we prefer the words of Professor J. A. Thomson, "as those who look back to a paradise in which man fell: we are as those who, rowing hard against the current of opposite states. I am not saying the word, do not dream it is a dream." (Bible of Nature, 226). If science definitely teaches that man has arisen by slow, irregular, subminute grades, and not from the word may be said on the subject, then indeed the problem is utterly inexplicable. There can then be no agreement between the Bible, conception of the evolutionary theory as so presented. For primitive man’s transmigration would only be the result of the natural expression of brute passion, to which the name of sin in the Christian sense can hardly be applied. But the "minute" or "lift" occurred in the process of development under the guiding and directing influence of the Divine power. Almost every naturalist of the problem sees a different shape. A sinless creature, transcending the moral law, is then not an unscientific assumption; conscience tells us the voice Divine within the human soul is then not only possible, but actual and real, in the history of man’s earliest progenitors. It will after all remain as the most reasonable explanation of man’s original condition and his terribil fall. In that narrative will be found enshrined the "shadowing tradition" of a real, historic event, which has influenced the human race through all the ages. Asessor Driver, writing under the strong influence of the evolutionary theory, and accepting as "the law stamped upon the entire range of organic nature, gradual advance from lower to higher, from the less perfect to the more perfect," has wisely remarked that "man failed in the trial to which he was exposed, that sin has entered into the world, and that through the whole course of the race it has been attended by an element of moral disorder, and thus it has been marred, perverted, impeded or drawn back. Adams Driver, Genesis 2 17.

An equally serious question arises as to the effects of the fall of man. Shame, corruption, death is the answer given by the OT and NT. 10. Effects "In the day that thou eatest thereof of the fruit of the tree (Gen 2 17) was the judgment pronounced upon man. By this was evidently meant "death" as a physical and as a spiritual fact. Man was doomed. The posse non mort, which according to older theologians was man’s privilege, was lost and was succeeded by a punishment of which the non posse mort, i.e. the inability of immortal life was followed by the impossibility of not suffering death. Not as though immortality was absolutely lost; for with sin came death, degeneration, death, not of the inbreathed spirit, but of the body into which the soul was breathed by God. But even the body is imperishable. It undergoes change, but not extinction. The resurrection-body has become a possibility through the atonement and resurrection of Christ. The tabernacle is removed, but renewed. The body is not a Carson house, but an adjunct but an integral part of the human being. The Bible teaches not only a resurrection-body, but a transformed body (Rom 12 1). It speaks not only of a soul to be saved, but of a body to be renewed. Scripture alone accounts for death and explains it.

With modern evolutionists death is an unsolved problem. Weissmann (Essays on Heredity) maintains on the one hand that "death is not an essential attribute of matter" (p. 159), and on the other, "it is only a Problem from the point of view of utility that we can understand the necessity of death" (p. 23), and again "death is to be looked upon as an occurrence which is disadvantageous to the species as a whole, and in the case of life, and not as an absolute necessity, essentially inherent in life." He even speaks of "the immorality of the protozoa," because "an immense number of the lower organisms" are not subject to death (ib. 241). Death the most evil that has been "acquired secondarily as an adaptation," and must in a certain sense be unnatural. It is indeed "one of the most difficult problems in the whole range of physiology." If this be so, we may safely from a scientific point of view regard the problem, which has a value peculiarly its own. "By man came death" is the authoritative declaration, because by man came sin. "In Adam all die," because through Adam came sin. Here we may say leave the problem, because, "by man" will come "resurrection from the dead."—Souter.

But if the body is mortal, is the soul immortal? On this point the NT gives no uncertain sound, and though the doctrine be not as clearly expressed in the OT, yet even there the thought of an immortal soul is entertained.

12. Immortality of the Soul—In Christian teaching the soul is held to be immortal; it is given to Adam as a gift from God, and it lives on after the body is destroyed. This belief is based on the following scriptural passages:

"I know that my redeemer liveth, and after my skin shall I see thee face to face." (Job 19:25).

"You shall desire your life, your body shall rise again, and ye shall not be ashamed." (Ps 37:29).

"I will ransom them from the power of Sheol; I will redeem them from death, where are thy plagues? O Sheol, where is thy destruction?" (Isa 26:19). The words of Isaiah (26:19): "Thy dead shall live; thy bodies shall rise again, awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust." Still clearer is the note sounded by Daniel (12:2,3): "Many of them that sleep in the dust shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever." In another word, the OT saint based all his hope and fellowship on God. That hope strengthened his soul when he shuddered at the sight of Sheol. "It overleaps Sheol in the vigor of his faith." In the Psalms we find the same hope expressed on almost every page: "As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with beholding thy form." (AV, "with thy likeness," Ps 17:15) and again: "Thou wilt not leave my soul to Sheol; neither wilt thou suffer thy holy one to see corruption. Thou hast made known to me the path of life; in thy presence is fulness of joy; in the right hand there are pleasures for evermore." (16:10,11). Whatever the ultimate verdict of science may be regarding the "utility" of death in regard to the human race, Scripture considers it abnormal, unnatural, an intervention, an interlude of man's wrongdoing and his transgression of the law of God. But death in Holy Writ is not a hopeless separation of body and soul. The NT sounds a note even clearer than the OT; for Christ has brought "life and immortality to light." "We know," says Paul, "that we have a building from God." (Acts 21:8) after the dissolution of our tabernacle (2 Cor 5:1); and that is but the necessary corollary to Christ's great utterance: "I AM THE RESURRECTION, AND THE LIFE." (Jn 11:25).

J. I. MARAIS

PTOLEMAIS, tol'-e-maís (Πτολεμαίος, Ptolemaios), but usually called Ptolemy—"the Warlike").

The name Ptolemy is rather common from the days of Alexander the Great. Ptolemy is best known as the dynastic name of the 13 (14) Macedonian kings of Egypt (323–43 BC) (as Pharaoh in the OT). Those of interest to the Bib. student are:

1. Ptolemy I, surnamed Soter (Savēr, Sōter, "Savior"). Ptolemy Lagi, was born c. 366 BC, the son of Lagus and Arsinoë, a concubine of Philip of Macedon. He was prominent among the officers of Alexander the Great, whom he accompanied in his eastern campaigns. On the death of Alexander, Ptolemy seized Egypt as his share (1 Mace 16 ff.). Now commenced the long hostilities between Egypt and Syria, Ptolemy on more than one occasion invading Syria. In 316 he joined in a war against Antigonus during which Coele-Syria and Phoenicia were lost, but in 312 regained from Demetrius the son of Antigonus. It was most probably in this year (312) that Ptolemy captured Jerus on a Sabbath day (Jos, Antl. II, 1, 1), and by force or persuasion induced many Jews to accompany him to Egypt as colonists or mercenaries. His kind treatment of them induced others to leave Syria for Egypt. In 306 Ptolemy was defeated in the great naval fight off Salamis in Cyprus by which Cyprus was lost to Egypt.

2. Ptolemy II, surnamed Philadelphus (Φιλαδέλφος, Philadelphos, "Brother[sister-jl-loving]"). whose youngest son of Ptolemy was disposed of by his youngest son Phila dophilus—the son of his favorite wife Berenice—and died in 283 BC. According to the usual interpretation this Philae is "the king of the south" in Dn 11 5. This Ptolemy shares with his son and successor the honor of founding the famous Alexandrian Museum and Library.

3. Ptolemy III, surnamed Euergetes (Εὐεργήτης, "Benefactor"). son of Philadelphus, whom he succeeded in 247 BC. In 246 he was provoked to war by the murder of his sister Berenice at Antioch; in the course of this campaign he met with remarkable success, overran Syria, plundered Susa and Babylonia, penetrated to the shores of India and captured the important stronghold of Seleucia (1 Macc 11:8). Euergetes was, however, prevented from reaping the fruits of his victories by being recalled by internal rebellion in Egypt. He then proceeded to the East where he fought the Egyptians. While he was fighting against the Egyptians, he died a natural death (222 BC), or, according to another (Justin, xxxi.1), he was murdered by his son. Some regard this king as the Euergetes mentioned in the Prologue to Sir, but the reference must rather be to Euergetes II (Ptolemy VII). The "shoot" who "shall enter into the fortress of the king of the north" and prevail is Euergetes I (Dnl 11:7-9), ver 8 referring to the act by which he won his title.

(4) Ptolemy IV, surnamed Philopator (φιλοπατηρ, Philopatér, "Lover of his father"), or Tryphon (Τριφων, Tríphón), the eldest son of Euergetes whom he succeeded in 222 BC. Antiochus the Great of Syria declared war against Egypt about 230 BC, in order to settle the Coeles-Syria and Phoenicia, he was defeated by Philopator at the battle of Raphia near Gaza (217 BC). On his victorious return to Alexandria, Philopator assumed a very anti-Jewish attitude, and indeed caused discontent generally among his subjects. In spite of the victory of Raphia, Egypt began to decline under his weakness. He was as dissolute as Nero, while his domestic tragedies are as dark as those of Herod the Great. He died in 205 BC. Dnl 11:10-12 refers to the death of Philopator. He was most probably the oppressor of 3 Macc.

(5) Ptolemy V, surnamed Epiphanes (Εἰπιφανῆς, Epiphanês, "Illustrious"). He was only 5 years old when his father Philopator died. Taking advantage of the king's minority, Antiochus the Great, leagued with Philip of Macedon against Egypt. Philip took the Cyclades and some cities in Thrace, while Antiochus defeated the Egyptian general Scopas at Panas on the Jordan in 198 BC, and thus Pal palaces and the Macedonid dynasty. Some Romans now interfered to make Antiochus surrender his conquests. Not daring to disobey Rome, Antiochus compromised by making peace with Ptolemy and betrothing to him his daughter Cleopatra, who was to overlook the recovered provinces Coeles-Syria, Pal and Phoenicia (Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 1; Polyb. xviii.17), but the control of these provinces seems to have been retained by Antiochus. The marriage took place in 193 BC. After the dismissal of his faithful minister, Aristomenes, Epiphanes' character and reign deteriorated. At last he bestirred himself to recover the lost provinces from Seleucia, the successor of Antiochus, but was poisoned before his plans materialized, in 182 (181) BC (Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 11). Dnl 11:14-17 is to be interpreted as referring to the relations between Ptolemy V and Antiochus III, "the Great."

(6) Ptolemy VI, surnamed Philometor (Φιλομητώρ, Philometor, "Fond of his mother"), elder son of Ptolemy V whom he succeeded in 182 (181) BC. For the first 7 years of his reign his mother Cleopatra acted as queen-regent, and peace was maintained with Syria till 173 BC. Antiochus IV Epiphanes then invaded Egypt, defeated the Egyptians at Panas on the Jordan, and proceeded to the person of Ptolemy, whom he spared, hoping to employ him as a tool to gain the ascendency over Egypt. Philometor's brother was now proclaimed king by the Alexandrians, with the title of Euergetes (II). When Antiochus retired, Philometor made peace with his brother, conceding him a share in the government (170 BC). This displeased Antiochus, who marched against Alexandria, but was stopped beneath the walls by a Roman embassy (168 BC), in obedience to which he withdrew. The brothers quarreled again, and Antiochus was expelled by the Alexandrians. The young king, Polybius, took refuge in Rome to seek assistance (164 BC). The Romans seated him again on his throne, assigning Cyrenaica to Euergetes. The next quarrel was about Cyprus. Philometor this time secured his brother as a prisoner, but sent him back to his province. Philometor was later drawn into Syrian politics in the conflict between Alexander Balas and Demetrius. The Egypt king espoused the cause of the former, to whom he also betrothed his daughter Cleopatra. But on discovering Balas' treachery, he took away his daughter from him and gave her to his opponent, Demetrius Nikator, whom he now supported against Balas. Balas was defeated in a decisive battle on the Oenoparas and killed, but Ptolemy himself died in 146 BC from the effects of a fall from his horse in the battle (1 Macc 1:18; 10:51 ff.; 2 Macc 1:10; 4:21). Dnl 11:25-30 refers to the events of this reign. Philometor seems to have taken a friendly attitude toward the Jews. In his reign the large Jewish community at Alexandria in Phoenicia was founded in 154 BC (Dn 11:1, 5), and two Jewish generals, Onias and Dositheus, were at the head of his armies and had a large share in the government (Jos, Cap, II, 5). The Jewish-Alexandrine philosopher Aristotle probably lived in this reign.

(7) On the death of Philometor his young son was proclaimed king as Ptolemy Eupator (["of a noble father"], but after reigning but a few months was put to death by his uncle Euergetes II (Just. xxxviii.8). His reign being so brief, he need hardly be numbered among the Ptolemies.

(8) Ptolemy VII (VIII), surnamed Euergetes (II) and called also Physcon (Φυσκός, Big-pauneh), became sole ruler in succession to his brother Philometor (or to his murdered nephew) in 146 BC, and reigned till 117 BC. His reign was characterized by cruelty, tyranny and vice, so that he was hated by his subjects, esp. by the people of Alexandria, who on one occasion expelled him during an insurrection. It is uncertain whether Physcon was an enemy or an persecutor of the Jews or their patron. Some authorities refer the persecutions mentioned in 3 Macc to this reign, but most modern authorities are disposed to date them in the reign of the anti-Jewish Ptolemy IV Philopator. The statement, "in the 38th year of King Ptolemy VII..." in the Prologue to Sir refers to Physcon Euergetes II and=132 BC, since he dated his reign from the year of joint kingship with his brother (170 BC).

The other Ptolemies of Egypt require no mention here.

The following are the apocryphal Ptolemites:

1. Ptolemy Macron. See Macron.

4. Ptolemy, son of Dosithes; he and his father were bearers of the "epistle of Pharruia" (Ad Est 11:1).

Literature.—J. P. Mahaffy, Empire of the Ptolemies, is the best account for English readers, but the first translation of the Ptolemaic records. A long list of Ptolemies will be found, e.g., in Smith's Classical Dict. The ancient authorities are Josephus, Polybius, Justin, Pausanias, Plutarch (Chrm.), Livy, Diodorus, Jerome (Comm. to Dnl 11).

PUAH, pū'ah, PUAH, pū'ah: (1) תַּעַה, pā'ah: One of the Heb midwives whom the king of Egypt commanded to kill all male children of Israel, the Heb. midwives, fearing God, refused to obey, pretending that the children of the Heb women were usually born before they arrived. Their act is spoken of as being meritorious in the eyes of the Lord, who is said to have rewarded them by making "houses" for their sons (Ex 1 15–20). In the Midrash, Ex Rabba', Puaḥ is identified with Miriam, and Shiprah, the other midwife, with her mother Jochebed. According to another tradition Puaḥ was a prostrate.

(2) תַּעַה, pā'ah, in 1 Ch 7 1; תַּעַה, pūmah, in Gen 46 13; Nu 26 23; written also "Pua" AV, and "Puvah" RV: Second son of Issachar, ancestor of the Punites, enumerated in the desert census taken by Moses and Eleazar.

(3) תַּעַה, pā'ah: Member of the tribe of Issachar, mentioned (Jgs 10 1) as the son of Dodo and the father of Tola, the judge. ELLA DAVIS ISACCS

PUBLICAN, pub'i-kan. See TAX, TAXING.

PUBLIUS, pub'li-us (Πούλιος, Pólios, from the Lat. praenomen Publius, derived from populus, "popular"); according to Ramsay it is the Gr form of the Lat. nomen Poplius; the Gr title meaning "first," applied to Publius in Acts 28 7, was an official one, and has been found on an inscription from the island of Culena near Malta (cf Böckh, CIG, no. 5, 754): Publius held office under the governor of Sicily. As the leading official in Malta, he was responsible for any Rom soldiers and their prisoners who might land there, but the account in Acts 28 7 implies that he displayed more than ordinary solicitude for Paul and his shipwrecked company, for, according to the writer, he "received us, and lodged us three days courteously" (AV). The Apocalypse "Acts of St. Paul" (see APOCALYPHAL ACRES, B, 1) states also that "he did for them many acts of great kindness and charity" (cf Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 605). On this occasion Paul miraculously healed the father of Publius, who "lay sick of fever and dysentery" (Acts 28 8). The exactitude of the medical terms here employed foremoins that the writer of Acts was a physician. Tradition relates that Publius was the first bishop of Malta and that he afterward became bishop of Athens. C. M. KERR PUDENS, pu'denz, pu'dens (Ποῦδες, Pōdēs, lit. "bashful") [2 Tim 4 21]: One of the Christians in Rome who remained loyal to Paul during his second and last imprisonment there, when most of the members of the church "forsook him." The pressure under which they acted must have been very great, as the apostle's final trial before the supreme court of the empire followed quickly after the Neroic persecution. Their defection from their loyalty to Paul must not be taken as implying that they had also professed the faith of Christ. At this time, however, there were some of the Christians who risked their earthly all, and their lives too, in order to prove their adherence to Paul, and Pudens was one of these.

Writing the last of all his letters, the Second Ep. to Tim, Paul sends greetings from "all the brethren" who were then with him. Among these he names Pudens. There were three other names associated with the apostle with that of Pudens: Eubulus, Linus and Claudia. The most interesting conjecture regarding Pudens and Claudia, that they were husband and wife, and that Claudia was of British birth, a daughter of a British chief of the tribe of the King Cogdunus was an ally of the Romans, and assumed the name of the emperor Tiberius Claudius, who was his patron. In this way his daughter would be named Claudia. But this identification of the British princess with the Claudia who sends salutation to Timothy is only a supposition; it lacks both evidence and proof. See CLAUDIA and CH (CH, B, 6).

In modern Rome, however, the tourist is still shown a building which is called the home of Pudens, in the same way as "Paul's hired house" is also shown. The authenticity in both cases is lacking.

Pudens is not mentioned elsewhere in the NT.

PULITES, pu'lit-es. See PUL-THITES.

PUL, pul: (1) An Assyrian king (2 K 15 19). See TIOLATH-PLACE.

(2) An African country and people (Isa 66 19). See PFT.

PULPIT, pul'p-it: Neh 8 4, " Ezra the scribe stood upon a mishdol of wood." Mishdol is one of the commonest words in the OT and means simply a high object—here a scaffolding or platform (בַּעַ, בֶּמֶה, 1 Esd 9 42). "Tower" (so RVm) gives an entirely wrong picture.

PULSE, pul' (םו'לס, zērōthim [Dnl 1 12 m., "herbs",] בַּע'ק, zērōthim [Dnl 1 16]; cf פַּלִּס, "sowing seed" [Lev 11 37], and בְּמו', "things sown" [Isa 61 11]): (1) In Dnl 1 12, 16, it must mean herbs or vegetables grown from seeds; a vegetable diet is what is implied. (2) In 2 S 17 28, "pulse" after "parchei" is not in the original, but is probably more correct than the tr in (1), as "pulse" usually implies leguminous plants, peas, beans, etc.

LITERATURE

I. Preliminary Assumptions.—(For "everlasting," where used in AV as the rendering of αἰώνιος, αἰώνιος, RV substitutes "eternal.") It is assumed in this art. that Scripture teaches the survival of the soul after death, the reality of retribution and of judgment to come, and a shorter or longer period of suffering for sin in the case of the unredeemed in the world beyond. Only such words need be said, therefore, in preliminary remark on these assumptions.

Whatever view may be taken of the development of the doctrine of immortality in the OT (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT), it will 1. Survival after Death out assumed in the NT that the souls of men, good and bad, survive death (see IMMORTALITY). Two passages only need be referred to in proof: one, Christ's saying in Mt 10 28: "Be not afraid of them that kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell"
Punishment

THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

(Geenna); the other, the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus in Lk 16 19-31: Lazarus is carried by the angels to Abraham’s bosom; the rich man lifts up his eyes in Hades, but is tormented. The whole doctrine of the future judgment in the NT presupposes survival after death.

Retribution for sin is a cardinal point in the teaching of both the OT and NT. The doctrine of judgment, again, in the NT, with Christ as judge, turns on this point. The following passages are decisive: Isa 3 10.11; Mt 11 22.24; 12 41.42; Rom 2 5.12; 2 Cor 5 10; Gal 6 7.8, etc (see Retribution).

The conscious endurance of punishment for sin in the future state is already implied in the preceding. The parable of the Rich Man speaks of it as following immediately on death in Hades; all the descriptions of the judgment imply pain and anguish as the result of condemnation (cf Rom 5 12). This does not settle the nature or duration of the punishment; but it excludes the idea that physical death is the extinction of being, or that annihilation follows immediately on punishment. It is maintained here that the punishment of sin, in the case of the finally impenitent, is everlasting.

II. Scriptural Support.—The doctrine that the punishment of sin is everlasting is sustained by many plain statements of the OT and NT.

The doctrine of future punishment is not prominent in the OT, where rewards and punishments are chiefly connected with the present life. In a few passages (Is 49 14.15; 73 18.19; of Isa 24 21.22; 66 24), Conceptions of Dr. Charles thinks that “Sheol appears as the place of punishment of the wicked” (Eschatology, 73-76, 156). If so, there is no suggestion of escape from it. In Dnl 12 2, some that sleep in the dust are represented as awaking to “shame and everlasting contempt” (the word for “everlasting” is the usual one, ご覒). In the Jewish literature of the century before Christ, “Sheol is regarded,” says Dr. Charles, “as the place of punishment, and punishment, death—hell” (op. cit., 236; see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT).

In the NT, the strongest language is used by Jesus and the apostolic writers on the certainty and severity of the punishment of sin in the future state, and always in a manner "eternal" (according to Cox it does not mean this at all), but is strictly “age-long,” is therefore compatible with, if it does not directly suggest, a termination of punishments in the NT, but they are described as being passed through and through with the element of time” (p. 100), but he denies its equivalence with "everlasting." The sense, no doubt, is to be determined by the context, but it can hardly be questioned that “the chains of the aeons” and similar phrases are the practical NT equivalents for eternity, and that αἰῶνιος in its application to God and to life (“eternal life”) includes the idea of an unending duration (cf Jn 18 33-39 for express assertion of this). When, therefore, the term is applied in the same context to punishment in the NT (Mt 25 46), and no hint is given anywhere of limitation, the only reasonable exegesis is to take the word in its full sense of "eternal.

(3) Equivalent expressions.—The meaning "eternal is confirmed by the use of equivalent expressions and of forms of speech which convey in the strongest manner the idea of finality. Such are the expressions, "the unquenchable fire," the "worm" that "doth not" (Mt 3 12; Mk 9 43-45; cf Mt 10 28), "the second death," "the second death," "second death," on which the advocates of conditional immortality build their arguments for final extinction. Such is the dictum of Jesus: "He that obeyeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him" (Jn 3 36; the opposite of "life" is "perishing," ver 16); or that in Rev 22 11, "He that is unrighteous, let him do unrighteousness still; and he that is filthy, let him be made filthy still." Finally, this is the word in the NT (see Retribution) — "the outer darkness" (Mt 8 12; 22 13); "The door was shut . . . I know you not" (Mt 25 10.12; cf 7 24), as in those of the Epp. (e.g. He 2 3; 6 6-8; 10 27.31; 12 25.29). Jesus speaks of the blasphemy against the Spirit as a sin which shall not be forgiven, “neither in this world, nor in that which is to come” (Mt 12 32; not as implying that other sins, unforgiven in this life, may be forgiven in the next), a passage which Mk 3 29 does not give in the remarkable form, “hath not forgiven, but is guilty of an eternal sin” (Mk 3 29). The Rich Man in Hades found an impassable gulf fixed between himself and Lazarus (Lk 16 26). See GULP. It adds to the terribleness of these sayings things that, as punishment, it has been common in the past to put against them; no hint or indication of a termination of the doom. Why did Jesus not safeguard His words from misapprehension, if behind them there lay an assurance of restoration and mercy? One may ask with Oxenham, in a reply to Jukes, “whether if Christ had intended to teach the doctrine of eternal punishment, He could possibly have taught it in plainer terms.

(5) The last judgment.—The NT doctrine of the last judgment is different in form and content. Two things seem plainly taught about this judgment: the first, that it proceeds on the matter of the present life—"the things done in the body" (Mt 25 31-46; 2 Cor 5 10; Rev 20 12); and the second, that it is decisive in its issues. Not a single suggestion is given of a reversal of its decisions in any future age. Such silence is inexplicable if the Scriptures meant to teach what the opponents of this doctrine so confidently maintain.

In corroboration of this Scripture view analogy might be pointed. How constantly referred to in this life is the law illustrated of the tend.

3. Teaching eny of character to fixity! The of Analogy present is the season of grace (2 Cor 6 2), yet what powers of resistance to God and good are so to lie in human nature, and how effectually, often, does it harden itself?
under the influences that seem most fitted to break down its rebellion! What likelihood is there that eternity will alter this tendency, or make conversion more easy? Eternity can hardly be thought of as more really a gift of grace than advocated by Origen to whom the gospel has already come. Its characteristic mark is said to be "judgment" (He 9 27). Like the photographer's bath, may it do effect to develop and fix existing character, rather than to change it. Yet it is true that judgment finds the soul may be presumed to be one that will remain.

III. Difficulties and Objections—Rival Hypotheses.—What, it will now be asked, of the tremendous difficulties which inher in this doctrine, with their undeniable effect in alienating many generous minds from it and from Christianity? The lurid rhetorical picturings of the sufferings of the lost, too frequent in the teaching of the past, may be discounted; it is not necessary to go beyond the inexpressibly solemn words of Christ Himself and His apostles. But even with this limitation, does it not seem as if, by this doctrine, a reflection was cast on the righteousness and mercy of God in creating such multitudes of the human race, as, on any showing, are outside the pale of Christ's salvation? The generation of the masses with the masses even in Christian lands who have not received or do not obey the light—only to doom them to endless misery? Before attempting a positive answer, it is proper that a glance be taken at the rival theories put forth in alleviation of the difficulty.

The most comprehensive solution propounded is that of universal salvation—of a final restitution of all souls to God's favor and to blessing.

1. Universal Salvation. This tempting speculation—Salvation for it is no more advocated by those who, in the early church, by Schleiermacher in the last century, has been urged by many writers in modern times. One of its best known advocates was Samuel Cox, in his book Salvator Mundi. It is noticeable that not a few who favor this theory (e.g. Maurice, Farrar) decline to commit themselves to it as more than a "hope," and admit the possibility of human souls continuing to resit God endlessly (Maurice, Theological Essays, 470; Farrar, Belief of Those Who, xx in The Christian Faith, 485, "In this sense there may be for some souls an endless hell"). It must, however, be evident that, be the number greater or smaller—and who shall give assurance of its smallness?—if there are any such souls, the difficulty in principle remains. And if the passion is alleged as teaching universal restoration is equally contradicted. The deeper objection to this theory is that, springing, not from real knowledge, but from men's hopes and wishes, it has, as already shown, the tremendous stress of Scripture testimony against it; nor do the passages commonly adduced as favoring it really bear the weight put upon them. We read, e.g., of a "restoration of all things"—the same that Christ calls the palingenesia—but, in the same breath, we are told that those who love not the light will not be spared; and will be destroyed (Mt 19 28; Acts 3 21.23). We read of Christ drawing all men unto Him (Jn 12 32); but we are not less clearly told that at His coming Christ will pronounce on some a tremendous condemnation (Mt 7 22-23; 25 41); we read of all things being governed, or esteemed, up, in Christ, of Christ subduing all things to Himself, etc; but representative exegesis like Meyer and Weiss show that it is far from Paul's view to teach an ultimate conversion or amelioration of the kingdom of evil (cf Meyer on 1 Cor 15 21.28, and Eph 1 10; Weiss, Bib. Theol., II, 723, 107, 109, ET). We confess, however, that the strain of these last passages does seem to point in the direction of some ultimate unity, be it through subjugation, or in some other way, in which active opposition to God's kingdom is no longer to be reckoned with.

The view favored by another class is that of the annihilation of the finally impenitent. The type of doctrine called "extinctionism," and "mortality" includes other elements (see IMMORTALITY). The annihilation theory takes different forms. So far as the annihilation is supposed to take place at death, it is contradicted by the Scriptures which support the soul's survival after death; so far as it is believed to take place after a longer or shorter period of conscious suffering (which is White's theory), it involves its advocates in difficulties with their own interpretations of "death," "destruction," "perishing," seeing that in Scripture this doom is uniformly represented as over-taking the ungodly at the day of judgment, and not at some indefinite period thereafter. The theory conflicts also with the idea of the gradation of punishment, for which room has to be sought in the period of conscious suffering, and rests really on an unduly narrowed conception of the meaning of the Scriptural terms "life" and "death." Life is not bare existence, nor is "death" necessarily extinction of being. And the language of most of the passages of Scripture implies the continued existence of the subjects of the Divine wrath.

It is significant that on the side alike of the advocates of restoration and of that of annihilation there seems to be refuge from the difficulties frequently sought in the Probation hypothesis of an extended probation and work of evangelization beyond death. This theory laboring under the drawback that—in marked contrast with Scripture, it throws immensity the larger part of the work of salvation into the future state of being. It is, besides, apart from the dubious and limited support given to it by the passage on Christ's preaching to "the spirits in prison" (1 Pet 3 19.20), destitute of Scriptural support. It has already been pointed out that the final judgment is uniformly represented as proceeding on the matter of this life. The theory is considered elsewhere (see punishment).}

IV. Nature, Conditions and Issues.—While dogmas like the above, which seem opposed to Scripture, are to be avoided, it is equally necessary to guard against dogmas of all possible forms, as if an extremity must not, in the nature of the case, have its undiscovered mysteries of which we here in time can frame no conception. The difficulties connected with the ultimate destinies of mankind are truly enormous, and no serious thinker will minimize them. Scripture does not warrant it in negative, any more than in positive, dogmas; with its uniformly practical aim, it does not seek to satisfy an idle curiosity (cf Lk 13 23.24). Its language is bold, popular, figurative, intense; the essential idea is to be held fast, but what is said cannot be taken as a directory to all that is to transpire in the ages upon ages of an unending duration. God's methods of dealing with sin in the eternities may prove to be as much above our present thoughts as His dealings now are with men in grace. In His hands we must be content to leave it, only using such light as His immediate revelation yields.

As respects the nature of the punishment of sin, it cannot be doubted that in its essence it is spiritual. Everything can be adopted here which is said by Maurice and others of the punishment of being without the knowledge of God, who is love, and of Jesus Christ who has manifested it; even as eternal life is declared to be the having the knowledge of God and of Jesus Christ" (Theological Essays, 450). The supreme penalty of sin is unquestionably the loss of God's life and love—the being sinful. Environment, indeed, may be expanded or contracted with will, but the heart is one the sinner essentially makes for himself, and, like the kingdom of God, is within. The fire, the worm, the stripes, that figure its severity, are not physical. Even should the poena sensus (were that conceivable) be utterly removed, the poena damnii would eternally remain.

It is a sound principle that, in His dealing with a sinner in the world to come, God's mercy will reach as far as it can reach. This follows 3. Range of from the whole Scriptural revelation Divine of the character of God. What may mercy be included in it, it is impossible for anyone to say. It should be noticed that those of whom it is said that they shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them, are the ones who deny not the truth (Da 3 30)—who actively and consciously disregard and oppose it. But all do not belong to this class. It may be assumed that none will be lost who can in consistency with holiness and love be saved. The most germinal ground of the belief is the interposition of His own Spirit, God will acknowledge and develop. The problem of undeveloped character may receive a solution we do not wot of with the entrance into the eternal light—not in change of character, but rather, as said before, in the reduction of character's inmost bent. In this sense, the entrance into eternity may be to many the revelation of a love and grace which had not been understood or appreciated as it should have been on earth, but with which it was essential. There are at least many shades and degrees of character, and God may be intrusted to take the most just, yet most merciful, account of all.

The fullest weight must further be given to what the Scripture so expressly says of gradation of punishment, even of the unsaved. It is not the case that the lot of all who fail of the eternal life in Christ is all Punishment of one grade. There are the "few stripes" and the "most stripes" (Lk 12 47 48); those for whom it will be "more tolerable" than for others in the day of judgment (Mt 11 20 24). Even "Sodom and her daughters" will be mercilessly dealt with in comparison with others (Ezk 16 49). There are here for everyone the most exact weighing of privilege, knowledge and opportunity. There is a vast area here for the Divine administration on which no light at all is afforded us. There remain those passages already alluded to which do seem to speak, not, indeed, of conversion or admission into the light and fellowship of all.

5. God "All ship of Christ's kingdom, but still of a final subjugation of the powers of evil, to the extent, at least, of a cessation of active opposition to God's will, of some form of ultimate unification and acknowledgment of Christ as Lord. Such passages are Eph 1 10; Phil 2 9 11; above all, 1 Cor 18 24 28. God, in this final vision, has become "all in all."

Here, again, dogmatism is entirely out of place, but it is permissible to believe that these texts foreshadow such a final persuasion of God's righteousness in His judgment and of the futurity of further rebellion as shall bring about an outward pacification and restoration of order in the universe disturbed, so that it can never repair that eternal loss accruing from exclusion from Christ's kingdom and glory.

fact that the nation consisted of newly emancipated slaves, and therefore required harsh measures to keep them in check.

Under the Mosaic Law, the offences that made one liable to the punishment of death were: (1) acts of sacrilege (Ex 21:15; 177); (2) blasphemy (Lev 24:14-16:23; 1 K 21:10; Mt. 26:55.66); (3) Sabbath-breaking (Ex 31:14; 35:2; Nu 15:28-32); (4) witchcraft and false pretense to prophecy (Ex 22:18; Lev 20:27; Dt 18:2; 20:9); (5) adultery (Lev 20:10; Dt 22:22); (6) sodomy (Lev 20:13; 15:20); (7) in case of a woman with someone other than her betrothed (Dt 25:23), (b) in a priest's daughter (Lev 21:9); (7) rape (Dt 22:25); (8) incestuous and unnatural connections (Ex 22:19; Lev 20:11.14.16); (9) man-stealing (Ex 21:16); (10) idolatry, actual or virtual, in any form (Lev 20:2; Dt 13:6; 17:2-7); (11) false witness in capital cases (Dt 19:16.18).

A large number of offences come under the law of punishment by cutting off from the people, the meaning of which expression has led to some controversy. It may signify excommunication or death, and occurs in connection with the following offences: cutting off of the head, such before marriage, but detected afterward (Dt 22:21), (b) in case of a woman with someone other than her betrothed (Dt 22:23), (c) in a priest's daughter (Lev 21:9); (7) rape (Dt 22:25); (8) incestuous and unnatural connections (Ex 22:19; Lev 20:11.14.16); (9) man-stealing (Ex 21:16); (10) idolatry, actual or virtual, in any form (Lev 20:2; Dt 13:6; 17:2-7); (11) false witness in capital cases (Dt 19:16.18).

Of capital punishments that are properly regarded as of Hebrew origin, we note:

(1) Stoning, which was the ordinary mode of execution (Ex 19:13; Lev 20:27; Josh 7:25; 1 K 20:6; Acts 7:58; 14:6). The number of witnesses, of whom there were at least two, were required to cast the first stone (Dt 17:9); (Jn 8:7). If these failed to cause death, the bystanders proceeded to complete the sentence, whereupon the body was to be suspended until sunset (Dt 21:25).

(2) Hanging is mentioned (Nu 25:4; Dt 21:22), probably not as a mode of execution, but rather of exposure after death. It may have been a Canaanitish punishment, since it was practised by the Gibonites on the sons of Saul (2 S 21:6-9).

(3) Burning, before the age of Moses, was the punishment of unchastity (Gen 38:24). The Law prescribes it as a punishment in the case of a priest's daughter (Lev 21:9), and in case of incest (Lev 20:14), but it is also mentioned as following death by other means (Lev 27:25), and some believe it was never used excepting after death. That it was sometimes used as a punishment on living persons among the heathen is shown by Dnl 3.

(4) The sword or spear as an instrument of punishment appears in the law (Ex 19:13; 32:27; Nu 25:7ff). It occurs frequently in monarchic and post-Bab times (Jgs 9:5; 1 S 15:33; 2 S 20:22; 1 K 19:1; Jer 26:23; Mt 14:8,10), but among these cases, there are some of assassination rather than of punishment.

(5) Strangling as a form of punishment has no Scripture authority, but according to tradition was frequently employed, and is said to have been performed by immersing the convict in clay or mud, and then strangling him by a cloth tied around the neck.

Besides these, which are to be regarded as the ordinary capital punishments, we read of some that were either of foreign introduction or of an irregular kind, such as: (1) crucifixion or crucification (Acts 16:2; 20:12); (2) drowning (Mt 18:11) and exposure (Isa 59:15); (3) sawing asunder or crushing (Isa 10:31; Mt 14:2); (4) torturing (1 Ch 20:3; He 11:35); (5) precipitation (Ps 22:22; Lk 4:29); (6) suffocation (2 Mac 13:3-8). The Persians are said to have filled a high tower a great way up with ashes, and then to have thrown the criminal into it, and continually stirred up the ashes by means of a wheel till he was suffocated (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchy, III, 246). See also Hexen, I, 110.

Secondary forms of punishment not heretofore mentioned are to be noted as follows:

(1) Blinding or putting out of eyes in the case of captives (Jgs 16:21; 1 S 11:2; 2 K 25:7).

(2) Chastening as willful and habitual, copper or iron, similar to our handcuffs fastened on the wrists and ankles and attached to each other by a chain (Jgs 16:21; 2 S 33:4; 2 K 25:7); also alluded to in the life of Paul (Acts 28:20; Eph 6:20; 2 Tm 1:16); and in the case of Peter (Acts 12:6).

(3) Confiscation of property that had fallen under the ban, i.e. had been singled out for destruction by the special decree of Jeh, as in Nu 21:2; Josh 7:17; or had been reserved for the army (Dt 2:35; 20:14; Josh 22:8); or given over to the priesthood (Josh 19:10). The term may be extended to include all things vowed or sanctified and those irrevocably devoted or consecrated to God (Lev 27:21-28). The idea is applied with special emphasis to those things which, because of their uncleanness, must not be used by the Israelites, though, through their warfare with the heathen, they might have come into possession of them (Dt 7:26; 1 S 15:16-23).

(4) Dashing in pieces (Ps 2:9; Isa 13:18).

(5) Divine visitation.

See VISITATION.

(6) Exposure to wild beasts (Lev 26:22; 1 S 17:46; Dnl 6).

(7) Flaying (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchy, I, 478; Ninmah and Babylon; mentioned figuratively in Misc. 3).

(8) Forfeiture (Ex 10:8).

(9) Gallows in the modern sense were probably unknown to the ancients. Where the word occurs in Est (8:14; 6:4; 7:9,10; 9:13,25), it probably refers to a beam or pole on which the body was impaled and then elevated to a height of 50 cubits as an object of warning to the people (see "Hanging").

(10) Imprisonment is frequently referred to in both the OT and the NT, indicating that this was a common mode of punishment among both the Israelites and other nations (Gen 40:3; 42:17;

(11) Indigities.—In this term may be included all those outbursts of vengeance or other evil dispositions that were practised in times or under circumstances when liberties with the prisoner were permitted on the part of bystanders or those who had charge beyond the execution of the judicial decree. Instances are found in the life of Christ (Mt 26 67-68; Lk 22 63 ff; Jn 18 22); also in the life of Paul (Acts 23 2).

(12) Mutilation (Jgs 1 6-7; Ezek 23 26; 2 Macc 7).—The law was opposed to thus treating any Israelite, and Samuel, when referring to the arbitrary power of the future king (1 S 8 10 ff), does not say that he would thus treat "their sons." It was a barbarous custom of the East (see Eunuchs; Polygamy), evidently regarded, among the Hebrews, as a heinous practice (Dt 23 1). The only act authorizing mutilation (except in retaliation) is mentioned in Dt 25 11.

(13) Plucking off the hair is alluded to as a mode of punishment in Neh 13 25; Isa 60 6.

(14) Prison sentences were in vogue to mark the convicts (Jer 62 33).

(15) Restitution has been alluded to in the general introduction to this topic.

(16) Retaliation was recognized by Moses as a principle, but the application of it was left to the judge (Lev 24 18-22). A fine example of it is found in the law of Dt 19 10.

(17) Scorpions, chasing with.—Probably the use of thongs armed with pointed pieces of lead or other metal (1 K 12 11; 2 Ch 10 14). See Scorpions.

PUNITIES, pūnīts (יִעְסָא, pūnāh, probably "dark"): Descendants of Pahah, of the tribe of Issachar (Nu 26 23; cf Gen 46 13; Jgs 10 1; 1 Ch 7 1).

PUNON, pūnōn (יִעְסָא, pūnān): A desert camp of the Israelites, the second after leaving Mt. Hor (Nu 33 42-43). Eusebius (Onom 299 85; 135 9) mentions a village Purges, pūr (Prison, Prison, Prison, 39): Gideon’s "serving," lit. "young man," i.e. armor-bearer (Jgs 7 10 f, AV "Phurah").

PURCHASE, pūrchās: In modern Eng., "to acquire by payment," in Elizabethan Eng., "to acquire" by any means. In the OT, AV has used "purchase" to represent יָכָּה, ḫāḥā, and its derivatives (vb. and noun), except in Lev 26 33, where the word is יָכָּה, ḫāḥā (RV "redeem"). In the NT the noun does not occur and the vb. is used for ḫākāyā, ḫākānāi, in Acts 1 18; 8 20, and ḫākānā, ḫākūnāi, in Acts 20 28; 1 Tim 3 13. But none of these words connects the payment of a price, so that RV has kept the word only in Acts 20 28 (in "acquired"), changing it into "obtain" in Acts 1 18; 8 20, and "gain" in 1 Tim 3 13. In the OT, RVm has "gotten" in Ex 15 16 and ARV has (very properly) introduced the same word into the text of Ps 74 2; 78 54.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

PURE, pūr, PURITAN, pūr-li, Purity, pūr-rī-ti: This group of words has in the OT and the NT an almost exclusively ethical significance, though the word "pure" is of course used also in its literal sense of freedom from alloy or other alien matter (Ex 25 11, etc.). "Pure" in the OT represents many Heb words, most frequently יָכָּה, ḥārōh; "purely," occurs once only in AV, as the tr of וַיְכָּה, bôr, properly that which cleanses" (cf Job 9 30, RVm "Heb "cleanse my hands with lye," i.e. wash them clean in Isa 1 25, RV "thoroughly [in "as with lye," AV "purely"] purge away thy dross"); "purity" is the AV tr of the same word in Job 22 20, RV "cleanliness." In the NT "pure" is the tr chiefly of καθαρός, katharōs (Mt 5 8, "Blessed are the pure in heart," etc), but also of ἄξυρος, ἀγνός (Phil 4 8; 1 Tim 5 22; Jas 3 17; 1 Jn 3 3)—always in an ethical sense. A different word (εὐλικρίνεια) is used in 2 Pet 3 1, RV "sincere.

PURGE, pūrje: A number of words in both the OT and the NT are so rendered in AV and RV. Although frequently in RV the older Eng word "purge" is displaced by the more applicable modern terms "cleanse" and "purify," since the emphatic and medical senses of the word, as we now use it, are not justified by some of the Heb or Gr originals. In older Eng. the word was broader in meaning, today it is specific. Occurrences in AV, with the changes made in RV, are as follows:

1. (Num 19:11; translated "to be clean." used of the putting-away of idolatry from Judah by Josiah (2 Ch 34 3, 8), AV is "purge" in all cases, but, in Ezek 24 13, ARV changes to "cleanse.

2. (Acts 22:13; translated "to make a sin offering" (Ps 51 7), is changed without improvement to "purify," "in RV, while "purge" is retained in ERV.

3. (Acts 22:13, translated "to cover" or to "make atonement," occurs in Ps 65 5; 79 9; Ezek 43 20-26; in the two passages in Ps, RV has "forgive" (the "expiate" of is still better), and in Ezek the even more accurate "make atonement." In both (4) ἀφανέσθη, "to refine" (Isa 1 25), and (5) ἀπορρίπτων, ἀπορρίπτων, lit. "to rinse" (Isa 4 4), "purge" is well retained in RV.

(6) (Acts 22:13, translated "to be shining." RV retains in Ezek 20 38, but in Dn 11 33 changes to "purify." (7) purge, zeac, "to make clean" in Mt, molten metal (Mal 3 3), also becomes "purify" in RV.

These occurrences are all in the figurative sense, and apply to sin, uncleanness, idolatry, etc. Most noteworthy is the ARV change of the familiar Ps 51 7.

The Gr words rendered "purge" in AV of the Apoc and NT are καθαρίζειν, katharizein, and καθαρίζον, katharizōn, and their compounds and derivatives.

2. In the AV, in all passages except four, RV more NT properly translates "cleanse" (Mt 3 12; Mk 1 7; Lk 3 17; Jn 18 2; He 9 22, 10 2). In He 1 13 "when he had by himself purged our sins" is changed to "had made purification." But in the case of the vb, compounded with the prep. ἀπό, ἀπὸ, and εἰς, i.e. ἀποκαθαρίζον and ἐκκαθαρίζον (Job 12 9; 1 Cor 7 5; 2 Tim 2 21), with strong signification to "cleanse out." RV more properly renders "purify" in the range of meaning. The change is the familiar verse in Jn, "Every branch, that beareth fruit, he purgeth" to "Every branch . . . he cleanseth" (15 2).

In there are therefore the Theories of the book, as the time, reason and manner of its celebration are given in detail (Est 3:7; 9:24 ff.). Reference also is made to it in apocryphal literature (I Macc 10:10-13; 2 Macc 15:10-18; in Jos (Ant, XI, vi, 13). No reference is made to this feast in the NT, as it was celebrated locally, and is therefore not to be connected with any of the festal pilgrimages to Jerusalem. For this reason the supposition of some that the feast of Nisan 1 (cf. 15) was Purim to be rejected, mention of it being immediately followed by the words, "And Jesus went up to Jerusalem."

For the complete account of the institution of Purim reference must be made to the Book of Est.

Only a brief statement is possible here.

2. History

Haman, son of Hammedatha the of Institution Aggaiteth (q.v.; cf I Sus 15.8.32), who had been prime minister by King Ahasuerus (Xerxes), bitterly hated the Jews, some of whom, as Mordecai, were rising to prominence in the empire. After Queen Vashiti had been put away from her royal position for cause 1 (9:12), a Jewess named Esther, kinswoman and adopted daughter of Mordecai, was chosen to become the royal consort. This only increased the hatred of Haman, who in his jealous fury soon began to seek an opportune day to work his hate upon Mordecai and the whole Jewish people, and therefore resorted to the casting of the lots for the auspicious time: "They cast Pur, that is, the lot, before Haman from day to day, month to month, to the twelfth month, which is the month Adar" (3:7). Beginning with the 1st month, all the days and months were tried with unfavorable result, until the last. At Haman's request Ahasuerus caused his scribes to send into all the realm on the 13th day of the 1st month a decree that all Jews should be put to death on the 13th day of the 12th month (3:12). As the narrative shows, the wisdom of Mordecai, Esther's heroism, and fasting and prayer availed to foil the deplorable scheme of Haman, who had already built the gallows on which his hated rival should be hanged. Haman was himself hanged on these gallows, while Mordecai was honored yet more (7:10; 8:12). A second decree was issued on the 23rd day of the 2d month, that on the 13th day of the 12th month (8:9.12), the day appointed in the first decree for their extermination, the Jews should gather together and defend themselves against their foes. On that fateful day not only did the Jews successfully resist the malice of their enemies, but the public officials also, seeing that the royal favor was with the Jews, espoused their cause. In Shushan, the royal city, a second day, the 14th, was granted the Jews for vengeance on their foes (9:11-16). In view of so great a victory, "Mordecai wrote these things . . . unto all the Jews . . . to enjoin them that they should keep the fourteenth day of the month Adar, and the fifteenth day of the same, yearly, as the days wherein the Jews had rest from their enemies" (9:22-23)

3. Manner of Observance

Already as early as the times of the Maccabees (2 Macc 15:36), the festival was observed, the 14th day being called "Mordecai's day. Jos refers to it as continuously observed and joyfully observed down to his time. "For this cause the Jews still keep the forementioned days, and call them days of Purim" (Ant, XI, vi, 13). In succeeding centuries as the Jews have passed from one civilization or empire to another, so many causes have arisen to remind them of the persecutions of Haman as to make the festival of a triumph over such persecutions both attractive and most significant to them. Experiences in Syria, Egypt, Rome, Russia and elsewhere have not been lacking in suggestion of the original occasion of Purim. The 13th day has been observed by fasting in commemoration of Esther's prayer and fasting before she approached the king; in the evening, at the beginning of the 14th day, the Jews repair to the synagogues. On the eve of Purim, one of the nephiloth, is read with interpretations, executions bursting out at the reading of Haman's name, accompanied by noise of rattles and stamping of feet, other persecutors and foes also sometimes observed. The names of Mordecai and Esther receive blessings.

On the following morning of the 14th synagogue services are again held, at which, in addition to the repetition of the Est reading, Ex 17:8-16, which is also read as the lesson from the Law, presents are given to the poor and to friends, and the rest of the day, as also the 15th, observed with feasting and rejoicing, even excesses being condensed in the exuberance of national spirit.

Many attempts have been made to trace the origin of Purim in popular or cosmic festivals, but to the present time without success, without approach to probability to any identifications with nature myths, national festivals, polytheistic legends have all found advocates. The word itself has suggested the possibility of identification with words of similar form or sound in other languages. But the ease of finding such similarities for any word casts doubt upon the reliability of any identification. (1) It has been traced to the Assyry pst, and identified as a Day of the Year when officials entered upon their term of service. (2) The Babylonian Mardi or the 14th day of Adar was claimed as the origin of Purim; Mordecai becomes Mardiuk, Esther is Ishtar, while Haman, Vashiti and Zeresh are Merodach gods. (3) The Jewish identification is in the Pers field, where bahar, "lot," is claimed as the source of Pur, or purdaj, "new year" or farvardigan, the feast of departed souls. (4) Origin also in a 9r harranian occasion has been sought. (5) Others suggest origin in other Jewish experiences than that claimed by the Book of Est itself, such as a captivity in Egypt, or a persecution in Rome, or a cataclysm in Egypt, or the victory of Judas Maccabaeus over Nicanor in 161 BC (1 Macc 7:45-57). No one of these theories has sufficient probability to secure for itself anything like general acceptance; the Book of Est remains as the most reasonable foundation on which to build, and in it are not so great as those of the explanations sought in other languages and religions.

EDWARD MACK

PURITY, puriti: The Bible bears witness to the long struggle over and in man to secure physical, mental, and moral cleanliness. The various forms of purity have relation to each other.

We have a common proverb that "cleanliness is next to godliness." Cleanliness and sanitation are certainly high neighbors. But cleanliness and ethics do not dwell farther apart. What is meant by "purification of person or property he may endanger the health or life of family, or even of society about him— in keeping conditions that develop typhoid fever begins to realize that there is a close tie between cleanliness and morals. Ought the government, its departments, and the whole realm of ethics is open, so are the departments of physical and ethical cleanliness. But now if one hesitates, without explanation, he cannot tell whether it relates to filth or sin.

The perception of this relationship is of very ancient date. Though it is Isaiah who says (66:21), "Cleanse yourselves, ye priests; wash away your filthiness" (Jer. 4:4). All the Jews, except they wash their hands diligently, eat not, holding the tradition of the elders; and when they come from the marketplace, except they bathe themselves, they eat not; and many other things there are, which they have received to do, such as washings of cups, etc.
and pots, and brass vessels," yet such statements are but summaries of directions distributed here and there throughout the whole Levitical Law. We can read therein what sounds like the hygienic orders of a general to his soldiers on the march, or like the rules of the board of health to preserve a city from pestilence. And these Levitical directions for cleanliness are connected inseparably with the worship of Jeh, as though physical purity were to that an essential. The Psalmist blends these two elements physically and spiritually, in the familiar question and answer (24 3-5), "Who shall ascend into the hill of Jeh? and who shall stand in his holy place? He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto falsehood, and hath not sworn deceitfully. He shall receive a blessing from Jeh, and righteousness from the God of his salvation."

The ceremonial cleansings called for by the Law had meaning and influence. They were interpretative of something spiritual — were a parable way of illustrating the necessity of purity of heart in order to gain acceptance with God. If in after-days the thing symbolized was forgotten in the symbol, that was owing to "blindness of mind." The darkness was not necessary. But the main subject in respect to which we shall in this art, and right, and purity from the Bible will not be hygiene or aesthetics, but morals.

1. The Sex
When we turn to that department of the Bible which treats of the sex relation, we find that the sex relation is the most primitive and comprehensive of all the human relations. The family. — The attitude of the Bible in respect to that relation is unmistakable. From the vision of the Garden of Eden to that of the New Jerusalem, the Bible rings true to the ideal of purity in family life. The Hebrews were much on the wrong track. This is remarkable, for it is a vast history over which its narrative sweeps, and in it every species of literature is represented. It sets forth the acts and views of a people in all the stages of civilization, from wandering nomads to dwellers in cities embellished by architecture and every device of man to set forth riches and splendor. It sets forth their crime, shame and sin, as well as their virtues, but its tone is approbative of the virtues and repugnant to the shame and sin. In the Magen Charts of the Hebrews — the Ten Commandments — there stands in equal rank with any other principle, "Thou shalt not commit adultery." The sanction of religion and law was thus given to the integrity and purity of family life. The minute regulations against marriage with relatives, and the severe punishments inflicted for disregard of the restrictions (Lev 18 and 20), were a powerful force in the same direction. The adultery of married persons was to be punished by the death of both the parties (Lev 20 10; Dt 22 22).

Such laws may sometimes seem severe. Doubtless they are primitive and date from the time of nomadism. In primitive conditions, penalties for infraction of law are to be severe and swift. Pioneers the world over and through time, for very self-preservation's sake, could show little or tolerance to lawlessness. Be these laws severe, they show the intense earnestness of a people to have a pure family life in which children born should be begotten by the Law. The Levitical restrictions upon intermarriage with relatives fit the sense of propriety and right of civilized people, even to this day.

There is no question about the attitude of the prophets on purity. They were in harmony with the Law. They had no tolerance for corrupt morals or manners leading to impurity or suggesting it. An illustration sometimes has the light of the sun in it. What it is that is illustrated is frequently best seen by looking at the illustration itself. The prophets were passionate monotheists. They wanted above all things that Israel should be true to Jeh and to Him alone. To the prophets, worship of other gods was treason to Jeh. One prophet after another, and over and over again, illustrates this highest virtue by identifying it with the highest relation. That shows in what estimate the family was held. To put any other in the place of Jeh was "to go a-whoring after other gods," or "to play the harlot." That shows as nothing else could how lowly and base the one who sought to pollute the family life. Indulgence was a high treason there, or it never would have furnished language to describe high treason to God.

Prov 5 and 7 indicate the attitude of the book on purity. We may let the book make its own case. The wise man and the stupid folly and destruction of her victim are specially set forth in the chapters mentioned. In the last chapter of the book we have a portrait of a "virtuous woman" in whom domesticity in purity has reached a high stage. "Let her own works praise her in the gates."

It is pleasant to turn from the tense severity of law, since it must deal largely with crime and sin, to the idealism of poetry. The Psalms and the Songs of Songs the relation of husband and wife, see. Bridal love and tenderness and purity are always treated with tenderness and reverence. Here is familiar Scripture (Ps 19): "The heavens declare the glory of God; the firmament showeth his handiwork. In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun, which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as the strong man to run his course. That does not betray any lack of sympathy with the exuberant spirit of a lover. So Is 62 4-5: "For Jeh delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married. For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee; and the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee." The psalmist clearly discloses the delight in the joy of those who are adjusting themselves under the primal eldest" rule over sex. Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh" (Gen 2 24).

It is sometimes thought strange that the Song of Songs should be in the Scripture Canon. But why should there be such doubt? It is but a more particular elaboration of what is boldly brought to notice in the quotations above. There is no more necessity of reading impurity into it than there is of reading into the quotations above or of an illustration of an experience as widely known as any in the life of the human race — an experience in which sin is no necessity. One must go out of his way who imputes sin to a single act or thought that comes to expression in the poem. The maiden is guileless and the lover is marry. The poem is said to be erotic. But the eros is idealized. It may be sensuous, but it is not sensual. It is not selfish. The passion of each finds expression in careful thought and desire for the other. It does not go back to itself in coarse brute craving of lust for its own self-indulgence. The refrain of the poem is—

"Each of you, O daughters of Jerusalem..."

That ye stir not up, nor awake my love;"

—Cant 2 7; 3 5; 8 4.

The watchfulness is as tender as that for an infant. Where will the law lay its indictment of sin against such thoughts and feelings? The lovers are under the charm that has been and is to be from everlasting to everlasting with the human race upon the earth.

Christ also strictest did not set Himself against the charm of love. He said it should be eternally and true in spirit. The maiden in the song goes forth in the light. In the simplicity of her heart and mind (3 2 ff). In the same simplicity, Evangelion wandered all the night of her life to find the object of her affection.
From the same charm in the beginning came the faithfulness of Enoch Arden. Out of the love that springs from the inner life there has endured to the end. The exuberance of the charm, like every other spiritual gift of regulation, but the charm itself is not to be treated as sin.

Paul has said, "Ye are not under law, but under grace" (Rom 6:14). But that depends upon the conditions to which it is applied.

5. Christ and Purity

Christian Law, but we are under the broad realm of ethical, always, even when we are under grace. What grace does is to idealize and spiritualize and make attractive and beautiful what before was perhaps hard, repellent statute and rule. Christ is sometimes thought to have relaxed the severity of "the reign of law." But six times even in the Sermon on the Mount He added to its strictness. Take the idea of the purity of the family as secured by its unity. Under the Mosaic legislation, certain not onerous forms of legal proceeding intervening, the termination of marriage be said to be optional with the parties. All this liberty is swept away in the sentence: "I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery' (Mt 19:9).

That is a law sentence. It was uttered in the realm of law. It was intended to have effect in law. No wonder, considering that it had been allowed in the Law up to that time, that the disciples as soon as they got breath said, "If the case of a man is so with his wife, it is not expedient to marry. They knew that a new law for Christ's disciples was put in place. Even the exception confirmed his rule. If the exception is allowed, polyandry or polygamy is established.

No other sentence of human speech has done more for the purity of family life (see DIVORCE). But Christ did not stop with the utterance of law protective of purity physically; He went behind all acts and laid down law for the thoughts and intents of the heart: "But I say unto you, that every one that looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" (Mt 5:28).

Sometimes it may be thought that there is a look of moral indifference about the way in which Jesus disposed of the woman's case who was taken in adultery (Jn 8:4-11). But it is not so. No man, Lord. And Jesus said, Neither do I condemn thee, go and sin no more. It must first be remembered that it was not her case but that of her accusers that was immediately before the mind of Jesus. They had brought her before Him to trap Him, but He turned and put them on trial. He made moral condition the main issue. Her sin was but an incident. But then, Jesus did not leave her without impressing on her mind that she was a sinner. The last words left ringing in her ears were, "Sin no more." And she was left, as all is sin are left, to wrestle out adjustment with the Holy Spirit, who leaves no soul without conjunction of sin, righteousness and judgment." The words of Jesus no more than the words of anyone else can explain all things to all. They can cover a point in view, but much must always be left to the understanding that comes from known experience under the more revealed God.

The subsequent psychology of a sinner after the words of Scripture leave him in no degree of interest. Psychological action he must have had: what is it? The question arises. Had the prodigal son committed his repentance till he had asked the forgiveness of his mother and his elder brother? What is the subsequent psychology of a sinner as he disappears from our view? We can interpret that, as we know what we know about the operations of the Holy Spirit in the soul, as we know a material object is what it is from without the action of gravitation. Few who have thought on this subject have expressed the truth so well as Whittier in "Our Master's Life" when he speaks of these words: "And men took note of his gauzy air The shame in his eye, the hurt in his prayer The signs of a battle lost, the pain of a soul in the coils of sin."

Into the desert alone rode He Alone with the Infinite Purity; And bowing his head in tender rebuke, As Peter did to the Master's look He measured his path with prayer of path For Grace with God and man again.

There is a recognition of the burning with fire that is infolded in the word "purity.

Paul is like his Master. He seeks for purity in this relation after marriage as well as before—purity of mind and body.

6. Paul how carefully and kindly Paul dis-course about all the complications in matters pertaining to sex. Then again, if Paul has exhorted wives to obedience to husbands, he has also called for equal self-surrender on the part of husbands (Eph 5:22-33): "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself up for it." Can there be any self-surrender greater than that which Christ made? Here let attention be called to the fact that in his catalogue of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal 5:22), if he has put "love" in the first place of emphasis among the nine, he has put "self-control" in the last.

We have only space for a glance at a few departments of action and thought to see what the world has gained in purity from the religion of the Saviour. The age of chivalry ought to have a word put to its credit. The knight took as one of the vows of chivalry the right to die at the word of the church. Take art—compare a Venus and a Madonna. Not only spirituality, but even intellectualism has been wanting in it. There is not a suggestion in a Venus that does not inhore in flesh and sense. Of what would she or could she speak if she were to open her mouth? To judge from her appearance, the utterance would be so "flat, stale and unprofitable" that even the charm of her physical beauty would disappear. In the Madonna you scarce see the physical. If she were to speak, her words would reflect the peace and calm joy of a heavenly realm. If her countenance is suggestive of something far away, it is of something far above.

But art is not dead, and spiritual art did not die with the creation of the Madonna. Take St. Gaudens' "Puritan." He was aware that with an Apollo, again we have the contrast there is between the Madonna and Apollo. He was the physical and the aesthetic in Apollo, but there is no glas of the intellectual. That Apollo thinks is not indicated, much less what he might be thinking about. There is not the faintest suggestion of the philosophical. There is no intent and purpose in him. But in the Puritan there is intent and purpose. He means much. He is just as intent and purpose in his "Puritan" work, and as much as he wants to express with an Apollo, and that if they were to clinch in a tug of wrestling Apollo would come out the winner, that is where the purpose is mastered. You may look through a whole pantheon of Greek gods and meet not a trace of the force concentrated in their sculptured bodies. Apollo's right makes might. He is in the majority because he knows Who gave him his right. If he is right, he can cause himself to be respected throughout the kingdom. He has won the greatest of all victories—self-control.

PURLOINING, pur-loin'ing: Lit. "for far off," hence to carry away or steal; the word is the fr. of soroipóma, soroipizomai, "to take away for one's self," "to secrete," "to steal," a word appropriate to those in a master's position in a master's service (Tit 2:10, "not purloining")

PURPLE, pur'p1 (παρπαλα', argàdán; Chal) παρπαλα', argàdân [2 Ch 2:7]; cf Arab. أركوان, 'arkwán, and Pers اروپکار, 'arkwán; πορφυα, porphýa, πορφýras, porphýras [LXX and NT]:

Purple dye was manufactured by the Phenicians from a marine mollusk, Murex trunculus. The shell was broken in order to extract the dye, and the body was removed and crushed. The crushed gland gives a milky fluid that becomes a deep red or purple after aging. Pipes of these broken shells still remain on the coast at Sidon and Tyre. The purple gland is found in various species of Murex and also of Dorsalium.

Purple is in the merchandise of Babylon (Rev 18 12). It is surprising that Ezekiel speaks of the Tyrians as obtaining purple from the islands of Elishah (Ezk 27 7) and from Syria (Ezk 27 16). PURPOSE, púr'püs, OF GOD (πρόθεσις, prothésis [Rom 9 11; Eph 1 11]). The word "purpose" seems to be an equivalent of the word "decrees" as used in relation to man's relation to eternity. More correctly stated, it softens the word "decree" and refers back to the cause of the decree as lodged in an intelligent design and forward to an aim consistent with the character of God. See FOREORDINATION; PREDESTINATION.

PURSE, púrs. See BAG.

PURSLAIN, púr'slán, JUICE, jöös, jüs. See JUICE.

PURTENANCE, púr'té-nans: With the significance of "belongings," this word occurs in AV of Ex 12 9 as the tr of ἐπτείξη, epitexi, "within," "inward," "roast . . . . with the pertenance thereof," RV "inwards" (cf Lev 1 9; 3 3, etc).

1. Renderings:

In consequence of the identification at the time, the prophets have "Libya" (Ἀλεξ., Libyes), except Nah 3 9, where the Gr renders the word as ἐφεις, phuē, "flight." The Vulg has "Phut," "Phuth," and in the Prophets "Libyes" and "Libyia"; AV "Phut."

In the "Table of Nations" Put is the third son of Ham (Gen 10 6), the first and second being Cush and Misraim, and the fourth Canaan. Put is the only one of the sons of Ham who is not credited with descendants.

In the Prophets, warriors from Put are referred to, principally in connection with the forces of Egypt. They appear as shield-bearers (Jer 46 9: "Cush and Put, that handle the shield; and the Ludim, that handle and bend the bow"). See also Ezek 30 5, where the order in the Heb is Cush, Put and Lud. In Nah 3 9 Put is the number of No-amon (Thebes in Egypt), and in Ezek 27 10 Put appears with Persia and Lydia (Laud) as being in the army of Tyre.

The common identification of Put is the Egypt Punt (or Pued), proposed by Ebers. The assimilation of n to a following consonant is common in the Sem languages, and would occasion no difficulty if the vocalization be found to agree. The final t of Put, however, seems to be the Egypt fem. ending, whereas the t of Put is radical.

Nevertheless, the district would seem to be rightly identified with the tract to the E. of Abydsinia (Somali-land), and it is described as being on both sides of the sea (the Red Sea, and as being included in connection with this, it is worthy of note that a fragment of a Bab tablet referring to Nebuchadnezzar's campaign in Egypt in his 37th year mentions, as though in the neighborhood, the city (here, apparently, standing for the district) of Pudu-gaman—probably not "Ludim (Gr Put)" (Lesbos, according to Winckler), but "Put of Yemen." If this be in contradistinction to the district of Put (Punt) on the African mainland, the latter would be the Puto referred to in the Pers inscription of Naqah-Rustem, which mentions, among the tributary-countries, Kushiya, Putiya and Massya, the Babylonian maβi Pūta, (mαβi) Kūsī, (mαβi) Mūsā (?), "the land Put, the land Kush (Ethiopia), the land Massā (?)". The soldiers of Put in the army of Tyre may have been either from the African or the Yemenite Put, in which case there was no northern tract of that name, unless settlements had been made in one or more of the areas from the original district. PUTEOLI, pu-te'ō-lí (Ποταίολοι, Potaíloi, "sulphur springs" [Acts 28 13, WH], the modern Pozzoli): A maritime city of Campania, which occupied a central position on the northern shore of a recess in the Gulf of Naples, turned toward the W., by the peninsula of Baiae and Cape Misenum. It was originally a colony of the neighboring Gr city Cumae.

The earliest event in the history of Puteoli which can be dated definitely was the repulse of Hannibal before its walls by a Rom garrison in 214 BC. The design of the Carthaginian to secure a seaport as base of supplies and communication was thus thwarted (Livy xxiv.7, 12, 13). A Rom colony was established here in 194 BC, and Puteoli thus became the first Rom port on the Gulf of Naples (Livy xxxiv.45; Strabo v.245; Velleius, i.15). Its subsequent remarkable prosperity and commercial activity are to be attributed to the security of the harbor and the inhospiatability of the character of the coast nearer Rome. For Puteoli became the chief seaport of the capital before the creation of an artificial harbor at Portus Augusti by Claudius, and before Trajan made the mouth of the Tiber the principal converging point for the over-sea carrying trade. The imports at Puteoli consisted of Egypt grain and oriental wares, dispatched from Alexandria and other cities of the Levant (Cicerio Pro Rabirio 40; Sestoniis Aug. 98; Strabo xvii. 793; Cicerio Pro Caelo 10). The eastern element in the population was very numerous (Petronius 81; CIL, X, 1797). The harbor was rendered doubly safe by a mole, which is known to have been at least 418 yds. in length, consisting of massive piers connected by means of arches, constructed in solid masonry (Strabo v.215). Extensive remains of this mole still exist. The shore line devoted to purposes of commerce (emporium) extended for a distance of about 11 miles westward from the mole. At the height of its prosperity under Claudius and Nero, the town is thought to have contained a population of nearly 100,000.

The region in which the town was situated is of volcanic formation, the name Puteoli being due to the odor of the sulphureous springs or to the wells of a volcanic nature which abound in the vicinity. The volcanic dust, called pozolana today, was mixed with lime to form a cement of the greatest durability, which was proof against the influence of seawater.

Extensive remains of an amphitheater, whose axes measure 160 and 126 yds. across the space inclosed by the outer façade and 75 and 45 yds. within the arena, bear testimony to the former affluence of Puteoli.

The region about Puteoli together with Baiae became the favorite resort of the Roman nobility, and the foundations of many ancient villas are still visible, although partly covered by the sea. Cicero's villa in the territory of Puteoli (Cicero Ad Fam. v.15, 2; Ad Att. xiv.16, 1; 20, 1) was afterward selected as the place of burial of Hadrian (Sparianus Had. 25). The portion of the bay between Puteoli and Baiae was the scene of the attempt made at the instigation of Nero upon the life of his mother by means of a vessel so contrived that it was to break to pieces while conveying Agrippina toward her villa near the Lucrine Lake (Tacitus Annals xiv.8). See Nero.

The apostle Paul found a Christian community at Puteoli, when he arrived there on his way to Rome, and stopped 7 days with them (Acts 28 13, 14). At that time the ordinary route to Rome, following the Via Appia from Capua, was 155 Rom. or about 142 Eng. miles (Nissen, Italicische Landeskunde, II, 739). Later, Domitian reduced the distance to 139 Rom. miles (about 129 Eng.) by laying out the Via Domitiana along the coast, joining the Via Appia at Nisano (Aelian, Geog. Rarae, IV, 32; Ibn. Ant., 122; Tab. Peut.). See GEORGE H. ALLEN.

PUTHITES, pūthīts (πυθίτης, pūthîs, "simple"; AV Puthitos): One of the families of Kirith-jearim, grandchild of Caleb (1 Ch 2 50 53).

PUTIEL, pū'ti-el (πυτιέλ, pūtîel, "contemned by El"): Father of the wife of Eleazar, Aaron's son, and thus grandfather of Phinehas, Eleazar's son (Ex 6 25). See PHINEHAS, (3).

PUVAH, pū'va. See PUVAH.

PYGARG, pī'garg (πυγαργ, dishôn; LXX τυγαργός, pugargos); of proper nouns, "Dishôn" and "Dishan" (Gen 38 21 30; 1 Ch 1 38 42); according to BDB, Hommel, Säugothiere, derives ִם from ֵיש, dish. Arab. ֽס, dâs, "to tread," and of Assy. dashânu, "mountain-goat"): Dishôn as the name of an animal occurs only in Dt 14 5 in the list of clean beasts. Both AV and RV have "pygarg," which is not the recognized name of any animal whatever. The LXX pugargos (from πυγαργός, puggare, "rump," and ἄργης, ἄργος, "white") was used by Herodotus (iv.132) as the name of an antelope. A white rump is a very common feature of deer and antelopes, and is commonly explained as enabling the fleeing herd easily to keep in sight of its leaders. It has been used as a specific name of Cererus pugargus, the Tartarian roe, and Bubalis pugargus, a small South African antelope. The Arabic Bible has rîm, "a white gazelle," a kindred word to rîdân, AV, "unicorn," RV "wild-ox." Tristram, NHB, considers dishôn to be the addax, Antilope addax or Addax nasomaculatus. There is excellent reason, however, for believing that the range of this African antelope does not extend into Pal, Sinai or Arabia. For a discussion of the animal names in Dt 14 4 5, see ZOÖLOGY.

PYRAMIDS, pîr'â-mids (πυραμίδας, pyramidas): Pyramids are mentioned in connection with the splendid monument reared by Simon Maccabaenus in memory of his parents and brethren at Modin (1 Macc 13 28; cf. Ant. XIII, vi, 6). Jos describes them as "very surprising, both for their largeness and beauty." There is nothing to show how the pyramid allotted to each was distinguished, whether by difference in size or by inscriptions. It is remarkable that in Scripture there is no allusion to the giant structures in Egypt; but these may have supplied the suggestion to Simon's mind.

PYRRHUS, pîr'ús (Πῆρρος, Pirros, "fiery-red"): The name is inserted in the text of RV in Acts 20 4 as that of the father of SOPATER (q.v.).

PYTHON, pî'thōn: Occurs only in Acts 16 16, where RV reads, 'a certain maid having a spirit of divination [in "a spirit, a Python!", met us," Wdwh, Phthōn, or Phthō, Phthō, is the oldest name of Delphi (or the country about Delphi), in which was situated the famous Delphic Oracle. Consequently "Pythonian spirit" came to be the generic title of the supposed source of inspiration of diviners, including the slave-girl of the account in Acts. Exactly what facts underlie the narrative it is rather hard to say, but it is evident that the girl was sincere in her conviction that she spoke with Pythonian inspiration. Probably she represents some hysterical type, of none too strong mentality, whose confused utterances were taken as coming from some supernatural power. Impressed by St. Paul's personality, she followed him about, and, when his command came, was in a state of mind that had prepared her to obey it. The narrative, incidentally, gives an interesting sidelight on a society in which a girl with hysteria had a greater commercial value than she had after her cure. See DIOVINA.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON
birds and live in the open, brooding along roads and around fields. They have a longer, fuller wing than the partridge and can make stronger flight. In Pal they were migratory. They are first mentioned in Ex 16:13: "And it came to pass at even, that the quails came up, and covered the camp: and in the morning the dew lay round about the camp." This describes a large flock in migration, so that they passed as a cloud. Nu 11:31-33: "And there went forth a wind from Jeh, and brought quails from the sea, and let them fall by the camp, about a day's journey on this side, and a day's journey on the other side, round about the camp, and about two cubits above the face of the earth. And the people rose up all at that day, and all the night, and all the next day, and gathered the quails; he that gathered least gathered ten men homers: and they spread them all abroad for themselves round about the camp"; cf Ps 78:26-30:

"He caused the east wind to blow in the heavens; And by his power he guided the south wind. He rained flesh also upon them as the dust: And winged birds as the sand of the seas; And he let it fall in the midst of their camp, Round about their habitation. So they did eat, and were well filled: And he gave them their own desire." Again the birds are mentioned in migration. Those that fell around the camp and the bread that was sent from heaven are described in Ps 105:39-42. Commentators have had trouble with the above references. They cause the natural historian none— they are so in keeping with the location and the laws of Nature. First the Heb s'daw means "to be fat." That would be precisely the condition of the quail after a winter of feeding in the S. The time was early spring, our April, and the quail were flocking from Africa and spreading in clouds—even to Europe. They were birds of earth, heavy feeders and of plump, full body. Migration was such an effort that when forced to cross a large body of water they always waited until the wind blew in the direction of their course, lest they tire and fall. Their average was about 16 birds to each nest. If half a brood escaped, they yet multiplied in such numbers as easily to form clouds in migration. Pliny writes of their coming into Italy in such numbers, and so exhausted with their long flight, that if they sighted a sailing vessel they settled upon it by hundreds and in such numbers as to sink it. Taking into consideration the diminutive vessels of that age and the myriads of birds, this does not appear incredible. Now compare these facts with the text. Israelites were encamped on the Sinai Peninsula. The birds were in migration. The quail followed the Red Sea until they reached the point of the peninsula where they selected the narrowest place, and when the wind was with them they crossed the water. Not far from the shore arose the smoke from the campfires of the Israelites. This bewildered them, and, weary from their journey, they began to settle in confused thousands over and around the camp. Then the Israelites arose and, with the ever-ready "throw sticks," killed a certain number for every soul of the camp and spread the bodies on the sand to dry, just as Herodotus (ii.77) records that the Egyptians always had done (see Rawlinson, Herod, II, for an illustration of catching and drying quail). Nature and natural history can account for this incident, with no need to call in the miraculous.

Quarrel, kwor'el: Originally (1) "a complaint," (cf "querulous"), or (2) "a cause of complaint," and so (3) "a contention." (1) In AV Mk 6:19 (RV 'set herself'); the colloquial "had it in for him" is an exact tr and Col 3:13 (ownikh, momphk, "complaint"); so RV. (2) In 2 K 5:7 (TIN, 'dáph, "be opportune," RV "an occasion"). (3) In AV Lev 26:25 (loose tr of Δρ' , nákhán, "vengence"; so RV). Cf Sir 31:29 AV (RV "conflict") and Prov 20:3 RV (AV "meddling").

Quarries, kwar'iz (ǥ'wər'iz), θηλήμι [Jgs 19:26, "graven images"], Θέλημι, skhébharim [Josh 7:5, "Shebarim," RV "the quarries"]: θηλήμι is elsewhere tr "graven images" (Dt 7:5; Ps 78:65; Isa 10:10; Mic 5:13, etc) and is a pl. form of ποτήρ, "graven image" (Ex 20:4, etc), from ποταμ, "to carve." It occurs in the story of Enosh and Egyptian and refers to images or hewn stones in the vicinity of Gilgal. skhébharim is pl. of skhéhar, "breach," "fracture," more often "destruction" (e.g. Prov 16:18), from skhetter, to break." The form skhébharim is also found in Job 41:25, "constrammon," AV "breakings." In Josh 7:5 Shebarim is the point to which the Israelites were chased after their first attack upon AI. See Shebarim.

Quarries in Pal are not usually very deep because there is plenty of good stone to be found at the surface. The quarryman seeks a thick stratum of firm limestone which has a favorable exposure. The vertical joint-planes divide the stratum into large blocks which the quarryman dislodges with the aid of crowbars. These great blocks he skilfully cleaves by inserting several wedges in a line in holes made by a pick, and driving the wedges in with a heavy hammer. In these days gunpowder is occasionally used, esp. when there are not favorable joint-planes producing blocks capable of being moved by the crowbar. Another method, which is employed where stones of great size are wanted, is to carve the stones out of the rock by cutting channels around them with the pick. In the limestone quarries of Ba'albek and the granite quarries of Agwān at the first cataract of the Nile, enormous stones may be seen which were abandoned while in process of being removed by this method. The channels are wide enough to admit the body of the workman, and the marks of the picks on the sides of the channels are plainly visible.

QUARTER, kwôr'tær: Lit., of course, “the fourth part,” and so of the four “ends” (γωνία, kāqōh) in Jer 49 36, and AV of the four “corners” (so RV, γωνία, gōnta) in Rev 20 8. Hence, “any part” and in this sense used freely for various words by AV. RV has usually dropped “quarter,” but unfortunately has retained it in Nu 34 3; Josh 15 5; in his cell between two soldiers, “bound with two chains,” his left hand chained to one and his right to the other. The other two soldiers of the quatermound guard before the door, and are spoken of as “the first and the second guard” (ver 10) whom St. Peter and his angel guide had to pass on the way to liberty. The Gr word thus rendered is not found in LXX or anywhere else in the NT.

QUEEN, kwên: The Bible applies this term:

1) To the wife of a king (“queen consort”) (מֶלֶכה, malkāh). In the Book of Est it is the title given to Vashti (1 9) and Esther (2 22); cf Cant 6 8 f.
2) Another Heb word for queen consort is מָלֶכָּה, malkāh.
3) מְרִית, lit. “mistress” (cf 1 K 11 19, the wife of Pharaoth; 2 K 10 13, “the children of the king and

STONE IN QUARRIES AT BA'ALBEK.

18 14, 15, and introduced it in Josh 18 12. 14, 20 for פֶּץ, pe'ēk, usually rendered “side.” The result is very obscure. Elsewhere in RV only in the phrase “from every quarter” (Gen 19 4; Isa 56 11; Mk 1 45). Cf Border; Coast.

QUARTUS, kwâr'tus (Κατσέρας, Καταράς): A Christian in Corinth who with “Erasus the treasurer of the city” sent greetings to the Christian community in Rome (Rom 16 23). He is known to Paul only as a Christian, “the brother.”

QUATERNION, kwâ-tur'ni-un (τετράδευς, tetradion): The name given to a company of four soldiers of Herod's army (Acts 12 4). To four such companies St. Peter had been handed over, who would take their turn of acting as guard over the prisoner, each of the four watches of the night according to Roman reckoning, which Herod Agrippa I would follow. In the castle of Antonia St. Peter was thus closely secured, in order that Herod, who had already killed James, the brother of John, with the sword (12 2), might, after the solemnities of the Passover, make sure of his death likewise. On the night before his intended execution he was sleeping the children of the queen”). In Neh 2 6 and Ps 45 9 we find the expression רְשָׁע, shēgal, which some trace back to רְשָׁע, shēgal, “to ravish,” a rather doubtful derivation. Still another term is רְשָׁע, sāḏāh, lit. “princess” (Isa 49 25). The LXX sometimes uses the word βασίλεισα, basilissa; cf Ps 45 9. (2) To a female ruler or sovereign (“queen regnant”). The only instances are those of the queen (malkāh) of Sheba (1 K 10 1–13; cf 2 Ch 9 1–12) and of Candace, the queen (basilissa) of the Ethiopians (Acts 8 27). In Mt 12 42 (cf Lk 11 31) Christ refers to the queen of the south (βασίλεισα νάον, basilissa nāou), meaning, of course, the queen of Sheba. (3) To a heathen deity, רְשָׁע, lekhet ha-shāmayim, “the queen of heaven” (Jer 7 18; 44 17 ff). See Queen of Heaven.

(4) Metaphorically, to the city of Babylon (Rome) (Rev 18 7): an expression denoting sovereign contempt and imaginary dignity and power.

QUEEN MOTHER (מֶלֶכה, malkāh), מְרִית, lit. “mistress,” then a female ruler, and sometimes simply the wife of a king ("queen," 1 K 11:19); in DoL 5:10 the term נָּשָׁ֫ה, melketha', "queen," really means the mother of the king: It stands to reason that among a people whose rulers are polygamous this practice looked nor at all. Hence becomes a person of great consequence. The records of the Books of K prove it. The גֶּבֶרָה, or queen mother, occupied a position of high social and political importance; she took rank almost with the king. When Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, desired "to speak unto him for Adoniah," her son "rose up to meet her, and bowed himself unto her, and sat down on his throne, and caused a throne to be set for the king's mother; and she sat on his right hand" (1 K 2:19). And again, in 2 K 24:15, it is expressly stated that Nebuchadnezzar carried away the king's mother into captivity; Jeremiah calls her גֶּבֶרָה (29:2). The king was Jehoiachin (Jec- noiah, Jer 29:2), and his mother's name was Nehushta (2 K 24:8). This was the royal pair whose impending doom the prophet was told to foretell (Jer 13:18). Here again the queen mother is mentioned with the king, thus emphasizing her exalted position. Now we understand why Asa removed Maacah his (grand) mother from being queen (queen mother), as the LXX tells us (cf 1 K 15:2; cf 2 Ch 16:12). She had used her powerful influence to further the cause of idolatry. In this connection Athaliah's corp d'état may be briefly mentioned. After the violent death of her son Ahaziah (2 K 9:27), she usurped the royal power and reigned for some time in her own name (2 K 11:3; cf 2 Ch 22:12). This was, of course, a revolutionary undertaking, being a radical departure from the usual traditions.

And finally, the political importance of the גֶּבֶרָה is illustrated by the fact that in the Books of K, with two exceptions, the names of the Jewish kings are recorded together with those of their respective mothers; they are as follows: Naaman, the Ammonite, the mother of Rehoboam (1 K 14:21; cf 1 K 2:31, and 2 Ch 12:13); Maacah, the daughter of Abishalom (1 K 15:2) or Absalom (2 Ch 11:20), the mother of Abijah; Maacah, the daughter of Abishalom, the mother (grandmother) of Asa (1 K 15:2; cf 2 Ch 12:15); Athaliah, the daughter of Shilhi, the mother of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22:42; cf 2 Ch 20:31); Athaliah, the granddaughter of Omri, the mother of Ahaziah (2 K 8:26; cf 2 Ch 22:2), Zibiah of Beersheba, the mother of Jehoram (2 K 8:22; cf 2 Ch 21:1); Jehoaddan (Jehoaddan, 2 Ch 25:1) of Jerus., the mother of Amaziah (2 K 14:2); Jehochiah (Jec- noiah, 2 Ch 26:3) of Jerus., the mother of Azariah (2 K 15:2) or Ouziah (2 K 15:13; cf 2 Ch 26:3); Jerus. (Jerushah, 2 Ch 27:1), the daughter of Zadok, the mother of Jotham (2 K 15:33); Abi (Abijah, 2 Ch 29:1), the daughter of Zechariah, the mother of Hezekiah (2 K 18:2); Hephzibah, the mother of Manasseh (2 K 21:1); Meshullemeth, the daughter of Haruz of Bethah, the mother of Amon (2 K 21:19); Jedidah, the daughter of Adaias of Bozkath, the mother of Josiah (2 K 22:1); Hamutal, the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, the mother of Jehoahaz (2 K 23:1); Zebikah, the daughter of Pedaiah of Ruh- mah, the mother of Jehoiakim (2 K 23:36); Nehushta, the daughter of Ethanah of Jerus., the mother of Jehoichin (2 K 24:8); Hamutal (Hamutal), the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, the mother of Zedekiah (2 K 24:18). The exceptions are Jehoram and Ahaz.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN מַלְּכָהָּמֶשֶׁת הָאָדָמִים, melketh ha-adamayim, although there is another reading, מַלְּכָהָּמֶשֶׁת הָאֲדָמִים, "worship" or "godless" Occurs only in two passages: Jer 7:18; 44:17-19.25, where the prophet denounces the wrath of God upon the inhabitants of Judah and those who have given themselves up to the worship of the host of heaven. This is no doubt a part of the astral worship which is found largely developed among the Jews in the later period of their history in Canaan. It is first mentioned in 2 K 17:13, and was practised by the kings of the Northern Kingdom when Samaria had fallen and the ten tribes were being carried away into captivity. Moses is represented as warning the Israelites against the worship of the sun and moon and stars and all the host of heaven, practised by the people of Canaan (Dt 4:19; 17:3), and the existence of such worship among the Canaanites and neighboring nations is attested from an early period (cf Job 31:26-28).

The worship of the heavenly bodies was widely spread in the East and in Arabia; and the Babylonian pantheon was full of astral deities, where each divinity corresponded either to an astral phenomenon or to some circumstance or occurrence in nature which is connected with the course of the stars (Jerem. The OT in the Light of the Near East, I, 100). From the prophets we gather that before the exile the worship of the host of heaven had become established among all classes and in all the towns of Israel (Jer abu supra; Ezk 8:10). In that worship the queen of heaven was in a prominent place; and if, as seems probable from the cates which were offered, she is to be identified with the Asyr Ishtar and the Canaanite Astarte, the worship itself was of a grossly immoral and debasing character. Thus, in this Babylonian antiquity and widely spread in ancient Babylonia may be seen from the symbols of it found in recent excavations (see Nippur, II, 236). How far the astral theorists like Winckler and Jeremias are entitled to link up with this worship the naming for Josiah, the lamentations over Tammuz, the story of Jephthah's daughter, and even the narrative of the misfortunes and the exaltation of Joseph, is questionable. But that the people of Judah in the days before the exile had given themselves over to the worst and vilest forms of heathen worship and incurred the grievous displeasure of Jeh is made clear by the denunciation of the worship of the queen of heaven by Jeremiah.

QUEEN OF SHEBA, מִשְׁפּוֹת, mishpohtha, (1 K 10:1-13; 2 Ch 9:1-12, called in Mt 12:42; Lk 11:31, "the queen of the south" [בֶּטֶלֶהוֹת בָּתָא אוֹתָתָא, betlesa naotou], the queen of the south) to Solomon differ slightly from one another, and, of the two, that in 1 K is the older. (1) The words concerning the Accounts of Nebi of Jeh in AK 10:9 are wanting in 2 Ch; while LXX in 1 K has "and the name of Jeh," apparently a correction of the MT. (2) For 1 K 10:9, "because Jeh loved Israel ever," 2 Ch 9:8 has "because thy God loved Israel, to establish them for ever"; LXX in 1 K has "because Jeh loved Israel, to establish it for ever." (3) In the last verse of each account, where 1 K 9:28-30 19 says that Solomon gave to the queen all her desire, besides that which she had brought unto the king," i.e., according to some, besides the equivalent of what she had brought to him; 1 K 10:13 has "besides that which he gave her of his own free will, according to the king's bounty," i.e., besides gifts commensurate with his own wealth and power (sbot), or besides gifts which he gave her gold.

The narrative tells of the queen of Sheba, on hearing of Solomon's great wisdom, coming to test him with perplexing questions or riddles (cf Jgs 14:12). She brought Narrative presents to the king, and interviewed him: "And when the queen of Sheba had seen all the wisdom of Solomon, and the palace that he had built" (i.e. the palace, not the temple) as well as its arrangements, "and his burnt-offering which he offered in the house of JeH [so read and translate with RV in 1 K 19:5, and also in 2 Ch 9:4]; there was no more spirit in the half of Solomon's wisdom had not been told her. "Happy," she said to him, "are thy wives [so read with LXX, Syr and Old Lat VSS], happy are these thy servants." She then exchanged gifts with him and returned to her own land.

The narrative is a complement of that in 1 K 3:16-28, where the king's justice is exemplified; here his wisdom.

The narrative is referred to by Jesus in Mt 12:42; Lk 11:31, where He refutes to anecdotes the request of the scribes and Pharisees for a sign from Him. He tells them that no sign will be given them except that of Jonah, whose sign was his preaching, one that proved sufficient to the Ninevites; and 'behold something greater than Jonah is here.' The men of Nineveh will be a living condemnation of them "in the judgment" (cf Lk 16:31); and so will the "queen of the south" who came from the ends of the earth after hearing of Solomon's wisdom, and beheld something greater than Solomon is here. The only sign to be given is that of the wisdom of Jesus, a wisdom far greater than that of Solomon (see D. Smith, Days of His Flesh, 176 f.).

Eastern lit. has much to say about the queen of Sheba. The Arabs called her Bilké. Abyssinian legend declares that she came from Ethiopia, her name being Maqësa, and that she had a scribe Solomon. QUICKEN, kwench, kwench: Where the word is used of fire or of thirst it has the usual meaning: "to allay," "to extinguish," "to suppress," "to cool." In the OT it is frequently applied to the affections and passions (see 2 K 25:17; Cant 4:7; Isa 42:3; Jer 4:4; 21:12). Quenching the coal or the light of Israel may mean slaying a dear one or a brilliant leader. In the NT it is also used figuratively, as in Eph 6:16 the shield of faith quenches the fiery darts of the evil one. In Mk 9:45, εἰρπότων, abominations, and abominations are said to have reference to Gehenna (tr "hell"). The same word is also used of resisting the gifts of the Holy Spirit in 1 Thess 5:19.

Burton Scott Easton

QUESTION, kwes'chon: The noun for the Septuagint, δάραθον, "word," in 1 K 10:3 & 2 Ch 9:2, with "hard question for the διδοὺς, ἁδικῶν, "dark saying," "riddle," in 1 K 10:1 & 2 Ch 9:1. In the NT for ἰνπάσον, σάλημα, the synonym ἰππασον, σάλησις (and 1 Tim 1:4, εἰρπεσίς, ἐκκλησία), is rendered "questioning" by RV (AV does not distinguish). In Mk 11:29 for λόγος, λόγος, "word" (so RVM). The vb. in the sense "ask a question" in 2 Ch 31:9 for ἰνπάσον, δάραθος, and Lk 2:46: 23:9 for ἐπερετόδῳ (cf ARV,ERVsm Jn 16:23). Elsewhere the vb. is for συρτοῦς, συράνσις, "dispute" (Mk 1:24, etc; of Acts 6:9; 9:29). Called "questioning" in Acts 19:40, represents ἐρετάνως, ἐρετρᾶτος, "call into court" (so Lk 7:26, 24:21), "I am called in question" is for στητόν, κρίσιμως, "I am being judged."
II. Constructive Principles of NT Quotation

III. Typical Instances of NT Quotation

1. Unity of the Two Dispensations
2. Biblical Movement Planned as the Beginning
3. The OT Accepted as Authoritative
4. Argumentative Quotations
5. Catena of Passages, Illustrating Principles of Reference

The second great constructive principle of NT quotation, and manifestly in close harmony with the first one, is that the movement from Abraham to Christ was historically one, but that it was from the beginning planned and prepared for. The Bible is one because the history out of which it grew is one. The history is one because God in the history and God is one. According to the writers of the NT in this history as a whole we have the unfolding of an all-embracing plan of God, stretching out into the remotest future and coming to its culmination in the person and the kingdom of the Messiah. The history of the OT through which the plan was disclosed in part beforehand, by way of anticipation and preparation, in order that men might intelligently cooperate with God in the fulfillment of His purpose. This is the idea involved in prophecy and its fulfillment, and in the closely related idea of promise and its realization. One mind, one will, and one central purpose are operating throughout the whole history which is, on the Divine side, the fulfillment of a plan complete in thought before it took shape in creation. This conception, the foreseen plan of God and its gradual revelation to men through messages of hope and warning set in the key of the great future and pointing the way thither, the greater part of the structure of the NT, is also the structure of the Old Testament.

A third principle which really involves a combination of the other two and is prominently brought forward in the use of quotation for purposes of argument is the recognition of the OT as authoritative, a real Word of God, in form occasional, but essentially applicable to all experiences, and hence good for all time. It is evident that the belief in the continuous authority of the Scripture of the old covenant over the men of the new, rests upon the unity of the two dispensations and the acceptance of the same Divine mind and will as operating throughout all outward and historical changes. This is admirably expressed by Paul when he speaks of the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he purposed in him unto an economy of the fulness of times, to sum up all things in Christ (Eph 1:10), and by the author of Hebrews when he says (Heb 1:1-2), 'In the past, through his Son who is to the age of all ages, he made purification for sin and consecrated a kingdom that cannot be shaken.'

The justification of these accepted principles of reference on the part of the NT writers lies beyond the scope of the present discussion.

4. Issue Involving Quotations

It is sufficient to emphasize the fact that any detailed discussion of NT quotations is within the scope of the present discussion.

III. Typical Examples of NT Quotation

With these constructive principles in mind we are prepared to pass in review typical instances in which general principles are embodied. At this point we shall be greatly assisted in the analysis and distribution of the complex material before us by giving careful heed to the formulas, more or less fixed and... uniform, by which the writers introduce quotations and indicate their sense of the value and significance of that which is quoted. While the form contains certain verbal variations, they are practically reducible to three, which correspond with substantial accuracy to the three constructive principles already noted: the unity of the OT and NT; the prediction of the NT in the OT; the authority of the OT as the Word of God intended for all time.

The unity of the two dispensations is asserted in all those passages introduced by a formula, in which the fulfilment is asserted as a fact, and in which the operation of identical principles in two or more separate events in the field of history is implied. A suggestive example is in Mt 13:14, where our Lord asserts, in connection with the parable of the Sower, that in the unbelief of the people of His day "the prophecy of Isaiah is fulfilled. The prophetic words here quoted (Isa 6:9-10) are not predictive in any immediate sense, but are susceptible of repeated application and realization in the experience of the Church as she contains. They apply to the prophet's own day; they also apply—and in that sense are fulfilled—to the time of Jesus, and by a legitimate extension of meaning, to stubborn unbelief in any age of apostasy.

Another passage in which the same formula is used in a very exceptional way clearly sets forth the fundamental principle upon which this usage rests. Isa 2:23 asserts that the justification of Abraham in the offering of his only son as a sacrifice to God affirms his belief that his seed will be counted for righteousness (Gen 15:6). This passage is not predictive in any sense, nor is there in the narrative any hint of a connection between the passage and the episode on Mt, Moriah. This use of the formula of fulfilment by James involves the principle that any event which realizes the meaning and truth of a Scriptural statement fulfils it. A vast number of quotations in the NT come under this head. Persons, events, doctrines, illustrate and confirm, or embody and concretely realize, principles which are taught in the OT or implied in its history. We are warned by this passage and many others like it against a too rigid and literal interpretation of any fixed or certain verbal passage which affirms that his belief was counted to him for righteousness (Gen 15:6).

In this connection it is to be remembered that a harmony of principle may extend all the way from a comparatively superficial illustrative resemblance to a profound assuance of thought. Not a few OT quotations were made for purposes of parallelism and literary embellishment. Herein lies the significance of Matthew's use (2:17) of Jer 31:15. A glance at this quoted passage indicates that it is a figurative and poetical expression in which Rachel (already for many years in her tomb) is represented as weeping over her exiled children and refusing to be comforted except by their return. There is no strictly predictive element in the passage, save only the promise of return, which is not used by Matthew. Its applicability to the massacre of the children of Bethlehem lies in its poetical parallelism, and nowhere else. Once again the voice of wailing motherhood is heard in Israel. The tender and beautiful imagery is applicable in this sense and is used with true insight, but with no intention of justifying a claim of prediction and fulfilment in the literal sense.

The prediction of events in the life of Jesus and in the history of Christianity is involved in all the quotations in which a necessary concurrence exists between the predictive and the event is asserted, or is referred to. An examination of the OT without reference to its use in the NT seems to justify the conclusion that its bearing upon the future may be particularized under four heads, which in turn with sufficient accuracy and exhaustiveness will classify the pertinent NT quotations.

(1) The prophetic teaching of Israel embodied not only in the messages of the prophets, but also in laws, institutions, and rites, has a twofold dispensational application. Reference is made here only to those explicit references to a future era of especial blessing. For example, in Acts 2:17 ff Peter interprets the Pentecostal experience in the terms of prophecy, referring to Joel (2:28 ff), who promises an outpouring of God's Spirit in a "great and notable day" of the Lord. The promise of a Pentecostal prediction (every promise is such), which in a measure would be fulfilled in any exceptional manifestation of God's Spirit among men. The only question which can possibly be raised in connection with Peter's reference to the Pentecostal outpouring was the climactic realization of the promise: that is, the establishment of the era of blessing foretold by the prophet. Later in the same book (3:20-26) the same apostle sweeps the whole field of prophecy as centering in certain promises fulfilled in Christ and the Christian community.

He instances two, the prophet like Moses (Dt 18:15) and the promised inclusive blessing through Abraham (Gen 12:3). He also includes (Acts 3:26) a hint of the Servant passages of Isa. This identification of the NT movement through two specific predictive promises is wholly justified by the prophetic character of Jesus, the range and richness of the blessings brought from Abraham through Him, and by the fact elsewhere emphasized that no other has measured up to the standard of the ideal servant. Negatively, it may be urged that if these promises were not fulfilled in Christ, history affords no possibility of discovering any fulfilment measureably adequate to fulfill their promise. In He (8:8-12) reference is made to the promise of a new covenant in Jer (31:31 ff) as a justification for believing that the OT dispensation was not complete in itself and that in its very constitution it pointed forward to Christianity as its fulfillment. Combining this passage with that quoted above (Acts 2:17 ff) taken from Joel, the strength of the case for this use of the OT is at once seen. Distinctively Jeremiah's "new covenant" was to be inward and not outward legal and formal. The promise through Joel is an awakening of prophecy through the free outpouring of God's Spirit. The distinctive feature of the gospel is its idea of justification by faith, through grace revealed in Christ and imparted by the Holy Spirit, given according to promise to Pentecost. The "new covenant" foresaid by Jeremiah was established at Pentecost through the outpouring of the Spirit promised through Joel. To deny this as fulfilment is to nullify the entire historical and contemporary history and to erase both promises from the page of credible prophecy.

(2) Contemporary persons or institutions are sometimes interpreted, not in the terms of present actuality, but on the basis of the ideal purposes revealed or realized until the coming of Christ. One striking example of this method is to be found in the so-called “Immanuel passage” (Mt 1:23, quoting Isa 7:14). Undoubtedly the message of the prophet to Ahaz had an immediate and contemplative effect. But whether any ambition, or any notable prophetic message, it is set in the key of the Messianic King whose unworthy predecessor Ahaz was. “The Messiah comes, but the willfulness of Ahaz has rendered His reign impossible” (G. A. Smith, “Isa,” Expositor’s Bible, 1, 194).

In Acts 2:24–36 passages representative of many others quoted, both the resurrection and ascension of Jesus are interpreted in the light of two quotations from the Ps (16:8ff; 110:1) as predestined and therefore certain events in the plan and purpose of God. In both instances the argument is that the promises nominally made to David, or claimed by him, were couched in terms too vast to find fulfillment in his own experience, but were spoken of the greater King who was to come and in whose experience alone they were realized. In the former instance, a triumph over death was anticipated with assurance which not the Psalmist but only Christ attained; in the latter a royal ascendency was promised that only Christ’s ascension was ever to fulfill. A second examination of the passages shows that Peter’s interpretation is justified not merely by the wording of the promises, which point to a fullness of experience not realized by any OT man, but still more clearly by the detailed side-by-side identity of the person who is the subject of the experience. In the first instance he is spoken of as Jeh’s “Holy One,” in the second as “My Lord!” The triumph over death which the speaker anticipates is grounded in a unity of purposed working, with God’s Logos, which was ideal and still unrealized until Christ came. The logic of the ps is: God’s “Holy One” must not see corruption. The logic of history is: Christ is God’s Holy One and He did not see corruption. The principle that triumph over death is the logical issue of holiness found its justification and proof not directly in the experience of the singer who first glimpsed it as a truth, but in the career of Christ who first realized it as a fact.

The argument here is not affected if one accepts the variant reading “Holy Ones” for the preceding passage.

The second passage is particularly interesting because Our Lord Himself first pointed out its importance in their place of origin, Nazareth. Such a passage as this entire ps (110) would have been impossible had not the powers and responsibilities of the Davidic King been keyed from the beginning at the Messianic level. The logic here is the same as in Ps 16. The Messianic kingdom over all nations awaited the coming of the true Messianic King. The long-delayed triumph followed hard upon the coming of the long-expected King (cf Ps 2:12; Acts 13:32–34).

This passage is invoked in Our Lord’s use of the Servant passage (Isa 61:1ff) in His sermon at Nazareth. Here the issue as to Messianic prophecy is fairly joined at the center. It is central because it occurs in the Lord’s own teaching and also because it concerns, not any external or incidental happenings in the life of Jesus, but the whole trend and movement of prophetic thought, together with the entire meaning and interpretation of His career.

Interpreted altogether apart from the NT, the prophecy has an unmistakable bearing upon the future. As one of the series concerned with the Servant (Isa 42:1ff), the quoted passage focuses attention upon the mission of Israel to the world, still to be carried out. “Ye are my witnesses, saith Jehovah, and my servant whom I have chosen” (44:10). “Yet now hear, O Jacob my servant, and Israel, whom I have chosen” (44:1). It also involves the entire scope and meaning of the prophetic office through which Jehovah’s will was made known to Israel and through Israel to the world. All considerations sweep out into the prophet’s future and both point unerringly to Christ as the historical fulfillment of Israel’s mission and as the actual realization of the ideal and ministry of prophethood.

The very antiquity of the prophetic passage (ch 61), whether to the Servant or to the prophet, and the questions raised as to whether Israel idealized is referred to or some person or personification, serve to make more clear and unmistakable the central fact that only in Christ is the conception embodied in the entire series of passages altogether realized. It thus becomes for sober thought a distinct revelation and portrayal in advance of what Jesus was in His person and work.

(3) In the course of Israel’s training to receive the Messiah, certain external items were given as bearing upon the identification of Him when He should come. We shall instance three items, closely related to each other, and each intensely interesting in itself. These three items are (a) His birth to Mary of Davidic ancestry (Lk 1:30–31), as a Virgin (Mt 1:22ff), (b) His birth at Bethlehem (Mt 2:5). Objection is offered at once to the interpretation of these OT passages as predictive, and to the alleged fulfillments in the life of Jesus, on the ground that they were not definitely foretold. But these passages are not only included within the legitimate scope of prediction; and, secondarily, that being items of this external kind it would be an easy matter to invent fulfillments. It may be granted that such incidents, or statements, not explicitly foretold, may be multiplied by fabricating coincidences, but the fact remains that, in the absence of any visible check upon invention, very few such instances are alleged by NT writers.

Further, there are suggestive variations between the events recorded and the natural interpretations of the OT passages connected with them; that is, the fulfillments arrive by such devious routes as to make it difficult to suppose them to be due to the imaginative stimulation of the passages. For example, the birth at Bethlehem was brought about by circumstances not at all to the liking of Jewish patriots, and was obscured to contemporaries by the previous and subsequent residence at Nazareth. The kinship of Jesus to David was not pronounced by the text (even unless Mary was of that house) by the virgin birth. The interpretation of Isa 7:14 as intimating a virgin birth was not compulsory to one familiar with the Heb text of the passage and would have been thought of in that connection only by one assured of the fact. The virgin birth (see IMMANUEL; VIRGIN BIRTH) is not an etymological but a providential commentary on Isa 7:14. One other consideration of primary importance remains. In the one point where the identification of Jesus with the Messiah by His followers can be tested most severely, they are most completely triumphant. It would be comparatively easy to invent incidents suggested by OT prophecies, and to take dignities and titles wholesale from the same source—but given all these, to find one capable of realizing and fulfilling the expectations so aroused is the chief problem. Here fabrication is impossible. And here too the NT meets and answers the challenge of truth. In view of these considerations it is safe to say that in matters of historical detail the career of Jesus was foreseen and predicted. Such passages belong to the philosophy of preparation as a whole and should be studied in that connection.

(4) In certain instances the original passage and its reappearance in quotation indicate a process which is continuous throughout all history. For example, the use of Zec 13 7 (Mk 14 27) suggests a deeper view of the connection between prophecy and history, immediate and more remote, than we are often aware of. On the face of them stand within Scripture the two concepts: The Shepherd and the scattered sheep are predictions, and the life of Christ stands as fulfilment. It simply cannot be contended that such passages as these do not find fulfilment and explanation in the career of Jesus as nowhere else in history. Nevertheless, the connection is far from clear, in the archaic, ancient sense of an isolated event and its occurrence. We must recognize that, in a sense, the event is foreseen because it is already a fact. The allegory of the Smitten Shepherd is, as has well been said, "a summary of the history of Israel." But it is more than that. The relationship of God with Israel, which involved a dealing of Divine grace with men, their rejection of it and the consequent vicarious imman- nation of the Divine Friend and Shepherd, which came to His climax in the tragedy of the cross, was established in all essential factors in the early days. Therefore, Christ can say, as the outcome of this profound insight into the meaning of history, "That which concerneth me hath fulfilment" (of Lk 23 44). He can assure more devoutly in the recollection of the doings of an earlier time than being there foreseen. In a real sense, "the Lamb" was "slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev 13 8). In this allegory of the rejected Shepherd and in the successive delineations of the Servant passages, we have the portrait of the Christ as He was—not merely as He was to be. In these quotations deep answers to deep. The only satisfactory interpretation of the tragedy of the cross is that in accordance with prophetic thought in human history, "it would be useless to seek to modify, to repudiate, to repel the fact. The only satisfactory interpretation of the passages cited is that they disclose the actual operation of the forces which in their culmination issued in the tragedy of the cross. This brings the passages in the original and in quotation into the framework of the same course of events. Peter in his sermon in Solomon's porch thus sums up the whole process: "But the things which God showed by the mouth of all the prophets, that his Christ should suffer, he thus fulfilled" (Acts 3 18, 19 33). The argument of the OT involves exactly the same principles which have been dealt with in the foregoing discussion. These principles coalesce in the conception of

4. Argumentative the OT as authoritative.

Quotations (1) Throughout the NT, in the teaching of Our Lord Himself and in the apostolic writings, a clear-cut distinction is drawn between the temporary and permanent offices of the OT. It is recognized that in essential principles the OT is for all time, while in its outward form and in its actualization of underlying and essential truths and in preliminary and preparatory. There are different dispensations, but one economy. Whenever Our Lord uses the OT for purposes of argument (see Mt 4 4; Mt 12 17; Lk 19 11; Mt 24 15) it is on the basis of essential truth which is permanent and unchanging (Mt 5 17-19). On the other hand, He never hesitates to annul that which had a merely temporary or preliminary or dispensational character (Mt 5 21-33; Lk 16 16). Christ can not destroy, but to fulfil, but fulfilment implies a new era—a new and higher stage in the delivery of truth.

(2) In like manner Paul and the other NT writers argue on the basis of an identity of principle which binds the two eras together. Paul contended for (1) the Old Testament, the Messiahship of Jesus, justification by faith, the inclusion of the Gentiles in the plan of salvation (the doctrine of election is a detail of this last argument; see Rom 9 7-9.12. 13.15.17). We shall consider typical examples of Paul's use of the OT in argumentation. Choice has been made of those which have provoked adverse criticism. Among these is the use of Gen 13 15; 17 8 in the Smitten Shepherd. Paul's alleged "rabbinical" misquote: "He is not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ." The Heb word "seed" as applied to offspring (Gen 22 17, "zera") is singular. This, of course, means that a man's descendants are looked upon as a single entity. But it is more than that. The relationship of God with Israel, which involved a dealing of Divine grace with men, their rejection of it and the consequent vicarious imman- nation of the Divine Friend and Shepherd, which came to His climax in the tragedy of the cross, was established in all essential factors in the early days. Therefore, Christ can say, as the outcome of this profound insight into the meaning of history, "That which concerneth me hath fulfilment" (of Lk 23 44). He can assure more devoutly in the recollection of the doings of an earlier time than being there foreseen. In a real sense, "the Lamb" was "slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev 13 8). In this allegory of the rejected Shepherd and in the successive delineations of the Servant passages, we have the portrait of the Christ as He was—not merely as He was to be. In these quotations deep answers to deep. The only satisfactory interpretation of the tragedy of the cross is that in accordance with prophetic thought in human history, "it would be useless to seek to modify, to repudiate, to repel the fact. The only satisfactory interpretation of the passages cited is that they disclose the actual operation of the forces which in their culmination issued in the tragedy of the cross. This brings the passages in the original and in quotation into the framework of the same course of events. Peter in his sermon in Solomon's porch thus sums up the whole process: "But the things which God showed by the mouth of all the prophets, that his Christ should suffer, he thus fulfilled" (Acts 3 18, 19 33). The argument of the OT involves exactly the same principles which have been dealt with in the foregoing discussion. These principles coalesce in the conception of nary habit of quoting authoritative Scripture is sufficiently obvious. In the case of the saying attributed to Christ, it is enough to say that it is so obviously Christlike that we need not hesitate to accept it as genuine, while in the case of Jude nothing is made to depend on whether or not an apparent quotation is genuine. "Textualists" (see Plummer, Expositor's Bible, "James and Jude," 134 ff.).

(2) Based on authority of the OT.—Mt 4:8; 5:38,43.

RAAMA, ra'ma' (רָמָא, ra'ma'; also ra'amah: B, Naamah, Naamiah, A, 'Pa-lud, Rhelma): One of the leading men who returned with Zerubbabel from captivity ( Neh 7:7). In the corresponding passage in Ex 2:2, where the same list is named, a slight variation in form is given, "Relahah," the name found in this passage. One is doubtless a corruption of the other. Both have the same root meaning.

RAAMESES, ra'am-se' (רָמֶסֶס, ra'me'se'; also ra'am'e'se): Gen 47:11; Ex 12:37; Nu 33:35 (אָמֶסֶס, a'me'se'; also ra'am'e'se).

1. Meaning: Papyrus, Rameses; Egyptian Ra-Meses of "Store cities," "Ra created him" [or "it"]: One of the two 'settlements' ( mish'beth) built, or "built up," by the Hebrews for the Pharaoh, the other being Pithom, to which the LXX adds a third, namely, "On which is Helipolis," a town near Cairo (Ex 1:11). The red term mish'beth comes from a root meaning "to set down" (Aaḥb. sakk, settlement, Assyr sakkanu or shaktanu, "to set"); but it is rendered "strong cities" in LXX, "treasure cities" in AV, and (incorrectly) "store-cities" in RV. The "land of Rameses," where Jacob and his sons settled, was apparently the "field of Zoan" (see Zoan), thus lying in the Delta E. of the Bubastic branch of the Nile.

It is often assumed that no city called Rameses would have existed before the time of Rameses II, who lived in the 14th cent. BC, though even before Rameses I the name occurs as of Name of that of a brother of Horemhab under the XVIIIth Dynasty. The usual this "Child of Ra" is grammatically incorrect in Egypt, and as Ra was an ancient name for the "sun" it seems possible that a town may have borne the title "Ra created it" very early. The mention of Rameses in Gen (47:11) is often regarded as an anachronism, since no scholar has supposed that Jacob lived as late as the time of Rameses II. This would equally apply to the other notices, and at most would only serve to mark the age of the passages in the Pentateuch. It may be that Rameses II was more than can be thought to be proved (see Exodus). According to de Rougé (see Pierret, Vocab. Hiéroglyph., 1875, 143) there were at least three towns in Lower Egypt that bore the name Pa Rames-ses ("city of Rameses"); but Brugsch supposes that the place mentioned in the OT was Zau, to which Rameses II gave this name when making it his capital in the Delta. Dr. Budge takes the same view, while Dr. Naville and others suppose that the site of Rameses has still to be found.

There appears to have been no certain tradition preserving the site, for though St. Silvia (about 385 AD) was told that it lay 4 miles

3. Situation from the town of Arabia (see Goshen), she found no traces of such a place. Brugsch ("A New City of Rameses, 1870," Zeitschrift, 69) places one such city in the southern part of Memphis itself. Goodwin (Rec. of Past, Old Series, VI, 11) gives an Egyptian letter describing the "city of Rameses--Miamin," which appears to be Zayan, since it was swamped.

It was a very prosperous city when this letter was written, and a pa-lennu or "palace city." It had canals full of fish, lakes swarming with birds, fields of lentils, melons, wheat, onions and sesame, gardens of vines, almonds and figs. Ships entered its harbor; the lotus and papyrus grew in its waters. The inhabitants greeted Rameses II with garlands of flowers. Besides wine and mace, of the "conqueror's city," beer was brought to the harbor from the Katt (in Cilicia), and oil from the Lake Sagha. There is no reason to suppose that Zayan was less prosperous in the early Hyksos age, when the Hebrews dwelt in its plain, whatever be the conclusion as to the date when the city Rameses received that name. The description above given agrees with the OT account of the possession given by Joseph to his family "in the best of the land, in the land of Rameses" (Gen 47:11).
Rabbah. It was during this siege that Uriah the Hittite by David's orders was exposed "in the forefront of the hottest battle" (2 S 11 15), where, treacherously deserted by his comrades, he was slain. How long the siege lasted we do not know; probably some years; but the end was in sight when Joab captured "the city of waters" (2 S 12 27). This may mean that he had secured control of the water supply. In the preceding verse he calls it the 'royal city.' By the chivalry of his general, David was enabled in person to enjoy the honor of taking the city. Among the booty secured was the crown of Melcom, the god of the Ammonites. Such of the inhabitants as survived he treated with great severity (2 S 12 26-31; 1 Ch 20 1 f).

In the utterances of the prophets against Ammon, Rabbah stands for the people, as their most important, or perhaps their only important, city (Jer 49 2,3; Ezek 21 20; 25 5; Am 1 14). Jer 49 4 speaks of the "flowing valley"—a reference perhaps to the abundance of water and fruitfulness—and the treasures in which she gloried. Ezek 21 21 represents the king of Babylon at "the head of the two ways" deciding by means of the divining arrows whether he should march against Jerusalem or against Rabbah. Amos seems to have been impressed with the palaces of Rabbah.

The city retained its importance in later times. It was captured by Ptolemy Philadelphia (285-247 BC), who called it Philadelphia. It was a member of the league of ten cities. Antiochus the Great captured it by means of treachery (Polyb. v.71). Jos (B J, III, iii, 3) names it as lying E. of the citadel appear to be very old; but it is quite impossible to say that anything Ammonite is now above ground. The citadel is connected by means of an underground passage with a large cistern or tank to the N., whence probably it drew its water-supply. This may be the passage mentioned in the account of the capture of the city by Antiochus.

"It is," says Conder (Heb and Moab, 158), "one of the finest Rom towns in Syria, with baths, a theater, and an odeum, as well as several huge private masonry tombs built in the valley probably in the 2d cent. The fortress on the hill, now surrounding a considerable temple, is also probably of this same date. The church with two chapels farther N., and perhaps some of the tombs, must belong to a later age, perhaps the 4th cent. The fine mosque and the fine Moslem building on the citadel hill cannot be earlier than the 7th, and are perhaps as late as the 11th cent.; and we have thus relics of every building epoch except the Crusading, of which there appears to be no indication.

The place is now occupied by Arabs and Circassians who profit by the riches of the soil. It is brought into contact with the outside world by means of the Damascus-Hejaz Railway, which has a station here.

(2) hərabbaḥ; B, χασάμη, ἀσάμη, A, 'ארבּאָד, 'ארבּאָד: An unidentified city of Judah named along with Kiriath-jearim (Josh 15 60).

RABBI, rab’i, rab (רבי, רבבי), rabβi, or ḫaḇi, ḫaḇi; A, ḫaḇi, ḫaḇi): A term used by the Jews of their religious teachers as a title of respect, from דַּרְבּ, rab, “great,” so “my great one” (cf Lat magister), once of masters of slaves, but later of teachers (Mt 23 7); therefore τρ by διδάσκαλος, διδάσκαλος, “teacher” (Mt 25 8; Jn 1 38; cf ver 49). In AV frequently rendered “Master” (Mt 20 25; 46; Jn 20 22; 25 40; Mk 9 5; 11 21; 14 45; Jn 4 31; 9 2; 11 8). John the Baptist (Jn 3 26), as well as Christ, is addressed with the title (Jn 1 47; 6 25), both by disciples and others. Jesus forbade its use among His disciples (Mt 23 8). Later (Galilean) form of same, Rabbi (q.v.). For Rabbinical literature see TALMUD.

EDWARD BAGBY POllARD

RABBITH, rab’ith (רַבְבִית, ḫaḇbith; B, דַּבָּפַת, Dabbīn; A, ḫaḇbī, ḫaḇbī): A town in the territory of Issachar (Josh 19 20) which is probably represented today by Raba, a village in the southern part of the Gilboa range and N. of Lodh. The hā is, of course, the def. art.

RABLE, rab’i: This word is not found in AV. RV has it once as the tr of ἑγγοι, ἐγγοι (lit. “lounger in the market place”), in Acts 17 5, where it replaces “baser sort” of AV. It has the common meaning of an unruly, lawless set who are ready to join in a mob.

RABBONI, rab’ōnī, rab-ō’ni (ךָבָבָבָא, Rabhboni; ḫaḇbōnī, “my great master” [Mk 10 51]; ḫaḇbōnī [WH -vel], ḫаḇbоnі [-net] [Jn 20 16]). See Rabbi.

RAB-MAG, rab’mag (רַבָּמָג), rabh-magḥ; LXX as proper noun, ῥαββαμάχ, ῥαββαμάχ: The name of one of the Rab princes who were present at the dedication of the temple (Ezra 3 10; 7 25). It is derived from the two parts seemingly being in apposition and signifying taufologically the same thing. The last syllable or section of the word, magḥ, was the designation among the Medes, Persians and Babylonians for priests and wise men. Its original significance was “great” or “powerful,” Gr μεγάς, μεγάς, Lat magus, magnus. The first, syllable, rab, expresses practically the same idea, that of greatness, or abundance in size, quantity, or power. Thus it might be interpreted the “all-wise” or “all-powerful” prince, the chief magician or physician. It is, therefore, a title and not a name, and is accordingly put in appositive relations to the proper name just preceding, as “Nergal-sharezer, the Rab-mag,” τρ fully, “Nergal-sharezer the chief prince or Kemal.” See NERGAL-SHAREZER.

In harmony with the commonly accepted view, the proper rendering of the text should be, “All the princes of the king of Babylon came in, and sat in the middle gateway, to wit, Nergal-sharezer, Samgar-nebo, Sarsechim, [the] Rab-saris, Nergal-sharezer, [the] Rab-mag; and Nebuzaradan, the captain of the guard sent, and Nebushazban, [the] Rab-saris, and Nergal-sharezer, [the] Rab-mag, and all the chief officers of the king of Babylon” (39 13).

WALTER G. CLIFFINGER

RAB-SARIS, rab’sa-ris (רַבָּסָרִיס), rabh-gārīṣ): As with Rab-mag, which is not regarded as a name, but a title, so this is to be regarded as a descriptive title for the person whose name precedes it (see RAB-MAG). The first part, rab, signifies “great” or “chief,” the second, gārīṣ, is the title of eunuch or chamberlain. The tr then refers to the chief of such an eunuch or the chief of the eunuchs (or chamberlains).

The oriental custom was for the king to surround himself with a number of eunuchs, who performed varied kinds of service, both menial and dignified. They usually had charge of his harem; sometimes they occupied court positions. Frequently, they superintended the education of the youth. The term itself was sometimes used to designate persons in places of trust who were not eunuchs. The above title describes the highest or chief in rank of these eunuchs. See EUNUCH.

The full title is used 3 t, once in connection with the titles of other important officers who were sent by the king of Assyria with a large army to demand the surrender of Jerusalem. The general term is rendered properly, ‘And the king of Assyria sent the Tartan and the Rab-saris (the chief eunuch) and the Rab-shakeh from Lachish to king Hezekiah’ (2 K 18 17). Again, it refers to a Babylonian; his real name was Sarsechim, who, with the other Babians, sat in the middle gate during the capture of Jerusalem. This event is described as having occurred in the 11th year of Zechariah, king of Judah (Jer 39 3).

The third use is in connection with the name Nebuzaradan, who, with the other chief officers of the king of Babylon, sent and took Jeremiah out of the court of the guard and committed him to Gedaliah, who was to take him home to dwell with his own people (Jer 39 12). Thus it is seen that based upon this accepted theory the three titles would be simply in their connections as follows: (1) simply “the chief eunuch,” (2) Sarsechim, the Rab-saris (or chief eunuch), and (3) Nebushazban, the Rab-saris (or chief eunuch). See also ASSYRIA, X. WALTER G. CLIFFINGER

RABSHAKEH, rab’sha’ke, rab-sha’ke (ךָבָשָׁךְ, Rabshakah): A compound word, the first part, rab, indicating “head” or “chief” (see RAB-MAG; RAB-SARIS). The second part, which in the Aram., probably meant “cupbearer,” or “bearer,” may be of Euphrates origin and elsewhere, according to later discoveries, an extended significance, and meant chief officer, i.e. chief of the heads or captains.

R. was one of the officers sent by Sennacherib, the king of Assyria, with the Tartan and the Rab-saris to demand the surrender of Jerusalem, which was under siege by the Assyrian army (2 K 18 17; 19.26.27. 25.37; 19 48; Isa 36 2 4.11.12.23; 37 4 8). The three officers named went from Lachish to Jerusalem and appeared by the conduit of the upper pool. Having called upon King Hezekiah, his representatives Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah, Shebnah, the scribe, and Joah, the recorder, appeared. R. sent through them a message to the king in which he represented himself as the spokesman for the king of Assyria. He derided King Hezekiah in an insolent fashion in representing his trust in Egypt as a bruised reed which would pierce the hand. Likewise his confidence in Jehovah was vain, for He also would be unable to deliver them. Then the officers of the king reproached requesting the king of Assyria his Syrian language which they understood, and not in the Jews’ language which the people on the wall understood. This he refused to do, speaking still more loudly in order that they might hear and be persuaded. By bribery and appeal, by promise and by deception he exhorted them to turn traitor.
RACAH, rā'kal, rā'kel (ra'kal, ra'hahk, WH, with codd. סְלָל, etc.; ῥακα, ῥακαθ, Tisch. with סָלַל; דָּרָם, ῥάκα; Tisch., from פָּרָךְ); Vain, worthless fellow; a term of contempt used by the Jews in the time of Christ. In the Bible, it occurs in Mt 5:22 only, but John Lightfoot gives a number of instances of the use of the word by Jewish writers (Hor. Heb., ed by Gandell, Oxford, 1859, II, 108). Chrysostom (who was acquainted with Syr as spoken in the neighborhood of Antioch) says it was equivalent to the Gr σιβί, σι, "thou," used contemptuously instead of a man's name. Jerome rendered it mansus et voto abque cerebro. It is generally explained as expressing contempt for a man's intellecutal capacity (= "so simpleton!"). While μωρό, μορέ (tī "thou fool"), in the same verse is taken to refer to a man's moral and religious character (= "you rascal!") (= "you impious fellow!"). Thus, we have three stages of anger, with three corresponding grades of punishment: (1) the inner feeling of anger (βραγιςμός, ἐραξισμόνας), to be punished by the local or provincial court (τὰ κλητὰ, τὰ κρίσει, τὸ κρίμινα, the judgment); (2) anger breaking forth into an expression of scorn (Raca), to be punished by the Sanhedrin (τὰ κρίμινα, τὸ κρίμινα, the council); (3) anger culminating in abusive and defamatory language (Μονερε), to be punished by the fire of Gehenna. This view, of a double climax, which has been held by foremost Eng. and Ger. commentators, seems to give the passage symmetry and gradation. But it is rejected among others by T. K. Cheyne, who, following J. P. Peters, rearranges the text by transferring the clause "and when his heart is exalted..." to his Raca verse, shall be in danger of the council" to the end of the preceding verse (ESV, IV. cols. 4001 f). There certainly does not seem to be trustworthy external evidence to prove that the terms "the judgment," "the council," "the Gehenna of fire" stand to each other in a relation of lower power and higher legal authority, or would be so understood by Christ's hearers. What is beyond dispute is that Christ condemns the use of disparaging and insulting epithets as a supreme offence against the law of humanity, which belongs to the same category as murder itself. It should be added, however, that it is the underlying feeling and not the verbal expression as such that constitutes the sin. Hence Our Lord can, without any real inconsistency, address two of His followers as "fools" (Mt 23:25, 26), and pass on to His Racas, practically equivalent to Raca, as is also James' expression, "O vain man," Jas 2:20.

RACAL, rā'kal (רָכָל, rākhal, "trader"): A place in Judah, enumerated among "the places where David himself and his men were wont to haunt," to the east of the share of spoils (1 Sam 29). The LXX reading "Carmel" has been adopted, by many, because of the similarity of the words in Heb (רָכָל and רָכָל) and because there was a Carmel in the neighborhood of Hebron (Josh 15:55; 1 Sam 15:12), which figures in the story of David's adventures when pursued by Saul (1 Sam 26) in a manner that makes it improbable that he would overlook the place in his good fortune (AV "Rachal"). RACHAB, rā'kahb (P'asēkh, Rhachāh): AV; Gr form of "Rahab" (thus Mt 1:5 RV).

RACHAL, rā'kal. See Ralca.

RACHAB, rā'kahb (רַעָכָה, Rākahb); AV, "eave"; P'asēkh, Rhachāh (Gen 29:6; Jer 31:15, AV "Rahel"): An ancestress of Israel, wife of Jacob, mother of Joseph and Benjamin. Rachel was the younger daughter of Laban, the Aramean, the brother of Jacob's mother; so Rachel and Jacob were cousins. They met for the first time upon the arrival of Jacob at Haran, where he had been sent by his father Isaac to find a wife for himself. The two met at the well of water, and Jacob was attracted by the beauty of the girl who was to become his wife. According to the custom of the times Jacob contracted with Laban for her possession, agreeing to serve him 7 years as the stipulated price (Gen 29:17-20). But when the time had passed, Laban deceived Jacob by giving him Leah instead of Rachel. When Jacob protested, Laban gave him Rachel also, on condition that Jacob serve 7 more years (29:21-29). To her great dismay "Rachel was barren" (Gen 30:25). She therefore offered all her household to Laban, in return for the birth of a child. This offer was accepted by Jacob, and Leah, envious of her sister, complained to Jacob, who reminded her that her children are the gift of God. Then Rachel resorted to the expedient once employed by Sarah under similar circumstances (16:2 ff); she bade her maid, Bilhah, who was barren, to "obtain children by her" (30:3). Dan and Naphtali were the offspring of this union. The evil of polygamy is apparent from the dismal rivalry arising between the two sisters, each seeking by means of children to win the heart of Jacob. In her eagerness to become a mother of children, Rachel bargained with Leah for the handmaids, or two wives, which were given to her by her firstborn, whom she named Joseph (30:22-24).

Some years after this, when Jacob fled from Laban with his wives, the episode of the theft of the teraphim of Laban by Rachel, related in 31:19. 34-55, occurred. She hoped by securing the household gods of her father to bring prosperity to her own household. Though she succeeded by her cunning in concealing them from Laban, Jacob later, upon discovering them, had them put away (35:2-4). In spite of all, she continued to be the favorite of Jacob, as is clearly evidenced by 33:2, where we are told that he assigned to her the place of greatest safety, and by his preference for Joseph, her son. After the arrival in Canaan, while they were on the way from Bethel to Ephrath, i.e. Bethlehem, Rachel gave birth to her second son, Benjamin, and died (35:16 ff).

In a marked manner Rachel's character shows the traits of her family, cunning and covetousness, so evident in Laban, Rebekah and Jacob.

2. Char-acter: Though a believer in the true God (Gen 30:29), she was yet given to the superstitions of her country, the worshiping of the teraphim, etc (31:19). The futility of her efforts in resorting to self-help and superstitious expedients, the love and strongest faith of her husband (35:2-4), were the preponderating causes of purifying her character. Her memory lived on in Israel long after she died. In Ruth 4:11, the names of Rachel and Leah occur in the nuptial benediction as the foundresses of the house of Israel.

Rachel's Tomb (רחל הַבָּרוּה, mezzebeth be'bhurath râhel): In Gen 35:20 we read: "Jacob set up a pillar upon her grave: the same is the Pillar of Rachel's grave unto this day," i.e. the time of the writer. Though the pillar, i.e. sepulchral monument, has long disappeared, the spot is marked until this day, and Christians, Jews and Mohammedans unite in honoring it. The present tomb, which, apparently, is not older than the 15th cent., is built in the style of the small-domed buildings raised by Moslems in honor of their saints. It is a rough structure of four square walls, each about 23 ft. long and 20 ft. high; the dome rising 10 ft. higher is used by Mohammedans for prayer, while on Fridays the Jews make supplication before the empty tomb within. It is doubtful, but probable, that it marks the exact spot where Rachel was buried. There are, apparently, two traditions as to the location of the place. The oldest tradition, based upon Gen 35:16-20; 48:7, points to a place one mile N. of Bethlehem and 4 miles from Jerus. Mt 2:18 speaks for this place, since the evangelist, reporting the slaughter of the innocents of Bethlehem, represents Rachel as weeping for her children from her neighboring grave. But according to 1 S 10:22ff., which apparently represents another tradition, the place of Rachel's grave was on the "border of Benjamin," near Bethel, about 10 miles N. of Jerusalem, at another unknown Ephrath. This location, some believe, is corroborated by Jer 31:15, where the prophet, in relating the leading away of the people of Ramah, which was in Benjamin, into captivity, introduces Rachel the mother of that tribe as bewailing the fate of her descendants. Those that believe this northern location to be the place of Rachel's grave take the words, "the same is Beth-lehem," in Gen 35:19; 48:7, to be an incorrect gloss; but that is a mere assumption lacking sufficient proof.

Mr. Nathan Strauss, of New York City, has purchased the land surrounding Rachel's grave for the purpose of erecting a Jewish university in the Holy Land.

RADDAl, râ'dâ'i, râ'dâ'i (רְדָאִית, radday, "beating down"?): The 5th of the 7 sons of Jesse, father of David, according to 1 Ch 2:14 (LXX Alex, "Rhadaî"); Luc., "Rhedai"; others, "Zaddai").

RADIANT, râ'dî-ant (רָדָא, nâhar, "to sparkle," i.e. [fig.] be cheerful; hence from the sheen of a running stream, to flow, i.e. [fig.] assemble; flow [together], be lightened): ARV substitutes the active "radiant" for the passive "were lightened" in Ps 34:5; Isa 60:5 (ERV, AV "flow together"). As the earth is bathed in the common sun and lighted each other, they are not only lightened, but radiant. So with the believers, "They looked unto him [Jeh], and were radiant." Thus nâhar combines the two ideas of being lightened and flowing together. This appears, also, in a different connection, in Isa 60:5, "Then thou shalt see and be radiant." "It is liquid light—light that ripples and sparkles and runs across the face; . . . the light which a face catches from sparkling water" (G. A. Smith, Ziaah, II, 430). M. O. Evans

RAFT, raft. See SHIPS AND BOATS, II, 1, (2).

RAFTER, raft'er (Cant 1:17). See GALLERY; HOUSE.

RAG: Pl. in Prov 23:21, "Drossiness will clothe a man with rage" (נָבָא, brâ'an, "torn garment"); of 1 K 11:30, and figuratively in Isa 64:6 AV, "All our righteousnesses are as filthy rags," in the sense of "tattered clothes" (נָבָא, beghâth, LXX "garment"). In Jer 38:11:12 ARV translates נבָא, šabbâhâh, as "rag" (AV, ERV "old cast clout"), while AV, ERV use "torn rag" for נבָא, melâh (ARV "worn-out garment"). Both šabbâhâh and melâh mean "worn out."

RAGAUA, râ'gō (Pâyâwâ [WH], Pâyâw, Rhagogâ): AV; Gr form of "Reu" (thus RV) (Lk 3:35).

RAGES, râ'jēz, RAGUA, râ'gō ("Rages,"). Tob 1:14; 4:120; 5:6; 9:12; 9:2; ("Ragia"). Jth 5:15; (Pâyâw, Rhagge, Pâyâw), Pâyâw, Râgô; 1. Location (Pâyâw, Rhagge, Pâyâw, Rhagge; in De- rius' Behistun Inscriptions, II, 71,72, Ragô, a province; in Avesta, Vend, I, 15, Raqga, city and province; perhaps, "the excellent"): In Eastern Media, one forced march from Capisian Gates, 11 days' journey from Ecbatana, 1/3 miles S. of present Tirshân; the capital of the province of the same name, though by Ptolemy called Rhagiana.

(1) Ancient.—A very ancient city, the traditional birthplace of Zoroaster (Zarathushtra), father of Zoroast; Vendishâd, Zâd aspand, XVI, 12, 4. 2. History (Dastâbân i Maqâhï). In Yasna XIX, 15, of the Avesta, it is thus mentioned: "The Zoroastrian, four-chief-possessing Rahta, hers are the royal chiefs, both the house-chief, the village-chief, and the town-chief: Zoroaster is the fourth." In Vend, I, 15: "As the tenth, the best of both districts and cities, I, am Ahura Mazda, did create Rahta, which possesses the three classes," i.e. fire-priests, charioteers, husbandsmen. Later it was the religious center of magaism, a large colony of captive Israelites settled there. Destroyed in Alexander's time, it was rebuilt by Seleucus Nicator (c 300 BC), who named it Europas. Later, Arsacides restored it and named it Arsacis.

(2) Media.—In the early Middle Ages Rahta, then called Bai, was a great literary and often political center with a large population. It was the birthplace of Bâhâ' al-Ma'âb (763 AD). In 1209 AD it was sacked and plundered (1029 AD) by Sulaiman Mahmûd, but became Tugh- rîl's capital. In the Vi o Râmin (c 1048 AD) it is an important place, 10 days' journey according to Kavvâr desert from Merv. It was a small provincial town in about 1200 AD. It was sacked by Mongols in 1220 AD and entirely destroyed under Ghâzî Khan in 258. A Zoroastrian community lived there in 1278 AD, one of whom composed the Zardvâns (c 1278 AD).

(3) Present condition.—Near the ruins there now stands the village of Shâh 'Abêtí, Agin, connected with Târîsh by the Khâbab railway in Persia (opened 1910).

RAGUEL, ra-gú'él (Parovía, Rhagouli): "The friend of God," of Echathana, the husband of Edna, father of Sarah, and father-in-law of Tobias (Tob 3 7-17; 6 10; 7 21; 14 12). In 7 2 he is called "cousin of Tobias," and in Tob 6 10 AV he is erroneously represented as "cousin" of Tobias = "kinsman" in RV. In En 20 4 Ragueul appears as one of the archangels, perhaps by confusion for Raphael (Tob 3 17). Another form of the name is REUEL (q.v.).

RAGUEL, ra-gú'él, ragú'él (תֶּרֶגֶּל, r'g'él; LXX Rhagouli): The Midianite hōthēm, i.e., either father-in-law or brother-in-law of Moses (Nu 10 29 AV, RV "Reuel"), the father of Hobab, called a Kenite, who is likewise described as a hōthēm of Moses (Jgs 4 11). See RELATIONS, FAMILY. Moses' wife's father is called r'g'él in Ex 2 18 where Lucian reads "Iothor" and EV "Reuel," which transliteration is adopted in RV in Nu 10 29 also. In other passages the hōthēm of Moses is called "Jether," the name in Jdg 5 13; "Jethro." Among the harmonizations suggested the following are worthy of consideration: (a) that all are names or perhaps titles of one man (Raah); (b) that Reuel was the father of Hobab and Jethro, that Jethro was the father-in-law of Moses, and that "Jether" is used for grandfather in Ex 2 18; (c) that Reuel was the father-in-law and Jethro and Hobab brothers-in-law; (d) that either Reuel or Hobab is to be identified with Jethro. None of these views is free from difficulty, nor is the view of those who would give Jethro as the name in E and Reuel as that in J and JE. See also REUEL. NATHAN ISAACS

RAHAB, ra'hab: (1) (תֶּרֶגֶּל, r'g'él, "broad"); in Jos, Ant, V. i, 2, 7; (2) Parosh. Ra(h)ab. He 11 31 and Jas 2 5, (Parosh. Rahab). A zónah, that is either a "harlot," or, according to some, an "inkeeper" in Jericho (LXX νηστρός, πόρνη, "harlot"). The two spies sent by Joshua from Shittim came into her house and lodged there (Josh 2 1). She refused to betray them to the king of Jericho, and when he demanded them, she hid them on the roof of her house with stalks of flax that she had laid in order to dry. She pretended that they had escaped before the shutting of the gate, and threw their pursuers off their track. She then told the spies of the fear that the coming of the Israelites had caused in the minds of the Canaanites—"Our hearts did melt ... for you your God, he is God in heaven above, and on earth beneath"—and asked that the men promise to spare her father, mother, brothers and sisters, and all that they had. They promised her to spare them provided they would remain in her house and provided she would keep their business secret. Thereupon she let them down by a cord through the window, her house being built upon the town wall, and gave them directions to make good their escape (Josh 2 1-24). True to their promise, the Israelites under Joshua spared Rahab and her family (Josh 6 18 ff AV); and, says the author of Jos, "she dwelleth in Israel even unto this day." Her story appealed strongly to the imagination of the people of later times. He 11 31 speaks of her as having been saved by faith; James, on the other hand, in demonstrating that a man is justified by works and not by faith only, and accordingly chooses the same example (Jas 2 25). Jewish tradition has been kindly disposed toward Rahab; one hypothesis goes so far as to make her the wife of Joshua himself (Jew Enc, s.v.). Naturally then, the other tr of zónah, deriving it from zón, "to feed," instead of zónah, "to be a harlot," has been preferred by some of the commentators.

(2) (Pāxah, Rhobah): Jos, Ant, V. i, 2, 7, so spells the name of (1) (LXX and NT contra). The wife of Salmon and mother of Boaz according to the genealogy in Mt 1 5. Query, whether there was a tradition identifying (1) and (2); see Lightfoot, Horae Heb on Mt 1 5.

RAHAB, ra'hahb, lit. "storm," "arrogance"): A mythical sea-monster, probably referred to in several passages where the word is tr as a common noun "prided" (Ps 89 13), "the whale" (Job 25 25), with other proverbs of Ps 89 10. It is used in parallelism with tannin, "the dragon" (Isa 51 9). It is most familiar as an emblem of Egypt, "the boaster that sitteth still" (Isa 30 7; Ps 87 4; cf 89 10). The Talm in Babbâ! Bathrâ! speaks of rahab as sar ha-yām, "master of the sea." See also ASTRONOMY.

RAHAM, ra'ham ([ם, 'raham, "pity," "love"): Son of Shema, and father of Jorkam (1 Ch 2 44).

RAHEL, ra'heh (Jer 31 15 AV). See RACHEL.

RAID, rād (I 27 10). See WAR, 3.

RAIL, rāl, RAILING, rāl'ing, RAILER, rāl'er: To "rail" (in modern usage "against") anyone is to use insolent or reproachful language toward one. It occurs in the OT as the tr of דָּרְל (2 Ch 32 17, "letters to rail on Jeh"), and ofםָרְל (י 1 S 25 14, of Nahal, "he railed at them," ERV "flew upon them," m "railed on"). In the NT "to rail" is the tr of βασανίζω, blasphémiō, (Mt 15 29; Lk 23 39, "railing," 1 Tim 6 4; 2 Pet 2 11; Jude ver 9). The word lōdōria, rendered "railing" in 1 Pet 3 9 AV, is in RV "reviling," and lôdoros, "railer," in 1 Cor 6 11 is in RV "reviler." See also RACA. W. L. WALKER

RAIMENT, rā'ment. See Dress.

RAIMENT, SOFT (aakado, malakos): In Mt 11 8 EV, where Jesus, speaking of John the Baptist, asks "What went ye out to see? a man clothed in soft raiment?" where "raiment," though implied, is not expressed in the best text, but was probably added from Lk 7 25. It is equivalent to "elegant clothing," such as courtiers wore, as shown by the words following, "Behold, they that wear soft raiment are in kings' houses." John had bravely refused to play courtier and had gone to prison for it. In the early days of Herod the Great some scribes who attached themselves to him laid aside their usual plain clothing and wore the gorgeous raiment of courtiers (Jost, in Plumptr).

1. Watering Supply (םָרְל, brēleho; מָלַכָּה, huqōs): In Egypt and Palestine water for vegetation being supplied in great abundance by the river Nile; but in Syria and Pal there are no large rivers, and the people have to depend entirely on the fall of rain for water for themselves, their animals and their fields. The children of Israel when in Egypt were promised by Jeh a land which "drinketh water of the rain of heaven" (Dt 11 11). Springs and fountains are found in most of the valleys, but the flow of the springs depends directly on the fall of rain or snow in the mountains.
The cultivation of the land in Pal is practically dry farming in most of the districts, but even then some water is necessary, so that there may be moisture in the soil. In the summer months there is no rain, and that the rains of the spring and fall, in other years there is a complete failure of the harvest. The lack of this rain in the proper time has often been the cause of complete failure of the harvest. A small difference in the amount of these seasonal rains makes a large difference in the possibility of growing various crops without irrigation. Ellsworth Huntington has insisted on this point with great care in his very important work, Pal and Its Transformation. The promise of prosperity is given in the assurance of "rain in due season" (Lev 26:4 AV). The withholding of rain according to the prophecy of Elijah (1 K 17:1) caused the crops to wither and die up (1 K 17:7), and certain famine ensued. A glimpse of the terrible suffering for lack of water at that time is given us. The people were uncertain of another meal (1 K 17:12), and the animals were perishint (1 K 17:5).

Pal and Syria lay on the borderland between the sea and the desert, and besides are so mountainous, that they not only have a great range of rainfall in different years, but a great variation in different parts of the country.

The amount of rain on the western slopes is comparable with that in England and America, varying from 25 to 40 in. per annum, but it falls mostly in the four winter months, when the downpour is often very heavy, giving oftentimes from 12 to 16 in. a month. On the eastern slopes, the western is 15.62 in., the eastern 18.08 in., and the center 15.35 in., per annum. The highest amount falls in the mountains of Lebanon where it averages about 50 in. Damascus the yearly average is 13.39 in. In Jerusalem the yearly average is 26.10 in. and the range is from 13.39 in. to 41.62 in. rainfall for the last hundred years. The highest is 41.62 in., reaching and a data in FEFO from 1861 to 1910, 50 years, are given in the accompanying table.

The amount of rainfall in ancient times was probably about the same as in present times, though it may have been distributed somewhat differently through the year, as suggested by Huntington. Conder maintains that the present amount would have been sufficiently to support the ancient cities (Tent-Work in Pal). Trees are without doubt fewer now, but meteorologists agree that trees do not produce rain.

The rainfall is largely on the western slopes of the mountains facing the sea, and the eastern slopes there is very little. The moisture-laden sea air comes up from the sea with the west and southwest wind. When these currents strike the hills they are thrown higher up into the cooler strata, and the moisture condenses to form clouds.

4. Dry and Rainy Seasons

In the spring and fall, which increase on the higher hills, the currents descend on the other side to warmer levels, where the moisture is easily held in the form of vapor so that no rain falls and few clouds are seen, except in the cold mid-winter months.

The summer months are practically rainless, with very few clouds appearing in the sky. From May 1 to the middle of October one can be sure of no rain; "The winter is past, the rain is over" (Cant 2:11), so many sleep on the roofs of the houses or in tents of leaves and branches in the fields and vineyards throughout the summer. The continuous hot droughts make the people appreciate the springs and fountains of fresh running water and the cool shade of rock and tree.

The rain season from October to May may be divided into three parts, the former, the winter, and the latter rains, and they are often referred to under these names in the OT.

The "former rains" are the showers of October and the first part of November. They soften the parched ground so that the very first rain may be seen before the heavy continuous rains set in. The main bulk of the rain falls in the months of December, January and February. Although in these months the rains are frequent and heavy, a dark, foggy day is seldom seen. The "latter rains" of April are the most highly appreciated, because they ripen the fruit and stay the drought of summer.

They were considered a special blessing: Jeh will come . . . as the latter rain that watereth the earth" (Gen 27:6). "They opened their mouth wide as for the latter rain" (Job 29:23); and as a reason for worshipping Jeh who sent them, "Let us now fear Jeh our God, that giveth rain, both the former and the latter, in its season" (Jer 5:24).

The rain storms always come from the sea with a west or southwest wind. The east wind is a hot wind and the "north wind driveth away rain" (Prov 25:23 AV). "Fair weather cometh out of the north" (Job 37:22 AV).

The Psalmist recognizes that the showers that water the earth (Ps 72:6) are among the greatest blessings from the hand of Jeh: "The 5. Biblical Uses

The severest punishment of Jeh was to withhold the rain, as in the time of Ahab and Elijah, when Elijah said the rain did not fall for three years (1 K 17): "the anger of Jeh be kindled against you, and he shut up the heavens, so that there shall be no rain, and the land shall not yield its fruit; and ye perish quickly" (Dt 11:17). Too much rain is also a punishment, as witness the flood (Gen 7:4) and the plague of rain and hail (Ex 10:9). Sending of rain was a reward for worship and obedience: "Jeh will open unto thee his good treasure, the heavens, to give the rain of the land in its season and to bless all the work of thy hand!" (Dt 28:12). Jeh controls the elements and commands the rain: "He made a decree for the rain" (Job 28:26); "For he saith to the snow, Fall thou on the earth; likewise to the shower of rain" (Job 37:6).

ALFRED H. JOY
RAINBOWS, râ‘n’bô (םָני, ָנֶת, kesheth, tr4 “a bow”; ḥos, ērt, “rainbow”): As most of the rainfall in Palestine is in the form of short heavy showers it is often accompanied by the rainbow. Most beautiful double rainbows are the dead, and occasionally the moon is bright enough to produce the bow. It is rather remarkable that there are so few references to the rainbow in the Bible. The Heb kesheth is the ordinary word for a bow, there being no special word for a rainbow.

RAISE, râ‘z: “To raise” in the OT is most frequently the tr of the Hiphil form of גָּנֶה, קים, “to cause to arise,” e.g. raising up seed (Gen 35:8), a prophet (De 18:18), judges (Jgs 2:10:15), etc.; also of גָּנֶה, צָרָה, “to awake,” “to stir up” (Ezr 1:5 AV; Isa 41:2, etc), with other words. In the NT the chief words are ξενράν, ορνόρ, “to awake,” “arouse” (Mt 3:9; Lk 1:69; 3:8, etc), frequently in the context of the dead, and ανείραν, ανειρέω (Mt 22:24; Jn 6:39, etc; Acts 2:24 [30 AV, etc]), with compounds of the former. Among the RV changes may be noted, “to stir the fire” for “from raising” (Hos 7:4); “raiseth high his gate” for “exalteth his gate” (Prov 17:19); ARV, “can it be raised from the roots thereof?” for “pluck it up by the roots thereof?” (Ezk 17:9 AV and ERV); “raised up” for “rise again” (Mt 20:19; cf Mt 26:32; Rom 8:34; Col 3:1).

RAISIN-CAKES, râ‘zn-kâks: RV gives this rendering for AV “foundations” in Isa 16:7 (Heb דַּשׁהְשָׁפָה from דַּשׁה, “to found,” “make firm,” “press”); the trade in these would cease through the devastation of the vineyards, and AV “cakes of raisins” in Hos 3:1, RV gives “cakes of raisins,” such as were offered to the gods of the land, the givers of the grape (cf Cant 2:5). See next article.

RAISINS, râ‘zn: (1) דָּשַׁהּים, גָּנֶסְלִים; σταφύλα, πσταφύλα, tr4 “dried grapes,” Nu 6:3; mentioned in all other references as a portable food for a march or journey. Abigail supplied David with “a hundred clusters of raisins,” among other things, in the wilderness of Paran (1 S 25:18); David gave two clusters of raisins to a servant of Elisha the Amalekite at Besor (30:12); raisins formed part of the provision brought to David at Hebron for his army (1 Ch 12:40); Ziba supplied David, when flying from Absalom, with a hundred clusters of raisins (2 S 16:1). (2) דָּשַׁהּ, דָּשַׁהּ, something “pressed together,” hence a “cake.” In Hos 3:1, mention is made of דַּשָּׁהּ דַּשָּׁהּ, דַּשָּׁהּ, σταφύλα, πσταφύλα, “cakes of raisins”; “Ich loveth the children of Israel, though they turn unto other gods, and love [not ‘or that love’] cakes of raisins.” These are supposed to have been cakes of dried, compressed grapes offered to false gods. Gritz considers that the Heb words are a corruption of דַּשָּׁהּ וְדַמָּם (sun images). Cf Is 17:8; 27:9. In other passages “cakes” stands alone without the “raisins,” but the cakes are given in 2 S 6:19; 1 Ch 16:3; Cant 2:5 (AV “flagons”); Isa 16:7 m “foundations.”

Raisins are today, as of old, prepared in considerable quantities in Palestine, esp. at en-Salt, E. of the Jordan. The bunches of grapes are dried in a strong solution of potash before being dried.

RAKEM, râ‘kem (ךָךְ מֵם, râ‘kemē, the pausal form of כֵּךְ, rekem): The eponym of a clan of Machir (1 Ch 7:16). See RAKEM.

RAKKATH, râ‘kâth (ךָךְ מֵם, râ‘kâkath; B ‘qâbût- nash, Omatobadokath, A Pecâkâth, Râkkâkâth): The Gr is obviously the result of confusing the two names Rakkath and Hammath, taking r in the former for d. Rakkath was one of the fortified cities in Naphtali (Josh 19:35). It is named between Hammath and Chinnereth. Hammath is identified with the hot baths to the S of Tiberias. There are traces of ancient fortifications here. The rabbis think that Tiberias was built on the site of Rakkath. Certain it is that Herod’s town was built upon the ancient site. The name was bestowed on the old inhabitants being disturbed in digging the new foundations (Neubauer, Geogr. dE Jüd. 208).

RAKON, râ‘kon (ךָךְ מֵם, hâ-râ‘kôn; ἱππαδών, Hierakon). See JERKON.

RAM, ram (גָּז, râ‘m, “high,” “exalted”): (1) An ancestor of David (Ruth 4:10 [Apdo, Arran]); Mt 1:34 [Apdo, Arrânon]; in 1 Ch 2:9 he is called the “brother,” but in ver 25, the “son of Jerahmeel” (cf ver 27). Ram as the son of Horez appears more likely than Ram the son of Jerahmeel, since, according to the narratives of 1 and 2 S, David cannot have been a Jerahmeelite.

(2) Name of Elihu’s family (Job 32:2). It is an open question as to whether Ram should be taken as a purely fictitious name, invented by the author of the Elihu speeches, or whether it is that of some obscure Arab tribe. In Gen 22:21 Abram is a nephew of Bus (cf Elihu the Buzite), and the conjecture was at one time advanced that Ram was a contraction of the name Abram; but the theory is no longer held to be tenable. The suggestion that the initial 6 of r (ם) has been changed by a scribal error into 6 (ו) is more acceptable. Rash, the rabbinical commentator, takes the quaint position that Ram is identical with Abraham.

RAM, ram (גָּז, râ‘m, “high”): (1) The ordinary word is גָּז, ḣayil, which is remarkably near to גָּז, ḥayil, “deep” (cf Lat carper, capra, “goat,” and caprocaulis, “wild goat” or “roe-buck,” also Gr ἱππαρκός, ἱππόκτος, “roe-buck” or “goat”). (2) גָּז, ḥâ’kâth, lit. “male” (Ezk 24:7; 27:9). (3) גָּז, “battering ram” (Ezk 4:3; 21:22); elsewhere “lamb” (Dt 32:14, etc.). (4) גָּז, ḥâ’kâth, properly “be-goat” (“ram”); Gen 31:10 AV). See SHEEP.

RAM, BATTERING. See SIERRA.

RAMA, râ‘ma (Pâqâ, Rhamâ): AV; Gr form of Ramah (q.v.) (Mt 2:18).

RAMAH, râ‘ma (ךָךְ מֵם, hâ-râ‘mân, without the def. art. only in Neh 11:33; Jer 31:15): The name denotes height, from root גָּז, “to be high,” and the towns to which it applied seem all to have stood on elevated sites.
(1) B, 'osh, Ara²l, A, Pa²a, Rhamá: A fenced city in the lot assigned to Naphtali (Josh 19:36). Only in this passage is the place referred to. It is probably identical with the modern er-Râmeh, a large Christian village on the highway from Safed to the coast, about 8 miles W.S.W. of that city. To the N., rises the mountain range which forms the southern boundary of Upper Galilee. In the valley to the S. there is much rich land cultivated by the villagers. The olives grown here are very fine, and fruitful vineyards cover many of the surrounding hills. Remains of antiquity are to be seen above ground; but the site is one likely to have been occupied in ancient times.

(2) Pa²a, Rhamâ: A city that is mentioned only once, on the boundary of Asher (Josh 19:29). The line of the boundary cannot be followed with certainty; but perhaps we may identify Ramah with the modern Râmiyeh, a village situated on a hill which rises in the midst of a hollow, some 13 miles S.E. of Tyre, and 12 miles E. of the Ladder of Tyre. To the S.W., is a marshy lake which dries up in summer. Traces of antiquity are found in the cisterns, a large reservoir and many sarcophagi. To the W. is the high hill Bêtâd, with ancient ruins, and remains of a temple of which several columns are still standing.

(3) B, Pa²a, Rhamâ, A, I¹sam, Iamâ, and other forms: A city in the territory of Benjamin named between Gibeon and Boereth (Josh 18:25). The Levite thought of it as a possible resting-place for himself and his concubine on their northward journey (Jgs 19:13). The palm tree of Deborah was between this and Bethel (Jgs 4:5). Basheka, king of Samaria, sought to fortify Ramah against Assh, king of Judah. The latter frustrated the attempt, and carried off the materials which Basheka had collected for and sent him from the temple of Benjamin and Mizpah (1 K 15:17; 2 Ch 16:5). Here the captain of Nebuchadnezzar's guard released Jeremiah after he had been carried in bonds from Jerusalem (Jer 40:1). It figures in Isaiah's picture of the Assyrians' approach (10:29). It is named by Hosea in connection with Gibeath (5:8), and is mentioned as being reoccupied after the exile (Ezr 2:26; Neh 7:30). It was near the traditional tomb of Rachel (Jer 31:15; of 1 S 10:2; Mt 2:18, A, 'Ram'.

From the passages cited we gather that Ramah lay some distance to the N. of Gibeath, and not far from Gibeon and Boereth. The first is identified with Tell el-Fûl, about 3 miles N. of Jerus. Two miles farther to the N. (el-Jih) is a village about 3 miles W. of er-Râm and Boereth (el-Biréh) is about 4 miles to the N. of the N. Onom places Ramah 6 Roman miles N. of Jerus; while Jos (Ant. VIII, xii, 3) says it lay 40 furlongs from the city. All this points definitely to identification with er-Râm. The modern village crowns a high limestone hill to the S. of the road, a position of great strength. W. of the village is an ancient reservoir. In the hill are cisterns, and a good well to the S.

1. Rhamathaim: The home of Ekanah and Hannah, and the birthplace of Samuel (1 S 1 19; 2 S 11, etc.). In 1 S 1 it is called "Rhamathaim-zophim" (רַמַּתְיָמִים, hó-rámad- thayim-zophim). The phrase as it stands is grammatically incorrect, and suggests tampering with the text. It might possibly be trl "Rama- thaim, the place of thorns." It was the home of Eliphaïm, within accessible distance of Shiloh, whence Samuel's parents went up from year to year to worship and to sacrifice (1:3). From Ramah as a center Samuel went on circuit annually, to judge Israel, to Bethel, Gilead and Mizpah (17 316). It is very probable that this is the city in which, guided by his servant, Saul first made the acquaintance of Samuel (9:6,10), where there was a high place (ver 12). Hither at all events came the elders of Israel with their demand that a king should be set over them (8:4, 5). After his final break with Samuel, Saul retired to Ramah (16:34). Here, in Naioth, David found asylum with Samuel from the mad king (19:18, etc.), and hence he fled on his ill-starred visit to Nob (20:1). In his native city the dust of the dead Samuel was laid (26 1; 28:3). In verse 11:34 it is named as one of the thirteen toponymies along with Aphaeraem and Lydda, which were added to Judaea from the country of Samaria in 145 BC. Onam places it near Diospolis (Euseb.) in the district of Timnah (Jerome).

There are two serious rivals for the honor of representing the ancient Ramah. (a) Beth Râmâ, a village occupying a height 13 miles E.N.E. of Lydda (Diospolis), 12 miles W. of Shiloh, and about the same distance N.W. of Bethel. This identification has the support of G. A. Smith (HGHL, 254), and Buhl (GAP, 170). (b) Ramathâl, a large and prosperous village occupying a lofty position with ancient remains. It commands a wide prospect, esp. to the W. It lies about 8 miles N. of Jerus, 3 W. of Bethel, and 12 S.W. of Shiloh. The same meaning of the height of Ramathaim may be reminiscent of the high place in the city where Saul found Samuel. In other respects it agrees very well with the Bib. data.

Claims have also been advanced on behalf of Ramathaim, a village 2 miles S.W. of Lydda, in the plain of Sharon. This, however, is out of the question, as the place did not exist before Arab times. Others support identification with Neby Samwil, which more probably represents the ancient Mizpah (q.v.).

(5) Ramathaim-zophim, "the South", AV "Ramath of the South": Ramath is the construct form of Ramah (Josh 19:8) (רַמַּת שְׁוֵי, râmâth négebh; Bâbêf, sêbâ niwa, Bâmeth katâ ibn). A city in that part of the territory of Judah which was allotted to Simeon. It stands here in apposition to Baalath-beer, and is probably a second name for the same place. It seems to correspond also with "Ramoth [pl.] of the South" (1 S 30:27), a place to which David sent a share of the spoil taken from the Amalekites. In this passage LXX retains the sing. form, Râmâd id. In the identification has been made with Kubbet el-Baul about 37 miles S. of Hebron; and with Kurnub a little farther S. There is no substantial ground for either identification.

(6) B, Pa²a, Rhamth, A, Pa²a, Rhamth: Ramath in 2 K 8:28; 2 Ch 22 6, is a contraction of Ramoth-gilead.

RAMATH, rámâth, of the SOUTH (Josh 19 8 AV). See Ramah, (5).

RAMATH-LEHI, rámâth-lehî (רַמַּת לֵהִי, râmâth lehî, "the hill") or "height of Lehi," ʿAnâqēs σαϊγών, Anaireis siâgonos): So the place is said to have been called where Samson threw away the jaw-bone of an ass, with which he had slain 1,000 Philis (Jgs 15:17). LXX seems to have supposed that the name referred to "heaving" or throwing up of the jaw-bone. The Heb, however, corresponds to the form used in other place-names, such as Ramath-mizpeh, and must be read as "Ramah of Lehi. The name Lehi may have been given because of the occurrence of the prominence in the place to the shape of a jaw-bone (Jgs 15:14,19). It may have been in Waday es-Sâra, not far from Zorah and Timnah; but the available data do not permit of certain identification. See JAW-BONE; LEHI.

RAMATH-MIZPEH, r'amath-miz'pe (חֲרוֹם מִזְפֶּה, r'amath ha-miz'peh; B, 'Ar'abôth katâ lîn Mâsphâd, Arâbôth katâ (in Massphath, A, Pa'âmôd . . . Ma'sphôd, Ramôth . . . Masphâd): A place mentioned in Josh 13:26 in a statement of the boundary of Gad, between Heshbon and Betonim. It may possibly be identical with Mizpah, (4).

RAMATHAIM, r'am-atha'im (1 Mac 11:34; AV Ramatham, ram-a-them). See Ramah, (4).

RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM, r'am-atha'im-zô'fîm. See Ramah, (4).

RAMATHITE, r'amath-it (חֲרוֹמָית, hâ-râ'môthî; B, ô 'îk Pa'âl, ho ek Rhaîl, A, ô Pa'âmãsîn, ho Rhaîma'taïos): So Shimeel was called who was set by David over the vineyards (1 Ch 27:27). There is nothing to show to which Ramah he belonged.

RAMESES, r'am-e'sez, ra-mê'se. See Raamesses.

RAMIAH, r'am-î'a (רמאיה, r'mîyâ; "Jehah hath loosened" or "Jehah is high"): One of the Israelites, sons of Parosh, mentioned in the register of those who had offended in the matter of foreign marriages (Ezr 10:25). The form of the name in 1 Esd (9:26), "Thérmas," presupposes a Heb form ýrmîyâ or possibly ýirmîyâ = "Jehemiah."

RAMOTH, r'amoth:
1. (רָמֹתъ, r'môth; ë Parôb, hê Ramôth: A city in the territory of Issachar assigned to the Geroshite Levites (1 Ch 6:73), mentioned between Daberath and Anem. It seems to correspond to "Remeth" in Josh 19:21, and to "Jarmuth" in 21:29, and is possibly mentioned with Er-Rameh about 11 miles S.W. of Jenin. (2) Ramoth of the South. See Ramah, (5).

RAMOTH, r'amoth (רָמֹת, r'môth), Krê for ýrmôth [Ezr 10:29 AV]; RVV Kôthibh makes the name similar to those in vs 26-27: One of the offenders in the matter of foreign marriages. RVV and ARV, adopting Kôthibh, read Jeremmoth (q.v.).

RAMOTH (Job 38:18 AVm). See Stones, Precious.

RAMOTH-GILEAD, r'amoth-gîl'ê-ad (רָמֹת גִּלְעָד, r'môth gîl'âd; B, Pa'âmuâl Tala'dâh, Ramomôth Galadd, A, Pa'amuâl, Ramomôth, and other forms): A great and strong city E. of the Jordan in the territory of Gad, which played an important part in the wars of Israel. It is first mentioned in connection with the appointment of the Cities of Refuge (Dt 4:43; Jos 20:8). It was assigned to the Merarite Levites (Jos 21:38; 1 Ch 6:80). In these four passages it is called "Ramoth in Gilead" (רָמֹת גִּלְעָד, r'môth ga-gîl'âd). This form is given wrongly by AV in 1 K 22:3. In all other places the form "Ramothe-gilead" is used.

Here Ben-geber was placed in charge of one of Solomon's administrative districts (1 K 4:13), which included Havvoth-jair and "the 1. History region of Argob, which is in Bashan." The city was taken from Omri by the Syrians under Ben-hadad I (2 K 10:32), and even more resoundingly by the defeat of Ben-hadad at Aphek they remained masters of this fortress. In order to recover it for Israel Ahab invited Jehoshaphat of Judah to accompany him in a campaign. Despite the discouragement of Micaiah, the royal pair set out on the disastrous enterprise. In their attack on the city Ahab fought in disguise, but was mortally wounded by an arrow from a bow drawn "at a venture" (1 K 22:1-40; 2 Ch 18). The attempt was repeated by Ahab's son Jehoram; but his father's ill fortune followed him, and, heavily wounded, he retired for healing to Jareel (2 K 8:28 ff; 2 Ch 22:5). During the king's absence from the camp at Ramoth-gilead Jehu was there appointed king of Israel by Elisha (2 K 9:1 ff; 2 Ch 22:7). He proved a swift instrument of vengeance against the doomed house of Ahab. According to Jos (Ant, IX, vi, 1) the city was taken before Joram's departure. This is confirmed by 2 K 9 14 ff. The place is not mentioned again, unless, indeed, it be identified with "Mizpah" in 1 Mac 5:35.

It is just possible that Ramoth-gilead corresponds to Mizpah, (1), and to Ramath-Mizpeh.

The spot where Laban and Jacob parted is called both Gilead and Gedor, and can be seen in the case of Ramoth of the South.

Merrill identifies the city with Jerash, the splendid ruin of which lies in Wady el-Den, N. of the Jebok. He quotes the Bab Talm (Makkah 96) as placing the Cities of Refuge in pairs, so that those on the E. of the Jordan are opposite those on the W. Shechem, being the middle one of the three W. of the Jordan, should have Ramoth-gilead nearly opposite to it on the E., and this would place its site at Gerasa, the modern Jerash (HDB, s.v.). But the words of the Talm must not be interpreted too strictly. It may very probably that Golan lay far S. of a line drawn due E. from Kedes (Kades-naphtali). No remains have been discovered at Jerash older than Gr-Rom times, although the presence of a fine perennial spring makes occupation in antiquity probable. The place could be approached by chariots along Wady 'Ajlûn, and the country adjoining was not unsuitable for chariot evolutions.

Condor and others have suggested Reimun, an ancient site to the W. of Jerash. The absence of any source of good water supply questions the identification. Buhl (GAP, 261 ff) favors el-Jirâd, a ruined site on a hill S. of the Jabok; see Gilead, (1). Eusebius and Jerome (Onom, s.v.) contradict each other, the former placing Ramoth-gilead 15 miles W. of Jerash, and the latter 15 miles E. of Philadelphia. It is clear, however, that this is a mere slip on Jerome's part, as both say it is near the Jabok. Many have identified it with es-Salt, which is indeed 15 miles W. of Amman (Philadelphia), but it is 10 miles S. of the Jabok, and so can hardly be described as near that river. It is also no place for chariot warfare. The case against identification with Ramoth-gilead is conclusively stated by Rev. G. A. Cooke in Driver's Dt, xx.

In suggesting these sites sufficient attention has not been given to what is said in 1 K 4. The authority of the king's officer in Ramoth-gilead extended over the land of Argob in Bashan, as well as over the towns of Jair in Gilead. A situation therefore to the N. of Mahanaim must be sought. Guthe would find it at cr-Reinloth, on the pilgrim road, about 10 miles S. of Mezerib (cf HGL, 556 ff). Cheyne's suggestion of Saltib, away on the crest of the mountain of Bashan, is out of the question.

The name Caleb H. argues in favor of Beit Râs, over 11 miles S.E. of Gadara, a position commanding all Northern Gilead and as favorably situated as Jerash for chariot warfare and communication with the W. of Jordan.
“Here we have the heights of Northern Gilead. Ramoth, Caphtorim, and Beil Rams are in their respective languages idiomatic equivalents. It is improbable that a large city like Caphtorim should have superseded anything but a very important city of earlier times. We must be content to leave the question open meantime. W. Ewing RAMPART, rampárt (Lam 2 8; Nah 3 8). See Fortification.

RAM’S HORN. See Music.

RAMS’ SKINS: The skin of the sheep, roughly tanned with all the wool on, is the common winter jacket of the shepherd or peasant, the ram’s being considered esp. desirable (cf He 11 37). Hence the appropriateness of these skins in the covering of the tabernacle (Ex 25 5, etc). See Tabernacle; Dye, Dyeing.

RANGE, ránj: “Range” and “ranks” have the same derivation, and in the sense of a “row” (of men, etc) they were formerly interchangeable. “Range” with this meaning is found in 2 K 11 8.15 AV (2 Ch 23 14 (RV “rank”; תDateFormat, s’dherah, “row”). Hence “to range” is “to set in a line” (Jth 2 16; 2 Macc 12 20, diatsiasd) or “to move in a line” or, simply, “to roan,” whence “a ranging bear” (Prov 28 15; יDateFormat, shásak, “run to and fro”). A cooking “range” is a sieve on which pots, etc. can be set in a row, but the kíyrjɪn (םDateFormat) of Lev 11 35 is a much more primitive affair, composed, probably, of two plates (kíyrjím is a dual). In Job 39 8, “range of the mountains” is good modern use, but תDateFormat, yir, should be pointed yáhur (not yár in MT) and connected with yár, “search.” So translate “He searcheth out the mountains as his pasture.” Burton Scott Eason

RANK, rank: (1) תDateFormat, śrah, used in Joel 2 7 of the advance of the locust army which marched in perfect order and in straight lines, none crossing the other’s track. (2) תDateFormat, ma’arakhāh, “battle array” (1 Ch 12 38 AV; cf 1 S 4 16; 17 22 48). See Army.

RANKS, ranks (רDateFormat, prásad, “a square plot of ground”; “a garden-bed”): “They sat down in ranks” (Mk 6 40); the several reclining ranks formed, as it were, separate plots or “garden-beds.”

RANSOM, ran’sum (the noun occurs in the Eng. LITERATURE

The supremely important instance is the utterance of the Lord Jesus Christ as reported by Matthew and Mark (Mt 20 28; Mk 10 45), and in looking at it we shall be able, by way of illustration, to glance at the OT passages. The 1. Usage context refers to the dispute among the disciples concerning position in the kingdom, with the kingdom to the world. The true nature of Christ’s kingdom. Christ makes use of the occasion to set forth the great law of service as determining the place of honor in that kingdom, and illustrates and enforces it by showing that its greatest exemplification is to be found in His own mission: “For the Son of man also came not to be ministered unto, but to minister” (Mk 10 45). His ministry, however, was to pass into the great act of sacrifice, of which all other acts of self-sacrifice on the part of His people would be but a faint reflection—and to give His life [soul] a ransom for many” (ib). He thus gives a very clear intuition of the purpose and meaning of His death; the clearest of all the intimations reported by the synoptists. The word He uses bears a well-established meaning, and is accurately rendered by our word “ransom,” a price paid to secure the freedom of a slave or to set free from liabilities and charges, and generally the deliverance from calamity by paying the forfeit. The familiar vb. בDateFormat, “to look” or “to set free” (Prov 18 20; פDateFormat, láttron, that which secures the freedom, the payment or forfeit; thence come the cognate vb. látroth, “to set free upon payment of a ransom,” “to redeem.” látroth, “the actual setting free; the redemption,” and látroth, “the redeemer,” the favorite NT word for “redemption” is the compound form, ἀπολύτρωσις.

The word láttron was common in Gr classical lit., constantly bearing the sense of “ransom price,” and was frequently connected with sacrificial and expiation. Usage—But for the full explanation of the Law Lord’s great thought we have to look to the OT usage. The two leading Heb vbs. trdy in our version by “redeem,” are generally rendered in the LXX by látroth, and derivatives of these words conveying the idea of the actual price paid are trdy by this very word láttron.

(1) General cases.—In Ex 21 30 we have the law concerning the case of the person killed by an ox; the ox was to be destroyed, and the owner liable to death but the proviso was made, “If there be laid on him a sum of money he shall pay that; but if not, he shall pay as much as the value of his life whatsoever is laid upon him” (AV). The Heb for “sum of money” is kópher, lit. “atone ment.” RV “ransom money” (the word for “redemption”) is piddáhōn (from piddáh); the LXX renders both by látroth either by the pl. form látroth or by the sing. form láttron. In Lev 25, among the directions in relation to the Jubilee, we have the provision (ver 25) that the land was not to be sold “in perpetuity,” but where any portion has been sold, opportunity is to be given for re-purchase: “Yo shall grant a redemption for the land” (lev 25). The Heb is go’uláh, a derivative of go’al, the LXX láttron. In vs 25,26, the case is mentioned of a man who through poverty has sold part of his land to a near kinsman who is able to redeem it he shall do so: if there is no one to act this brotherly part, and the man himself is able to redeem it, there remain a scale of consideration in the Heb it is again go’al that is used with the cognate go’al for “kinsman.” The last clause rendered in AV, “but himself he able to redeem it,” in RV “and he be warded rich and find sufficient to redeem it”), is lit. “and his hand shall advance, and he find sufficient for his redemption”%; LXX has the vb. látroth in the first part, and renders the clause pretty literally, “and there be furnished to his hand and there be found with him the sufficient price [látroth] of it.” In vs 51,52, in reference to the redemption of a Jew sold into slavery, we have in the Heb the word go’uláh, rendered in Eng, accurately “the price of redemption”; LXX has the plural, for accuracy, in both cases, látroth, “the ransom-price.” In Lev 27 31 AV, the phrase “if a man will at all redeem of his house” (cf 13 28) is intended to represent the phraseological Heb idiom, “if a man redeeming will redeem,” which is rendered by LXX κα nos látroth látroth ἀνθρώπων.

ing the half-shekel to be paid by every Israelite from 20 years old and upward when a census was taken. It was to be the same for rich and poor, and it was called "atonement money," "to make atonement for their souls." In the opening words of the law, in Ex 30:12 (AV), we read "Then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul unto the Lord"—the Heb kôpher; the LXX rendering is λύτρα τῆς παύχεις αὐτῶν, "a ransom price for his soul." All the people were thus considered and treated alike, and agreeing to the same amount. It is significant that this atonement money paid at the first census furnished the silver for the sockets of the tabernacle boards, intimating that the typical tabernacle was built upon atonement. The same thought, that the people's lives were forfeited, comes out in the provision for the consecration of the Levites, recorded in full in Nu 3:40-51. The firstborn represented the people. God claimed all the firstborn as forfeited to Himself, teaching that Israel deserved the same punishment as the Egyptians, and was only spared by the grace of Jeh, and in virtue of the sprinkled blood. Now He takes to Himself for His services the Levites as the equivalent of the firstborn, and when it was found that the number of the firstborn exceeded the number of the Levites, equivalence was maintained by ransom at a certain price the surplusage of the firstborn males. In the LXX account, lûtrà occurs 4 times, twice for the phrase "those to be redeemed," and twice for "ransom." Thus the idea of ransom for the forfeited life became familiar to the people as educated by the typical system, and redemption expressed the sum total of their hopes for the future, however faulty might be their conception of the nature of that redemption.

(3) Connection with sacrifice. It is also clear in the text that the sacrificial and the ransom were closely related. Even in classical Gr., as we have noted, the two concepts correspond, and it is not surprising to find it so in the OT. Köpher, we have seen, is lit. "atonement" and comes from kôpher, lit. "to cover," and hence by covering to make atonement, or to cover by making atonement: and so it is in the Piel form, the most common and technical Heb word for making atonement, or expiation, or propitiation, and is frequently rendered in the Gr by hilasomai, often too by the comp. εἰλισθήμενος. In Ex 30:2, 12; Nu 15:21, 35; 31:12; the Heb kôpher is lûtrà in the Gr. In the latter place, where it is twice stated that no satisfaction shall be taken of the life of a man, the Heb is kôpher, LXX lûtrà, RV "ransom," AV "satisfaction.

(4) Typical reference to the Messiah.—Sacrifice was thus linked with ransom. Sacrifice was the Divinely appointed covering for sin. The ransom for the deliverance of the sinner was to be by sacrifice. Both the typical testimony of the Law and the prophetic testimony gave prominence to the thought of redemption. The Coming One was to be a Redeemer. Redemption was to be the great work of the Messiah. The people seem to have looked for the redemption of the soul to God alone through their own vicarious rights, while redemption, in the more general sense of deliverance from all enemies and troubles, they linked with the advent of the Messiah. It required a spiritual vision to see that the two things would coincide, that the Messiah would bring in all phases and fulness by means of ransom, of sacrifice, of expiation.

Jesus appeared as the Messiah in whom all the old economy was to be fulfilled. He knew perfectly the meaning of the typical and prophetic testimony; and that full heath was to fulfill the OT types and accomplish its brightest prophetic anticipations, He deliberately uses this term lûtròn to describe it (Mt 20:28); in speaking of His death as a ransom, He also regarded it as a sacrifice, an expiatory offering. The strong preposition used intensifies the idea of ransom and expiation, even to the point of substitution. It is ἀντί, "instead of," and the idea of exchange, equivalence, substitution cannot be removed from it. In Nu 18:16, "Take the Levites instead of all the first-born," the LXX uses ἀντί, which, like the Eng. "instead of," exactly represents the Heb tabâh; and all three convey most unmistakably the idea of substitution. And as the Levites were to be substituted for the firstborn, so for the surplus of the firstborn the "ransom money" was to be substituted, that idea, however, being clearly enough indicated by the use of the genitive. Indeed the simpler way of describing a ransom is to be with the genitive, the ransom of many; or as our version renders, "a ransom for many," but just because the ransom here is not simply a money payment, but is the actual sacrifice of the life, the substitution of His soul for many, He is appropriately said to "give his soul a ransom instead of many." The Kingdom of God which Christ proclaimed was so diverse in character from that which Salome and her sons anticipated that, so far from appearing in dazzling splendor, with distinguished places of power for eager aspirants, it was to be a spiritual home for renegades. Men held captive by sin needed to be ransomed that they might be free to become subjects of the Kingdom, and so the ransom work, the sufferings and death of Christ, must lie at the very foundation of that Kingdom. The need of ransom supersedes life forfeited; the ransom paid secures life and liberty; the life which Christ gives comes through His ransoming death.

Besides the passages in the Pent which we have noted, special mention should be made of the two great passages which bear so closely upon the need of spiritual redemption, the Ps and Job and come into line with this great utterance of Christ. Ps 49:7-9, "None of you can by any means redeem [pādāḥ; lûtrā] his brother, nor give to God a ransome [kôpher; exîlassmosa] for him (for the redemption of their life is costly, and it faileth for ever.)." (The Eng. gives pîkîyôn for "reparation", the Gr. the price of the redemption of a soul.)"

No human power or skill, no forfeit in money or service or life can avail to ransom any soul from the doom entailed by sin. But in the same ps (ver 15) the triumphant hope is expressed that God will redeem [pādāḥ; lûtrā] my soul from the power of Sheol." In Job 33:24, "Deliver him from going down to the pit, I have found a ransome"; God is the speaker, and whatever may be the particular exegesis of the passage in its original application, it surely contains an anticipation of the gospel redemption. This Divine unction is explained in the light of Christ's utterance; it finds its realization through the cross: "I have found a ransome," for "the Son of Man" has given "his soul a ransom for many.;

This great utterance of the Saviour may well be considered as the germ of all the apostolic teaching concerning redemption, but it is 4. Apostolic not for us to show its unfolding beyond Teaching, not that in apostolic thought the redemption was always connected with the death, the sacrifice of Christ.

Thus Paul (Eph 1:7), "In whom we have our redemption through his blood," Thus Peter (1 Pet 1:18, 19), "Ye were redeemed not with corruptible things, such as silver or gold, but with precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, even the blood of Jesus Christ; through the eternal Spirit..." (Rev 5:9) the song is, "Thou wast slain, and didst purchase unto God with thy blood men of every tribe;" etc.
In all but the last of these passages there is an echo of the very word used by Christ, _aphora_ and _aphorism_, both being cognate with _lutoris_. In Tim 2 5-6 Paul has a still closer verbal coincidence when he says, "Christ _aphorism_ which he gave himself a ransom for all" (_aparturation_). The word used in the Apocalypse is _aphora_, to buy in the open market, and is frequently used of the redeeming work of Christ (Rev 5 9-10; 1 Cor 1 27). In the two places where Paul uses it he adds the means of purchase: "To were bought with a price," which from his point of view would be equivalent to ransom. In the passage in Gal 3 13; 4 5, Paul uses the compound word _aphoriphora_ which is equivalent to "re- deem, buy off, deliver by paying the price."

The question "Who receives the ransom?" is not directly raised in Scripture, but it is one that not unnaturally occurs to the mind, and theologians have answered it in various ways.

5. To Whom was the Ransom (1) Not to Satan.—The idea entertained by some of the Fathers (Irenaeus, Origen) that the ransom was given to Satan, who is conceived of as having through the sin of man a righteous claim upon him, which Christ recognizes and meets, is grotesque, and not in any way countenanced by Scripture. (2) To Divine justice.—But in repudiating it, there is no need to go so far as to deny that there is anything answering to a real redeeming transaction. All that we have said goes to show that, in no mere figure of speech, but in tremendous reality, Christ gave "his life a ransom," and if our mind demands an answer to the question to whom the ransom was given it does not seem possible for us to be able to think of the justice of God, or God in His character of Moral Governor, as requiring and receiving it. In all that Scripture asserts about propitiation, sacrifice, reconciliation in relation to the work of Christ, it is implied that there is at least a veiling of it, and it is implied that there is wrath to be averted, something to be appeased, or satisfied, and while it may be enough simply to think of the effects of Christ's redeeming work in setting us free from the penal claims of the Law—the just doom of sin—it does not seem going beyond the spirit of Scripture to draw the logical inference that the ransom price was paid to the Guardian of that holy law, the Administrator of eternal justice. "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us" (Gal 3 13). This essential, fundamental phase of redemption, that Christ, theologians, with good Scriptural warrant, have called redemption by blood, or by price, as distinguished from the practical outcome of the work of Christ in the life which is redemption by power.

(1) Redemption by price: As to Satan's claims, Christ by paying the ransom price, having secured the right to redeem, exercises His power on behalf of the believing sinner. He does not recognize the right of Satan. He is the "strong man" holding his captives lawfully, and Christ the "stronger than he" overcomes him and spoils him, and sets his captives free (Lk 11 21-22). In one sense men may be said to have sold themselves to Satan, but they had no right to sell, nor he to buy, and Christ ignores that transaction and brings "to _drown_ him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" (Heb 2 14), and so is able to "deliver all them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Heb 2 15).

(b) Redemption by power: Many of the OT passages about the redemption wrought on behalf of God's people illustrate this redemption by power, and the redemption by power is always founded on the redemption by price; the release follows the ransom. In the case of Israel, there was first the redemption of the sprinkled blood of the Paschal Lamb which sheltered from the destroying angel (Ex 12)—and then followed the redemption by power, when by strength of hand Jeh brought His people out from Egypt (Ex 13 14), and in His mercy led forth the people which He had redeemed (Ex 15 13). So under the gospel when "he hath visited and wrought redemption for his people" (Lk 1 68), He can "grant unto us that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies should serve him without fear" (Lk 1 74). It is because we have in Him our redemption through His blood that we can be delivered out of the "power of darkness" (Col 1 13, 14). See further, _REDEEMER_, _REDEMPTION_.

ARCHAEOLOGY.—M'CAG.

RAPE, räp. See CRIMES; PUNISHMENTS.

_The Rapha_, _Rapha_, _rāfa_ (Nf, _raphā_): (1) In RV these names are substituted for the "giant" in 1 Ch 20 4-6 and in 2 S 21 16.15.20.22. The latter passage states that the Philistines were slain by the raphād in Gath. The text is corrupt; _Raphah_ is probably an eponym. Originally the name of one of the Philis who was of the body "Raphaites" stood in the text. The plural of this word, or at least a plural of this stem, is _Raphaim_ (qv.).

(2) _Rapha_ (AV "Rapha"), a descendant of Saul (1 Ch 37). See _Raphael_.

_Horace_ J. _Wolfe_

RAFAEL, rā'aff-al, rā'aff-ēl (Nf, _raphā'ēl, from _raphā_ "él, "God has helped"; _Raphaël, Raphael_): The name of the angel who, as Azarias, guides Tobias to Ecbatana and _Raguel_ (qv.). The purpose of his mission is, in accordance with his name, to cure Tobit of blindness, and to deliver Sarah, the daughter of Raguel, from the power of the evil spirit Asmodeus (Tob 3 8; 12 15). Later, in addition, when he reveals himself (12 15), he declares that he is "one of the seven holy angels, which present the prayers of the saints, and go in before the glory of the Holy One." These seven angels are derived, according to some, from the seven Am-shapards (Amesh-shapetos) of Zoroastrianism (cf Rev 4 5). At the head of the elaborate angelology of the Enoch books there are "four presences," and Raphael is one of them (En 40 9; 54 6). In the first of these passages Raphael is theheader; in the second, he with Michael, Gabriel and Phanuel lead the wicked away to punishment. These four presences seem related to the four "living creatures" of Ezek (1 5) and of the Apocalypse (4 6). While in the general representation of Raphael's position in En, in 20 3 he is named among the angels who "watch," whose number according to the Gr text is seven. Raphael shared in the function assigned to the archangels, in the _Oracula Sibyllina_, of leading souls to the judgment seat of God (II, 215, Alexandre's text). He occupies a prominent place in Jewish mediaeval writings: he with Michael and Gabriel cured Abraham (Yoma 37n); according to the book _Zähir_, Raphael conveyed to Abraham a book containing 72 kinds of wisdom in 670 writings. The painters of the Renaissance frequently depicted Raphael.

_Raphaim_, rā'ā-īm, rā'ā-īm (B omit; N and A have "'Pa<|)ē|τēv", _Raphai|ēn_): An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8 1).

_Raphon_, rā'ōn (_Pa<|)ē|tōn_, _Raphö|ēn_): The place where in his campaign E. of Jordan Judas inflicted disastrous defeat on the host of Timotheus, the fugitives fleeing for refuge to the temple at Caraim (1 Macc 5 37f; _Ant_, XII, vili, 4). The same place is doubtless referred to by Pliny as "Raphana" (_NH_, v 16). It may possibly be represented by the modern _'Rafah_, on the E. of the pilgrimage road, about 47 miles N. of _Dar'āb_, and 11 miles N.E. of Tell el-'Ash'ary. It is a mile and a half N. of Wady Kanawat, which would thus be the "brook" mentioned in the narrative. It is perhaps far enough away from Carnaim, if this is rightly placed at Tell el-'Ash'ary.

W. Ewino

RAPHU, ῥαφός (rapāhō, "one healed"): The father of Palti, the spy selected from the tribe of Benjamin (Nu 13:9).

RASSES, ῥασῆς (from ῥασσέας, ῥασσές, A B, ῥασσές, ῥασσές; Vulg Tharsus; Oki Lat Thrasis et Rassus): The children of Rasses are mentioned with Put, Lud and the children of Ishmael as having been subdued by Holofernes (Jth 2:23).

Their identity is a matter of conjecture only. Some think Vulg Tharsus (σταυρός) is meant, others Rhesus (Ezk 38:13; 39:1), others Rhodes, a mountain range and city s. from Anamur, on the Gulf of Issus. Most probably a district, not a town, is named, situated in the eastern part of Asia Minor.

S. F. Hunter

RATHUMUS, ῥαθυμός (Ῥαθύμος, ῥαθυμός): One of those who joined in writing a letter to protest against Artaxerxes against the Jews (1 Esd 2:16 ff.). In 2:17 he is styled "story-writer," RV

Ra'v'n (ra'v'n, ῥάβν; κόρας, κόρας; Lat Corvus corax): A large family of the smaller birds of prey belonging to the genus Corvus corax. A bird of such universal distribution that it is known from Iceland to Japan, all over Asia, Europe and Africa, but almost extinct and not of general distribution in our own country. In no land is it more numerous than in Pal. In general appearance it resembles the crow, but is much larger, being almost two feet long, of a glossy black, with whiskers around the beak, and rather stiff-pointed neck feathers. A bird exhibiting as much intelligence as any, and of a saucy, impudent disposition, it has been an object of interest from the beginning. It has been able to speak sentences of a few words when carefully taught, and by its uncanny acts has made itself a bird surrounded by superstition, myth, fable, and is connected with the religious rites of many nations. It is partially a carrion feeder, if offal or bodies are fresh; it also eats the young of other birds and very small animals and seeds, berries and fruit, having as varied a diet as any bird. It is noisy, with a loud, rough, emphatic cry, and its young are clamorous at feeding time.

Aristotle wrote that ravens drove their young from their location and forced them to care for themselves from the time they left the nest. This is also the usual habitat. Bird habits and characteristics change only with slow ages of evolution. Our ravens of today are, to all intents, the same birds as those of Pal in the time of Moses, and ours follow the young afield for several days and feed them until the summer. Happening to see a raven, record him that in time of drought a raven found a bucket containing a little water beside a sepulcher and raised it to drinking level by drooping its wings.

Pal has at least 8 different species of ravens. This bird was the first sent out by Noah in an effort to discover if the flood were abating (Gen 6:8–9). Because it partially fed on carrion it was included among the abominations (see Lev 11:15; Dt 14:14). On 1 K 17 4–6, see Elisha and the present writer's Birds of the Bible, 401–5. Among the marvels of creation and providence inJob 38:41, we have this mention of the raven,

"Who provideth for the raven his prey, / When his young ones every one cry. / And wander for lack of food?"

The answer to this question is in Ps 147:9:

"He giveth to the beast his food, / And to the young ravens which cry."

Both these quotations point out the fact that the young are peculiarly noisy. In Prov 30:17 it is indicated that the ravens, as well as eagles, vultures and hawks, found the eye of prey the vulnerable point, and so attacked it first. The Heb 'ērebh means "black," and for this reason was applied to the raven, so the reference to the locks of the bridegroom in the Song of Solomon becomes clear (Cant 8:11). The raven is one of the birds indicated to prey upon the ruins of Edom (Isa 34:11). The last reference is found in Lk 12:24: "Consider the ravens, that they sow not, neither reap; which have no store-chamber nor barn; and God feedeth them. This could have been said of any wild bird with equal truth."

RAVEN, rav'n, RAVIN, ray'in: "Raven" (vb.) is from "rapine," "violent plundering," used for τῆς ἀράφης, tēs āraphēs, in Gen 49:27; Ps 22:13; Ezek 22:5–21, while "ravin" (noun) is the object ravened, in Nah 2:12 the two terrorizing carcases (ῥαβδίως, ῥαβδίως). So a "ravenous" bird (Isa 46:11; Ezek 39:4) is a bird of prey (not a "hungry bird"), ὄραφας, ὄραφα, "afright, lit. a screacher." "Ravenous beast" in Isa 36:9 is for ῥαβδίως, ῥαβδίως, "violent one." In the NT ἀπατοῦν, ἀπατοῦσα, ἀπατοῦσα, is tr. "ravining" in Mt 7:15, while for the cognate ἀπατάω, ἀπαταπάω (Lk 11:38), AV gives "ravining," RV "extortion."
READING, red'ing (םְרֵד, mikrd; מִשְׁרֵד, anqypravo, andgnbôsâ): As a noun occurs once in the OT (Neh 8 8) and 3 t. in the NT (Acts 13 15; 2 Cor 3 14; 1 Tim 4 13), each time with reference to the public reading of the Divine Law. The vb. "to read" (םְרֵד, kdrî; מִשְׁרֵד, anqypwv, anqypodô) occurs frequently both in the OT and in the NT: (1) often in the sense of reading aloud to others, esp. of the public reading of God's Law or of prophecy, as by Moses (Ex 24 7), Ezra (Neh 8 3.18), Jesus in the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk 4 16), of the regular reading of the Law and the Prophets in the synagogues (Acts 13 27; 16 21), and of the reading of apostolic ep. in the Christian church (Col 4 16; 1 Thess 5 27); (2) also in the sense of reading to one's self, whether the Divine word in Law or prophecy (Dt 17 19; Acts 8 28-30, etc), or such things as private letters (2 Ki 5 7; 19 14; Acts 23 34, etc).

D. MIALL EDWARDS

READY, red'i (םָרָד, mâhr): Occurs twice in the sense of apt, skilful (Ex 7 6; Ps 45 1). RV gives "ready" for "fit" (Ex 24 27), for "asketh" (Mic 7 15), for "prepared" (Mt 14 13), for "not negligent" (2 Pet 1 12).

REIAH, râ-a'ya, râ-'a (םַרְיאָה), r'â'ah, "Jeh has seen": LXX B, Pedé, Rekkd, A, Ped, Rheid; the name of a Calebite family (1 Ch 4 2). The word "Reiah" should probably be substituted for "Haroeh" in 1 Ch 2 52, but both forms may be corruptions.

(2) A Reubenite (1 Ch 5 5, AV "Reuia"). See Jos. 13 4.

(3) The family name of a company of Nethinim (Ezr 2 47; Neh 7 50 = 1 Esd 5 31).

REAPING, râ'pîng (מָסָרְפ, ָפַסָר תְּעִיזָה), theriaï): Reaping in ancient times, as at present, consisted in either pulling up by the roots or cutting it with a sickle (see Sickle), and then binding the stalks into bundles to be carried to the threshing-floor. If the Egypt sculptures are true to life, reaping was sometimes divided into two operations, the heads of grain and the stalks being reaped separately. In Pal and Syria both pulling and cutting are still practised, the former when the ground is stony and the sparc scarce. Even where the sickle is used, much of the grain comes up by the roots, owing to the toughness of the drum stalks or the dullness of the sickle. The reaper sometimes wears pieces of cane on the fingers of the hand which gathers the grain in order to protect them from injury by the sharp grasses or the sickle. There were definite laws established by the Hebrews in regard to reaping (Lev 19 9; 23 10; 25 5.11; Dt 16 9). Samuel mentions the task of reaping the harvest as one of the requirements which would be made by the king for whom the people were clomarng (1 S 8 12).

Futurative: The certainty of the consequences of good and evil doing were often typified by the sowing and the reaping of harvests (Job 4 8; Prov 22 8; Hos 8 7; 10 12.13; 2 Cor 9 6; Gal 6 7.8). "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy" is found in the liberated captives' song (Ps 126 5). "He that regardeth the clouds shall not reap," i.e. a lack of faith in God's care will be punished (Ecc 11 4); cf also the lesson of trust drawn from the birds (Mt 6 26; Lk 12 24). Sowing and not reaping the harvest is mentioned as a punishment for disobedience (Job 31 8; Jer 12 13; Mt 24 36; Lk 17 18). Reaping where he sowed not, showed the injustice of the landlord (Mt 25 26), as did also the withholding of the reapers' wages (Jas 5 4). In God's Kingdom there is a division of labor: "He that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together" (Jn 4 36-38). In John's vision he saw an angel reap the earth (Re 14 15.16). See AGRICULTURE; GLEANING. JAMES A. PATCH

REARWARD, râr'word (םַרְאָה), 'qaaph, "to gather," Nu 10 25; Josh 6 9 (AVm "gathering host"); Isa 52 12). See ARMY; DAN, TRIBE OF; WAR, 3.

REASON, râz'n, REASONABLE, râz't-n-b'l, REASONING, râz'n-ing (םָרֵאָן, yâkhôkh, etc); kâvâ, báshô, 'bâshô, 'bâshôh, 'bâshôh, 'bâshôh, 'bâshôh; 'bâshôh (American "principal"). "Reason," with related terms, has a diversity of meanings, representing a large number of Heb and Gr words and phrases. In the sense of "cause" or "occasion" it stands in 1 K 9 15 for dôbhar, "a word" (RVM "accompanying"). In cases renderes propositional forms as "from," "with," "because of," "for the sake of," etc. (as the ground or argument for anything, it is the tr of ta'am (Prov 26 16, RVM "answers discreetly"), of yâkhôh, as in Isa 1 18, "Come now, and let us reason together" (cf Job 13 3; 15 3); in 1 S 12 7, the word is šâbhoš, RV "that I may plead," etc. The principal Gr words for "reason," "reasoning," are those given above. The Christian believer is ready to give a reason (logos) for the hope within him (1 Pet 3 15 AV). "Reason" as a human faculty or in the abstract sense appears in Apoc in Wis 17 12 (logismôs); Ecclus 37 16, "Let reason [logos] go before every enterprise," RV "be the beginning of every work." In Acts 18 14, "reason would" is lit. kâvâhôn, "according to reason"; in Rom 12 1, for "reasonable [logikos] service," RV has "spiritual," and in m in "Gr belonging to the reason." In RV "reason," etc occurs much oftener than in AV (cf Lev 17 11; Dt 28 47; Jgs 5 22; Job 20 23; 27 3; etc; Lk 3 15; 12 17; Acts 17 17, etc).

REBA, râ'bah (םַרְבָּה), rebha, "fourth part"; LXX B, PoBe, Rhôbe, A, PôBe, Rôhek). One of the five chieftains of Midian who were slain by the Israelites, under Moses (Nu 31 8; Josh 13 21). Like his comrades, he is termed a "king" in Nu, but a "chief" or "prince" in Josh.

REBEKAH, râbã'kha (םַרְבָּקה), râb'hâkh; LXX and NT Pôrâbôcia, Rôhekba, etc), the usual Eng. spelling Rebecca): Daughter of Bethuel and an unknown mother, granddaughter of Nahor and Milcah, sister of Laban, wifc of Isaac, mother of Esau and Jacob.

Her name is usually explained from the Arab, ַרְבָּךַו, rabkat, "a tie-rope for animals," or rather, "a noose" in such a rope: its application would then by figure suggest the beauty (q.) of her that beareth it, by means of which men are snared or bound. The root is found in Heb only in the noun meaning "hitching-place," as "stall," in the familiar phrase of the rambled calf. The word is used in view of the meaning of such names as Rachel and Leah, as if He that conceptually figurative, like ַרְבָּkah, ַרְבָּקה, ַרְבָּקה, ַרְבָּקה, ַרְבָּקה, ַרְבָּקה, ַרְבָּקה, ַרְבָּקה, ַרְבָּkah, "a tied-up calf" or "a lamb," one therefore peculiarly choice and fat.

Rebekah is first mentioned in the genealogy of the descendants of Nahor, brother of Abraham (Gen 22 20–24). In fact, the family is there carried down just so far as is necessary in order to introduce this woman, for subsequent the reference and rôle the genealogy is obviously intended as a preparation. All this branch of the family of Terah had remained in Aram when Abraham and Lot had migrated to Canaan, and it is at Haran, "the city of Nomad", that we first meet Rechabah, when in ch 24 she is made known to Abraham's servant at the well before the gate.

That idyllic narrative of the finding of a bride for Isaac is too familiar to need rehearsal and too simple to require comment. Besides, the substance of what is told about the career of Rechabah is treated in connection with the sketches of the other actors in the same scenes. Yet we note from the beginning the maiden's decision of character, which appears in every line of the narrative, and prepares the reader to find in subsequent chapters the positive, ambitious and energetic woman that she there shows herself.

Though the object of her husband's love (Gen 24 67), Rechabah bore him no children for 20 years (Gen 25 20). But when Sarah, she too was barren, it was only after that score of years and after the special intercession of Isaac that God at length granted her twin sons. "The purpose of God according to election," as Paul expresses the matter in Rom 9 13, "was the cause of that strange oracle to the wondering, inquiring parents, 'The elder shall serve the younger'" (Gen 25 23).

Whether because of this oracle or for some other reason, it was that younger son, Jacob, who became the object of his mother's special love (Gen 25 28). She it was who led him into the deception practised upon Isaac (Gen 27 5–17), and she it was who devised the plan for extirpating Jacob from the dangerous situation into which that deception had brought him (vv 42–46). When the absence of Jacob from home became essential to his personal safety, Rechabah proposed her own relations in Aram as the goal of his journey, and gave as motive the desirability of Jacob's marrying from among her kindred. Probably she did not realize that in sending her favorite son away on this journey she was sending him away from her forever. Yet such seems to have been the case. Though younger than Isaac, who was still living at an advanced age when Jacob returned to Canaan a quarter of a century later, Rechabah had given birth to the line which we learn definitely only this, that she was buried in the cave of Machpelah near Hebron (Gen 49 31).

Outside of Gen, Rechabah is alluded to in Scripture only in the passage from Rom (9 10–12) already cited. Her significance there is simply that of the wife of Isaac and the mother of two sons of such different character and destiny as Esau and Jacob. And her significance in Gen, apart from this, lies in her contribution to the family of Abraham of a pure strain from the eastern stock, thus transmitting to the founders of Israel both an unmixed lineage and that tradition of separateness from Can, and other non-Heb elements which has proved the greatest factor in the ethnological marvel of the ages, the persistence of the Heb people. J. OSCAR BOYD

REBUKE, re-buk': As a vb. "rebuke" is in the OT the tr of διώκω, délêkô, in RV "correction": another word, ῥίπτω, in Neh 5 7, is in RV tr "contended with." Rechabite, son (Gen 25 20), whose subsequent the reference and rôle the genealogy is obviously intended as a preparation.

RECEIPT, re-sët', of Custom. See Custom.

RECEIVER, re-së-vër': Found in AV (Isa 33 18); but RV substitutes "thee that weighed the tribute." The Heb is skôd, which means "one who weighs," a "weigher."

RECHAB, re-kâb, RECHABITES, rek'a-bits (רֶכָּב, rekâb, רֶכְּבָה, rekkbâm): Rechab is the name of two of men of some prominence in the OT records:

1. (A Benjamite of the town of Beeroth, son of Rimmon (2 S 4 2); and he and his brother Baanah were "captains" of the military host of Ish-bosheth. On the death of Abner (2 S 3 30) the two brothers treacherously entered Ish-bosheth's house, and, at the hour when he was resting and helpless, beheaded him, and escaped with the head to David at Hebron (4 6–8). They expected to receive reward and honor from David for the foul deed, which left him without a rival for the throne of all Israel. But the just and noble-minded king ordered their immediate execution (4 9–12), as in the case of the Amalekite, who asserted that he had killed Saul (2 S 1). For some reason the Beerothites left their old town and fled to Gittaim, another town in Benjamin, where they were still living when the Books of S were written (2 S 4 3).

2. (The more prominent of the men bearing this name was a KENITE (q.v.), a descendant of Hamath (1 Ch 2 5–6). In NT the name is also granted to the Christian church (Rev 2 17). Rechab was the ancestor or founder of a family, or order, in Israel known as the Rechabites, who at various times were conspicuous in the religious life of the nation. The most notable member of this family was Jehonadab (2 K 10 15 ff.25), as one who maintained against the ever-increasing tendencies of sensuality, and as a covenant of fidelity to Jeh, to whom they wholly devoted themselves when they joined themselves to Israel. Jeremiah used the Rechabites, who had been driven into exile by Nebuchadnezzar's invasions of the land, as an object-lesson to covetantbreaking Jeush. The Rechabites, hungry and thirsty, refused wine when it was set before them, because of the command of their ancestor Jonadab (Jer 35:8–10). In Jer 35:19, Judah refused to heed Jeh's commands or to keep His covenant (vs 14–15).

If the Rechab of Neh 3:14 is the same as this Kenite, then his descendant Malchiah, who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem, may have abandoned the vow of his ancestors, for he was "ruler of the district of Beth-haccerem" (i.e. "house of the vineyard").

(3) Gal 1:23, the compound). The word "reconcile" has a double meaning and usage, and the context must in each case determine how it is to be taken. The great doctrine is the reconciliation of God and men, but the question to be decided is whether it is God who is reconciled to men, or men who are reconciled to God, and different schools of theology emphasize one side or the other. The true view embraces both aspects. The word "to reconcile" means literally to exchange, to bring into a changed relationship. Some maintain that it only is the party in the sinner that is intended, a laying aside of his enmity, and coming into peaceful relations with God. But that manifestly does not exhaust the meaning, nor is it in the great Pauline passages the primary and dominant meaning. The meaning is not limited to the idea of securing or renewing friendship; it is more comprehensive. It comprehends the entire work of the cross, the substitution of Christ for the sinner, the satisfaction of the law, the propitiation of God on account of his people. The idea of relationship is but the result of the work of Christ. The central idea is the appeal of Christ to the Father, the acceptance of Christ by the Father, and the consequent acknowledgment of the Father of the Son, in whom He sees the righteousness of God accomplished. The cross is the means by which man is restored to God. This is a reconciliation in the broadest and widest sense, and this is the meaning of "reconciliation" in Christ's prayer, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." (Acts 1:22).

(2) The OT usage does not materially help in the elucidation of the NT terms, for though the word occurs in a number of passages in AV, it is in RV generally changed to "atonement," which more accurately represents the Heb kābār, which is generally rendered by "atonement," and by ἀφιλακτονοι or ἀφιλακτωσις in the Gr. (In one passage of the NT [He 2:17], the phrase "to make reconciliation" represents the Gr kathalassomai, and is better rendered in RV by "to make propitiation.") The making atonement or propitiation is the basis of the reconciliation, the means of its accomplishment, and the fact that the translators of AV sometimes rendered kābār by "reconcile" shows that they understood reconciliation to have the Godward aspect. Whatever may be said of the nature of the atonement or propitiation in the old dispensation, it was something contemplated as appeasing or satisfying, or at least in some way affecting God so as to make Him willing, or render it possible for Him to enter into a new relationship with men. In one passage in the OT where "reconciliation" occurs (2 Ch 29:21) it represents a different Heb word, but here RV has changed it into "sin-offering," which is in harmony with the general meaning and usage of the Heb.

(3) Special passage in 1 Sam 15:29–30.—There is yet another Heb word rendered "reconcile." In 1 Sam 24, and inasmuch as this passage in the LXX has as the equivalent of the Heb word diallassō, it seems probable that this is the word used in guiding to the NT meaning. On one occasion when the Philistines gathered together to battle against Israel, David and his men went out in the mist to Gath to the muster-place. "The princesses of the Philistines" did not at all speak to the present case. David, and although Achish testified in favor of David's fidelity, they were very indignant, and demanded that David and his men should go back. "Let not an adversary or a foe be an adversary or a foe to you: for wherewith should this fellow reconcile himself to his lord? should it not be with the heads of these men?" The Heb is rēkhā, which means "to be pleased with" or "to accept favorably and the Hiphil form here used is used to make men pleasing or acceptable," "to reconcile himself." But assuredly the Philistines' idea of David reconciling himself to his lord was not that he should lay aside his enmity against Saul, and so become friends with him. The enmity was on Saul's side, and the thought of the princes was that David by turning against them in the battle would gratify Saul, and lead him to lay aside his enmity against David.

(4) Usage in the Apocalypse.—It may be noted that in 2 Macc 5:18 God is said to "reconcile" the Jews with the Godward side: "And the place which was forsaken in the wrath of the Lord was, at the end of the days of great Sovereign, restored again with all glory." The vb. occurs in 2 Macc 5:15 when again the Godward side seems intending to do great harm not only to God, but to God ... be reconciled to your supplications, and be reconciled with you." But in the context, "being of the grace and I will reconcile you and to you in 7:33: "If for rebuke and changing our living Lord has been angered a little while, yet shall he again be reconciled with his own servants, and in 8:9: "They have sought the mean for the Lord to be wholly reconciled with his servants." In these two esp. in the last, it is undeniably the laying aside of the Divine displeasure that is meant.

Before passing on to look at the great utterances in the Epp., we may look at the passages referred to at the beginning. There is, indeed, another non-doctrinal instance in 1 Cor 7:11, where the same event is brought back by the husband. But the whole statement shows that it is not a question of the one who is offering the gift laying aside his enmity against his brother, but the reverse. If therefore thou art offering thy gift at the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath a grudge against thee, —the brother was the offended one, he is the one to be brought round, and not he who gives the gift. This is not, then, to be regarded as a general rule for the whole passage, but it is, at least, a beautiful application of the principle of reconciliation in a passage where it is least expected.

2. Non-doctrinal Passage

(1) Rom 5:5—Turning now to Rom 5:5, how stands the matter? Paul has been speaking of the blessed results of justification; one of these is love in the death of Christ, a love that was displayed to the ungodly, having no righteousness. Then the richest sin and unloving state we were embraced by the love of God, a fortiori that love will not be less now that it has already begun to take effect. If He loved us when we were under His condemnation sufficient to give Himself to die for us, much more shall His love bestow upon us the blessings secured by that death. "Much more then, being now justified by his blood, shall we be saved from the wrath of God through him" (Rom 5:9).

(a) The fact of Divine wrath: It is well to note, then, that the word is 'varied' in meaning in the Hebrew text. 3. Doctrinal results is the shedding abroad of the love of God in the heart. Then he dwells upon the manifestation of that love in the death of Christ, a love that was displayed to the ungodly, having no righteousness. Then the richest sin and unloving state we were embraced by the love of God, a fortiori that love will not be less now that it has already begun to take effect. If He loved us when we were under His condemnation sufficient to give Himself to die for us, much more shall His love bestow upon us the blessings secured by that death. "Much more then, being now justified by his blood, shall we be saved from the wrath of God through him" (Rom 5:9).

is reconciled from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." (18) And, the coming day of judgment is the 'the day of the judgment of God' (95). And because of this stern fact, the gospel is a revelation not only of love, but specifically "a righteousness of God" (18). And he shows that the essence of the gospel is found in the propitiatory death of the Lord Jesus Christ (24.25.26), through whom alone can men who have been "brought under the judgment of God" (19) find justification, salvation, deliverance from the wrath of God (4.25; 5-6). Christ, the perfect propitiator, is the means by which the wrath of God is not to be thought of as having any unworthy or capricious element in it—it is the settled opposition of His holy nature against sin.

(b) Reconciliation, Godward, as well as manward: The apostle proceeds (ver 10): "For if, while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of His Son, much more, being reconciled, shall we be saved by His life." Now if, as many maintain, it is only the reconciliation on the manward side that is meant, that the manifested love led to the sinner laying aside his enmity, it would entirely reverse the apostle's argument. He is not arguing that if we have begun to love God we may reckon upon His doing so and for so us, but that He has done so, we may expect Him to do more. The verse is parallel to the preceding, and the being reconciled is on the same plane as being justified; the being justified was God's action, and so is the reconciling. Justification is a declaration of the favor of God; reconciliation takes effect upon enemies.

(c) The meaning of the word "enemies": The word "enemies" is important. By those who take the manward aspect of reconciliation as the only one, it is held that the word must be taken actively—those who hate God. But the passive meaning, "hated of God," seems far preferable, and is indeed demanded by the context. Paul uses the vb. eichthriō, "enemies," in Rom 11.28, in antithesis to "beloved of God," and that is the consistent sense here. The enemies are those who are the objects of the wrath of the previous verse. And when we were thus hated of God, the objects of His just displeasure on account of our sin, "we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son." God laid aside His enmity, and in the propitiatory death of Christ showed Himself willing to receive us into His favor.

(d) The manward side: By this propitiation, therefore, the barrier was removed, and God having assumed a gracious attitude toward the sinner, it is possible for the sinner now, influenced by His love, to come into a friendly relationship with God. And so in the second phrase, the two meanings, the Godward and the manward, may coalesce: "being reconciled, we shall be saved by His life." The reconciliation becomes mutual, for there is no kind of doubt that sinners are enemies to God in the active sense, and require to lay aside their hostility, and so be reconciled to Him. But the first step is with God, and the reconciliation which took place in the death of His Son could only be the Godward reconciliation, since at that time men were still uninfluenced by His love. But, perhaps, just because that first reconciliation is brought about through the Divine transaction, the manward aspect avoids saying "God is reconciled," but uses the more indirect form of speech. The manward aspect is emphasized in the next verse, although the Godward is not lost sight of: "We also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, who there have now received the reconciliation" (6.11). It is therefore something that comes from God and does not proceed from man. God is the first mover; He makes the reconciliation as already indicated, and then the fruit of it is imputed to faith. The fact that our receiving the reconciliation, or being brought into a state of reconciliation, follows the being reconciled of ver 10, shows that the other is Divine reconciliation as the basis of the human.

(2) 2 Cor 5.18-20: The Godward aspect primary: In the same way the great passage in 2 Cor 5.18-20 cannot be understood apart from the conception that there is a reconciliation on the Divine side. There is unquestionably reference to the human as next, but the warning is that the Godward aspect is primary and dominating: "All things are of God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ, and gave unto us the ministry of reconciliation. It might be possible to argue from AV that this describes the process going on under gospel influences, men being brought into gracious relations with God, but the arorist of the Gr rightly rendered by RV, "who reconciled us to himself," points back to the historic time when the transaction took place. It cannot be simply the surrender of the sinner to God that is meant, though that comes as a consequence; it is a work that proceeds from God, is accomplished by God, and because of the accomplishment of that work it is possible of God's ministry. As a result of this, we are intrusted to men. To make this mean the human aspect of the reconciliation, it would be necessary unduly to confine it to the reconciliation of Paul and his fellow-workers, though even then it would be a strained language, to translate the historic act described, "and gave unto us the ministry of reconciliation." The plain meaning is that through Jesus Christ, God established the basis of agreement, removed the barrier to the sinner's approach to Himself, accomplished the work of propitiation, and, having done so, He intrusts His servants with the ministry of reconciliation, a ministry which, basing itself upon the great propitiatory, reconciling work of Christ, is directed toward men, seeking to remove their enmity, to influence them in their turn to be reconciled with God. This is more clearly set forth in the verse which follows, which in explaining the ministry of reconciliation says: "To wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world to Himself, accomplished the work of propitiation, and, having done so, He intrusts His servants with the ministry of reconciliation." Here there can be no question that the historic Incarnation is meant, and the reconciling of the world can be nothing other than the objective work of atonement culminating in the cross. And in that transaction there can be no thought of the sinner laying aside his hostility to God; it is God in Christ so dealing with sin that the doom lying upon the guilty is canceled, the wrath is averted, propitiation is made.

(5) The manward side also prominent: God, in a word, enters into gracious relations with a world of sinners, becomes reconciled to man. This being done, gracious influences can be brought to bear upon man, the chief of which is the consideration of this stupendous fact of grace, that God has in Christ dealt with the sin of man. This is the substance of the "word of reconciliation" which is preached by the apostle. So he continues, "We are ambassadors therefore on behalf of Christ, as though God were entreating by us: we beseech you on behalf of Christ, be reconciled to God." Here is the human side. The great matter now is to get the sinner to lay aside his enmity, to respond to the gracious overtures of the gospel, to come into harmony with God. But that is only possible because the propitiation in the historic transaction has already been accomplished. If the first reconciliation, "the reconciliation of the world unto himself," had been the laying aside of human encyclopedia, there could now be point in the exhortation to "Be reconciled to God."

(3) Eph 2 16.—The two passages where the compound word occurs are in complete harmony with this interpretation. Eph 2 16: "And might reconcile them both [Jew and Gentile] in one body unto God through the cross, having slain the enmity thereby," is the outcome of Christ 'making peace' (2 15), and the reconciling work is effected through the cross, reconciliation both Godward and manward, and, having made peace, it is possible for Christ to come and preach peace to them that are far off through the reconciling work of the cross has been accomplished.

(4) Col 1 20–22.—So in Col 1 20, "And through him to reconcile all things unto himself, having made peace through the blood of his cross; through him, I say, whether things upon the earth, or things in the heavens." Here the thought of the apostle trembles away into infinity, and there seems a parallel to the thought of He 9 23, that according to the typical teaching even "the things in the heavens" in some way stood in need of cleansing. May it be, that the work of Christ in some sense affected the angelic intelligences, making it possible for harmony to be restored between redeemed sinners and the perfect creation of God? In any case, the reconciling all things unto Himself is not the last paragraph crucially of the Westminster, but the determining of the Divine attitude. Then comes the specific reference to the human side, "And you, being in time past alienated and enemies in your mind in your evil works, yet now hath he reconciled in the body of his flesh through death there, as in Rom, the two phases coalescing, God appearing gracious through the work of Christ, sinners coming into gracious relation with Him. "Having made peace through the blood of his cross," the ground of peace has been established. Christ has done something by His death which makes it possible to offer peace to men. God has laid aside His holy opposition to the sinner, and shows Himself willing to bring men into peace with Himself. He has found satisfaction in that great work of His Son, has been reconciled, and now calls upon men to be reconciled to Him—to receive the reconciliation. See Atonement; Propitiation; Wrath.

Until in recent times it was discovered that the Gulf of Suez formerly extended 30 miles northward to the site of the present Ismailia and the ancient Pitom, the course of the Biblical Israelites was known only by the east wind mentioned in Scripture (Ex 14 21) to have opened a passage-way sufficiently wide to have permitted the host to have crossed over in a single night. The bar leading from Suez across, which is now a shoal, is 100 fathoms deep. An attempt to have furnished a passage-way as Robinson supposed (BR 1, 56–59). Besides, if the children of Israel were S. of the Bitter Lakes when there was no extension of the Gulf N. of its present limits, with swamps, and the top of simple clay without open stubble to hold the brick together (see Naville, "The Store-City Pitom and the Route of the Exodus," Egypt Exploration Fund, 1885; M. G. Kyle, "A Redetermination of Naville’s Works," Records of the Past, VIII, 1901, 304–7). The next day’s journey brought them to Suez, a station probably identical with Thath, close upon border line separating Egypt from Asia. Through the discoveries of Naville in 1883 this has been identified as Pitom, one of the store-cities built by Pharaoh in the Nile Delta during the time of Joseph, and the site of which was about 7 miles S. of the modern Suez (Ex 1 11). Here Naville uncovered vast store pits for holding grain, and the works which were constructed according to the description given in Ex 1: the lower portions of brick made with straw, the middle with mud, and the top of simple clay without open stubble to hold the brick together (see Naville, "The Store-City Pitom and the Route of the Exodus," Egypt Exploration Fund, 1885; M. G. Kyle, "A Redetermination of Naville’s Works," Records of the Past, VIII, 1901, 304–7). At this change of course Pharaoh was delighted, seeing that the children of Israel were "entangled in the land" and "the wilderness" had "shut them in" instead of issuing a flank movement upon them, Pharaoh’s army now followed them in the rear and overtook them, Pharaoh being on the sea beside Bithah-irbit, the location of which is essential to a proper understanding of this passage.

called Tiasr at E. of Lake Timnah, where there is a shrine at the present day, visited every year about July 14 by thousands of pilgrims to celebrate a religious festival; how Jerusalem existed were seeming reason to connect it with any sanctuary of the Canaanites. Dawson favors the general location which we have assigned to Pithom, but would place it beside the narrow southern portion of the Bitter Lakes.

Somewhere in this vicinity would be a most natural place for the children of Israel to halt, and there is no difficulty, such as Naville supposes, to their passing between Jebel Genefeh and the Bitter Lakes. The contour is low, and does not slope abruptly to the lake, but leaves ample space for the passage of a caravan, while the mountain on one side and the lake on the other would protect them from a flank movement by Pharaoh and limit his army to harassing the rear of the Israelite host. Protected thus, the Israelites found a wide plain over which they could spread their camp, and if we suppose them to be as far s. as Cheloof, every condition would be found to suit the narrative which follows. Moses was told by the Lord that in the third day of the children of Israel after they had passed through the Red Sea, the waters would be divided and the children of Israel could cross over on dry ground. And when, in compliance with the Divine command, Moses stretched out his hand over the sea, “Jehovah hearkened and did what was right with the sea all the night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided. And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground: and the waters were a wall unto them on this right hand, and on that left hand.” And the Egyptians pursued, and went in after them into the midst of the sea, all Pharaoh’s horses, his chariots, and his horsemen” (Ex 14:21–30). But when the children of Israel were safely on the other side the waves returned and overwhelmed the entire host of Pharaoh. In the Song of Moses which follows, describing the event, it is said that the waters were piled up by the “blast of thy [God’s] nostrils” (Ex 15:8), and again ver 10, “Thou didst blow with thy wind, the sea covered them.” Thus the wind is mentioned as the means employed by God in opening the water. The competency of the wind temporarily to remove the water from the passage connecting the Gulf of Suez with the Bitter Lakes is clearly shown by the fact that it was only a wind of the sea, which is hourly and daily seen to rise in great force, and sometimes to be driven for miles inland. This effect is well illustrated by the following story of Captain Tucker, of the British army (Proc. Victoria Inst., XXVIII, 267–80) reports having witnessed the driving off of the water from Lake Marsehal by the wind, to such an extent as to lower the level 6 ft., thus leaving small vessels over the shallow water stranded for a while in the muddy bottom. According to the report of the Suez Canal Co., the difference between the highest and the lowest water at Suez is 10 ft. 7 in., all of which must be due to the effect of the wind, since the tides do not affect the Red Sea. The power of the wind to affect water levels is strikingly witnessed upon Lake Erie in the United States, where according to the report of the Deep Waterways Commission for 1896 (165, 168) it appears that strong wind from the S.W. sometimes lowers the water at Toledo, Ohio, on the western end of the lake to the extent of more than 7 ft., at the same time causing it to rise at Buffalo at the eastern end a similar amount; while the same wind and the wind during the time of a single storm reverses the effect, thus sometimes producing a change of level at either end of the lake of 14 ft., in the course of a single day. It would require far less than a tornado to lower the water at Cheloof to a level 10 ft. below normal, which is the level on which we have supposed at that time to separate Egypt from the Sinaitic Peninsula. See Exodus, the.

Several objections to this theory, however, have been urged which should not pass without notice.

1. Some have said that the children of Israel would have found an insuperable obstacle to their advance in the steep banks on either side of the supposed channel. But there were no steep banks to be encountered. A gentle slope to the center of the depression and a correspondingly gentle rise leads up on the other.

2. Much has also been made of the statement (Ex 14:22) that “the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left hand.” Consider the rhetorical use of this word “wall” it presents no difficulty. In Prov 18:11 we are told that “The rich man’s wealth is his strong city, And as a high wall in his own imagination.” In Isa 26:1 we are told that God will appoint salvation “for walls and bulwarks.” Again Nahum (3:8) says of Egypt that her “rampart was the sea [in “the Nile”), and her wall was of the sea.” The water upon either side of the opening served the purpose of a wall for protection. There was no existence for the idea of a wall by a actual movement. Nor is there need of paying further attention to the poetical expressions in the Song of Moses, where among other things it is said “that the deeps were congealed in the heart of the sea,” and “the waters stood up as a heap.” (“the deeps were congealed in the heart of the sea, and the waters stood up as a heap.”) (3) Again it is objected that an east wind does not come from the right direction to produce the desired result. On the other hand it is an east wind only which could have freed the channel from water. A north wind would have blown the water from the Bitter Lakes southward, and owing to the quantity of water impounded would have increased the depth of the water in the narrow passage from the southern end of Suez. An east wind, however, would have pressed the water out from the channel both ways, and from the contour of the shore lines would be the only wind that could have done so. (4) Again, it is objected that this explanation destroys the miraculous character of the event. But it should be noted that little is said in the narrative about the miraculous. On the other hand, it is a straightforward statement of events, leaving their miraculous character to be inferred from their nature. On the explanation we have adopted we have to do with a phenomenon that calls a mediate miracle, that is, a miracle in which the hand of God is seen in the use of natural forces which it would be impossible for man to command. If anyone should say that this was a mere coincidental thing and that the east wind was at no other time that Moses reached the place of crossing, the answer is that such a coincidence could have been brought about only by supernatural agency. There was at that time no weather bureau to forecast the approach of a storm. There are no takes on the Red Sea with respect to ebb and flow. It was by a miracle of prophecy that Moses was emboldened to get his host into position to avail themselves of the temporary opportunity at exactly the right time. As to the relation of the Divine agency to the event, speculation is useless. The opening of the sea may have been a foreordained event in the course of Nature which God only foreknew, in which case the direct Divine agency was limited to those influences upon the human actors that led them to believe themselves where they could take advantage of the natural opportunity. Or, there is no a priori difficulty in supposing that the east wind was directly aroused for this occasion; for man himself produces disturbances among the forces of Nature which are as insuperable as any other. The east wind is a storm produced by direct Divine agency. But in this case the disturbance is at once seen to be beyond the powers of human agency to produce.
It remains to add an important word concerning the evidential value of this perfect adjustment of the narrative to the physical conditions involved. So perfect is this conformity of the narrative to the obscure physical conditions involved, which only recent investigations have made clear, that the account becomes self-verifying. There is not much need to invent a story so perfectly in accordance with the vast and complicated conditions involved. The argument is as strong as that for human design when a key is found to fit a Yale lock. This is not a general account which would fit into a variety of circumstances. It is not only one place in all the world, and one set of conditions in all history, which would meet the requirements; and here they are all met. This is scientific demonstration. No higher proof can be found in the inductive sciences. The story is true. It has not been remodeled by the imagination, either of the original writers or of the transcribers. It is not the product of mythological fancy or of legendary accretion.

The idea of redemption in the OT takes its start from the thought of property (Lev 25 26; Ruth 4 4 ff). Money is paid according to law to buy back something which must be delivered or rescued (Nu 3 51; Neh 5 8). From this start the word "redemption" throughout the OT is used in the general sense of deliverance. God is the Redeemer of Israel in the sense that He is the Deliverer of Israel (Dt 9 26; 2 7 23; 1 Ch 15 21; Isa 26 20). The words redemption and deliverance from all forms of evil lot, from national misfortune (Isa 52 9; 63 9; cf Lk 2 38), or from plague (Ps 78 35.52), or from calamity of any sort (Gen 46 16; Nu 25 4.9). Of course, the general thought of the relation of Israel to God was that God had both a claim upon Israel (Dt 16 15) and an obligation toward Israel (1 Ch 17 21; Ps 25 22). Israel belonged to Him, and it was by His own right that He could move into the life of Israel so as to redeem Israel. On the other hand, obligation was upon Him to redeem Israel.

In the NT the idea of redemption has more a suggestion of ransom. Men are held under the curse of the law (Gal 3 13), or of sin itself (Rom 7 24 f). The Redeemer purchases their deliverance by offering Himself as payment for their redemption (Eph 1 7; 1 Pet 1 18).

Throughout both the OT and the NT there is to be observed a gradual moralizing of the meaning of redemption. The same process of redemption meaning has continued throughout all the Christian ages. Starting with the idea of redemption price, conceived almost in material terms, religious thought has advanced to conceptions entirely spiritual and spiritual. Through the same process of redemption meaning has become more specific with the progress of Christian revelation. In the beginning God is the Redeemer from distresses of all kinds. He redeems from calamity and from sorrows. This general idea, of course, persists throughout the revelation and enters largely into our thinking of today, but the growing moral discernment of the Bib. writers comes to attach more and more importance to sin as the chief disturber of man’s welfare. We would not minimize the force of the Scriptural idea that God is the Deliverer from all misfortune to which man falls heir, but the Scriptural emphasis moves more and more to deliverance from sin. Paul states this deliverance as a deliverance from one strong long lasting repressing evil, but we must not conceive his idea in any artificial fashion. He would have men delivered not only from the law, but also from the consequences of evil doing and from the spirit of evil itself (Rom 8 2).

In trying to discern the meaning of redemption from sin, toward which the entire progress of Bib. and Christian thought points, we may 2. REDEMPTION—well keep in mind the Master’s words on this very subject and the words of the Redeemer in individual life and might have it more abundantly (Jn 10 10). The word “life” seems to be the final NT word as a statement of the purpose of Christ. God sent His Son to bring men to this life (Jn 5 21). The word life is indeinite. Life means more at one period of the world’s history than at another. It has the advantage, nevertheless, of always being entirely intelligible in its essential significance. Our aim must be to keep this essential significance in mind and at the same time to provide for an increasing fullness and enlargement of human capacity and endeavor. The aim of redemption can only be to bring men to the fullest use and enjoyment of their powers. This is really the conception implicit even in the earliest statements of redemption. The man redeemed by money payment comes out of the prison to the light of day, or he comes out of slavery into freedom, or he is restored to his home and friends. The man under the law is redeemed from the burden and curse of the law. Paul speaks of his experience under the law as the experience of one chained to a dead body (Rom 7 24). Of course, relief from such bondage would mean life. In the more spiritualized sense of the NT, the evil in man’s heart is like a blight which paralyzes their higher activities (Jn 8 33-51).

In all redemption, as conceived of in Christian terms, there is a double element. There is first the deliverance from a curse—either a man or weights him down; redemption relieves him from this load. On the other hand, there is the positive movement of the soul thus relieved toward larger and fuller life. We have said that the Bib. emphasis is always upon deliverance from sin as the essential in redemption, but this deliverance is so essential that the life cannot progress in any of its normal activities until it is redeemed from evil. Accordingly in the Scriptural thought all manner of blessings follow deliverance. The man who seeks first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness finds all other things added unto him (Mt 6 33). Material, intellectual and social blessings follow as matters of course from the redemption of the inner spirit from evil. The aim of redemption, to beget in men’s hearts the will to do right, once the lie is found, leads men to seek successfully along all possible avenues for life. But, this, of course, does not mean that the redeemed life gives itself up to the cultivation of itself toward higher excellencies. It means that the redeemed life is a life of happiness in every form of selfishness. In the unselfish seeking of life for others the redeemed life finds its own greatest achievement and happiness (Mt 16 25).
3. Redemption. But as the redemption of the individual leads to large social transformations. It is impossible to strike out of the Scriptures the idea of a redeemed humanity. But humanity is not conceived of in general or class terms. The object of redemption is not humanity, or the human kind, or the masses. The object of redemption is rather men set in relation to each other as members of a family. But it would do violence to the Scriptural conception to conceive of the individual's relations in any narrow or restricted fashion (1 Cor 12:12-27).

An important enlargement of the idea of redemption in our own time has come as men have conceived of the redemption of individuals in their social relationships. Very often men have thought of redemption as a snatch from the perils of a world in itself absolutely wicked. Even the material environment of men has at times been regarded as containing something inherently evil. The thought of redemption which seems most in line with the moral ideal would seem to be that which brings the material and social forces within reach of individual wills. Paul speaks of the whole creation groaning and travailing in pain waiting for the revelation of the sons of God (Rom 8:22). This graphic figure sets before us the essentially Christian conception of the redemption of the forces in the midst of which men are placed. Those redeemed for the largest life, by the very force of their life, will seize all powers of the process of redemption, their own purposes. The seer saw a great multitude which no man could number, of every kindred and nation and tongue, shouting the joys of salvation (Rev 7:9), yet the implication nowhere appears that these were redeemed in any other fashion than by surrendering themselves to the forces of righteousness.

We have said that the aim of redemption is to bring men to the largest and fullest life. We have also said that "life" is a general term. We have also said that "life" is a general term. In various passages we would best say that the Process aim of redemption is to make men like Christ (Rom 8:9). Otherwise, it might be possible to use the word "life" so as to imply that the idea of life refers to a system of values which we mean by redemption. The idea of redemption, as a matter of fact, has been thus interpreted in various times in the history of Christian thinking. Life has been looked upon as sheer quantitative existence--the lower pleasures of sense being reckoned as about on the same plane with the higher. We can see the moral and spiritual anarchy which would thus be brought about. In Christ's words to His disciples He once used the expression "Ye are the salt of the earth.

"Ye are the salt of the earth which I have spoken unto you" (Jn 15:3). In this particular context the idea does not seem to be that of an external washing. Christ seems rather to mean that His disciples are cleansed as a vineyard is cleansed by pruning away some of the branches that others may bear fruit. In other words, the redemption of life is to be interpreted so that stress is laid upon the qualitative rather than the quantitative.

Christ indeed found place in His instructions and in His own life for the normal and healthy activities of Scriptural interpretation which we call the eclectic; He went to feasts and to weddings, but His emphasis was always upon life conceived of in the highest terms. We can say then that the aim of redemption is to beget in men life like that in Christ. Moreover, redemption must not be conceived of in such fashion as to do away with the need of response upon the part of the individual will. The literal suggestion of ransom in Scriptural teaching has to do with a man's deliverance, whether the man is willing to be delivered or not. Of course, the assumption in the mind of the Bib. writers was that any man in prison or in slavery or in sickness would be overjoyed at being redeemed; but in dealing with men whose lives are more or less always under some provocation. The dreadfulness of sin is largely in the love of sinning which sinning begets. Some thinkers have interpreted redemption to mean almost a seizing of men without regard to their own will. It is very easy to see how this conception arises. A man who himself hates sin may not stop to realize that some other men love sin. Redemption, to mean anything must touch this inner attitude of will. We cannot then hold to any idea of redemption which brings men under a cleansing process without the assent of their own wills. If we keep ourselves alive to the growing moral discernment which moves through the Scriptures, we must lay stress always upon redemption as a moral process. Not only must mankind beget a life in which they can do as men like Christ, but we must say also that the method of redemption must be the method of Christ, the method of appealing to the moral will. There is no Scriptural warrant for the idea that men are redeemed in the sense that we can get from the words of Christ is a statement of the persistence of God in His search for the lost: [He goeth] after that which is lost, until he finds it' (Lk 15.4).

Some would interpret these words to mean that the true Christian life is a recovery of something that has been brought into the kingdom. We cannot, in the light of the NT, limit the redeeming love of God; but we cannot, on the other hand, take passages from figurative expressions in such sense as to limit the freedom of men. The redemption must be conceived of as respecting the moral choices of men. In our thought of the Divine search for the control of inner human motive we must not stop short of the idea of men redeemed to the love of righteousness. Out of the plan of redemption as taught we have come away with the plan of redeeming men by merely relieving them of the consequences of their sins. Out of a changed life, of course, there must come changed consequences. But the Scriptural teaching is that the very faculties by which men are moral, the turning to life because of what life is.

Having thus attempted to determine, at least in outline, the content of the Christian idea of redemption, it remains for us to point out some implications as to the work of the Redeemer. Throughout the entire teaching on redemption in the Scriptures, redemption is set before us primarily as God's own affair (Jn 3:16). God redeems His people; He redeems them out of love for them. But the love of God is not to be conceived of as mere indulgence, partiality, or good-humored affection. The love of God rests down upon moral foundations. Throughout the Scriptures, therefore, we find implied often, if not always clearly stated, the idea that God is under obligations to redeem His people. The progress of later thinking has expanded this implication with fairness of moral discernment. We have come to see the obligations of power. The more powerful the man the heavier his obligations in the discharge of this power. This is a genuinely Christian concept which we do not apply to the character of God, feeling confident that we are in line with Scriptural teaching. Hence we may put the obligations of God somewhat as follows: God is the most obligated being in the universe. If a man is under heavy obligations to use aright the power of controlling the forces already at work in the world, how much heavier must be the obligations on the Creator who started these forces! The obligation becomes appalling to our human thought, and any voice that inclines to calling of human beings into existence and endowing them with the unsolicited boon of freedom. Men are not in the world of their own choice. Vast masses of them seem to be here as the outworking of a blind, infinite and unchangeable will. The shading of men make it very easy for them to sin. The tendencies which at least seem to be innate are too often tragically inclined toward evil. Men, seen, of themselves, utterly inadequate for their own redemption; by itself, there to be redemption it must come from God, and the Christian thought of a moral God would seem to include the obligation on the part of God to redeem those whom He has sent into the world. Christ has made clear forever the absolutely binding nature of moral considerations. If the obligation to redeem men meant everything to Christ, it must also mean everything to the God of Christ. So we feel in line with true Christian thinking in the doctrine that redemption comes first as a discharge of the obligations on the part of God Himself.

If we look for the common thought in all the Christian statements of God's part in redemption we find it in this: that in all these statements God is conceived of as doing all. He can do for the redemption of men; He can give the redemption of men. In earlier times men conceived of the human race as under the dominion of Satan, and of Satan as the fiend by the deliverance of man and therefore entitled to some compensation, they also conceived of God Himself as paying the ransom to Satan. If they thought of God as a feudal lord whose dignity had been offended by sin, they felt that He paid the cost of this offended dignity. If their idea was that a substitute for sinners must be furnished, the idea included the thought of God Himself as paying the ransom to Satan. If they conceived of the universe as a vast system of moral laws—beings whose dignity must be upheld, they thought of God Himself as providing the means for maintaining the dignity of the laws. If they conceived of men as saved by a vast moral influence set at work, they thought of this influence as proceeding, not from man, but from God. The common thought in theories of redemption then, so far as concerns God's part, is that God Himself takes the initiative and does all He can in the direction upon which He has set His face. Each phrasing of the doctrine of redemption is the attempt of an age to express the idea that God has done all that He can for men.

It is from this standpoint that we must approach the part played by Christ in redemption. This is not the place for an attempt at formal demonstration of this. Some have thought to find such a statement in the conception that Christ is a prophet. They would empty the expression, "Son of God," of any unique meaning; they would make Christ the Son of God in the same sense that any great prophet could be conceived of as Son of God. Of course, we would not minimize the teaching of the Scripture as to the full humanity of Christ, and yet we may be permitted to voice our belief that the representation of Christ as the Redeemer merely in the same sense in which a prophet is a redeemer does not do justice to the Scripture teaching; and we feel, too, that such a solution of the problem of Christ would be inadequate for the practical task of redemption. If Christ is just a prophet giving us His teaching we rejoice in the teaching, but we feel constrained to ask how to make the teaching effective. If it be urged that Christ is a prophet who in Himself realized the moral ideal, we feel constrained to reply that this really puts Christ at a vast distance from us. Such a doctrine of Christ's person would make Him the supreme religious genius, but the human genius stands apart from the ordinary mass of men. He may gather up into Himself and realize the ideals of men; He may draw men to His ideal as a magnet draws iron; He may be the perfection of man's aspirations; but He may not be able to make men like unto Himself. Shakespeare is a consummate literary genius. He has said once and for all many things which the common man thinks or half thinks. When the common man comes upon a phrase of Shakespeare he feels that Shakespeare has said for all time the things which he himself have said if he had been able. But the appreciation of Shakespeare does not make the ordinary man like Shakespeare; the appreciation of Christ has not proved successful in itself in making men like unto Christ.

If, on the contrary, without attempting formal theological construction, we put some real meaning into the idea of Christ as the Son of God and hold fast to a unique relationship between Christ and God which makes Christ the greatest gift that God can give us, we find indeed that Christ is lifted up to essentially Divine existence; but we find also that this divinity does not estrange Him from us. Redemption, it seems feasible, we may have a revelation of how far up man can go, but when we have also a revelation of how far down God can come. If we can think of God as having in some real way come into the world through His Son Jesus Christ, that revelation makes Christ the Lord who can lead us to redemption.

Such a conception furnishes the dynamic which we must have in any real process of redemption. We need not only the idea, but we need power by which to realize the idea. If the entire universe is under the sway of a moral God, a God who is under obligations to bear the burdens of men, and who willingly assumes these obligations, we really feel that moral life at its fullest and best is the greatest fact in the universe. Moreover, we must be true to the Scriptures and lift the entire conception of redemption beyond the realm of conscience to the realm of the heart. What the conscience of God calls for, the love of God willingly fulfills. The Cross of Christ stands as the revelation of the righteousness of God and the love of God. Power is thus put back of human conscience and human love to move forward toward redemption (Rom 8:35-39).

The aim and elements of redemption in Christ then is to lift men out of death toward life. The mind is to be quickened by the revelation of the true ideals of human life. The conscience is to be reinforced by the revelation of the moral God who carries on all things in the interests of righteousness. The heart is to be stirred and won by the revelation of the love which sends an only begotten Son to the cross for our redemption. And we must take the work of Christ, not as a solitary incident or a mere historic event, but as a great movement of the world which has been at work from the beginning and works forever. The Lamb was slain from the foundation of the world (Rev 13:8); the spirit of God revealed in the cross of Christ is the same yesterday, today, and forever. We have in the cross a revelation of holy love which, in a sense, overpowers and at the same time encourages. The cross is the revelation of the length to which God is willing to go in redemption rather than set aside one jot or tittle of His moral law. He will not redeem men only to forgive, but to save them. He will not overwhelm them in any such manner as to do away with their power of free choice. He will show men His own feeling of holiness and love. In the name of a holy love which they can forever aspire after, but which they can never fully reach, men call to Him for forgiveness and that forgiveness men find forever available.

It remains to add one further item of Scriptural teaching, namely that redemption is a continuous process. If we may again use the word “life,” which has been the key to this discussion, we may say that the aim of redemption is to make men progressively alive. There are not limits to the development of human powers touched by the redemptive processes of God. The cross is a revelation of Divine willingness to bear with men who are forever being redeemed. Of course, we speak of the redeemed man as redeemed once and for all. By this we mean that he is redeemed once and for all in being faced about and started in a right direction, but the progress toward full life may be faster or slower according to the man and the circumstances in the midst of which he is placed. Still the chief fact is the direction in which the man is moving. The revelation of God who aids in redemption is of the God who takes the direction as the chief fact rather than the length of the stride or the rate of the movement. Every man is expected to do his best. If he stumbles he is supposed to find his way to his feet; if he is moving slowly, he must attempt to move faster; if he is moving at a slower rate than he can attain, he must strive after the higher rate, but always the dynamic force is the revelation of the holy love of God.

The Scriptures honor the prophets in whatever land or time they appear. The Scriptures welcome goodness under any and all circumstances. They have a place for a “light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world,” but they still make it clear that the chief force in the redemption of men is the revelation of holy love in Jesus Christ. The redemption, we repeat, is never conceived of in artificial or mechanical terms. If any man hath not the spirit of Christ he does not belong to Christ (Rom 8 9). The aim of redemption is to beget this spirit, and this spirit is life.

Redness, red’ness, of eyes. See drunkenness, II.

Redound, re-dound’ (from re, “back,” and undare, “to surge as a wave’’): To be sent back as a reaction, to overflow; occurs only as the tr of περισσών, perissóidó, “to be over and above,” “to superabound” (frequent in the NT); in 2 Cor 4 15, “might through the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God,” RV “may cause the thanksgiving to abound.”

Red, réd: (1) ἱλικία, ἱλίκα, tr4 “reed-grass” (Gen 41 218; Job 8 11 m). See Flag. (2) ἰλίθιος, ἰλίθι, tr4 “swift,” m “reed!” (Job 9 26). The “ships of red” are the light skiffs made of plated reeds used on the Nile; cf “vessels of papyrus” (Isa 18 29). (3) ἱλικιον, ἱλικιον, tr4 “reeds,” m “marshes,” Heb “pools” (Jer 51 32); elsewhere “pools” (Ex 7 19; 8 5; Isa 14 23, etc). See Pools. (4) ἱλιαῖος, ἱλιαί, tr4 “meadows,” AV “paper reeds” (Isa 19 7). See Meadows. (5) ἰλική, ἰλική, ἱλικός, ἱλικός, (the Eng. “canes” comes from Heb. ve-laye and Gr. kannos), “stalk,” “stalk” (Gen 41 522); “shaft” (Ex 37 17, etc); “reed,” or “reeds,” (I K 14 15; 2 K 18 21; Isa 36 6; 42 3; Ps 88 30, AV “spearman”); “calamus” (Ex 30 23; Cant 4 14; Ezk 27 19); “sweet cane,” m “calamus” (Isa 43 24; Jer 6 20); “bone” (Job 31 22); used of the cross-beam of a “balance” (Isa 46 6); “a measuring reed” (Ezk 40 3); “a staff of reed,” i.e. a walking-stick (Isa 36 6; Ezk 29 6); the “branches” of a candlestick (Ex 37 18). (6) κάλαμος, κάλαμος, “a reed shaken with the wind” (Mt 11 7; Lk 7 24); “a bruised reed” (Mt 12 20); they put “a reed in his right hand” (Mt 27 29.30); “They smote his head with a reed” (Mk 15 19); “put it on a reed” (Mt 27 45; Mk 15 36); “a measuring reed” (Rev 11 1; 21 15.16); “a pen” (3 Jn ver 13).

It is clear that kāneh and its Gr equivalent kalamos mean many things. Some refer to different uses to which a reed is put, e.g. a cross-beam of a balance, a walking-stick, a measuring rod, and a pen (see above), but apart from this kāneh is a word used for at least two essentially different things: (1) an ordinary reed, and (2) some sweet-smelling substance.

Red (Arundo donax).

(1) The most common reed in Pal is the Arundo donax (N.O. Gramineae), known in Arab. as kāshafarasi, “Persion reed.” It grows in immense quantities in the Jordan valley along the river and its tributaries and at the oases near the Dead Sea, notably around Ain Pezghibah at the northwest corner. It is a lofty reed, often 20 ft. high, of a beautiful fresh green in summer when all else is dead and dry, and of a fine appearance from a distance in the spring months when it is in full bloom and the beautiful silky panicles crown the top of every reed. The “covert of the reed” (Job 40 21) shelters a large amount of animal and bird life. This reed will answer to almost all the requirements of the above references.

(2) Kāneh occurs in Jer 6 20 qualified בְּנֵית נַר, kāneh ha-foh, “sweet” or “pleasant cane,” and in Ex 30 23, בֵּית נַר, krūth bhōns, “sweet calamus,” or, better, a “cane of fragrance.” Cant 4 14; Isa 43 21; Ezk 27 19 all apparently refer to the same thing, though in these passages the kāneh is unqualified. It was an ingredient of the holy oil (Ex 30 23); it was imported from a distance (Jer 6 20);
The resulting lead oxide, called in the Bible silver dross, was used for glazing pottery (Prov 26:23), a use to which it is still put by Syrian potters. The description of refining in Ezk 22:22-25 indicates that a flux (of "as with lye," Isa 1:25 AV) was sometimes added to the melted metal to dissolve the oxides of copper, lead, tin and iron as they formed, thus leaving the silver pure. Crude processes similar to those described above are used in the Taurus Mountains today.

Figurative: In the various Bible references the refining of precious metals is used figur. to illustrate the kind of trial God's children are called upon to go through. If they are of the right metal the dross will finally be blown away, leaving pure, clear, shining silver. If of base metal they will be like the dross described in Jer 6:29.30. The refiner may blow more fiercely, but in vain, for nothing but lead dross appears.

James A. Patch

REFORM, re-form' (θέραμα, yāsar): The word in RV is found only in Lev 26:23, in the phrase "ye will not be reformed." The meaning is, "to be instructed," or, more fully, "to let one's self be chastened." It is a word by church.

JAMES ORR

REFORMATION, re-or-mā'shun: The word is found only in He 9 10, being the tr of σκόπος, diathesis, in its only occurrence. This Gr word means etymologically "making straight," and was used of restoring to the normally straight condition that which is crooked or bent. In this passage it means the rectification of conditions, setting things to rights, and it is a description of the Messianic time.

REFRESH, re-fresh', REFRESHING, re-fresh'-ing: "Refresh" occurs a few times in the OT as the tr of דחמ, nāḇaš, "to take breath," figurative "to be refreshed" (Ex 23 12; 31 17; 2 S 16 14); of יבש, rēḇāy, "to have room" (1 S 16 23; Job 32 20, m "find relief," AV "may breathe"); of יבש, yāʾada, "to support" (1 K 13 7); and in the NT as the tr of σκόπος, anapēsō, "to give rest" (1 Cor 16 18; 2 Cor 7 13; 1 Th 5 24; 2 Th 3 13; 1 Cor 16 13 32 AV); in compound words from it: οἰκονομία, oikonomia, "to invigorate," "revive" (2 Tim 1 10), and other words. "Refreshing" is in Isa 28 12 marg'oth, "rest" or "quiet;" and in Acts 3 19, ἀναφέρομαι, and πορεύομαι, "seasons of refreshing," through the coming of Jesus, the Christ; cf 2 Ed 11 46 and Av Sir 43 22 (דָּשָׁב). E. of the Jordan they were Bezer, Ramoth-gilead in the tribe of Gad, and Golan in the territory of Manasseh. On the W. of the Jordan they were Hebron in Judah, Shechem in Mt. Ephraim, and Kedesh in Naphtali (Nu 35 6, 14; Josh 20 27 ff.; 21 13.21.27.32.38; Bezer is named in ver 36, but not described as a City of Refuge). An account of these cities is given in separate arts. under their names. Dt 19 2 speaks of three cities thus to be set apart, referring apparently to the land W. of the Jordan.

From time immemorial in the East, if a man were slain the duty of avenging him has lain as a sacred obligation upon his nearest relative.

2. Purpose

In districts where more primitive conditions prevail, even to this day, the distinction between intentional and unintentional killing is not too strictly observed, and men are often done to death in revenge for what was the purest accident. To prevent such a thing where possible, and to provide for a right administration of justice, these cities were instituted. Open highways were to be maintained along which the manslayer might have an unobstructed course to the city gate.

The regulations concerning the Cities of Refuge are found in Nu 35; Dt 19 1-13; Josh 20. Briefly, everything was to be done to facilitate the flight of the manslayer, lest the nearest of kin, who had purposed his death, should overtake him, and, overtaking him, should slay him mortally. On reaching the city he was to be received by the elders and his case heard. If this was satisfactory, they would give all care and protection until trial could be carried out. They took him, apparently, to the city or district from which he had fled, and there, among those who knew him, witnesses were examined. If it were proved that he was not a willful slayer, that he had no grudge against the person killed, and had shown no sign of purpose to injure him, then he was declared innocent and conducted back to the city in which he had taken refuge, where he must stay until the death of the high priest. Then he was free to return home in safety. Until that event he must on no account go beyond the city boundaries. If he did, the avenger of blood might slay him without blame. On the other hand, if he were found guilty of delicto, and it were proved that no protection was given, he was handed over to the avenger of blood, who, with his own hand, took the murderer's life. Blood-money, i.e. money paid in compensation for the murder, in settlement of the avenger's claim, was in no circumstances permitted; nor could the refugee be ransomed, so that he might "come again to dwell in the land" until the death of the high priest (Nu 35 32).

A similar right of refuge seems to have been recognised in Israel as attaching to the altar in the temple at Jerusalem (1 K 1 50; 2 28; cf Ex 31 12 f.). This may be compared with the right of asylum connected with the temples of the heathen. W. Ewing

I. The Term Explained.

The theological term "regeneration" is the Lat. tr. of the Gr expression παλαίγενεσις, palingenesia, occurring twice in the NT (Mt 19 28; Tit 3 5). The word is usually written παλαίγενεσις, palingenesia, in classical Gr. Its meaning is different in the two passages, though an easy transition of thought is evident.

In Mt 19 28 the word refers to the restoration of the world, in which sense it is synonymous to the expressions ἀποκατάστασις πάντων, "restoration of all things" (Acts 3 21; the vb. is ἀποκαταστάνω, apokatastano, "to restore all things"), and ἄφεςτος, ἀποκαταστάσις, ἀφιέρωσις, "to make purification, consecrate, dedicate," which signifies a gradual transition of meaning to the second sense of the word under consideration. It is supposed that regeneration in this sense denotes the final stage of development of all creation, by which God's purposes regarding the same are fully realized, when "all things are put in subject under his feet" (1 Cor 15 27). This is a "regeneration in the proper meaning of the word, for it signifies a renovation of all visible things when the old is passed away, and heaven and earth become new" (cf Rev 21 1). To the Jew the regeneration thus prophesied was inseparably connected with the reign of the Messiah.

We find this word in the same or very similar senses in profane literature. It is used of the renewal of the world in Stoical philosophy. Jos (Ant. XI. il. 9) speaks of the ανακαίνεσις τοῦ παλαιοῦ πάντων, "a new foundation and regeneration of the fatherland," after the return from the Bab captivity. Philo (ed. Manger, I. 144) uses the same expression, pointing of the past and the future of the earth, as of a new world, and Marcus Aurelius Antoninus (IX. 1, of a periodical restoration of all things, laying stress upon the constant recurrence and uniformity of all happenings, which thought the Preacher expressed by the "there is nothing new under the sun." There is no transition of meaning under the same circumstances. In the philosophical, literary, and Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls (Plut., ed. Xylander, f. 99 a; Clem. Alex., ed. Potter, 185) or else of a revival of life (Philob. 1139). Cleve uses the word in his letters to Atticus (vi.6) metaphorically of his own nature from a new exile of life granted to him. See Ecclesiastes of the NT, ix.

This sense is undoubtedly included in the full Bib. conception of the former meaning, for it is unthinkable that a regeneration in the eschatological sense can exist without a spiritual regeneration of humanity toward the heart. It is, however, quite evident that this latter conception has arisen rather late, from an analysis of the former meaning. It is found in Tit 3:5 which, without absolute certainty as to its meaning, is here interpreted in agreement with the numerous nuns and v.s. which have given the dogmatical setting to the doctrine of regeneration in Christian theology. Clem. Alex. is the first to differentiate this meaning from the former by the addition of the adj. pneumatikos, pneumatic, "spiritual" (cf. anapanasis, Acts 3:20; see REFRESHING). In this latter sense the word is typically Christian, though the OT contains many allusions of the spiritual process expressed thereby.

II. The Biblical Doctrine of Regeneration

1. In the OT

It is well known that the earlier part of the OT, and to a certain degree all through the OT, religion is looked at and spoken of more as a national possession, the benefits of which are largely visible and tangible. The idea of regeneration here occurs therefore—though no technical expression has as yet been coined for the process—in the first meaning of the word elucidated above. Whether the Divine promises refer to the Messianic end of times, or are to be realized at an earlier date, they all refer to the nation of Israel as such, and to individuals only as far as they are partakers in the benefits bestowed upon the commonwealth. This is even true where the blessings prophesied are only spiritual, as in Isa. 60:21,22. The mass of the people of Israel are therefore as yet scarcely aware of the fact that the conditions on which these Divine promises are to be attained are more than ceremonial and ritual ones. Soon, however, great disasters, threatening to overthrow the national entity, and finally the captivity and dispersion which caused national functions to be almost, if not altogether, discontinued, assisted in the growth of a sense of individual or personal responsibility before God. The sin of Israel is now looked at as the sin of the individual, which can be removed only by individual repentance and cleansing. This is best seen from the stirring appeals of the prophets of the exile, where frequently the necessity of a change of attitude toward Jeh is preached as a means to such regeneration. This cannot be understood otherwise than as a turning of the individual to the Lord. Here, too, no ceremony or sacrifice is sufficient, but an interposition of Divine grace, which is represented under the figure of a water, as from all iniquity and sin (Isa. 1:18; Jer 13:23). It is not possible now to follow in full the development of this idea of cleansing, but already in Isa. 62:15 the sprinkling of many nations is mentioned and is soon understood in the sense of the "baptism" which is to come upon them before their reception into the covenant of Israel. It was the symbol of a radical cleansing like that of a "new-born babe," which was one of the designations of the proselyte (cf. Ps 87:5; see also the tractate Yib haHokmah). Would it be surprising if Israel, which had been guilty of many acts of the Gentiles, needed a similar baptism and sprinkling? This is what Ezek. 36:25 suggests: "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you." In other passages the cleansing and refining power of fire is alluded to (e.g. Mal 3:2), and there is no doubt that John the Baptist found in such passages the ground for his practice of baptizing the Jews who came to him (Mt. 3:2-28).

The turning of Israel to God was necessarily meant to be an inward change of attitude toward Him, in other words, the sprinkling with clean water, as an outward sign, was the emblem of a pure heart. It was Isaiah and Jeremiah who drew attention to this (Isa. 57:15; Jer 24:7; 31:33-35; 32:38-40, et passim). Here again reference is made to individuals, not only to the people in general (Jer 31:34). This promised regeneration, so lovingly offered by Je, is to be found between God and His people (Jer 31:31; Ezek. 11:19-21; 18:31;32; 37:23-24).

The renewing and cleansing here spoken of is in reality nothing else than what Dt 30:6 had promised, a circumcision of the heart in contradistinction to the flesh, the token of the former (Abrahamic) covenant (of circumcision, Jer 4:4). As God takes the initiative in making the covenant, the conviction that root human sin and depravity can be effectually eliminated only by the act of God Himself renewing and purifying the heart of the man of heart (Hos 14:4). This we see from the testimony of some of Israel's best sons and daughters, who also knew that this grace was found in the way of repentance and humiliation before God. The elucimation of this conviction is found in the prayer of David: "Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right (in "steiffast") spirit within me. Cast me not away from thy presence; and take not thy holy Spirit from me. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and uphold me with a willing spirit" (Ps 51:10-12). Jeremiah puts the following words into the mouth of Ephraim: "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned" (Jer 31:18). Clearer than any passages of the OT, John the Baptist, forerunner of Christ and last blazing torch of the time of the earlier covenant, spoke of the baptism, not of water, but of the Holy Spirit and of fire (Mt. 3:11; Lk. 3:16; Jn. 1:33), leading thus to the realization of OT foreshadowings which became possible by faith in Christ.

In the teaching of Jesus the need of regeneration has a prominent place, though nowhere are the reasons given. The OT had succeeded and overthrown—under conscience agreed with it—in convincing the people of this need. The clearest assertion of it and the explanation of the doctrine of regeneration is found in the conversation of Jesus with Nicodemus (Jo. 3). It is based upon (1) the observation that man, even the most pugnacious in the observance of the Law, is dead and therefore unable to "live up" to the demands of God. Only He who gave life at the beginning can give the (spiritual) life necessary to do God's will. (2) Man has fallen from his virginal and Divinely appointed sphere, the realm of the spirit, the Kingdom of God, living now the perishing earthly life. Only by having a new spiritual nature imparted to him, by being "born anew" (Jn. 3:3), Rvm. "from above," Gr. ápou, from above), by being "born of the Spirit" (3:6,8), can he live the spiritual life which God requires of man.

These words are a NT exegesis of Ezekiel's vision of the dead bones (37:1-10). It is the "breath from Je," the Spirit of God, who alone can give life to the spiritually dead.

But regeneration, according to Jesus, is more than life, it is also purity. As God is pure and sinless, none but the pure in heart can see God (Mt 5:8). This is always reasserted as a new and more human endeavor. Bilhadi the Shuhite declared, and his friends, each in his turn, expressed very similar thoughts (Job 4:17; 14:4): "How then can man live with God? Or how can he clean that is born of a woman? Behold, even the moon hath no brightness, and the stars are not pure in his sight: how much less man, that is a worm! and the son of man, that is a worm?" (26:4–6).

To change this lost condition, to impart this new life, Jesus claims as His God-appointed task: "The Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost" (Lk 19:10); "I came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly" (Jn 10:10). This life is eternal, imperishable: "I give unto them eternal life; and they shall abide in me, and I in them." (Jn 10:28). This life is imparted by Jesus Himself: "It is the spirit that giveth life; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I have spoken unto you are spirit, and are life." (Jn 6:63). This life can be received on the condition of faith in Christ or by coming to Him (Jn 14:6). By faith power is received which enables the sinner to overcome sin, to "sin no more" (Jn 8:11).

The parables of Jesus further illustrate this doctrine. The prodigal is declared to have been "dead" and to be "alive again" (Lk 15:24). This new life from God is compared to a wedding garment in the parable of the Marriage of the King's Son (Mt 22:11). The garment may have been refused by the unhappy guest, who, in consequence, was "cast out into the outer darkness" (Mt 22:13).

Finally, this regeneration, this new life, is expressed in the knowledge of God and His Christ: "And this is life eternal, that they may know thee the only true God, and thee whom thou didst send, even Jesus Christ." (Jn 17:3). This seems to be an allusion to the passage in Hos (4:6): "My people are destroyed through want of knowledge: because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee, that thou shalt be no priest to me." It may be said in general that the teaching of the apostles on the subject of regeneration is a development of the teaching of Jesus on the lines of the adumbrations of the OT.

3. In Apostolic Teaching

Considering the differences in the personal character of these writers, it is remarkable that such concord of views should exist. There is a more stress on the specific facts of justification and sanctification by faith than on the more comprehensive head of regeneration. Still the need of it is plainly stated by St. Paul. It is necessary to "save all men, that they might taste the goodness of the 'new life'" (Rom 8:3–11; Eph 2:1). The flesh is at enmity with God (Eph 2:15); all mankind is "darkened in their understanding, alienated from the life of God." (4:18). Similar passages might be multiplied. Paul then distinctly teaches that this is a new life in store for those who have been spiritually dead. To the Ephesians he writes: "And you did he make alive, when you were dead through your trespasses and sins" (2:1), and later on: "God, being rich in mercy, for his sake made us alive together with Christ" (2:4,5). A spiritual resurrection has taken place. This regeneration causes a complete revolution in man. He has thereby passed from under the law of sin and death and has come under "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus!" (Rom 8:2).

The change is so radical that it is possible now to speak of a "new creature" (2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15, "new creation"), of a "new man," that after God had been created in righteousness and holiness with infallible power (Eph 2:22). The new man, then, being renewed unto knowledge after the image of him that created him" (Col 3:10). All "old things are passed away: behold, they are become new" (2 Cor 5:17).

St. Paul is equally explicit regarding the authority of this change. He says, "The Spirit of Christ" has been given from above to be the source of all new life (Rom 8); by Him we are proved to be the "sons" of God (Gal 4:6); we have been adopted into the family of God (viviparia, huiostheia, Rom 8:15; Gal 4:5). Thus St. Paul speaks of the "second Adam," by whom the life of righteousness is initiated in us; just as the "first Adam" became the leader in transgression, He is "a life-giving spirit" (1 Cor 15:45). St. Paul himself experienced this change, and henceforth expounds the benefits of the new life in his life of service. "It is no longer I that live," he exclaims, "but Christ liveth in me: and that life which I now live in the flesh I live in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself up for me:" (Gal 2:20).

Regeneration is to St. Paul, no less than to Jesus, connected with the conception of purity and knowledge. We have already noted the second NT passage in which the word "regeneration" occurs (Tit 3:5): "According to his mercy he saved us, through the washing [in 'layer'] of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit, which he poured out upon us richly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour," (Tit 3:5). In 1 Cor 12:13 such cleansing is called the "baptism of the Spirit," and the repeated promise (Job 2:28 [in the Heb text 3:1]; Mt 3:11; Mk 1:8; Lk 3:16; Acts 1:5; 11:16). There is, of course, in these passages no reference to mere water-baptism, any more than in Ezek 36:25. Water cleanseth the outer body, so the spirit purifieth the inner man (cf 1 Cor 6:11; 1 Pet 3:21).

The doctrine that regeneration redounds in true knowledge of Christ is seen from Eph 3:15–19 and 4:17–24, where the lack of knowledge, ignorance of natural man are placed in contradistinction to the enlightenment of the new life (see also Col 3:10). The church redeemed and regenerated is to be a special "possessions," an "heritage" of the Lord (Eph 1:11,18), and the whole creation is to participate in the final redemption and a doption (Rom 8:21–23).

St. James finds less occasion to touch this subject than the other writers of the NT. His Ep. is rather ethical than dogmatical. Indeed, he lays more stress on the specific facts of justification and sanctification by faith than on the more comprehensive head of regeneration. Still the need of it is plainly stated by St. Paul. It is necessary to "save all men, that they might taste the goodness of the 'new life'" (Rom 8:3–11; Eph 2:1). The flesh is at enmity with God (Eph 2:15); all mankind is "darkened in their understanding, alienated from the life of God." (4:18). Similar passages might be multiplied. Paul then distinctly teaches that this is a new life in store for those who have been spiritually dead. To the Ephesians he writes: "And you did he make alive, when you were dead through your trespasses and sins" (2:1), and later on: "God, being rich in mercy, for his sake made us alive together with Christ" (2:4,5). A spiritual resurrection has taken place. This regeneration causes a complete revolution in man. He has thereby passed from under the law of sin and death and has come under "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus!" (Rom 8:2).

The change is so radical that it is possible now to speak of a "new creature" (2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15, "new creation"), of a "new man," that after God had been created in righteousness and holiness with infallible power (Eph 2:22). The new man, then, being renewed unto knowledge after the image of him that created him" (Col 3:10). All "old things are passed away: behold, they are become new" (2 Cor 5:17).
pletion of God's plans concerning the whole creation, and accordingly looks here at God's people as a whole. In a similar sense he says in his Second Ep., after mentioning "the day of God": "We look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (2 Pet 3 13). Still he alludes very plainly to the regeneration of individuals (1 Pet 1 23). The idea of a second birth of the believers is clearly suggested in the expression, "newborn babe" (1 Pet 2 2), and in the explicit statement of 1 Pet 1 23: "Having been begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, through the word of God, which liveth and abideth." It is in this sense that the apostle calls God "Father" (1 17) and the believers "children of obedience" (1 14), i.e. obedient children, or children who ought to obey. We have seen above that the agent by which regeneration is wrought, the incorruptible seed of the word of God, finds a parallel in St. Paul's and St. James's theology. All these expressions go back probably to a word of the Master in Jn 3 5-8. We are made partakers of the word by having received the spirit. This spirit (cf. the Pauline "life-giving spirit," 1 Cor 15 45), the "mind" of Christ (1 Pet 4 1), is the power of the resurrected Christ active in the life of the believer. Peter refers to the same thought in 1 Pet 3 15-21. By regeneration we become "an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession," in whom Divine virtues, the excellencies of him who called you" (1 Pet 2 9), are manifested. Here the apostle uses well-known OT expressions foreshadowing NT graces (Isa 61 6; 66 21; Ex 19 6; Dt 7 6), but he individualizes the process of regeneration in full agreement with the increased light which the teaching of Jesus has brought. The theology of St. Peter also puts out the concept of regeneration with purity and holiness (1 Pet 1 15.16) and true knowledge (1 14) or obedience (1 14; 3 16). It is not surprising that the idea of purity should invite the OT parallel of "cleansing by water." The flood washed away the iniquity of the world "in the days of Noah," when "eight souls were saved through water"; which also with a true likeness (RVm "in the antitype") doth now save you, even baptism, not the putting away of the old man of sin (RVm "inquiry," "appeal") of a good conscience toward God, through the resurrection [-life] of Jesus Christ! (1 Pet 3 20.21).

The teaching of St. John is very closely allied with that of Jesus, as we have already seen from the multitude of quotations we had to select from St. John's Gospel to illustrate the teaching of the Master. It is esp. interesting to note the cases where the apostle didactically elucidates certain of these pronouncements of Jesus. The most remarkable apostolic gloss or commentary on the subject is found in Jn 7 39. Jesus had spoken of the change which faith in Him ("coming to Him") would cause in the lives of His disciples; how Divine regeneration "rivets over" men and should issue forth from them; and the evangelist continues in explanation: "But this spake he of the spirit, which they that believed on him were to receive: for the Spirit was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified." This recognition of a special manifestation of Divine power, transcending the experience of OT believers, was based on the declaration of Christ, that He would send "another Comforter" (RV "advocate," "helper," Gr Paraclete), that he may be with you for ever, even the Spirit of truth" (14 16).

In his Ep. St. John shows that this Spirit be- stows the elements of a Godlike character which makes us to be "sons of God," before who were "children of the devil" (1 Jn 3 10.24; 4 18, etc.). This regeneration is "eternal life" (1 Jn 5 13) and moral similarity with God, the very character of God in man. As "God is love," the children of God will love (1 Jn 4 20). At the same time it is also the "new birth," a changed life, or a new manifestation of the life of the Son of God, who also called fellow-believers to life as Christ, victorious life which conquers the world (1 Jn 5 4); it is purity (1 Jn 3 3-6) and knowledge (1 Jn 2 20).

The subject of regeneration lies outside of the scope of the Ep. to the He, so that we look in vain for a clear dogma, for in no place contradict the dogma, which, on the other hand, underlies many of the statements made. Christ, "the mediator of a better covenant, which hath been enacted upon better promises" (8 6), has made "purification of sins" (1 3). In contrast to the first covenant, in which the people approached God by means of outward forms and ordinances, the "new covenant" (8 13) brought an "eternal redemption" (9 12) by means of a Divine cleansing (9 4). Christ, brings man "out of glory" and is "author of their salvation" (2 10). Immature Christians are spoken of (as were the proselytes of the OT) as babes, who were to grow to the stature, character and knowledge of "full-grown men." (13 12-13)

III. Later Development of the Doctrine.—Very soon the high spiritual meaning of regeneration was obscured by the development of priestcraft within the Christian Church. With the initiation into the mysteries of baptism as accomplished by the mediation of ministers thereto appointed, the ceremonies hereby employed became means to which magic powers were of necessity ascribed. This we see plainly in the view of baptismal regeneration, which, based upon half-understood passages of Scripture quoted above, was taught at an early date. While in the post-apostolic days we frequently find traces of a proper appreciation of an underlying spiritual value in baptism (cf Didache, vii), many of the expressions used were lifted from apocryphal Gnostic sources (e. g., ascensions, xi 5) calls baptism the second of the three births of a child of God: first experience of regeneration (birth), the third the resurrection). This birth is "of the day, free, delivering from passions, taking away the veil of our nature or life, i.e. everything hiding the Divine image in which we are created, and leading up to the life above." (Ullmann, Geiger v. Nazianz, 325.) Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat., xvii, c. 37) ascribes to baptism the power of absorption from sin and the power of endowment with heavenly virtues. According to Augustine baptism is essential to salvation, though the baptism of blood (martyrdom) may effect it also. The exercise of baptism is not as in the case of the thief at the cross (Aug., De Anima et Vite Originals I, 9; Ep. 73). Nevertheless, the Great compares the spirit-filled water of baptism with the spirit-filled womb of the Virgin, in which the Holy Spirit engenders the sinless child (Ep. 94, xxv. 5; see Hagenbuch, Dogmengeschichte, § 137).

In general this is still the opinion of pronounced sacramentarians. With the evangelists Christianity has gone back to the teaching of the NT.

IV. Present Significance.—Although a clear distinction is not always maintained between regeneration and other experiences of the spiritual life, we may summarize our belief in the following theses:

(1) Regeneration implies not merely an addition of certain gifts or graces, a strengthening of certain innate good qualities, but a radical change, which revolutionizes our whole being, contradicts and overcomes our old fallen nature, and places our spiritual center of gravity wholly outside of our own powers in the realm of God's causation.

(2) It is the will of God that all of us be made partakers of this new life (1 Tim 2 4) and, as it is clearly stated that some fall short of it (Jn 5 40), it is plain that the fault thereof lies with man. God requires all men to repent and turn unto Him (Acts 27 30) before He will or can effect regeneration.

Conversion, resulting in men dying to faith in Christ, is therefore the human response to the offer of salvation which God makes. This response gives occasion to and is synchronous with the Divine act of renewal (regeneration). The Spirit of God enters into us with the believing, accepting spirit of man. This is fellowship with Christ (Rom 8 10; 1 Cor 6 17; 2 Cor 5 17; Col 3 3).

(3) The process of regeneration is outside of our observation and beyond the scope of psychological analysis. It takes place in the sphere of subconcious phenomena, as psychological investigation has thrown a flood of light on the psychic states which precede, accompany and follow the work of the Holy Spirit. "He handles psychic powers;
He works upon psychic energies and states; and this work of regeneration lies somewhere within the psychological realm that is of highest value and greatest importance. The facts of Christian experience cannot be changed, nor do they lose in value by the most searching psychological scrutiny.

Psychological analysis does not eliminate the direct workings of the Holy Spirit. Nor can it disclose its process; the "underlying laboratory where are wrought radical remedial processes and structural changes in the psychological being as portrayed in explicit scriptural utterances:
'Create in me a clean heart' (Ps 51 10). Ye must be born again' (John 3 7). But as if that be in Christ he is a new creation: old things are passed away; behold all things are made new' (2 Cor 5 17; 2 Pet 3 18); is in the region of subconsciousness. To look in the region of consciousness for this Person or for His work is fruitless and with such a conclusion, Christian psychology thus traces to its deep-lying retreat the Divisi ear. It is here that regeneration occurs. 'Where God works in the depths of the soul as silently and secretly as if on the remotest world of the stellar universe' (H. E. W. Dress, Psychology of the Christian Life, 117).

(4) Regeneration manifests itself in the conscious soul by its effects on the will, the intelligence and the affections. At the same time regeneration supplies a new life-power of Divine origin, which enables the component parts of human nature to fall under the law of God, to strive for the coming of God's kingdom, and to accept the teachings of God's spirit. Thus regenerate man is conscious of the facts of justification and adoption.
The former is a judicial act of God, which frees man from the law of sin and absolves him from the state of enmity against God; the latter an enduement with the Spirit, which is an earnest of his inheritance (Eph 1 14). The Spirit of God, dwelling in man, testifies to the state of sonship (Rom 8 16; Gal 4 6).

(5) Regeneration, being a new birth, is the starting-point of spiritual growth. The regenerated man needs nurture and training. He receives it not merely from outside experiences, but from an immanent principle - himself now recognized as the power of the life of the indwelling Christ (Col 26 27). Apart from the mediate dealings of God with man through word and sacraments, there is therefore an immediate communication of life from God to the regenerate.

(6) The truth which is mentioned as the agent by whom regeneration is made possible (Jn 3 32; Jas 1 18; 1 Pet 2 3), is nothing else than the Divine Spirit, not only the spoken or written word of God, which may convince people of right or wrong, but which cannot enable the will of man to forsake the wrong and to do the right, but He who calls Himself the Truth (Jn 14 6) and who has become the motive power of regenerated life (Gal 2 5).

(7) Recent philosophy expressive of the reaction from the mechanical view of bare materialism, and also from the depreciation of personality as seen in socialism, has again brought into prominence the realities and need of personal life. Johannes Müller and Rudolf Eucken among others emphasize that a new life of the spirit, independent of outward conditions, is not only possible, but necessary for the attainment of the highest development. This new life is not a fruit of the free play of the tend-dencies and powers of natural life, but is in sharp conflict with them. Man as he is by nature stands in direct contrast to the demands of the spiritual life. Spiritual life, as Professor Eucken says, can be implanted in man by some superior power only and must constantly be sustained by superior life. It breaks through the order of causes and effects; it severs the continuity of the outer world; it makes impossible a rational joining together of realities; it prohibits a monistic view of the immediate condition of the world. This new life derives its power not from Nature; it is a manifestation of Divine life within us (Hauptprobleme der Reli-gionsphilosophie, Leipzig, 1912, 17 ff; Der Kampf um einen geistigen Lebensinhalt, Leipzig, 1907; Grundlinien einer neuen Lebensanschauung, Leipzig, 1907; Johannes Müller, Bauernliebe für persönliche Kultur, 3 vols, München, 1908). Thus the latest development of idealistic philosophy corroborates in a remarkable way the Christian truth of regenration. See also Conversion.

REGION, rē'jün: A "district," as in modern Eng. The word "region" is used by EV interchangeably with "country," "coasts," etc., for various Heb and Gr terms, but "region round about" is usually in AV and invariably in RV the tr of ἐρήμωσις, ἐρήμωσις, "surrounding country.
For a possible technical use of "region" in Acts 16 6 and RV 18 23; see Galatia.

nitus.

REHABIAH, rē-häb'ā (רֶחָבָיָה, r'habiyāh, רֶחְבָּיָה, r'habiyāh, "Jeh is wide"): Son of Eliezer, and grandson of Moses. Eponym of a Levitical city (1 Ch 23 17; 24 21; 26 25).

REHEARSE, rē-hu'rs (רְחַעֲשׁ, šām, רְחַעֲשׁ, ḫāba ций, ḫābā; ḫāmāh, ḫāmāh, "Jeh is wide"); Usually means simply "to relate," "to tell," "to declare" (Ex 17 14; Jgs 5 11; 1 Sa 8 21; 17 31; Acts 14 27); with "rehearse from the beginning" (Acts 11 4, for παρειμα, ἐρήμωσις, "begin" (so RV).
RV has preserved uniformity by translating ἀναγγέλλω by "rehearse" also in Acts 16 4, and has introduced "rehearse" as the tr of ἐρήμωσις, ἐρήμωσις, throughout (Lk 24 35; Acts 10 8; 15 12 14; 21 19), except in Jn 1 18 ("declare"). Sir 27 7, AV has "rehearse" for ἀναγγέλλω, ἐρήμωσις, "repeat" (so RV).

REHEB, rē'hoḇ (רֶהֶב, ṭḥōb; פֹּדָב, Rhōb, Rhōb, פֹּדָב, Rhōb): (1) Etymologically the word means "broad" and might be applied either to a road or a plain.
Rehoab is given (Nu 13 21) as the northern limit of Israel as reached by the spies. This agrees with the position assigned to Beth-rehob in the narrative of the settlement of the Danites (Jgs 18:28). It is mentioned again along with the kingdom of Zobah in connection with the wars of Saul (1 S 14:47; 1 Xx 14:6) and as having been associated with Zobah and Maacah against David in the Ammonite war and as having been defeated by him (2 S 10:6). Robinson sought to identify it with Hinnun, but it hardly suits the references. Buhl (GA, 240) following Thomson (LB, 11, 547) seeks it at Pancaes (modern Banias). This would suit all the requirements of the capital, Beth-rehob, which might then be the second Rehob, assigned as part of the territory of Sidon to the tribe Asher (Josh 19:25-30; Jgs 18:28). We must, however, assign to the kingdom of Rehob a territory extending from the settlements of the Danites to the "entering in of Hamath" or to Libo (modern Lebanon), i.e. the Great Plain of Coele-Syria bounded by Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon and within the limits indicated.

(2) Two separate towns belonging to Asher (Josh 19:28; 19:30). One of them was given to the Gersomite Levites (Josh 21:31), and one is mentioned as remaining in the hands of the Canaanites (Josh 19:30).

(3) Father of Hadadezer, king of Aram Zobah, who was overwhelmed by David at the Euphrates (2 S 8:3,12).

(4) One of the Levites who sealed Nehemiah's covenant on the 24th Tishri, 4th BC (Neh 10:11).

W. M. Chumley: REHOBOAM, rě-hō-bā'am (־רְבֹּבָאָם), Ḳ̄rbōbā'ām, "the people is enlarged," or perhaps "Am is wide;" "Rōbōbām, Rehobōm; "Robocam," Mt 1:7 AV:

1. The Disruption of the Kingdom
2. Underlying Causes of Disruption
3. Shemaiah Forbids Civil War
4. Rehoboam's Prosperity
5. Shishak's Invasion
6. His Death

The son and successor of Solomon, the last king to claim the throne of old Israel and the first king of Judah after the division of the kingdom. He was born c. 967 BC. His mother was Naamah, an Aramean princess. The accession of his reign is not exactly dated in 1 K 14:21-31; 2 Ch 10:12. The incidents leading to the disruption of the kingdom are told in 1 K 11:43--12:24; 2 Ch 9:31--11:4. R. was 41 years old when he began to reign (1 K 12:14; 13:1) and he reigned 19 years. He ascended the throne at Jerusalem immediately upon his father's death with apparently no opposition. North of the Kingdom of Israel, however, was dissatisfied, and the people demanded that the king meet them in popular assembly at Shechem, the leading city of Northern Israel. True, Israel was no longer, if ever, an elective monarchy. Nevertheless, the people claimed a constitutional privilege, based perhaps on the transaction of Samuel in the election of Saul (1 S 10:25), to be a party to the conditions under which they would serve a new king and he become their ruler. David, in making Solomon his successor, had ignored this wise provision, and the people, having lost such a privilege by default, naturally deemed their neglect the cause of Solomon's burdensome taxes and forced labor. Consequently, they would be more jealous of their rights for the future, and R. accordingly would have to accede to their demands. Having come together at Shechem, the people agreed to accept R. as their king on condition that he would lighten the grievous service and burdensome taxes of his father. R. asked for three days' time in which to consider the request. Against the advice of men of rigorous judgment, who assured him that he might win the people by becoming their servant, he chose the counsel of the younger men, who were of his own age, to rule by sternness rather than by kindness, and returned the people a rough answer, saying: "My father's yoke was heavy, but I will add to your yoke: my father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions" (1 K 12:14). R., however, misjudged the temper of the people, as well as his own ability. The people, led by Jeroboam, a leader more able than himself, were ready for rebellion, and so force lost the day where kindness might have won. The threat of the king was met by the Marseilles of the people. What portion have we in David? Is he our king? We have Yhwh, an our God" (1 K 12:16). Thus the ten tribes de-throned R., and elected Jeroboam, their champion and spokesman, their king (see JEROBOAM). R., believing in his ability to rule the nation, sent Adoram, his taskmaster, who no doubt had quelled other disturbances, to subdue the populace, which, insulted by indignities and enraged by R.'s renewed insolence, stoned his messenger to death. Hence, for the first time, the secession of the revolt. R. fled ignominiously back to Jerus, king only of Judah and of the adjacent territory of the tribe of Benjamin. The mistake of R. was the common mistake of despots. He presumed too much on privilege not earned by service, and on power for which he was not willing to render adequate compensation.

It is a mistake, however, to see in the disruption the shattering of a kingdom that had long been a harmonious federation from the very outset. From the sev- enfolded into two, the kingdom of the twelve tribes was imperfectly cemented. They seldom united against their common foe. No mention is made of R. in the list of tribes who fought with Deh- yan against Sisera. A claim of cities held by the Canaanites, stretching across the country from E. to W., kept the North and the South apart. Different physical characteristics produced different types of life in the two sections. Old jealousies repeatedly fanned into new flame intensified the divisions due to natural and artificial causes. David labored hard to break down the division in his reign Israel rebelled twice. North Israel had produced many of the strongest leaders of the nation, and they would have been strong for themselves against the rival ruler from the Judaean dynasty. Solomon, following David's policy of unification, divided in the midst of the days of worship at Jerusalem and through the general splendor of his reign, but he, more than any other, finally divided the nation into the North and the South, through his unjust discriminations, his heavy taxes, his fees, his devotion to general extravagance of his reign. The religion of Jeh was the only bond capable of holding the nation together. The apostasy of Solomon severed this bond. The prophets, with their profound knowledge of religious and political values, saw less danger to the true wor- ship of Jeh in a divided kingdom than in a united nation ruled over by R., who had neither political sagacity nor an adequate conception of the greatness of the religion of Jeh. Accordingly, Ahijah openly encou- raged the revolution, while Shemaiah gave it passive support.

Immediately upon his return to Jerus, R. col- lected a large army of 180,000 men (reduced to 120,000 in LXX B), for the purpose of making war against Israel. The expedition, however, was forbidden by Samuel. R., being determined to bring his expedition, however, was forbidden by Samuel. R., being determined to bring his expedition, however, was forbidden by Samuel. R., being determined to bring his expedition, however, was forbidden by Samuel. R. Forbids Shisha, the leading city of Northern Israel, to prepare the ground that they should not fight against their brethren, and that the division of the kingdom was from God. Notwith- standing the prohibition, we are informed that "there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam continually" (1 K 14:30; 2 Ch 12:15).

R. next occupied himself in strengthening the territory which still remained to him by fortifying a number of cities (2 Ch 11:5-12). These cities were on the roads to Egypt, or on the western hills of the Judaeans Shephelah, and were doubtless fortified as a protection against Egypt. According to 2 Ch 11 13-17, Rehoboam's prosperity was augmented by an immigration of Shishak's time. As the city of Jericho was much used by the Philistines, it is not surprising that it became the capital. It was doubtless of considerable extent; “many of the dwellings had each its cistern, cut in the solid rock”; “once this must have been a city of not less than 12,000 or 15,000 inhabitants. Now it is a perfect field of ruins, a scene of unutterable desolation, across which the passing stranger can with difficulty find his way.” Huntington (Pal and Its Transformation, 124) describes considerable remains of a suburb population extending both to the N. and to the S. of this once important place.

REI, רָאֵי (rē', rē), "friendly"; "Praise, Khesek": Rei, Shimei and the Gibborim who belonged to David are listed among those who did not join Adonijah in his attempt on the throne (1 K 1 8). The name is very uncertain. Winckler (Geschichte, II, 217) identifies him with Ira, the Jairite, who was a "priest to David" (2 Sm 20 26 RVm); he tries to prove that this Ira (or Jair) was a priest of Beth- lehem (Mishna, II, 195). R. H. A. holds that Shimei and Rei were two officers of David s bodyguard. Jos (Ant. VII, xiv, 4) has דאודוב פֹלָר, ho Daoudou philos, thus making Shimei a "friend," the courier of the 2 Sm 15 37; 16 16, and omitting Rei entirely. This would call for an original reading רֶאֵי רֶאֵי, ha-melekh, or רֶאֵי רֶאֵי, ha-melekh, and is too wide a variant from the MT. Assuming that Rei belongs in the text, he is an officer of the royal guard.

HORACE J. WOLF

REIGN, rēn: The Heb word מַלְעָה (mal'āh), מַלָכָה (mal'akh), "to be king" ("to reign as king"), "to become king," "to accede to the throne," "to assume royal power publicly" and, generally speaking, "to become powerful." In the NT θρόνος, βασιλεία, βασιλέα, βασιλεῖα, "reign," "inward"; "kings" or "reign." The latter word, which is derived from Lat regnus through Off. reins, has given place in modern Eng. to the word "kings," see Skeat, Concise Etymological Dictionary of the Eng. Language, 398). RV has, however, retained the older word, at least in the m, in all passages in which it is found in AV: According to Heb psychology the reins are the seat of the deepest emotions and aspirations of man, which God alone can fully know. Thus RV has substituted "heart" for "reins" in the text of Job 19 27; Ps 7 9; 16 7; 26 2; 73 21; Prov 23 16; Jer 11 20; 12 17; 10 19; 20 12; 2 Sm 11 1 while it has substituted "inward parts" for once (Ps 139 13). In one passage AV has substituted the Heb בְּלִיָּה ("laws") with "reins" (Isa 11 5), where the RV has rightly substituted "wait" (q.v.). The Gr word nεφρός (which is etymologically allied to the Middle Eng. wer, Ger. Wer, see Skeat, ibid., 231, s.v. "Reign") is found in 1 Mac 5 24; 23 22. See KINDEYS.

Thus RV has substituted "heart" for "reins" in the text of Job 19 27; Ps 7 9; 16 7; 26 2; 73 21; Prov 23 16; Jer 11 20; 12 17; 10 19; 20 12; 2 Sm 11 1 while it has substituted "inward parts" for once (Ps 139 13). In one passage AV has substituted the Heb בְּלִיָּה ("laws") with "reins" (Isa 11 5), where the RV has rightly substituted "wait" (q.v.). The Gr word nεφρός (which is etymologically allied to the Middle Eng. wer, Ger. Wer, see Skeat, ibid., 231, s.v. "Reign") is found in 1 Mac 5 24; 23 22. See KINDEYS.

REKEM, rēkem (רְקֵם, rekem, "friendship"): (1) One of the five kings of Midian slain by the Israelites under Moses (Nu 31 8; Josh 13 21; [B, פַּטְשָׂא, Ῥήκαμ], probably king of a town in Southern Judah. A town of this name is given as belonging to Benjamin (Josh 18 27).)

(2) Eponym of a Calebite family (1 Ch 2 43 [Pē'as, Ῥήκαμ]; According to the唿喊, probably a town in Southern Judah. A town of this name is given as belonging to Benjamin (Josh 18 27).)

(3) A city of Benjamin, mentioned with Irpeel and Taralah (Josh 18 27); the site is unknown. See also RAKEM.

RELATIONSHIPS, rē-lat-shēn-hips, FAMILY:

I. Consanguinity. — Genealogical records were carefully kept by the ancient Hebrews (of those Gen Nu, Ch, Ez, Neh, Mt, Lk), not only because they formed the basis of a man's title to his property (Nu 27 8-11; exceptional case, 36 1-12), but also because on occasion these degrees fixed the right of the family to intermarry with the priestly caste. descent was traced through the father; a man's closest association was therefore with his father's family, and he was ordinarily referred to as the son of his father, thus the son of Abraham (Gen 25 19), Joshua the son of Nun, Caleb the son of Jephunneh (Nu 14 6). Still there are instances of men named for their mothers (Joab the son of Zeruiah), and a man's relation with his mother's family was fully recognized in the laws forbidding incest. No linear relatives were permitted to intermarry (Lev 18 7-10). The relations of ancestors and descendants were considered so close that the ordinary terms of relationship between children and parents are used constantly in relation to grandparents and remote ancestors. The wishes of a great-grandfather are respected long after his death as the wishes of a father (Jer 35 16).

The father (בָּן, 'ab; נִשּׁה, nishāh; נְבֵית, nehits) was the head of the family (mishpāhah) and household (behafrāh), which was a religious (1 S 20 6-29; Ex 12 3; Job 1 5) as well as and a social and political unit, consisting Children usually of a combination of families in the modern sense. As long as polygamy prevailed, a family would include at least the several groups of children of the wives and concubines. The Bible represents the Heb father as commanding (Gen 50 16; Jer 35 6 ff; Prov 6 20), instructing (Prov 1 4; 4 1), and rebuking (Gen 37 10; Nu 12 14); at the same time, as loving (Gen 25 28; 37 4; 44 20), pitying (Ps 103 13), and blessing his household (Gen 27 41), rejoicing over its triumphs (Prov 10 1; 15 20), or grieving over its misfortunes (Gen 37 35). The mother, too (מֵאָה, meʾēḥ; נִשָּׁה, nishāʾah), naturally displayed love and care (Gen 25 28; Prov 4 3; Isa 49 15; 66 13). To the Heb woman childlessness was considered the greatest of misfortunes (1 S 1 10 ff, of Hannah; Gen 30 23, of Rachel). Children were looked upon as a blessing from God (Ps 127 3) and the defenders of the home (vs 4, 5). In early life a child was more directly under the care of the father than of the mother; the mother was its first teacher (Prov 1 8). Thereafter the father was expected to direct the training of the son (בָּנָי, bāni; יִבְשָׂס, yibshās; רְשָׁא, reshāʾ) probably remained with the mother until her marriage (Mic 7 6). Both parents are looked upon in the Law as objects of honor (Ex 20 12; Dt 5 16 [the Fifth Commandment]; Ex 21 15; Lev 20 9; Dt 27 16; Prov 20 20; Ezk 22 7; Mic 7 6), obedience (Gen 18 17; Lev 19 14; Dt 18 15 ff), and love (1 K 19 20; Prov 28 24; 30 11). The control of parents was so great as to include the right to sell daughters in marriage, but not, without restrictions, into slavery (Ex 21 7-11; cf 22 16 f; Lev 19 14; Neh 5 5), a power which, under the Mosaic law, could not (Dt 22 28-29); they could chastise children (Dt 8 5; 21 18; Prov 13 24; Ecclus 30 1-13), and in the early days even exerted the power of life and death over them (Gen 22; Jgs 11 39; Lev 18 21; 20 2-5; 2 K 23 10; Mt 15 4). This power, at least for sacrificial purposes, was entirely removed by the Law, and changed, even for punishment, in the case of a stubborn, rebellious, gluttonous and disobedient son to a mere right of complaint to the proper authorities (Dt 21 18-21), who were to put him to death. Infanticide by exposure, such as was common among other ancient peoples, seems never to have been practised by the Hebrews. That the children were nevertheless the chattels of the parents seems to be attested from the fact that they could be seized for the debts of the father (2 K 14 6). The father could annul the vows of his daughter (Nu 30 3-5), and damages for wrongs done to her were paid to him, as in Eng. law "for loss of services" (Dt 22 22). A widow's or divorced daughter could return to her father (Gen 30 11; Lev 21 9, 10; Ruth 1 15). At his death the mother would become the actual, if not the legal, head of the household (2 K 8 1-6, the Shunammite woman; Tob 1 8, Tobit's grandmother; of the position of the head of the family of Jesus). This was esp. true of the queen mother (םְלֹה, melāh), whose name is usually given in the accounts of the kings of Judah (i K 1 11; 2 19), where a throne at the king's right hand was set for the king's mother; 11 20, 14 23; 15 2; 16 1). Usual of her was that she was the "great lady" according to Malachi (4 5 [Heb 3 23]) is one of conciliation of parents and children.

The terms "father" (亲子, 'ab; אֶלֶף, adāphō; אֶלֶפָד, adāphād) and "sister" ( الزمن, ṣimōn; אָבִית, ṣāḇīt; אֲדָלָפָה, ṣāḇīt) apply to children of the same father and mother (Gen 4 2), and also to children of one father (Gen 25 28; 37 4; 44 20), pitying (Ps 103 13), and blessing his household (Gen 27 41), rejoicing over its triumphs (Prov 10 1; 15 20), or grieving over its misfortunes (Gen 37 35). The mother, too (בָּנָי, 'ab; נִשָּׁה, nishāʾah), naturally displayed love and care (Gen 25 28; Prov 4 3; Isa 49 15; 66 13). To the Heb woman childlessness was considered the greatest of misfortunes (1 S 1 10 ff, of Hannah; Gen 30 23, of Rachel). Children were looked upon as a blessing from God (Ps 127 3) and the defenders of the home (vs 4, 5). In early life a child was more directly under the care of the father than of the mother; the mother was its first teacher (Prov 1 8). Thereafter the father was expected to direct the training of the son (בָּנָי, bāni; יִבְשָׂס, yibshās; רְשָׁא, reshāʾ) probably remained with the mother until her marriage (Mic 7 6). The control of parents was so great as to include the right to sell daughters in marriage, but not, without restrictions, into slavery (Ex 21 7-11; cf 22 16 ff; Lev 19 14; Neh 5 5), a power which, under the Mosaic law, could not (Dt 22 28-29); they could chastise children (Dt 8 5; 21 18; Prov 13 24; Ecclus 30 1-13), and in the early days even exerted the power of life and death over...

Relationships

20 12) or of one mother (Gen 43 7; Lev 18 9; 20 17). The brother as well as the father was the natural protector of the honor of his wife. Jacob speaks thus, in a later form: "The man was "taken" by her husband, or "given" by her father or, in the case of a servant, by her master or mistress (Gen 2 22; 16 3; 34 9.21), and although the contract was between the men (Gen 29; 39 16; Ex 22 16; Dt 22 29; Ruth 4 10) or the parents (Gen 21 21; 24), it is probable that the consent of the girl was usually asked (Gen 24 58). Love between the young people was given due consideration (as in the case of Samson, Shechem, Jacob and Rachel; [Gen 29 18], David and Michal [1 S 18 20]); at Abel's burial there were among married people, so that Hoesa could compare the attitude of husband toward wife to that of Jehovah toward Israel. As a matter of legal right, it is probable that throughout the Orient long before the events narrated in the Book of Est, every man did "bear rule in his own house" (Est 1 22). In fact a precedent for the Pers decree has been traced as far back as the first joint head (Gen 3 16). Nevertheless, we find many instances in which the wife seems to take the lead in the family. In the case of Samson, the parents of Samson's parents (Jgs 13 23), of the Shunammite woman (2 K 4), of Jael (Jgs 4 18 ff; 5 24 ff), of Achar's Ishai (Job 16 3; 21), Sapphira (Acts 5 1 et seq) and the woman who, at least consulted in the affairs of their several households. Abraham is even commanded by the voice of God, "In all that Sarah saith unto thee, hearken unto her voice" (Gen 21 12). That most of these women were not only permitted but almost encouraged to be consulted, is attested by the fact that at least in the earlier times the best of them had to resort to stratagem to accomplish their purposes (as in the cases of Rebekah [Gen 27 6 ff], Rachel (Gen 31 4), Leah (Gen 30 16) and Abigail (1 S 25 18 ff), and even to get information as to their husband's affairs (Sarah, Gen 18 10; Rebekah, Gen 27 5)). Perhaps their humbler sisters in later days accomplished their ends by being so contentious as to attract the notice of two proverb-collectors (Prov 21 9; 25 21). Though we have no instance of the exercise of the right of life and death over the wife by the husband, and though it is clear that the Heb husband had no power of sale (cf Ex 21 8), it is frequently asserted that the basis of child ownership, the one-sided ownership in the OT (Dt 21 14), and on the basis of analogy with other ancient laws, as well as because the wife is spoken of in conjunction with property (Ex 20 17) and because the husband exercised the right to annul the wife's vows (Nu 30 6), that the wife occupied in the ordinary Hb home a very subordinate position. It must not be forgotten, however, that the husband owed duties to the wife (Ex 21 10). It must also be borne in mind that great divergence existed at different times and places in different stations of society. Most of our OT evidence pertains to the wealthier classes. The two extremes of the women that are "at ease in Zion" (Isa 32 9-20; cf Am 4 1 ff; 6 1 ff) and the "busy "good wife" described in Prov 31 10 ff are hardly excelled in the most complex society today. The latter probably gives the fairer as well as the more wholesome picture of the functions of the wife in the home, and it is significant that her husband as well as her sons are expected to call her blessed (Prov 31 29).

It is difficult to estimate the extent to which polygamy and concubinage were practised in ancient Pal, but it is clear that the former practice was discouraged even among kings (Dt 17 17), and the latter, an outgrowth of slavery, was not held in high repute (cf Dt 21 10-14). The position of a les-favored wife (Dt 21 15, "hated") was naturally unpleasant, and her relations with other wives of her husband decried bitterly—they were called each other's "strife, lit. "abuse." (Rev "rivals," Lev 18 18; 1 S 1 6, AV "adversary"; cf Ecclesi 37 11)—even when they were sisters (as in the case of Rachel and Leah, Gen 30 1). Hence the Law forbade the marrying of two sisters (Lev 18 18). On the other hand so strong was the desire of a Heb mother for children that the chance-wed wife welcomed the children of a maid-servant born to her husband as her own (Gen 30 1 12, etc.).

In normal Heb society, for reasons already explained, the relations of a family with the husband's parents (יִתְנָה, הֵדֶן, fem. יִתְנָה, הֵדֶנָּה, הֵדֶבֶל; יִתְנָה, -ן, -ן, -ן, -ן); Where under special conditions a man remained with his wife's tribe after marriage, as in the case of Jacob, serving out his mohar, or Moses fleeing from the wrath of the Egyptians, or the sons of Elimelek appearing in the land of Moab because of the famine in Pal, his identity with his own tribe was not destroyed, and at the first opportunity the natural impulse was to return to his own country. The bride, on the other hand, leaving her people, would become a member of her husband's tribe, with the rights and duties of a daughter (Mic 7 6). Thus Judah can order Tamar burned for violation of the obligations of a widow (Gen 38 24). No doubt the position of the daughter-in-law varied in the Heb home between the extremes of those who vexed their parents-in-law unto the death (Gen 26 35; 27 46; 28 8) and the one who said to her mother-in-law, "Jeh do so to me ... if aught but death part thee and me" (Ruth 1 17). Parents-in-law and children-in-law were considered too closely related to intermarry (Lev 18 15; 20 12 14).

A woman's brother acting in loco parentis might perform all the offices of a father-in-law and possibly be called hohem (Gen 21 30 55; 24 3. Brother- 11 ff). Naturally, brothers-in-law and in-law, etc sisters-in-law would be considered too closely related to intermarry (Lev 18 16 18; 20 2). Nevertheless the husband's brother (יִתְנָה, -ן, -ן, -ן, -ן) expected to marry the childless widow to establish the name of the deceased on his inheritance (Dt 25 5 10). This custom dated back to Canaanitic practice (Gen 38 8), and from the connection between marrying the childless widow and the restoration of land would be called part of the land of Pal (Ruth 4 1 12; cf Jer 32 6 6). In practice the Levirate was probably considered more in the nature of a moral duty than a privilege (Dt 25 7; Ruth 4 6), and devoted not only on the brother, but on other members of a deceased husband's family in the order of the nearness of their relationship to him (Ruth 3 12). In the Heb family brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law would form part of the same household. In this relation as in others we find both ideal friendship (David and Jonathan, 1 S 15 3; 2 S 1 26) and petty jealousies (in the matter of Moses' wife, Nu 12 1). Ill. Other Domestic Relations.—The Heb יִתְנָה, 'omen, fem. יִתְנָה, יִתְנָה, יִתְנָה, יִתְנָה (participle of 'aman), "nourishing, nourishment, to nourish," and "nursing, father mother" (Nu 11 12; Isa 49 23), "nurse" (Ruth 4 16; 2 S 4 4), or simply as the equivalent of "bringing up" (2 K 10 1 5; Est 2 7). In the case of Ahinoam's children, and possibly in the other instances referred to, the relation of foster-parents is suggested. The foster-children under such conditions obeyed the words of the foster-father as the words of a father (Est 2 20). Michal is spoken of as the mother of Merab's two children (2 S 21 8) because she reared them (Sanhedrin 190). Adoption in the Rom sense was, however, hardly to be expected in a polysynonymous society where the childless father could remarry. Nevertheless, Jacob adopts Manasseh and Ephraim (Gen 48 5), and the father of the tribe of tribes. According to Jos, while Abraham was childless he adopted Lot (Ant., I, vii, 1), and the daughter of Pharaoh adopted Moses (Ant., II, ix, 7; cf Ex 2 10). In NT times the notion of adoption was so familiar that Paul uses the word figuratively of conversion (katabia, kathodeia, Rom 8 15; 9 4; Gal 4 5; Eph 1 5).

The "family" as the word is used of ancient peoples included dependents. The Heb mishpahah is connected with the word shiphahah, "maid-servant," as the Lat familia and Servants For a discussion of the various classes of servants and slaves, Heb and foreign, male and female, see Slaverty.

When Lot protested against betraying his visitors to the men of Sodom, forsooth as they had come under the shadow of his roof, and he even preferred to give his daughters to the mob rather than fail in his duties as a host (Gen 19 8), he was acting on the ancient principle of guest-friendship (cf Gr xenia), which bound host and guest by sacred ties. In the light of this principle the act of Jaal, who receives Sisera as a guest, and then betrays him, becomes startling and capable of explanation only on the basis of the spirit of hatred existing at the time, and justifiable, if at all, only on the theory that all is fair in war (Jgs 4 18 21; 5 24 27). The nomads of ancient times and even the post-exilic Hebrews, like the Arabs of today, were bound by a temporary covenant whenever there was "salt between them," that is, in the relation of host and guest (Ezr 4 14; of the expression "covenant of salt," 2 Ch 13 5; Nu 18 19). In the early Christian church breaking bread together served as a sort of brith 'ahim, or covenant of brothers. In later times, as with the king, those that ate at the table were members of the household (2 S 9 11, compared to sons; cf also 2 S 9 7 10 13; 19 28; 1 K 2 7; 4 27; 18 19). See Hospitallt.

The gër or stranger (as indicated by the expression "thy stranger") [Ex 20 10; Lev 25 6; Dt 5 14; 29 11; 31 12; cf of 1 16], Heb Stranger himself to an influential Hebrew for protection. Thus we read a "sojourner of the priest's" (Lev 22 10, tshah; of 26 6) who was in many respects a dependent, but still to be distinguished from a servant (Lev 22 11). The Mosaic Law commands that such strangers be treated with consideration (Ex 12 9 49; 20 10; 22 21 5; 23 9; Lev 19 13; 20 16; 10 18; 14 21, etc; Ps 145 9) and even with love (Dt 16 14; Lev 19 34). See Stranger.

Release, relés: (1) The forgiveness of a debt (מִיתָם, שְׁמִיתָם [Dt 15 1 2 9; 31 10; see Jubilee Year], with vb. shama, "to release," vs 23. (2) To exempt one from taxation (נְאַהַם, הֵדֶבֶל; יִתְנָה, הוֹדֶנָּה, יִתְנָה, יִתְנָה), "release," "rest" (Est 2 18). Some would render "granted a holiday." (3) To set a prisoner or slave at liberty (דְּשָׁנוֹת, apolous, "to let go free" [Mt 27 15 | Jn 19 10], etc.

Religious, rē-lijūn: "Religion" and "religious" in Elizabethan Eng. were used frequently to denote the outward expression of worship. This is the force of ἰδρυσις, ἐτρακσα, τρείρ "religion" in Acts 26:5; Jas 1:26;27 (with adj. ἀρχαίον, "religious"), while the same noun in Col 2:18 is rendered "worshiping" (so in the AV). It would give the exact meaning. And in the same external sense "religion" is used by AV for λατρεία, λατρευν, "worshiping" (so RV), in 1 Mac 1:43; 2:19:22. Otherwise "Jews' religion" (or "religion of the Jews") appears in 2 Mac 8:14; 13:22; Gal 13:14 (Ἰουδαϊσμός, Ἰουδαϊστής, "Judaism"), and "an alien religion" in 2 Mac 6:24 (Ἀλλοφυλεσίας, ἀλλοφυλεσίατος, "that belonging to another tribe"). The neglect of the external force of "religion" has led to much reckless misquoting of Jas 1:26:27. Cf Acts 17:22 and see SUPERSTITION. Burton Scott Easton.

REMAINDER, ré-mán'dér (וָאָ֫בָּד), yáthhar, "to be left," גִּנָּ֖נָּת, sh'érith, "remnant"): In 2 S 14 7 "residue" would have been clearer (of Ps 76:10), but the changes of RV in Lev 6:16; 7:16.17 are pointless (contrast Ex 23:34).

REMALLAH, rem-a-lā' (רמאלת), r'malṭáḥ (whom Jehovah has adorned): The father of Pekah (2 K 15:25; Is 7:4 ff; 8:6). The contemptuous allusion to Pekah as "the son of Remaliah" in Is 7:4 (similarly "the son of Kish," 1 S 10:11) may be a slur on Remaliah's humble origin.

REMEMBER, ré-mem'ber, REMEMBRANCE, ré-mem-nérán: "Remember" is mostly the tr. in the OT, of[z, zahar, and in the NT of μνωμων, μνημονευ, (Mt 5:23; 26:75; Jn 2:17, etc), and of μνημονευω, μνημονευομαι (Mt 16:9; Mk 8:18; Lk 17:32, etc), and "remembrance" the tr. of derivatives of these (zeker, andminēs, etc). There are a few other words. "To remember" is used of God in remembering persons (Gen 1:8; 19:2), etc; his covenant (Gen 9:15; Ex 2:24; Ezek 66:60, etc), in answering prayer (Jgs 16:28; Neh 13:14;22; Ps 20:3, etc), and in other ways. Men are exhorted to "remember" God's dealings with them, His command (Dt 8:16:17; Josh 2:10; 10:16 12, etc), the Sabbath (Ex 20:8). A specially solemn command is that relating to the Lord's Supper in Lk 22:19; 1 Cor 11:24,25. This do in remembrance of me.

"Remembrance" (writer of chronicles) occurs in AV of 2 S 18:16; 20:24; 1 K 4:3; 1 Ch 16:15 (text "recorder," RV "chronicle"). In Isa 62:6, RV reads, "ye that are Jehovah's rememberers." RV has frequent changes on AV text, as "have marked") (1 S 15:2); "mark and mention") (Ps 30:7; 77:11; Cant 1:4); "rememberer" for "be ye mindful") (1 Ch 16:15); "memorial" for "remembrance") (Isa 57:8); in ARV, "to his holy memorial name") (Ps 30:4; 97:12, ERV "to his holy name," m Heb "memorial"); in 2 Tim 1:5, having been reminded of") for AV "call to remembrance," etc. W. L. Walker REMETH, ré-meth, rem'eth (רֵ֖מֶת), remeth; B, ῥαμάθα, ῥαμάθας, A, ῥαμαθᾶ, ῥαμαθᾶς): A place in the territory of Issachar named with En-gannim (Josh 19:21). It is probably identical with Remath, in 1 Ch 2:35, and Jarnament of Josh 21:29. It is represented today by the village er-Ramah, situated on a hill which rises abruptly from the green plain about 11 miles S.W. of Jenin (En-gannim). While the southern boundary of Issa

ISA 40:31, it refers to the restoring of spiritual strength; (7) in the NT it invariably refers to spiritual renewal, e.g. Rom 12:2; 2 Cor 4:16; Eph 4:23; Col 3:10; Tit 3:5; He 6:6; all derivatives of σωάν, kaúna, "new."
G. H. GERBERING

REPAIR, ré-pár (רָפָא, maḥsheh, "refuge"): In Joel 3:16, for AV "The Lord will be the hope of his people!" AV then renders "place of repair," or, "hut of refuge." RV gives "refuge." Other words are פָּתָא, הָשָּׁא, "to strengthen, "to harden," "fix" (2 K 12:5 and often; Neh 3); נָשָּׁא, rápháh, "to heal" (1 K 18:30); נְשִׁי, "to stand still" (Ezr 9:9); נָשָּׁה, הָשָּׁה, "to revive" (1 Ch 11:5); נָשָּׁב, "to close up" (1 K 11:27).

In RV Apoc for εἰσπαράτευσαι, ἐπιστρέφοντας, "to patch up" (Sir 50:11); וַהֲשָׁא, episkeuázontas, "to get ready" (1 Mac 12:37). In 1 Mac 14:34 occurs "reparation" (modern Eng. "repairs") for εἰσπαράτευσαι, επιστρέφοντας, "strengthening up."

LITERATURE
To get an accurate idea of the precise NT meaning of this highly important word it is necessary to consider its approximate synonyms in the original Heb and Gr. The psychological elements of repentance should be considered in the light of the general teaching of Scripture.

The Heb word רָפָא, nāḥam, is an onomatopoetic term which implies difficulty in breathing, hence "to pant," "to sigh,"
1. Repent, "to groan." Naturally it came to "to Pant," to signify "to lament" or "to grieve," "to Sigh" and when the emotion was produced by the desire of good for others, it merged into compassion and sympathy, and when incited by a consideration of one's own character and deeds it means "to rue," "to repent." To adduce as our understanding, God is represented as repenting when averted penalties are at last to be inflicted, or when threatened evils have been averted by genuine reformation (Gen 6:6; Jon 3:10). This word is τρέπω repet" about 40 times in the O.T., and in nearly all cases it refers to God. The principal idea is not personal relation to sin, either in its experience of grief or in turning from an evil course. Yet the results of sin are manifest in its use. God's heart is grieved at man's iniquity, and in love He bestows His grace, or in justice He terminate...His mercy. It indicates the aroused emotions of God which prompt Him to a different course of dealing with the people. Similarly when used with reference to man, only in this case the consciousness of personal transgression is evident. This distinction in the application of the word is intended by such declarations as God "is not a man, that he should repent" (1 S 15:29; Job 42:6; Jer 8:6). The term נחָש, shabb, is most generally employed to express the Scriptural idea of genuine repentance. It is used extensively by the prophets, and makes prominent the idea of God as a father to man and to enter into fellowship with God. It is employed extensively with reference to man's turning away from sin to righteousness (Dt 4:30; Neh 1:9; Ps 7:12; Jer 3:14). It quite often refers to God in His relation to man (Ex 32:12; Josh 7:26). It is employed to indicate the thorough spiritual change which God alone can effect (Zech 12:8). When God employs the term "return" it has reference either to man, to God, or to God and man (Isa 1:26; Ps 50:13 [both terms, nāḥam and shabb); Isa 21:12; 55:7). Both terms are also sometime employed when the twofold idea of grief and altered relations is expressed, the one is tsōb by "repent" and "return" (Ezk 14:6; Hos 12:6; Jon 3:8).

II. NT TERMS
The term παραλλάσσω, meta-méllomai, literally signifies to have a feeling or care, concern or regret; like nāḥam,
1. Repent, it expresses the emotional aspect of "to Be repentance. The feeling indicated by Careful" or the word may issue in genuine repentance. "Concerned ance, or it may degenerate into mere With" remorse (Mt 21:32, 27). Judas repented only in the sense of regret, remorse, and not in the sense of the abandonment of sin. The word is used with reference to Paul's feeling concerning a certain course of conduct, and with reference to God in His purposes of grace (2 Cor 7:8 AV; He 7:21). The word περαλοβεί, meta-bolébs, expresses the true NT idea of the spiritual change implied in a sinner's return to God. The term signifies to have another mind; to change the opinion or purpose with regard to the mind. It is equivalent to the OT word "turn." Thus it is employed by John the Baptist, Jesus, and the apostles (Mt 3:2; Mk 1:15; Acts 3:18). The idea expressed by the word is intimately associated with different aspects of spiritual transformation and of Christian life, with the process in which the agency of man is prominent, as faith (Acts 20:21), and as conversion (Acts 19:3), and with those experiences and blessings of which God alone is the author, as remission and forgiveness of sin (Lk 24:47; Acts 5:31). It is sometimes conjoined with baptism, which as an overt public act proclaims a changed relation to God and God (Mt 3:14; Lk 3:3; Acts 13:24, 19:4). As a vital experience, repentance is to manifest its reality by producing good fruits appropriate to the new spiritual life (Mt 3:8).

The word ἐπιστρέφω, epistárephō, is used to bring out more clearly the distinct change wrought in repentance. It is employed quite frequently in Acts to express the positive side of a change involved in NT repentance, or to indicate the return to God of which the turning from sin is the negative aspect. The two conceptions are inseparable and complementary. The word is used to express the spiritual transition from sin to God (Acts 9:53; 1 Thess 1:9); to strengthen the idea of faith (Acts 11:21); and to complete and emphasize the change required by NT repentance (Acts 26:20).

There is great difficulty in expressing the true idea of a change of thought with reference to sin when we translate the NT "repentance" into other languages. The Lat version renders it "exercise penitence (poenitentiam agere). But "penitence" etymologically signifies pain, grief, distress, rather than a change of thought and purpose. Thus Lat Christianity has been corrupted by the pernicious error of proscribing grief over sin's state and abandonment of sin as the primary idea of NT repentance. It was easy to make the transition from penitence to penance, consequently the Romanists represent Jesus and the apostles as urging people to do penance (poenitentiam agere). The Eng.
word "repent" is derived from the Lat. repentire, and inherits the fault of the Lat, making grief the principal idea and keeping in the background, if not altogether out of sight, the fundamental NT conception of a change of mind with reference to sin. But the exhortations of the ancient prophets, of Jesus, and of the apostles show that the change of mind is the dominant idea of the words employed, while the accompanying grief and consequent reformation enter into one's experience from the very nature of the case.

1. The Psychological Elements.—Repentence is that change of a sinner's mind which leads him to turn from his evil ways and live.

The change wrought in repentance is so deep and radical as to affect the whole spiritual nature and to involve the entire personality. The intellect must function, the emotions must be aroused, and the will must act. Psychology shows repentance to be profound, personal and all-pervasive. The intellectual element is manifest from the nature of man as an intelligent being, and from the demands of God who desires only rational service. Man must apprehend sin as unutterably heinous, the Divine law as perfect and inexorable, and himself as a sinner and falling below the requirements of a holy God (Job 42:5; Ps 51:3; Rom 3:20).

There may be a knowledge of sin without turning from it as an awful thing which dishonors God and ruins man. The change of view may lead on man merely to a desire of punishment and not to the hatred and abandonment of sin (Ex 9:27; Nu 22:34; Josh 7:20; 1 S 16:24; Mt 27:4).

An emotional element is necessarily involved in repentance. While feeling is not the equivalent of repentance, it nevertheless may be a powerful impulse to a genuine turning from sin. A penitent cannot from the nature of the case be stolid and indifferent. The emotional attitude must be altered if NT repentance be experienced. There is a type of grief that issues in repentance and another which plunges into remorse. There is a godly sorrow and also a sorrow of the world. The former brings life; the latter, death (Mt 27:3; Lk 18:23; 2 Cor 7:9-10).

There must be a conscious sense of sin in the individual's relation to God before there can be a hearty turning away from unrighteousness. The feeling naturally accompanying repentance implies a conviction of personal sin and sinfulness and an earnest appeal to God to forgive according to Lk 11:2(10-14).

The most prominent element in the psychology of repentance is the voluntary, or volitional. This aspect of the penitent's experience is expressed in the OT by "turn," or "return," and in the NT by repent," or "turn." The words employed in the Heb and Gr place chief emphasis on the will, the change of mind, or of purpose, because a complete and sincere turning to God involves both the apprehension of the nature of sin and the consciousness of personal guilt (Jer 25:5; Mt 1:15; Acts 2:38; 2 Cor 7:9-10). The demand for repentance implies free will and individual responsibility. That men are called upon to repent there can be no doubt, and that God is represented as taking the initiative in repentance is equally clear. The solution of the problem belongs to the spiritual sphere. The psychical phenomena have their origin in the mysterious relations of the human and the Divine personalities. There can be no extension on the natural plane. Sackcloth for the body and remorse for the soul are not to be confused with a determined abandonment of sin and return to God. Not material sacrifice, but a spiritual change, is the inexorable demand of God in both dispensations (Ps 51:17; Isa 1:11; Jer 6:20; Hos 6:6).

Repentence is only a condition of salvation and not its meritorious ground. The motives for repentance are chiefly found in the goodness of God, in the Divine love, in the pathetic desire to have sinners saved, in the inevitable consequences of sin, in the universal demands of the gospel, and in the hope of spiritual life and membership in the kingdom of heaven (Ezk 33:11; Mk 1:15; Lk 13:1-3; Jn 18:11; Acts 2:20; Rom 2:4; 1 Tim 2:4). The first four beatitudes (Mt 5:3-6) form a heavenly ladder by which penitent souls pass from the dominion of Satan into the Kingdom of God. A consciousness of spiritual poverty doth refining, a sense of personal unworthiness producing grief, a willingness to surrender to God in genuine humility, and a strong spiritual desire developing into hunger and thirst, enter into the experience of one who wholly abandons sin and heartily turns to Him who grants repentance unto life.

REPETIONS, rep-i-tish'yun: In Mt 6:7 only, "Use not therefore the repetition of words, but let your speech be always seasoned with graciousness,..." Repetitions of a family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26:7). The name occurs in Tob and En ("Raphel"); it probably belongs to a group of late formations. See Gray, HPN, 225, 311.

REPHAIM, re-fa'el, re-fa-el (Ne'f, r'ph'ay'ah, "God has healed"); Pa'af, Raphel): The eponym of a family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26:7). The name occurs in Tob and En ("Raphel"); it probably belongs to a group of late formations. See Gray, HPN, 225, 311.

REPHAH, re-fa'ay, re-fa'ya (Ne'f, r'ph'ay'ah, probably "Jeh is healing"); LXX Pa'af, Riph, Ra'phad (a): (1) In David's family, LXX also Raphah (1 Ch 3:21).

(2) A captain of Simeon (1 Ch 4:42).

(3) A grandson of Iseaar, LXX also Rapharad (1 Ch 7:2).

(4) A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 9:43; in 8:37 called "Raphah" ([Ne'f]); LXX also Raphah).

One of the repairers of the wall under Nehemiah (Neh 3:9).

REPHAIM, re-fa'im, re-fa'aim (Ne'f, r'ph'aim, "a terrible one," hence 'giant," as in 1Ch 20:4, Ne'f, r'ph'aim, y'Efleh hā-r'ph'aim, "sons of the giant"); AV Rephaim): A race of aboriginal or early inhabitants E of the Jordan in Asheroth-karnaim (Gen 14:5) and in the vale of Rephaim S.W. of Jerusalem (Josh 10:8). They associated with... other giant races, as the Emim and Anakim (Dt 2:10.11) and the Zuzummum (ver 20). It is probable that they were all of the same stock, being given different names by the different tribes who came in contact with them. The same Heb word is rendered "the dead," or "the shades" in various passages (Job 36:5; Ps 68:10; Prov 2:18; 9:15; 21:16; Is 14:9; 26:14.19 m). In these instances the word is derived from רפָּחַה, rāphēh, "weak," "powerless," "a shadow" or "shade.

REPHAIM, VALE OF (עֵדֶּר חָמָן; 1 Mc 19:27; "emek r'phānim; פִּלְגָּתָה, Pīlāqāt Rāphāhem, פִּלְגָּתָה תָּבָא, Pīlāqāt Ṭāḇāyān;): This was a fertile vale (Isa 17:5), to the S.W. of Jerusalem (Josh 15:8; 18:16; AV "Valley of the Giants"), on the border between Judah and Benjamin. Here David repeatedly defeated the invading Philistines (2 S 5:18; 22:13; 1 Ch 11:15; 14:9). It is located by Jos between Jerusalem and Bethlem (Ant, VII, iv, i; xii, 4). It corresponds to the modern el-Bīko, which falls away to the S.W. from the lip of the valley of Hinnom. The name in ancient times may perhaps have referred to a larger area, including practically all the land between Jerusalem and Bethlem, where the headwaters of Nahar Rūṭān are collected.

REPHAN, רָפָן: A name for Chion, the planet Saturn. See Astrology, 7; CREMN.

REPHIDIM, רֵפִּידִים (בֵּית אי, רפִדִים, "rests"); פִּדים, Rāphidiym): A station in the Wanderings, between the wilderness of Sin and the wilderness of Sinai (Ex 17:18; 19:2; Nu 33:14). The host expected to find water here; to their distress the streams were dry, and water was miraculously provided. Palmer (Desert of the Exodus, 158 ff) states cogent reasons for identifying Rephidim with Wady Feiran. It is the most fertile part of the peninsula, well watered, with a palm grove stretching for miles along the valley. Palmer speaks of passing through the palm grove as a "most delightful" walk; "the tall, graceful trees afforded a delicious shade, fresh water ran at our feet, and, above all, bulbous fritillaries from branch to branch cast a carpet of sweet notes." Our camp was pitched at the "mouth of Wady 'Aleidy, a large open space completely surrounded by steep, shelving mountains of gneiss, the fantastic cleavage of which added greatly to the beauty of the scene. Palms and tamarisks were dotted all around, and on every knoll and mountain slope were ruined houses, churches, and walls, the relics of the ancient mo-nastic city of Paran. Behind our tents rose the majestic mass of Serbal, and beneath the rocky wall opposite ran a purling brook, only a few inches in depth, but still sufficiently cool, clear, and refreshing."

Such a place as this the Amalekites would naturally wish to preserve for themselves against an impending attack. For these desert dwellers, indeed, the possession of this watered vale may well have been a matter of life and death.

If this identification is correct, then Jebel Tahuneh, "Mount of the mill," a height that rises on the N. of the valley, may have been the hill from which Moses, with Aaron and Hur, viewed the battle.

REPROBATE, rep'rō-bāt: This word occurs in the Eng. Bible in the following passages: Jer 6:30 (RV "refuse"); Rom 1:25; 2 Cor 13:5.6.7; 2 Tim 3:8; Tit 1:16. In all the cases above, the word is "adokimos, unacknowledged." The same Gr word, however, is found with other renderings in Is 1:22 ("dross"); Prov 25:4 ("dross"); 1 Cor 9:27 ("castaway," "rejected"). The primary meaning of adokimos is "not-received," "not-acknowledged." This is applied to precious metals or money, in the sense of "not-current," to which, however, the connotation "not-genuine" easily attaches itself. It is also applied to persons who do not or ought not to receive honor or recognition. This purely negative connotation frequently passes over into the positive one of that which is or ought to be rejected, either by God or men. Of the above passages 1 Cor 9:27 uses the word in this meaning. Probably Rom 1:25, "God gave them up unto a reprobrate mind," must be understood on this principle: the nois of the idolatrous heathen is permitted by God to fall into such extreme forms of evil as to meet with the universal rejection and repudiation of men. Wettstein's interpretation, "an unfit mind," i.e. incapable of properly performing its function of moral discrimination, has no linguistic warrant, and obliterates the word-play between "they refused to have God in their knowledge [ook adokimason]," and "God gave them up to a reprobate [unacknowledged, adokimoas] mind." Even Tit 1:16, "unto every good work reprobate," affords no instance of the meaning "unfit," but belongs to the following rubric.

The close phonetic resemblance and etymological affinity of dokimos to the vb. dokimazo, "to try," "test," "has led the notion that the word is "tried," "tried," and its opposite of "being found wanting in the test" to associate itself more or less distinctly with the adj. dokimos and adokimos. Thus the more complex meaning results of that which is not acknowledged, not rejected, but it has not been found or not approved itself in testing. This connotation is present in 2 Cor 13:5.6.7; 2 Tim 3:8; Tit 1:16; He 6:8. In the first two of these passages the word is used of Christians who ostensibly were in the true faith, but either hypothetically are represented as having failed to meet the test. "Reprobate unto every good work" (Tit 1:16) are they who by their life have disappointed the expectation of good works. The "reprobate [rejected] land" of He 6:8 is land that by bearing thorns and thistles has failed to meet the test of the husbandman. It should be noticed, however, that adokimos, even in these cases, always retains the meaning of rejection because of failure in trial; of the last-named passage: "rejected and nigh unto cursing."

REPROOF, rep'rō-ref; REPROVE, rep'rō-vāv: "Reprove" in Elizabethan Eng. had a variety of meanings ("reject," "disprove," "convince," "rebuke"), with "put to the proof" (see 2 Tim 4:2 RVm) as the force common to all, although in modern Eng. the word means only "rebuke" (with a connotation of deliberateness). AV uses the word chiefly (and RV exclusively, except in 2 Esd 12:32; 14:13; 2 Macc 4:33) for ἀδοκιμος, ἀδοκίμως, and ἄνωθεν, eléchō, words that have very much the same ambiguities of meaning. Hence a fairly easy rendering into Eng. was possible, but the result included all the ambiguities of the original, and to modern readers such a passage as "But your reproof, what doth it reprove? Do ye think to reprove words?" (Job 6:23-24 ARV) is virtually incomprehensible. The meaning is, approximately: "What do your rebukes prove? Are you quibbling about words?" In Jn 16:18 no single word in modern Eng. will translate eléchō, and "reprove" (AV) "converse with the Gr. eléchō (a word)" are both unsatisfactory. The sense is: "The Spirit will teach men the true meaning of these three words: sin, righteousness, judgment."

Reptile, rep’til, -tl: Vulg in Mic 7 17 has reptilia for zôdâh, "crawling things," ARV "worms of the earth," AVm "creeping things." See Lëvi-tân; Lízar, Serpent; Tortoise.

Reputation, rep’-û-tá’-shun: AV uses "reputation" where modern Eng. would use "repute," as connecting prominence rather than moral character. Hence RV’s change to "repute" in Gal 2 2 (for dokeô, dokein, "seem," perhaps with a slightly sarcastic touch). RV’s alteration of "reputation," into "have in honor" (Acts 5 34; Phil 2 29) is to secure uniformity of tr for the derivatives of ῥῆξις, ῥῆξ, "honor," but RV retains "reputation in Scripture." AV’s "made himself of no reputation" in Phil 2 7 is a gloss. See Koine. On Eccl 10 1 see the commentaries.

Require, rē-krî’-vâ: "Require" meant originally "seek after," whence "ask," and so (as in modern Eng.) "demand." All meanings are common in AV (e.g. 1 S 21 8; Eccl 3 15; Ex 8 22; 1 Cor 4 2), and RV has made little change.

Rereward, rer’-ward. See Rearward.

Resaias, ré-sâ’-yâs, ré-sâ’-ás (Pyraías; Rhésaias; AV Reesaias): One of the "leaders" with Zerubbabel in the return (1 Ex 5 8) "Reelaiah" in Ex 2 2; "Rezamiah" in Neh 7 7. The name is apparently duplicated in 1 Ex 6 5 in the form "Reelaisa.

Resen, rē-së’-n (רֶשֶׁן, resen; LXX Áãor, Dássen, Δάρις, Νιμροῦ): The Gr forms show that the LXX translators had "rē-sēn, for rē-sēn, rē-sēh, but the reading of the MT is to be preferred. Name and Resen—the last of the four cities Its native mentioned in Gen 10 11.12 as having Equivalent been founded by Nimrod (AV by Assur)—probably represents the Assyrian pronunciation of the place-name Rēsh-en, "fountain-head." The only town so named in the inscriptions is one of 18 mentioned by Sennacherib in the Bavian inscription as places from which he dug canals connecting with the Tigris. Nineveh was one of the sources of Nineveh’s water supply. It probably lay too far N., however, to be the city here intended. Naturally the name "Resen" could exist in any place where there was a spring.

As the Black Sea, the so called lying between Nineveh and Calah (Kουγυσικ and Nimroud), it is generally thought to be represented

2. Possibly by the ruins at Selamiyeh, about 3 miles N. of the latter city. It is noted Selamiyeh worthy that Xenophon (Anab. iii.4) mentions a "great" city called Lariass as occupying this position, and Bochart has suggested is that it is the same. He supposed that when the inhabitants were asked to what city the ruins belonged, they answered "la Resen," "to Resen," which was revised by the later Chaldeans as Lariass. Xenophon describes its walls as being 25 ft. wide, 100 ft. high, and 2 parasangs in circuit. Except for the stone plinth 20 ft. high, they were of brick. He speaks of a stone-built pyramid near the city—possibly the temple-tower at Nimroud. See Calah; Nineveh, 10.

Reservoir, rē’-zë-vôr, -vôr (תֵּבר, mîkâvâh; AV ditch [Isa 22 11]). See Ditch; Cistern; Pool.

Resh, rēsh (רעש): The 20th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as r. It came also to be used for the number 200. For name, etc., see Alphabet.

Reseph, re’-sef (רְסֵף), reseph, "flame" or "fire-hole"): Personal name found in Phoen as a divine name. In the OT the name of a descendant of Ephraim, the eponym of an Ephraimitic family or clan (1 Ch 7 25).

Residue, rez’-i-dû. See Remnant.

Respect, rē-spekt’, OF PERSONS: The phrase צֶּרֶס הָנִּיצָר (nāṣā rēsāh, means lit. "lift up the face," and, among other tr, is rendered indifferently "accept" or "respect the person" in AV (contrast Prov 18 1, etc.). As applied to a (prostrate) suppliant, the phrase means "receive him with favor," and is so used in 1 S 26 35; Mal 1 8.9 (cf Gen 19 21, etc). By a shift in force the phrase came to mean "accept the person instead of the cause" or "show partiality" (Job 13 8.10 ARV), and is so used commonly. A literal tr into Gr gave ρέσηφων, ῥησάρθρων (Sir 35 13 [32 16]; Lk 20 21; Gal 2 6), with the noun ρησαλαμαία, ρησολαμαία, "face-taking" (Rom 2 11; Eph 4 1, etc.). AV rendered uniformly "respect of persons" in RV. A noun ρησαλαμαία, ρησολαμαία, are found Acts 10 34; Jas 2 2. God’s judgment rests solely on the character of the man and will be influenced by no worldly (Eph 6 9) or national (Rom 2 11) considerations. See also Accept.

Rest (רֶס, reš, רְסָה, רְסָה; mînâḥâh, "cessation from motion," "peace," "quiet, etc.; פָּנַי, פָּנַי, פָּנַי, פָּנַי; פָּנַי, פָּנַי, פָּנַי; פָּנַי, פָּנַי): The geographical situation above sense is of frequent occurrence, and is the tr of several words with various applications and shades of meaning, chiefly of the words given above. It is applied to God as ceasing from the work of creating on the 7th day (Gen 2 2); as having His place of rest in the midst of His people in the temple (1 Ch 25 2; Ps 132 8.14); as resting in His love among His people (Zeph 3 17; RVm "Heb," "be silent"). The 7th day was to be one of rest (Ex 16 23; 31 15; see Sabbath); the land also was to have its rest in the 7th year (Lev 25 4). Jehovah promised His people rest in the land He should give them; this they looked forward to and enjoyed (Dt 11 9; Jos 11 29). "To rest" often means to come under the shadow of the Spirit of Jeh (Nu 11 25 f; Isa 11 2), of wisdom (Prov 14 33), of anger (Eccl 7 9). There is again the "rest" of the grave (Job 3 13;17;18; Isa 67 2; Dan 12 13). Rest is sometimes equivalent to trust, reliance (2 Ch 14 11, RV "rely"); hence rest in Jeh (Ps 37 7, etc); "rest" in the spiritual sense is not, however, prominent in the OT. In the NT Christ’s great offer is rest to the soul (Mt 11 28). In He 4 1ff, it is argued from God’s having promised His people a "rest"—a promise not fulfilled in the Canaan (ver 8)—that there remains for the people of God a "Sabbath rest" (sabbatianmos, ver 9). For "rest." RV has "solemn rest" (Ex 16 23; 31 15, etc), "resting-place" (Ps 132 8.14; Isa 11 10), "peace" (Acts 9 51), "relief" (2 Cor 2 13; 7 5), etc. See also Remnant.

Restitution, res-ti-tû’-shun, Restoration. See PUNISHMENTS.

Restoration, res-tô’-râ’-shun: The idea of a restoration of the world had its origin in the preaching of the OT prophets. Their faith in the unique position and mission of Israel as the chosen people of God inspired in them the conviction that the destruction of the nation would eventually be fol-loved by a restoration under conditions that would insure the realization of the original Divine purpose. When the restoration came and passed without fulfilment of this hope, the Messianic era was projected into the future. By the time of Jesus the concept of the more or less spiritualized, and the anticipation of a new order in which the consequences of sin would no longer appear was a prominent feature of the Messianic conception. In the teaching of Jesus and the apostles such a restoration was assumed as a matter of course.

In Mt 17 11 (cf Mk 9 12), the moral and spiritual regeneration preached by John the Baptist is described as a restoration and viewed as a fulfilment of Mal 4 6. It is to be observed, however, that the work of John could be characterized as a restoration only in the sense of an inception of the regeneration that was to be completed by Jesus. In Mt 19 28 Jesus speaks of a regeneration (σωματικὴν ἀνεκούσιαν) of the whole in terms that ascribe to the saints a state of special felicity. Perhaps the most pointed expression of the idea of a restoration as a special event or crisis is found in the address of Peter (Acts 3 21), where the restoration is described as an ἀνακάθαρσις πνεύμων, apokatâstasis pàndòn, and is viewed as a fulfilment of prophecy.

In all the passages cited the restoration is assumed as a matter with which the hearers are familiar, and consequently its nature is not unfolded. The evidence is, therefore, too limited to justify any attempt to outline its special features. Undoubtedly circumstances there is grave danger of reading into the language of the Scriptures one's own conception of what the restoration is to be. We are probably expressing the full warrant of the Scripture when we reconstruct the regeneration mentioned in these passages contemplates the restoration of man, under the reign of Christ, to a life in which the consequences of sin are no longer present, and that this reconstruction is to include in some measure a regeneration of both the physical and the spiritual world.

Whether the benefits of the restoration are to accrue to all men is also left undefined in the Scriptures. In the passages already cited only the disciples of Christ appear in the field of vision. Certainly other readings are sometimes regarded as favorable to the more inclusive view. In Jn 12 32 Jesus speaks of drawing all men to Himself, but here, as in Jn 3 14-15, it is to be observed that while Christ's sacrifice includes all men in its scope, its benefits will doubtless accrue to those only who respond willingly to His drawing power. The saying of Caiphas (Jn 11 52) is irrelevant, for the phrase, "the children of God that are scattered abroad," probably refers only to the worthy Jews of the dispersion. Neither can the statements of Paul (Rom 11 32; 1 Cor 16 22; Eph 1 9-10; Col 1 20; 1 Tim 2 4; 4 10; Tit 2 11) be pressed in favor of the restorationist view. They affirm only that God's plan makes provision for the redemption of all, and that His saving will is universal. But men have wills of their own, and whether they share in the benefits of the salvation provided depends on their availing themselves of its privileges. The doctrine of the restoration of all can hardly be deduced from the NT. See also Punishment, Everlasting.

RESURRECTION, res-u-rek'shun (in the NT ἀνάστασις, anástasis, with vbs. ἀνάστημι, anastēmi, "stand up," and ἐπιθίνω, epithinō, "raise.") There is no technical term for granted in the OT, but in Isa 26 19 are found the vbs. ἀνάστημι, ἐπιθίνω, "live," ἀνάπλασις, "rise," ἐρχομαι, kîp, "awake").

1. Israel and Immortality.—It is very remarkable that a doctrine of life after death as an essential part of religion was of very late development in Israel, although this doctrine, often highly elaborated, was commonly held among the surrounding nations. The chief cause of this lateness was that Israel's religion centered predominantly in the ideal of a holy nation. Consequently the individual was a secondary object of consideration, and the future of the men who died before the national promises were fulfilled either was merged in the future of his descendants or else was disregarded altogether.

Much speculation about life after death evidently existed, but it was not in direct connection with the nation's religion. Therefore the OT data are scanty and point, as might be expected, to non-homogeneous concepts. Still, certain ideas are clear. The living individual was composed of 'flesh' and nephesh, or a trichotomy appears to be post-Bib., despite 1 Thess 5 23; see Psychology). In the individual nephesh and râ$h seem to be fairly synonymous words, meaning primarily "breath," as the animating principle of the flesh (so for the lower animals in Ps 104 20; see also Job 38 17; Job 33 18, etc), and nearly all of such passages seem quite late. Indeed, in some 13 cases the nephesh of a dead man is unmistakably his corpse (Lev 19 25; Nu 5 2; Hag 2 13, etc). It seems the question of what survives death was hardly raised; whatever existed then was thought of as something quite new. On the one hand the dead man could be called a "god" (1 S 28 13), a term perhaps related to ancestor-worship. But more commonly the dead are thought of as "shades," râ'phâ\'im (Job 26 5 m, etc), weak copies of the original man in all regards (Ezk 32 25). But, whatever existence such "shades" might have, they had passed out of relation to Jeh, whom the "dead praise not" (Ps 150 5; Isa 38 18-19), and there was no religious interest in them.

Indeed, any interest taken in them was likely to be anti-religious, as connected with necromancy, etc (Dt 14 1; 26 14; Isa 8 19; Ps 146 6; etc; see Sorcery), or connected with foreign religions. Here, probably, the very fact that the surrounding nations taught immortality was a strong reason for Israel's refusing to consider it. That Egypt held an elaborate doctrine of individual judgment at death, or that Persia taught the resurrection of the body, would actually tend to render these doctrines suspicious, and it was not until the danger of syncretism was removed that such beliefs could be considered on their own merits. Hence it is not surprising that the prophets virtually disregard the idea or that Ezech denies any immortality doctrine categorically.

None the less, with a fuller knowledge of God, wider experience, and deeper reflection, the doctrine was bound to come. But it came slowly. Individualism reaches ex-

Immortality plied statement in Ezk 14, 18, 33 (cf. 24 16; Jer 31 29-30), but the national point of view still made the rewards and punishments of the individual matters of this world only (Ezk 14 14; Ps 37, etc.), a doctrine that had surprising vitality and that is found as late as SIR 11 13 26. But as this does not square with the facts of life (Job), a doctrine of immortality, already hinted at (11, 1, below), was inevitable. It appears in full force in the post-Macca-bean period, but why just then is hard to say; perhaps because it was then that there had been witnessed the spectacle of martyrs on a large scale (1 Mace 1 60-64).

Resurrection of the body was the form immortality took, in accord with the religious premises.

As the saint was to find his happiness in the nation or the nation to be restored to the nation; and the older views did not point toward pure soul-immortality. The "shades" led a wretched existence at the best; and S. Paul himself shuddered at the thought of "death and judgment" (1 Cor 15 25 26).

As was the case with Ps 23 and Ps 25, the New Testament was uncertain about the immortality of the soul, and still more were the terms of expression. Even the NT has no consistent terminology for the immortal part of man ("soul," Rev 6 9; 20 4; "spirit," He 12 23; 1 Pet 3 19; St. Paul avoids any term in I Cor 15; and we know that "soul" and "spirit" were uncertain quantities, and even the NT has not a common view is that the old bodies will receive new souls (Ber. R. 2 7; 6 7; Vagg. R. 12 2; 15 1, etc.; cf. Sib Or 4 187).

Where direct Gr influence is clear, however, it can be predicated, pure soul-immortality is found (cf. Wis 8 19 20; 9 15 [but Wisd's true teaching is very uncertain]; En 102 Concepts 4-105; 108; Slav En; 4 Macc; Jos, and esp. Philo). According to Jos (BJ, 11, viii, 6), the Erez is to be restored to the Erez, but as Jos graces the Pharisaic resurrection into metaphorical soul-transition (II, viii, 14; contrast Ant, XVIII, i, 3), his evidence is doubtful. Note, moreover, how Lk 6 9; 9 25; 12 45 has reworded Mk 3 4; 8 20 and Lk 15 21 (the Talm in a vaguer way even Palestinian Judaism had something of the same concepts (2 Esd 7 88; 2 Cor 4 16; 12 2), while it is commonly held that the souls in the intermediate state can enjoy happiness, a statement first appearing in En 22 (Jub 33 21 is hardly serious).

II. Resurrection in the OT and Intermediate Literature. — For the reasons given above, references in the OT to the resurrection doctrine are few. Probably it is to be found in Ps 17 15; 16 11; 49 15; 73 24, and in each case with increased probability, but for exact discussions the student must consult the comm. Of course no exact dating of these Ps passages is possible. With still higher probability (see below) should be Job 14 13-15; 19 25-29, but again alternative explanations are just possible, and, again, Job is a notoriously hard book to date (see Jos, Book or). The two certain passages are Isa 26 19 m and Dan 12 2. In the former (to be dated about 330 b.c.) it is implied that the "dead" shall rise from the earth and so the (righteous) dead shall revive. But this resurrection is confined to Pal and does not include the unrighteous. For Dnl 12 2 see below.

Indeed, restriction for the righteous only was thought of much more naturally than a general resurrection. And still more naturally

2. The a resurrection of martyrs was thought Righteous of, such simply receiving back what they had given up for God (Sib 90 33 (prior to 107 BC) and 2 Macc 7 9 11. 23; 14 46 (only martyrs are mentioned in 2 Macc); cf. Rev 20 4. But of course the idea once given could not be restricted to martyrs only, and the intermediate lit. contains so many references to the resurrection of the righteous that this is not very common, and XII P. Test. Judah 25 4 (before 107). A very curious passage is En 25 6, where the risen saints merely live longer than did their fathers, i.e. resurrection does not imply immortality. This passage seems to be unique.

For a resurrection of unrighteous men (Dnl 12 2; En 22 11; XII P. Test. Benj. 10 7 8, Armenian text — in none of these cases a general resurrec-

3. The Uni- tion), a motive for the "second death" is Righteous 13: for such men the mere condition of Sheol is not punishment enough.

For a general resurrection the motive is always the final judgment, so that all human history may be summed up in the resurrection. The NT, however, is not very common, and XII P. Test. Benj. 10 7 8 (Gr text) — Bar 50 2; En 51 1; Sib Or 4 178-90; Life of Adam (Gr) 10, and 2 Esd 6 45; 7 32; 14 35 about account for all the unequivocal passages. It is a doctrine of resurrection and its teachings were confined to the Talm. XII P. Test. Benj. 10 7 8 (Gr) has two resurrections.

Finally, much of the lit. knows no immortality at all. Ezech, Sir and 1 Mace are the most familiar examples, but there are many others.

4. Complete It is esp. interesting that the very Denial spiritual author of 2 Esd did not think it worth while to modify the categorical denial in the source used in 13 20. Of course, the Jewish party that persisted most in a denial of any resurrection was the Sadducees (Mt 22 23 and 24; Acts 23 8), with an extreme conservatism often found among aristocrats.

III. Teaching of Christ. — The question is discussed explicitly in the following passages: Mk 12 18-27; Mt 22 23-33; Lk 20 27-38.

1. Mk 12: The Sadducees assumed that resurrection implies simply a resuscitation to a

2. The resurrection of the soul only was con-restricted to the" soul," with a vague idea of God. For the Scriptures teach a God whose ability and willingness to care for His creatures are so unlimited that the destiny He has prepared for them is caricatured if conceived in any terms but the absolutely highest. Hence there follows not only the truth of the resurrection, but a resurrection to a state as far above the sexual sphere as that of the angels. (The possibility of mutual recognition by husband and wife is irrelevant, nor is it even said that the resurrection bodies are sexual.) Lk 20 36 adds the explanation that, as there are to be no deaths, marriage (in its relation to births) will not exist. It may be thought that Christ's argument would support equally well the immortality of the soul only, and, as a matter of fact, the same argument is used for the latter doctrine in 4 Macc 7 18 19; 16 25. But in Jesus and under the given circumstances this is quite impossible. And, moreover, it would seem that any such dualism would be a violation of Christ's teaching that the resurrection is literal.

However, the argument seems to touch only the resurrection of the righteous, esp. in the form given in Lk (cf Lk 14:14). But that Luke thought of so limiting the resurrection is disproved by Acts 24:15. Similarly in Mt 6:11 | Lk 13:30 | Mt 24:31. But, as a general feature in the Judgment, the resurrection of all men is taught. Then the sordom, Tyre, Nineveh appear (Mt 11:22,24; 12:41.42 | Lk 10:11 | 11:32), and those cast into Gehenna, are represented as having a body (Mt 9:43-47; Mt 29:30; 10:28; 18:8,9). And at the great final assize (Mt 25:31-46) all men appear. In the Fourth Gospel a similar distinction is made (6:39.40.44.54; 11:25), the resurrection of the righteous, based on their union with God through Christ and their present possession of this union, and (in 5:28:29) the general resurrection to judgment. Whether these passages imply two resurrections or emphasize only the extreme difference in conditions at the one cannot be determined.

The passages in 4 Mac referred to above read: "they who care for piously with their whole heart, they alone are able to conquer the impulses of the flesh, being patriarchy with firmness. (Rom. 6:19) And they do not die to God but live to God" (7:18-19); and "They knew that dying for God they would live with God forever and Isaac and Jacob and the patriarchs" (16:25). It is distinctly possible that Oral traditions recorded have been known to the author of 4 Mac, although the possibility that Christ approved and broadened the tenets of some spiritually-minded few is not to be overlooked, and possibly even helped, for 4 Mac influenced Luke's Gr pharoeology. See Macr. Book of IV.

IV. The Apostolic Doctrine.—For the apostles, Christ's victory over death took the resurrection doctrine out of the realm of speculative eschatology. Henceforth it is a fact of experience, basic for Christianly. Direct references in the NT are found in Acts 2:17; 18:32; 23:6; 24:15,21; Rom 4:17; 5:17; 6:5,8; 8:11; 11:15; 1 Cor 6:14; 15; 2 Cor 1:9; 4:14; 5:1-10; Phil 3:10; 11,21; Col 1:18; 1 Thess 4:13-18; 2 Tim 2:18; Heb 6:2; 11:19.35; Rev 20:4 (martyrs only); 20:12,13. Of these only Acts 24:15; Rev 20:12,13, refer to a general resurrection with absolute unambiguity, but the doctrine is certainly contained in others and in 2 Tim 4:1 besides.

A theology of the resurrection is given fully by St. Paul. Basic is the conception of the union of Christ with God in heaven, so that every believer anticipates it (Phil 3:10). Godiff 4:11). Every deliverance from danger is a foretaste of the resurrection (2 Cor 4:10,11). Indeed so certain is it, that it may be spoken of as accomplished (Eph 2:6). From another standpoint, the resurrection is simply part of God's general redemption of Nature at the consummation (Rom 8:11,18-25). As the believer then passes into a condition of glory, his body must be altered for the new conditions (1 Cor 15:50; Phil 3:21); it becomes a "spiritual" body, belonging to the realm of the spirit (not "spiritual" in opposition to "material"). Nature shows us how different "bodies" can be— from the "body" of the sun to the bodies of the lowest animals the kind depends merely on the creative will of God (1 Cor 15:36-41). Nor is the idea of a change in the body of the same thing unfamiliar: look at the difference in the "body" of a grain of wheat, its sowing and after it is grown (Mt 13:31). Just so, I am "grown" or "changed" in the image of Christ (Rom 12:2).

Of a resurrection of the wicked, St. Paul has little to say. The doctrine seems clearly stated in 2 Cor 5:10 (and in 2 Tim 4:1, unless the Pauline authorship of 2 Tim is denied). But St. Paul is willing to treat the fate of the unrighteous with silence.

V. Summary.—The points in the NT doctrine of the resurrection of the righteous, then, seem to be these: The personality of the believer survives death and is with Christ.

1. NT Data

But it is lacking in something that will be accomplished by the general resurrection when a body will be given in which there is nothing to hinder perfect intercourse with God. The connection of this body with the present body is not discussed, except for saying that some connection exists, with the necessity of a transformation for those alive at the end. In this state nothing remains that is inconsistent with the height to which man is raised, and in particular sexual relations (Mt 12:28) and the results of nutrition (1 Cor 6:9). For this end the whole power of God is available. And it is insured by the perfect trust the believer may put in God and by the resurrection of Christ, with whom the believer has become intimately united. The urgetiousness for the final vindication of God's name and glory in history. These resurrections are found in Rev 20:5.13 and quite possibly in 1 Thess 4:16; 1 Cor 15:23.24. Hence the phrase first resurrection; see Last Judgment.

Into the “blanks” of this scheme the believer is naturally entitled to insert such matter as may seem to him best compatible with his other concepts of Christianity and of philosophy. As in the Bible, the student marvels at the way the sacred writers were restrained from committing Christianity to metaphysical schemes that growth in human knowledge might afterward show to be inadequate to the task of discerning God's design to distinguish between the revealed facts and the interpretation given them in any system that he constructs to make the doctrine fit the connected concepts of his own time or circle, distinction too often forgotten in the past and sometimes today. The desire to reconcile such a phrase as “a purely spiritual immortality” rests on a metaphysical dualism that is today obsolete, and its truth is hardly discoverable. The expectation that the resurrection body will contain knowledge of the spiritual body. We are still quite in the dark as to the relations of what we call “soul” and “body,” and so, naturally, it is quite impossible for A. Meyer in 1 COR 15:40 (‘Hanser-Buchstab. dogmatisch’) has some interesting suggestions. In metaphysics, soul, and spirit, there are only two forms of God's thought, the resurrection offers no difficulties. If the body be regarded as the web of forces which was the essence of the resurrection, this web would take the form of the return of those forces to their original conditions. It becomes, therefore, to embrace the totality of effects that proceed from the individual man. According to the final and individual units. Or resurrection may be considered as the end of evolution—the reunion in God of all that has been done and developed to a natural, but may be found to lead to results of great value.

In recent years the attention of scholars has been directed to the problem of how far the teachings of other religions assisted the Jews in attaining a resurrection doctrine. Practically only the Pers system comes into question, and here the facts seem to be these: A belief among the Persians in the resurrection of the body is attested for the pre-Christian period by the fragments of the so-called Book of Life, BC, preserved by Diodorus, Laertius and Aeneas of Gaza. That this doctrine was taken up by the followers of Zoroaster, known by Paper, but is probable. But on the precise details we are in great uncertainly. In the Avesta the doctrine is not found at first (the oldest document is the Gathas, written in the 19th cent.). A document that has certainly undergone post-Christian redaction of an unknown date is the Bundahesh. The fullest Pers sources is the Bundahesh (30), written in the 9th century. It contains much very ancient matter, but the age of any given passage is in it always a problem. Consequently the sources must be used with great caution. It may be noted that late Judaism certainly was affected to some degree by the Pers religion (see Tob., esp.), but there are so many native Jewish elements that were leading to a resurrection doctrine that familiarity with the Pers beliefs could have been an assistance. Esp. is it to be noted that the great acceptance of the doctrine lies in the post-Maccabean period, when direct Pers influence is not apparent. See Zoroastrianism.

LITERATURE.—The older works suffer from a defective understanding of the presuppositions, but Salmond, Corn. F. is invaluable, but must be used critically by the thorough student, for the opinions and theories of other authors have not always been worth the price of the book. “Resurrection” in DCG is good; Bernard's in HDD is not so good. On 1 Cor. Findlay on 1 Cor. C. Eichhorn on 1 Cor. W. J. is an excellent introduction to the NT Theologies of Weiss, Holtzmann, Peine; Schäfer's “Anleitung” is PEB. On Weiss see J. Weiss in PEB (see 9); on 2 Cor. Bachmann in the Zahn series. On both Cor. See Bouquet in the Schriften des NT of J. Weiss (the works of an eminent ecclesiologist, Lichtenstein, his Handbuch. BIRTIN SCOTT EASTON challenged. The theory of a swoon and a recovery in the tomb is impossible, and to it Strauss "practically gives its deathblow" (Orr, op. cit., 223).

2. Second At Christ's burial a stone was rolled before the tomb, the tomb was empty. Proof: The tomb was rolled before the tomb, the tomb was empty. Yet on the third morning the body had disappeared, and the tomb was empty. There are only two alternatives. His body must have been taken out of the grave by human hands or else by superhuman power. If the hands were human, they must have been those of His friends or of His foes. If His friends had wished to take out His body, the question at once arises whether they could have done so in the face of the stone, the seal and the guard. If His foes had contemplated this action, the question arises whether they would seriously have considered it. It is extremely improbable that any effort should have been made to remove the body out of the reach of the disciples. Why should His enemies do the very thing that would be most likely to spread the report of His resurrection? As Chrysostom said, "If the body had been stolen, they could not have stolen it naked, because they could not find a garment of the buried clothes and the trouble caused by the drugs adhering to it." (quoted in Day, Evidence for the Resurrection, 35). Besides, the position of the grave-clothes proves the impossibility of the theft of the body (Gospel of St. Peter, 17; Tertullian, De Corona, 11; T. T. Waterlow, Man and Humanity, 69, 70; Latham, The Risen Master; Expos T, XIII, 293 f.; XIV, 510). How, too, is it possible to account for the failure of the Jews to disprove the resurrection? Not more than seven weeks afterward Peter preached in that city the fact that Jesus was not "dead". It is more difficult to believe that they could have been deceived or that they would have produced the dead body and silenced Peter forever. "The silence of the Jews is as significant as the speech of the Christians" (Fairbairn, Studies in the Life of Christ, 357).

The fact of the empty tomb with the disappearance of the body remains a problem to be faced. It is now admitted that the evidence for the empty tomb is adequate, and that it was part of the primitive belief (Pannafraction, 134, 154). It is important to realize the force of this admission, because it is a testimony to St. Paul's use of the term "third day" (see below) and to the Christian observance of the first day of the week. And yet in spite of this were we not to be accommodated somehow? By some writers the idea of resurrection is interpreted to mean the revival of Christ's spiritual influence on the disciples, which had been brought to a close by His death. It is thought that the essential idea and value of Christ's resurrection can be conserved, even while the belief in His bodily rising from the grave is surrendered (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 23). But how can we believe in the resurrection while we regard the basis of the primitive belief in it as a mistake, not to say a fraud? The disciples found the tomb empty, and on the strength of this they believed He had risen. How can the belief be true if the foundation be false? Besides, the various forms of the vision- theory are now gradually but surely being regarded as inadequate and impossible. They involve the change of almost every fact in the Gospel history, and the invention of new scenes and conditions of which the Gospels know nothing (Orr, op. cit., 223). It has never been satisfactorily shown why the disciples had such a consistent experience of visions; nor why they should have had it so soon after the death of Christ and within a strictly limited period; nor why it suddenly ceased. The disciples were familiar with the apparition of a spirit, like Samuel's, and with the resurrection of a body, like Lazarus', but what they had not experienced or imagined was the fact of a spiritual body, the combination of body and spirit in an entirely novel way. So the old theory of a vision is now virtually set aside, and the disciples were called to the duty of a real spiritual manifestation of the risen Christ. The question at once arises whether this is not prompted by an unconscious but real desire to get rid of anything like a physical resurrection. Whatever may be true of unbelievers, this is an impossible position for those who believe Christ is alive.

Even though we may be ready to admit the reality of telepathic communication, it is impossible to argue that this is equivalent to the idea of resurrection. Psychical research has not proceeded far enough as yet to warrant arguments being built on it, though in any case it is difficult, if not impossible, to obtain material from this quarter which will answer to the conditions of the physical resurrection recorded in the NT. "The survival of the soul is not resurrection." "Whoever heard of a spirit being buried?" (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 229).

In view of the records of the Gospels and the general testimony of the NT, it is impossible to be "agnostic" about facts that are so large on the face of the records. When once the evidence for the empty tomb is allowed to be adequate, the impossibility of any other explanation than that indicated in the NT is at once seen. The evidence for the resurrection of Christ is the dead body, which is to be exercised in the exalted Lord, and that belief in a resuscitation of the human body is no vital part of it. It is no doubt true that faith today is to be exercised solely in the exalted and glorified Lord, but faith must ultimately rest on fact, and it would be "agnostic" about facts that are so large on the face of the records. not a physical resurrection" (C. H. Robinson, Studies in the Resurrection of Christ, 12). But the difficulty here is as to the meaning of the term "resurrection." If it means a return from the dead, a rising again (re-), must there not have been some identification of appearance with body in the tradition and the "objective reality" which appeared to the disciples? Wherein lies the essential difference between an objective vision and an objective appearance? If we believe the apostolic testimony to the empty tomb, why may we not accept their recognition of the resurrection? They evidently recognized their Master, and this recognition must have been due to some familiarity with His bodily appearance. No difficulty of conceiving the resurrection of mankind hereafter must be allowed to set aside the plain facts of the record about Christ. It is, of course, quite clear that the resurrection body of Jesus was not exactly the same as it was when it was put in the tomb, but it is equally clear that there was definite identity as well as definite dissimilarity, and both elements must be faced and accounted for. There need be no insuperable difficulty if we believe that in the very nature of things Christ's resurrection must be unique, and, since the life and work of Jesus Christ transcended all our experience (as they could do), we must not expect to bring them within the limitations of natural law and human history. How the resurrection body was sustained is a problem quite outside our ken, though the reference to "flesh and bones," as opposed to "spirit," the words about "flesh and blood" not being able to enter the kingdom of God, may suggest that while the resurrection body was not constituted upon a natural basis through blood, yet that it possessed "all things pertaining to the change of nature" (Church of England Article IV). We may not be able to solve the problem, but we must hold fast to all the facts, and these may be summed up by saying that the body was the same though different, different though the same. The true description of the resurrection seems to be that "it was an objective reality, but that it was not merely a physical resuscitation." We are therefore brought back to a consideration of the facts recorded in the Gospels as to the empty tomb and the return of appearances of our Lord in three days' time as an explanation which will take into consideration all the facts recorded, and will do no violence to any part of the evidence. To predicate a new resurrection body in which Christ appeared to His disciples and which was the body which had been placed in the tomb was done away with. Does not this theory demand a new miracle of its own (Kenny, Interpreter, V, 271)?

3. Third Proof: Transformation of the Disciples caused by the resurrection. They had seen their Master die, and through that death they lost all hope. Yet hope returned three days after. On the day of the crucifixion they were filled with sadness on the first day of the week with gladness. At the crucifixion they were hopeless; on the first day of the week their hearts glowed with certainty. When the message of the resurrection first came they were overcome and astonished, but when once they became assured they never doubted again. What could account for the astonishing change in these men in so short a time? The mere removal of the body from the grave could never have transformed their passions and characters. Three days and nights for a legend to spring up which should so affect them. Time is needed for a process of legendary growth. There is nothing more striking in the history of primitive Christianity than this marvelous change wrought in the disciples by a belief in the resurrection of their Master. It is a psychological fact that demands a full explanation. The disciples were prepared to believe in the resurrection when they had seen it in the tomb and the possibility of a resurrection (see Mk 16:11). Men do not imagine what they do not believe, and the women's intention to embalm a corpse shows they did not expect His resurrection. Besides, a hallucination involving five hundred people at once, and repeated several times during forty days, is unthinkable.

From this fact of the transformation of personal life in so incredibly short a space of time, we proceed to the next line of proof, the existence of the primitive church.

The apostles believed in the resurrection of the Lord (Burkitt, The Gospel Church, 74). Yet multititudes of Jews were led to worship Him (Acts 2:41), and a great company of priests to obey Him (Acts 6:7). The only explanation of these facts is God's act of resurrection (Acts 2:20), for nothing short of it could have any Jewish sect come to acknowledge Christ as their Messiah. The apostolic church is thus a result of a belief in the resurrection of Jesus Christ. The early chapters of Acts bear the marks of primitive documents, and their evidence is unmistakable. It is impossible to allege that the early church did not know its own history, that myths and legends quickly grew up and were eagerly received, and that the writers of the Gospels had no conscience for principle, but manipulated their material at will, for we should give no account of its history for the past fifty years or more (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 144). And it is simply absurd to think that the earliest church had no such capability. In reality there was nothing vague or unreal in the testimony borne by the apostles and other members of the church. "As the church is too holy for a foundation of rottenness, so she is too real for a foundation of mist" (Archbishop Alexander, The Great Question, 10).

The conversion and work of Saul of Tarsus is one next line of proof. It is first called to the evidence of his life and writgings. Some years ago an article appeared (E. W. Medley, Expositor, V, 359), inquiring as to the conception of resurrection which would be suggested to a heathen inquirer by a perusal of Paul's writings. The extent of the time at least would stand out clearly—that Jesus Christ was killed (2:15; 4:14) and was raised from the dead (4:14). As this Ep. is usually dated about 61 AD—that is, only about 22 years after the resurrection—and as the same Ep. plainly attributes the conception of God in relation to man (1:15, 2:12; 3:11), we can readily see the force of this testimony to the resurrection. Then a few years later, in another place (1 Corinthians 15:21), he speaks as one of St. Paul's, we have a much fuller reference to the event. In the well-known passage (1 Corinthians 15:12, where he is considered to prove (not Christ's resurrection, but) the resurrection of Christians, he naturally adduces Christ's resurrection as his own model. If we make a list of the various appearances of Christ, ending with one to himself, which he puts on an exact level with the others:
"Last of all he was seen of me also." Now it is essential to give special attention to the nature and particularity of this testimony. It is delineated unto you first of all that which I received, that Christ said for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he was buried; and that the records of the resurrection of the dead, according to the scriptures" (I Cor 15:3 f.). This, as it has often been pointed out, is our earliest authority for the appearance of the resurrection. ... An ancient chronologist has left us a few years of the year itself. ... But there is much more than this. If we address that which 25 years or the crucifixion of Jesus he was taught that 'Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures; and that he was made alive again on the third day according to the Scriptures' (Kennett, Interpretor, V. 267). And it therefore follows that we, if we could give the same testimony as the view, and their, and the amplitude and weight of their testimony should be carefully estimated. While we are precluded by our space from examining each appearance minutely, and indeed it is unnecessary for our purpose to do so, it is impossible to avoid calling attention to two of them. No one can read the story of the walk to Emmaus (Lk 24), or of the visit of Peter and John to the tomb (Jn 20), without observing the striking marks of reality and personal testimony in the accounts. As to the former, because it carries with it, as great literary critics have pointed out, the deepest inward evidences of its own literal truthfulness. For it so narrates the intercourse of a 'risen God' with commonplace men as to set natural and supernatural sides by side. ...We have adduced this in the previous chapter (p. 212), and now we shall attempt a further demonstration, and bear the same testimony to the impression of truth and reality made upon them by the Emmanuel narrative (A. Meyer and K. Lake, quoted in Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 176 f.). It is well known that there are difficulties connected with the number and order of these appearances, but they are probably due largely to the summary character of the story, and certainly are not sufficient to invalidate the utter reliability of the accounts. The two facts: (1) the empty grave, (2) the appearances of Christ on the third day. These are the main facts of the combined witness (Orr, op. cit., 212). The very difficulties which have been observed in the Gospels for nearly nineteen centuries are a testimony to a conviction of the truth of the narratives on the part of the whole Christian church. The church has not been afraid to leave these records as they are because of the facts that they embody and express. If there had been no difficulties men might have said that everything had been artificially arranged, whereas the differences bear testimony to the reality of the event recorded. The fact that we possess these two sets of appearances—one in Jerusalem and one in Galilee—is really an argument in favor of their credibility, for if it had been recorded that Christ appeared in Galilee only, or Jerusalem only, it is not unlikely that the account might have been rejected for lack of support. It is well known that the results of eyewittiness are often very exact in details, while there is no question as to the events themselves. The various books recording the story of the Indian mutiny, or the surrender of Napoleon III at Sedan are cases in point, and Sir William Ramsay is there, as elsewhere, a liberal and enlightened critic. And the main fact with great uncertainty as to precise details (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 29). We believe, therefore, that a careful examination of these appearances will afford evidence of a chain of circumstances extending from the empty grave to the day of the ascension.

Now, let us carefully all these converging lines of evidence and endeavor to give weight to all the facts of the case, it seems impossible

7. Summary to escape from the problem of a physical and miracle. That the prima facie view of the evidence afforded by the resurrection of Christ and that the apostles really believed in a true physical resurrection are surely beyond all question. And yet very much of present-day thought refuses to accept the miraculous. The scientific doctrine of the uniformity and continuity of Nature bars the way, so that from the outset it is concluded that miracles are impossible. We are either not allowed to believe (see Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 44), or else we are told that we are not required to believe (C. H. Robinson, Studies in the Resurrection of Christ, ch ii), in the reanimation of a dead body. If we take this view, "there is no need, really, for investigation of evidence: the question is decided before the evidence is looked at" (Orr, op. cit., 46).

A challenge to this position. It proves too much. We are not at all concerned by the charge of believing in the abnormal or unusual. New things have happened from the beginning of the present natural order, and the Christian faith teaches that Christ Himself was a new thing, and that His own resurrection as "God manifest in the flesh" was something absolutely unique. If we are not allowed to believe in any Divine intervention which we may call supernatural or miraculous, it is impossible to account for the Person of Christ at all. "Assuming Personality would be a miracle in time." Arising out of this, Christianity itself was unique, inaugurating a new era in human affairs. No Christ, therefore, can have any difficulty in accepting the abnormal, the unusual, the miraculous. If it be said that no amount of evidence can establish a fact which is miraculous, we have still to account for the moral miracles which are really involved and associated with the resurrection, esp. the deception of the disciples, who could have found out the truth of the case; a deception, too, that has proved so great a blessing to the world. Surely to those who hold a true theistic view of the world this prior view is impossible. Are we to refuse to allow to God at least as much liberty as we possess ourselves to the spontaneity of action on the other hand? We may like or dislike, give or withhold, will or not will, but the course of Nature must flow on unbrokenly. Surely God cannot be conceived of as having given such a constitution to the universe as limits His power to intervene if necessary and for sufficient purpose with the work of His own hands. Not only are all things of Him, but all things are through Him, and to Him. The resurrection means the presence of miracle, and "there is no evading the issue with which this confronts us" (Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 53). Unless, therefore, we are prepared to accept the possibility of the miraculous, all explanation of the NT evidence is a pure waste of time.

Of recent years attempts have been made to account for the resurrection in terms of ideas derived from Bab and other Eastern sources. It is argued that mythology provides the key to the problem, that not only analogy but derivation have been found. But apart from the remarkable variety of conclusions of Bab archaeologists there is nothing to show any historical proof worthy of the name. The whole idea is arbitrary and baseless, and prejudiced by the attitude to the supernatural. There is no connection between these oriental cults and the Jewish and Christian beliefs in the resurrection.

And so we return to a consideration of the various lines of proof. Taking them singly, they must be admitted to be strong, but taking them altogether, the argument is cumulative and sufficient. Every effect must have its adequate cause, and the only proper explanation of Christianity today is the resurrection of Christ. The doctrine of the post-Resurrection miracles of Ruggles, however, no mean judge of historical evidence, said that the resurrection was the "best-attested fact in human history." Christianity welcomes all possible sifting, testing, and use by those who honestly desire to arrive at the truth, and if they will give proper attention to all the facts and factors involved, we believe they will come to the conclusion expressed years ago by the Archbishop of Armagh, that the resurrection is the rock from which all the hammers of criticism have vainly chipped a single fragment (The Great Question, 24).

The theology of the resurrection is very important and calls for special attention. Indeed, the prominence given to it in the NT 8. Theology affords a strong confirmation of the fact itself, for it seems incredible that the resurrection—such varied and important truths—should not rest on historic fact. The doctrine may briefly be summarized: (1) evidentiary: the challenge of the resurrection promises the atoning character of the death of Christ, and of His Deity and Divine exaltation (Rom 1:4); (2) evangeline: the primitive gospel included testimony to the resurrection as one of its characteristic features, thereby proving to the hearer the assurance of the Divine redemption (1 Cor 15:1-4; Rom 4:25); (3) spiritual: the resurrection is regarded as the source and standard of the holiness of the believer. Every aspect of the Christian life confronts the believer from the beginning to the end (Rom 10:13-17); (4) eschatological: the resurrection is the guaranty and model of the believer's resurrection (1 Cor 15). As the bodies of the saints arose (Mt 27:52), so ours are to be quickened (Rom 8:11), and made like Christ's glorified body (Phil 3:21), thereby becoming spiritual bodies (1 Cor 15:44), that is, bodies ruled by their spirits and yet bodies. These points offer only the barest outline of the fullness of NT teaching concerning the doctrine of the resurrection of Christ.

RETAIL, re-tal'v. Several Heb words are thus transliterated: נְּחָשַׁנָּה, nēḥaseh, "to hold fast" (Jgs 7:8; 19:4; Job 2:9 AV [RV "hold fast"]; Mic 7:18; נְגָר, nger, "to shut up" [only in Dn 10:8; 11:6]; נְּפָדֵּנָה, naphadenah, "to hold" (Prov 3:18; 4:27; 11:16 AV [RV "obtain"]; in one case כָלָּה, kalah [Eccl 8:8]. In the NT καταλήψις, katalepsis, is used in Jn 20:23 of the "retaining of" sins by the apostles (see Retention of Sins); in Rom 1:28, RV has "refused to have," m כָלָה, "did not approve."' For AV "did not like to retain" (echo); and in Philm ver 13, substitutes "fain have kept" for "retained" (katechō). Sir 41:16 has "retain" for dialphounteō, "keep.""

RETAILATION, re-tal-i-ā'shun, re-. See Law in the NT; PUNISHMENTS; RETRIBUTION.

RETENTION, re-ten'shun, OF SINS (καταλήψις, katalepsis, "to lay fast hold of" [Jn 20:23]): The opposite of "the remission of sins." Where there was no evidence of repentance and faith, the community of believers were unauthorized to give assurance of forgiveness, and, therefore, could only warn that the guilt of sin was retained, and that the sinner remained beneath God's judgment.

While such retention has its place in connection with all preaching of the gospel, since the offers of grace are conditional, but not the law of God. All personal dealing of a pastor with a communicant, preparatory to the reception of the Lord's Supper. As the retention is supposed to be by an individual assurance, so the retention is an assurance of individual merit. With the retention is exercised by the ministry, not as an order, but as the representatives of the congregation of believers, to whom Christ gave power. It is well known by Alford in Test. on above passage, See also Malachi. Appendix to the "Schmalkald Articles."

RETRODUCTION, ret-i-bi'-shun:

1. NT Terms
2. A Revelation of Wrath as Well as Grace
3. Witness of Natural Theology
4. Retribution the Natural Consequence of Sin
5. Also the Positive Infliction of Divine Wrath
6. Instances of Use of ergo and thumos
7. Instances of Use of Greek Words for "Vengeance"
8. Words Meaning "Chastisement" Not Used of the Impenitent
9. Judgment Implies Retribution
10. Moral Sense Demands Vindication of God's Righteousness
11. Scripture Indicates Certainty of Vindication

The word as applied to the Divine administration is not used in Scripture, but undoubtedly the idea is commonly enough expressed. The words which come nearest to it are:

1. NT Terms ergo, thumos, wrath attributed to God; ενόχα, εκκλησία, κοινωνία, εἱκάζειν, εἰκάζεσθαι, εἰκάζω, δική, δίκαιος, δίκαιος, kóllasí, and τυμβία, τιμβία, "punishment"; besides σοφία, krtmá, and its derivatives, words expressive of judgment.

Rom 2 is full of the thought of retribution. The apostle, in vs 5, 6, comes very near to using the word itself, and gives indeed a good description of the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment as of God, "who will render to every man according to his works." It is well in approaching the subject to remind ourselves that there is undoubtedly, as the apostle says, a Revelation of wrath. We are so accustomed to think of the gracious revelation which the gospel brings us, and to approach the subject of the doom of the impenitent under the influence of the kindly sentiments engendered thereby, and with a view of God's gracious character as revealed in salvation, that we are apt to overlook somewhat the sterner facts of sin, and to misconceive the Divine attitude toward the impenitent sinner. It is certainly well that we should let the grace of the gospel have full influence upon all our thinking, but we must beware of being too fully engrossed with one phase of the Divine character. It is an infamy of human nature that we find it difficult to let two seemingly conflicting conceptions find a place in our thought. We are apt to surrender ourselves to the sway of one or the other of them according to the pressure of the moment.

Putting ourselves back into the position of those who have only the light of natural theology, we find that all deductions from the perfections of God, as revealed in His works, combined with a consideration of man's sin and want of harmony with God, lead us to the conclusion announced by the apostle: "The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men" (Rom 1:18). Wrath implies punishment, punishment is decreed, punishment is denounced. The word of God but confirms the verdict which conscience forecasts, Nature teaches that punishment, retribution, must follow sin. Within the sphere of physical law this is clearly exemplified. No breach of the so-called laws of Nature is tolerated. Strictly speaking, the laws of Nature are not laws, but by man's will to keep in harmony with them, and the natural consequences will be trouble, punishment, retribution. Harmony with law is blessing; collision with law is loss. Thus law in Nature "worketh wrath" to the neglecters of it. Punishment necessarily results. So we may well expect that in the higher sphere, God's moral laws cannot be neglected or violated with impunity, and Scripture fully justifies the expectation and shows that sin must be punished. All things considered, the fact of punishment for sinners need not surprise; the fact of pardon is the surprising thing. The surprise of pardon has ceased to surprise us because we are so familiar with the thought. We know the "how" of it because of the revelation of God's grace, however, saves on certain conditions, and there is no such thing known in Scripture as indiscriminate, necessary, universal grace. It is only from the Bible that we know of the salvation by grace. That same revelation shows that the grand design does not come to all, in the wise of saving all; though, of course, it may be considered as presented to all. Those who are not touched and saved by grace remain shut up in their sins. They are, and must be, in the nature of the case, left to their sins, with the added guilt of rejecting the offered grace. "Except ye believe that I am he," says Incarnate Grace, "ye shall die in your sins" (Jn 8:24).

Another conclusion we may draw from the general Scriptural representation is that the future retribution is one aspect of the natural consequence of sin, yet it is also in another aspect the positive infliction of Divine wrath. It is shown to be the natural outcome of sin in such passages as "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap" (Gal 6:7); "He that soweth unto his own flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption" (Gal 6:8). It is not without suggestiveness that in Heb word 'đwōn means both iniquity and punishment, and when Cain said "My punishment is greater than I can bear" (Gen 4:13), he really said "My iniquity is greater than I can bear"; his iniquity became his punishment. Of course, due consideration to the iniquity goes a long way toward meeting many of the objections brought against the doctrine of future punishment.

The other statement, however, remains true and must be emphasized, that there is an actual infliction of Divine wrath. All the great statements about the Divine judgment imply this, and while it is wrong not to take account of the natural working out of sin in its terrible consequences, it is equally wrong, perhaps more so, to refuse to recognize this positive Divine infliction of punishment. This, indeed, is the outstanding feature of retribution as it assumes form in Scripture. Even the natural consequences of sin, rightly viewed, are part of the Divine infliction, since God, in the nature of things, has conjoined sin and its consequences, and part of the positive infliction is the judicial shutting up of sin, "wrath to the neglection of it." With the case of Cain, his iniquity became his punishment, inasmuch as God sentenced him to bear the consequences of that iniquity. On the other hand, we might say that even the terribly positive outpourings of God's wrath upon the sinner are the natural consequences of sin, since sin in its very nature calls down the Divine displeasure. Indeed, these two phases of future punishment are so very closely connected that a right view of the matter compels us to keep both before us, and no full explanation of the punishment is possible when either phase is ignored.

The term Scripture applied to the doom of sinners all imply Divine displeasure, punitive action, retribution. The two outstanding Gr words for "wrath," ἀγέρ and θανάσιος, are both freely applied to God. ἀγέρ indicates settled displeasure, whereas θανάσιος is rather the tearing out of the flesh anger. The former is, as we should expect, more frequently applied to God, and, of course, all that is capricious and reprehensible in human wrath must be eliminated from the word as used of God. It indicates the settled opposition of His holy nature against sin. It was an affection found in the sinless Saviour Himself, for "he looked round about on them with anger" (Mk 3 5).

In the Baptist's warning "to flee from the wrath to come" (Mt 3 7), it is unquestionably the wrath of God that is meant, the manifestation of that being further described as the burning of the chalk with unquenchable fire (Mt 3 12). In Jn 3 36 it is said of the unbeliever that "the wrath of God is revealed from heaven to light of men" (Rom 1 18), the great passage we have already quoted about "the wrath of God revealed from heaven." The connection is a suggestive one and is often overlooked. In that passage Paul has quite a change of terms; he is ready to preach the gospel at Rome for he is not ashamed of the gospel; he is not ashamed of the gospel for it is the power of God unto salvation; it is the 'power of God' for therein is revealed the righteousness of God by faith; and his salvation by faith is a necessity "for the wrath of God is revealed," etc. Thus the Divine wrath on account of sin is the dark background of the gospel message. Had there been no such just wrath upon men, there had been no need for the Divine salvation. The despising of God's goodness by the impenitent means a treasuring up of "the wrath of God in the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God" (Rom 2 3-5). God "visithet with wrath" (1 5).

In Rom 4 15 the apostle states that "the law worketh wrath" (i.e. brings down the Divine displeasure), while in 5 9 he shows that believers are saved from wrath—undoubted wrath of God. The other two instances are in 2 20 where "are the children of wrath" (Eph 2 3); surely not "wrathful children," but liable to the wrath of God, and because of evil deeds come "the wrath of God upon the sons of disobedience" (Eph 5 6; Col 3 6). Christ "delivereth us from the wrath to come" (1 Thess 5 9); wrath has come upon the opposing Jews (2 16); but believers are not appointed unto wrath (5 9). With all these specific passages in view, to say nothing of the general teaching of the apostle on the question of coming judgment and punishment, it is utterly impossible to eliminate the idea of the Divine displeasure against sinners, and His consequent retributive action toward them. Even Ritschl, who absolutely denies the great principle of retribution, of positive displeasure, admits that "the only way for him out of the difficulty is to reject Paul's teaching as unauthorized." Other references to the "wrath of God" are in He 3 11; 4 3; and 6 passages in the Apocalypse—Rev 6 16 f; 11 18; 14 10 16 19 19 15. Two of the most terrible phrases in the whole of the NT. θανάσιος is only used in the Apocalypse concerning God (Rev 14 10-19; 15 1-7; 16 1-19; 19 15). In each case it refers to the same punishment, the blasing forth of the wrath; in the last two passages it is in passages in combination with ἀγέρ, and is rendered "fiercefulness" the fierceness of His wrath.

Εὐθύθεν, which means to avounce, is twice used of God (Rev 6 10; 19 2), and chatharos, "vengeance," 6 times (Lk 18 7 f; Rom 13 19; 2 Thess 1 8; He 10 30). In the first two instances it is used by Jesus, concerning the Divine action: εὐθύθεν, "judgment," or "vengence" is twice applied to God (2 Thess 1 9; Jude ver 7). Use of these terms shows that the punishment inflicted on evil men is strictly punishment of the vindictive sort, the vindication of outraged justice, the infliction of deserved penalty. Very significant is the passage in 2 Thess 1 6, "It is a righteous thing with God to recompense affilection to them that afflict you." There is no question of bettering the offender.

It is very remarkable that the terms in Gr which would carry the meaning of punishment for the good of the offender are never used in the NT of the infliction which comes upon the impenitent; these are παντελής and παντελεδές, and they are frequently used of the "chastisement of believers, but not of the impenitent. It is often claimed that the word κατάδικος used in Mt 25 46 carries the same idea of chastisement of the chaste unrepentant offender, but although Aristotle comparing God, in comparing Him to the judge of the living and the dead claims to mean that it is for the benefit of the offender (what he really says is that it is a god θανάσιος Macedonia, "one not mons and judging," "has the punished one in view," whereas θανάσιος in τον ολόκληρον εὐθυθέν, "of every one who haimg," "he may be satisfied"), the usage even in classical Gr is predominantly against making the supposed distinction. Reasons for this are given by the leading classical authors, including Aristotle himself, and it is certain that to those not thought of betterment can be in question, while all admit that in Hellenistic Gr the distinction is not maintained, and in any case chrestheria is also used of the punishment of the sinner (He 10 29).

All the representations of the coming day of judgment tell of the fact of retribution, and Christ Himself distinctly asserts it. Apart from His great eschatological discourses, concerning which criticism still hesitates and stammers, we have the solemn close of the Sermon on the Mount, and the pregnant statement of Mt 25 16 27. "The Son of Man in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then shall he render unto every man according to his deeds," and all the apostolic teaching upon the solemn theme is but the unfolding of the same great thought.

The conception of God as a perfect moral governor demands that His righteousness shall be fully vindicated. Looking at the course of history as it unfolds itself before us, we cannot fail to be struck with the anomalous Righteousness does not always triumph, goodness is often put to shame, wickedness appears to be profitable, and wicked men often prosper while good men are persecuted. Time and time signal Divine interpositions proclaim that God is indeed on the side of righteousness, but too often it seems as if He were unmindful, and men are tempted to ask the old question, "How doth God know? And is there knowledge in the Most High?" (Ps 73 11), while the righteous say in their distresses, "Jeh, how long shall the wicked, how long shall the wicked triumph?" (Ps 94 3). The moral sense cries out for some Divine vindication, and the Scriptures, in harmony with these, indicate that the final judgment will bring such vindication.

In the OT it is frequently presented as the solution of the baffling problems which beset the ethical sphere, as for instance in that fine utterance of religious philosophy in Ph 7;3, the Psalmist has before him all the puzzling elements of the problem; the cohesiveness, the coherence upon too many assumptions and conjectures. The narrative as it stands is quite intelligible and self-consistent. There is no good reason to doubt that, as far as it goes, it is an authentic record of the life of Jacob’s son.

At the first census in the wilderness Reuben numbered 46,500 men of war (Nu 1 21); at the second they had fallen to 43,730; see

At this time Reuben was on the west side of the tabernacle; and with him were Simeon and Gad; the total number of fighting men in this division being 151,450. Tg Pseudojews says that the standard was a deer, with the legend “Hear O Israel, the Lord thy God is one Lord.” On the march this division took the second place (Nu 2 10 f). The prince of the tribe was Elizur ben Shedeur, whose oblation is described in 7 30 ff.

The Reubenite among the spies was Shammun ben Zaccur (13 4). It is possible that the conspiracy against Moses organized by Reuben, Simeon, and Abiram, with the assistance of Korah the Levite (Nu 16), was an attempt on the part of the tribe to assert its rights as representing the firstborn. It is significant that the children of Korah did not perish (13 11). Moses’ infamy in the desert is considered the reward and triumph of the righteous and the confession and punishment of the wicked, a great final, retributive judgment in Scriptural, reasonable, necessary.

1. Jacob’s Eldest Son: two derivations of the name. As it stands in MT it means “behold a son”; but the reason given for so calling him is “The Lord hath looked upon my affliction,” which in Heb is ru’ben, ‘reb’en. Of his boyhood we have only the story of the mandrakes (Gen 30 14). As the firstborn he should really have been leader among his father’s sons. His birthright was forfeited by a deed of peculiar infamy (35 22), and as far as we know his tribe never took the lead in Israel. It is named first, indeed, in Nu 1 5,20, but thereafter it falls to the fourth place, Judah taking the first (2 10, etc.). To Reuben’s intervention Joseph owed his escape from the fate prepared by his brethren (Gen 37 29). Some have thought Reuben designed to set him free, from a desire to rehabilitate himself with his father. But there is no need to deny to Reuben certain noble and chivalous qualities. Jacob seems to have appreciated these, and, perhaps, therefore all the more deeply lamented the lapse that spoiled his life (Gen 49 3 f). It was Reuben who felt that their perils and anxieties in Egypt were a fit recompense for the unbrotherly conduct (42 22). To assure his father of Benjamin’s safety Joseph is represented as requiring him to be taken, Reuben was ready to pledge his own two sons (ver 37). Four sons born to him in Canaan went down with Reuben at the descent of Israel into Egypt (49 8 f).

The incidents recorded are reported by a certain school of OT scholars as the vague and fragmentary traditions of the tribe, wrought into the form of a biography of the supposed ancestor of the tribe. This interpretation raises more difficulties than it solves, and the coherence made too many assumptions and conjectures. The narrative as it stands is quite intelligible and self-consistent. There is no good reason to doubt that, as far as it goes, it is an authentic record of the life of Jacob’s son.

The incidents recorded are reported by a certain school of OT scholars as the vague and fragmentary traditions of the tribe, wrought into the form of a biography of the supposed ancestor of the tribe. This interpretation raises more difficulties than it solves, and the coherence made too many assumptions and conjectures. The narrative as it stands is quite intelligible and self-consistent. There is no good reason to doubt that, as far as it goes, it is an authentic record of the life of Jacob’s son.

At the first census in the wilderness Reuben numbered 46,500 men of war (Nu 1 21); at the second they had fallen to 43,730; see

The land given by Moses to the tribe of Reuben reached from the Arnon, Wady el-Majib, in the S., to the border of Gad in the N. In Nu 32 34 of Gad's tribal boundary which lay far S., Aror being on the very lip of the Arnon; but they were probably to be taken as an enclave in the territory of Reuben. From Josh 13 15 ff. it is clear that the northern border ran from some point N. of the Dead Sea in a direction E.N.E., passing to the N. of Heshbon. The Dead Sea was the western boundary, and it matched with the desert on the E. No doubt many districts changed hands in the course of the history. At the invasion of Tiglath-pileser, e.g., we read that Aror was in the hands of the Reubenites, "even unto the entrance of the wilderness from the river Euphrates" (1 Ch 5 8 f.). Bezer the city of refuge lay in Reuben's territory (Josh 20 8, etc.). A general description of the country will be found under Moab; while the cities of Reuben are dealt with in separate articles.

Reuben and Gad, occupying contiguous districts, and even, as we have seen, to some extent overlapping, are closely associated in the history. Neither took part in the glorious struggle against Sisera (Jgs 5 15 f.). Already apparently the sun-drying influences were taking effect. They are not excepted, however, from "all the tribes of Israel" who sent contingents for the war against Benjamin (Jgs 20 10; 21 5), and the reference in 5 15 seems to show that Reuben might have done great things had he been disposed. The tribe therefore was still powerful, but perhaps absorbed by anxieties as to its relations with neighboring peoples. In guarding their numerous flocks against attack from the S., and sudden incursions from the desert, a warlike spirit and martial prowess were developed. They were "valiant men, men able to bear buckler and sword, and to shoot with bow, and skilful in war" (1 Ch 5 18). They overwhelmed the Hagrites with Jetur and Naphish and Nodab, and greatly enriched themselves with the spoil. In recording the raid the Chronicler pays a compliment to their religious loyalty: "They cried to God in the battle, and he was entreated of them, because they put their trust in him" (5 19 ff.). Along with Gad and Maaseiah (27,000) a contingent of 120,000 men "with all manner of instruments of war for the battle, . . . men of war, that could order the battle array," men who "came with a perfect heart to Hebron," to make David king (12 37 f.). Among David's mighty men was Adyq, chief of the Reubenites, and thirty with him" (11 42). In the 40th year of David's reign overseers were set over the Reubenites "for every matter pertaining to God, and for the affairs of the king" (26 32). Perhaps in spite of the help given to David the Reubenites had never quite got over their old hostility to the house of Saul. At any rate, when disruption came they joined the Northern Kingdom (1 K 11 31).

The subsequent history of the tribe is left in much obscurity. Exposed as they were to hostile influences of Moab, a breach and split-off from fellowship with their brethren in worship, in their isolation they probably found the descent into idolatry all too easy, and the once powerful tribe sank into comparative insignificance. Of the immediate cause of this decline we have no knowledge. Moab established its authority over the land that had belonged to Reuben; and Mesha, in his inscription (M S.), while he speaks of Gad, does not think Reuben worthy of mention. They had probably become largely absorbed in the northward stream. Meanwhile we are informed that the invasion of Hazael during the reign of Jehu (2 K 10 32 f.) that "they trespassed against the God of their fathers, and played the harlot after the gods of the peoples of the land" is given as the reason for the fate that befell them at the hands of Pul, king of Assyria, who carried them away, "and brought them unto Halah, and Habor, and Harra, and to the river of Gozan" (1 Ch 5 25 f.).

The resemblance of Reuben's case to that of Simeon is striking, for Simeon also appears to have been practically absorbed in the tribe of Judah. The prestige that should have been Reuben's in virtue of his birthright is said to have passed to Joseph (1 Ch 5 1). And the place of Reuben and Simeon in the land is taken by the son of Joseph, a fact referred to in the blessing of Jacob (Gen 48 6). Ezeckiel finds a place for Reuben in his picture of restored Israel (48 6). He appears also—in this case to proceed by Judah only—in Rev 7 5.

REUBENITES, rōʿbēn-ītēs (רֹעֲבֶן-יִתֵּן), hōʿr-rē-bēnī; Ḥēmōʿ Pāwēfān, dēmoi Ṣhōwbēn; Members of the tribe of Reuben (Nu 26 7, etc.). Adina, one of David's mighty men, was a Reubenite (1 Ch 11 42).

REUEL, rōʿēl (רֹעֶל), rōʿēl, "God is his friend": LXX Pāwōφā, Rhagōudāl.

(1) In the genealogical system Reuel is both a son of Esau by Basemath (Gen 36 4.10.13.17; 1 Ch 1 35.37) and the father of the father-in-law of Moses, Hobah (Nu 10 29). In the account of the marriage of Zipporah to Moses (Ex 2 16–21) Jethro seems to be called Reuel (of Hobah). The various names of Jethro perplexed the Talmudists, too; some held that his real name was "Hobab," and that Reuel was his father. Reuel is probably a clan name, "Nu" (NU), and Hobah is a member of the clan ("son") of Reuel (Nu 10 29 AV reads "Raguel").

(2) The father of Elishaph, the prince of Gad (Nu 2 14), called (by some copyist's mistake) "Deneel" in 1 14; 7 42–47; 19 20. LXX has uniformly Rhagouda.

(3) A Benjamite (1 Ch 9 8).

REUHMAH, rōʾōma (רֹעָה), rōʾēmah: The concubine of Nahor (Gen 22 24).

1. The Nature of Revelation.—The religion of the Bible is a frankly supernatural religion. By this it is not meant merely that, according to it, all men, as creatures, live, move and have their being in God. It is meant that, according to it, God has intervened extraordinarily, in the course of the sinful world's development, for the salvation of men otherwise lost. In Eden the Lord God had been present with sinless man in such a sense as to form a distinct element in his social environment (Gen 3 8). This intimate association was broken up by the Fall. But God did not therefore withdraw Himself from concernment with men. Rather, He began at once a series of interventions in human history by means of which man might be rescued from his doom. And He brought to the end destined for them. These interventions involved the segregation of a people for Himself, by whom God should be known, and whose distinction should be that God should be "nigh unto them" and He was not to other nations (Dt 4 7; Ps 145 18). But this people was not permitted to imagine that it owed its segregation to anything in itself fitted to attract or determine the Divine preference; no consciousness was more poignant in Israel than that Jehovah had chosen it, not it Him, and that Jehovah's choice of it rested solely on His gracious will. Nor was this people permitted to imagine that it was for its own sake alone that it had been singled out to be the sole recipient of the knowledge of Jehovah; it was made clear from the beginning that God's mysteriously gracious dealing with it had as its ultimate end the blessing of the whole world (Gen 12 2 3; 17 4 5 6 16; 18 18; 22 18; of Rom 4 15), the bringing together again of the whole earth under the glorious reign of Jehovah, and the reversal of the curse under which the whole world lay for its sin (Gen 12 3). Meanwhile, however, Jehovah was known only in Israel. To Israel Jehovah showed His word and made known His intentions and judgments, and after this fashion He dealt with no other nation; and therefore none other knew His judgments (Ps 147 19 f). Accordingly, when the hope of Israel (who was also the desire of all nations) came, His own lips unhesitatingly declared that the salvation He brought, though of universal application, was "from the Jews" (Jn 4 22). And the nations to which this salvation had not been made known are declared by the chief agent in its proclamation to them to be, meanwhile, "far off" "having no hope" and "without God in the world" (Eph 2 12), because they were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers from the covenant of the promise.

The religion of the Bible thus announces itself, not as being chosen among men. After God, if haply they may feel after Him and find Him, but as the creation in men of the gracious God, forming a people for Himself, that they may show forth His praise. In other words, the religion of the Bible proclaims essentially a revealed religion. Or rather, to speak more exactly, it announces itself as the revealed religion, as the only revealed religion; and sets itself as such over against all other religions, which are represented as all products, in a sense in which it is not, of the art and device of man.

It is not, however, implied in this exclusive claim to revelation—which is made by the religion of the Bible in all the stages of its history—that the living God, who made the heaven, and the earth and the sea and all that in them is, has left Himself without witness among the peoples of the world (Acts 14 17). It is asserted indeed, that in the process of His redemptive work, God suffered for a season all the nations to walk in their own ways; but it is added that to none of them has He failed to do good, and to give from heaven rains and fruitful seasons, filling their hearts with food and gladness. And not only is He represented as thus constantly showing Himself in His providence not far from any of them, they are also charged with His if haply they might feel after Him and find Him (Acts 17 27), but as from the foundation of the world openly manifesting Himself to them in the works of His hands, in which His everlasting power and Divinity are clearly seen (Rom 1 20).

That men at large have not retained Him in their knowledge, or served Him as they ought, is not due therefore to failure on His part to keep open the way to knowledge of Him, but to the darkening of their senseless hearts by sin and hardening of their sinfulness (Rom 1 21 ff), by means of which they have supplanted the truth of God by a lie and have come to worship and serve the creature rather than the ever-blessed Creator. It is, indeed, precisely because in their sin they have thus held on to the truthless righteousness and have refused to have God in their knowledge (so it is intended); and because, moreover, in their sin, the revelation God gives of Himself in His works of creation and providence no longer suffices for men's needs, that God has intervened supernaturally in the course of history to form a people for Himself, through whom at length all the world should be blessed.

It is quite obvious that there are brought before us in these several representations two species or stages of revelation, which should be discriminated to avoid confusion. There and Special is the revelation which God communicated Revelation ously makes to all men: by it His fore Divinity is announced. And there is the revelation which He makes exclusively to His chosen people: through it His saving grace is made known. Both species or stages of revelation are insisted upon throughout the Scriptures. They are, as a compromise, brought significantly together in such a declaration as we find in Ps 19: "The heavens declare the glory of God . . . their line is gone out through all the earth" (vs 4). "The law of Jehovah is perfect, restoring the soul!" (ver 7). "The heavens, the earth, the sea, and all that in them is, declare the glory of Jehovah, the Creator of all that is, which has been written upon the very heavens, that none may fail to see it. From this it is evident, however, quickly to the more full-throated praise of the mercy of Jehovah, the covenant God, who has visited His people with saving instruction. Upon this higher revelation there is finally based a prayer for salvation from sin, which ends in a great threefold acclamation, instinct with adoring wonder: "O Jehovah, my rock, and my redeemer!" (ver 14). "The heavens, the earth, and everything in them, declare the glory of God, but not of His will according to which the poet prays to be pardoned and sanctified." In so commenting, Lord Bacon touches the exact point of distinction between the two species. The stages of revelation are adapted to man as man; the other to man as sinner; and since man, on becoming sinner, has not ceased to be man, but has only acquired new needs requiring additional provisions to bring him to the end of his existence, so the revelation directed to man as sinner does not supersede that given to man as man, but supplements it with these new provisions for his attainment, in his new condition of blindness, helplessness and guilt induced by sin, of the end of his being.

These two species or stages of revelation have been commonly distinguished from one another by the distinctive names of natural and supernatural revelation, or general and special revelation, or natural and soteriological revelation. Each of these modes of discriminating them has its particular fitness and describes a real difference between the two in nature, reach or purpose. The one is communicated through the media of natural phenomena occurring in the course of Nature or of history; the other implies an attempt to follow the natural course of things and is not merely in source but in mode supernatural. The one is addressed generally to all intelligent creatures, and is therefore accessible to all men; the other is addressed to a special class of sinners, to whom God would make known His salvation. The one has in view to meet and supply the natural need of creatures for knowledge of their God; the other to rescue broken and ruined sinners from their sin and its consequences. By and through them to one another, it is important that the two species or stages of revelation should not be set in opposition to one another, or the closeness of their mutual relations or the constancy of their interchange. They constitute the whole, the unitary whole, and each is incomplete without the other. In its most general idea, revelation is rooted in creation and the relations with His intelligent creatures into which God has brought Himself by giving them being. Its object is to realize the end of man's creation, to be attained only through knowledge of God and perfect and unbroken communion with Him. On the entrance of sin into the world, destroying this communion with God and obscuring the knowledge of Him derived from Nature, another phase of revelation was necessitated, having also another content, adapted to the new relation to God and the new conditions of intellect, heart and will brought about by sin. It must not be supposed, however, that this transition of revelation was an expected effect, introduced to meet an unforeseen contingency. The actual course of human development was in the nature of the case the expected and the intended course of human development, for which man in his destiny and revelation, therefore, in its double form was the Divine purpose for man from the beginning, and constitutes a unitary provision for the realization of the end of his creation in the actual circumstances in which he exists. We may call this unitary revelation and it consists of two elements by the cooperation of which the effect is produced; but we should bear in mind that only by their cooperation is the effect produced. Without special revelation, general revelation would be for sinful men incomplete and ineffective, and could issue, as in point of fact it has issued wherever it alone has been accessible, only in leaving them without excuse. (Rom 1:20). Without general revelation, special revelation would lack that basis in the fundaments of knowledge of the mighty and wise, righteous and good maker and ruler of all things, apart from which the further revelation of this great God's interventions in the world for the salvation of sinners could not be either intelligible, credible or operative.

Revelation in Eden.—Only in Eden has general revelation been adequate to the needs of man. Not being a sinner, man in Eden had no need of that grace of God himself by which sinners are restored to communion with Him, or of the special revelation of this grace of God to sinners to enable them to live with God. And not being a sinner, man in Eden, as he contemplated the works of God, saw God in the unclouded mirror of his mind with a clarity of vision, and lived with Him in the untroubled depths of his heart with a trustful intimacy of association, inaccessible to sinners. Nevertheless, the revelation of God in Eden was not merely "natural." Not only does the provision of the forbidden fruit involve its own capacity for a personal relation with God, but the whole history implies an immediacy of intercourse with God which cannot fail to be set to the credit of the picturesque and spiritual nature of the creative, or be fully accounted for by the vividness of the perception of God in His works proper to sinless creatures. The impression is strong that what is meant to be conveyed to us is that man dwelt with God in Eden, and enjoyed with Him immediacy and voluntary communication. In that case, we may understand that if man had not fallen, he would have remained Eden's representative, in relation with God, and that the cessation of this immediate intercourse is due to sin. It is not that the sphere of knowledge which is rooted in sin, but, if we may be allowed the expression, the specialness of spiritual relation which is rooted in sin, that had fallen, he would have continued to lie about him through all his history, as it lay about his infancy, even man having the fall, and the cherubim and the flame of a sword, turning every way, keep the path; and God breaks His way in a round-about fashion into man's darkest hour, to reveal the guidance of providence. By slow steps and gradual stages He at once works out His saving purpose and molds the world for its reception, choosing people for Himself, and leading them through long and weary ages, until at last when the fulness of time has come He bears in His arm and proclaims before the whole world the proclamation of His great salvation to all the earth.

(2) Revelation among the heathen.—Certainly, from the gate of Eden onward, God's general revelation ceased to be, in the strict sense, supernatural. It is, of course, not meant to say that God left His world and let it to fester in its iniquity. His providence still ruled over all, leading steadily onward to the goal for which man had been created, and of the attainment of which in God's own good time and way the very continuance of men's existence, under God's providential government, was a pledge. And His Spirit still everywhere wrought upon the hearts of men, stirring up all their powers (though created in the image of God, marred and impaired by sin) to their best activities, and to such splendid efforts in every sphere of achievement as to command the admiration of all ages, and in the highest region of all, that of conduct, to call out from an apostle the encomium that though they had no law they did by nature (observe the word "nature") the things which the law requires. But this, however, remains within the limits of Nature, that is to say, within the sphere of operation of Divinely directed and assisted second causes. It illustrates merely the heights to which the powers of man may be trained under the guidance of providence and the influences of what we have learned to call God's "common grace." Nowhere, throughout the whole ethnic domain, are the conceptions of God and His ways put within the reach of man, through God's revelation of Himself in the works of creation and providence, transcended; nowhere is the slightest knowledge betrayed of anything concerning God and His purposes, which could be known only by its being supernaturally told to men. Of the entire body of "saving truth," for example, which is the burden of what we call "special revelation," the whole heathen world remained in total ignorance. And even its hold on the general truths of religion, not being vitalized by supernatural enforcement, weakened, and men's conception of the very nature of God decayed, until it ran out to the dreadful issue which Paul sketches for us in that inspired philosophy of religion which he incorporates in the latter part of the first chapter of the Ep. to the Rom.

Behind even the ethnic development, there lay, of course, the supernatural intercourse of man with God which had obtained before the entrance of sin into the world, and the supernatural revelations at the gate of Eden (Gen 3:8), and at the second origin of the human race, the Flood (Gen 8:21, 22; 9:1-17). How long the tradition of this primitive revelation lingered in minds and corners of the heathen world, conditioning and vitalizing the natural revelation of God always accessible, we have no means of estimating. Neither is it easy to measure the extent of God's special revelation itself, or that to His people upon men outside the bounds of Israel. And, coming into contact with, this chosen people, or sharing with them a common natural inheritance, Lot and Ishmael and Esau have all been wholly ignorant of the word of God which came to Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and all the race of Israel whose hands were trained with His power and whose hearts were enlightened through His grace. But He had been with those whose hands were trained with His power and whose hearts were enlightened through His grace. But He had been with the race who were hailed as a "special people," and whose experience and history were for the instruction of all. He had been with the race who were told something of the heavens and the earth, and what was in them; and who were told these things in such a manner as to make it plain that whatever impressions were thus conveyed reached apparently individuals only: the heathen which surrounded Israel, even those of the Gentile nations which were not the special people of God, and the heathen that had remained heathen; they had no revelation. In the special instances where He opened the eyes of men and sanctified natural communication—such as the dreams sent to Abimelech (Gen 20) and to Pharaoh (Gen 40, 41) and...
II. The Process of Revelation. — Meanwhile, however, God had not forgotten them, but was preparing salvation for them also through the supernatural revelation of His grace that He was making to His people. According to the Bib. representation, in the midst of and working confluently with the revelation which He has always been giving of Himself on the plane of Nature, God was making also from the very fall of man a further revelation of Himself on the plane of grace. In contrast with His general, natural revelation, in which all men by virtue of their very nature as men share, this special, supernatural revelation was granted only to a chosen few, and, progressively to a family, a tribe, a nation, a race, until, when the fulness of time was come, it was made the possession of the whole world. It may be difficult to obtain from Scripture a clear account of the order in which this revelation was given. One thing, however, is certain, the recipient of this revelation, it is so that He builds up His kingdom in the world and in the individual soul, which only gradually comes whether to the knowledge of God or to the fruition of His salvation. As to the fact, the Scriptures are explicit, tracing for us, or rather embodying in their own growth, the record of the steady advance of this gracious revelation through definite stages from its first faint beginnings to its glorious completion in Jesus Christ.

So express is its relation to the development of the kingdom of God itself, or rather to that great series of Divine operations which are directed to the building up of the kingdom of God in the world, that it is properly considered under the head of Redemptive Acts of God in the contemplating mind of man. Thus it is not infrequently said that revelation, meaning this special, redemptive revelation, has been communicated in deeds, not in words; and it is occasionally elaborately argued that the sole manner in which God has revealed Himself as the Saviour of sinners is just by performing those mighty acts by which sinners are saved. This is not, however, the Bib. representation. Revelation is, of course, often made through the instrumentality of deeds; and the series of His great redemptive acts by which He saves the world constitutes the preeminent revelation of the grace of God — so far as these redemptive acts are open to observation and are perceived in their significance. But revelation, after all, is the correlate of understanding and has as its proximate end just the production of knowledge, though not, of course, knowledge for its own sake but knowledge for the sake of salvation. The series of the redemptive acts of God, accordingly, can properly be designated “revelation” only when and so far as they are contemplated as adapted and designed to produce knowledge of God and His gracious works. No less the series of unexplained acts can be thought, however, adapted to produce knowledge, esp. if these acts be, as in this case, of a highly transcendental character. Nor can this particular series of acts be thought to have as its main design the production of knowledge; its main design is rather to produce an experience culminating in any event avail to modify the general fact that the life of the heathen peoples lay outside the supernatural revelation of God. The history of revelation were suffered to walk in their own ways (Acts 14:16).

1. Place of Revelation.

a. The acts of God in the development of the kingdom of God in the world, that it is properly considered under the head of Redemptive Acts of God in the contemplating mind of man. Thus it is not infrequently said that revelation, meaning this special, redemptive revelation, has been communicated in deeds, not in words; and it is occasionally elaborately argued that the sole manner in which God has revealed Himself as the Saviour of sinners is just by performing those mighty acts by which sinners are saved. This is not, however, the Bib. representation. Revelation is, of course, often made through the instrumentality of deeds; and the series of His great redemptive acts by which He saves the world constitutes the preeminent revelation of the grace of God — so far as these redemptive acts are open to observation and are perceived in their significance. But revelation, after all, is the correlate of understanding and has as its proximate end just the production of knowledge, though not, of course, knowledge for its own sake but knowledge for the sake of salvation. The series of the redemptive acts of God, accordingly, can properly be designated “revelation” only when and so far as they are contemplated as adapted and designed to produce knowledge of God and His gracious works. No less the series of unexplained acts can be thought, however, adapted to produce knowledge, esp. if these acts be, as in this case, of a highly transcendental character. Nor can this particular series of acts be thought to have as its main design the production of knowledge; its main design is rather to produce an experience culminating in any event avail to modify the general fact that the life of the heathen peoples lay outside the supernatural revelation of God. The history of revelation were suffered to walk in their own ways (Acts 14:16).

2. Stages of Material from the point of view, the development of God's redemptive revelation from its first beginnings, in the promise of Material given to Abraham—or rather in what Develop- ment at the gate of Eden—to its comple- tion in the advent and work of Christ and the teaching of His apostles; a steadily ad- vancing development, which, as it lies spread out to view in the pages of Scripture, takes to those who look at it from the consummation backward, the appearance of a series of stages or phases of God's acts by the great figure of Christ. Even from the formal point of view, however, there has been pointed out a progressive advance in the method of revelation, consonant with its advance in content, or rather with the advancing stages of the bringing up of the Kingdom of God, to subserve which is the whole object of revelation. Three distinct steps in revelation have been discriminated from this point of view. They are distinguished precisely by the increasing independence of revelation from divine control, the disclosure of God's acts of revelation, and the redemption by the acts of God, in which, nevertheless, all revelation is a substantial element. Discriminations like this must not be taken too absolutely; and in the present instance the chronological sequence cannot be accurately dealt with. Moreover, there are three generally successive stages of revelation which may be recognized, producing periods at least characteristically of what we may somewhat conventionally call theophany, prophecy and inspiration. What may be somewhat indefinitely summed off as this Patriarchal age is characterized as "the period of External Manifestations, and Symbols, and Theophanies"; during it "God spoke to men through their senses, in physical phenomena, as the burning bush, the cloudy pillar, or in sensuous forms, as men, angels, etc., etc. . . . . In the Prophetic age, on the contrary, the prevailing mode of revelation was by means of inward prophetic inspiration": God spoke to men characteristically by the movements of the Holy Spirit in their hearts. "Prevalently, at any rate, revelation in the downward process, or revelation as it was called, was supernatural revelation was a revelation in the hearts of the foremost thinkers of the people, or, as we call it, prophetic inspiration, without the aid of external sensuous symbols of God?" (A. B. Davidson, OT Prophecy, 1903, p. 148; cf. pp. 12-14, 145 ff.) This internal method of revelation reaches its culmination in the NT period, which is preeminently the age of the Spirit. What is esp. characteristic of this age is revelation through the medium of the written word, what may be called the apodictic or outward prophetic inspiration. The revealing Spirit speaks through chosen men as His organs, but through these organs in such a fashion that the most intimate processes of their souls become the instruments by means of which He speaks His mind. Thus at all events there are brought clearly before us three well-marked modes of revelation, which we may perhaps designate respectively, not with perfect discrimination, it is true, but not misleadingly, (1) external manifestation, (2) internal suggestion, and (3) concursive operation.

III. Modes of Revelation.—Theophany may be taken as the typical form of "external manifestation"; but by its side may be ranged the other modes by which Revelation is to Himself known, including express miracles, no doubt, but along with them every supernatural intervention in the affairs of men, by means of which a better understanding is communicated of what God is or what are His purposes of grace to a sinful race. Under "internal suggestion" may be subsumed all the characteristic phenomena of what is most properly spoken of as "prophecy": visions and dreams, which, according to a fundamental passage (Nu 12 6), constitute the testimony, (2) internal suggestion, and with them the whole "prophetic word," which shares its essential characteristic with visions and dreams, since it comes not by the will of man but from God. By "concursive operation" may be meant that form of revelation constituted in an inspired psalm or oracles or history, in which no human activity—not even the control of the will—is superseded, but the Holy Spirit works in, and through them all in such a manner as to communicate to the product qualities distinctly supernatural and not to be found in the ordinary literature of the Bible, from that of Moses to that of Christ and His apostles, in which all these modes of revelation do not find place. One or another may seem particularly characteristic of this age of or that; but they all occur in every age. And they occur side by side, broadly speaking, on the same level. No discrimination is drawn between them in point of worthiness as modes of revelation, and much less in point of purity in the revelation. For revelation cannot be viewed in the circumstance that God spoke to Moses, not by dream or vision but mouth to mouth, is, indeed, adverted to (Nu 12 8) as a proof of the peculiar favor shown to Moses and even of the superior dignity of Moses above other organs of revelation: God admitted him to an intimacy of intercourse which He did not accord to others. But though Moses was thus distinguished above all others in the dealings of God with him, no distinction is drawn between the revelations given through him and those given through other organs of revelation in point of either of Divinity or of authority. And beyond this we have no Scriptural warrant to go on in contrasting one mode of revelation with another. Dreams may seem to us little fitted to serve as vehicles of Divine communications. But there is no suggestion in Scripture that revelations through dreams stand on a lower plane than any others; and we should not fail to remember that the essential characteristics of revelations through dreams are shared by all forms of communication in which men may or should call them visions or not the images or ideas which fill, or pass in procession through, the consciousness are determined by some other power than the recipient's own will. It may seem natural to suppose in such cases that the recipient is not in communication to the fullness of the engagement of the mental activity of the recipient in their reception. But we should bear in mind that the intellectual or spiritual quality of a revelation is not derived from the recipient, but from its source, and that the fundamental fact in all revelation is that it is from God. This is what gives unity to the whole process of revelation, given though it may be in diverse portions and in diverse manners and distributed though it may be through the ages in accordance with the mere will of God, or as it may have suited His developing purpose—this and its unitary end, which is ever the building up of the kingdom of God. In whatever diversity of forms, by means of whatever variety of modes, in whatever distinguishable stages it is given, it is ever the revelation of the One God, and it is ever the one consistently developing redemptive revelation of God.

On a prima facie view it may indeed seem likely that a difference of the nature of the cases, in which it is said that God spoke to Moses in a vision, would inevitably obtain between revelations given through dreams and those given through other organs. The completely supernatural character of revelations given in theophanies is obvious. To the several men, to make known His gracious purposes toward them, has no other recourse here than to pronounce the stories legendary. The objectivity of the mode of communication which is adopted is intense, and it is thrown up to observation with the greatest emphasis. Into the natural life of man there is intruded a mode of knowledge more purely supernatural communication. In these communications we are given accordingly just a series of "natural forms of prophecy," which are not supernatural. In the Patriarchal age were all revelations given in theophanies or objective appearances. Visions and visions, and revelations without explicit intimation in the narrative of how they were communicated. And when we pass on in the history, we do not. Indeed, leave behind us theophanies and objective appearances. It is not only made the very characteristic of Moses, the greatest figure in the whole history of revelation except only that of Christ, that he knew God face to face (Dt 34 10), and that He spoke to him "manifestly" and not in dark speeches (Nu 12 8); but throughout the whole history of the appearance of Jesus to Paul on the road to Damascus, God has shown Himself visibly to His servants whenever He has seemed so impressed to Him the occasion of making them in objective speech. Nevertheless, it is expressly made the characteristic of the Prophetic age that the God makes Himself known to His servants "in a vision, ... in a dream" (Nu 12 8). And although, throughout its entire duration, God, in fulfillment of His promise (Dt 18:18), put His words in the mouths of His prophets and gave them His commandments to speak, yet it would seem that the very employment of men as instruments of revelation that the words of God given through them might be spoken out are in the very nature of the purport of the supernatural may seem so far obscured. And when it is not merely the mouths of men with which God has spoken, but their minds and hearts as well—the play of their own mental processes of the logical reasoning, or the tenacity of their memories, as, say, in a psalm or an epistle, or a history—the supernatural element is less likely to appear easily something to retire still farther into the background. It can scarcely be a mystery that will be revealed, for vision has been raised to the same position of the nature and the supernatural in such revelations, and, in many cases, man's employment meaning or the completion of their supernatural has been limited and curtailed in the interests of the natural instrumentalities employed. The plausibility of such reasoning renders it the more necessary that we should observe the unvarying emphasis which the Scriptures place upon the absolute supernaturality of revelation in all its modes alike. In the view of the Scriptures, the completely supernatural character of revelation is in no way lessened by the circumstance that it has been given through the lips, mouth, hand, or oracle, as the case may be.

We have already been led to note that even on the occasion when Moses is exalted above all other organs of revelation (Nu 12:6 ff), in the highest point of dignity and favor, no suggestion whatever is made of any inferiority, in either the directness or the purity of their supernaturalness, attaching to other organs of revelation. There might never afterward arise a prophet in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face (Dt 34:10). But each of the whole series of prophets raised up by Jehovah the people that might always know His will was to be like Moses in speaking to the people only what Jehovah commanded them (Dt 18:15-18:20). In this great promise, securing to Israel the succession of prophets, there is also included a declaration of precisely how Jehovah would communicate His messages not so much to them as through them. "I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto me, and will speak unto them in my name; and they shall hearken unto them" (Dt 18:18); and He will put His words in His mouth, and He shall speak unto them all that I shall command him." The process of revelation through the prophets was a process by which Jehovah put His words in the mouths of the prophets, and the prophet speaking precisely those words and not others. So the prophets themselves ever asserted. "Then Jehovah put forth his hand, and touched my mouth," explains Jeremiah in his account of how he received his prophecies, "and Jehovah said unto me, Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth" (Jer 1:9; of 6:14; Isa 51:16; 69:21; Nu 22:35; 23:5. 12:16). Accordingly, the words "with which" they spoke were not their own but the Lord's: "And he said unto me, records Ezekiel, "Son of man, go, get thee unto the house of Israel, and speak with my words unto them" (Ezk 3:4). It is a process of nothing other than "dictation" which is thus described (2 S 5:14.319), though, of course, the question may remain open of the exact processes by which the dictation is accomplished. The fundamental passage which brings the central fact before us in the most vivid manner is, no doubt, the account of the commissioning of Moses and Aaron given in Ex 4:10-17. 7-1. Here, in the case of Jehovah speaking to which Jehovah had made the mouth can be with it to teach it what to speak, and announces the precise function of a prophet to be that he is a "mouth of God," who speaks not his own but God's words. Accordingly, the Heb name for "prophet" (nabhāt), whatever may be its etymology, means throughout the Scriptures just "spokesman," though not "spokesman" in general, but spokesman by way of eminence, that is, God's spokesman; and the characteristic formula by which a prophetetic declaration is announced is: The Lord Jehovah says (Nu 12:6 [or the brief "saith Jehovah"] (nēḇū ʿāḇeḵ). In no case does a prophet put his words forward as his own words. That he is a prophet at all is due not to choice on his own part, but to a call of God, obeyed often with reluctance; and he prophesies or forbear to prophesy, not according to his own will or fancy, but at the Lord's bidding (Ezk 3:20), and for the benefit of the Lord, not of himself (Ezk 3:20). It is for the Lord to grant his sight (Ezk 12:24), and it is He who gives him the fruit of the spirit (Isa 57:19; cf 6:7; 50:4). In contrast with the false prophets, he strenuously asserts that he does not speak out of his own heart ("heart" in Bib. language includes the whole inner man), but that what he proclaims is the pure word of Jehovah. The fundamental passage does not quite leave the matter, however, with this general declaration.

4. Prophecy as Message. The word with which Jehovah communicated His messages to His prophets as through the medium of visions and dreams. Neither visions in the technical sense of that word, nor dreams, appear, however, to have been the common mode of deliverance of the prophets, the record of whose revelations has come down to us. But, on the other hand, there are numerous indications in the record that the universal mode of revelation to them was one which was in some way or other a vision, and so be classed only in the category distinctively so called.

The whole nomenclature of prophecy presupposes, indeed, its vision-form. Prophecy is distinctively a word, and was delivered by the Lord by means known to Him as the "word of Jehovah." That it should be announced by the name. "Thus saith the Lord," is, therefore, on what we expect, or expect to understand for such a description of its process as: "The Lord Jehovah saith unto man, to open mine ear;" (Isa 50:4-5). But this is not the story of speaking of their messages which is most usual in the prophets. Rather is the whole body of prophecy curiously presented as a thing seen. Isaiah places at the head of his books: "The vision of Isaiah which Jehovah spake unto him," (cf Isa 29:10; Ob 1); and then proceeds to set at the head of subordinate sections the remarkable words, "The word which Jehovah spake unto me. His burden [in "oracle" . . .] which Jehovah did see . . ." (Isa 13). Similarly, therefore, stand at the head of other prophetic books: the words of Amos (Am 1:1); the word of Jehovah which came to Amos (Am 2:1), "which Jehovah spake unto me" (Am 2:14); the oracle of Jehovah which was revealed unto the prophet did see (Hab 1:1); and elsewhere, such language occurs: the word that Jehovah hath spoken to the prophet, (Isa 35:18); the spirit of Jehovah that spake by me. . . . oracles (Lam 2:14); the word of Jehovah came to me (Ezek 13:3); and, beholding I am unto the foolish prophets, which follow their own spirit, and have seen nothing. (Ezek 13:8). I will look forth to see what he will speak with me. . . . Jehovah . . . said, Write the vision (Hab 2:1). It is an inadequate explanation of such language to suppose it merely a relic of a time when vision was more predominantly the form of revelation. There is no proof that vision in the technical sense was ever more predominantly the form of revelation than in the days of the great writers, and so language which have quoted too obviously represents the living point of view of the prophets to admit of the supposition that it was merely conventional on the part of the prophets in a word, represent the Divine communications which they received, to be given to them in the mode of words. It is possible, no doubt, to exaggerate the significance of this. It is an exaggeration, for example, to insist that therefore all the Divine communications before us in the most vivid manner is, no doubt, the account of the commissioning of Moses and Aaron given in Ex 4:10-17. 7-1. Here, in the case of Jehovah speaking to which Jehovah had made the mouth can be with it to teach it what to speak, and announces the precise function of a prophet to be that he is a "mouth of God," who speaks not his own but God's words. Accordingly, the Heb name for "prophet" (nabḥāt), whatever may be its etymology, means throughout the Scriptures just "spokesman," though not "spokes-
tive fact of the vouchers to a prophecy, or, in other words, that these revelations took place entirely externally to the prophets, and, if they were implied, stood off and contemplated them, or if they were implied, that a mediation was passed through which so violent as not to supersede their mental activity, but for whose memory it is not possible they would be even in the least degree evident that they came from a source other than the prophets' own minds. It is undoubtedly the fundamental point of the question, which represents the complete picture of the prophets' own views; it is their own testimony that the revelations given through them are not their own but wholly God's. This point stands beyond question (Ezk 13 3; "Woe unto the foolish prophets, that follow their own spirit, and have seen nothing,"") a typical utterance of the prophet. The Revelation is not the prophet's. What distinguishes the false prophets is the medium through which it came; genuine prophecy (Ezk 13 16-17), on, or to, draw the anathema sharply, that they speaks a vision of their own heart, and not out of the mouth of the Lord. But the extreme views fail to do justice, the one to the equally important fact that the word of God, given through the prophets, comes as the pure and unadulterated word of God not merely to, but from, the prophets; and the other to the equally obvious fact that the influence of the prophets is alert throughout the whole process of the reception and delivery of the revelation made through them (see INSPIRATION; PROPHECY).

That which gives to prophecy as a mode of revellation its place in the category of visions, strictly so called, and dreams is that it shares with them the distinguishing characteristic which determines the class. In them all alike the movements of the mind to a vision are something extraneous to the subject's will, or, rather, they are speaking of supernaturally given dreams and visions, extraneous to the totality of the subject's own psychoses. A power not himself takes possession of his consciousness and determines it according to its will. That power, in the case of the prophets, was fully recognized and energetically asserted to be Jeh-Himself or, to be more specific, the Spirit of Jeh (1 S 10 6:10; Neh 9 30; Zec 7 12; Joel 2 28.29). The prophets were therefore 'men of the Spirit' (Hos 9 7). What constituted them prophets was that the Spirit was put upon them (Isa 42 1) or poured out on them (Joel 2 28.29), and they were consequently filled with the Spirit (Mic 3 8), or, in another but equivalent location, that "the hand" of the Lord, or "the power of the hand" of the Lord, was upon them (1 Ki 1 3; 2 11:22; 3 22; 37 1; 40 1), that is to say, they were under the Divine control. This control is represented as complete and compelling, so that, under it, the prophet becomes not the "mover," but the "court," the "articulator," of the thing. This is how the apostle Peter very purely reflects the prophetic consciousness in his well-known declaration: 'No prophecy of scripture comes of private interpretation; for prophecy was never brought by the will of man; but it was born by the Holy Spirit that men spoke from God' (2 Pet 1 20.21).

What language of Peter emphasizes—and what is emphasized in the whole account which the prophets give of their own consciousness—is, to speak plainly, the passivity of the revelation given through them. This is the significance of the phrase; 'it was as borne by the Holy Spirit that men spoke from God.' To be "borne" (φησιν, προει) is not the same as to be led (ἀκολούθος, μέλτος) (εὐφραίνω, εὐφραίνω): he that is "borne" contributes nothing to the movement induced, but is the object to be moved. The term "passivity" is, perhaps, however, liable to some misapprehension, and should not be over-stressed. It is not intended to deny that the intelligence of the prophets was active in the reception of their message; it was by means of their active intelligence that their message was received; their intelligence was the instrument of revelation. It is intended to deny only that their intelligence was active in the production of their message: that it was creatively as distinguished from receptively active. For reception itself is a kind of activity.

What the prophetic passivity conceals is this: that we shall understand is that they are in no sense co-authors with God of their messages. Their mesgages are given them, given them entire, and given them precisely as they are given out by them. God may make use of personal instruments, but he does not give a part of his revelation to his messengers, but "His mouth." But at the same time their intelligence is active in the reception, retention and announcing of their messages, contributing nothing to them but presenting fit instruments for the communication of them— instruments capable of delivering the message profoundly to and zealously proclaiming it.

There is, no doubt, a not unnatural hesitancy abroad in thinking of the prophets as exhibiting only such meretricious and mechanical traits, and nothing of their personal character. For the term 'prophetic,' so far from being applied in *1* a derogatory sense, is equally applicable to the personal and to the prophetic character of the prophet. We are led to the conclusion that the true prophet is not only a speaker of God but an authority in his own right. The prophet is an independent source of divine authority, a revealer of God in his own unique way, and as such, is not only a mouth-piece of the living God, but also a representative of his wisdom, with a unique faculty of presenting it. He is a called, and an inspired. "He is a teacher in his own right." And the same thing is true of the message; it is a message that is given to the prophet and is not simply 'mover,' of the element of life, or "born of God," in the sense that he is a mouth-piece of the living God, but also as the authority in his own right, with a unique faculty of presenting it. He is a called, and an inspired. "He is a teacher in his own right." And the same thing is true of the message; it is a message that is given to the prophet and is not simply

5. Passivity of the Prophets—The revelation given through them. This is the significance of the phrase; 'it was as borne by the Holy Spirit that men spoke from God.' To be "borne" (φησιν, προει) is not the same as to be led (ἀκολούθος, μέλτος) (εὐφραίνω, εὐφραίνω): he that is "borne" contributes nothing to the movement induced, but is the object to be moved. The term "passivity" is, perhaps, however, liable to some misapprehension, and should not be over-stressed. It is not intended to deny that the intelligence of the prophets was active in the reception of their message; it was by means of their active intelligence that their message was received; their intelligence was the instrument of revelation. It is intended to deny only that their intelligence was active in the production of their message: that it was creatively as distinguished from receptively active. For reception itself is a kind of activity.

What the prophetic passivity conceals is this: that we shall understand is that they are in no sense co-authors with God of their messages. Their messages are given them, given them entire, and given them precisely as they are given out by them. God may make use of personal instruments, but he does not give a part of his revelation to his messengers, but "His mouth." But at the same time their intelligence is active in the reception, retention and announcing of their messages, contributing nothing to them but presenting fit instruments for the communication of them— instruments capable of delivering the message profoundly to and zealously proclaiming it.

There is, no doubt, a not unnatural hesitancy abroad in thinking of the prophets as exhibiting only such meretricious and mechanical traits, and nothing of their personal character. For the term 'prophetic,' so far from being applied in a derogatory sense, is equally applicable to the personal and to the prophetic character of the prophet. We are led to the conclusion that the true prophet is not only a speaker of God but an authority in his own right. The prophet is an independent source of divine authority, a revealer of God in his own unique way, and as such, is not only a mouth-piece of the living God, but also a representative of his wisdom, with a unique faculty of presenting it. beasts speak, and mysterious voices sound forth from the void; and there have not been lacking instances in which men have been compelled by the same power to speak what they would not, and it is not without cause we speak of the strangling power of their ears. But ordinarily when God the Lord would speak to men He avails Himself of the services of a human tongue with which to speak, and He employs this tongue according to its nature as a tongue and according to the particular nature of the tongue which He employs. It is vain to say that the message delivered through the instrumentality of this tongue is conditioned at least in its form by the tongue by which it is spoken, if not, indeed, limited, curtailed, in some degree determined even in its matter, by it. Not only was it God the Lord who made the tongue, and who made this particular tongue with all its peculiarities, not without regard to the message He would deliver through it; but His control of it is perfect and complete, and it is as absurd to say that He cannot speak His message by it purely without that message suffering change from the peculiarities of its tone and modes of enunciation, as it would be to say that no new truth can be announced, no new element of speech by the combination of which the truth in question is announced are already in existence with their fixed range of connotation. The marks of the several individualities imprinted on the messages of the tongues of men, are not the crowning mark of the general fact that these messages are couched in human language, and in no way beyond that general fact affect their purity as direct communications from God.

6. Revelation by Inspiration. This mode of revelation differs from prophecy, properly so called, precisely by the employment in it, as is not done in prophecy, of the total personality of the organ of revelation, as a factor. It has been common to speak of the mode of the Spirit's action in this form of revelation, therefore, as an assistance, a superintendence, a direction, a control, the meaning being that the effect aimed at— the discovery and enunciation of Divine truth—is attained through the action of the human powers—historical research, logical reasoning, ethical thought, religious aspiration, not by themselves, however, but under the prevailing assistance, superintendence, direction, control of the Divine Spirit. This manner of speaking has the advantage of setting this mode of revelation sharply in contrast with prophetic revelation, as involving merely a determining, and not, as in prophetic revelation, a supercessive action of the revealing Spirit. We are warned, however, against pressing this discrimination too far by the inclusion of the whole body of Scripture in the category of revelation under this heading. It is true, as a category of prophecy, and the assignment of their origin not to a mere "leading" but to the "bearing" of the Holy Spirit. In any event such terms as assistance, superintendence, direction, control, inadequately express the nature of the Spirit's action in revelation by "concussive operation." The Spirit is not to be conceived as standing outside of the human powers employed for the effect in view, ready to supplement any inadequacies they may show and to supply any defects they may manifest, but as working confluently, with a superiority, elevating them, directing them, controlling them, energizing them, so that, as His instruments, they rise above themselves and under His inspiration do His work and reach His aim. The product, therefore, which by their hand is theirs, is His product through them. It is this fact which gives to the process the right to be called actively, and to the product the right to be called passively, a revelation. Although the circumstance that what is done is done by and through the action of human powers keeps this product more properly in a true sense human, yet the confluent operation of the Holy Spirit throughout the whole process raises the result above what could by any possibility be achieved by mere human powers and constitutes it expressly a supernatural product. The human traits are traceable throughout, but at bottom it is a Divine gift, and the language of Paul is the most proper mode of speech that could be applied to it: "Which things also we speak, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Spirit teacheth" (1 Cor 2:13); "The things which I write unto you...are the commandment of the Lord" (1 Cor 14:37).

7. Complete may without violence be subsumed under "Revelation" the other of these three modes of God—external manifestation, internal significance in Christ, and concursive operation. All, that is, except the culminating revelation, not through, but in, Jesus Christ. As in His person, Jesus Christ is a Godhead bodily, He rises above all classification and is sui generis; so the revelation accumulated in Him stands outside all the divers portions and divers manners in which otherwise revelation has been given and sums up in itself that which has been or can be made known of God and of His redemption. He does not so much make a revelation of God as Himself is the revelation of God; He does not merely disclose God's purpose of redemption, He is unto us wisdom from God, and righteousness and sanctification and redemption. The theophanies are but faint shadows in comparison with His manifestation of God in the flesh. The prophets could prophesy only as the Spirit of Christ which was in them testified, revealing to them as to servants one or another of the secrets of the Lord Jehovah; from Him as His Son Jehovah has no secrets, but whatsoever the Father knows that the Son knows also. Whatever truth men have been made partakers of by the revelation of the Spirit of truth, those have it. But the Father hath them all in Himself, and is taken by the Spirit of truth and declared to men that He may be glorified. Nevertheless, though all revelation is thus summed up in Him, we should not fail to note very carefully that it would also be all sealed up in the Spirit of truth and declared to men in Him—so little is revelation conveyed by fact alone, without the word—had it not been thus taken by the Spirit of truth and declared unto men. The entirety of the NT is but the explanatory word accompanying and explaining the revelation of Christ. And when this fact was in all its meaning made the possession of men, revelation was completed and in that sense ceased. Jesus Christ is no less the end of revelation than He is the end of the law.

IV. Biblical Terminology.—There is not much additional to be learned concerning the nature and processes of revelation, from the terms currently employed in Scripture to express the idea. These terms are often used in the book of Proverbs and of Psalms, as closing, making known, making manifest, applied with more or less heightened significance to supernatural acts or effects in kind. In the Eng. Bible (AV) the vb. "revel" occurs about 51 t., of which 22 are in the OT and 29 in the NT. In the OT the word is always the rendering of a Heb term נָצָר, gālāh, or its Aram. equivalent נָצָר, gālāh, the root meaning of which appears to be "nakedness." When applied to revelation, it seems to hint at the removal of obstacles to perception of the underlying objects to perception. In the NT the word "reveal" is always used with the singular exception of Lk 2:5 where the rendering of a Gr term ἀποκαλύπτω, ἀποκάλυπτος (but in 2 Thess 1:7; 1 Pet 4:13 the corresponding noun ἀποκάλυψις, ἀποκάλυπτος), which has a very similar basic significance with our word. As this Hebrew word formed no substantive in this sense, the noun "revelation" does not occur in the Eng. OT, the idea being expressed, however, by other Heb terms variously rendered. It occurs in the Eng. NT, on the other hand, about a dozen times, and always as the rendering of the substantive corresponding to the vb. rendered "reveal" (ἀποκάλυπται). On the face of the Eng. Bible, the terms "reveal," "revelation" bear therefore uniformly the general sense of "disclose," "disclosure." The idea is found in the Bible, however, much more frequently than the terms "reveal," "revelation" in EV. Indeed, the Heb and Gr terms exclusively so rendered occur more frequently in this sense than in this rendering in the Eng. Bib. And by their side there stand various other terms which express in one way or another the general conception.

In the NT the vb. ἀποκρίνομαι, ἀποκρίνεσθαι, with the general sense of making manifest, manifesting, is the most common of these. It differs from ἀποκαλύπτω as the more general and external term from the more special and inward. Other terms also are occasionally used: ἀποκάλυπται, ἀποκάλυπτος, "manifestation" (2 Thess 2:8; 1 Tim 6:14; 2 Tim 1:10; 4:1; Tit 2:13; cf ἀπαντάω, ἀπανθάνω, Tit 2:11; 3:4); ἀποκάλυψις, ἀποκάλυψισ (Rev 1:1; 17:1; 22:16.8; cf 1 Jos 19:16; 1 Tim 4:15); ἀποκαλύβομαι, ἀποκαλύβο δότας (Ju 1:18), of which, however, one only perhaps—χρηματίζω, χρηματιζόμαι (Mt 2:12.22; Lk 2:20; Acts 10:22; He 8:5; 11:7; 12:25); χρηματίζω, χρηματιζόμαι (Rom 11:4)—calls for particular notice as in a special way, according to its usage, expressing the idea of a Divine communication.

In the OT, the common Heb vb. for "seeing" (תָּנָה, rādāh) is used in its appropriate stems, with God as the subject, for "appearing," "showing": "the Lord appeared unto..."; "the word which the Lord spoke..."

And from this vb. not only is an active substantive formed which supplied the more ancient designation of the official organ of revelation: רָדָה, rēdāh, "seer;" but also objective substantives, נֶצֶר, nēzēr, נָצָר, marēh, and נַצְר, marēh, which were used to designate the thing seen in a revelation—the "vision." By the side of these terms there were others in use, derived from a root which supplies to the Aram. its common word for "seeing," but in Heb has a somewhat more pregnant meaning, נָצָר, hāzāh. Its active derivative, נָצֵר, nēzēr, had become practically obsolete; and its passive derivatives hāzōn, hāzzōn, hāzōn, hāzēth, hāzōn, which provided the ordinary word for the substance of the revelation or "vision." The distinction between the two sets of terms, derived respectively from רָדָה and hāzōn, while not to be unduly pressed, seems to lie in the direction that the former suggests external manifestations and the latter internal revelations. The רָדָה is to whom Divine manifestations, the hāzōn he to whom Divine communications, have been vouchsafed; the marēh is an appearance, the hāzōn and its companions a vision. It may be of interest to observe that marēh is the term employed in Nu 12:6, while it is hāzōn which commonly occurs in the headings of the written prophecies to indicate their revelatory character. From this it may possibly be inferred that the former, informing it is the mode, in the latter the contents of the revelation that is emphasized. Perhaps a like distinction may be traced between the hāzōn of Dnl 8:15 and the marēh of the next verse. The ordinary vb. for "knowing," יֶדֶח, yēḏeh, expressing in its causative sense the idea of making known, informing, is also very naturally employed, with God as its subject, in the sense of revealing, and that, in accordance with the natural sense of the word, with a tendency to pregnancy of implication, of revealing effectively, if not merely uncovering to observation, but making to know. Accordingly, it is paralleled not merely with נָצָר, gālāh (Ps 98:2: "The Lord hath made known his salvation; his righteousness hath he displayed in the sight of the nation"), but also with such terms as נֶצֶר, lānāh (Ps 26:4: "Make known to me thy ways, O Lord: teach me thy paths"). This vb. yēḏeh forms no substantive in the sense of "revelation" (cf נֶצֶר, do'lah, Nu 24:16; Ps 19:3).

The most common vehicles of the idea of "revelation" in the OT are, however, two expressions which are yet to be mentioned. These are the phrase, "word of Jeh," and the term commonly rendered in the EV by "law." The former (dēḇār Yhwh, varied to dēḇār Yhwh, masāl Yhwh) occurs scores of times and is at once the simplest and the most colorless designation of a Divine communication. By the latter (torāh), the proper meaning of which is "instruction," a strong implication of authoritativeness is conveyed; and, in this sense, it becomes what may be called the technical designation of a specifically Divine communication. The two are not infrequently brought together, as in Isa 1:10: "Hear the word of Jeh, ye rulers of Sodom; give ear unto the law [in "teaching"] of our God, ye people of Gomorrah;" or Isa 2:3; Mic 4:2: "For out of Zion shall go forth the law, and from Yhwh his word." Both terms are used for any Divine communication of whatever extent; and both came to be employed to express the entire body of Divine revelation, conceived as a unitary whole. In this comprehensive usage, however, both terms, as already said, came to fall more on the graciousness, and of the other more on the authoritativeness of this body of Divine revelation; and both passed into the NT with these implications. The "word of God," or simply "the word," comes thus to mean in the NT, just the gospel, "the word of the proclamation of redemption, that is, all that which God has to say to man, and causes to be said" looking to his salvation. It expresses, in a word, precisely what we technically speak of as God's redemptive revelation. "The law," on the other hand, means in this NT use, just the whole body of the authoritative instruction which God has given men. It expresses, in other words, what we commonly speak of as God's supernatural revelation. The two things, of course, are the same: God's authoritative revelation is His gracious revelation; God's redemptive revelation is His supernatural revelation. The two terms merely look at the one aggregate of revelation from two aspects, and each emphasizes its own aspect of this one aggregate revelation.

Now, this aggregated revelation lay before the men of the NT in a written form, and it was impossible to speak freely of it without consciousness of and at least occasional reference to its written form. Accordingly we hear of a Word of God that is written (Jn 15:25; 1 Cor 15:54), and the Divine Word is naturally contrasted with mere tradition, and its written body of its very idea (Mc 7:10); indeed, the written Scriptures’ body of revelation—with an emphasis on its written form—is designated expressly ‘the prophetic word’ (2 Pet 1:19). More distinctly still, the Law comes to be thought of as written, not exactly, code, but body of Divine authoritative instructions. The phrase, “It is written in your law” (Jn 10:34; 15:25; Rom 3:19; 1 Cor 14:21), acquires the precise sense of, ‘...the Law, faith, the Gospel, the Scripture, the content of which is “law,” that is, Divine instruction.’ Thus “the Word of God,” “the Law,” came to mean just the written body of revelation, what we call, and what the NT writers called, in the same hagiographic sense which we give the term, “the Scriptures.” These “Scriptures” are thus identified with the revelation of God, conceived as a well-defined corpus, and two conceptions rise before us which have had a determining part to play in the history of Christianity—the conception of an authoritative Canon of Scripture, and the conception of this Canon of Scripture as just the Word of God written. The former conception was thrown into prominence in opposition to the gnostic heresies in the earliest age of the church, and gave rise to a new variety of apocalyptic speech concerning the Scriptures, emphasizing their authority in legal language, which goes back to and rests on the Bib. usage of “law.” The latter it was left to the Reformation to do justice to in its struggle against, on the one side, the Roman depression of the Scriptures in favor of the traditions of the church, and on the other side the Enthusiasts’ supercession of them in the interests of the “inner Word.” When Tertullian, in the one hand, speaks of the Scriptures as an “Instrument,” a legal document, his terminology has an express warrant in the Scriptures’ own usage of tórho, “law,” to designate their entire content. And when John Gerhard argues that “between the Word of God and Sacred Scripture, taken in a material sense, there is no real difference,” he is only declaring plainly what is definitely implied in the NT use of “the Word of God” with the written revelation in mind. What is important to recognize is that the Scriptures themselves represent not merely containing the Word, and there the record of revelations—“words of God,” tórho—given by God, but as themselves, in all their extent, a revelation, an authoritative body of gracious instructions from God; or, since they alone, of all the other books God may have written, are “True Word of God” accessible to men, all their parts “law,” that is, authoritative instruction from God.

REVELATION OF JOHN

I. TITLE AND GENERAL CHARACTER OF BOOK

1. The title.

The oldest form of the title would seem to be simply, “Apocalypse of John,” appended with the “Divine” (θεόλογος, theológos, i.e. “theological”) not being older than the 4th. cent. (of the title given to Gregory of Nazianzus, “Gregory the theologian”). The book belongs to the class of works commonly named “apocalyptic,” as containing visions and revelations of the future, frequently in symbolical form (e.g. the Book of Enoch, the Apocalypse of Bar, the Apocalypse of Ezra; see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE), but it is doubtful if the word here bears this technical sense. The frequency at which this title is given to the NT Apocalypse with these others, and attributed to it the same kind of origin as theirs, viz. in the unbridled play of religious phantasy, clothing itself in unreal visual form.

But there is a wide distinction. These other works are pious, extravagant; on the face of them products of imagination; 2. Uniqueness and Reality of Visions.

The Apocalypse bears on Visions the name of its author—an apostle of Jesus Christ (see below); claims to rest on real visions; rings with the accent of sincerity; is orderly, serious, sublime, purposeful, in its conceptions; deals with the most solemn and momentous of themes. On the modern New-theory, to which most recent expositors give adherences, it is a farrago of baseless phantasies, no one of which came true. On its own claim it is a product of true prophecy (1 3; 20 181), and has or will have sure fulfillment. Parallels here and there are found between the Book of Enoch or the Apocalypse of Ezr. As a rule the resemblances arise from the fact that these works draw from the same store of the ideas and imagery of the OT. It is there the key is chiefly to be sought to the symbolism of John. The Apocalypse is steeped in the thoughts, the images, even the language of the OT (of the illustrations in Lightfoot, Gal, 361, where it is remarked: "The whole book is saturated with illustrations from the OT. It speaks not the language of Paul, but of Isaiah and Ezekiel and Daniel." These remarks will receive elucidation in what follows.

II. Canonicity and Authority.—The two questions of canonicity and authorship are closely connected. Eusebian states that opinion in his day was divided on the book, and among the disputed books or ranking it among the disputed books or ranking it with the acknowledged (homologotìnma). "Among these," he says, "if such a view seem correct, we must place the Apocalypse of John" (HE, III, 25). That it was right to place it so is proved by a survey of the evidence. The first to refer to the book expressly is Justin Martyr (c 140 AD), who speaks of it as the work of "a certain man, whose name was John, one of the apostles of Christ" (Dial. 81). Irenaeus (c 180 AD) repeatedly and decisively declares that the Apocalypse was written by John, a disciple of the Lord (Adv. Haer., iv.20, 11; 30, 4; v.26, 1; 35, 2, etc), and comments on the number 666 (v.30, 1). In his case there can be no doubt that the book of John is meant. Andreas of Cappadocia (5th cent., c 410) in the "Chronicles" states that Papias (c 130 AD) bore witness to its credibility, and cites a comment by him on Rev 12 7–9. The book is quoted in the Ec. on the martyrs of Vienne and Lyons (174 AD); had commentary written on it by Melito of Sardis (c 170 AD), one of the churches of the Apocalypse (Euseb., HE, IV, 26); was used by Theophilus of Antioch (c 185 AD) and by Apollonius (c 210 AD); HE, V, 25) from these cases being cited as the Apocalypse of John. It is included in John's in the Canon of Muratori (c 200 AD). The Johannine authorship (apostolic) is abundantly attested by Tertullian (c 200 AD; Adv. Mar., iii.14, 24, etc); by Hippolytus (c 240 AD), who wrote a work upon it; by Clement of Alexandria (c 200 AD); by Origen (c 230 AD), and other writers. Doubt about the authorship of the book is first heard of in the obser- saec of the Alogi (end of 2d cent.), who, with Caius, a Rom presbyter (c 205 AD), attributed it to Cerinthus. More serious is the criticism of Dionysius of Alexandria (c 250 AD) who, on internal grounds, held that the Fourth Gospel and the Apocalypse could not have come from the same pen (Euseb., HE, VII, 25). He granted, however, that it was the work of one of John's contemporaries and followers. The result was that, while "in the Western church," as Bousset grants, "the Apocalypse was accepted unanimously from the first" (EB, I, 193), a certain doubt attached to it for a time in sections of the Gr and Syrian churches. It is not found in the Pesh. and a citation from it in Ephraim the Syrian († 373) seems not to be genuine. Cyril of Jerusalem (c 386 AD) omits it from his list, and it is unmentioned by the Antiochian writers (Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret). The Canon attributed to the Council of Laodicea (c 360 AD) does not name it, but it is doubtful whether this document is not of later date (cf Westcott; also Bousset, Die Offenb. Joh., 28). On the other hand, the book is acknowledged by Methodius, Pamphilus, Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril Alex., Epiphanius, etc.

The testimony to the canonicity, and also to the Johannine authorship, of the Apocalypse is thus exceptionally strong. In an age when the Syntorion was the climax of the books of the canon, there is no doubt of the book's position, not indeed, as an apostle, yet, in his inspired character, position of authority in the Asian churches, and selection as the medium of these revelations, can hardly be thought of as other than the well-known John of the Gospels and of consentent church tradition. The alternative view, first suggested as a possibility by Eusebius, has, however, largely been abandoned. The reason is that the John intended is the "presbyter John" of a well-known passage cited by Eusebius from Papias (HE, III, 39). Without entering into the intricate questions connected with this "presbyter John"—whether he was really a distinct person from the apostle (Zahn and others dispute it), or whether, if he was, he resided at Ephesus (see John, Gospel of)—it is enough here to say that the reason already given, viz: the importance and place of authorship of the Apocalypse in the Asian churches, and the emphatic testimony above cited connecting him with the apostle, forbid the attribution of the book to a writer wholly unknown to church tradition, save for this casual reference to him in Papias. Had the assumed presbyter really been the author, he could not have dropped so completely out of the knowledge of the church, and had his place taken all but immediately by the apostle.

One cause of the hesitancy regarding the Apocalypse in early circles was dislike of its millennial- and apocalyptic character. This was recently emphasized with much critical skill by Dionysius the Areopagite (c 500 cent.). He held that the Apocalypse of John is "of a later period", and is a work filled with "unnecessary details and exaggerated amplification, and a curious mingling of the spiritual with the mythical, and a poetical confusion of ideas, which may have been added by the author to make his statements more effective, or in order to make them more pleasing to the multitude."

3. Objections to Johannine Authorship.—It was the undoubted custom in church circles to accept a work as the Johannine authorship of a work, and to attribute it to the Fourth Gospel, likewise claiming to be from the pen of John. Two Gospel works so diverse in character—the Gospel of the Johannine authorship, and the Apocalypse, abrupt, mysterious, material in its imagery, inexact and barbarous in its idioms, sometimes employing solemnicisms—could not, it was argued, proceed from the same author. Not much, beyond amplification of detail, has been added to the force of the arguments of Dionysius. There were three possibilities—either first, admitting the Johannine authorship of the Apocalypse, to assail the genuineness of the Gospel; this was the method of the School of Bolland (c 1700); secondly, to seek a different author for the Apocalypse—John the presbyter, or another: thus not a few reverent scholars (Bleek, Neander, etc); or, third, with most moderns, to deny the Johannine authorship of both. The solution most often reached is to say that the "presbyter" as the author of the latter (Harnack, Bouset, Moffatt, etc). Singularly there has been of late in the advanced school itself a movement in the direction of recognizing that this difficulty of style is less formidable than it looks—that, in fact, beneath the surface difference, there is a strong body of resemblances pointing to a close relationship of Gospel and Apocalypse. This had long been argued by the older writers (Gossett, Luthardt, Alford, Salmon, etc), but the more freer and more openly acknowledged. As instances among many may be noted the use of the term Logos (19 13), the image of the Lamb, "water of life," words and phrases as "true," "he that over- cometh," "keep the commandments," etc. A striking coincidence is the form of quotation of Zec 12 10 in Jn 19 37, and Rev 1 7. If the Gr in parts shows a certain abruptness and roughness, it is plainly evidenced by the use of the correct construction in the full accord with want of knowledge of the language. "The very rules which he breaks in one place he observes in others" (Salmon). There are, besides, subtle affinities in the Gr usage of the two books, and some of the very irregularities complained of are found in the Gospel (for ample details consult Bousset, op.
2.584 unified the other declared 1-8, to the discuss means, seems, of Domitian, in which case the Gospel will be the earlier, and the Apocalypse the later work. This, likewise, seems to yield the better explanation. The tremendous experiences of Patmos, bursting through all ordinary and calmer states of consciousness, must have produced startling changes in thought and style of composition. The "rapt seer" will not speak and write like the self-collected, calmly brooding evangelist.

III. Date and Unity of the Book.—Eusebius, in summing up the tradition of the Church on this subject, assigns John's exile to Patmos, and consequently the composition of the Apocalypse, to the latter part of the reign of Domitian (Josephus, Ant. xvi. 6:5). Domitian Irenaeus (c. 180 AD) says of the book, "For it was seen, not a long time ago, but almost in our own generation, at the end of the reign of Domitian." (Adv. Haer., v. 30, 5). This tradition is confirmed by Clement of Alexandria (who speaks of "the tyrant"), Origen, and later writers. Epiphanius (4th cent.), indeed, puts (Haer., ii.12, 233) the exile to Patmos in the reign of Claudius (41-54 AD); but as, in the same sentence, he speaks of the apostle as 90 years of age, it is plain there is a strange blunder in the name of the emperor. The former date answers to the conditions of the book (deedance of the churches; widespread and severe persecution), and to the prediction of Domitian for this mode of banishment (of Tacitus Hist. i.2; Euseb., HE, III, 18).

This, accordingly, may be regarded as the traditional date of composition of the Apocalypse, though good writers, influenced partly by a desire to give a date for the later part of the Apocalypse, have signified a preference for an earlier date (e.g. Westcott, Salmon). It is by no means to be assumed, however, that the Apocalypse is the earlier part of the Gospel; the same criticism, if anything, will be seen immediately, is to revert to the traditional date (Bouset, etc); but for a decade or two, through the prevalence of what may be called the "Nero-theory" of the book, the pendulum swung strongly in favor of its composition shortly after the death of Nero, and before the destruction of Jerusalem (held to be shown to be still standing by ch 11), i.e. about 68-69 AD. This date was even held to be demonstrated beyond all question. Reuss may be taken as an example. According to him (Christian Theology of the Apostolic Age, I, 369 ff, ET), apart from the ridiculous preconceptions of theologians, the Apocalypse is "the most simple, most transparent book that prophet ever penned." There is no other apostolic writing, he says, which can be more exactly fixed. "It was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, under the emperor Galba—that is to say, in the second half of the year 68 of our era." He proceeds to demonstrate "the incontestable proof of this. The proof, in brief, is found in the beast (not introduced till ch 13) with seven heads, one of which has been mortally wounded, but is for the present healed (13 3). "This is the Rom empire, with its first 7 emperors, one of whom is killed, but is to live again as Antichrist" (cf 17 10 f). The key to the whole book is said to be given in 13 18, where the number of the beast is declared to be 666. Applying the method of numerical values (the Jewish Gematria), this number is found to correspond with the name of Nero (omitted in Heb letters). The number of Nero then is the 5th head that is to live again; an interpretation confirmed by rumors prevalent at that time that Nero was not really dead, but only hidden, and was soon to return to claim his throne. As it to make assurance doubly sure, it is found that by dropping the final n in "Neron the number becomes 616—a number which Irenaeus in his comments on the subject (v.30.1) tells us was actually found in some ancient copies. The meaning therefore is thought to be clear. Writing under the emperor Galba, the 6th emperor (reckoning from Augustus), the author anticipates, after a short reign of a 7th emperor (17 10), the return of the Antichrist Nero—an 8th, but of the 7, with whom is to come the end. Jesus is to be miraculously preserved (ch 11), but Rome is to perish. This is to happen within the space of 3 years. "The final catastrophe, which was to destroy the city and empire, was to take place in three years and a half. . . The writer knows . . . that Rome will . . . in three years . . . perish, will come to an end again." It does not matter for this theory that not one of the things predicted happened—that every anticipation was falsified. Nero did not return; Jesus was not saved; Rome did not perish; 33 years did not see the end of all things. Yet the Christian church, though the failure of every one of these predictions had been decisively demonstrated, received the book as of Divine inspiration, apparently without the least idea that such things had not been intended (see the form of this theory in Renan, with a keen criticism in Salmon's Intro to the NT, lect xiv).

What is to be said with reference to this "Nero-theory" belongs to subsequent sections: mean while it is to be observed that, while portions of the theory are retained, significant changes have since taken place in the view entertained of the book as a whole, and with this of the Jewish Theory of the "Nero-number." Lahmeyer (1882) and others, have carried the line of criticism a long distance, and have, for the most part, been led to the conclusion that the "Nero-number" was a mere invention of the compiler of the book. Thus, the realization of which the "Nero-number" had been supposed to be a prophecy. It may be added, however, that, while the "Nero-number" is no longer accepted as a prophecy, it is still held by many weights, though in a different sense from that of the "Nero-number". The "Nero-number" is now held to be a symbol of the Antichrist, and is therefore said to be "impossible". But it is not impossible to think that the number of the beast may be symbolical, though it is impossible to think that the number of the beast may be symbolical. The number of the beast may be symbolical, though it is impossible to think that the number of the beast may be symbolical.
this, in turn, reminiscent of Bab mythology). These supposed Jewish sections are, however, without real support in anything that is known, and the symbolism admits as easily of a Christian interpretation as any other part of the book. We are left, therefore, as before, with the book as a unity, and the tide of opinion flows back to the age of Domitian as the time of its origin. Moffatt (connecting it mistakenly, as it seems to us, with Domitian’s emphasis on the imperial cultus, but giving also other reasons) goes so far as to say that “any earlier date for the book is hardly possible” (Expos Gr Test., V, 317). The list of authorities for the Domitianic date may be seen in Moffatt, Intro, 508.

IV. Field and Analysis of the Book. The method of the book may thus be indicated. After an introduction, and letters to the 1. General seven churches (chs 1-3), the properly prophetic part of the book commences with a vision of heaven (chs 4, 5), following upon which are two series of visions of the future, parallel, it would appear, to each other—the first, the 7 seals, and under the 7th seal, the 7 trumpets (chs 6-11, with interludes in ch 7 and again in 10; 11: 1-12); the second, the woman and her child (chs 12, 13), and, after, the 4 new interludes (ch 14), the bowls and 7 last plagues (chs 15, 16). The expansion of the last judgments is given in separate pictures (the scarlet woman, doom of Babylon, Har-Magedon, chs 17-19); then come the closing scenes of the millennium, the last apostasy, resurrection and judgment (ch 20), followed by the new heavens and new earth, with the descending new Jesus (chs 21, 22). The theme of the book is the conflict of Christ and His church with secular Roman power, the devil, the beast, the false prophet, 16:13), and the ultimate and decisive defeat of the latter; its keynote is in the words, “Come, Lord Jesus” (22: 20; cf 1:7), but it is to be noticed, as characteristic of the book, that while this “coming” is represented as, in a manner, ever near, the end, as the crisis approaches, is again always postponed by a fresh development of events. Thus, under the 6th seal, the end seems reached (6:12-17), but a pause ensues (ch 7), and on the seventh seal a new series begins with the trumpets (8: 2 ff). Similarly, at the sounding of the 6th trumpet, the end seems at hand (9:12-21), but a new pause is introduced before the last sounding takes place (11:15 ff). Then is announced the final victory at last, and its summary.

A new series of visions begins, opening into large perspectives, till, after fresh interludes, and the pouring out of 6 of the bowls of judgment, Har-Magedon itself is reached; but though, at the outpouring of the 7th bowl, it is proclaimed, “It is done” (16:17), the end is again held over till these final judgments are shown in detail. At length, surely, in ch 19, with the appearance of the white horseman—“The Word of God” (ver 13)—and the decisive overthrow of all his adversaries (vs 18-21), the age of its seventh seal is found; but just then, to our surprise, intervenes the announcement of the binding of Satan for 1,000 years, and the reign of Jesus and His saints upon the earth (the interpretation is not here discussed), followed by a fresh apostasy, and the general resurrection and judgment (ch 20). Precise time-measures evidently fail in dealing with a book so constructed; the 3 1/2 years of the Nero-interpreters sink into insignificance in its crowded panorama of events. The symbolic numbers more chiefly indicate: “seven,” the number of completeness (7 spirits, seals, trumpets, bowls, heads of beasts); “ten,” the number of worldly power (10 horns); “four,” the earthly number (4 living creatures, corner of earth, winds, etc); 3 1/2 years—time, and times, and half a time” (12:14) =1,290 days, the period, borrowed from Dnl (7: 25; 12:7), of anti-Christian ascendency.

The following is a more detailed analysis:

I. Introduction 1. Title and Address (1: 1-8)

II. The Things to Come. First Series of Visions: The Seals and Trumpets 1. The seal of heaven (1-6)

(a) Adoration of the Creator (ch 4)

(b) The 7-sealed Book: Adoration of God and the Lamb (ch 5)

2. Opening of Six Seals (ch 6)

(a) A white Horse (vs 1-2)

(b) The Red Horse (vs 3-4)

(c) The Black Horse (vs 5-6)

(d) The Pale Horse (vs 7-8)

(e) Seals under the altar (vs 9-11)

(f) The Wrath of the Lamb (ch 15:1-17)

3. Interludes (chs 7-10)

(a) The 4 horsemen: 2,000 on earth vs 1-8)

(b) Triumphant Multitude in Heaven (vs 9-17)

4. Opening of Seventh Seal: Under This Seven Trumpets, of Which Six Are Sounded (chs 8, 9)

(a) Hail and Fire on Earth (8: 7)

(b) Burning Mountain in Sea (vs 9, 9)

(c) Burning Star on Rivers and Fountains (vs 10: 11)

(d) One-third Sun, Moon, and Stars Darkened (9: 12)

(e) Woe to Trumpets (ver 13)

(f) The Fallen Star-locusts (9: 13)

(g) Angels Loosed from Euphrates—the Horsemen (9: 14-15)

5. Interludes—

(a) First with Little Book (ch 10)

(b) Measuring of Temple and Altar—the Two Witnesses (11: 1-13)

6. Seventh Trumpet Sounded—Final Victory (vs 14-19)

III. Second Series of Visions: The Woman and the Red Dragon: The Two Beasts; The Bowls and Last Plagues

1. The Woman and Child: the Red Dragon and His Persecutions (ch 12)

2. The Beast from the Sea, Seven-headed, Ten-horned (13: 1-10); the Two-horned Beast (vs 11-18)

3. Interludes (ch 14)

(a) The Lamb on Mt. Zion: the 144,000 (vs 1-5)

(b) The Angel with “an Eternal Gospel” (vs 6: 7)

(c) Second Angel—(Anticipatory) Proclamation of Fall of Babylon (ver 8)

(d) The Angel—Proclamation of worshippers of the Beast (vs 9-12)

(e) Blessness of the Dead in the Lord (ver 13)

(f) The Son of Man and the Great Vantage (vs 14-20)

4. The Seven Last Plagues—the Angels and Their Bowls: the Preparation in Heaven (ch 15)—the Outpouring (ch 16)

(a) On Earth (16: 2)

(b) On Sea (vs 3)

(c) On Rivers and Fountains (vs 4-7)

(d) On Sun (vs 8, 9)

(e) On Seat of Beast (vs 10, 11)

(f) On Euphrates, Har-Magedon (vs 12-16)

(g) In the Air—Victory and Fall of Babylon (vs 17-21)

IV. Expansion of Last Judgments (chs 17-19)

1. The Scarlet Woman on Beast—Her Judgment (ch 17)

2. Doom of Babylon and Lament over Her (ch 18)

3. Interlude—Announcement of Marriage of the Lamb (ch 19: 1-10)

4. Rider on White Horse (“The Word of God”—the Son of God and the armies—Lamb and Drest of Beast, False Prophet, and Their Followers (vs 11-21)

V. The Millennium—New Heavens and New Earth (chs 20-22)

1. Saint’s End: First Resurrection and Reign of Saints for 1,000 Years (20: 1-6)

2. Loosing of Satan and Final Conflict—Doom of Advocates and of the Devil (vs 7-10)

3. General Resurrection and Last Judgment (vs 11-15)
4. New Heavens and New Earth
(1) The New Jerus from Heaven (21 1–9)
(2) The New Jerusalem (xx 10–21)
(3) The Blessedness of Its Citizens (22 1–7)
(4) Epilogue (vs 22–21)

V. Principles of Interpretation.—As a book intended for the consolation of the church under future afflictions, the Apocalyptic is meant by its author to be understood (1 3; 22 7). He must have been aware, however, that, while its general scope might be apprehended, many of its symbols, till the time of their actual fulfilment. The book relates to “things which must shortly come to pass” (1 1)—in their beginnings at least—and the divers interpretations since put upon its prophecies are the best evidence of the difficulties attaching to them. Schemes of interpretation have generally been grouped into preterist (the prophecies being regarded as already fulfilled), futurist (the fulfilment being thrown wholly into the future), and the historical (the fulfilment being looked for in the continuous history of the church from the death of the author). (1) The older preterist view may be taken as represented by Moses Stuart, who finds the fulfilment of chs 6–11 in the destruction of Jerus (Comm., 520 ff.), and of chs 13–19 in the reign of Nero (690 ff.). Even he, however, has to interpret the chapter on the last things of the future. (2) The futurist view connects the whole with the times of the second advent and the millennium. The beast is an individual who shall then appear as Antichrist. This rejects the plain intimations of the book that the events predicted lay, in their beginnings, at least, immediately in the future of the writer. (3) The historical view connects the various symbols with definite occurrences—as the invasions which overthrew the Rom Empire (the first 4 trumpets), the Saracens (first woe-trumpet), the Turks (second woe-trumpet), the papacy (the beast, ch 13; the scarlet woman, ch 17), etc. A day-year principle is applied to the periods (1,260 days—1,260 years). As representatives of this view may be mentioned Mede, Vitringa, Sir Isaac Newton, and the Rev. Horae Apocalypsicæ, A. Barnes. These older schemes are largely horizon, already alluded to, in which the Apocalyptic is explained out of contemporary conditions, the legend of the returning Nero, Jewish apocalyptic, Amg, and Bible symbolists. Of these the older theories, however, differ from the older in that in them all real prophecy is denied. A mainstay of such theories is the declaration of the book that the events announced are close at hand (1 1–3; 22 20). When, however, it is remembered that, on any view, this nearness includes a period of 1,000 years before the judgment and descent of the new Jerus, it will be felt that it will not do to give these expressions too restricted a temporal significance. The coming horizon is wider. The coming of Christ is ever near—ever approaching—but it is not to be tied down to “times and seasons”; it is more of the nature of a process and has anticipatory exemplifications in many crises and providential events forecasting the end. The “coming,” e.g., to the church at Ephesus (2 5), or to the church at Pergamos (2 16)—contingent events—can hardly exhaust the full meaning of the Parousia. The Nero-theory demands a date nearest under Gal, at 68, but that date we have seen to be generally abandoned. Those who place it under Vespasian (omitting three short reigns) sacrifice the advantage of dating the book before the destruction of Jerus, and have to fall back on a supposititious Jewish fragment in ch 11, which those who incorporated it must have known had never been fulfilled. The attempt to give a “contemporary historical” interpretation to the symbols of the successive churches, as Gunkel has neatly shown, completely breaks down in practice, while Gunkel’s own attempt at a Bab explanation will be judged by most to be overstrained. “The new Jerus” in the OT and elsewhere may be associated with widespread oriental ideas, but the definite symbolism of the Apocalyptic in ch 12 has no provable connection with Bab myths. There is the widest disagreement of the theories (from Jewish apocalyptic). What seems simple and demonstrable to one has no plausibility to others. A form of “Nero Caesar,” indeed, yields the mystic 666, but so do 1,000 other names—almost any name, with proper manipulation (cf. Salmon, lect xiv). Lastly, the returning-Nero legend yields no satisfactory explanation of the language in 13 3,12,14; 17 11. The theory is that these words allude to the belief that Nero would return from the dead and become Antichrist (see above). Tacitus attests that there were vague rumors that Nero had not really died (Hist. ii.8), and later a pretender arose in Parthia taking advantage of this feeling (Suet. Nero. 57). The idea of Nero returning from the dead is categorically denied in Sib Or 4 119–22 (c 80 AD). Augustine mentions the idea (City of God, xx.19, 3), but without connection with the Apocalyptic. By Domitian’s time, however, it was perfectly certain that Nero had not returned and there was no longer, on this interpretation, any appositeness in speaking of a “head” the “deathstroke” of which was healed (13 3), which became the “eighth head” of 17 11—it, indeed, the apostle could be conceived of as being instructed by such a return. The prophecy of the future of the past. The key to the book lies at the basis of the historical interpretation, viz. that there are reconstructed the great crises in the age-long conflict of Christ and His church with pagan and anti-Christian adversaries. Events and tendencies may be grouped, or under different forms may relate to the same subject (e.g. the 144,000 sealed on earth—a spiritual Israel—in 7 1–8, and the triumphant multitude in heaven, vs 9–17); successions of events may be foreshortened; different pictures may overlap; but, shining through the symbols, great truths and facts which have historical realization appear. There is no need for supposing that, in a drama of this range, the “heads” of the beast of chs 13 and 17 (behind whom is the Dragon-enemy, Satan, of ch 12) stand, in contrapuntal to the analogy of Dan, for seven individual emperors, and that the “image of the beast,” which has life given to its and “speaks” (13 4,15), is the statue of the emperor; or that such tremendous events as the fall of the Rom Empire, or the rise of the papacy—both which have been combined, ecclesiastical anti-Christianism—or the false prophecy of later intellectual anti-Christianism have no place in the symbolism of the book. Sane, reverent thought will suggest many lines of correspondence with the course of God's providence, which may serve to illuminate its dark places. More than this need not be said here.

VI. Theology of the Book.—On this it is hardly necessary to dwell, for expositors are now well aware that one of the great duties of God, Christ, man, sin, redemption, the teaching of the Apocalypse does not vary essentially from the great types in the Epp. The assonances with John's mode of thinking have already been alluded to. It is granted by all writers that the Christology is as high as such an unfolding permits. This it is thought necessary to be acknowledged," says Reuss, "that Christ is placed in the Apocalypse on a par with God" (op. cit., I, 397-98; cf Rev 1 4-17; 2 3; 5 2-14; 22 13, etc.). Not less striking are the correspondences with the teaching of Paul, Peter on redemption through the blood of Christ (1 5; 5 9; 7 14; 14 4, etc.). The perverted conception of the school of Baur that we have in the book an anti-Pauline manifesto (thus also Pieper, cf. Hibbert Lectures, 178), is now practically dead (see the criticism of it by Reuss, op. cit., I, 308-12). The point in which its eschatology differs from that of the rest of the NT is in its introduction of the millennium before the final resurrection and judgment. This, however, is not necessarily contrary, the earlier stage of thought.

REVELLINGS, rev'el-ingz (kōma; ἱππομακαρία). The word is found both in AV and in RV in Wis 14 23 (RV "revels," orgiastic heathen worship is in point); 2 Mac 6 4; Gal 5 21; 1 Pet 4 3. In Gal 5 21 it is clasped with fornication, uncleanness, licentiousness as one of the works of the flesh. In 1 Pet 4 3 it is spoken of the Gentiles and is classed with drunkenness and carousings and such like. In Rom 13 11 RV has "revelling" instead of AV "riotings," and in 2 Pet 2 13, "revel" replaces "riot." Am 6 7, "revelling" replaced "banquet." The obvious meaning of the word is excessive and boisterous intemperance and lustful indulgence. G. H. GEBRERDING

REVENGE, re-vēn'ej, REVENGER, re-vēn'jar. The same Heb and Gr words are used to express the idea of "to avenge" and "to revenge" (צל, נאף, or derivative; ἀρρήτως, ἀναζημότως, or derivative). In Eng. these words are synonymous in that they are both used to express the infliction of punishment upon the wrongdoer. But "to avenge" means also simply a spiteful, wrongful or malignant spirit. In the latter case RV preserves "revenge" (cf Jer 20 10; Ezek 25 15; 26 17 an anthropomorphism), but, wherever it is synonymous with "avenge," this word is used (cf Nu 31 23; Ps 79 10; Nah 1 2; Jer 12 20; Rom 3 4; 2 Cor 7 11; 10 6 RV; AV has "revenge" in all these cases). In Dt 32 42, AV "revenge" is a wrong tr. Read with RV "from the head of the leaders of the enemy" or RVm the "haired head of the enemy." Cf Avenge, Avenger; Blood; Goel. A. L. BREIICH

REVENUE, rev'n-ya: (1) צלאה, ἀπρόθομον, "revenue or income" (Ezk 4 13 AV); (2) צלאה, ἀνατρέφον, "increase," "revenue" (Prov 8 19; 15 6 Isa 23 3; Jer 12 13); προμοδος, προμόδος, "income" (2 Mac 3 3; 4 8 [RV "fund"]; 9 16).

REVERENCE, rev'er-ens: In the OT, "reverence" occurs as the tr of two Heb words, יָדֶר and שדְּחָד. The root idea of the former is "to hold fast," it is used to express the attitude toward God Himself, as in Ps 89 7 AV; or toward His sanctuary, as in Lev 19 30; 26 2. So the group of ideas there would be "fear," "awe," "reverence." The root idea of the second is "falling down," as prostration of the body. It is used of the act of the man who is considered superior, as in 2 Sam 6 6 AV; 1 K 1 31 AV; Est 3 2.5. The group of ideas here, therefore, is "honor," "obeisance," "reverence."

In the NT "reverence" occurs as the tr of three Gr words, ἀλήθος, φθοβόμαι, and εντροπέω. In the first, the idea is "modesty" (He 12 28; cf 1 Tim 2 9). In the second, "fear" (Eph 5 23 AV), though here it is used to set forth the attitude of proper subjection on the part of a wife toward her husband (cf 1 Pet 3 2). In the third, the idea is that of "self-valuation of inferiority," and so set forth an attitude toward another of doing him honor (Mt 21 37; Mk 12 13; Hl 12 9; 23 8). In the Apoc εντροπέω occurs in Ws 2 10; Sir 4 22. In addition, προσκυνέω, "make obeisance," occurs in Jth 10 23; 14 7; thumadzō, "wonder," Sir 7 29, and ἄφθονον, "be ashamed," (Hb 14 15).

Reverend occurs in the OT in Ps 111 9, of the name of God (יָדֶר), and in the Apoc in 2 Mac 15 12, "a man revered [αιδηνόν, "mostest"] in bearing," and in the NT RV has "reverent in demeanor" (ηθοπροσόπου) in Tit 2 3 and "revered" in Phil 4 8 (σεμνός). E. J. FORRESTER REVIVE, ré-vīv, REVIVING, ré-vīving: "To revive" is the tr of בֹּקֵד, בֹּקְדָה, "to live," "cause to live," "to use of restored to life (Gen 45 27; Jgs 16 19, etc.); of rebuilding (Neh 4 2); of restoration to well-being (Ps 85 6 AV ["quicken"]; 138 7; Is 57 15; Hos 5 2; 14 7); of Jeh's gracious work for His people (Hab 3 2, "revive thy work in the midst of the years"); "reviving" is the tr of מָחַר, מַחְּרָה, "preservation," or "means of life" (Ezr 9 8). "Revive" occurs in the NT as the tr of διασώσεως, διασώςας, "to live again" (Rom 7 9, and 14 9, AV "to live both died and rose, and revived"); RV ["resurrection of [and rose"] "Christ died and lived again," σῶς].

REVEL, ré-vel. See Crimes; Punishments.

In 1 Mac 13 7 RV we have "And the spirit of the people revived," διασώσεως, διασώσας, "to stir or kindle up as a fire," the same word as in 1 Tim 1 6, RV "stir up the gift of God, which is in thee," AV "to stir into flame." "

In view of the frequent modern use of "revive" and "revival," it is worthy of notice that it is to Timothy himself the exhortation is addressed. We too often merely pray for "revivals," forgetting that it is for us to "stir into flame" the gift of the spirit which we have already received of God. It is ours from Him, but we let it lie dormant, as a slumbering ember merely.

REWARD, ré-wārd: In modern Eng. (except when influenced by the Bib, forms) a "reward" is something given in recognition of a good act. In EV, however, "reward" is used quite generally for anything given, and the term covers the recompense of evil (Ps 14 5, AV "wages of" 1 K 21 15 AV); of good works (Mic 7 3), and gifts (Jer 40 5 AV). RV has specialized the meaning in a number of cases (Ps 94 2; Ezek 16 34; Jer 40 5, etc.), but not systematically.
REZEH, rá'zéh (227), receph; B, Páños, Rhápllés, 'Páños, Rháplhes, A, Tébálh, tin Rháphoth
(2 K 19:12); By, Rézé'h. 1. Forms of A, Páños (1 Sa 37:12; Vulg, Rezeph the name [2 K 19:12]. Rezeph [1 Sa 37:12]): One of the places referred to by Sennacherib's Rabbashkeh when delivering that king's message to Hezekiah demanding the surrender of Jerusalem. The names which precede are Gozan and Haran; and "the children of Eden that were in Telinassar" follows. It is now represented by רֶפֶךְ, E, of Tipshah and N.E. of Hamath, and is regarded as the תֹּפְסָא (תֹּפְסָא) of Toloemy (v.15).
2. Now
It was for some time under Assyrian domination, and appears in a geographical list (2 R 36, 57a) preceded by Arrapha (Arrapachitis) and Halapeh (Halah), and followed by Tammunu, under the form of Ra-şappa (elsewhere Rașapi).
From the Eponym Κανίνα, Ninip-kibly-uṣur was, it appears, prefect in 530 BC, Urae-eres from 894 to 775 BC, Sin-salimun in 757, and 3. Its
Bēl-emuranni in 737 BC. Judging Assyrian from their names, all these were Governers
Assyrians, but a seemingly native gov-erner, Abd[u ('or Abdâ'), possibly later than the preceding, is mentioned in a list of officials (K. 9291). Yašu[u was šann (deputy-governor?) of Rezeph in 673 BC. Its mention in the Assyrian geographical lists implies that Rezeph was an important trade-center in OT times.

REZIA, ré-zi'a. See Rizia.

REZIN, ré'zin (777, rē'zin; Ρασσών, Rhass-ôn): The last of the kings of Syria who reigned in Damascus (2 K 15:17; 16:5–10; Isa 7:1; 8:4–7).
Along with Pekah, the son of Remaliah, who reigned 20 years over Israel in Samaria, he joined in the Syro-Ephraimitic war against Ahaz, the king of Judah. Together they laid siege to Jerusalem, but were unsuccessful in the effort to take it (2 K 16:5; Isa 7:1). It was to calm the fears, and to restore to the smoking spirit of the men of Judah, that the Israel was commissioned by the Lord to assure them that the schemes of "these two tails of smoking fire-brands" (Isa 7:4) were destined to miscarry. It was then, too, that the sign was given of the virgin who should conceive, and bear a son, and should name him Rezin. Rezin deliberately contented himself on this campaign to the S. with the capture of Edath from the men of Judah and its restoration to the men of Edom, from whom it had been taken and made a seaport by Solomon (2 K 16:6, where it is agreed that "Syriu" and "Syrians" should be read "Edom" and "Edomites," which in the Heb.
script are easy to be mistaken for one another, and are in fact often mistaken). Rezin, however, had a more formidable enemy to encounter on his return to Damascus. Ahaz, like kings of Judea before and after him, placed his reliance more on the arm of flesh than on the true King of his people, and appealed to Tiglath-pileser III, of Assyria, for help. Ahaz deliberately sacrificed the independence of his country in the terms of his offer of submission to the Assyrian: "I am thy servant and thy son" (2 K 16:7). Tiglath-pileser had already carried his arms to the W. and ravaged the northern border of Israel; and now he crossed the Euphrates and hastened to Damascus, slaying Rezin and carrying his people captive to Kir (2 K 16:9). In the course of his efforts, Tiglath-pileser Rezin figures with the designation Ṣārusūni, but the tablet recording his death, found and read by Sir Henry Rawlinson, has been irrecoverably lost, and only the fact of its existence and loss remains (Schrader, COT, I, 252, 253).

REZIN, ré'zin (יוו, rē'zin; Ρασσών, Rhassóä): Son of Eliadah, and a subject of Hadadezer, kings of Zobah (2 K 11:23). His name appears to be given as ייו, hezön, "Athir, Hazein (1 K 15:18; see Hezxon), where he is the father of Tab-rinmon, whose son Ben-hadad I is known through his league with Assa, king of Judah. When David conquered Zobah, Rezin renounced his allegiance to Hadadezer and became powerful as an independent chief, capturing Damascus and setting up as king.
Along with Hadad, the noted Edomite patriot, he became a thorn in the side of Solomon, the one making himself obnoxious in the S., the other in the N., of the kingdom of Israel, both being animated with the bitter hatred of the common foe. It is said of Rezon that he "reigned over Syria" (1 K 11:25), and if the surmise adopted by many scholars is correct that he is the same as Hezion (1 K 15: 18), then he was really the founder of the dynasty of Syrian kings so well known in the history of this period of Israel; and the line would run:
Rezon, Tabrimmon, Ben-hadad I, and Ben-hadad
II.

RHEUMIUM, ré'jü-üm: This city (Ῥευμίων, Ῥήμιωγ [Acts 28:13]), the modern Reggio di Calabria was a town situated on the east side of the Sicilian Strait, about 6 miles S. of a point opposite Messana (Messina). Originally a colony of Chalcidian Greeks, the place enjoyed great prosperity in the 5th cent. BC, but was captured and destroyed by Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, in 387 BC, when all the surviving inhabitants were sold into slavery (Diodorus xiv.106–8, 111, 112). The city never entirely recovered from this blow, and was partially restored by the younger Dionysius. On the occasion of the invasion of Italy by Pyrrhus, the people of Rhegium had recourse to an alliance with Rome (280 BC) and received 4,000 Campanian troops within their walls, who turned out to be very unruy guests. For, in imitation of a similar band of mercenaries across the strait in Messana, they massacred the male inhabitants and reduced the women to slavery (Polybius 1.7; Oroshus iv.3). They were not punished by the Romans until 270 BC, when the town was restored to those of its former inhabitants who still survived. The people of Rhegium were faithful to their alliance with Rome during the Second Punic War (Livy xxi.30; xxiv.1; xxvi.12; xxix.8). At the time of the Social War they were incorporated with the Roman state, Rhegium becoming a municipality (Cicero Verr.
v.60; Pro Archia, 3).
The ship in which Paul sailed from Melita to Puteoli encountered unfavorable winds after leaving Tarentum, and was compelled to run by means of sailing. It waited at Rhegium a day for a south wind which bore it to Puteoli (Acts 28:13), about 180 miles distant, where it probably arrived in about 20 hours.

GEORGE H. ALLEN

RHESA, rē'sa (Ῥεσά, Rhēdô): A son of Zerubabel in the genealogy of Jesus according to St.

RHESES, rē'se, 2 (Ῥῆσε, Rhēs): A city of Mysia, on the coast. It was on the road from Amasia to Pergamum.
RHINOCEROS, ri-nos'ær-os: This word is found in AV in Is 34 7 ("rhinocerots") for οὐνάκον, re'naim, AV "unicorns," RV "wild-oxen." The word is quite inappropriate to the passage, which refers to Edom. The horned rhinoceros, Rhinoceros unicornis, is confined to India. Other rhinocerous are found in India and in equatorial Africa, but it is hardly to be presumed that those animals were meant by the Heb writers. See Unicorn.

RHODA, ró'da (Póso, Rhóδ, "rose"): A maid in the house of Mary the mother of John Mark. She came to answer when Peter knocked at Mary's door after his miraculous release from prison. On recognizing his voice, she so forgot herself with joy that she neglected to open the door, but ran in to tell the others the glad news. They would not believe her, thinking she was mad; and when she persisted in her statement they said it must be his angel. The Jewish belief was that each man had a guardian angel assigned to him. Peter continued knocking, and was ultimately admitted (Acts 12 12 f).

RHODES, ró'da (Pósoe, Rhóδo): An island (and city) in the Aegean Sea, W. of Crete, rough and rocky in parts, but well watered and productive, though at present not, extensively cultivated. Almost one-third of the island is now covered with trees in spite of earlier deforestation. The highest mountains attain an altitude of nearly 4,000 ft. The older names were Ophiusa, Asteria, Trinacria, Corymbia. The capital in antiquity was Rhodes, at the northeastern extremity, a strongly fortified city provided with a double harbor. Near the entrance of the harbor stood a colossal bronze statue of a woman—half the seven wonders of the ancient world—a colossal bronze statue dedicated to Helios. This colossus, made by Chares about 290 BC, at a cost of 300 talents ($300,000), towered to the height of 104 ft.

In the popular mind—both before and after Shakespeare represented Caesar as bestriding the world like a colossus—this gigantic figure is conceived as an image of a human being of monstrous size with legs spread wide apart, at the entrance of the inner harbor, so huge that the largest ship with sails spread could move in under him. In reality, however,this conception is based seems to have no foundation.

The statue was destroyed in 223 BC by an earthquake. It was restored by Ptolemy VI. In 212 AD the Saracens sold the ruins to a Jew. The quantity of metal was so great that it would fill the cars of a modern freight train (900 camels loads).

The most ancient cities of Rhodes were Ialyssos, Ochyros, and Lindus. The oldest inhabitants were immigrants from Crete. Later came the Carians. But no real advance in civilization was made before the immigration of the Dorians under Tlepolemus, one of the Heraclidae, and (after the Trojan war) Aethamenes. Lindus, Ialyssos and Camirus formed with Cos, Cnidus and Halicarnassus the so-called Dorian Hexapolis (Six Cities), the center of which was the temple of the Triopian Apollo on the coast of Caria. Rhodes now founded many colonies—in Spain (Rhode), in Italy (Parthenope, Salapia, Sirus, Sybaris), in Sicily (Gela), in Asia Minor (Solii), in Cilicia (Gages), and in Lycia (Corydalla). The island reached no liturgical greatness until the three chief cities formed a confederation and founded the new capital (Rhodes) in 408 BC. In the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, Rhodes sided with the Athenians, but, after 19 years of hostility to Athens, went over to the Spartans (412 BC). In 394, when Conon appeared with his fleet before the city, the island fell into the hands of the Athenians again. A garrison was stationed at Rhodes by Alexander the Great. After his death this garrison was driven out by the Rhodians. It is at this time that the really great period of the island's history begins. The inhabitants bravely defended their capital against Demetrius Poliorcetes in 304 BC—the same Demetrius who two years before had won a naval victory and had coins stamped with a "Victory" that is the counterpart of the "Winged Vict.

ory" which commands the unabounded admiration of the modern world—and extended their dominion over a strip of the Carian coast, as well as over several of the neighboring islands, and for the first time in the history of the world established an international maritime and commercial law. The arts and sciences now began to flourish in the fair island in the southeastern Aegean. Aeschines, the famous orator of Athens, fled to Rhodes after his defeat by Demosthenes, and founded a school of oratory, which was attended by many Romans. Rhodes became the faithful ally of Rome after the defeat of Anitochus in 189 BC. As a reward for her loyalty she received Caria. In 168, however, only a small portion of this territory remained under Rhodian sway (Pserna, or the Chersones). In 42 BC the island was devastated by Cassius. Later it was made a part of the Roman province of Asia (44 AD). Strabo says that he knows no city so splendid in harbor, walls and streets. When the Roman power declined, Rhodes fell into the hands of Caliph Moawijah, but later was taken by the Greeks, from whom at a later date the Genoese wrested the island. In 1249 John Cantacuzenus attempted to recover Rhodes, but in vain. Finally, however, success crowned the efforts of the Greeks under Theodoros Protobastos. In 1310 the Knights of St. John, who had been driven from Pal, made Rhodes their home. After the subjugation of the island by Sultan Soliman in 1522 the Knights of St. John, driven to Malta (later called Rhoda), remained uninterruptedly a possession of the Sublime Porte down to the recent war between Turkey and the Balkan allies, forming, with the other islands, the province of the "Islands of the White Sea" (Archipelago). It has a Christian governor whose seat, though mostly at Rhodes, is sometimes at Chios. The population of the island has greatly diminished by emigration. In 1890 the total number of inhabitants was 30,000 (20,000 Greeks, 7,000 Mohammedans, 1,500 Jews). The chief products of Rhodes are wheat, oil, wine, figs and tropical fruits. A very important industry is the exportation of sponges. The purity of the air and the mildness of the climate make Rhodes a most de- lightful place to live in during the fall, winter and early spring. The city, built in the shape of an amphitheater, has a magnificent view toward the sea. It contains several churches made out of old mosques. The once famous harbor is now almost filled with sand. The inhabitants number nearly 12,000 (all Turks and Jews). Rhodes is mentioned in the NT only as a point where Paul touched on his voyage southward from the Hellespont to Caesarea (Acts 21 1); but in 1 Macc 15 23 we are informed that it was one of the states to which the Romans sent letters in behalf of the Jews.
RHODOCUS, rod'k-ús (Ῥοδόκος, Rhodokos): A Jewish traitor who disclosed the plans of Judas to the Roman Emperor (2 Mac 13 21) 162 BC. Of his fate nothing more is known.

RIB (ריב), rab (ריב, rabbd; LXX 'Poûba, Ribaib, with variants): A Benjamite, the father of ITTAI (q.v.), one of David's "mighty men" (2 S 23 29 | 1 Ch 11 31).

RIBBAND, rib'and, rib'and (ריבב, pāthil [Nu 15 38 AV]). See Colon, (Cor), (Cord).

RIBLAIH, rib'la (ריבלא, riblah; 'Peb'lae, Riblehād, Riblehād, with variants): (1) Riblah in the land of Hamath first appears in history in 608 BC. Here Pharaoh-nechoh, after defeating Josiah at Megido and destroying Kedytis or Kadlesh on the Orontes, fixed his headquarters, and while in camp he deposed Jehoahaz and cast him into chains, fixed the tribute of Judah, and appointed Jehoiskim king (2 K 23 33–35). In 588 BC Nechohea:nazarat, at war with Egypt and the Syrian states, also established his headquarters at Riblah, and from it he directed the subjugation of Judas. When it fell, Zedekiah was carried prisoner to Riblah, and there, after his sons and his nobles had been slain in his presence, his eyes were put out and he was given in charge of the smiths' prison to Nebuzaradan (2 K 25 6 20; Jer 39 5–7; 52 8–14). Riblah then disappears from history, but the site exists today in the village of Riblid, 35 miles N.E. of Baalbek, and the situation is the finest that could have been chosen by the Egyptian or Bab kings for their headquarters in Syria. An army camped there had abundance of water in the control of the copious springs that go to form the Orontes. The Egyptians coming from the S. had behind them the command of the rich corn and forest lands of Coele-Syria, while the Bab army from the N. was equally fortunate in the rich plains extending to Hamath and the Euphrates. Lebanon, close by, with its forests, its hunting grounds and its snows, ministered to the needs and luxuries of the legions. Riblah commanded the great trade and war route between Egypt and Mesopotamia, and, besides, it was at the dividing-point of many minor routes. It was in a position to attack with facility Phoenicia, Damascus or Pal, or to defend itself against attack from those places while a few miles to the S. the mountains on each side close in forming a pass where a mighty host might easily be resisted by a few. In every way Riblah was the strategical point between North and South Syria. Riblah should probably be read for Diblah in Ezk 14; While in Nu 34 11 it does not really appear. See (2).

(2) A place named as on the ideal eastern boundary of Israel in Nu 34 11, but omitted in Ezk 47 15–18. The MT reads "Hariblah"; but the LXX probably preserves the true vocalization, according to which we should read "to Harbel." It is said to be to the east of 'Ain, and that, as the designation of a district, can only mean Merj 'Ayun, so that we should seek it in the neighborhood of Hermon, one of whose spurs furner found to be named ' défini Arb.'

W. M. CHRISTIE

RICHES, rich'ez, rich'iz: Used to render the following Heb and Gr words: (1) 'Osher, which should, perhaps, be considered the most general word, as it is the most often used (Gen 31 16; Ecol 4 8; Jer 9 23). It looks at riches simply as riches, without regard to any particular feature. Alongside this would go the Gr σαρόν, ploutos (Mt 13 22; Eph 2 7). (2) ἅρπαξ (Pro 27 24; Jer 20 5), ἀρματίζον and ἐκφύλου (Gen 36 7; Dn 11 13 24 AV) look at riches as things accumulated, collected, amassed (6 3; ἧλιον looks upon riches as earnings, the fruit of toil (Ps 119 14; Prov 8 18; Ezk 27 27). (4) Ἐλαμον regards riches in the aspect of being much, this coming from the original idea of noise, through the idea of a multitude as making the noise; the idea of many, or, more precisely, being in multitude (Ps 37 16 AV). (5) Ὑσιλ regards riches as power (Ps 62 10; Isa 8 4; 10 14). (6) θυτήρ means "running over," and so presents riches as abundance (Jer 46 36 AV). Along with this may be placed ἄθροι, which has the idea of the fifth, and so of a kind of abundance (Job 36 19 AV). (7) Κυριάν regards riches as a creation, something made (Ps 104 24; cf m); (8) χρημα (chreme) looks at riches as useful (Mk 10 23 f). Like the NT, the Apc uses only ploutos and chreme.

Material riches are regarded by the Scriptures as neither good nor bad in themselves, but only according as they are properly or improperly used. They are transitory (Prov 27 24); they are not to be trusted (Mk 10 23; Lk 18 24; 1 Tim 6 17); they are not to be gloried in (Jer 9 23); the heart is not to be set on them (Ps 62 10); but they are made by God (Ps 104 24), and come from God (1 Ch 29 12); and they are the crown of the wise (Prov 14 24). Material riches are used to body forth for us the most precious and glorious realities of the spiritual realm. See, e.g., Rom 9 23; 11 33; Eph 2 7; Phil 4 19; Col 1 27. Cf MAMMON; TREASURE; WEALTH. E. J. FORRESTER

RiD, riD, RIDDANCE, ri'd'ans: "Ri'd" originally meant "rescue" (AV Gen 37 22; Ex 6 6; Ps 82 4; 144 7 11), whence the meaning "remove" or "clean out" (Lev 26 6 AV, with "riddance" in Lev 23 22; Zeph 1 18). The word occurs in ARV and in ERV in Ex 6 6.
RIGHT, rìt (תְּרֵי, yôshâr, יְשָׁרָה, mishpâh; δικαίος, dikaios, ἰδιός, euthus): Many Heb words are trd "right," with different shades of meaning. Of these the two noted are the most important: yôshâr, with the sense of being straight, direct, as "right in the sight" of Jeh (Ex 15 26; Dt 12 25, etc.) and a forensic term, as "shall not the Judge of all the earth do right" (Gen 18 25). In Job 34 17, RV has "justice" (ver 6, "right"), etc. The words cfâbek, כְּדַבֵּק, ordinarily trd "righteousness," are in a few cases rendered "right" (2 S 19 28; Neh 2 20; Ps 9 4; 17 1; 119 75; Ezk 18 5, etc.). In the NT the chief word is dikaios, primarily "even," "equal" (Mt 20 4; Lk 12 57, etc.); more generally the word is rendered "just" and "righteous." Euthus, used by LXX for yôshâr (1 S 12 23; Hos 14 9), occurs a few times (Acts 8 21; 13 10; 2 Pet 2 15); so orthos, "straight," "upright" (Lk 10 28). The word "right," representing Heb yôshâr, and kindred forms (Gen 48 13 14 17; Ex 15 6, etc.), the Gr, in this sense, is deizôs (Mt 6 3; 20 21, etc.).

RIGHTEOUSNESS, rìd'chus-nès ( isize, cadidk, adj., "righteous," or occasionally "just"; isize, caâhek, noun, occasionally = "righteousness," occasionally = "justice"; δικαίος, dikaios, adj. δικαιοσύνη, dikaiosûnê, noun, from δίκη, dikê, whose first meaning seems to have been "custom"; the general use suggested conformity to a standard; righteousness, "the state of him who is such as he ought to be" [Thayer]):

LITERATURE

In Christian thought the idea of righteousness contains both a permanent and a changing element. The fixed element is the will to do right; the changing factor is the conception of what may be right at different times and under different circumstances. Throughout the entire course of Christian revelation we discern the emphasis on the first factor. To be sure, in the days of later Pharisaism righteousness came to be so much a matter of externals that the inner intent was often lost sight of altogether; but, on the whole and in the main, Christian thought in all ages has recognized as the central element in righteousness the intention to be and do right. This common spirit binds together the first worshippers of God and the latest. Present-day conceptions of what is right differ by vast distances from the conceptions of the earlier Hebrews, but the intentions of the first worshippers are as discernible as are those of the doors of righteousness in the present day.

There seems but little reason to doubt that the content of the idea of righteousness was determined in the first instance by the customs of social groups. There are some of Customs and Righteousness.

2. Social Customs, which would have us believe that what we experience as inner moral sanction is nothing but the fear of consequences which come through disobeying the will of the social group, or the feeling of pleasure which results as we know we have acted in accordance with the social demands. At least some thinkers would have us believe that this is all there was in moral feeling in the beginning. If a social group was to survive it must lay upon its individual members the heaviest exactions. Back of the performance of religious rites was the fear of the group that the god of the group would be displeased if certain honors were not rendered to him. Merely to escape the penalties of an angry deity the group demanded ceremonial observances. From the basis of fear to the group the individuals of the group have come all our lofter movements toward righteousness.

It is not necessary to deny the measure of truth there may be in this account. To point out its inadequacy, however, a better statement would be that from the beginning the social group utilized the native moral feeling of the individual for the defence of the group. The moral feeling, by which we mean a sense of the difference between right and wrong, would seem to be a part of the native furnishing of the mind. It is very likely that in the beginning this moral feeling was directed toward the performance of the rites which the group looked upon as important (see ALMS).

As we read the earlier parts of the OT we are struck by the fact that much of the early Heb morality was of this group kind. The righteous man was the man who performed the rites which had been handed down from the beginning (Dt 5 25). The meaning of the observance of these rites was, however, not yet determined, but from a very early period the characteristic of Heb righteousness is that it moves in the direction of what we should call today the enlargement of humanity. There seemed to be at work, not merely the forces which make for the betterment of the group, not merely the desire to please the God of the Hebrews for the sake of the material favors which He might render the Hebrews, but the factors which make for the betterment of humanity as such. As we examine the laws of the Hebrews, even at so late a time as the completion of the formal Codes, we are indeed struck by traces of primitive survivals (Nu 5 11 31). There are some injunctions, whose purpose we cannot well understand. But, on the other hand, the vast mass of the legislation has to do with really human considerations. There are rules concerning sanitation (Lev 13), both as it touches the life of the group and of the individual; laws whose mastery begets emphasis, not merely upon external consequences, but upon the inner result in the life of the individual (Ps 51 3); and prohibitions which would indicate that morality, at least in its plainer decencies, had come to be valued on its own account. If we were to seek for some clue to the development of the moral life of the Hebrews, we should find it in a contemplation of the growing demands of human life as such. A suggestive writer has pointed out that the apparently meaningless commandment, "Thou shalt not boil a kid in its mother's milk" (Ex 23 19), has back of it a real human purpose, that there are some things which in themselves are revolting apart from any external consequences (see also Lev 18).

An index of the growth of the moral life of the people is to be found in the changing conception of the character of God. We need not stop to think of the thought of God as yet when we come to the very beginning we see clearly that the outward reciprocal God of the Hebrews started, but from the very beginning we see clearly that the Hebrews believed in their God as one associated with the Hebrews, and by the right (Gen 18 25). It may well be that at the start the God of the Hebrews was largely a God of War, but it is to be noticed that His eminence was against the peoples who had little regard for the larger human considerations. It has often been pointed out that one proof of the inspiration of the Scriptures is to be found in their moral superiority to the Scriptures of the peoples around about the Hebrews. If the Heb writers used material which was common property of Chaldeans, Babylonians, and other peoples, they nevertheless used these materials with a moral difference. They breathed into them a moral life which forever separates them from the Scriptures of other peoples. The marvel also of Hebrew history is their growing and growing immorality. The Hebrews grew to such ideals of human worth. The source of these ideals is to be found in their thought of God. Of course, in moral progress there is a reciprocal effect; the thought of God affects the thought of human life and the thought of human life affects the thought of God; but the Hebrews no sooner came to a fresh moral insight than they made their moral discovery a part of the character of God. From the beginning, we represent the God of the Hebrews was a God directed in His moral wrath against all manner of abominations, aberrations and abnormalities. The purpose of God, according to the Hebrews, was to make a people "separated" in the sense that they were to be free from anything which would detract from a full moral life (Lev 20 22).

We can trace the more important steps in the growth of the Heb ideal. First, there was an increasingly clear discernment that certain things are to be ruled out at once as immoral. The primitive decrees upon which Jewish and social life depended were discerned at an early period (cf passages in Lev cited above). Along with this it must be admitted there was a slower approach to some ideals which we today consider important, that is, certain rules of moral conduct (Dt 24 1 2). Then there was a growing sense of what constitutes moral obligation in the discharge of responsibilities upon the part of men toward their fellows (Isa 6 8 22). There was increasing realization also of what God is, as a moral Being, is obligated to do. The hope of salvation of nations and individuals rests at once upon the righteousness of God.

By the time of Isaiah the righteousness of God had come to include the obligations of power (Isa 63 1). God will save His people, not merely because He has promised to save them, but because He must save them (42 6). The must is moral. If the people of Israel show themselves unworthy, God must punish them; but if a remnant, even a small remnant, show themselves faithful, God must show His favor toward them. Moral worth is not conceived of as something that is to be paid for by external rewards, but if God is moral He must treat the righteous and the unrighteous differently. This conception of what God must do as an obligation and Being influences profoundly the Heb interpretation of the entire course of history (10 20 21).

Upon this ideal of moral obligation there grows later the thought of the virtue of vicarious suffering (ch 53). The sufferings of the good man and of God for those who do not in themselves deserve such sufferings (for them) are a mark of a still higher righteousness (see Hosea Book of). The movement of the Scriptures is all the way from the indifference of those who receive their benefit to the thought of a God who receives in Himself the heaviest shocks of that battle others may have opportunity for moral life.

These various lines of moral development come, of course, to their crown in the NT in the life and death of Christ as set before us in the Gospels and interpreted by the apostles. Jesus stated certain moral axioms so clearly that the world never will escape their power. He said some things once and for all, and He did some things once and for all; that is to say, in His life and death He set on high the righteousness of God as at once moral obligation and self-sacrificing love (Jn 3 16) and with such effectiveness that the world has not escaped and cannot escape this righteous influence (Jn 12 32). Moreover, the course of apostolic and subsequent history has shown that Christ put a winning and compelling power into the idea of righteousness that it would otherwise have lacked (Rom 3 31).

The ideas at work throughout the course of Heb and Christian history are, of course, at work today.

4. Righteousness as Inner

Christianity deepens the sense of obligation to do right. It makes the moral spirit essential. Then it utilizes every force working for the increase of human happiness to set on high the meaning of righteousness. Jesus spoke of Himself as "Life," and declared that He came that men might have life and have it more abundantly (Jn 10 10). The keeping of the commandments was a large part in the unfolding of the life of the righteous Christian, but the keeping of the commandments is not to be conceived of in artificial or mechanical fashion (Lk 10 25-37). With the passage of the centuries some commandments once conceived of as essential drop into the secondary place, and other commandments take the controlling position. In Christian development increasing place is given for certain swift insights of the moral spirit. We believe some things happen that at once appeal to us as righteous. Again, some other things seem righteous because their consequences are beneficial, both for society and for the individual. Whatever makes for the largest life is in the direct line of righteousness in the Christian life, however, we must remember the essentially Christian conception that man does not live through external consequences alone. In all thought of consequences the chief place has to be given to inner consequences. By the surrender of outward happiness and outward success a man may attain inner success. The spirit of the cross is still the path to the highest righteousness.

The distinctive note in emphasis upon righteousness in our day is the strong emphasis on social service. This does not mean that

5. Righteousness as Social

Christianity is to lose sight of the righteousness of the individual in itself. As Social We have come pretty clearly to see that the individual is the only moral end in himself. Righteousness is to have as its aim the upbuilding of individual lives. The commandments of the righteous life are not for the sake of society as a thing in itself. Society is nothing apart from the individuals that compose it; but we are coming to see that those individuals have worth than we had once imagined and greater responsibilities than we had dreamed of. The influence of the individual touches others at more points than we had formerly realized. We have at times con-tainty best always have insisted that to the fullest degree the present world must be redeemed by the life-giving forces of Christianity. We still insist that all idea of earthly righteousness takes its start from heavenly righteousness, or, rather, that the righteousness of man is to be based upon his conception of the righteousness of God. Present-day thinking concerns itself largely with the idea of the irrefutability of God. In this present world, this does not mean that there may not be other worlds, or are not other worlds, and that God is not also in those worlds; but the immediate revelation of God to us is in our present world. Our present world consists of the sphere of the righteousness of God and of man to be set forth. God is conscience, and God is love. The present sphere is to be used for the manifestation of His holy love. The chief channel through which that holy love is to manifest itself is the conscience and very essence of the Christian, but that inner spirit to live the life of God out into society.

In all our thought of righteousness it must be borne in mind that there is nothing in Christian revelation which will tell us what righteousness calls for in every particular circumstance. The differences between circumstances and the differences between different standards in different circumstances have led to much confusion in the realm of Christian thinking. We can keep our bearing, however, by remembering the double element in righteousness which we mentioned in the beginning: on the one hand, the will to do right, and, on the other, the difficulty of determining in a particular circumstance just what the right is. The larger Christian conceptions always have an element of fluidity, or, rather, an element of expansiveness. For example, it is clearly a Christian obligation to transmit a spiritual spirit of good will or with the spirit of Christian love. But what does love call for in a particular case? We can only answer the question by saying that love seeks for whatever is best, both for him who receives and for him who gives. This may lead to one course of conduct in one situation and to quite a different course in another. We must, however, keep before us always the aim of the largest life for all persons whom we can reach. Christian righteousness today is even more important upon material things such as salary arrangements, than was the Code of Moses. The obligation to use the latest knowledge for the hygienic welfare is just as binding now as then, but “the latest knowledge” is a changing term. Material progress, education, spiritual instruction, are all influences which necessarily make for full life.

Not only is present-day righteousness social and growing; it is also concerned, to a large degree, with the thought of the world which now is. Righteousness has too often been conceived of merely as the means to the end of the present life. Future Kingdom of Heaven. Present-day emphasis has not ceased to think of the life beyond this, but the life beyond this can best be met and faced by those who have been in the full sense righteous in the life that now is. There is here no break in true Christian continuity. The seers who have understood Christ

RIMMON, rimon:

(1) The rock Rimmon (רימון, rimmon, שֵׁרָמְנָה, Shermōn) and *Rimmon (גֵּרִימון, gerimmon); אֶרֶם (אֶרֶם, Aram), a place of refuge of the 600 surviving Benjamites of Gibeah (Elisha 21:13). Robinson’s identification (RB, 1, 440) has been very generally accepted. He found a conical and very prominent hill 6 miles. K. E. S. A. E. gives the name upon which stands a village called Rimmon. This site was known to Eusebius and Jerome (OS 146:6, 287:98), who describe it as 15 Roman miles from Jerus. Another view, which would locate the place of refuge of the Benjamites in a large cavern on the south of the Wady Suwein, near Jeba’, is strongly advocated by Ravnslcy and Birch (see PEF, III, 137-48). The latter connects this again with 8 21 14, 2, where Saul, accompanied by his 600, “in the uttermost part of Gibeah under the pomegranate tree (Rimmon).”

(2) (רִימְנָם, rimmon; רִימְנוֹן, Rimmon, or Pesh. Rimmon, or *שְׁרָמְנָה, Shermēnāh): A city in the Negev, near the border of Edom, ascribed to Judah (Josh 15:32) and to Simeon (19:7; 1 Ch 4:32, AV “Rimmon”). In Zec 14:10 it is mentioned as the extreme S. of Judah—“from Geba to Rimmon, S. of Jerus.” In the earlier references Rimmon occurs in close association with ’Arin (a spring), and in Neh 11:29, what is apparently the same place, ’Arin Rimmon, is called Ein-rimmon (q.v.).

(3) (רִימָן, rimmon [Josh 19:13, נָרֶם, nārēm], rimmōnāh, in some Heb MSS מִרְמוֹן, dimmond [see Dimnah [Josh 21:63], and מִרְמוֹן (1 Ch 6:77]): In AV we have identified the name of the city of Rimmon in Josh 19:13, but RV translates the latter as “which stretcheth.” This was a city on the border of Zebulun (Josh 13:31) allotted to the Levites (Josh 21:35, Dimnah; and 1 Ch 6:77). The site is now the little village of Rimmonāh on a low ridge S. of the marshy plain of the B оф in Galilee; there are many rock-cut tombs and cisterns. It is about 4 miles.
N. of el Mesh-hed, usually considered to be the site of Gath-hepher. See PEF, I, 363, Sh VI.

RIMMON (ירמון), rimmon, "pomegranate"; see RIMMON-PEREZ:

(1) A Syrian god. Naaman the Syrian leper after being cured is troubled over the fact that he will still have to bow down to the house of the Syrian god, Rimmon, when his master goes into the house to worship leming on his hand (2 K 5 18). Elisha answers him ambiguously: "Go in peace." Judging from Naaman's position and this incident, R. must have been one of the leading gods of the Syrians worshipped in Damasc. He has been identified with Rammanu, the Assyrian god of wind, rain and storm. The name appears in the Syrian personal names Hadar-Rimmon and Tan-Rimmon (q.v.) and its meaning is dubious (ramanu, "to thunder"? (2)

A Benjamite of Beeroth, whose sons Bannah and Rechab assassinated Ish-bosheth (2 S 4-2 59).

Nathan Isaacs

RIMMON-PEREZ, r-pērez (רפרץ, rimmon perez; AV Rimmon-parez): A desert camp of the Israelites (Nu 33 19 2), unidentified. Gesenius translates rimmon as "pomegranate," the place deriving its name from the abundance of pomegranates. But Conder derives it from rimmon, "so be high," and translates it "clove height." See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

RIMMON, ROCK OF. See RIMMON, (1).

RIMMONAH, rim-mō'na, RIMMONO, rim-mō'no. See RIMMON, (3).

RING (AS HEB "ring"): The word renders (ARV) two Heb words (in AV and ERV three) and two Gr words. תֹּבָּד, tobbath, the principal Heb word, is from תֹּבָּד, tâbho, "sick," either because the ring is something "cast" or molded or, more probably, since the principal use of the ring was as a seal, because it "sank" into the wax or clay that received the impression. In Ex, tâbbath, "ring," is a detail of furniture or equipment, as the rings of the ark through which the staves were thrust. (Ex 25 12, etc), rings for curtains, in the high priest's ephod. (Ex 26 28; 39 21, etc). Its other use was perhaps the hope, to describe the article of personal adornment worn on the finger, apparently in the OT always a signet-ring, and as such an indispensable article of masculine attire. Such a ring Pharaoh gave Joseph as a symbol of authority (Gen 41 42); and Abasuerus gave Haman (Est 3 10); with it the royal missive was sealed (Est 3 12; 8 8 hor. 10). It also was a feminine ornament in Israel's list of the fashionable feminine paraphernalia, "the rings and the nose-jewels" (quite likely rings also) (Isa 3 21). Either as ornaments or for their intrinsic value, or both, rings were used as gifts for sacred purposes from both men and women: "brooches, ear-rings, and signet-rings" (NRSV "pomegranates") (Ex 22 22); "bracelets, rings (ARV "signetgrings"), ear-rings" (Nu 31 50 AV). יִרְמִית, hêbham, "signet," mentioned in Gen 38 18 25; Ex 28 11. 21 36; Ex 39 16.14; Jer 22 24; Hag 2 23, etc, was probably usually a seal ring, but in Gen 38 and elsewhere the seal may have been swung on wire, and suspended by a cord around the neck. It was not only an identification, but served as a stamp for signature. יָרַם, gâdîl, "circle" (of "Galilee," "Circle" of the Gentiles), rendered "ring" in Est 1 6; Cant 5 14, may rather mean "cylinder" or "rod" of metal. Earring (q.v.) in AV is from totally different words: יִרְמִית, nezem, whose etymology is unknown, יָרַם, "eghîl, "round," or בּוֹרֵט, lehoah, "amulet"; so RV. The "rings" of the wheels in Ezek 1 18 (AV) are בּוֹרֵט, gâth, "curved," and mean "rings" (ARV), "felloes." Egyptians esp. wore a great profusion of rings, principally of silver or gold, engraved with scarabaei, or other devices. In the NT the ring, δακτύλιον, daktulion, "finger-ring," is a token of means, position, standing: "put a ring on his hand!" (Lk 1 16). So it included the right to give orders in his father's name. To be χειροδακτυλιον, chrosdaktulios, "golden-ringed," perhaps with more than one, indicated wealth and social rank: "a man with a gold ring" (Jas 2 2). See also EARRING; SIGNET; SEAL.

Philip Wendell Channell

RINGLEADER, ring-lēd-ər: In Acts 21 5 the τὰ τρίγωνα, trígōna, "one who stands first," Not an opprobrious word in the Gr.

RINGSTREAKED, ring'strēkt (AV and ERV ringstreaked): Gen 30 35 39 40; 31 8 (bes) 10 12 for תֹּבַּד, tâbôth. In the context of 30 35, etc, tâbôth certainly denotes defective coloring of some sort, but the exact meaning of the word is uncertain. The τρ "ringstreaked" ("marked with circular bands") comes from connecting the word with the γ' λαθο, "to bind" (Gen 22 9), but this connection is dubious.

RINNAH, rin'a (רִנָה, rimnah, "praise to God"); LXX B, Ἀνά, Ἄνδα, Α', Phanwv; Rhamon}: A Judahite, according to MT a son of Shimon (1 Ch 4 20). But LXX makes him a son of Haman (B, Phond, A, Andra) by reading "ben" in the next name (Ben-hanan) as "son of.

RIOT, r'ut: Properly, "unrestrained behavior" of any sort, but in modern Eng. usually connoting mob action, although such phrases as a "rhetorical banquet" are still in common use. AV uses the word in the first sense, and it is retained by RV in Lk 15 13; Tit 1 6; 1 Pet 4 4 for δίκτυων, asōte, "strata, astóis, "having no hope of safety," "profligate." In Prov 23 20; 28 7 RV has preferred "gluttonous," "glutton," in Rom 13 13, "revelling," and in 2 Pet 2 13, "revel.

Burton Scott Easton

RIPHATH, r'iphath (ריפא, riphath): A son of Gomer, the eldest son of Japheth (Gen 10 3; 1 Ch 1 6, where MT and RV read Darr, etc. Joes 1, vi 1) identifies the Ripheans with the Paphgalions, through whose country on the Black Sea ran the river "Rhebas" (Pinya, NH, vi 4).

RISING, r'is'ing (רַע, rē'ah, "a tumor," "swelling" (Lev 13 2, 10, etc). See Leprosy.

RISSAH, ris'a (רִיסָה, rīsēh, "dew"): A camp of the Israelites in the wilderness Wanderings between RITHMAH, rith‘ma (רִיתָם, rīthmāh, “broom”): A desert camp of the Israelites (Nu 33 18-19). The name refers to the white desert broom. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

RIVER, riv‘ér: (1) The usual word is רָֽיִן, nāḥār (Aram. ṯā‘r, ṯərā‘, ḥār [Ezr 4 10, etc.]), used of the rivers of Eden (Gen 2 10-14), often of the Euphrates (Gen 15 18, etc.); of Arab. and Pharrar (2 K 5 12), the river of Gozan (2 K 17 15), the river Geder (Ezr 1 1), the rivers (canals?) of Babylon (Ps 137 1), the rivers of Ethiopia (Isa 18 1; Zeph 3 10). Cf נָֽהַר, nahar, the common Aram. word for “river.”

(2) נַֽעַר, yōʿer, according to BDB from אֲבֹא (nikhār), yārēḏ nāgōr, AV “brooks of defense,” RV has “streams of Egypt.” In Isa 19 7,8, for נַֽעַר, yōʿer, AV “brooks,” and Zec 11 10, AV “river,” RV “River.” In Job 28 10, AV “He cutteth out rivers among the rocks,” RV “has channels,” RV “diggeth Avvasses.”

(3) There are nearly 100 references to נָֽהַר, nahal, in about half of these AV has “brook” and in about half “river.” RV has more often “brook” or “valley.” But RV has river in “whatsoever hath fins and scales in the waters, in the seas, and in the rivers” (Lev 11 9); “the river Jehovah” (Dt 2 37; Josh 12 2); the stream issuing from the temple (Ezk 47 5-12). RV has “brook of Egypt,” i.e. el-Arish (Nu 34 5; Josh 16 57; 1 K 8 65; 2 K 24 7; 2 Ch 7 8; Am 6 14, “of the Arabah”); “brook [AV ‘river’ of Karnah” (Josh 16 18); “valley [AV ‘river’] of the Amron” (2 K 24). EV has “valley” of Gerar (Gen 26 17), of Zered (Nu 21 12), but “brook Zered” (Dt 2 13), of Eschol (Nu 32 9), of Sorek (Jgs 16 4), of Shittim (Jos 3 15). EV has “brook” Besor (1 S 30 10), Kidron (2 S 23 16), Gaash (2 S 23 30), Cherith (1 K 17 3); also the fem. נָֽהָל, nahalah, “brook [AV ‘river’] of Egypt” (Ezk 47 19; 48 28). The torrent-valley (wayd) is often meant.

(4) נֶֽפֶל, pelakh, with fem. נֶֽפֶל, pēlaḥāh, AV “river,” is in RV τρόον* “stream” except EV “river of Egypt” (Ps 65 9); “streams of water” (Ps 1 3); Prov 5 15; Lam 4 8); “streams of honey” (Job 20 17); “streams of oil” (Job 29 6).

(5) נֵֽעָב, Nā‘ab, AV “river,” except EV “water brooks” (Ps 42 11, is in RV “watercourses” (Ezk 6 3; 31 12; 32 36; 34 13; 35 8; 36 46), “water-brooks” (Cant 5 12; Joel 1 20).

(6) נֵֽעָב, Nā‘ab, AV “river” (Jer 17 8). נֵֽעַב, ‘aḥabal, and נֵֽעַב, ‘eḥabal, AV “river” (Dnl 8 2.3.6).

(7) נָֽוָאָב, pokamah, AV the Jordan (Mk 1 5); Euphrates (Re 9 14); “rivers of living water” (Jn 7 38); “river of water of life” except EV “water brooks” (Ps 42 11). Note also always in Gr for “river” in RV Apoc (1 Esd 4 23, etc.): See BRIDGE, STREAM; VALLEY.

RIZIA, riz‘ía (רִצִּי, rīṣī‘ā), rīṣā (רֵיצָא, rīṣā): An Asherite (1 Ch 7 39).

RIZPAH, rīṣā‘ā (רָֽיִסָּה, rīṣā‘ā, “hot stone”); Jos, Por-Ba‘a, Rahispah): In 2 S 3 7 the subject of a coarse slander. 2 S 21 contains the pathetic story of Rizpa‘ah’s faithful watch over the bodies of her dead sons Mephibosheth and Armoni (vs 10.11). Did this story suggest Tennyson’s “Rizpah”? A three years’ famine had made David anxious, and in seeking a reason for the affliction he concluded that it lay in Saul’s unavenged conduct to the Gibeonites (ver 2). To appease Jehovah he gave up to the Gibeonites the two sons of Saul, Mephibosheth and Armoni, as well as Saul’s 5 grandsons (whether by Michal or Mera‘ah; see MERAB). These seven were hanged at Gibeath. Rizpa‘ah watched 5 months over their exposed bodies, but meanwhile the famine did not abate. Word was brought to David of Rizpa‘ah’s act (vs 10.11), and it is possible that her action suggested to David his next step in expiation. At any rate, he remembered the unavenged-for bones of Jonathan and Saul lying in ignominy at Jabesh-gilead, whether they had been carried by stealth after the Philis had kept them hung in the streets of Beth-shan for some time. The bones were recovered and apparently mingled with the bones Rizpa‘ah had guarded, and they were together buried in the family grave at Zelah. We are told that then “God was entreated for the land” (ver 14).

ROBBER, rob‘er, ROBBERY, rob‘er-ē. “Robber” represents no particular Heb word in the OT, but in the Apoc and the NT is always a tr of λῃστής, lēstēs (see THIEF). In AV Job 5 5; 18 9, “robber” stands for the doubtful word γραμμός, gammōn, RV “hungry” in 5 5 and “sinner” in 18 9. The meaning is “thirsty” and perhaps “thirsty, hungry” should be read in both places. Ps 62 10, “Become not vain in robbery,” means “put not your trust in riches dishonestly gained.” RV’s changes of AV in Prov 21 7; Dnl 11 14; Nah 3 1 are obvious. In Phl 2 6 AV reads “thought it not robbery to be equal with God.” EV has “a prize,” while ERVm and ARV read “thing to be grasped,” ARV wording “counted not the being on an equality with God a thing to be grasped.” The Gr here is ἐξουσιαστᾶν ἀρπαγμόν, a word derived from ἀρπάζω, “to ravish away, ‘carry off,’ ‘plunder’ (cf.” ‘harpy’”). Properly speaking, the termination -mos should give the derived noun an active sense, “the act of plundering,” whence AV’s “robbery.” The verse reads then more naturally “who thought that being on an equality with God did not consist in grasping,” and this tr gives good sense in the context and has some excellent scholarly support. But a passive significance is frequently found despite a -mos termination, giving to ἀρπαγμός the sense of “thing grasped,” as in RV. Usually ENG. commentators take “grasped” as meaning “cling to”—“did not think equality with God should be clung to tenaciously”—but “to cling to” seems unknown as a tr of ἀρπαγμός. Hence render “a thing to be grasped” rather “did not seek equality with God by selfish methods but by humbling himself.” It is to be noticed, naturally, that St. Paul is thinking of “equality with God” simply in the sense of “receiving explicit adoration from men” (vs 10.11), and that the metaphysical relation of the Son to the Father is not at all in point. ROBBERS OF TEMPLES (ἱεροσόλυτοι, hierosolūtōi, “guilty of sacrilege”): A term used by the town clerk of Ephesus (Acts 19 30), as applied to Ephesian churches”). As the temple of Diana had a great treasure-chamber, the offence might not be unknown among them; cf Rom 2 22.
ROEB, rōb. See Drues, 1, (3).

ROBOAM, rōbō-ām (Poebōa, Rhabodam). AV; Gr form of 'Rehoboam' (thus RV) (Mt 1:7); successor of Solomon.

1. Names [Job 30:6; Jer 4:20]; cf Kūṭās, Kūṭūhās, "Cophan" = Ḥrēpēs, Piṭērēs, "Peter" (Jn [1] 42 AV and RVm); [5] ṭēpēa, ṭētra: ġār and sela' are the words most often found, and there is no well-defined distinction between them. They are frequently coupled together in the parallelism which is characteristic of the Heb writers: e.g.

"Be thou to me a strong rock [ḡār], a house of defence to save me. For you hast set my rock [sela'] and my fortress" (Ps 118:1).

"He clave rocks [ḡār] in the wilderness, And gave them drink as abundantly as the depths. He brought streams also out of the rock [sela'], And caused rivers to run down like rivers" (Ps 78:15,16).

It is plain here that the two words are used for the sake of variety, without any clear difference of meaning. Even ḥōlānnāsh (tr'f "flint") is used in the same way with ġār in Ps 114:8:

"Who turned the rock [ḡār] into a pool of water, The flint [ḥalānnāš] into a fountain of waters."

(1) Some of the most striking and beautiful imagery of the Bible is based upon the rocks. They are a symbol of God: "Jeh is my rock, and my fortress" (2 S 22:2; Ps 18:2; 71:3); "God, the rock of my salvation" (2 S 22:47; cf Ps 62:27; 89:26); "my God the rock of my refuge" (Ps 94:22); "the rock of my strength" (Isa 17:10); "Lead me to the rock that is higher than I" (Ps 61:2); repeatedly in the song of Moses (Dt 32:3.4.18.30.31; cf 2 S 22:32). Paul applies the term to the wilderness (Ex 17:6; Nu 20:11) to Christ as the source of living water for spiritual refreshment (1 Cor 10:4).

(2) The rocks are a refuge, both figuratively and literally (Jer 48:28; Cant 5:14). The rocks are a "refuge for lions" (Ps 104:14). Many a traveler in Pal has felt the refreshment of "the shade of a great rock in a weary land" (Isa 32:2). A very different idea is expressed in Isa 8:14, "And he shall be for a sanctuary; but for a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence" (cf Rom 9:33; 1 Pet 2:8).

(3) The rock is a symbol of hardness (Jer 5:3; cf Isa 60:7). Therefore the breaking of the rock exemplifies the power of God (Jer 23:29; cf 1 K 19:11). The rock is also a symbol of that which endures, "Oh that they ... were graven in the rock for ever!" (Job 19:23,24). A rock was an appropriate place for offering a sacrifice (Jgs 6:20; 13:19). The central feature of the Mosque of 'Umar in Jerusalem is Kubbat-Šekhrat, the "dome of the rock." The rock or sōkher under the dome is thought to be the site of Solomon's altar of burnt offering, and further thought is to be the site of the threshing-floor of Arahunah the Jebusite which David purchased and built an altar upon.

(1) The principal rock of Pal and Syria is limestone of which there are many varieties, differing in color, texture, hardness and degrees of impurity, some of the limestone having considerable admixtures of clay or sand. Some of the harder kinds are very dense and break with a conchoidal fracture similar to the fracture of flint. In rocks which have for ages been exposed to atmospheric agencies, erosion has produced striking and highly picturesque forms. Nodules and layers of flint are of frequent occurrence in the limestone of Pal.

(2) Limestone is the only rock of Western Pal, with the exception of some local outpourings of basaltic rock and with the further exception of a light-brown, porous, partly calcareous sandstone, which is found at intervals along the coast. This last is a superficial deposit of Quaternary recent age, and is of aeolian origin. That is, it consists of dune sands which have solidified under the influence of atmospheric agencies. This is very exceptional, nearly all stratified rocks having originated as beds of sand or mud in the bottom of the sea.

(3) In Sinai, Edom, Moab, Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon is found the Nubian sandstone, a silicious sandstone which, at least in the N., is of middle or lower Cretaceous age. In the S., the lower strata of this formation seem to be paleozoic. Most of it is not sufficiently coherent to make good building stone, though some of its strata are very firm and are even used for millstones. In some places it is so incoherent or friable that it is easily dug with the pick, the grains falling apart and forming sand that can be used in mortar. To color the Nubian sandstone is on the whole dark reddish brown, but locally it shows great variation, from white through yellow and red to black. In places it also has tints of blue. The celebrated rock tombs and temples of Petra are carved in this stone.

(4) Extensive areas of the northern part of Eastern Pal are covered with igneous rock. In the Jau'dân S.E. of Mt. Hermon, this has been for ages exposed to the atmosphere and has formed superficially a rich dark soil. Further S.E. is the Le'ja (Arab. "refuge"), a wild tract covered with a deposit of lava which is geologically recent, and which, while probably earlier than man, is still but little affected by the atmosphere. It is with difficulty traversed and frequently furnishes an asylum to outlaws. See Crag; Flint; Geology; Lime.

ROCK-BADGER, r.-bah-jēr: This term is found in RVm for "coney," ṣēbēphān (Lev 11:5; cf Dt 14:7; Ps 104:18; Prov 30:26). It is a tr of klij dōs, the name given by the Boers to the Cape hyrax or coney. See Coney.

ROD (多种形式, makkēl, ṣēlah, māteh, ḫēthēth, Ḣēbēth; Ḥēbēs, Ḥēbēlo): Little distinction can be drawn between the Heb words used for "rod" and "staff." Māteh is the word used in Gen 30:37 ff for the twigs of poplar put by Jacob before his sheep, and in Jer 11:11 of the "rod of an almond-tree." Ḫēthēth is used of the rod in the hand of Moses and of Aaron (Ex 4:2 ff; 7:9 ff, etc). Ḩēbēth is used, but sometimes also māteh, of the rod used for correction (Ex 21:20; 2 S 7:14; Prov 10:13; 13:24; Isa 10:5, etc). In Ps 33:4 Ḫēthēth is used of a rod and of any staff, though, however, Ḩēbēth is the shepherd's rod, figurative of Divine guidance and care. In Ezk 21:10.13, the word stands for the royal scepter. In the NT Ḫēthēth is used of a rod of correction (1 Cor 4:21); Aaron's rod of midst (Num 17:10); a measuring rod (Rev 11:1). See also Armor, Arms.

JAMES ORR
RODANIM, rod'a-min: The reading of MT in 1 Ch 17:7 for the Rodanim (q.v.) of Gen 10:4 correspond to the Phoen, RhodOi of LXX in both passages. The Rodanim are generally identified as inhabitants of the island of Rodos (q.v.), well known to the ancient Phoenicians (Romer's Hidat).

ROE, rophe, ROEBUCK, ro'beck: AV has "roe" and "roe-buck" for ṣeḇṭa, ṣeḇṭāh, ṣēḇṭayāh. RV usually substitutes "gazelle" in the text (Dt 12:15, etc) or m (Prov 6:5, etc), but retains "roe" in 2 S 2:18, 1 Ch 12:8; Cant 3:5; 7:3. So RV has "gazelle" for AV "roe" in Sir 27:20 (dokoras). RV has ing or closing a book. The m'ghillah sephēr (Jer 36:2) means the unwritten roll, or the roll considered in its material form as contrasted with the work. M'ghillah, which is found in Ezr 6:2 (RV "roll"), Jer (often), Ezek (often) and Zec, is a somewhat late word, and came to mean a small roll (but with a complete work) as distinguished from a book, corresponding to the modern distinction of manuscript and book or document and book. The word gillumah is tr in RV as "tablet," and is univerally regarded as meaning (Isa 8:1) "some smooth surface, corresponding to the same word in Isa 3:23 which is rendered, "hand-mirror." But "cylinder-seal" would possibly fit the sense in both cases; this being hung round the neck as an ornament in one case and inscribed with a personal name in the other.

Biblion is regarded by the Bible translators as equivalent to m'ghillah in the sense of small roll. It is in fact 4 in the LXX of Jer 36 used as the tr for m'ghillah, but very much oftener it is the tr for sephēr, for which in fact it is the correct technical equivalent (Birt, Buchrolle, 21). Indeed the "small book" (Thayer, Lex., 101) is hardly consistent with the ideas of the heavens as a scroll, of the Lamb's Book of Life, or of the vast quantity of books of Jn 21:25, although in Lk 4:17 it may perhaps correspond closely with m'ghillah in the sense of a complete roll and work, which is at the same time a whole part of a larger work. Its use in Rev 6:14 is reminiscent of Isa 34:4 ("scroll"), and is conclusive for the roll form. It is indeed always technically a roll and never codex or tablet.

It is not likely that Isaiah and St. John (here and in his Gospel, 21:25) refer directly to the biblia idea that the heavens are a series of written tablets or to the rabbinic saying that "if all the oceans were ink, all seas pens, the heavens and earth sheets to write upon, and all men writers, still it would not suffice for writing out the teachings of my Masters" (Blau, op. cit., 34). Nevertheless, the "whole Cosmos" does suggest "the heavens and earth" as sheets to write upon, and under all there does perhaps lurk a conception of the broad expanse of heaven as a roll for writing upon.

ROLLER, rol'ber: AV and ERV in Ezk 30:21 for ṣḥad, ṣḥil, "bandage" (so ARV). "Roller" was formerly a technical term in surgery for a wide bandage.

ROLLING, rol'ing, THING: Isa 17:13, AV "like a rolling thing before the whirwind," a non-committal tr of ṣeḇṭa, gulgul, "revolving thing," "wheel" (Ecc 12:6). RV "like the whirling dust before the storm" is probably right. But see CHAFF; DUST; STUBBLE.

LITERATURE

I. OUTLINE OF ROMAN EMPIRE.—The founding of the Roman empire was the grandest political achievement ever accomplished. The conquests of Alexander the Great, Charleempire a magne and Napoleon seem small compared with the durable structure reared by Julius and his successor, Augustus. In one sense Julius Caesar was the most wonderful man that Rome or any other country produced—was the founder of the empire, and Augustus the founder of the princeps. But the Roman empire was the culmination of a long process of political, constitutional, and social growth which gave a lasting prestige to monarchy. The Roman empire was the only possible solution of a 700 years' struggle, and Roman history is the story of the conflict of class with class, patrician against pleb-lian, popular against pious, the antagonism of oligarchy and democracy, the struggle against neglected masses. It is the account of the triumphant march of democracy and popular government against an exclusive governing caste. Against heavy odds the plebeians asserted their rights till they secured at least a measure of social, political and legal equality with their betters (see Rome, I, 2, 4). But in the long conflict both parties degenerated until neither militant democracy nor despotic oligarchy could hold the balance with justice. Democracy had won in the uphill fight, but lost itself and was obliged to consent to a common master with absolute power. It was of no small importance for Christianity that the Roman empire—practically synonymous with the orbis terrarum—had been converging both from internal and external causes toward a one-man government, the political counterpart of a universal religion with one God and Saviour.

(1) JULIUS CAESAR.—For a couple of generations political leaders had foreseen the coming of supreme power and had tried to grasp it. But it was Julius Caesar who first succeeded in exploiting democracy for his own aggrandizement. He proved the potent factor of the first triumvirate (see BC, his consulship 63 BC), was consul in 49 BC he crossed the Rubicon and declared war upon his country, but in the same year was ap-donated Dictator and thus made his enemies the ones of his country. He vanquished the Pompeian—senas-orial and republican—at Pharsalia in 48 BC, Pius in 46 BC, and Munda in 45 BC. Between 46 and the Ies of March, the emperor before Diocletian was imperial. He was recognized officially as "demigod"; temples were dedicated to his "elementy." He encouraged the people to accede to his purposes self-government and right of election, became chief princeps of senate and high priest (pontifex masus), so that he could manipulate even the will of the gods to his own purposes. His plans were equally great and beneficent. He saw the necessity of blending the heterogeneous populations into one people and extending the Roman citizenship. His outlook was larger and more favorable to the coming of Christianity than that of his successor, Augustus. The latter learned from the fate of Caesar that to keep the imperial power in the empire, he must pronounce the new "secret of
(2) OCTAVIAN.—In 48 AD a new "secret of empire" was revealed, viz., that emperors could not hold office in one line and that emperors could be nominated by the armies. After the bloody civil wars of 68, "the year of the four emperors." Vespasian founded the Iud Dynasty, and dynastic succession was for the present again adopted. With the Flavians begins a new epoch in Roman history of pronounced importance for Christianity. The exclusive Roman emperors are the wane. Vespasian was of plebeian and Sabine rank and there thus non-Rom, the first of many non-Rom emperors.
His ideas were provincial rather than imperial. But a new in the autocratic spirit stands halfway between the Augustan principate and the absolute monarchy of Diocletian.
Augustan, that is, the age of the "two Augustus" is the old Roman republic. The commonwealth sank in exhaustion after the protracted civil and internece strife. It was a case of the survival of the fittest. It was a great crisis in human history, and a great man was at hand for the occasion. Octavian realized that emperor, and became a Roman citizen. His outlook was larger and more favorable to the coming of Christianity than that of his successor, Augustus. The latter learned from the fate of Caesar that to keep the imperial power in the empire, he must pronounce the new "secret of

(4) ADAPTIVE or ANTONINE emperors.—The Antonine was another dynasty of empire, andsına an equally entranced by the ideas of universalism. Under Trajan the empire was expand.; a series of new oratories was established; a contention that Rome could advance no further. Under Hadrian a policy of retreat began; henceforth Rome is never again a always on the defensive against restless barbarians.
unmistakable signs of weakness and decay set in under Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius. This, the best and longest of the great imperial ages, was the beginning of the end. In this era, in fact, we see the growing centralization of authority; the senate practically became a mere debating club. The office of emperor was established which culminated in bureaucracy under Hadrian, 117-138 A.D. On the death of Commodus, whose reign 180-192 A.D. was remarkable for its industry, his empire was put up for sale by the soldiery and knocked down to the highest bidder.  In the period of the 2nd century the empire was emasculated—which was indeed essential in the face of the period of barbaric aggressiveness to postpone the fall of the empire for another three centuries a.m. accomplished. A rapid succession of emperors followed, almost each of whom attempted to shift the weight of the empire under his sway. The center of gravity now shifted to Italy, where the Roman spirit asserts itself proportionately. The year 212 A.D. is memorable for the edict of Caracalla granting citizenship to all. (6) From Diocletian till partition.—In the next period absolute monarchy of pure oriental type was established by Diocletian, one of the ablest of Roman rulers. He inaugurated the principle of division and subdivision of imperial power. Thus in 284, Diocletian divided the empire into the Western and Eastern parts, with the growing prominence of the East, becomes apparent. Rome and Italy are reduced to the rank of provinces, and new courts are opened by the two Augusti and two Cæsars. Diocletian's division of power led to civil strife, which soon divided the whole empire under his sway. The center of gravity now shifted toward the declining position of the Western portion, the Rhine and Danube. The empire was again partitioned out to the sons of Constantine, one of whom, Constantius, succeeded in the Western portion and continued the Empire for 46 years. In 312, however, a new and again divided, Valentinian receiving the West and Valens the East. (7) Final partition.—On the death of Theodosius I (395), West and East fell to his sons Honorius and Arcadius, respectively. They were unable to hold the steady ground degenerated before barbaric hordes and weakening rulers. The western provinces and Africa were overrun by the Franks fleeing from Germanic, and the Eastern provinces invaded by the Goths. The Vandals under Genseric settled first in Southern Spain, then in Africa, and restored the Mediterranean to Rome. The Roman frontier, settled in Illyria and invaded Italy. After his death, 408, his son Hormius and his Germanics in 470, he announced the world that the Roman state had ceased to exist in 3124 and its final capture by the Turks in 1453, 500, when its spiritual and intellectual treasures were opened to the Westerns. It proved to be of great benefit in providing the way for the Reformations of the 16th century. The Roman Empire was not the same as the old Roman Empire, but it was the old, the Roman spirit. In the East was the birth of humanism. (1) Exhaustion of parties.—The Roman world had for two generations been ruled by aristocracy, and at least one generation before the empire became divided, so it was set up, the inevitable necessity of one-man government or supreme power, and each political leader made this its ambition to grasp it. The civil wars ceased for a century with the death of Antoninus. But the struggles of Tiburius Gracchus and Scipio Aemilianus, Caius Gracchus and Opimius, Drusus and Philippus, Marius and Sulla, Pompey and Caesar, and lastly Octavion and Antony had exhausted the state, and this exhaustion of political parties opened the way for monarchy. It was, however, a republic, a republic whose wealth is that one should be able who could fairly hold the balance between oligarchy and republicanism, and an empire which could not lose and could not longer work under the arm of the oppressed powers. If any form of government is truly sublime effectual, and an enthroned, un-ambition could best meet their grievances. The senate had ruled with a rod of iron; the provinces could not possibly have existed in any form except government. Besides, monarchy was more congenial to the provincials than a republic which they could not comprehend.

2. Influence of Orient.—The Orient had long been used to living under imperial and absolute forms of government. The Roman conquests added to the new conquerors. Besides, residence in the Orient had affected Roman military leaders with the three after another. This was the only form possible to the old city-state system, and as yet federal governments had not been dreamed of. Another consideration: the vast and dissimilar masses of population living within the Roman dominions could more easily be held together or emasculated by a series of ever-changing administrations, just as the Austro-Hungarians and the British Empire are probably held together better under the present monarchies than would be possible under a republican system. This survey may make clear the whole of the Bible history, for all students of human history. The Roman empire was established indeed in the fulness of the times for its citizens and for Christianity.

II. Preparation of the Roman Empire for Christianity.—About the middle of the reign of Augustus a Jewish child was born who was destined to rule an empire more extensive and lasting than that of the Caesars. It is a striking fact that almost spontaneous planting of the whole Roman empire. Christianity appeared in the world. Although on a superficial glance the Roman empire may seem the greatest enemy of early Christianity, and at times a bitter persecutor, yet it was in many ways the greatest benefactor and in some ways the bulwark of Christianity. It ushered in politically the fulness of the times. The Caesars—whatever they may have been or done—prepared the way of the Lord. A brief account must here be given of some of the services which the Roman emperors rendered to humanity and esp. to the kingdom of God.

The first universal blessing conferred by the empire was the famous pax Romana ("Roman peace").

The world had not been at peace since the days of Alexander the Great. The quarrels of the Diadochi, and the aggression of the Roman republic had kept the nations in a state of constant turmoil. A universal peace was first established with the beginning of the reign of Augustus and the closing of the temple of Janus. In all the countries round the Mediterranean and from distant Britain to the Euphrates the world was at rest. Rome had made an end of her own civil war and had put an end to wars among the nations. Though her wars were often iniquitous and unjustifiable, and she conquered like a barbarian, she ruled her conquests like a humane statesman. The quarrels of the Diadochi which caused so much turmoil in the East were ended, the territory of the Lagids, Attalids, Seleucids and Antigonus having passed under the sway of Rome. The empire united Greeks, Romans and Jews all under one government. Rome thus blended the nations and made them all Roman. Now for the first time we may speak of the world as universal humanity, the orbis terrarum, ἡ οἰκουμένη, hé oikoumenê (Lk 2:1), the genus humannum. These terms represented humanity as living under a uniform system of government. All were members of one earthly state; the Roman empire was their communis omnium patria.

This state of affairs contributed largely to the spread of cosmopolitanism which had set in with the Macedonian conqueror. Under the empire all provincial barriers were removed; the great cities—Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, etc.—became meeting-places of all races and languages. The Romans were everywhere carrying their laws and civilization; Greeks settled in thousands at all important centers as professors, merchants, physicians, or orators;

Orientals were to be found in large numbers with their gods and mysteries in Rome, "the epitome of the world." In the Rom armies soldiers from all quarters of the empire became companions. And many thousands of slaves of fine education and high culture were driven among the new conquerors. Being in many cases far superior in culture to their masters, they became their teachers. And in every city of importance, East or West, large bodies of the Jewish Diaspora were settled.

This cosmopolitanism gave great impetus to a corresponding eclecticism of thought. Nothing could have been more favorable to 3. Ecclesiology. Christianity than this mixture of the various races and mutual exchange of thought. Each people discovered how much it had in common with its neighbors. From the days of the Diadochi, Stoicism had been preaching the gospel of a civic and ethical brotherhood of humanity. In the fusion of different philosophical systems the emphasis had shifted from the city-state or republic or national to the universal human point of view. All men were thus reduced to equality before the One; only virtue and vice were the differentiating factors. Men were akin with the Divine—at least the wise and good—so that one poor Stoic said, "The gods are all one.

Stoicism did a noble service in preparation for Christianity by preaching universalism along the path of individualism. It also furnished comfort and strength to countless thousands of weary human lives and ministered spiritual support and calm resignation at many a hearth desolated by death. It may be said that the system of religious thought—for it was a religion more than a philosophy—which made a serious study of the diseases of the human soul. We know of course its weaknesses and imperfections, that it was an aristocratic system appealing only to the elect of men, that it had a little message for the fallen and lower classes, that it was cold and stern, that it lacked—as Seneca felt—the inspiration of an ideal life. But with all its failings it proved a worthy pedagogue to a religion which brought a larger message than that of Greece. It afforded the spiritual and moral counterpart to the larger human society of which the Roman empire was the political and visible symbol. Hitherto a good citizen had been a good man. Now a good man is a good citizen, and that not of a narrow city-state, but of the world. Stoicism also proved the interpreter and mouthpiece to the Roman empire of the higher moral and spiritual qualities of Gr civilization. It gave the cosmopolitan and universal ideas of Greece, and the West. Those Jews bringing from the homeland the spiritual monotony of their race combined it with Gr philosophy which had been setting steadily for monothelism. With the Jews the exclusively national element was subordinated to the more universal, the ceremonial to the religious.

They even adopted the world-language of that day—Greek—and had their sacred Scriptures translated into this language in which they carried on an active proselytism. The Roman spirit was at first essentially national, and exclusive. But the Romans soon fell beneath the spell of this cosmopolitanism and eclecticism. As their conquests increased, their mind was correspondingly widened. They adopted the policy of Alexander—sparing the gods of the conquered and admitting them into the responsibility of guarding Rome, and them with their own Pantheon or identified them with Roman gods. In this way naturally the religious ideas of conquered races more highly civilized than the conquerors laid hold on Roman minds (see Dispersions).
Another inestimable service rendered to humanity and Christianity was the protection which the Rom power afforded the Gr civilization. We must remember that the Romans were at first only conquering barbarians who had little respect for culture, but idealized power already had wiped out two ancient and superior civilizations—that of Carthage without leaving a trace, and that of Etruria, traces of which have been discovered in modern times. It is hard to conceive what a vast change Rome did to the world she had not fallen under the influence of the superior culture and philosophy of Greece. Had the Rom Mars not been educated by Pallas Athene the Romans would have proved Vandals and Tartars in blotting out civilization and arresting human progress. The Greeks, on the other hand, could conquer more by their preeminence in everything that pertains to the intellectual life of man than they could hold by the sword. A practical and political power was needed to protect Gr speculation. But the Romans after causing much devastation were gradually educated and civilized and have contributed to the uplifting and enlightenment of subsequent civilizations by both preserving and opening to the world the wondrous heritage of Greece. The kinship of man with the Divine, learned from Socrates and Plato, went forth on its wide evange. This Gr civilization, philosophy and theology trained many of the great theologians and leaders of the Christian church. The Clement of Alexandria said that Gr philosophy and Jewish law had proved schoolmasters to bring the world to Christ. Paul, who prevented Christianity from remaining a Jewish sect and proclaimed its universalism, learned much from Gr—especially from Stoicism. He thought his mission to be a normal koiné or “common language.” By the conquests of Alexander and the Hellenistic sympathies of the Diadochi this common Gr language became the lingua franca of antiquity. Gr was known in Northern India, at the Parthian court, and on the distant shores of the Euxine (Black Sea). The native land of the gospel was surrounded on all sides by Gr civilization. Gr culture and language penetrated into the midst of the obstinate home-keeping Palestinian Jews. Though Gr was not the mother-tongue of our Lord, He understood Gr and apparently could speak it when occasion required—Aram. being the language of His heart and of His public teachings. The history of the Macabean struggle affords ample evidence of the extent to which Gr culture and words of the Gr language were familiar to the Jews. There were in later days Hellenistic bodies of devout Jews in Jerus itself. Gr was recognized by the Jews as the universal language: the inscription on the wall of the outer temple court found under the pavement stated that in Gr was the koinē. The language became the koinē language of religion—where a foreign tongue is least likely to be used—of the large Jewish Diaspora. They perceived the advantages of Gr as the language of commerce—the Jews’ occupation—of culture and of proselytizing. They threw open their sacred Scriptures in the LXX and other VSS to the Gr-Rom world, adapting the tr in many respects to the requirements of Gr Readers. The Gr Jews of Qumran and the Gr Yahweh was the Bible of one people: the Bible whose God was κύριος (κυρίος, “Lord”) was the Bible of humanity.” When the Romans came upon the scene, they found this language so widely known and so deeply rooted they could not hope to suppress it. The women in Sicily and Magna Graecia—to suppress Gr, but rather gladly accepted it as the one common means of intercourse among the peoples of their eastern dominions (see LANGUAGE OF THE NT).

Though Latin was of course the official language of the conquerors, the decrees of governors generally appeared with a Gr tr, so that they might be “understood of the people,” and Gr overcame Lat, as English drove out the French of the Norman invaders. Lat poets and historians more than once complained that Graecus crypto ferrum nemoris cepit (“conquered Greece vanquished its stern conqueror”). With the spread of Lat there were two world-languages side by side for the whole Rom empire, but Gr was prevailingly the language of the eastern half, the Rom empire, and soil for Christian churches and the first half of the empire to be Christianized. Later when Christianity was able to extend her activity to the West, she found Lat ready as the common means of intercourse. That Rome respected Gr is greatly to her credit and much to the advantage of Christianity. For Christianity, when it began to aim at universalism, dropped its native Aramic. The gospel in order to become a world-evangel was tr' into Gr. The early Christian missionaries apologetically inserted languages or potois of the Rom empire, but confined themselves to centers of Gr culture. Paul wrote in Gr to the church in Rome itself, of which Gr was the language. And while Christianity was spreading through the Gr East under the supervision of Rom administration, the Romans were Romanizing and leveling the West for Lat Christianity (see LATIN). In the West it may be noted that the first foothold of the Christian religion was in Gr—it was Latin in Gaul, Greek in Italy.

In material ways too Rome opened the way for Christianity by building the great highways for the gospel. The great system of roads that knit the then civilized world together served not only the legionaries and the imperial escorts, but were of equal service to the early missionaries, and when churches began to spring up over the empire, these roads greatly facilitated that church organization and brotherhood which strengthened the church to overcome the empire. With the dawn of the pax Romana all these roads became alive once more with a galaxy of caravans and traders. Commerce revived and was carried on under circumstances more favorable than any that obtained till the past century. Men exchanged not only material things, but also spiritual things. Many of these early traders and artisans were Christians, and while they bought and sold the things that perish, they did not lose an opportunity of spreading the gospel. For an empire which embraced the Mediterranean shores, the sea was an important means of intercommunication; and the Mediterranean routes were safer for commerce and travel at that period than during any previous one. POMPEY cleared the sea. The ships which pld in countless numbers from point to point of this great inland sea offered splendid advantages and opportunity for early Christian missionary enthusiasm.

The large measure of freedom permitted by Rom authorities to the religions of all nations greatly favored the growth of infant Christianity. The Rom empire was never in principle a persecutor with a permanent court of inquisition. Strange cults from the East and Egypt flourished in the capital, and except when they became a danger to public morality or to the peace of society they were allowed to exist at a distance from the eyes of the police. See below on non-Rom religions.

Further, the Rom empire afforded Christianity a material and outward symbol for its spiritual ambition. It enlarged the vision of the church. Only a citizen (Paul) of such a religion for all humanity. If the Rom Church sword could so conquer and unify the orbis terranum, the militant church should be provoked to attempt nothing less in the religious sphere. It is said by a supreme testimony to the early organizers of the new community, until the Christian church became the spiritual counterpart of the Rom empire. The Christians appropriated many a weapon from the arsenal of the might and learned from them aggressiveness, the value of thorough organization and of military methods.

Rom law in its origins was characterized by the narrowest exclusiveness, and the first formal Rom code was written by the Cisarians, yet their Romans here is as so many other respects improved upon what they had borrowed and become masters of jurisprudence in the antique world. As their empire and conceptions expanded, they remodelled their laws to accommodate all their subjects. One of the greatest boons conferred by Rome on the antique world was a uniform system of good laws—the source of much of our European jurisprudence. The Rom law played an equally important rôle with the Jewish in molding and disciplining for Christianity. It taught men to obey and to respect authority, and proved an effective leveling and civilizing power in the empire. The universal law of Rome was the pedagogue for the universal law of the gospel. See ROMAN LAW.

The Romans could offer their subjects good laws, uniform government and military protection, but not a satisfactory religion. A universal empire called for a universal religion, which Christianity alone could offer. Finally, not only by what Rome accomplished by what she was incapable of accomplishing, the way of the Lord was made ready and a people prepared for His coming. It was a terrible crisis in the civilization and religion of antiquity. The old national religions and systems of belief had proved unable to soothe the increasing imperious moral and spiritual demands of man's nature. A moral bankruptcy was imminent. The old Rom religion of abstract virtues had gone down in formalism; it was too cold for human hearts. Man could no longer find the field of his moral activity in the religion of the state; he was no longer merely an atom in society performing religious rites, not for his own soul, but for the good of the commonwealth. Personality had been slowly emerging, and the new schools of philosophy called man away from the state to seek peace with God in the solitude of his own soul first of all. But even the best of these schools found the crying need of a positive, not a negative religion, the need for a perfect ideal life as of use. Thus was felt the demand for a new revelation, for a fresh vision or knowledge of God. In earlier days men had believed that God had revealed Himself to primitive wise men or heroes of their race, and that subsequent generations must accept with faith what these earlier seers, who stood nearer God, as Cicero said, had been pleased to teach of the Divine. But soon this stock of knowledge became exhausted. Plato, after soaring to the highest point of poetic and philosophic thought about the Divine, admitted the need of a demon or an angel to tell us the secrets of eternity. With the early Rom empire began a period of tremendous religious unrest. Men tried philosophy, magic, astrology, foreign rites, to find a sure place of rest. This accounts for the rapid and extensive diffusion of those mysteries which promised to the initiated communion with God here, a “better hope” in death, and satisfied the craving for immortality beyond time. These were the more serious souls who would gladly accept the connotations of Jesus. Others, losing all faith in any form of religion, gave themselves up to blank despair and accepted Epicureanism with its gospel of annihilation and its carpe diem morals. This system had a terrible fascination for those who had lost themselves; it is presented in its most attractive form in the Letters of Lucretius, the Omar Khoziym of Latin literature. Others again, unable to find God, surrendered themselves to cheerless skepticism. The sore need of the new gospel of life and immortality will be borne in upon the mind of those who read the Gr and Rom religious anticipations. And even Seneca, who was almost a Christian in some respects, speaks of immortality as a "beautiful dream" (bellum somnium), though tribulation later gave a clearer vision of the city of God.” Servius Sulpicius, writing to Cicero a letter of consolation on the death of his much-missed Tullia, had only a sad “if” to offer about the future (Cic. Fam. iv.5). Nowhere does the unbelief and pessimism of pre-Christian days among the higher classes strike one more forcibly than the discussion recorded by Sallust (Bel. Cat. li f) as to the punishment of the Catilinarian conspirators. Caesar, who held the Rom high-priesthood and the highest authority on the religion of the state, proposes life imprisonment, as death would only bring annihilation and rest to these villains—no hereafter, no reward or punishment (eam cuncta mortalium mala dissolvunt; ultra neque curae neque gaudii necem esse). He next speaks of the religious man of his generation—in terms which cast but reprove upon Caesar’s Epicureanism and materialism (ib. 62). Cicero (In Cat. iv.4) is content to leave immortality an open question. The philosophy of pre-Christian days was a prelude to the discussion recorded by Sallust (Bel. Cat. li f) as the attitude of the educated classes of the Gr-Rom world at the dawn of Christianity, though it cannot be denied that there was also a strong desire for continued existence. The other classes were either perfunctorily performing the rites of a dead national religion or were seeking, some, excitement or aesthetic worship or even scope for their baser passions, some, peace and promise for the future, in the eastern mysteries. The distinction between moral and physical evil was coming to the surface, and hence a consciousness of sin. Religion and ethics had not yet been united. “The throne of the human mind” was declared vacant, and Christianity was at hand as the best claimant. In fact, the Gr-Rom mind had been expanding to receive the pure teachings of Jesus.

III. Attitude of the Roman Empire to Religions.—The history of Rom religion reveals a continuous penetration of Italian, Etruscan, Gr, Egyptian, and oriental religions, until the old Rom religion became almost unrecognizable, and even the antiquarian learning of a Varro could scarcely discover the original meaning or use of

The Roman Empire

The Roman empire, as a political and religious entity, was one of the most significant in history. It expanded rapidly and became a powerful force in the Mediterranean world. The empire's influence was felt throughout the known world, and its legacy can still be seen today.

The Roman religion was polytheistic, meaning it had many gods and goddesses. The Romans believed in a pantheon of gods and goddesses, each with their own domain and responsibilities. These deities were associated with various aspects of life, such as war, love, and agriculture.

The Roman religion was also syncretic, meaning it incorporated elements from other religions. The Romans were known for their tolerance of other religions, and many foreign gods and goddesses were accepted into the Roman pantheon.

The Roman religion had a significant impact on the development of Christianity. The principles of Christianity, such as the idea of a single god, a savior, and salvation, were influenced by the Roman religion. The Roman empire's decline and fall also contributed to the spread of Christianity, as many people sought a new religion to replace the corrupt and decadent Roman religion.

In summary, the Roman religion was a crucial aspect of Roman culture and played a significant role in the development of Christianity. Its legacy can still be seen in modern-day religious practices and beliefs.

tianity were aiming at a social organization to embrace the genus humanum. But though these two empires were so alike in several points and the one had done so much to prepare the way for the other, yet the contrast was too great to allow conciliation. The Jews had so far disintegrated themselves that it aimed at universalism along the path of individualism—giving new value to human personality.

(b) Unique claims of Christianity: It seemed also to provoke Rom pride by its absurd claims. It preached that the world was to be destroyed by fire to make way for a new heaven and new earth, that the Eternal City (Rome) was doomed to fall, that a king would come from heaven whom Christians were to obey, that amid the coming desolations the Christians should remain tranquil.

(c) Novelty of Christianity: Again after Christianity came from underneath the aegis of Judaism, it must have taken the government somewhat by surprise as a new and unlicensed religion which had grown strong under a misnomer. It was the newest and latest religion of the empire; it came Occidental, as it was, where the stage was not. It was not apparent to the Rom mind that Christianity had been spreading for a generation under the tolerance granted to Judaism (sub umbraclu licitae), and the thought in which the Jews were "protected by its antiquity," as Tacitus said. The Romans were of a conservative nature and disliked innovations. The greatest statesman of the Augustan era, Maecenas, advised the emperor to extend no tolerance to new religions as "subversive of monarchy" (Dio Cassius lli.36). A new faith appearing suddenly with a large clientele might be dangerous to the public peace (multilatu ingenii; Tac. Ann. xvi.44; ἀννο διδόμεν Κελλιμ. Rom.; Cor I 6).

(d) Intolerance and exclusiveness of Christian religion and society: the marked way the new faith was to react against the tolerant eclec spirit of the empire—the intolerance and absoluteness of their religion and the exclusiveness of their society. All other religions of the empire admitted compromise and eclecticisms, were willing to dwell rather on the points of contact with their neighbors than on the contrast. But Christianity admitted no compromise, was intolerant to all other systems, must be admitted that in this way it was rather unfair to other cults which offered comfort and spiritual support to thousands. The Christians disdained the society of Christianity. But we shall not blame, when we recognize that for their own life and purpose, they felt it necessary to show itself at first intolerant. Many heathen would gladly accept Christ along with Mithra and Isis and Ceres and all the other deities. But Christianity demanded separation. The Jesus cults could tolerate no rival; it claimed exclusiveness and absoluteness. It was driven from the world. The Christian church was absolute in its demands; it would not rank with, but above, all worship. This was the day of Christ so far as concerns the day which enabled rival cults to co-exist with the greatest indifference. Add to this the exclusive state of Christian society. No piues heathen who had purified his soul by asceticism and the sacraments of antiquity could be admitted into membership unless he renounced things dear to him and of some spiritual value. In every detail of public life this exclusive spirit made itself felt. Christians met at night and held secret assemblies in which they were reputed to perpetrate the most scandalous crimes. Theseytism indicates the conditions of incest, child murder, were among the charges provoked by their exclusiveness.

(e) Obstinacy: Add to this also the sullen obstinacy with which Christians met the demands of imperial power—a feature very offensive to Rom governors. Their religion would be left them undisturbed if they would only render formal obedience to the religion of the state. Rome was lax and flexible before Christian obstinacy. The martyr's courage appeared as sheer fanaticism. The pious Aurelius refers but once to Christianity, and in the words μὴ παρατηρεῖ, πατὶ παρανοίαν, "sheer obstinacy," and Aristides apparently refers to it as a "false religion, absurdities, stubbornness." See Persecutions, 18.

(f) Aggressiveness against pagan faith: But the Christians were not content with an uncompromising withdrawal from the practices of heathen worship: they also actively assailed the pagan cults. To the Christians they became doctrines of demons.
The imperial cult and worship of the Genius of the emperor were very unholy in their sight. Hence they will consider the charges of disloyalty to the emperor and might be proved guilty of majestas. They held in contempt the doctrine that the greatness of Rome was due to her reverence for the gods; the Christians were atheists from the pagan point of view. And as religion was a political concern for the welfare of the state, atheism was likely to call down the wrath of divinity to the subversion of the state.

(g) Christians ad bonos: Very soon when disasters began to fall thickly upon the Roman empire, the blame was laid upon the Christians. In early days Rome had often sought to appease the gods by introducing external cults; at other times oriental cults were expelled in the interests of public morality. Now in times of disaster Christians became the scapegoats. If famine, drought, pestilence, earthquake or any other public calamity threatened, the cry was raised “the Christians to the lions!” (see Nero; Persecutions, 12). This view of Christianity as subversive of the empire survived the fall of Rome before Alaric. The heathen forgot—as the apologists showed—that Rome had been visited by the greatest calamities before the Christian era and that the Christians were the most self-sacrificing in periods of public distress, lending succor to pagan and Christian alike.

(b) Odium generis humani: All prejudices against Christianity were summed up in odium generis humani, “hatred for the human race” or society, which was reciprocated by “hatred of the human race toward them.” The Christians were bitterly hated, not only by the populace, but by the upper educated classes. Most of the early adherents belonged to the slave, freedman and artisan classes; “not many wise, not many noble.” Few were Rom citizens. We have mentioned the crimes which popular prejudice attributed to this hated sect. They were in mockery styled Christiani by the Antiochians (a name which they at first rejected), and Nazarenes by the Jews. No nicknames were too vile to attach to them—Aristaeus (the sect that worshipped the ass’s head), Sarmentici or Semazit. Roman writers cannot find epithets strong enough. Tacitus reckons the Christian faith among the “atrocious and abominable things” (atrocia aut pudenda) which doomed Rome, and further designates it superstes sub exitibus (“baneful superstition,” Ann. xvi 44), Suetonius (Ner. 16) as novel and malefic (novus ac maleficus), and the gentle Pliny (Ep. 97) as vile and indecent (prava immodica). Well might Justus say the Christians were “hated and reviled by the whole human race.” This opprobrium was accentuated by the attacks of philosophy upon Christianity. When the attention of philosophers was drawn to the new religion, it was only to scorn it. This attitude of heathen philosophy is best understood in reading Celsus and the Christian apologists. It was maintained that Celsus, a Graeco-Roman, was the last to enter the kingdom of God. When later Christianity had established itself as a permanent force in human thought, philosophy designed to consider its claims. But it was too late; the new faith was already on the offensive. Philosophy discovered its own weakness and began to reform itself by aiming at being both a philosophy and a religion. This is particularly the case in Platonicism (in Plotinus) in which reason breaks down before revelation and mysticism. Another force disturbing the peace of the Christian church was the enemy within the fold. Large numbers of heathen had entered the ecclesia bringing with them their oriental or Gr ideas, just as Jewish Christians brought their Judaism with them. This led to grave heresies, each system of thought distorting in its own way the orthodox faith. Later another party joined the forces against Christianity—reformed paganism led by an injured priesthood. At first the cause of Christianity was greatly aided by the fact that there was no exclusive and jealous priesthood at the head of the Gr-Rom religion, as in the Jewish and oriental religions. There was thus no dogma and no class interested in maintaining a dogma. Religious persecution is invariably instituted by the priesthood, but in the Rom world it was not till late in the day when the temples and sacrifices were falling into desuetude that we find a priesthood as a body in opposition. Thus the Rom imperial power stood not alone in antagonism to Christianity, but was abetted and often provoked to action by (a) popular hate, (b) philosophy, (c) pagan priesthood, (d) heresies within the church.

IV. Relations between the Roman Empire and Christianity. We have here to explain how the attitude of the Rom empire, at first friendly or indifferent, developed into one of fierce conflict, the different stages in the policy—if we can speak of any uniform policy—of the Rom government toward Christianity, the charges or mode of procedure on which Christians were condemned, and when and how the profession of Christianity was again made a crime in the Rom empire progressively weakening and Christianity gaining ground. For the sake of clearness we shall divide the Rom empire into six periods, the first from the commencement of the Christian era till the last of the Julio-Claudian dynasty.

At first the presence of the Christian faith was unknown to Rom authorities. It appeared first merely as a reformed and more spiritual Judaism; its earliest preachers were expelled from the synagogue severing from the synagogue. Christiani were only another of the Jewish sects to which a Jew might belong while adhering to Mosaic and Judaist. But soon this friendly relation became strained on account of the expanding views of some of the Christian preachers, and from the introduction of gentile proselytes. The first persecutions for the infant church came entirely from Jewish Christians, and it was the Jews who first accused Christians before the Rom courts. Even so, the Rom government not only refused to turn persecutor, but even protected the new faith both against Jewish accusations and against the violence of the populace (Acts 21 31). And the Christian missionaries recognized in the Rom empire an ally and a power for good. Writing to the Romans Paul counsels them to submit in obedience to the powers that be, as "ordained of God." His favorable impression must have been greatly enhanced by his mild captivity at Rome and his friendly relations with the procurator. The latter had come to his rescue in Jesus to save his life from the fanaticism of his own coreligionists. The Romans persist in looking upon Christians as a sect of delirous Jews on the first opportunity, in formulating a charge of disloyalty (begun before Pilate) against the new sect as acting "contrary to the decrees of Caesar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus" (Acts 17, 7; cf. 25, 8). Christianity was disowned thus early by Judaism and cast upon its own resources. The increasing numbers of Christians would confirm to the Roman government the independence of Christianity. And the trial of a Roman citizen, Paul, at Rome would further establish the sect as a distinct people.

The first heathen persecution of Christianity resulted from no definite policy, no apprehension of danger to the body politic, and no definite charges, but from an accidental spark which kindled the conflagration. This was due to this fact: no emperor had taken much notice of Christianity. It was only in the middle of the reign of Augustus that Jesus was born. In the reign of Tiberius, belonging to Jesus' public ministry, crucifixion and resur- rection of Christ is closed too. (37 AD) He allows no participation to the new faith, though this emperor was credited with proposing to the senate a decree to receive Christ into the Roman pantheon—a legend of course. Under the brief principate of the mad Gaius (37-41 AD) the "new way" was not yet divorced from the parent faith. Gaius caused a diversion in favor of the Christians by his persecution of the Jews and the command to set up his own statue in the temple. In the next reign (Claudius, 41-54 AD) the Jews were again harshly treated, and thousands were banished from Rome (Judaeos impulsa cronte assidue tumultuantres Roma expulit; Suet. Claud., 25). Some would see in this an action against the Christians by interpretation of similar persecutions in Roman history and by a. "new way" of Christians in the reign of Vespasian, in consequence of which some Christians were banished as Jews, but Dio Cassius (l,6) implies that it was a police regulation to restrain the spread of Jewish worship. It was in the reign of Nero, after the fire of 64 AD, that the first hostile step was taken by the government against the Christians, earliest account of which is given by Tacitus (Ann. xv.44). Nero's reckless career had given rise to the rumor that he was the incendiary, to see the burning of the city bathed in order to rebuild it on more magnificent plans. See Nero. Though he did everything possible to arrest the flames, even exposing his own life, took every means of alleviating the destitution of the sufferers, and ordered such religious rites as might appease the wrath of the gods, the suspicion still clung to him.

"Accordingly in order to dissuade the rumor, he put forward as guilty [suidbid reo] and inflicted the most cruel punishments for the abominations [Augita] and called Christians by the populace. The originator of that name, Christus, had been put to death by the procurator Pontius Pilatus in the reign of Tiberius, and the baneful superstition [eritribis superstition] put down for the time being brook'd out again, not only throughout Judaea, the home of this evil, but also in the City [Rome] where all atrocious and shameful [gea] things were committed. Those therefore who confessed [i.e. being Christians] were first arrested, and then by the information gained from them a large number [multido ingens] were implicated [conuiciat] in the MS reading, not convicti, not so much on the charge of inciting the sedition of mankind [ado humani generis]. The victims perished by various and monstrous tortures here unknown. The skins of wild beasts were torn to pieces by dogs; others impaled on crosses in order to set on fire to afford light after death. How again, [after these cruelties] commiseration began to be felt for those thus guilty, though they were criminals, is well known. The worst penalties [quamquam adversus sectes et nostros exemplum merito], for men felt their destruction was not undeserved. But from consideration of the sect's moral character, its cruelty of one person [Nero]."

This passage supplies the earliest classical account of the crucifixion and the only mention of Pilate in a heathen author—offers some difficulties which require to be balanced at. It is held by some who have no faith in himself by writing sudditus rea at the beginning and sectes at the end, but the latter is another derivation. Another derivative from the point of view of the populace and deserving severe punishment for other supposed augmentations. Tacitus regards the Christians as innocent, though he had not the slightest kindly feeling towards them. Qui infidebantur means "those who confessed to being Christians," though Arnold argues that "confessers" were the word for profes- sors of a religion. But this would contradict both the sense and other evidence of the context. For the word confessus, meaning "confessed to arson," therefore the whole body of Christians should have been arrested, and, further, this would have been supported by the evidence not the case according to Tacitus. Some Christians were boldly asserting their religion, or they were taken in Bitinia, recanted before tribulation. By indicio curum Ramsay (Christianity in the Roman Empire, 233) understands that the information of the i.e. from information gathered by the inquisitors in the house of the procurator. This information implicated a large number of others, hence Pilate prefers the MS reading confesuit to the correction confesus. It is a good order to explain the difficulty by raising, viz. that the noblest Christians who boldly confessed their Christianity would suffer first, and so on. But it is not impossible that some of these bold spirits did condescend to give the names of their coreligionists to the Roman procurator. Hence Harkness and O. J. and Rom. Government, 67 prefers the more usual rendering in indicio curum, "by information." This may have occurred either (1) through torture, or (2) for promised immunity, or (3) on account of local jealousies. The early Christian communities were not perfect; party strife often ran high as at Corinth. And in a church like that of Rome composed of Jewish and pagan elements and undoubtedly more cosmopolitan than Corinth, a bitter sectarian spirit is easy to understand. This is a probable explanation more strength, and rendered almost certain by the words of Clement of Rome, who, writing to the church at Corinth (1 st Chr. 51), demands that they be consorted with the church at Rome only a generation after the persecution, and thus familiar with the internal history of the Roman empire, twice assures the Corinthians of his own and a. "new way" of the "multido ingens" of the Roman Christians suffered his severities (dixit aliquis qui cruento). The most natural and obvious explanation is "mutual or sectarian jealousy."

But those who do not like this fact explain it as the jealousy of the Jews, which was more easily refuted, for had it been the jealousy of the Jews Clement would not have hesitated one moment to assert as much. Those who are familiar with the literature of that age know that the Christians were none too sensitive toward Jewish feelings. But the very fact that it was not the Jews made Clement rather modestly omit details the memory of which was probably still bearing fruit, even in his day. Once more com- mended, usually rendered, "arrested," is taken by Hardy as "put under their trial." One argues that this is more in accordance with the Tacic usage. A. "huge multitude" need not cause us to distracT. It is a relative term. It was a considerable number to be so inhumanly butchered. There is some hesitation as to whether the term multis in T. is objective or subjective and in the first case the hatred of the Christians toward the human race" or hatred of the human race toward the Christians. Grammatically, of course it may be the former, but the latter is the form more or less familiar with the origin of the Christian party. Also Poppaea was at this time mistress of Nero's affections and sufficiently influential with him to stay the cruel persecution against those whom she had a leaning and who claimed her as a protégée. Again, the Jewish faith was certe licita and a recognized worship of the empire.

The next question is, Why were the Christians alone selected for persecution? That they were so singled out we know, but exactly for what reason is hard to say with certainty. A number of reasons no doubt contributed. (1) Farrar (Early Days, etc.) says "in the proselytism of Poppaea, guided by Jewish malice, the only adequate explanation of the first Christian persecution," and Lightfoot is of the same opinion, but this by itself is inadequate, though the Jews would be glad of an opportunity of taking revenge on their aggressive opponents. (2) Christians had already become in the eyes of the Roman authorities a distinct sect, either from the reports of the eastern provincial governors, where Christianity was making most headway, or from the attention attracted by Paul's first trial. They were thus the newest religious sect, and as such would serve as victims to appease deity and the populace. (3) Even if ingens multitudo be rhetorical, the Christians were no doubt considered a Roman pest in Rome, and active proselytism made their numbers even more formidable. (4) They were uncompromising in their expression of their beliefs; they looked for a consummation of the earth by fire and were also eagerly expecting the thousand years of their kingdom to constitute society. These tenets together with their calm faith amid the despair of others would easily cast suspicion upon them. (5) For whatever reason, they had earned the opprobrium of the populace. The hatred for their faith was passed over to hatred for the Christians" (Mommsen). A people whom the populace so detested must have fallen under the surveillance of the city police administration. (6) A large proportion of the Christian community at Rome would be non-Rom and so deserve no recognition of Roman privileges. These reasons together may or may not explain the singling-out of the Christians. At any rate they were chosen as scapegoats to serve Nero and his minion Tigellinus. The origin of the first persecution was thus purely accidental, in order to remove suspicion from Nero. It was not owing to any already formulated policy, neither through apprehension of any danger to the state, nor because the Christians were guilty of any crimes, though it gave an opportunity of investigation and accumulation of evidence. But accidental as this persecution was in origin, its consequences were of far-reaching importance. There are three principal views as to the date of the policy of proscription of the new faith by the Roman government: (1) the old view that persecution for the name, i.e. for the mere profession of Christianity, began under Trajan in 112 AD—a view now almost universally abandoned; (2) that of Ramsay (Christianity in the Roman Empire, 242 ff, and three arts. in Expos, 1893), who holds that the development from punishment for definite crimes (flagitia) to proscription “for the name” took place between 68 and 96 AD, and (3) that of Hardy (Christianity and the Roman Government, 77), Mommsen (Expos, 1893, 1–7) and Soden (ibid., 1895, 1–7) and adopted by the writer of this article—that the trial of the Christians under Nero resulted in the declaration of the mere profession of Christianity as a crime punishable by death. Tacitus apparently represents the persecution of the Christians as accidental and isolated and of brief duration (i.e.), while Suetonius (Ner. 16) mentions the punishment of Christians in a list of permanent police regulations for the maintenance of good order, into which it would be inconsistent to introduce an isolated case of procedure against the “baneful superstition” (Ramsay, op. cit., p. 230). But these two accounts are not contradictory. Tacitus giving the initial stage and Suetonius “a brief statement of the punishment of a principle into which Nero’s action ultimately resolved itself” (ib, 232). Nero’s police administration, then, pursued as a permanent policy what was begun merely to avert suspicion from Nero. But as yet, according to Ramsay, Christians were not condemned as Christians, but on account of certain flagitia to apprehending the profession and because the Roman police authorities had learned enough about the Christians to regard them as hostile to society. A trial must still be held and condemnation proclaimed. Nero’s act was no more but of serious offences naturally connected with the name,” viz., first incendiarism, which broke down, and secondly hostility to civilized society and charges of magic. The others agree so far with Ramsay as describing the first stages, but assert that adum humanum generis was not of the nature of a definite charge, but dissimulation to the social and political arrangements of the empire. At the outset a trial was needed, but soon as a consequence of this many of the Christians were recognized as a society whose principle might be summarized as adum generis humani.” A trial became unnecessary; the religion itself involved the crimes, and as a religion it was henceforth preserved and permitted. While their punishment was left to the police administration which could step in at any time with severe measures or remain remiss, according as exigencies demanded. Christianity was henceforth a religio liciter. The Roman government was never a systematic persecutor. The persecution or non-persecution of Christianity depended henceforth on the mood of the reigning emperor, the character of his administration, the activity of provincial governors, the state of popular feeling against the new faith, and other local circumstances. There is no early evidence that the Neronian persecution extended beyond Rome, though of course the “example set by the emperor necessarily guided the action of all Roman officials.” The stormy close of Nero’s reign and the tumultuous days till the accession of Vespasian created a diversion in favor of Christianity. Orosius (Hist. vii.7) is too late an authority for a general persecution (per omnes provincias pari persecutione excitata imperator op. [sic] stirpere conatus . . . ). Besides, Paul, after his acquittal seems to have prosecuted his missionary activity without any extraordinary hindrances, till he came to Rome the second time. This Neronian persecution is important for the history of Christianity: Nero commenced the principle of persecuting Christians, and thus made a precedent for future rulers. Trouble first began in the world-capital; the next stage will be found in the East; and another in Africa and the West. But this was only local. Nero was the first of the Roman persecutors who, like Herod Agrippa, came to a miserable end—a fact much dwelt upon by Lacinius and other Christian writers.

In the Flavian period no uniform imperial policy against Christianity was developed. According to Ramsay the Flavius developed the practice set by Nero from punishment of Christians for definite crimes to proscription of the name. But, as we have seen, the Neronian persecution set the future attitude of the Roman state toward the new faith. The Flavius could not avoid following the precedent set by Nero. Christianity was spreading—esp. in the East and at Rome. We have no account of any persecution under Vespasian (though Hillary erroneously speaks of him as a persecutor along with Nero and Decius) and Titus, but it does not follow that none such took place. As the whole matter was left to the police administration, severity would be spasmodic and called for circumstances. The fate of Jesus must have had profound influence both on Judaism and on Christianity. For the former it did what the fall of Rome under Goths, Vandals, and Germans did for the old Roman religion—it weakened the idea of a national God bound up with a political religion. The clef between Judaism and its rival would now become greater. Christianity was relieved from the overpowering influence of a national center, and those Jews who now recognized the futility of political dreams would more readily join the Christian faith. Not only the distinction but the opposition and hostility would now be more apparent to outsiders, though Vespasian imposed the poll-tax on Jewish Christians and Jews alike. No memory of harshness against Christianity under Vespasian has survived. Ramsay (op. cit., 257) would interpret a mutilated passage of Suetonius (Vesp. 15) as implying Vespasian's reluctance to carry out justa supplicia against Christians.

Titus, "the darling of the human race," is not mentioned as his successor of Judaism and Christianity as stated in the council of war before Jesus in 70 AD and recorded by Sulpicius Severus (Chron. ii.30, 6) is interesting as an approval of the policy adopted by Nero. Severus' authority is undoubtedly only Probabilis (Burmans and Monmonier). The authenticity of the speech as contradicting the account of Jos has been impugned; at any rate it represents the point of view of Tacitus. Titus then advocates the destruction of the Temple in order that the religion of the Jews and the Christians may be more thoroughly exterminated (quo plenius Judaeorum et Christianorum religio tolleretur), since these religions though opposed to each other were of the same origin, the Christians having sprung from the Jews. If the root was removed the stem would readily perish (radix subulta, stirpem facile perituram). We know, however, of no active measures of Titus against either party, his short reign perhaps allowing no time for it.

It is Domitian who stands out prominently as the persecutor of this period, as Nero of the first period. His procedure against Christians was not an isolated act, but part of a general policy under which he was more or less defending this very ancient principles. He attempted to reform morals, suppress luxury and vice, banish immoral oriental rites, actors, astrologers and philosophers. It was in his attempt to revive the national religion that he came in conflict with the universal religion. His own cousin, Flavius Clemens, was condemned apparently for Christianity (atheism), and his wife, Domitilla, was banished. The profession of Christianity was not sufficient for the condemnation of Rom citizens of high standing; hence the charges of atheism or majestas were put forward. Refusal to comply with the religion of the national gods could be brought under the latter. But for ordinary Rom citizens and for provincials the profession of Christianity merited death. No definite edict or general proscription was enacted; only the principle instituted by Nero was allowed to be carried out. There was, as Mommers remarks, a standing proscription of Christians as of brigands, but harsh persecution with this exception on the caprice or character of provincial governors. Domitian took one definite step against Christianity in establishing an easy test by which to detect those who were Christians and so facilitate inquiries. This test was the demand to worship the Genius of the emperor. This too was only part of Domitian's general policy of asserting his own dominus et deus title and emphasizing the imperial cult as a bond of political union. The Apocalypse reflects the sufferings of the church in this reign.

(1) Nerva and Trajan. On the death of Domitian peace was restored to the Christian church which lasted throughout the brief reign of Nerva (96–98) and the first 13 years of the Antonine Period, 96–192 AD (see Nerva, Trajan, Marcus Aurelius, and Dioecletian) were harsh to the Christians, while some of the worst (as Commodus, Caracalla, Helogabalus) left them in peace (see Persecution, 17). Christianity had been rapidly spreading as it became governor of Bithynia in 111 AD and found, esp. in the eastern part of his province, the temples almost deserted. Some Christians were brought before him and on established precedents were ordered to be executed for their religion. But Pliny soon discovered that many of both sexes and all ages, provincials and Rom citizens, were involved. The Roman citizens he sent to Rome for trial; but being of a humane disposition he shrank from carrying out the wholesale execution required by a consistent policy.

He wrote to Trajan telling him what he had already done, rather covertly suggesting tolerant measures. Should no distinction be made between old and young? Should pardons be extended to provincials, who worshiped the emperor's image and cursed Christ? Should mere profession (deaum spars) be a capital offence if no crimes could be proven, or should the crimes rather be punished that were associated with the faith (si quid dea plurima nomen?...). He explained his procedure: he gave those who were accused an abundant opportunity to renounce their faith; and if this were not done, their faith was executed. He considered their "stubbornness and inflexible obstinacy" (pertinacia corte et obduratam, etc.) as his justification for punitive measures. But the administration having once interfered found plenty to do. An anonymous list of many names was handed in, most of whom, however, denied being Christians. Informers then put forward others who likewise denied belonging to the faith. Pliny was convinced their meetings were harmless, and on examination of two deaconesses under torture discovered nothing but a perverse extravagant superstition (sup. parr. immolament). Trajan replied that no universal and final rule could be laid down for testing the correctness of Pliny's action and perhaps disapproving him not yielding to tolerance in various situations. Nevertheless, the emperor made three important concessions: (1) the Christians were not to be sought out by the police authorities, but to be suspected and convicted they must be punished; (2) anonymous accusations of superstition are not to be acted up, even those suspected of fuga in the past were to be pardoned on proving they were not Christians or on renouncing their Christianity; Some of the friends of Trajan as the first official and legal authorization to persecute Christianity, but we have already seen that Christianity as such was proscribed as a result of the Neronian investigations. Besides, there is not the slightest trace of any new principle of severity, either in the letters of Pliny or in the rescript of Trajan. The persecution of Christianity had been "permanent," like the edicts of highwaymen, but not systematic or general. Neither was Trajan's rescript an edict of toleration, though on the whole it was favorable to the Christians in minimizing the dangers to which they were exposed. The question was as yet purely one of administration.

Trajan initiated no procedure against Christians—in fact rather discouraged any, asking his lieutenants to deal leniently with those suspected. It resulted in the hope of obtaining milder treatment for the Christians by putting in question form what he really wished to be approved. Trajan's rescript marks the end of the old system of uncompro- mising hostility and persecution. It had been a period of toleration for the Christians. He was no bigot, but tolerant and eclectical, inquiring into all religions and initiated into several mysteries and willing to leave religion an open question. In Asia, where Christianity was making most progress, a state of terrorism was imminent if delatores were encouraged against Christians making a profession of delatio (giving information). As we saw in the last chapter, Pliny, every non-Christian was accused, and any Christian found guilty was threatened by these informers in order to secure a bribe for proceeding no farther. Licinius Silvanus Graianus, like Pliny, found himself involved in difficulties and wrote to Hadrian for advice. Hadrian determined to send a rescript to all the proconsuls in Asia, and to some extent to provide protection against proceedings of any sort against Christians, by the law against the Jews. In the rescript, Antinianus, Hadrian's successor, Minucius Fundanus, the proconsul of Asia, about 124 AD. The genuineness of this important document, though impugned by Overbeck, Keim and Lipsius, is vouched for by Monnensen, Hardy, Lightfoot and Ramsay. Indeed, it is more easily accounted for as authentic than as a forgery, for who but the broad-minded Hadrian could have written such a rescript? Apparently the questions put by the proconsul must have been of a similar nature to those raised by Pliny. The aim of Hadrian is a decided step in favor of Christianity and goes beyond that of Trajan: (1) information is not to be passed over (a) lest the innocent suffer (as was the case under Pliny), and (b) lest informers should make a trade of lodging accusations; (2) protection is granted to Christians when accused, that the accused have committed something illegal; (3) mere petitions and acclamations against the Christians are not to be admitted; (4) a prosecutor on failing to make good his case is to be punished. These terms would greatly increase the risk for informers and lessen the dangers for Christians. That the name is a crime is not admitted, neither is this established principle rescinded. It is quite possible that Hadrian's rescript "gave a certain status to the employment of the more definite and regular legal procedure."

(3) Antoninus Pius (138-61).—The liberal policy of Trajan and Hadrian was continued by Antoninus, though persecution occurred in his reign in which Ptolemaeus and Lucina were executed at Rome and Polycarp at Smyrna. But he decidedly confirmed Hadrian's policy of protecting the Christians uncondemned against mob violence in his letters to Larisaeus, Athens, Theassalonica and to "all the churches," in which he states that the Church was in advance of public feeling," and so was disregarded.

Anonymous delation was also repressed. (4) Marcus Aurelius (161-80).—Under Aurelius a strong reaction set in affecting the Christians, caused partly by the persecution in the public buildings and partly by Aurelius' policy of returning to ancient principles and reviving the Roman national religion. In this reign we find persecution extending to the West (Gaul) and to Africa—a step toward the general persecutions of the next century. Though no actual change was made by Aurelius, the lassitude of the last three reigns is evident. No general edict or definite rescript of persecution was issued; the numerous martyrs recorded in this reign are partly due to the fact that the rise of Christianity and the Schism of Constantine and the persecution of the Emperors of the East. Christianity in itself still constituted a crime, and the obstinacy (paradoxit, paradixis) of Christians in itself deserved punishment. Aurelius seems to have actually rebuked the severity of the Roman government at Aquileia and to have further discouraged the trade of informers against Christians. Tertullian actually styles him as debellator Christianorum ("protector of Christians"). We find as yet therefore no systematic or serious attempt to extirpate the new faith. The central motive was the want of all time without a permanent or steady policy toward the Christians. It had not yet made up its mind" (Hardy).

Under the rule of Commodus (180-92) Christians again enjoyed a respite. The net result of the collisions between the new faith and the government in this period is somewhat differently estimated by Ramsay and by Lightfoot ("Christianity in the Empire, i. f") that Ramsay "has to some extent anticipated the existence of anything approaching a persecution," due to antedating the time when Christianity was regarded as a serious political danger. Hardy thinks that the Christian organization was not more than an abstract danger during the first two centuries. Hadrian took the view that its organization was a real danger and an imperium in imperio, she must have started a systematic exterminating policy during a period when Christianity could have least withstood it. When the empire did—as in the last days of the 3rd cent.—spread the first rash measures, the most general measures, Christianity was already too strong to be harmed, and we shall find the empire henceforth only networked around and warning off.

In the next period the insecurity of the throne, when in less than 100 years about a score of candidates were the purple and almost each new emperor began a new dynasty, enabled Christianity to spread practically untroubled. Further divisions in its favor were created by those fierce barbarian wars and by the necessity of renewed vigilance at the frontier posts. The Christians' aloofness from political strife and their acquiescence in each new dynasty brought them generally into agreement with the government. Further, the fact that many of these emperors were non-Rom provincials, or foreigners who had no special attachment to the old Roman faith, and were ecclesiastical in their religious views, was of much importance to the new eastern faith. Moreover, some of the emperors proved not only not hostile to Christianity, but positively friendly. In this period we find no severe (except perhaps that of Decius) and certainly no protracted persecution. The Christian Church herself was by the principle of the imperial government, and made herself thus strong and united, so that when the storm did come she remained unshaken. In 202 Severus started a cruel persecution in Africa and Egypt, but peace was restored by the savage Caracalla (lactio Christiano educatus: Tert.). Heligabalus assisted Christianity indirectly (1) by the degradation of Roman religion, and (2) by tolerance. According to one writer he proposed to fuse Christianity, Judaism, Buddhism, and Zoroastrianism into one religion. Alexander Severus was equally tolerant and syncretic, setting up in his private chapel images of Orpheus, Apollo, Moses, Abraham, and Christ, and engraving the golden rule on his palace walls and publishing letters to the public on the intention of erecting a temple to Christ. Local persecution broke out under Maximin the Thracian. The first general persecution was that of Decius, in which two features deserve notice: (1) that death was not the immediate result of Christian profession, but every means was employed to induce Christians to recant; (2) Roman authorities already cognizant of the dangers of Christian organization directed their efforts esp. against the officers of the church. Gallus continued this policy, and Valerian, after first stopping persecution, tried to check the spread of the worship by banishing bishops and closing churches, and later enacted the death penalty. Gallienus promulgated what was virtually the first edict of toleration, forbade persecution and restored the Christians to public employment. Christianity now entered upon a period of 40 years' tranquillity: as outward dangers decreased, less desirable converts came within her gates and her adherents were taken in a flood of worldliness, stayed only by the perils of the province. Like some other persecutors, Diocletian was one of the ablest Roman rulers. He was not disposed to proceed against the Christians, but was finally driven to harsh measures by his son-in-law Galerius. The first edict, February 21, 303, was not intended to exterminate Christianity, but to check its growth and weaken its political influence, and was directed principally against. Bibbes, Christian assemblies and churches. The second was against church organization. A decree was granted freedom to those who recanted, but sought to compel the submission of recalcitrants by tortures — a partial confession of failure on the part of the imperial government. Persecution was avoided and the death penalty omitted. But a fourth edict issued by Maximin prescribed the death penalty and required the act of sacrifice to the gods. In the same year (304) Diocletian, convinced of the uselessness of these measures, stayed the death penalty. The change of policy on the part of the emperor and his abdication next year were virtually a confession that the Galilean had conquered. After the persecution had raged 8 years (or 10, if we include local persecutions after 311), Galerius, overthrown by a loathsome disease, issued from Nicomedia with Constantine and Licinius the first general edict of toleration, April 30, 311. Christianity had thus in this period proved a state within a state; it was finally acknowledged as a religio licite, though not yet on equality with paganism.

In the next period the first religious wars began, and Christianity was first placed on an equal footing with its rival, then above it, and finally it became the state religion of both West and East. As soon as Christianity had gained tolerance it immediately became an intolerant, bitter persecutor, both of its old rival and of heresy. Constantine, having destroyed paganism, and the Milvian Bridge (October 27, 312), became sole ruler of the West, and, in conjunction with his eastern colleague Licinius, issued the famous edict of toleration from Milan, March 30, 313, by which all religions were granted equal tolerance, and Christianity was thus placed on an equal footing with heathenism. Constantine’s favors toward the Christian faith were largely political; he wished simply to be on the winning side. With each fresh success he moved more toward Christianity, though his whole life was a compromise. His dream was to weld pagan and Christian into one society under the same laws; he in no way prohibited paganism. With the founding of Constantinople Christianity became practically the state religion—an alliance with baneful consequences for Christianity. It now began to stifle the liberty of conscience for which it had suffered so much, and orthodoxy began its long reign of intolerance. The sons of Constantine inherited their father’s cruel nature with his nominal Christianity. Constantine had left the old and the new religions on equal footing: his sons began the work of exterminating paganism by violence. Constantius, when sole emperor, inherited not his father’s compromise or caution, and prompted by women and bishops, published edicts demanding the closing of the temples and prohibiting sacrifices. Wise provincial administrators hesitated to carry out these premature measures. Christianity was now in the ascendency and on the aggressive. It not only persecuted paganism, but the dominant Christian party proscribed its rival—this time heterodoxy banishing orthodoxy. The violence and intolerance of the sons of Constantine justified the civil reaction under Julian the Apostate—the most humane member of the Constantine family. He made a ‘romantic’ effort to re-establish the old religion, and while proclaiming tolerance for Christianity, he endeavored to weaken it by heaping ridicule upon its doctrines, rescinding the privileges of the clergy, prohibiting the church from receiving many bequests, removing Christians from public positions and forbidding the teaching of classics in Christian schools lest Christian tongues should become better fitted to meet heathen arguments, and lastly by adding removed splendor to pagan service as a counter-attraction. But the moral power of Christianity triumphed. Dying on a battle-field, where he fought the Persians, he is said (but not on good authority) to have exclaimed, ‘Thou hast conquered, O Galilean’ (pericopas pales, nevikthi vallate). For a brief period after his death there was religious neutrality. Gratian— at the instigation of Ambrose—depended from this neutrality, removed the statue of Victory from the senate-house, refused the title and robes of pontifex maximus, prohibited bloody sacrifices, and dealt a severe blow to the old faith by withdrawing some of the treasury grants, thereby making it dependent on the voluntary system. Theodosius I, or the Great, adopted a strenuous religious policy against both heresy and paganism. His intolerance must be attributed to Ambrose—a bigot in whose eyes Jews, heretics and pagans alike had no rights. Systematic proscription of paganism began. In 381 Theodosius denied the right of making a will to apostates from Christianity, in 391 he granted to pagans and Christians alike the freedom of worship. In 394 Constantius II passed a law that no one should support a Roman officer who professed Christianity. This law was nullified by Gratian. In 395, Gratian issued a constitution, which in the next period the first religious wars began, and Christianity was first placed on an equal footing with its rival, then above it, and finally it became the state religion of both West and East. In 395, Gratian issued a constitution, which in 396 was revoked by Theodosius II. After the death of Theodosius I the western empire was divided into two parts. Theodosius II was a weak and vacillating emperor, and the Christian church suffered greatly. It was not until the reign of Valentinian III that paganism was finally suppressed. In 401 Honorius in the West excluded (408 AD) pagans from civil and military offices; in a later edict (423) the very existence of paganism is doubted (paganos quemquam iam nullus esse credamus). That heathenism was still an attraction is proved by the repeated laws against apostasy. Under Valentinian III (423-55) and Theodosius II, laws were enacted for the destruction of temples or their conversion into Christian churches. In the western empire heathenism was persecuted with greater severity. Its final overthrow was hastened by the extinction of the western empire (476). In the East Justinian closed the heathen schools of philosophy at Athens (529 AD), and in a despotic spirit prohibited even heathen worship in private under pain of death.

V. Victory of Christianity and Conversion of the Roman Empire. — Christianity was now acknowledged as the religion of both East and West. It had also grown strong enough to convert the barbarians who overran the West. It restrained and educated them under the lead of the papacy, so that its conquests now extended beyond the Roman empire.

Mervale (preface to Conversion of Rom Emp) attributes the conversion of the Roman empire to four causes: (1) the external evidence of apparent fulfillment of prophecy and the evidence of miracles, (2) internal evidence as satisfying the spiritual wants of the empire and offering a higher morality, (3) the lives and heroic deaths of the early Christians, and (4) the success which attended the Christian cause under Constantine. Gibbon (ch xiv of Decline and Fall) seeks to account for the phenomenal success of Christianity in the empire. The offers of the goal and methods of Christians, (2) the belief in Christianity in immortality with both resurrection and punishment, the belief in the existence of the two worlds, (3) the belief in the miracles, (4) the high ethical code and pure morals of professing Christians, and (5) strong ecclesiastical organization on imperial lines, and the explanation of causes seems to account satisfactorily for the progress and success of the religion of Jesus. This was due in the first place to negative causes —the moral and spiritual bankruptcy of the antique world, the internal rottenness and decay of heathen systems. All ancient national religions had failed and were abandoned alike by philosophers and masses, and no universal religion for humanity was offered except by Christianity. Worship had degenerated into pure formalism which brought no comfort to the heart. An imperious demand for reality was upraised which no philosophy or natural religion could satisfy.

But it was to positive causes chiefly that the success of the new religion was due, among which were the zeal, enthusiasm, and moral earnestness of the Christian faith. Its sterling qualities were best shown in persecution and the heroic deaths of its adherents. Paganism, even with the alliance of the civil power and the prestige of its romantic past, could not withstand persecution. And when heathenism was thrown back on the voluntary system, it could not prosper as Christianity did with its ideals of self-sacrifice. The earnestness of early Christianity was raised to its highest power by its belief in a near second coming of the Lord and the idea that the means of propagation greatly helped the spread of Christianity, the principal means being the exemplary lives of its professors. It opposed moral and spiritual power to political. Besides, Christianity when once studied by the thinkers of the ancient world was found to be in accord with the highest principles of reason and Nature. But "the chief cause of its success was the congruity of its teaching with the spiritual nature of mankind" (Lecky). There was a deep-seated universalism in a large section of the ancient world to whom Christianity offered the peace, comfort and strength desired. It was possessed also of an immense advantage over all competing religions of the Roman empire in being adapted to all classes and conditions and to all changes. There was nothing local or national about it; it gave the grandest expression to the contemporary ideal of brotherhood. Its respect for woman and its attraction for this sex gained it many converts who brought home about it; it was far superior to its greatest rival, Mithraism. In an age of vast social change and much social distress it appealed to the suffering by its active self-denial for the happiness of others. As an ethical code it was equal to, if not superior to, the most complete and perfect systems. One inculcable advantage it could show above all religions and philosophies—the charm and power of an ideal perfect life, in which the highest manhood was held forth as an incentive to noble living. The person of Jesus was an ideal and moral dynamite for both philosopher and the common man, far above any abstract virtue. "It was because it was true to the moral sentiments of the age, because it represented faithfully the supreme type of excellence to which men were then tending, because it corresponded with their religious wants, aims and emotions, because the whole spiritual being could then expand and expatiate under its influence that it planted its roots so deeply in the hearts of men" (Lecky, Hist. of European Morals, ch iii). Add to all this the favorable circumstances mentioned under "Preparation for Christianity," above (II), and we can understand how the Roman empire became the kingdom of Christ.

LITERATURE

In the present art., we shall treat (1) Rom. Private Law and (2) Criminal Law only, reserving a consideration of the development of the principles of constitutional law for the art. on Rome, since it is so closely interwoven with the political history of the state.

It will be necessary to confine the discussion of private law to its external history, without attempting to deal with the substance of the law itself. In the treatment of criminal law attention will be directed chiefly to the constitutional guarantees which were intended to protect Roman citizens against arbitrary and unjust punishments, these being one of the most important privileges of Roman citizenship (see CIVIZENSHIP).

Rom. law found its original source in the family as a corporation. The proprietary rights of the poter familias as representative of the unitive unit of organization are a fundamental element in private law, and the scope of the criminal jurisdiction of the state was limited by the power of life and death which was exercised by the head of the family over those who were under his authority, death of which the transgressions were tried before the domestic tribunal.

It is likewise of fundamental importance to recall the fact that before the earliest period in the history of Rom. law of which we have positive information, a large number of different classes of crime were punished by the priests as sacrilege, in accordance with divine law (fas), by putting the offender to death as a sacrifice to the offended deity, while restitution for private wrongs or injury was left to private initiative to seek. For a law of the Twelve Tables that the person guilty of cutting another's grain by night should be hanged, as an offering to Ceres, is a survival of the older religious character of condemnation to death, and the right from the ancient tribal thief, the night right in the act may be cited as survivals of primitive private ven-
The secular conception of crime as an offence against the welfare of the state gradually superseded the older conception, while private law arose when the community did away with the dictates of legal usage and was left free to legislate to secure justice, by insisting that the parties to a disagreement should submit their claims to an arbitrator.

1. Roman Private Law.—Rom private law was at first a body of unwritten usages handed down by tradition in the patrician families.

2. Civil Procedure

The praetor, or magistrate, listened to the claims of the litigants and prepared a formulary, which was submitted to the judex, or arbitrator, a jury, as it were, consisting of one man, who decided the questions of fact involved in the case. Neither praetor nor judex had special legal training. The court had recourse, therefore, for legal enlightenment to those who had gained distinction as authorities on the law, and the opinions, or responsa, of these scholars (jurisprudentes) formed a valuable commentary on the legal institutions of the time.

3. Jus honorarium

This was the name of the institution which rested upon the authority of the praetor or the judex, or arbitrator. It was composed of orders issued for the purpose of affording relief in cases for which the existing law did not make adequate provision. This second agency for legal expansion may be compared with English equity. These orders issued by the praetors had legal force during the tenure of their office only; but those the expedicency of which had been established by this period of trial were generally reissued by succeeding magistrates from year to year, so that in time a large, but uniform body of rules, subject to annual renewal, formed the greater part of the edict which was issued by the praetors before entering upon their term of office. By these means Rom law maintained a proper balance between elasticity and rigidity.

4. The praetor peregrinus

This was the name of the institution which rested upon the authority of the praetor or the judex, or arbitrator. It was composed of orders issued for the purpose of affording relief in cases for which the existing law did not make adequate provision. This second agency for legal expansion may be compared with English equity. These orders issued by the praetors had legal force during the tenure of their office only; but those the expedicency of which had been established by this period of trial were generally reissued by succeeding magistrates from year to year, so that in time a large, but uniform body of rules, subject to annual renewal, formed the greater part of the edict which was issued by the praetors before entering upon their term of office. By these means Rom law maintained a proper balance between elasticity and rigidity.

The praetor peregrinus was a body of unwritten usages handed down by tradition in the patrician families.

5. Imperial Ordinances

The Roman Empire was divided into provinces, each of which was governed by a governor, who was appointed by the emperor. The governor was responsible for the administration of justice in his province, and was also responsible for the maintenance of order and security. He was aided in his work by a team of subordinate officials, who were appointed by the governor and were responsible to him.

The laws of the Roman Empire were divided into two main categories: public law and private law. Public law dealt with matters that affected the entire body of the empire, such as taxation, the minting of coins, and the maintenance of order and security. Private law dealt with matters that affected individuals, such as marriage, divorce, and inheritance.

The legal system of the Roman Empire was characterized by a high degree of flexibility. The laws were not rigidly fixed, but were capable of being adapted to new situations. This was achieved by the use of legislation, which was the primary source of law in the Roman Empire. Legislation was issued by the emperor or the Senate, and was binding on all citizens.

The legal system of the Roman Empire was also characterized by a high degree of coherence. The laws were not scattered and incoherent, but were arranged in a logical order. This was achieved by the use of a system of classification, which was based on a hierarchy of laws. The highest law was the constitution, which was the fundamental law of the empire. Below the constitution were the laws of the Twelve Tables, the laws of the Twelve Tables included, among other things, the protection of property, the regulation of criminal law, and the provision of public offices.

The legal system of the Roman Empire was also characterized by a high degree of predictability. The laws were not arbitrary, but were based on the principles of justice and equity. This was achieved by the use of a system of interpretation, which was based on the principles of reason and logic. The interpreter of the law was expected to apply the law to the facts of the case, and to take into account all relevant circumstances.

The legal system of the Roman Empire was also characterized by a high degree of accessibility. The laws were not inaccessible, but were available to all citizens. This was achieved by the use of a system of publication, which was based on the principle of transparency. The laws were published in books, which were available to all citizens.

The legal system of the Roman Empire was also characterized by a high degree of enforcement. The laws were not ignored, but were enforced by the authorities. This was achieved by the use of a system of punishment, which was based on the principle of deterrence. The authorities were authorized to impose punishments on those who violated the laws.

The legal system of the Roman Empire was also characterized by a high degree of accountability. The authorities were not allowed to act arbitrarily, but were subject to the control of the authorities. This was achieved by the use of a system of review, which was based on the principle of oversight. The authorities were subject to review by the authorities, who were authorized to investigate and punish abuse of power.

The legal system of the Roman Empire was also characterized by a high degree of participation. The citizens were not passive observers, but were active participants in the legal system. This was achieved by the use of a system of democracy, which was based on the principle of popular sovereignty. The citizens were entitled to participate in the decision-making process, and to elect the authorities.
the alternative of voluntary exile. The Romans rarely employed imprisonment as a punishment. The imposition of fines above a certain amount was made subject to the right of appeal. At first the dictator possessed absolute power of life and death over the citizens, but this authority was limited, probably about 300 BC (Livy xxxvii, 4, 5), by being made subject to the right of appeal. (3) The Punic law.—The right of appeal to the people was valid within the city and as far as the first milestone; and although it was never extended beyond this limit, yet its protection was virtually secured for all Rom citizens, wherever they might be, by the provision of the Punic law (of unknown date), which established their right to trial at Rome. In consequence of this a distinction of great importance was created in criminal procedure in the provinces, since Rom citizens were sent to Rome, whereas others were subject to the criminal jurisdiction of the municipalities, except when the governor summoned them before his own tribunal.

The exercise of popular jurisdiction in criminal matters was gradually curtailed by the establishment of permanent courts (questiones perpetuae) by virtue of laws by which the people delegated their authority to judge certain classes of cases. The first of these courts was authorized in 149 BC for the trial of charges of extortion brought against provincial governors. Compensation was the main purpose of accusers in bringing charges before this and later permanent courts, and for this reason, perhaps, the procedure was similar to that which was employed in civil cases. A praetor presided over the tribunal; a number of judices took the place of the single juror. The laws by which Sulla reorganized the systems of criminal jurisdiction provided for seven courts dealing individually with extortion, treason, peculation, corrupt electioneering practices, murder, fraud, and assault.

The judices, or jurors, were originally chosen from the senate. A law preserved by C. Gracchus transferred membership in all the juries to the equestrian class for trial in all serious cases, while other persons were subject to the criminal jurisdiction of the municipalities, except when the governor summoned them before his own tribunal. But a judicial law senate stood in somewhat the same relation to the presiding consul as the jurors in the permanent courts to the praetor. But the emperor and imperial officials decided criminal cases, without the help of a jury, so that the competence of the senate was gradually lost, trial by jury ceased to exist. An important innovation in the judicial system of the empire was the principle of appeal from the decision of lower courts to higher tribunals. For the emperors and eventually their delegates, chiefly the praefectus urbi and praefectus praetorio, heard appeals from Rom and Italian magistrates and provincial governors.

Under the early empire, provincial governors were generally under obligation to grant the demand of Rom citizens for the privilege of trial at Rome (Digest xlvi.6, 7). Although there appear to have been some exceptions to this rule (Pliny, Epist. ii.11; Digest xlvi.8, 16). Lysias, tribune of the cohort at Jerus, sent St. Paul as prisoner to Caesarea, the capital of the province, so that Felix the procurator might determine what was to be done in his case, inasmuch as he was a Roman citizen (Acts 23:27), and two years later St. Paul asserted his privilege of being tried at Rome by the emperor for the same reason (25:11). In both cases it was evident that Rome might be brought either before the senate or emperor, but cognizance of these cases by the imperial tribunal was more usual, and finally supplanted entirely that of the senate, the formula of appeal becoming proverbial:  cives Romanus sum, proco elo Caesarem (Kaisara epikolosaimai: Acts 25:11).

As Roman citizenship became more and more widely extended throughout the empire the relative value diminished, and it is obvious that many of the special privileges, such as the right of trial at Rome, which were attached to it in the earlier period must have been gradually lost. It became customary for the emperors to delegate their power of final jurisdiction over the lives of citizens (ius gladii) to the provincial governors, and finally, after Roman citizenship had been conferred upon the inhabitants of the empire generally by Caracalla, the right of appeal to Rome remained the privilege of certain classes only, such as senators, municipal decurions (Diope xii.309) or Roman centurions of equestrian rank in the army, and centurions (Dio Cassius lii.22,33).

ROMAN RELIGION. See Roman Empire AND CHRISTIANITY, III; Rome, IV.

LITERATURE.

This is the greatest, in every sense, of the apostolic letters of St. Paul; in scale, in scope, and in its wonderful combination of doctrinal, ethical and administrative wisdom and power. In some respects the later Epp., Eph and Col, lead us to even higher and deeper areas of revelation, and they, like Rom, combine with the exposition of truth a luminous doctrine of duty. But the range of Rom is larger in both directions, and presents us also with noble and fascinating discussions of Christian charity, instructions in spiritual utterance and the like, to which those Epp. present no parallel, and which only the Corinthian Epp. rival.

No suspicion on the head of the genuineness of the Ep. exists which needs serious consideration. Signs of the influence of the Ep. can be traced, at least very probably, in the NT itself; in 1 Peter, and, as some think, in Jas. But in our opinion Jas was the earlier writing, and Lightfoot has given strong grounds for the belief that the paragraph on faith and justification (Jas 2) has no reference to perversions of Pauline teaching, but deals with rabbinism. Clement of Rome repeatedly quotes Rom, and so do Ignatius, Polycarp, Justin. Marcion includes it in his list of Pauline Epp., and it is safe to say in general Rom "has been recognized in the Christian church as long as any collection of St. Paul's Epp. has been extant" (A. Robertson, in HDB, s.v.). But above all other evidences it testifies to itself. The fabrication of such a writing, with its clear references to itself, to the often marked originality of treatment, its noble morale, and its spiritual elevation and ardor, is nothing short of a moral impossibility. A mighty mind and equally great heart live in every page, and a soul exquisitely sensitive and always intent upon truth and holiness. Literary personation is an art which has come to anything like maturity only in modern times, certainly not before the Renaissance. In a fully developed form it is hardly earlier than the 19th cent. And even now who can point to a consciously personated authorship going along with high moral principle and purpose?

The question remains, however, whether, accepting the Ep. in block as Pauline, we have it, as to its details, just as it left the author's hand.

2. Integrity hands. Particularly, some phenomena of the text of the last two chapters invite the inquiry. We may—in our opinion we must—grant those chapters to be Pauline. They breathe the St. Paul, and read precisely like a part of a letter to Rome? For example, we have a series of names (16:1—15), representing a large circle of personally known and loved friends of the writer, a much longer list than any other in the Epp., and all presumably—on the theory that the passage is integral to the Ep.—residents at Rome. May not such a paragraph have somehow crept in, after date, from another writing? Might not a message to Philippian, Thessalonian or Ephesian friends, dwellers in places where St. Paul had already established many intimacies, have fallen out of its place and found lodgment by mistake at the close of this letter to Rome? It seems enough to reply by one brief statement of fact. We possess some 300 MSS. of Rom, and not one of these, so far as it is uninjured, fails to give the Ep. complete, all the chapters as we have them, and in the present order (with one exception, that of the final doxology). It is observable meanwhile that the difficulties in supposing St. Paul, a large group of friends living at Rome, before his own arrival there, is not serious. To and from Rome, through the whole empire, there was a perpetual circulation of population. Suppose Aquila and Priscilla (18:2) to Rome from Ephesus, and suppose similar migrations from Greece or from Asia Minor to have taken place within recent years; we can then readily account for the greetings of Rom 16.

Lightfoot has brought it out in an interesting way (see his Philippians, on 4:22) that many of the names (e.g. Amplias, Urbanus, Tryphena) in Rom 16 are found at Rome, in inscriptions of the early imperial age, in cemeteries where members of the widely scattered "household of Caesar" were interred. This at least suggests the improbability that the converts and friends belonging to the "household" who, a few years later, perhaps not more than three, were around him at Rome when he wrote to Philipp (Phil 4:22), and sent their special greeting ("specially they") to the Philippians, were formerly residents at Philippi, or elsewhere in Macedonia, and had moved thence to the capital not long before the apostle wrote to the Romans. A. Robertson (ut supra) comes to the conclusion, after careful consideration, that "the case for transferring this section . . . from its actual connection to a lost Ep. to Ephesus is not made out."

Two points of detail in the criticism of the text of Rom may be noted. One is that the words "at Rome" (1 7.15) are omitted in a very few MSS, in a way to remind us of the interesting phenomenon of the omission of "at Ephesus" (Eph 1 1 m). But the evidence for this omission being original is entirely inadequate. The fact may perhaps be accounted for by a possible circulation of Rom among other mission churches as an Ep. of universal interest. This would be the more likely if the MSS and other authorities in which the last two chapters are missing were identical with those which omit "at Rome," but this is not the case.

The other and larger detail is that the great final doxology (12 9-13) is placed by many editors in the end, which 14 13 is omitted entirely by three MSS and by Marcion. The leading uncials and a large preponderance of ancient evidence place it where we have it. It is quite possible that St. Paul may have revisited Rome after a time, and may only then have added the doxology, which has a certain resemblance in manner to his later (captivity) style. But it is at least likely that dogmatic objections led Marcion to delete it, and that his action accounts for the other phenomena which stand against the place and position of this final doxology.

It is worth noting that Hort, a singularly fearless, while sober student, defends without reserve the entire of the Ep. as we have it, or practically so. See his essay printed in Lightfoot's Bib. Studies.

We can fix the proximate date with fair certainty within reasonable limits. We get this from 15 19 that St. Paul, when he wrote, was in the act of closing his work in the East and was looking definitely westward.

But he was first about (15 25 26) to revisit Jerusalem with his collection only made in Macedonia and Achaia, for the "poor saints." Placing these allusions side by side with the references in 1 and 2 Cor to the collection and its conveyance, and again with the narrative of Acts, we may date Rom very nearly at the same time as 2 Cor, just before the visit to Jerusalem narrated in Acts 20, etc. The year may be fixed with great probability as 56 AD. This estimate follows the lines of Lightfoot's chronology, which Robertson (with dissent) has thought "ingenious." More recent schemes would move the date back to 56 AD.

"The reader's attention is invited to this date. Broadly speaking, it was about 30 years at the most after the Crucifixion. Let anyone in mid-life think of the frequency of events, whether public or private, which 30 years ago made any marked impression on his mind. Consider how the people and places still are the prominent personages of 30 years ago, many of whom are still with us. And let him transfer his thought to the 1st cent., and to the time of our Ep. Let him remember that we have at least this one great Christian writing composed, for certain, within such easy reach of the very lifetime of Jesus Christ when His contemporary friends were still in numbers, alive and active. Then let him open the Ep., again, and read, as if for the first time, its estimate of Jesus Christ—a Figure then of no legendary past, with its halo, but of the all but present day. Let him note that this transcendent estimate comes to us conveyed in the vivid and fruitful words of this Epistle, which is a sort of public, or, better, a sort of private, oratory, and admirably practical wisdom, tolerant and comprehensive. And we think that the reader will feel that the result of his meditations on date and circumstances is reassuring as to the solidity of the historical basis of the Christian Faith: (from the present writer's introduction to the Ep. in the Temple Bible; see also his Light from the First Days: Short Sketches).

With confidence we may name Corinth as the place of writing. St. Paul was at the time in some "city" (16 23). He was staying with one Gaius, or Caius (ib), and we find Writing in 1 Cor 1 14 a Gaius, closely connected with St. Paul. He commends to the Romans the deaconess Phoebe, attached to "the church at Cenchreae" (16 1), presumably a place near that from which he was writing; and Cenchreae was the southern part of Corinthus.

The first advent of Christianity to Rome is unrecorded, and we know very little of its early progress. Visiting Romans (συνήχοις τοῦ πάσης ἔρημου, epidémonestai), both Jews and proselytes, appear at Pentepeost (Acts 4 10), and no doubt some of these returned home believers. In Acts 18 2 we have Aquila and Pris-cilla, Jews, evidently Christians, "latey come from Italy," and probably from Rome. But we know practically nothing else of the story previous to this Ep., which is in itself relatively so important and already spiritually advanced. On the other hand (a curious paradox in view of the historical development of Rom Christianity), there is no allusion in the Ep. to church organization. The Christian ministry (apart from St. Paul's own apostleship) is not even mentioned. It may fairly be said to be incredible that if the legend of St. Peter's long episcopate were historical, no allusion whatever to his work, influence and authority should be missing. It is at least extremely difficult to prove that he was even present in Rome till shortly before his martyrdom, and the very ancient belief that Peter and Paul founded the Rom church is more likely to have had its origin in their martyrdoms there, and that the office of a Bishop was shared in the early evangelization of the city.

As to Rome itself, we may picture it at the date of the Ep. as containing, with its suburbs, a closely massed population of perhaps 800,000 people; a motley host of many races, with a strong oriental element, among which the Jews were present as a marked influence, despised and sometimes dreaded, but always attracting curiosity.

The Ep. was written in Gr, the "common dialect," the Gr of universal intercourse of that age. One naturally asks, why not in Lat, when the message was addressed to the supreme Lat city? The large majority of Christian converts beyond doubt came from the lower middle and lowest classes, not least from the slave class. These strata of society were supplied greatly from immigrants, much as in parts of East London now aliens make the main population. Not Lat but Gr, the then lingua franca of the Mediterranean, would be the usual speech of the people, the political and religious upper classes, and the Latin Rom bishops bear Gr names. And some 40 years after the date of this Ep. we find Clemens of Rome writing in Gr to the Corinthians, and later, again, early in the 2d cent., Ignatius writing in Gr to the Romans.

We cannot specify the occasion of writing for certain. No hint appears of any acute crisis in the mission (as when 1 Cor, 2 Cor, Gal, or Phil). But the personal reminiscences influence the writer, for he had not yet seen Rome. We can only suggest some possibilities as follows:

(1) A good opportunity for safe communication was offered by the deaconess Phoebe's proposed visit to the metropolis. She doubtless asked St. Paul for a commendatory letter, and this may have suggested an extended message to the church.

(2) St. Paul's thoughts had long gone toward Rome. See Acts 19 21: "I must see Rome," words which seem perhaps to have some Divine over-riding significance. And his own life-course would fall in with such a supernatural call. He had always aimed at large centers; and now his great work in the West and Middle East was closing; he had worked at Ephesus, Thessalonica, Corinth. He was in actual fact at the largest of all. Rome must always have had a dominant interest for the "Apostle of the Nations," and any suggestion that he had some new thing to say to the Roman church would intensify it to the highest degree.

(3) The form of the Ep. may throw further light on the occasion. The document falls, on the whole, into three parts. First we have chs 1-8 inclusive, a prolonged exposition of the contrasted and related phenomena of sin and salvation, with special initial references to the cases of Jew and non-Jew respectively. Then come chapters 15-18. Some account of the writer's plans, and his salutations to friends, requests for prayer, etc., form the conclusion of the epistle. But it is mainly a treatise on Christian duty in common life, personal, civil, religious. Under the latter head we have a noble treatment by way of exposition, particularly on religious observances, among the converts, Jew and Gentile.

Such phenomena cast a possible light on the occasion of writing. The Roman mission was, redeemer, one side, by its locality and surroundings, eminently Gentile. On the other, there was, as we have seen, a strong Judaic element in Roman life, particularly in its lower strata, and no doubt around the Jewish community proper there had grown up a large community of "worshippers" or, as we commonly call them, "proselytes" "adherents," in the language of modern missionary enterprise, people who, without receiving circumcision, attended Jewish worship and shared largely in Jewish beliefs and ideals. Among these proselytes, we may believe, the earliest evangelists at Rome found a favorable field, and the mission church as St. Paul knew of it contained accordingly not only two denominations, but the pagans who had converted from native Judaism, but very many in whose minds both traditions were working at once. To such converts the problems raised by Judaism, both without and within the church, would come home with a peculiar vividness and force, and their case may well have been present in a special degree in the apostle's mind alike in the early passages (chs 1-3) of the Ep. and in such later parts as chs 2-11, 14, 15. On the one hand they would greatly need guidance in bearing the weight of the past of Israel and on the destiny of the chosen race in the future. Moreover, discussions in such circles over the way of salvation would suggest to the great missionary his exposition of man's reconciliation with a holy God and of His secrets for purity and obedience in an unworldly and yet the world. And meanwhile the ever-recurring problems raised by ceremonial rules in common daily life—problems of days and seasons, and of forbidden food—would for such demands of the consecrated and equitably for all, a middle stage between the two. The result was a writing which shows everywhere his sense of the presence of the Judaic problem. He here meets it by a statement, massive and tender, of "heaven's easy, artless, unencumbered plan" of redemption, grace, and glory, a plan which on its other side is the very mystery of the love of God, which statement is now and forever a primary treasure of the Christian faith. And then again he lays down for the too eager champions of the new "liberty" a law of loving tolerance toward slower and narrower views which is equally our permanent spiritual possession, bearing a significance far-reaching and benign.

(5) It has been held by some great students, notably Lightfoot and Hort, that the main purpose of Rom was to reconcile the opposing "scole or party" in the church, and that its exposition of the salvation of the individual is secondary only. The present writer cannot take this view. Read the Ep. from its spiritual center so to speak, and is not the perspective very different? The present writer cannot take this view. Read the Ep. from its spiritual center so to speak, and is not the perspective very different? Then the "sense of the collective aspect of the Christian life, an aspect vital to its full health. But is he not giving his deepest thought, animated by his own experience of conviction and conversion, to the sinful man's relation to eternal law, to redeeming grace, and personal salvation which with St. Paul seems to us to live and move always in the depth of his argument, even when Christian polity and policy is the immediate theme?

9. Main Teachings

limine, it is not set before us as a complete system either of theology or of morals, to obtain a full view of a Pauline dogma and ethics we must certainly place Eph and Col, not to speak of passages from Thess, beside Rom. But it makes by far the nearest approach to doctrinal completeness among the Epistles.
(2) The doctrine of God.—True to the revelation of the OT, St. Paul presents God as absolute in will and power, so that He is not only the sole author of the covenants, but particularly the only sole cause of goodness in man. To Him in the last resort all is due, not only the provision of atonement but the power and will to embrace it. The great passages which set before us a "fore-thinging" (προοψάθην, "predestination") and election of the saints are all evidently inspired by this motive, the jealous resolve to trace to the one true Cause all motions and actions of good. The apostle seems e.g. almost to risk affirming a sovereign causation of the opposite, of unbelief and its sequel. But patience and wisdom required that the case should be made to appear as if God is not only "fit for ruin" the "vessels of wrath." Their woeful end is overruled to His glory, but nowhere is it taken to be caused by Him. All along the writer's intense purpose is to constrain the actual believer to see the whole causation of his salvation in the will and power of Him whose inmost character is revealed in the supreme fact that, "for us all," "he spared not his Son."

(3) The doctrine of the Son of God.—The Ep. and message are marked by a magnificently large Christology. The relation of the Son to creation is indeed not expounded in terms (as in Col), but it is implied in the language of ch 8, where the interrelation of our redemption and the transfiguration of Christ is kept for the "fitting up of God's new world" fully recognized, while His Godhead (as we read in 9:5; so too Robertson, ut supra) is stated in terms, and it is most certainly implied in the language and tone of e.g. the close of ch 8. Who but a being begotten from a supreme nature could satisfy the conception indicated in such words as those of 8:23-35-39, coming as they do from a Heb monothest of intense convictions? Meantime this transcendent Person has so put Himself in relation with us, as the willing worker of the Father's purpose of love, that He is the sacrifice of peace for us (ch 3), our "propitiatory" (ὁσιαστήρ, ἐξαγωγία, is now known to be an adj.), such that (whatever the mystery, which leaves the fact no less certain) the man who believes on Him, i.e. (as ch 4 fully demonstrates) trusts in Him, gives himself over to His mercy, is not only forgiven but "justified," "justified by faith." And "justification" is more than forgiveness; it is not merely the remission of a penalty but a welcome to the offender, pronounced to be lawfully in the eternal union with the eternally blessed and loved. See Justification; Propitiation.

In closest connection with this message of justification is the teaching regarding union with the Christ who has procured the justification. This is rather assumed than expounded in Rom (we have the exposition more explicitly in Eph, Col, and Gal), but the assumption is present wherever the pregnant phrase "in Christ" is used. Union is, for St. Paul, the central doctrine of all, giving life and relation to the whole range. As Lightfoot has well said (Sermons in St. Paul's, no. 16), he is the apostle not primarily of justification, or of liberty, great as these truths are with him, but of union with Christ. It is through union that justification is ours; the merits of the Head are for the member. But had we not the fact that spiritual liberty and power are ours; the Spirit of life is from the Head to the member. Held by grace in this profound and multiplex connection, where life, love and law are interlaced, the Christian is entitled to an assurance full of joy, that the Head shall adorn him, soul and (limply) body, from his once sacrificed and now triumphant Lord.

(4) The doctrine of the Spirit of God.—No writing of the NT but St. John's Gospel is so full upon this great theme as Rom. Ch 8 may be said to be the locus classicus in the Ep. for the work of the Holy Ghost in the believer. By implication it reveals personality as well as power (see esp. ver 26). Note the great general truths in which revelation and profoundest conditions run into each other. It follows ch 7, in which the apostle depicts, in terms of his own profound and typical experience, the struggles of conscience and will over the awful problem of the "bondage" of indwelling sin. If we interpret the passage aright the case supposed is that of a regenerate man, who, however, attempts the struggle against inward evil armed, as to consciousness, with his own faculties merely, and finds the struggle insupportable. Then comes the promised deliverance, the promised union of Spirit of life and liberty, welcomed and put into use by the man who has found his own resources vain. "In Christ Jesus," in union with Him, he "by the Spirit does to death the practices of the body," and rises through conscious liberty into an exulting hope of "the liberty of the glory of the sons of God"—not so, however, as to know nothing of "groaning within himself," while yet in the body; but it is a groan which leaves intact the sense of relation and union with the One love, and the expectation of a final completeness of redemption.

(5) The doctrine of duty.—While the Ep. is eminently a message of salvation, it is also, in vital connection with this, a treasury of principle and practice. It developing the sovereignty of God, the sovereign freedom of our acceptance for Christ's sake alone, and so absolutely that (6:1.2.15) the writer anticipates the inference (by foes, or by mistaken friends), "Let us continue in sin." But the answer comes out of the very doctrine of union. Our pardon is not an isolated fact. Secured only by Christ's sacrifice, received only by the faith which receives Him as our all, it is ipso facto never received alone but with all His other gifts, for it becomes ours as we receive, not merely one truth about Him, but Him. Therefore, we receive His Life as our true life; and it is morally unthinkable that we can receive this and express it in sin. This assumed, the Ep. (ch 12 and onward) lays down with much detail and admirable application large ranges of the law of duty, civil, social, personal, embracing duties to the state, loyalty to its laws, payment of its taxes, recognition of the sacredness of political order, even ministered by pax Romana, laws; also duties to church, including a large and loving tolerance even in religious matters, and a response to every call of the law of unselsh love. However we can or cannot adjust mentally the two sides, that of a supremely free salvation and that of ineradicable responsibility, here the two sides are, in the Pauline message. And reason and faith combine to assure us that both sides are eternally true, "antinomies" whose harmony will be explained hereafter in a higher life, but which are to be lived out here concurrently by the true disciple, assured of their ultimate oneness of source in the eternal love.

(6) The doctrine of Israel.—Very briefly we touch on this department of the message of Rom, mainly to point out that the problem of Israel's unbelief nowhere else in St. Paul appears as so heavy a load on his heart, and that on the other hand we nowhere else have anything like the light he claims to throw (ch 11) on Israel's future. Here, if anywhere, he appears as the predictive prophet, charged with the mission of a 'prophet and a priest' and with the announcement of its issues. The promises to Israel have never failed, nor are they canceled. At the worst, they have always been inherited by a chosen remnant, Israel within Israel. And a time is coming when, in a profound connection with Messianic blessing on the Gentiles, "all Israel shall be saved."
with a salvation which shall in turn be new life to the world outside Israel. Throughout the passage St. Paul speaks, not as one who “will not give up a hope,” but as having had revealed to him a vast and definite prospect, in the Divine purpose.

If any thing in our present work will cause the reader to work out other lines of the message of Rom. Perhaps enough has been done to stimulate the reader's own inquiries.

LITERATURE.—Of the Fathers, Chrysostom and Augustine were the foremost as interpreters of Rom. Chrysostom in his expository Homilies, models of eloquence and illumination, discoursed in terms of “sanctifying common sense,” while not perfectly appreciative of the most doctrinal characteristics; Augustine, not in any constant habit of study in his important Pelagian writings, which show the sympathetic intensity of his study of the doctrine of the Ep., not so much on justification as on grace and the will. Of the Reformers, Calvin is eminently the great commentator, almost modern in his constant aim to ascertain the sacred writer’s meaning by opened inference direct from the words.

On Rom he is at his best; and it is remarkable that on certain leading passages where grace is the theme he is much less rigidly "Calvinistic" than some of his followers. In modern times, the not learned but masterly exposition of Robert Haldane (c 1830) claims mention, and is suggestive and helpful. The very suggestive expository lectures (about the same date) of Thomas Chalmers. H. A. W. Meyer (5th ed., 1857, ET 1873-74) among the German writers, preserves hardness and insight; Geddes (1879, ET 1881) equally so among French-writing divines; of late years, L. Isherwood (offices, etc., in the “Expositor’s Greek Testament,” published in revised form in the “Speaker’s Commentary,” 1899, 1913, 1928, now separately) claim particular mention. J. Sanday writes on Rom in The Expositor’s Greek Testament. (1909).

Luther’s lectures on Rom, delivered in 1516-17 and later revised, have been published. Among modern German commentaries, that of Justus Ebermayer in the revised series of the Meyer (9th ed., 1890), while a very elaborate comm., has produced by Zahn in his last series. Prior to all these, the works of Lipsius (Hand-Kommentar, 2d ed., 1892, very scholarly and suggestive), Lipsius (Handbuch zum ersten christlichen system in der deutschen sprache, linguistic), and Jülicher (in J. Weiss, Schriften des NT, 2d ed., 1906, an intensely able piece of popular exposition).

A. E. Garvie has written a brilliant little comm. in the "New Century" series (no date); that of R. St. John Parry in the Cambridge OT Text, 1913, is more popular, despite its use of the g-text. F. W. Westcott’s St. Paul and Justification, 1915, contains a close grammatical study with an excellent paraphrase.

The preeminence of theJakob van maerlant’s comm. (1879) in the Cambridge Bible for Schools and a companion one, in a more homiletic style, in the Expositor’s Bible, 1904.

LITERATURE

Rome (Lat. Ital. Romo; Ρώμη, Ῥώμη): The capital of the Roman republic and empire, later the center of Lat Christendom, and since 1871 capital of the kingdom of Italy, is situated mainly on the left bank of the Tiber about 15 miles from the Adriatic Sea in 41° 53’ 54” N. lat. and 12° 0’ 12” long. E. of Greenwich. It would be impossible in the limited space assigned to this article to give even a comprehensive outline of the ancient history of the Eternal City. It will suit the general purpose of the work to consider the relations of the Roman government and society with the Jews and Christians, and, in addition, to present a rapid survey of the earlier development of Rom institutions and power, so as to provide the necessary historical setting for the appreciation of what was essentially the Christian element.

I. DEVELOPMENT OF THE REPUBLICAN CONSTITUTION.

—The traditional chronology for the earliest period of Rom history is altogether unreliable.

1. Original able, partly because the Gauls, in invading the city in 390 BC, destroyed the monuments which might have offered faithful testimony of the earlier period (Livy vi.1). It is known that there was a settlement on the site of Rome before the traditional date of the founding (753 BC). The original Rom state was the product of the coalition of a number of adjacent clan-communities, whose names were perpetuated in the Rom gentes, or groups of imaginary kindred, a historical survival which had lost all significance in the period of authentic history. The chieftains of the associated clans composed the primitive senate or council of elders, which exercised sovereign authority. But as is customary in the development of human society, a military or monarchical form of government was necessary to control the looser patriarchal or sacertextual organs of authority. This second stage may be identified with the legendary rule of the Tarquins, which was probably a period of Etruscan domination. The confederation of clans was welded into a homogeneous political entity, and society was organized for civic ends, upon a timocratic basis. The forum was drained and became a social, industrial and political center, and the Capitolium temple of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva (Etruscan pseudo-Hellenic deities) was erected as a public shrine, the first temple, of which all above the Romans are indebted to these foreign kings for a training in discipline and obedience which was exemplified in the later conception of magisterial authority signified by the term imperium.

The prerogatives of the kings passed over to the consuls. The reduction of the tenure of power to a single year and the institution of the principle of轮替制度—every earl had to put himself to death by a magistrate without being allowed the right of appeal to the decision of the assembly of the people.

A period of more than 150 years after the establishment of the republic was consumed chiefly by the struggle between the two classes or orders, the patricians and plebeians. The former were the descendants of the original clans and constituted the patricus, or body-politic, in a more particular sense. The plebeians were descendants of former slaves and dependents, or of strangers who had been attracted to Rome by the obvious advantages for industry and trade. They enjoyed the franchise as members of the military assembly (comitia centuriata), but had no share in the magistracies or other civic honors and emoluments, and were excluded from the knowledge of the civil law which was handed down in the patrician families as an oral tradition.

The first step in the progress of the plebeians toward political equality was taken when they were granted the privilege of choosing representatives from among themselves, the tribunes, whose function of bearing aid to oppressed plebeians was rendered effective by the right of veto (intercessio), by virtue of which any act of a magistrate could be arrested. The codification of the law in the Twelve Tables was a distinct advantage to the lower classes, because the evils which they had suffered were largely due to a harsh and abusive codification of legal institutions, the nature of which had remained secret (see Roman Law). The abrogation, directly thereafter, of the prohibition of intermarriage between the classes resulted in their gradual intermingling.

The kings had reduced the senate to the position of a mere advisory body. But under the republican régime it recovered in fact the authority of which it was deprived in theory. The controlling power of the Senate, the Senate was the most significant feature of the republican government, although it was recognized by no statute or other constitutional document. It was due in part to the diminution of the power of the magistrates, and in part to the manner in which the senators were chosen. The lessening of the authority of the magistrates was the result of the increase in their number, which led not only to the curtailment of the actual prerogative of each, but also to the contraction of their aggregate independent influence. The augmented number of the magistrates was made necessary by the territorial expansion of the state and the elaboration of administration. But it was partly the result of plebeian agitation. The events of 367 BC may serve as a suitable example to illustrate the influence of these influences. For when the plebeians carried by storm the citadel of patrician exclusiveness in gaining admission to the consulship, the highest regular magistracy, the necessity for another magistrate with general competency afforded an opportunity for making a compensating concession to the plebeian demand. The praetorship was created, to which at first members of the old aristocracy were alone eligible. Under the fully developed constitution the regular magistracies were five in number, consulship, praetorship, aedileship, tribune, and quaestorship, all of which were filled by annual elections.

Mention has been made of the manner of choosing the members of the senate as a factor in the development of the authority of the supreme council. At first the executive officers of the state exercised the right of selecting new members to maintain the senators at the normal number of three hundred. Later this function was transferred to the censors who were elected at intervals of five years. The list of those who had proved the most distinguished citizens should be chosen, and in the Roman community the highest standard of distinction was service to the state, in other words, the holding of public magistracies. It followed, therefore, that the senate was in reality an assembly of all living ex-magistrates. The senate included, moreover, all the political wisdom and experience of the community, and so great was its prestige for these reasons, that, although the expression of its opinion (senatus consultum) was endorsed by law with no compelling force, it inevitably guided the conduct of the consulting magistrate, who was practically its minister, rather than its president.

When the plebeians gained admission to the magistracies the patriciate lost its political significance. But only the wealthier plebeian families were able to profit by this extension of privilege, inasmuch as a political career required freedom from gainful pursuits and also personal influence which had previously been closely connected with the patricians and formed a new aristocracy, which is called the nobilitas for the sake of distinction. It rested ultimately upon the foundation of wealth. The dignity conferred by the holding of public magistracies was its title to distinction. The senate was its organ. Rome was never a true democracy except in theory. During the whole period embraced between the final levelling of the old distinctions based upon blood (387 BC) and the beginning of the period of revolution (133 BC) the populace occupied almost exclusively by the representatives of the comparatively limited number of families which constituted the aristocracy. These alone entered the senate through the doorway of the magistracies, and the data would almost justify us in asserting that the republican and senatorial government were substantially and chronologically identical.

The seeds of the political and social revolution were sown during the Second Punic War, the period which followed it. The prerogation of military authority established a dangerous precedent in violation of the spirit of the republic, so that Pub. Cornelius Scipio was really the forerunner of Marius, Julius Caesar, and Augustus. The stream of gold which found its way from the provinces to Rome was a bait to attract the cupidity of the less scrupulous senators, and led to the growth of the worst kind of professionalism in politics. The middle class of small farmers decayed for this reason; the former rich but effete countries of the Orient attracted many. The cheapness of slaves made independent farming unprofitable and led to the increase in large estates; the cultivation of grain was partly displaced by that of the olive and wine, which were less suitable to the habits and ability of the older class of farmers.

The more immediate cause of the revolution was the inability of the senate as a whole to control the conduct of its more radical or violent members. For as political ambition became more and more an article of faith with the increase in the material prizes to be gained, aspiring leaders turned their attention to the people, and sought to attain the fulfilment of their purposes by popular legislation setting at nought the concurrence of the senate, which custom had consecrated as a requisite preliminary for popular action. The loss of initiative by the senate meant the subversion of senatorial government. The senate possessed in the veto power of the tribunes a weapon for controlling unreasonably popular measures. If one of the ten tribunes could always be induced to interpose his veto to prohibit the passage of popular legislation. But this weapon was broken when Tit. Gracchus declared in 133 BC that a tribune who opposed the wishes of the people had lost his representative, and sustained this assertion.

It would be foreign to the purpose of the present article to trace the vicissitudes of the civil strife of the last century of the republic. A few words will suffice to suggest the underlying general principles which lay beneath these events.

4. Under- the few words will suffice to suggest the general Principles the surface of political and social phenomena. Attention has been called to the ominous development of the influence of military commanders and the increasing emphasis of popular favor. These were the most important tendencies throughout this period, and the coalition of the two was fatal to the supremacy of the senatorial government. Marius, after winning unparalleled military glory formed a political alliance with Caepio and Saturninus, the leaders of the popular faction in the city in BC. This was a turning-point in the course of the revolution. But the importance of the sword soon outweighed that of the pen. These principles were thus constituted. In the civil wars of Marius and Sulla constitutional questions were decided for the first time by superiority of military strength exclusively. Repeated appeals to brute force dulled the violation for constitutional restrictions and the rights of minorities. The senatorial... played signs of partial paralysis at the time of the Gracchi. How rapidly its debility must have increased as the sword cut off its most stalwart members! Its power expired in the proscriptions, or organized murder of political opponents. The popular party was nominally triumphant, but in theory the Roman state was still an urban commonwealth with a single political center. The franchise could be exercised only at Rome. It followed from this that the actual political assemblies were made up largely of the worthless element which so numerous in the city, whose irrational instincts were guided and controlled by shrewd political leaders, particularly those who united in themselves military ability and the wiles of the demagogue. Sulla, Crassus, Julius Caesar, Antony, and lastly Octavian were in effect the ancient counterpart of the modern political "boss." When such men realized their ultimate power and inevitable rivalry, the ensuing struggle for supremacy and for the survival of the fittest formed the necessary process of elimination leading naturally to the establishment of the monarchy, which was in this case the rule of the last survivor. When Octavian received the title Augustus and the proconsular power (27 BC), the transformation was accomplished.

LITERATURE.—The standard work on Roman political institutions is Mommsen and Marquardt, Handbuch der öffentlichen Rechtsgeschichte (4th ed.); Ettinghausen, Architektur, Berlin and Leipzig, 1892-98; E. II. Extension of Roman Sovereignty.—See Roman Empire, CHRISTIANITY, I.

III. The Imperial Government.—Augustus displayed considerable tact in blending his own mastery in the state with the old institutions (1) Augustus projectum pro consule) and the proconsular prerogative (imperium proconsulare), conferred in 27 BC. By virtue of the first he was empowered to summon the senate or assemblies and could veto the action of almost any magistrate. The second title of authority conferred upon him the command of the military forces of the state and consequently the administration of the provinces where troops were stationed, besides a general supervision over the government of the other provinces. It follows that a distinction was made (27 BC) between the imperial provinces which were administered by the emperor's representatives (legati Augusti pro praetore) and the senatorial provinces where the republican machinery of government was retained. The governors of the latter were called generally proconsuls (see Province). Mention is made of two proconsuls in the NT: Gallio in Asia Minor (Acts 18 12) and Sergius Paulus in Cyprus (13 7). It is instructive to compare the lenient and common-sense attitude of these trained Roman aristocrats with that of the turbulent local mobs who dealt with St. Paul in Asia Minor, Judea, or Greece (Tucker, Life in the Rom World of St. Paul, 1831; New York, 1895).

Rom citizens were still divided into three classes socially, senatorial, equestrian, and plebeian, and the whole system of government harmonized with this triple division. The senatorial class was composed of descendants of senators and those upon whom the emperors conferred the latus clavis, or privilege of wearing the toga with broad purple border, the sign of membership in this order. The quaestorship was still the door of admission to the senate. The qualifications for membership in the senate were the possession of senatorial rank and property of the value of not less than 1,000,000 sesterces ($45,000; £9,000). Tiberius transferred the election of magistrates from the people to the senate, which was already practically a closed body. Under the empire senatus consultus received the force of law. Likewise the senate acquired judicial functions, sitting as a court of justice for trying important criminal cases and hearing appeals in civil cases from the senatorial provinces. The equestrian class was made up of those who possessed property of the value of 400,000 sesterces or more, and the privilege of wearing the narrow purple band on the toga. With the knights the emperors filled many important financial and administrative positions in Italy and the provinces which were under their control.

IV. Roman Religion.—(1) The Roman religion was originally more consistent than the Gr, because the deities as conceived by the uneducated Lat people were without human character. They were the influences or forces which directed the visible phenomena of the physical world, whose favor was necessary to the material prosperity of mankind. It would be incongruous to assume the existence of a system of theological doctrines in the primitive period. Ethical considerations entered to only a limited extent into the attitude of the Romans toward their gods. Religion partook of the nature of a contract by which men pledged themselves to the scrupulous observance of certain sacrifices and other ceremonies, and in return deemed themselves entitled to expect the active support of the gods in bringing their projects to a fortunate conclusion. The Romans were naturally polytheists as a result of their conception of divinity. Since before the dawn of science there was no semblance of unity in the natural world, there could be no unity in heaven. There must be a controlling spirit over every important event, be it personal or public, be it person, and every process of nature. The gods, therefore, were more numerous than mankind itself.

(2) At an early period the government became distinctly secular. The priests were the servants of the community for preserving the venerable traditions. They performed the formalism and ceremonies, many of which lost at an early period such spirit as they once possessed. The magistrates were the true representatives of the community in its relationship with the deities both in seeking the divine will in the auspices and in performing the more important sacrifices.

(3) The Romans at first did not make statues of their gods. This was partly due to lack of skill, but mainly to the vagueness of their conceptions of the highest beings. Symbols of the gods were usually the existence, a spear, for instance, standing for Mars. The process of reducing the gods to human form was inaugurated when they came into contact with the Etruscans and Greeks. The Tarquins summoned Etruscan artisans and artists to Rome, who made them terra-cotta religious statues and a pediment group for the Capitoline temple.

The types of the Gr deities had already been definitely established when the Hellenic influence in molding Roman culture arrived. Greek gods were entirely the Gr gods became familiar to the Romans in works of sculpture, they gradually supplanted those Rom deities with which they had not nominally a real or fanciful resemblance. See GREECE, RELIGION IN.

(4) The importation of new gods was a comparatively easy matter. Polytheism is by its nature tolerant because of its indefiniteness. The Romans could no more presume to have exhaustive knowledge of the gods than they could pretend to possess a comprehensive acquaintance with the universe and its gods. The increased necessity as human consciousness of natural phenomena expanded. Besides, it was customary to invite the gods of conquered cities to transfer their abode to Rome and favor the Romans in their undertakings. But the most productive source for religious expansion was the Sibyline Books. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE. This oracular work was brought to Rome from Cumae, a center of the cult of Apollo. It was consulted at times of crisis with a view to discover what special ceremony would secure adequate divine aid. The forms of worship recommended by the Sibyline Books were exclusively Gr. As early as the 5th cent. BC the cult of Apollo was introduced at Rome. Heracles and the Dioscuri found their way thither about the same time. Later Italian Divas were merged with Artemis, and the group of Ceres, Liber, and Libera were identified with foreign Demeter, Dionysus, and Persephone. Thus Rom religion became progressively Hellenized. By the close of the Second Punic War the greater gods of Greece had all found a home by the Tiber, and the myriad of petty local deities who found no counterpart in the celestial beings of Mt. Olympus fell into oblivion. Their memory was retained by the antiquarian lore of the priests alone (see Roman Empire and Christianity, III, 1).

Rom religion received with the engrafted branches of Gr religion the germs of rapid decay, for its Hellenization made Rom religion peculiarly susceptible to the attack of philosophy. The cultivated class in Gr society was already permeated with skepticism. The philosophers made the gods appear ridiculous. Gr philosophy gained a firm foothold in Rome in the 2d cent. BC, and it became customary a little later to look upon Athens as a sort of university town where the sons of the aristocracy should be sent for the completion of their education in the schools of the philosophers. Thus at the termination of the republican era religious faith had departed from the upper classes largely, and during the turmoil of the civil wars even the external ceremonies were often abandoned and many temples fell into ruins. There had never been any intimate connection between formal religion and conduct, except when the faith of the gods was invoked to secure the fulfillment of sworn promises.

Augustus tried in every way to restore the old religion, rebuilding no fewer than 82 temples which lay in ruins at Rome. A revival of religious faith did occur under the empire, although its spirit was largely antithetical to that which had been displayed in the performance of the official cult. The people remained superstitious, even when the cultivated classes adopted a skeptical philosophy. The formal religion of the state no longer appealed to them, since it offered nothing to the emotions or hopes. On the other hand the sacramental, mysterious character of oriental religions inevitably attracted them. This is the reason why the religions of Egypt and Syria spread over the empire and exercised an insurmountable influence over the life of the people. The partial success of Judaism and the ultimate triumph of Christianity may be ascribed in part to the same causes.

In concluding we should bear in mind that the state dictated no system of theology, that the empire in the beginning presented a spectacle of a sort of religious chaos where all national cults were guaranteed protection, that Rom polytheism was naturally tolerant, and that only the form of religion which the state could not endure was one which was equivalent to an attack upon the foundations of polytheism as a whole, since this would imperil the welfare of the community by depriving the deities of the offerings and other services in return for which their favor could be expected.

V. Rome and the Jews.—Judea became a part of the province of Syria in 63 BC (Jos, BJ, vii, 7), and Hyrcanus, brother of the last king, remained as high priest (archieræus kai attharchès; Jos, Ant, XIV, iv, 4) invested with judicial as well as religious functions. But Antony and Octavius gave Pal (46 BC) as a kingdom to Herod, surnamed the Great, although his rule did not become effective until 3 years later. His sovereignty was upheld by a Rom legion stationed at Jersus (Jos, Ant, XV, iii, 7), and he was obliged to pay tribute to the Rom government and provide auxiliaries for the Rom army (Appian, Bell. Civ, v, 75). Herod built a temple in honor of Augustus (Jos, Ant, XV, ix, 6), and the Rom procurators later made it the seat of government. At his death in 4 BC the kingdom was divided between his three surviving sons, the largest portion falling to Archelaus, who ruled Judea, Samaria and Idumaea with the title attharchès (Jos, Ant, XVII, xi, 4) until 6 AD, when he was deposed and his realm reduced to the position of a province. The administration by Rom procurators (see Procurator), which was now established, was interrupted during the reign of Augustus, when royal authority was exercised by Herod Agrippa, grandson of Herod the Great, over the lands which had been embraced in the kingdom of his grandfather (Jos, Ant, XIX, viii, 2), and, after 53 AD, Agrippa II ruled a considerable part of Pal (Jos, Ant, XX, vii, 1, viii, 4).

After the fall of Jersus and the termination of the great revolt in 70 AD, Pal remained a separate province. Henceforth a legion (legio X Fretensis) was added to the military forces stationed in the land, which was encamped at the ruins of Jersus. Consequently, imperial governors of praetorian rank (legati Augusti pro praetore) took the place of the former procurators (Jos, BJ, VII, i, 2, 3; Dio Cassius IV, 23).

Several treaties are recorded between the Romans and Jews as early as the time of the Maccabees (Jos, Ant, XII, x, 6; XIII, ix, 2; viii, 5), and Jews are known to have been at Rome as early as 138 BC. They became very numerous in the capital after the return of Pomp. who brought back many captives (see Libertines). Cicero speaks of multitudes of Jews at Rome in 58 BC (Pro Flacco 28), and Caesar was very friendly toward them (Suetonius Caesar 84). Held in favor by Augustus, they recovered the privilege of collecting sums to send to the temple (Pisto Legatio ad Casum 40). Agrippa offered 100 oxen in the temple when visiting Herod (Jos. Ant. XVI. i. 1), and Augustus established a daily offering of a bull and two lambs. Upon the whole the Roman government displayed noticeable consideration for the religious scruples of the Jews. They were exempted from military service and the duty of appearing in court on the Sabbath. Yet Tiberius repulsed Jewish riot in Rome in 19 AD (Suetonius Tiberius 36) and Claudius expelled the Jews from the city in 49 AD (Suetonius Claudius 25); but in both instances repression was not of long duration.

The Jews made themselves notorious in Rome in propagating their religion by means of proselytizing (Horace Satires i. 4, 142; i. 9, 2. Jewish 69; Juvenal xiv. 96; Tacitus Hist. Proselytism v. 5), and the literature of the Augustan age contains several references to the observation of the Sabbath (Thibalus 13; Ovid Ars amatoria 675, 415; Remedium amoris 219). Proselytes from among the Gentiles were not always required to observe all the prescriptions of the Law. The proselytes of the Gate (sedebona), as they were called, could not fully identify with the Jewish public worship, and abstained from the blood and meat of sacrificed animals. Among such proselytes may be included the centurion of Capernaum (Lk 7 5), the centurion Cornelius (Acts 10 1), and the emperor Poppaea (Jos. Ant. XIX. vii. 11; Tacitus Ann. xv. 6). On "proselytes of the Gate," G. IV. III. 177, very properly corrects the error in H. P. "These "Gate" people were not proselytes at all: the first step that carried them into Judaism—viz. circumcision (Ramsay, Expos. 1809, p. 200; Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, I. 11; see Devices—Proselytes). Notwithstanding the diffusion of Judaism by means of proselytism, the Jews themselves lived for the most part in isolation in the poorest parts of the city or suburbs, across the Tiber, near the Circus Maximus, or outside the Porta Capena, except with its synagogue and council of elders presided over by a gerusier. Five cemeteries have been discovered with many Gr. few Lat, but no Heb inscriptions.

VI. Rome and the Christians.—The date of the introduction of Christianity into Rome cannot be determined. A Christian community 1. Intro- existed at the time of the arrival of St. duction of Paul (Acts 28 15), to which he had Christianity addressed his Ep. a few years before (58 AD). It is commonly thought that the statement regarding the expulsion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius on account of the commotion excited among them by the agitation of Chrestus (Suetonius Claudius 25; Iunius impul- sivus—Castris actedi tunc hulcrodas Roma expulsi, probably in 49 AD), is proof of the diffusion of Chris- tian teaching in Rome, on the ground that Chrestus is a colloquial, or mistaken, form of Christus. It has been suggested that the Christian faith was brought to Rome by some of the Romans who were converted at the time of Pentecost (Acts 2 10. 41). It would be out of place to discuss here the grounds for the traditional belief that St. Peter was twice in Rome, once before 50 AD and again subsequent to the arrival of St. Paul, and that together the two apostles established the church there. Our present concern is with the attitude of the government and society toward Christianity, when once established. It may suf- fice, therefore, to remind the reader that St. Paul was permitted to preach freely while nominally in custody (Phil 1 13), and that as early as 64 AD the Christians were very numerous (Tacitus Ann. xv. 44: autotud ingens).

At first the Christians were not distinguished from the Jews, but shared in the toleration, or even protection, which was usually conceded to the aliens. The application of the term "Christian" to one of the peoples embraced within the empire. Christianity was not legally proscribed until after its dis- tinction from Judaism was clearly perceived. Two questions demand our attention: (1) When was Christianity recognized as a sect of Judaism? (2) When was the profession of Christianity declared a crime? These problems are of fundamental im- portance in the history of the church under the Roman empire.

1. If we may accept the passage in Suetonius cited above (Claudius 25) as testimony on the victories of Christianity, we infer that at that time the Christians were confused with the Jews. The employing Pontius Pilate, who was committed to the jurisdiction of her husband (Tacitus Ann. xiii. 32) for adherence to a foreign belief (sapiens de religione) with a view to securing proof that as early as 57 AD Christianity had secured a covert in the provinces, as well as in the empire. Evidence in this case by the contemporary authority from whom Tacitus has gleaned this incident would supply an opportunity to the author of Tacitus to throw light on several oriental religions from the point of view of Romans of that period; for Pompilia, his amatae, would have been of another manner since 44 AD. Since there is some other evidence that Pompilia was a Christian, the indefinite account of the accusation against her as mentioned by Tacitus is partial proof that Christianity had not as yet been considered as a sect of Judaism. This is the recognition of the distinctive character of Christianity from Judaism already taken by the author of this history. It was probably due in large measure to the circumstances of St. Paul's sojourn and trial in Rome and to the unexpected number of converts made at that time. The emperor Poppaea, who was probably an adherent of Judaism (Jos. Ant. XIX. viii), may have enlightened the imperial court regarding the heresy of the Christians and their separation from the parent stock.

2. In attempting to determine approximately the time at which Christianity was placed under the official ban of the imperial government, the convenient date to adopt as starting-points certain incontestable dates between which the act of proscription must be issued. It is clear that at the time of the great confirma- tion (64 AD), the profession of Christianity was not a ground for any imperial action. Oppian writes that Nero at liberty by decree of the imperial court (of 2 Tim 4 17). Moreover, there is a charge against the Christians was a plot to burn the city, not adherence to a proscribed religion, and they were condemned, as it appears, for an attitude of hostility toward the human race (Tacitus Ann. xvi. 44). While governor of Bithynia (c. 112 AD), Pliny the younger addressed Trajan in a celebrated letter (x. 96) asking advice to guide his conduct in the trial of many persons who were accused as Christians, and inquiring particularly whether Christianity in itself was culpable, or only the faults which usually accompanied adherence to the new faith. The reply of the emperor makes quite plain the fundamental guilt at that time of adherence to Christianity, and it supposes a law already existing against it (x. 96. 2). It follows, therefore, that the law against Christianity was the legal basis for the persecution mentioned by the emperor. But the evidence of the confirmation in 64 AD and Pliny's administration of Bithynia. We cannot define the time of this important act of legislation more closely with absolute certainty, although evidence is not wanting for the support of theories of more or less modernity. Tradition ascribes a general persecution to the reign of Domitian, which would imply that Christianity had acquired the status of a forbidden religion at that time. Allusions in Rev. (6. 9), the references to recent calamities in Rome by St. Clement in his first letter to the Corinthians (A.D. 55), the condemnation of Aelius Glabrio (Dio Cassius lxvii. 13), a man of consular rank, together with the emperor's cousin Flavius Clemens (Dio Cassius, xii, 8) and Flavia Domitilla and many others on the charge of atheism and Jewish customs (2 Mitre 30, A.D.), are close aids to the persecution. The fact that a number of persons in Bithynia abandoned Christianity many years before the judicial investigation of Pliny (Pliny x. 96) is an important as corroborative evidence.
But there are grounds worthy of consideration for carrying the point of departure back of Domitian. The letter of St. Peter to the Babylonians (Rom. 1:9) and the Christians in Asia Minor implies an impending persecution (Rev. 13:9). This was probably in the closing years of the reign of Nero, Allard previously observes (Histoire des persécutions, 61) that the mention of the persecution of the Christians apart from the description of the great fire in the work of Suetonius (Ner. 16), amid a number of acts of legislation, is evidence of a general enactment. These have been adopted at the time of, or soon after, the proceedings which led to the issue of the edict of Domitian. Upon the whole the theory that the policy of the imperial government was definitely established under Nero carries with it considerable probability (cf. Sulpicius Severus, Chron. ii. 41).

Although the original enactment has not been lost the correspondence of Pliny and Trajan enables us to formulate the imperial policy in dealing with the Christian question. Adherence to Christianity was in itself culpable. But the proceedings were not to be undertaken by magistrates on their own initiative; they were to proceed only from charges brought by voluntary denunciations, after careful consideration of the proofs of their assertions. Informal and anonymous information must be rejected. Penitence shown in abandoning Christianity absolved the accused from the legal penalty of former guilt. The act of adoring the gods and the celebration of the festival rites were more than sufficient proof of non-adherence to Christianity or of repentance.

The attitude of the imperial authorities in the 3d cent. was more complex. The problem became more complicated as Christianity grew. Persecution was directed more esp. against the church as an organization, since it was now an established power. About 202 AD, Septimius Severus issued a decree forbidding specific activities and respecting Judaism or Christianity (Suetonius, Severus, 17), in which he departed from the method of procedure prescribed by Trajan. Nevertheless, the persecution was continued without any specific edict, and the Jews and Christians were put in the same category as any other religious establishment. Although a few edicts were directed against the Jewish community, there is no positive evidence that Christianity was ever regarded as a danger to the state or that it was the subject of a special edict. The practice of the emperors was more general. The pagans were to be dealt with by the usual procedure of the state, and the Christians were to be treated on the same basis as their actions were proved to be contrary to the laws of the state.

Under Valerian (253 AD) the Christian organizations were to be suppressed and the churches were to be destroyed. But an edict in 260 AD restored this property (Eusebius, VII. 15). A short persecution under Aurélion (274 AD) broke the long period of calm which extended to the first edict of persecution of Diocletian (February 24, 303). The edict of Valerian was merely a reissue of the same law, proclaiming the same modal claim to exist, for Diocletian did not at first consider them a guilty capital crime. His successors, borne down by the many incursions of the tribes, by the onrush of the barbarians, and by the increasing destruction of churches and sacred books, and an habitual governmental and social decadence (Lactantius, De Morti Persecutorum, x. 11, 12, 13; Eusebius, VIII. 1, 2, 10), issued a series of edicts, under which the sacrists were arrested for the public and imperial edicts. They were not put to death until they renounced the faith (Eusebius, VIII. 6). Finally, the requirement of an act of conformity in sacrificing to the gods was made general. This final persecution, continuing in an irregular way with varying degrees of severity, terminated with the defeat of Maxentius by Constantine (October 29, 312). The Edict of Milan issued by Constantine and Licinius the following year established toleration, the restoration of ecclesiastical property and the peace of the church. Rome

ROSE, ROY. See rose.

ROSE-CHAMBER. See House.

ROOM, ROOM. See House.

ROOT, ROOT (ר', סֵּנָךְ, shèresh; πέρα, rhiza): Frequently mentioned in the OT and NT, but almost always in a figurative sense, e.g. "root of the righteous" (Prov 12: 312); "root that heareth gall" (Dt 29: 18); "Their root shall be as roteness" (Is 5: 24); "root of bitterness" (He 12: 15). Also of peoples: "they whose root is in Amalek" (Jgs 5: 14); of Assyria (Ezk 31: 7); "Ephraim is smitten, their root is dried up" (Hos 9: 16); "Judah shall again take root" (Isa 60: 21). The root of Jesse (Isa 11: 10; Rom 15: 12); root of David (Rev 5: 5; 22: 16).

ROOT OF DAVID. See David, Root of.

ROOT OF JESUS (יהוּדָּא, יְהוּדָּא, shèresh yishav; יְשֵׁרְתָּא, yeshret; רֵיחַ יְשֵׁשָׂל, rhiza toh Jesal; Rom 12: 16): The Heb and Gr words are practically the same in meaning. "Root" means descendant, branch of the family or stock. The Messianic king was to be the family of Jesse the father of David. In Rom 16: 12 Paul quotes the LXX of Isa. 11: 10. Jesus is a branch or descendant of the family of Jesse, as well as of David. See also David, Root of.

ROPE, ROPE (רֶפֶף, ῥῆφα, רֵחָב; רֵיחָל, ῥηχάλ; ῥῆβι, ῥηβί, רָב הָן, hēbel, "that which binds" (2 S 17: 13, etc); for ῥῆβι, "hbhôth, "that which is won" (Jgs 15: 13, etc). In neither word is any specified thickness or strength connoted, and ῥῆβι is in equally well by "line" (2 S 8: 2, etc) or "cord" (Josh 2: 15, etc), and ῥῆβι by "cord" (Ps 118: 27, etc), as best suits the context. Similarly in the NT the word ῥῆιος, σαχονίον, ῥῆχος, ῥῆιος, ῥαιρίον, "made of rushes," can mean the rope by which a boat is fastened (Acts 27: 32) or small cords suitable for a whip (Jn 2: 15). The usual material for ropes was certainly flax (hemp), but the Egyptians, and so possibly the Hebrews, at times made ropes of leathern thongs. See Cord; Line; Ships and Boats; III, 2.

ROSE, ROSE (1) (רְפֶּסָא, ῥῆθος, ῥῆθος, "a flower" [Cant 2: 1], ρῆος, κρινον, "a lily" [Isa 35: 1]): By general consent EV is wrong: in Cant 2: 1 reads "Heb hawahzeloth, the autumn flowers," and in Isa 35: 1, to reads "or autumn crocus." This is the Colchicum autumnale (N.O. Liliaceae). A Tg on Cant 2: 1 explains the Heb word as "narcissus," a very common plant in the plains and mountains of Pal and a great favorite with the ancients. Two species, N. N. and scabiosa (N.O. Amaranthaceae), occur, the latter being the finer; they are autumn plants. All authorities agree that the so-called "rose" was some kind of bulbous plant. (2) ῥῆος, ρῆος, "the rose," mentioned in Ecles 24: 14; 39: 13; 50: 8; Wis 2: 8; 2 Esd 2: 19: There is no reason why the rose, of which several varieties are common in Pal, should not be meant. Tristan favors the rhododromon. The expression, "rose plants in Jericho," in Ecles 24: 14 has nothing whatever to do with what is now sold there as a "rose of Jericho," a dwarf annual plant, Aruncus hierochuntina (N.O. Cruciferae), which dries up and can be made to reexpand by placing the root in water.

ROSH, Rosh: A son or grandson of Benjamin (Gen 46: 21).

ROSH (רְשָׁה, רְשָׁה; 'Pös, Rhos, var. [Q'w] ḫiphōn, ḫophote; Vulg capit) (capi): This name occurs in the prophecies against Gog in Ezek 38: 19; 39: 1, where AV has "Gog, the chief prince of Renderings Meshech and Tubal." This is due to "rbsh" being the common Heb word for "head" or "chief" (cf. Gr varient and the Vulg), and is regarded as incorrect, that of the RV, “Gog, of the land of Magog, the prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal,” being preferred.

The identification of Rosh is not without its difficulties. Gesenius regarded it as indicating the Russians, who are mentioned in Byzantine writers of the 10th cent. under the name of Rosh. He adds that they are also noticed by Ibn Foselan (same period), under the name of Râs, as a people dwelling on the river Rha (Volga). Apart from the improbability that the dominion of Gog extended to this district, it would be needful to know at what date the Râs of the Volga arrived there.

Notwithstanding objections on account of its eastern position, in all probability Fried. Delitzsch’s identification of Rosh with the mât Râbî, “land of Râbî” of the Assyrian inscriptions, is the best. Sargon of Assyria (c 710 BC) conquered the countries “from the land of Râbî on the border of Elam as far as the river of Rha,” and this country is further described in his Khorsabad Inscription, 18, as “the land of Râsû, the boundary of Elam, which is beside the Tigris.” Assyria having disappeared from among the nations when Ezekiel wrote his prophecies, Babylonia was probably the kingdom with power which “Gog of the land of Magog” would have had to reckon, but it may well be doubted whether the Bab king would have allowed him to exercise power in the district of Râsû, except as a very faithful vassal. It may here be noted that the Hebrew spelling of Rosh presupposes an earlier pronunciation as Râsh, a form agreeing closely with that used by the Assyrians. See Fried. Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies? 522.

ROT, rot, ROTTENNESS, rotteness. rot. roth, root, rootnote, rootnote (vbs. râbâh, râbî, roth, râbâh, rotheh. noun roâdâh (roâdâhâh), Job 41 27), with âb, mak, “decay” (Isa 5 24), and âbâsh, “shriveil” (so Joel 1 17 RVm): “Rotteness of the bones” (Prov 12 4; 14 30; Hab 3 16) is ulceration (caries) of the bones, used as an example of an intensely painful disease. AV, in addition, has “rot” in Nu 5 21.22.27 where RV has “fall away” (âbî, râb, but a euphemistic phrase is in point (see the note in the A.V.). In Jer 11.12 AV has “old rotten rags” for abî, melah, “rag” (RV “worn-out garments,” a tr that specializes too far).

ROKE, rôt: RVm gives “learned by rote” in Isa 29 13 for “taught,” which indicates that the service of Jeh was merely formal.

ROWER, rër, ROWING, rîing. See SHIPS and BOATS, III, 1.

ROYAL, rojâl: Either belonging to a king (kingdom) or having kingly power, dignity, authority, etc., in Heb, the word is expressed by using different nouns in the gen. case (the “construct state”), e.g., melâkh, “king;” Âsher, “Asher:” they shall yield royal dainties,” lit. choice morsels of the king, meaning fit for a king (Gen 49 20): “besides that which Solomon gave her of his royal bounty,” lit. which he gave her according to the hand (the wealth) of King Solomon (1 K 10 13; cf RVm): “a royal statute,” lit. statute of a malâkh, which is the emphatic Aram. term for melâkh, “king” (Dnli 6 7): (2) mammalâkhah, “the power and dignity of a king,” “Gibeah, one of the royal cities,” lit. a capital city with a king of her own (Josh 10 2; cf 1 S 27 5): “all the seed royal,” lit. the seed of the kingdom (2 K 11 1; cf 2 Ch 22 10); (3) malakhuth, “kinghood,” “kingdom”: “royal majesty,” lit. majesty of kingdom (1 Ch 29 25): quite frequently in the Book of Est; royal wine (1 7): crown (1 11; cf 2 17; 6 8); commandment (1 19); “her royal estate,” lit. her kingdom (1 19); house royal (2 16; cf 5 1); royal apparel (6 1; cf 6 8, 15); throne (5 1); “mighty powers, kingdom;” “kingly power and majesty;” “royal city,” lit. the city of the kingdom, meaning here that part of the city (Rabbah) in which the royal palace was situated (2 S 12 26); “royal diadem,” lit. turban of kingdom (Isa 62 3); (5) in Jer 43 10 we find the word shaphrît; its meaning is uncertain: “royal pavilion” (RV and AV), “glittering” (RVm), “scepter,” “a carpet covering a throne.”

The NT uses the word for basileus, “belonging to a king;” “royal apparel” (Acts 12 21); “the royal law,” something like “the golden rule,” being foremost because including all others (Jas 2 5), and for basileus (being vested with kingly power and honor) “royal priesthood,” the Heb rendering would be mamlekth eth kôhânim, “a kingdom of priests,” i.e., a kingdom whose citizens are priests, emphasizing the two facts that the true Christians have free access to the grace of God and that they enjoy the liberties and privileges of His kingdom (1 Pet 2 9).

RUDICENTS, ro'di-men'ts (stô'thîk'â, stokheia, pl. of stô'this, stokheion, Gal 4 3 9; Col 2 20; He 5 12; 2 Pet 3 10 12)). This word occurs 7 times in the NT, and AV translates it in three different ways. In the two passages in Gal, and in the two in 2 Pet, it is rendered “elements.” In the two passages in Col, it is tr “rudiments.” In He it is rendered “first principles.”

The etymological meaning of the word is, that which belongs to a stage or rank, hence any first thing, an element, first principle. It denotes, specially (1) the letters of the logical alphabet, the spoken sounds, as the elements of speech; (2) the material elements of the universe, the physical atoms of which the world is composed; (3) the heavenly bodies; (4) the elements, rudiments, fundamental principles of any art, science or discipline; of the phrase, “the a, b, c,” etc. (1) The NT use of the word, where it always occurs in the pl., is as follows: In 2 Pet 3 10 12, “The elements shall be dissolved with fervent heat,” that is, the physical elements of the world and of the heavens are to be consumed, or subjected to change, by means of fire. In Hc 5 12, AV "Ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God." This means that the Heb Christians had not advanced to the advance expected, in Gal 4 3.9 AV Paul writes, "When we were children, [we] were in bondage under the elements of the world"; "How turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereinunto ye desire again to be in bondage?" The apostle here means the ceremonial precepts of the worship of the Jews. These requirements involved much and protracted difficulty in their observance; they were "a yoke . . . which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear" (Acts 15 10). Yet the Galatian converts were turning back again to these legal ordinances, and desired to be in bondage to them. These elements were "of the world," they had reference to material and not to spiritual things, they were formal and sensuous. They were "weak," for they had no power to rescue man from condemnation, and they could not save him from sin. They were "beggarly," for they brought no endowment of the heavenly riches. By these epithets Paul signifies that rites, ordinances, sacrifices, observance of days and seasons belonged to the elementary stages of the Jewish religion, which had not attained its end and purpose in the coming of Christ and His work. These things were necessary at the time they were Divinely instituted, but the time had come when they were no longer required. They contained and enclosed an essential of the new knowledge, were root knowledge, from the first, to lead to an advance in the moral and spiritual life, which is now revealed in Christ.

It has been thought by some that what is meant by "elements" or "rudiments" in Gal and Col is the physical elements, preceived over by angels, and that this is in some way connected with the worship of angels, to which Paul refers in Col 2 18. The Jews believed that there were angels of fire and of the wind, and of the other physical elements. The apostle therefore wished to show that the worship of angels and of the heavenly bodies which they were supposed to control, this latter meaning of the term is a possible, but not a probable one. The interpretation, already first given, with understanding of the "elements" to mean the ordinances of Jewish legalism, is most in harmony with the gospel and the purpose of the apostle. For Paul, "the rudiments" are probably the correct interpretation, both as simpler in itself and as suiting the context better. St. Paul seems to be dwelling still on the previous chapter, or rather characterizing the law, as fitted to "serve for an earlier stage in the world's history" (Lightfoot, Comm. on Gal, 167).

In Col 2 5 AV Paul writes, "Beware lest any man spoil you, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ"; and in ver 20, AV "Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why . . . are ye subject to ordinances?" The meaning of the term here is the elements of religious training, the ceremonial precepts of the Jewish Law. In Col and Gal the meaning is that the systems of the false teachers, both in Colossae and in Galatia, laid stress on Jewish ritual, ceremonial law and ascetic observances—things of this world, belonging to the visible sphere, things external, and intended, as being the Jewish Law is concerned, simply as a preparation for the coming of Christ. Such were the rudiments of the world, so far as their source was Jewish. On their heathen side they were still more decidedly anti-Christian. Both of these tendencies, Jewish and heathen, were "not according to Christ," 2 Cor 3 6. For Christ Himself who atoned for sin, and who now lives and reigns, delivers believers from all such methods, as well as from the need of them. — John Rutterford

RUE, רווה (רְיוֹחַ, ōyôkh; Rapha);: One of the plants mentioned in Lk 11 42 as subject to tithe: in the passage, Mt 23 23, anise and cummin are mentioned. Rueda (N.O. Rutaceae) is the official rue, and a very similar species, R. chalepensis, is indigenous. Rue is a small shrub growing 2 to 4 ft. high with a heavy odor, disagreeable to Westerners, but a favorite with Orientals. A sprig of rue is often fixed on a child's cap or clothes as a kind of charm.

RUFUS, רְפּוּס (רֵפּוּס, Raphos);: The name is mentioned twice: (1) Simon of Cyrene, who was compelled to bear the cross of Jesus, is "the father of Alexander and Rufus" (Mk 15 21); (2) Paul sends greetings to Rom Christians, "Rufus the chosen, and his mother and mine" (Rom 16 13). Rufus was well known among those for whom Mark primarily wrote his Gospel, and according to tradition this was the Christian community at Rome. There seems no reason to doubt, therefore, that the Rufus of Mark and the Rufus of Paul are the same person. The name, meaning "red," "reddish," was, however, one of the commonest of slave names; the identification of these two is therefore merely a conjecture. The Rufus whom Paul greets is "the chosen in the Lord," i.e. "that choice Christian" (Demisy). Since all Christians are "chosen," this title must express some distinction. The mother of Rufus had played the mother's part to Paul on some occasion of which we are ignorant, hence the phrase "his mother and mine" (cf Mk 10 30).

RUG, ṛug, ṛug: Alternative rendering of a word (רְגוּשׁ, ṛug, or ṛug, "horrible"); in Jgs 4 18 RV, "mantle" AV. The tr is doubtful; OHL gives "rug or thick coverlet"? [1]

RUHAMAH, רְחָמָה, ṛahâmâ: See Lo-Ruhamah, the symbolic name of Hosea's daughter (Hos 1 6 8).

RUIN, ṛūin (רְיוּן, ṛūin, "ruin"); the tr of ṛēthā, ṛūin, ṛēthā; "Ruin," the tr of ṛēthā (Am 9 11; cf Acts 15 16, where RV Gr text, ἀπὸ ὀρείσκεσθαι, and of a number of other Heb words: in Lk 6 49 ῥήγμα, "breakage," is used both in a literal sense (Isa 23 13; 25 2, of fallen buildings; Ezk 27 27; 31 13, of a state or people; Lk 6 49, of a house, etc) and with a moral significance (Proverbs 26 28). RV correctly renders mikheĥel in Ezk 18 30 "stumblingblock" (AV "ruin"), and RV in 21 15 "stumbling" (AV "ruins"). RV has "ruins" for AV "desolation" in Ezr 9 9, m "waste places"; Ps 74 3; in "their ruins" for "with their mantles" (2 Ch 34 8, m "with their axes. The Heb is obscure"; "midst of the ruin" for "desolation" (Job 10 13); "their ruin" for "their wickedness" (Proverbs 21 12). "Ruinous" is the tr of map- ēgalāh (Isa 17 1) and of ūnāh (2 K 19 25; Isa 37 26).

RULER, ṛōler;: (1) מַשָּׁה, Ma-shah, "ruler," "ruler," "prince," "master" (tirant), applied to Joseph in Egypt (Gen 45 8; cf Ps 105 21); to the Philis (Jgs 16 11); to David's descendants, the future kings of Israel (2 Ch 7...
1; cf Jer 33 26); to Pharaoh (Ps 105 20); to a wicked prince, a tyrant (Prov 28 15; cf Isa 14 5; 49 7); to the theocratic king, 1. In the the Messiah (Mic 5 2); it is often OT of the general (Gen 36 7; 23 1; 29 12; Eccl 10 4; Isa 16 1, etc.).

(2) ἀρχή, archē, "leader," "noble" (nobles), "prince." In a number of instances RV renders it "prince," where AV has ruler (1 S 25 30; 2 S 6 21; 1 K 1 35, etc.). It is used of Azikriam having charge of the palace of King Ahaz (2 Ch 22 7; governor) of Judah (Seraiah, Neh 11 11), who is called the "ruler of the house of God" (1 Ch 9 11; cf 2 Ch 31 13); he was the leader of a division or group of priests. In 2 Ch 36 28 the names of three others are given (Hilkiah, Zechariah and Jahiel).

(3) συμβολή, συμβολή, "prince" (so Nu 13 2; AV "ruler"); generally speaking, the συμβολή is one of the public authorities (Ex 22 28); the rulers of the congregation (Ex 16 22; cf 34 31); "The rulers brought the onyx stones" (Ex 35 27), as it was to be of the sons of men of the highest standing and financial ability: "when a ruler [the head of a tribe or tribal division] sinneth" (Lev 4 22).

(4) δικαίωσιν, ἰσότητα, "judge" or "magistrate;" (Isa 1 10; 3 6 7; 22 3; Mic 3 19); "a military chief" (Josh 10 24).

(5) ἰσότητα, ἰσότητα, one having dominion: "There is little Benjamin their ruler" (Ps 68 27); the meaning is obscure; still we may point to the facts that Saul, the first one to conquer the heathen (1 S 14 47), came of this the smallest of all the tribes, and that within its boundaries the temple of Jeh was erected.

(6) θυσία, ἱδρυ, a "dignitary," "a prince." "The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against Jeh (Ps 2 2); in the NT the word rendered archontes (Acts 4 26).

(7) σωρός, σωρός, "chief," "head"; prince, king. A nobleman having judicial or other power; a royal officer. RV renders it frequently "prince": "rulers over my cattle" ("head-shepherds," Gen 47 6); "rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds," etc (Ex 18 21); they had to be men of good character because they were endowed with judicial power (ver 22); in Dt 1 15 the rendering of EV is "captains," etc; they were military leaders. "Zebul the ruler of the city" (of Shechem, Jgs 9 30); meaning "governor" (of 1 K 22 26; 2 K 23 8); "rulers [or captains; of 1 K 16 9] of his [Solomon's] chariots" (1 K 9 22); the rulers of Jezreel (2 K 10 1) were, presumably, the ruler of the palace of the king and the ruler of the city of Samaria (cf ver 5). It is difficult to explain why they should be called the rulers of Jezreel; both the LXX and RV omit the word; "the rulers of the substance which was king David's" (1 Ch 27 31) overseers of the royal domain; "The rulers were behind all the house of Judah" (Neh 4 16), the officers were ready to assemble in case of an attack.

(9), (10) στρατηγός, στρατηγός, "a commander," "an officer": "the rulers of the provinces" (Dnl 3 25); στρατηγός, "a person in power," "a potentate" (Dnl 2 10); there seems to be little doubt that the Aram. term is used as an adj. (cf RVm); in Dnl 5 7 occurs the vb. στρατατεύομαι, "to have dominion," "he shall rule as the third in rank" (cf vs 16 29).

(11) σαμάν, nāḥām, "shielid;" "Her rulers [shields] dearly love shame" (Hos 4 18). Perhaps we ought to read (with LXX) māgyō nāmām, "their glory," and to translate "they love shame more than their glory;" they would rather have a good (!) time than a good name.

(1) ἀρχῶν, archōn, used of the "rulers" of the Spartans (1 Mac 14 20) and, in a general sense, of the "rulers" of the Jews (Mic 5 5) (cf 2 K 24 6); has the word also in a general sense in Sir 53 18 (RV "ruler").

2. In the Apoc (2) οὐρανός, οὐρανός, "one leading the way." A quite general term, Sir 10 2 (ruler of a city); 17 17 (of gentile nations); 46 18 (of the Jews). Also 2 17 AV (RV "he that ruleth"); and 3 20 AV (a "ruler").

(3) οἱ μεγαντάται, μεγαντάται, a rare word found only in the pl., for "rulers of the congregation," (Sir 33 18) the same word in Mic 6 24 is called "lords;" (4) 2 Mac 4 27 AV for εἰρήνης, εἰρήνης (RV "governor").

(5) AV inserts the word without Gr equivalent in 1 Mac 6 14: 11 57; 1 Mac 13 2.

(1) ἀρχών, archōn, "a person in authority," "a magistrate," "a judge," "a prince;" a councillor, a member of the upper council of the Jews; a man of influence. "There NT came a ruler" (Mt 9 18), meaning a ruler of the synagogue (cf Mk 5 22; Lk 8 41); see (2) below; "one of the rulers of the Pharisees" (Lk 14 1), perhaps a member of the Jewish council belonging, at the same time, to the Pharisees, or, more probably, one of the leading Pharisees; "the chief priests and the rulers" (Lk 23 13 35; 24 20; of Jn 3 17; 7 26 48; 12 42; Acts 3 17; 4 5 8; 13 27 50); they were, with the chief priests and the scribes, members of the Sanhedrin, either of two councils of the Jews (the Great and the Lesser); they were lay-members (elders); before the rulers (Acts 16 19), the police magistrates (prœtorii, AV "masters") of the city of Philippi; "Thou shalt not speak evil of a ruler of thy people" (Acts 23 5; ex 22 28, nāth; see, 1, 3], above), a magistrate, a person in authority (of Acts 27 35; Rom 13 3, the public authorities; "the executors of this world" (Col 2 8); persons being mentally superior to their fellow-men, and so having great influence in shaping their opinions and directing their actions.

(2) ἀρχισύνεχος, archisynégōs, "ruler of the synagogue.

There was the president of the board, a board of elders, who had charge of the synagogue. Sometimes they, also, were given the same name (of "one of the rulers of the synagogue," Mk 5 22 55; Lk 8 41 49; in Mt 9 18 Jairus is simply called archēn; the ruler mentioned in Lk 13 14 was, of course, the president of the board (cf Acts 18 17, Sosthenes), while in Acts 13 15 the phrase "rulers of the synagogue" simply signifies the board. It was a deliberative body, but at the same time responsible for the maintenance of good order in the synagogue and the observance of its members; having, therefore, disciplinary power, they were authorized to reprimand, and even to excommuni-cate, the guilty ones (cf Jn 9 22; 12 45; 16 2).

(3) ἀρχισύνεχος, archisynégōs, "ruler of the synagogue" (of the feast (Jn 2 8 9). See separate article.

(4) κοσμοκράτωρ, kosmokrátōr, a "world-ruler" (Eph 6 12). The angels of the devil (Mt 26 41; 12 45) or Satan, the prince of this world (Jn 12 31), participate in this power; they are his tools, their sphere of action being "this darkness," i.e. the morally corrupt state of our present existence.

(5) παράκιερος, politarchēs; the prefect of a city (Acts 17 6 8). Luke being the only one of the BB authors to hand down to us this word, it is a noteworthy fact that, in relatively modern times, a Gr inscription was discovered containing this very word and, moreover, having reference to the city of Thessalonica (77 Th). Here it was where Paul and Silas preached the gospel so successfully that the Jews, "being moved with jealousy," caused Jason and certain brethren to be dragged before the rulers of the city ("epi tois politar-choi"). These magistrates suffered themselves to be made the tools of the unscrupulous Jews by demanding and getting security from Jason and the rest.

RULER OF THE FEAST (ἀρχηγός τοῦ συναγο-γοῦ; AV governor): The word occurs in the NT in the account of the wedding feast in Cana of Galilee (Jn 2:8-9). According to Eclesius (32:1) it was customary to appoint a "master of the ceremonies" from among the invited guests. It was his duty to determine the places of the guests, to see that the ordinary rules of etiquette were observed, etc., and generally to supervise the arrangements. RVm "steward" is possible if the "governor of the feast" meant the "head waiter" (Merx renders "head servant of the feast"), and not one of the guests appointed for a special purpose. But the context is in favor of the view that the person in question was one of the prominent guests—an intimate friend or relative of the host. See Ruler, 2, (2). T. LEWIS

RUMAH, ῥοῦμα (ῥοῦμα, ῥαμᾶ; B, Ρουμᾶ, Rhound, A, Ροῦμα, Rhound): To this place belonged Pecahiah whose daughter Zebudah (RV "Zebahdah") entered the harem of Josiah, king of Judah, and became the mother of Jehoiakim (2 K 23:36). Jos (Ant, x, v, 2) calls the place Abouma, but this is an obvious clerical error for Arouma. This suggests a possible identification with Arumah (Jgs 9:41), which lay not far from Shechem. Another possible identification is with the Rumah mentioned by Jos (BJ, III, vii, 21) in Galilee (cf Neubauer, Geog. du Talm, 203), which may be identical with the modern Kerit Râma, about 3 miles N. of Saferrâkh. Some, however, would identify Rumah with Dumah of Jos 15:52, where the substitution of r for d is supported by the LXX (Rhou- ma), possibly represented by the modern Dâmeh, about 13 miles S.E. of Beit Jôrbîn. This of course was in the territory of Judah, and no question of jas cannabium is involved, such as might arise in the case of a Galitalic site. W. EWING

RUMP, rump: AV uses this word as tr of ῥυμα, 'alyah (Ex 29:22; Lev 3:9; 7:3; 8:25; 9:19), where RV correctly renders "fat tail." Reference is here had to the broad tail of the Syrian sheep, which occasionally weighs as much as 20 lbs., and is considered one of the daintiest portions of mutton. It was one of those portions of the peace and trespass offering which were not eaten by the priest or the sacrificer, but which with other choice portions were waved before the Lord and wholly burnt on the altar as a sweet savor unto Jeh.

RUNAGATE, run'-a-gat: A runaway: "The runagates continue in scariness" (Ps 68:6, Prayer Book Version, RV "The rebellious dwell in a parched land").

having married women of Moab, in the course of a further ten years also died, and left Orpah and Ruth widows (1: 5). Naomi then decided to return to Judah, and her two daughters-in-law accompanied her on her journey, and gave her the blessing which turned back and only Ruth remained with Naomi, journeying with her to Bethlehem, where they arrived "in the beginning of barley harvest" (1: 22). The piety and fidelity of Ruth are thus early exhibited in the course of the narrative, in that she refused to abandon her mother-in-law, although thrice exhorted to do so by Naomi herself, on account of her own great age and the better prospects for Ruth in her own country. Orpah yielded to persuasion, and returned to Moab, but Ruth remained with Naomi.

At Bethlehem Ruth employed herself in gleaning in the field during the harvest and was noticed by Boaz, the owner of the field, a near kinsman of her father-in-law Eleimelech. Boaz gave her permission to glean as long as the harvest continued; and told her that he had heard of her filial conduct toward her mother-in-law. Moreover, he directed the reapers to make intentional provision for her by dropping the extra grain in her way (2: 15). She was thus able to return to Naomi in the evening with a whole ephah of barley (ver. 17). In answer to questioning she explained that her success in gleaning was due to the good-will of Boaz, and that she was determined to go to his field and glean there. Naomi, her husband, and her son were all dead, and she had been left to Boaz to recall to him his duty as near kinsman of her late husband Eleimelech (3: 1 f.).

Boaz acknowledged the claim and promised to take Ruth in marriage, fulfilling all the legal requirements of marriage. He gave her a Levitical inheritance and sent her to Boaz to recall to him his duty as near kinsman of her late husband Eleimelech (3: 8-13). Naomi was confident that Boaz would fulfill his promise, and advised Ruth to wait in patience.

Boaz then adopted the customary and legal measures to secure a decision. He summoned the near kinsman before ten elders at the gate of the city, related to him the circumstances of Naomi's return, with her desire that Ruth should be married and settled with her father-in-law's land as her marriageportion, promising to acquit himself of his legal obligations. The near kinsman, whose name and degree of relationship are not stated, declared his inability to undertake the charge, which he renounced in legal form in favor of Boaz according to ancient custom in Israel (4: 6 f.). Boaz accepted the charge thus transferred to him, the elders and bystanders bearing witness and pronouncing a formal blessing upon the union of Boaz and Ruth (4: 9-12). Upon the birth of a son in due course the women of the city congratulated Naomi, saying that "A new name is come upon Israel; and the young man is dead, and the woman is alive again, and the house is restored as before" (4: 11). Naomi said to her husband, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, who spake with his lips! Even I said it, and lo, it is come to pass!" (4: 13).

Thus the life and history of Ruth are important in the eyes of the narrator because she forms a link in the ancestry of the greatest king of Israel. From a more modern point of view the book exhibits an idyllic history, showing how the faithful loving service of Ruth to her mother-in-law met with its due reward in the restored happiness of a peaceful and prosperous home-life for herself. Incidentally are illustrated also ancient marriage customs of Israel, which in the time of the writer had long since become obsolete. The narrative is brief and told without affectation of style, and on that account will never lose its interest. It has preserved moreover the memory of an incident, the national significance of which they hold today, but to which value will always be attached for its simplicity and natural grace.

2. Authorship and Importance of the Narrative

RUTH, BOOK OF: The place which the Book of Ruth occupies in the order of the books of the Eng. Bible is not that of the Heb. Canon. The first book in the order is the famous "Pentateuch," or "five books," comprising the first five books of the Old Testament, and excluding Ruth. The second book in the order is Moses, or the "Book of the Law." Ruth occupies the second position because the book was appointed to be read at the Feast of Weeks which was one of the second of the 5 special days in Heb. MSS. However, the order was considered by the Masors, generally, and in one at least of the Gen. schools (ver. 15). Ruth precedes Cant. and in the former Ecc. is placed before Lam. The "m'ghillah" constitute the second portion of the "m'ghillah" order according to the structure of the books of the Heb. Scriptures. The Talm., however, associates Ruth altogether with the "m'ghillah," and places it first among the Hagiographies, before the Book of Ps. By the Gr. translators the book was removed to the position which it occupies in the Canon, and because it described events contemporaneous with the Judges, was attached as a kind of appendix to the latter work. This sequence was adopted in the Vulg., and so has passed into all modern Bibles.

The book is written without name of author, and there is no direct indication of its date. Its aim is to record an event of interest and importance in the family history of David, and incidentally to illustrate ancient custom and marriage law. There is no ground for supposing, as has been suggested, that the writer had a polemical purpose in view, and desired to show that the strict and stern action taken by Ezra and Nehemiah after the return in forbidding mixed marriages was not justified by precedent. The narrative is simple and direct, and the poignancy of the contrast which it records of the descent of Israel's royal house from a Moabite ancestress is probably due in the first instance to oral communication for some considerable time before it was committed to writing. The writer also has the advantage of an unwritten tradition between David and Moab, when during the period of his outlawry the future king confided his father and mother to the care of the king of Moab (1 & 23: 3 f.), and so fur supports the truth of the tradition which is embodied in the Book of Ruth.

With regard to the date at which the narrative was committed to writing, it is evident from the position of the Book of Ruth in the Heb. Canon that the date of its composition must be assigned to the close of the great period of the "earlier prophets." Otherwise it would have found a natural place, as was assigned to it in the Gr. Bible, together with the Book of Jgs and other historical writings, in the second division of the Heb. Scriptures. In the opening words of the book also, "It came to pass in the days when the judges judged" (Ruth 1: 1), the writer appears to look back to the period of the Judges as to a comparatively distant epoch. The character of the district is pure and畅通, but has been supposed in certain circles to betray the presence of so-called Aramaisms, to betray a late origin. The reference to the observance of marriage customs and their sanctions "in former time in Israel" (4: 7) does not necessarily imply that the composition of Ruth dates from such a time. It is possible that the laws and rights of the succession are enjoined, or

SABAENS, sa-ba'ons (םבאב'ון, sibba'ōnim; Joel 3 8 AV, צבאוים; 'Sabacon, Sabacon, Sabacon, Sabacon in Isa 45 14; צבאות, saba'oth). 1. Forms of read sibba'ōnim but rendered as though the Word from sibba', "to imbibe," hence "drunkards;" ol'ōn'áno, aín'oméni, "wine-drunkens" (Ezk 23 42 AV): "Sabaena" is also the tr. of the name of the country itself (םבאב'ון, sibba'ōn) in Job 3 15; 6 19. This last, which is the root of sibba'ōnim, is regarded by Arabists as coming from that root with the meaning of "to take captive," though sa'ba, "he raided" (cf Job 1 15), has also been suggested. As Sheba is said in Gen 10 7; 10 28; and 25 3 respectively to have been (1) a son of Raamah, the 4th son of Cush; (2) the 10th son of Joktan; son of Eber; (3) the 1st son of Joktan, son of Abraham and Keturah, at least two nationalities of this name are implied. The former were identified by Jos (Ant. II, x, 2) with the tall people of Saba in Upper Egypt, described by him as a city of Ethiopia, which Moses, when in the service of the Egyptians, besieged and captured. It is the Sem Sabaens, however, who are the best known, and the two genealogies attributed to them (Joktan-Eber and Jokhan-Abraham) seem to imply two settlements in the Sabaeans and their land regarded as that of their origin. As Ezechiel (27 23) mentions Haran Commerce (Hirran), Cushen (Kamannah), and Eden as being connected with Sheba, and these three places are known to have been in Southern Arabia, their Sem parentage is undoubted. The Sabaeans are described as being exporters of gold (Isa 60 6; Ps 72 15), precious stones (Ezk 27 28), perfumes (Job 28 20; Isa 28 16; Ezk 27:28), and if the rendering "Sabaens" for Joel 3 (4) 8 be correct, the Sheba, "a nation far off," dealt in slaves. Literature

The Sabbath was the day on which man was to leave off his secular labors and keep a day holy to Jeh. 1. Origin of the Sabbath.—The sketch of creation in Gen 1:1-2:3 closes with an impressive account of the hallowing of the 7th day, but the rather abrupt and obscure form of the statement that God set apart the 7th day for holy purposes in honor of His own rest after six days of creative activity is boldly challenged by many modern scholars as merely the pious fiction of a priestly imagination of a later date. There are only a few hints of a weekly Sabbath before Moses, who is comparatively a modern character, that argumentation is almost excluded, and each student will approach the question with the bias of his own intellectual and spiritual history. There is no distinct mention of the Sabbath in Gen, though a 7-day period is referred to several times (Gen 7:4, 10; 8:10, 12; 29:27). The first express mention of the Sabbath is found in Ex 15:21-22, in connection with the giving of the manna. Jehu taught the people in the wilderness to observe the 7th day as a Sabbath of rest by sending no manna on that day, a double supply being given on the 6th day of the week. Here we have to do with a weekly Sabbath as a day of rest from ordinary secular labor. A little later the Ten Words were spoken by Jeh from Sinai in the hearing of all the people, and were afterward written on the two tables of stone (Ex 20:1-17; 31:18; 34:24-28). The Fourth Commandment enjoins upon Israel the observance of the 7th day as a sabbath week as a sabbath week on which no work shall be done by man or beast. Children and servants are to rest from all work, and even the stranger within the gates is required to keep the day holy. The reason assigned is that Jeh rested on the 7th day and blessed it and hallowed it. There is no hint that the restrictions were meant to guard against the wrath of a jealous and angry deity. The Sabbath was meant to be a blessing to man and not a burden. After the sin in connection with the golden calf Jeh rehearses the chief duties required of Israel, and again announces the law of the Sabbath (Ex 34:21, ascribed to J). In the Levitical legislation there is frequent mention of the Sabbath (Ex 31:13-16; 35:2). In Deut 19:33; 28:25). A willful Sabbath-breaker was to be put to death (Nu 15:32-36). In the Deuteronomical legislation there is equal recognition of the importance and value of the Sabbath (Dt 5:12-15). Here the reason assigned for the observance of the Sabbath is philanthropic and humanitarian: “that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou.” It is thus manifest that all the Pentateuchal codes, whether proceeding from Moses alone or from many hands in wide-different centuries, equally recognize the Sabbath as one of the characteristic institutions of Israel’s religious and social life. If we cannot point to any observance of the weekly Sabbath prior to Moses, we can at least be sure that this was one of the institutions which he gave to Israel. From the days of Moses until now the holy Sabbath has been kept by devout Israelites. “The older theories of the origin of the Jewish Sabbath (connecting it with Egypt, with the day of Saturn, or in general with the sun) have been entirely abandoned” (see Astronomy, I, 5). The disposition at present is to regard the day as originally a lunar festival, similar to a Bab custom (Schrader, Stud. u. Krit., 1874), and as originally excluded, and its days are finally considered to have contained a term sabattu or sabattum, identical in form and meaning with the Heb word sabbaton.” Thus wrote Professor C. H. Toy in 1899 (JBL, XXVII, 190). In a syllabary (H 112, 16a, b) sabattum is said to be equivalent to the Akk. liddi, the natural tr of which seemed to be “day of rest of the heart.” Schrader, Sayce and others so understood the phrase, and naturally looked upon sabattum as equivalent to the Heb Sabbath. But Jensen and others have shown that the phrase should be rendered “day of the appointment of the mind” (of an offended deity). The reference is to a day of atonement or pacification rather than a day of rest, a day in which one must be careful not to arouse the anger of the god, whereas the Sabbath is observed on that particular day. Now the term sabattum has been found only 5 or 6 times in the Bab inscriptions and in none of them is it connected with the 7th day of a week. There was, however, a sort of institution among the Assyrians and Babylonians which has been compared with the Heb Sabbath. In certain months of the year (Elul, Marcheshvan) the 7th, 14th, 19th, 21st and 25th days were set down as favorable days, or unfavorable days, that is, as days in which the king, the priest and the physician must be careful not to eat the food prepared for them by the cook. On these days the king was not to eat food prepared by fire, not to put on royal dress, not to ride in his chariot, etc. As to the 19th day, it is thought that it was included among the unlucky days because it was the 49th (7 times 7) from the 1st of the preceding month. As there were 30 days in the month, it is evident that we are not dealing with a recurring 7th day in the week, as is the case with the Heb Sabbath. Moreover, no proof has been adduced that the term sabattum ever applied to nefasti or unlucky days. Hence the assertions of some Assyriologists with regard to the Bab origin of the Sabbath must be taken with several grains of salt. Notice must be taken of an ingenious and possible paper by W. C. M. Jastrow, presented before the Eleventh International Congress of Orientalists in Paris in 1897, in which the learned author attempts to show that the Heb Sabbath was originally a day of propitiation like the Bab sabattum (JUT, II, 312-33). He argues that the restrictive measures in the Heb laws for the observance of the Sabbath arose from the original conception of the Sabbath as an unfavorable day, a day in which the anger of Jeh might flash forth against men. Although Jastrow has supported his thesis with many arguments that are cogent, yet the reverent student of the Scriptures will find it difficult to resist the impression that the OT writers without exception thought of the Sabbath as an unfavorable day, which was the day on which Jeh might flash forth against men. Whatever may have been the attitude of the early Hebrews toward the day which was to become a characteristic institution of Judaism in all ages and in all lands, the organs of revelation throughout the OT enforce the observance of the Sabbath by frequent exhortations which lay emphasis upon its beneficial and humanitarian aspects.

We must call attention to Meinhoff’s ingenious hypothesis as to the origin of the Sabbath. In 1894
The wealth of learning and ingenuity expended in the search for the origin of the Sabbath has yet to reach the point of yielding small returns.

II. History of the Sabbath after Moses.—The early prophets and historians occasionally make mention of the Sabbath. It is sometimes named in connection with the festival of the new moon (2 K 4.23; Am 8.5; Hos 2.11; Isa 1.13; Zek 46.3). The prophets found fault with the worship on the Sabbath, because it was not spiritual nor prompted by love and gratitude. The Sabbath is exalted by the great prophets who faced the crisis of the Bab exile as one of the most valuable institutions in Israel's life. Great promises are attached to faithful observance of the holy day, and confession is made of Israel's unfaithfulness in profaning the Sabbath (Jer 17.21-27; Isa 56.2-4; 58.13; Eek 20.12-24). In the Pers period Nehemiah struggled earnestly to make the people of Jerusalem observe the law of the Sabbath (Neh 10.31; 13.15-22).

With the development of the synagogue the Sabbath became a day of worship and of study of the Law, as well as a day of cessation from all secular employment. That the pious in Israel carefully observed the Sabbath is clear from the conduct of the Maccabees and their followers, who at first declined to resist the onslaught made by their enemies on the Sabbath (1 Macc 2.29-38); but necessity drove the faithful to defend themselves against hostile attack on the Sabbath (2 Macc 2.39-41), and Ezra (Ezek 20.12-24) in the Pers period Nehemiah struggled earnestly to make the people of Jerusalem observe the law of the Sabbath (Neh 10.31; 13.15-22).

2. In the Inter-Testa-mental Period

The subject is touched upon in other parts of the Mosaic code, and in the Gemara there are extended discussions, with citations of the often divergent opinions of the sages. In the Mish (Shabbat, vi.2) there are 39 classes of prohibited actions with regard to the Sabbath, and there is much hair-splitting in working out the details. The beginnings of this elaborate definition of actions permitted and actions forbidden are to be found in the centuries immediately preceding the Christian era. The movement was at flood tide during our Lord's earthly ministry and continued for centuries afterward, in spite of His frequent and vigorous protests. Apart from His claim to be the Messiah, there is no subject on which our Lord came into such sharp controversy with the religious leaders of the Jews as in the matter of Sabbath observance. He set himself squarely against the current rabbinic restrictions as contrary to the spirit of the original law of the Sabbath. The rabbis seemed to think that the Sabbath was an end in itself, an institution to which the pious Israelite must not only adhere but extend to all his personal interests; in other words, that man was made for the man-made Sabbath: man might suffer hardship, but the institution must be preserved inviolate. Jesus, on the contrary, taught that the Sabbath was made for man's benefit. If there should arise a conflict between man's needs and the letter of the Law, man's needs must have precedence over the law of the Sabbath (Mt 12.1-14; Mk 2.23-3.6; Lk 6.1-11; also Jn 5.1-18; Lk 13.10-17; 14.1-6). There is no reason to think that Jesus meant to discredit the Sabbath as an institution. It was His custom to attend worship in the synagogue on the Sabbath (Lk 4.16). The humane element in the rest day at the end of every week must have appealed to His sympathetic nature. It was the one precept of the Decalogue that was predominantly ceremonial, though it had distinct sociological and moral significance. As an institution for the benefit of toiling men and animals, Jesus held the Sabbath in high regard. As the Messiah, He was not subject to its restrictions; He could and did on occasion impart His lordship over the Sabbath (Mk 2.28). The institution was not on a par with the great moral precepts, which are unchangeable. It is worthy of note that, while Jesus pushed the moral precepts of the Decalogue into the inner realm of thought and desire, thus making the requirement more difficult and the law more exacting, He fought for a more liberal and lenient interpretation of the law of the Sabbath. Rigorous sabattarians must look elsewhere for a champion of their views.

The early Christians kept the 7th day as a Sabbath, much after the fashion of other Jews. Gradually the 1st day of the week came to be recognized as the day on which the followers of Jesus would meet for worship. The resurrection of our Lord on that day made it for Christians the most joyous day of all the week. When Gentiles were admitted into the church, the question at once arose whether they should be required to keep the Lord's Day as Jesus and His disciples had kept the Sabbath. In the earliest times there was much indecision on the point. The different groups of Christians had different customs (Acts 15.1-21). Paul boldly contended that believers in Jesus, whether Jew or Gentile, were set free from the burdens of the Mosaic Law. Even circumcision counted for nothing, now that men were saved by believing in Jesus (Gal 5.6). Christian liberty as proclaimed by Paul included all days and seasons. A man could observe special days or not, just as his own judgment and conscience might dictate (Rom 14.5 ff); but in all such matters one ought to be careful not to put a stumbling-block in another's way (Rom 14.13 ff). That Paul contended for personal freedom in respect of the Sabbath is made quite clear in Col 2.16 f, where he groups together dietary laws, feast days, new moons and sabbaths. The early Christians brought over into their mode of observing the Lord's Day the best elements of the Jewish Sabbath, without its onerous restrictions. See further Lord's Day; Ethics of Jesus, 1, 3, (1).

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST POSITION

The views entertained by Seventh-Day Adventists concerning the nature and obligation of the Sabbath may conveniently be presented under three general heads: (1) what the history says concerning the Sabbath; (2) what history says concerning the Sabbath; (3) the significance of the Sabbath.

(1) OT teaching—In their views concerning the institution and primal obligation of the Sabbath, Seventh-Day Adventists are in harmony with the Bible, the early representatives of nearly all the concerning denominations. The Sabbath is ascribed to the creation of man.

That the Sabbath thus instituted was well known throughout the Patriarchal age is clearly established both by direct evidence and by necessary inference.

(2) OT teaching—"If we had no other passage than this of Gen 2 3, there would be no difficulty in deciding in favor of the seventh-day Sabbath, as being the day consecrated to the Lord for the observance of the Sabbath, from the time that was consecrated to the Lord, and the two Sabbaths, the first and the second, are both to be regarded in the same light" (Lange's Comm. on Ge 2 3, 1871).

"And the day arrived when Moses went to Goshen to see his brethren, that he saw the children of Israel in their hardresses and hard labor, and Moses was grieved on their account. And Moses returned to Egypt and came to the house of Pharaoh; and he saw before the king, and Moses bowed down before the king. And Moses said unto Pharaoh, I pray thee, my lord, I come to shew a small request from thee, turn not away my face empty; and Pharaoh said unto him, Speak. And Moses spake, and said, "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, 'Let my people go, that they may hold a solemn feast unto me at the sea, and in the wilderness. Then will I make thee free from all the burdens of the Egyptians, that thou mayest be my servant.' And Pharaoh said, Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice to let Israel go? I know not the Lord, and will neither let Israel go. Get thee from among me, I pray thee, and take thy people, whom thou hast. But Moses said, Nay, Lord, not thus. Only let this people go a little way, that they may hold a solemn feast unto the Lord, and offer burnt offerings and sacrifices unto the Lord. And the Lord said, "Take a lakeside, and let the children go and hold a solemn feast unto the Lord." And Moses said, "Yea, it is well said that the Lord hath spoken.

"Then called Pharaoh to Moses and said, Behold, God hath multiplied thy evil toward me, and toward my people; and it is very grievous to me. Now therefore, forgive me this sin; I pray thee, and take thy people, the sheep and the cattle, and go. And Moses said, "But what shall I do to the people, if they say to me, What is it that thou hast done?" (Book of Joshua 70-71, 51. published by Noah & Gould, New York, 1849).

"Hence you can see that the Sabbath was before the Law of Moses came, and has existed from the beginning of the world. It was the first day of the week, which have preserved the true faith, met together and called upon God on this day. (Apoc. XXXV. p. 25)."

"Why should God begin two thousand years after (the creation of the world) to give men a Sabbath upon the reason of His rest from the creation? He might have called man to that commemoration before? And it is certain that this event was observed in the falling of the manna before the giving of the Law; and let any considering Christian judge . . . . (1) whether the not fastening of the rest of God’s people on the creation was like to be the original reason of the Sabbath; (2) and whether the first, should not have been said. Remember to keep holy the Sabbath day and on six days the manna fell, and not on the seventh; rather it, happened in six days God created heaven and earth, etc., and rested the seventh day." And it is casually added. Therefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it.” Nay, consider whether this annexed reason intimates not that the day on this ground being the true one, he said it was sent not down the manna on that day, and that He prohibited the people from seeking it (Richard Baxter, Practical Theology, VII. 774 ed. 1910; Huldah, Sabbath u. Woche im AT, 1903; Beer, Schabbath, 1908).

That the Sabbath was known to those who came out of Egypt, even before the giving of the Law at Sinai, is shown from the experience with the manna, as recorded in Ex 16 22-30. The double portion on the sixth day, and its preservation, was the constantly recurring miracle which reminded the people of their obligation to observe the Sabbath, and that the Sabbath was a definite day, the seventh day. To the people, first wondering at this remarkable occurrence, Moses said, “This is that which the Lord hath said, To morrow is the rest of the holy sabbath unto the Lord” (ver 25 AV). And to some who went out to gather manna on the seventh day, the Lord administered this rebuke: “How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws?” (ver 28). All this shows that the Sabbath law was well understood, and that the failure to observe it rendered the people justly subject to Divine reproof.

At Sinai, the Sabbath was instituted as an institution, and had been observed during the intervening centuries, was enjoined to the Israelites on the statement of man’s duties usually designated as the “Ten Commandments.” It is treated as an institution already well known and the command is, “Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy” (Ex 20 8-11). The 4th commandment therefore states that the Sabbath is revealed. It is a memorial of the Creator’s rest at the close of those six days in which He made “heaven and earth, the sea, and all that is in them” (Gen 1 26-31). For this reason “Jehovah blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed it.” This blessing was not placed upon the day at Sinai, but in the beginning, when “God blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it” (Gen 2 3).

From the very nature of the basis of the Sabbath, as set forth in this commandment, both the institution itself and the definite day of the Sabbath are of a permanent nature. So long as it is true that God created heaven and earth, and all things therein, so long will the Sabbath remain a measure of man’s work; and so long as it is true that this creative work was completed in six days, and that God Himself rested on the seventh day, and was refreshed in the enjoyment of His completed work, so long will it be true that the memorial of that work can properly be celebrated only upon the seventh day of the week.

During all the period from the deliverance out of Egypt to the captivity in Babylon, the people of God were distinguished from the nations about them by the worship of the only true God, and the observance of His holy day. The proper observance of the true Sabbath would preserve them from idolatry, being a constant reminder of the one God, the Creator of all things. Even when Jeus was suffering from the attacks of the Babylonians, God assured His people, through the prophet Jeremia, that if they would hallow the Sabbath day, great should be their prosperity, and the city should remain forever (Jer 17 18). This shows that the spiritual observance of the Sabbath was the supreme test of man’s rest in God. He felt necessary to make prophecies of Isaiah, which deal primarily with the restoration from Babylon, remarkable promises were made to those who would observe the Sabbath, as recorded in Isa 56 1-7.

(2) OT teaching—From the record found in the four Gospels we learn that the Jews during all the previous centuries had preserved a knowledge both of the Sabbath institution and of the definite day.
It is equally plain that they had made the Sabbath burdensome by their own rigorous exactions concerning it. And Christ, the Lord of the Sabbath, both by example and by precept, brushed aside those exactions that He might reveal to the people the true Sabbath of the commandment as God gave it—a blessing and not a burden. A careful reading of the testimony of the evangelists will show that Christ taught the observance of the commandments of God, rather than the traditions of men, and that the charge of Sabbath-breaking was put against Him for no other reason than that He refused to allow the requirements of man to change the Sabbath, blessed of God, into a merely human institution, grievous in its nature, and enforced upon the people with many and troublesome restrictions.

All are agreed that Christ and His disciples observed the seventh-day Sabbath previous to the crucifixion. That His followers had received no intimation of any proposed change at His death, is evident from the recorded fact that on the day when He was in the tomb they rested, "on the sabbath...according to the commandment." (Lk 23:56) and that they treated the following day, the first day of the week, the same as of old, is further evidenced upon that day they came unto the sepulcher for the purpose of anointing the body of Jesus. In this, the resurrection of Jesus, there is recorded, in the history of the work of the disciples in proclaiming the gospel of a risen Saviour, no other Sabbath is recognized than the seventh day. Such evidence as is adduced, it would seem, in support of the theory that the seventh-day Sabbath is the proper designation of a well-known institution (Acts 15:1). In our Lord's great prophecy, in which He foretold the experience of the church between the first and the second advent, He declared that the seventh-day Sabbath as an existing institution at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem (70 AD), when He instructed His disciples, "Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on a sabbath" (Mt 24:20). Such instruction given in these words in an evangel which was committed to the care of men in the extreme, had there been any such thing contemplated as the overthrow of the Sabbath law at the crucifixion, and the substitution of another day upon an entirely different basis.

That the original Sabbath is to be observed, not only during the present order of things, but also after the restoration when, according to the vision of the revelator, a new heaven and a new earth will take the place of the heaven and the earth that now are, is clearly intimated in the words of the Lord through the prophet Isaiah: "For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith the Lord, and all flesh shall come to worship before me, saith Jeh" (Isa 66:23).

Seventh-Day Adventists regard the effort to establish the observance of another day than the seventh by using such texts as Jn 20:19, 26; Acts 20:7; 1 Cor 16:1, 2; Rev 1 10 as being merely an afterthought, an effort to find warrant for an observance established upon other than Bib. authority. During the last two or three centuries there has been no movement for the restoration of the original seventh-day Sabbath, not as a Jewish, but as a Christian, institution. This work, commenced and carried forward by the Seventh-Day Baptists, has been taken up and pushed with enlarged vigor by the Seventh-Day Adventists during the present generation, and the Bible teaching concerning the true Sabbath is now being presented in nearly every country, both civilized and uncivilized, on the face of the earth.

(1) Josephus.—This summary of history must necessarily be brief, as it will be impossible, for lack of space, to quote authorities. From the testimony of another nation, continued to observe the seventh-day Sabbath until their overthrow, when they were captured by the Romans (70 AD), colonies, and individuals, scattered over the face of the earth, have preserved the secret knowledge of the original Sabbath, and the definite day, until the present time. They constitute a living testimony for the benefit of all who desire to know the truth of this matter.

(2) Church History.—According to church history the seventh-day Sabbath was observed by the early church. And no other Sabbath was observed during the first two or three centuries (see HDB, IV, 322 b).

In the oft-repeated letter of Pliny, the Roman governor of Bithynia, inquiring about the observance of the seventh-day Sabbath at 112 AD, there occurs the expression, "a certain stated day," which was generally assumed to be in reference to this matter W. B. Taylor, in Historical Comm., ch. i, sec. 47, makes the following statement: "As the Sabbath day appears to have been quite as commonly observed at this date as the sun's day (if not even more so), and was referred to in the institution of the day referred to by Pliny was the 7th day as that it was the 1st day; though the latter is generally taken for granted." The seventh day was distinguished as the Sabbath by the circumstances that men did not fast upon it, and that they prayed standing up, and not kneeling, as Christ had now been raised from the dead. The festival of Sunday, like all other festivals, was always only a human ordinance, and it was far from the intentions of the apostles to establish a Divine command in this respect, far from them, and from the early apostolic church, to transfer the laws of the Sabbath to Sunday. Perhaps at the end of the 2d cent., a false application of this kind had begun to false placed work. "God saved anything to have considered laboring on Sunday as a sin" (Tertullian De Orat., c. 23). This quotation is taken from his Newer, London, 1831, 1, 395, and is the correct tr.'t from Neander's first Gen. ed., Hamburg, 1826, I, p. 2, p. 339. 4. Neander has another quotation from the traditions of the church, in which he expressly stated that Sunday was only a human ordinance, but he has added nothing to the controversy. The Roman and New Testament evidence of the destruction of the first day of the week, Sunday, as a Sabbath, but as an institution, is too great to study the Word of God together and to celebrate the ordinances one with another: without a shadow of doubt this took place on the seventh-day Sabbath. (Geschichte des Sonntags, 69).

Gradually, however, the first day of the week came into prominence as an added day, but finally by civil and ecclesiastical authority as a required observance. The first legislation of its observance during the 4th or 5th cent., early in the history of the first day of the week by ecclesiastical authority, and in the great apostasy which followed, the civil day obtained the assent of the officials. During this period, however, there were always witnesses for the true Sabbath according to the great prophet, and in various lands, the knowledge of the true Sabbath has been preserved.

In the creation of the heavens and the earth the foundation of the gospel was laid. At the close of the book it is written, "for in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (Gen 1:1). In the book of Revelation, the church is to be "an equal sign" and "an equal light" as the city of God (Revel 21:10). The Father of all ages has commented that the "word of God is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart" (Heb 4:12). The Word of God is "the beginning of our salvation, and the end of our peace, and of all our good for evermore" (Ps 107:19, 20). The Word of God is "the light that enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world" (John 1:9).

3. The Significance of the Sabbath:

The Sabbath is the sign and the memorial of that creative power which is able to make all things good and perfect in the image of God, lost that image through sin. In the gospel, provision is made for the restoration of the image of God in the soul of man. The Creator is the Redeemer and redemption is the new creation. As the Sabbath was the sign of that creative power which wrought in Christ, the Word, in the making of the heaven and the earth and all things therein, so it is the sign of that same creative power working through the same eternal Word for the restoration of all things. Wherefore man is in a spiritual sense, there is a new creation: the old things are passed away; behold, they are become new" (2 Cor 5 17 m). "For neither is circumcision anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creation" (Gal 6:15). "For he whose work is approved he will be made alive by the Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor 3:9).

A concrete illustration of this gospel meaning of the Sabbath is found in the deliverance of Israel from Egypt. The same creative power which was so powerfully exercised in the signs and miracles which preceded their deliverance, and in those miracles, such as the opening of the Red Sea, was used to deliver them. And the waters came to their place from the rock, which attended the journeys of the Israelites. In consequence of these manifestations of creative power in their behalf, the children of Israel were instructed to remember in their observance of the Sabbath "that they were not delivered as other nations were" (Ex 12:49). And therefore, the deliverance from Egypt is the type of every man's deliverance from sin; and the instruction to Israel concerning the Sabbath shows its true significance in the gospel of salvation from sin, and the new creation in the image of God.

Furthermore, the seventh-day Sabbath is the sign of both the divinity and the deity of Christ. God only can create. He through whom this work is wrought must be one with God. To this the Scriptures testify: “In the beginning was the Word, . . . and the Word was God. . . . All things were made through him; and without him was not anything that was made” (John 1:1-3). But the same Word which was with God, and was God, “became flesh, and dwelt among us” (John 1:14). This is the eternal Son, “in whom we have our redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses, according to the riches of his grace” (Ephesians 1:7). To the Christian the Sabbath, which was the sign and memorial of that Divine power which wrought through the eternal Word in the creation of the heaven and the earth, becomes the sign of the same power working through the same eternal Son to accomplish the new creation, and is thus the sign of both the divinity and the deity of Christ.

As much as the redemptive work finds its richest expression in the cross of Christ, the Sabbath, which is in the sign of that redemptive work, becomes the sign of the cross.

Seventh-Day Adventists teach and practise the observance of the Sabbath, not because they believe in salvation through man’s effort to keep the law of God, but because they believe in that salvation which alone can be accomplished by the creative power of God working through the eternal Son to create believers anew in Christ Jesus.

Seventh-Day Adventists believe, and teach, that the observance of any other day than the seventh as Sabbath is the sign of that predicted apostasy in which the man of sin would be revealed who would make himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped.

Seventh-Day Adventists believe, and teach, that the observance of the Sabbath in this generation is a part of that gospel work which is to make ready a people prepared for the Lord.

SABBATH DAY’S JOURNEY, jür’ni (σάββατον ὄβος, sabbathon hadès): Used only in Acts 1:12, where it designates the distance from Jerusalem to the Mount of Olives on which Jesus and His disciples on the day of His ascension. The expression comes from rabbinical usage to indicate the distance a Jew might travel on the Sabbath without transgressing the Law, the command against working on that day being interpreted as including travel (see Exodus 16:27–30). The limit set by the rabbis to the Sabbath day’s journey was 2,000 cubits from one’s house or domicile, which was derived from the statement found in Joshua 3:4 that this was the distance between the ark and the people on their march, this being assumed to be the distance between the tents of the people and the tabernacle during the sojourn in the wilderness. Hence it must have been allowable to travel thus far to attend the worship of the tabernacle. We do not know when this assumption in regard to the Sabbath day’s journey was made, but it seems to have been in force in the time of Christ. The distance of the Mount of Olives from Jerusalem is stated in Jos (Ant. XXI. viii. 6) to have been five stadia or furliongs and in Justin, I, xvi. 7, six stadia; the discrepancy being explained by supposing a different point of departure. This would make the distance of the Sabbath day’s journey from 1,000 to 1,200 yds., the first agreeing very closely with the 2,000 cubits. The rabbis, however, invented a way of increasing this distance without technically infringing the Law, by depositing some food at the 2,000-cubit limit, before the Sabbath, and declaring that spot a temporary domicile. They might then proceed 2,000 cubits from this point without transgressing the Law.

And in some cases even this intricacy of preparation was unnecessary. If, for instance, an approach to the Sabbath found one on his journey, the traveler might select some tree or some stone wall at a distance of 2,000 paces and mentally declare this to be his residence for the Sabbath, in which case he was permitted to go the 2,000 paces to the selected tree or wall and also 2,000 paces beyond, but in such a case he must do the work thoroughly and must say: “I will be under the shade of that tree,” for if he merely said: “Let my Sabbath residence be under that tree,” this would not be sufficient, because the expression would be too general and indefinite (Tract. ‘Erubin 4:7).

Other schemes for extending the distance have been devised, such as regarding the quarter of the town in which one dwells, or the whole town itself, as the domicile, thus allowing one to proceed from any part of the town to a point 2,000 cubits beyond its utmost limits. This was most probably the case with walled towns, at least, and boundary stones have been found in the vicinity of Gaza with inscriptions supposed to mark these limits. The 2,000-cubit limits around the Levitical cities ( Numbers 35:5) may have suggested the limit of the Sabbath day’s journey also. The term came to be used as a designation of distance which must have been more or less definite.

SABBATH, SECOND AFTER THE FIRST (σαββάτων δυτικάπρωτον, sabbaton deutérica-proton; [Lev. 6:1]), lit. “the second-first sabbath,” of RV’s): We will mention only a few of the explanations elicited by this expression. (1) It was the first Sabbath in the second year of a 7-year cycle comprising the period from one Sabbath year to the other; (2) the first Sabbath after the second day of Passover, i.e., the first of the seven Sabbaths the Hebrews were to “count unto” themselves from the “morrow after the sabbath” (the day after Easter) until Pentecost (Leviticus 23:15); (3) the first Sabbath in the Jewish ecclesiastical year (about the middle of March), the first Sabbath in the civil year (about the middle of September) being counted as the “first-first” sabbath; (4) the Sabbath of the second month, which was a monstrous combination of the words deutéros, “second,” and prōtos, “first,” attributable to unskilful attempts at textual emendation on the part of copyists. This supposition would, of course, render unnecessary all other efforts to unravel the knotty problem, and, as a matter of fact, deutério-prōtos is omitted by many MSS (including A and B). To those not feeling inclined to accept this solution we would suggest the first of the above-named explanations as the most natural and probable one.

SABATHUS, sub-a-th'-us: AV=RV Sabathus (q.v.).

SABBATHS, sabbath’s, OF YEARS (يقين يارب, yârîb yârib; shabbathôn shâbâhôn; ἄναπαύεις ἅτομ, ēnāpāyeis ἅtōm, ἀναπαύομαι eînō), The seven sabbatic years preceding the Year of Jubilee. See SABBATICAL YEAR; Jubilee Year; Astronomy, I, 5.

SABBATICAL, sa-bat’ik-al, Year (יֵשׁשָׂבָת yâshâbâh; כַּאֲשֶׁר שָׂבָתָה, kâasher šâbâthâ; יָשָׂר, šârî; יָשָׂר אֵשֶׁר שָׂבָתָה, šârî eshîr šâbâthâ; יִשָּׂר עֵשֶׁר עֵשֶׁר שָׂבָתָה, šârî u’eser u’eser šâbâthâ; יִשָּׂר עֵשֶׁר יְשָׂר עֵשֶׁר שָׂבָתָה, šârî u’eser yârîb šâbâthâ; יִשָּׂר עֵשֶׁר עֵשֶׁר עֵשֶׁר יִשָּׂר עֵשֶׁר שָׂבָתָה, šârî u’eser u’eser yârîb šâbâthâ), “a year of solemn rest”; or יָשָׂר אֵשֶׁר הִשָּׂר עֵשֶׁר עֵשֶׁר שָׂבָתָה, yârîb hâšâr u’eser u’eser šâbâthâ; shabbathôn shâbâhôn; ráḇbâta ṭâvânuwâs, sabbata anaḥpâusâs, “a sabbath of solemn rest” [Leviticus 25:4];
1. Primary Intention

The Covenant Book (Dt 15:9–32:32) is a complex document, and its final form may well have been created by a redactor who wanted to consolidate the earlier phases of the Covenant. The final form of the book is a patchwork of earlier material, and it is not always clear where the redactor left off and where he began. The book begins with the formula, "This is the law which you shall speak to the children of Israel," and then goes on to describe the ceremonial law. The book ends with the formula, "This is the law which you shall speak to the children of Israel," and then goes on to describe the ceremonial law.

2. Mosaic Legislation

The book begins with the formula, "This is the law which you shall speak to the children of Israel," and then goes on to describe the ceremonial law. The book ends with the formula, "This is the law which you shall speak to the children of Israel," and then goes on to describe the ceremonial law.

3. General Observance of the Feast of Tabernacles (booths) began five days later and it lasted from the 15th day to the 21st of the month (Tisri). In the Sabbatical year, at that time, the Law was read "before all Israel in their hearing," a fact which tends to prove that the Sabbatical year became a matter of general and simultaneous observance (cf Dt 31:10–13). Another lesson may be deduced from this passage: it gives us a hint respecting the use to which the people may have put their leisure time during the 12 months of Sabbatical rest; it may have been a period of religious and probably other instruction.

4. Central Idea

The central thought is brought home to them, viz. God is the owner of the soil, and through His grace only the chosen people have come into its possession. Their time, i.e. they themselves, belong to Him: this is the deepest meaning of the day of rest; their land, i.e. their means of subsistence, belong to Him: this reveals to us the innermost significance of the year of rest. It was Jehovah's pleasure to call the children of Israel into life, and if they live and work and prosper, they are indebted to His unmerited loving-kindness. They should, therefore, put their absolute trust in Him, never doubt His word or His power, always obey Him and so always receive His unbounded blessings.

5. The possibility of observing the precept respecting the Sabbatical year is demonstrated by the post-exilic history of the Jewish people. Nehemiah registers the solemn fact that the reestablished nation entered into a covenant to keep the law and to maintain the temple worship (Neh 9:10; 30:22). In ver 31 of the last-named chapter he alludes to the 7th year, "that we would forego the 7th year, and the exact nature of the short allusion; it may refer to the Sabbatical rest of the land and the suspension of debts.

For a certainty we know that the Sabbatical year was observed by the Jews at the time of Alexander the Great. When he was petitioned by the Samaritans "that he would remit the tribute of the 7th year to them, because they did not sow therein, he asked who they were that made such a petition"; he was told they were Hebrews, etc (Jos, Ant, XI, 8:6).

During Maccabean and Asusmenian times the law regarding the Sabbatical year was strictly observed, although it frequently weakened the cause of the Jews (1 Macc 6:40,55; Jos, Ant, XIII, vii, 1; cf 2 Macc 1, 2, 4; Ant, XIV, v, 6; XIV, 1, 2). Again we may find references to the Sabbatical year in Jos, Ant, XIV, v, 2, etc. Tac. Hist. v, etc, all of which testifies to the observance of the Sabbatical year in the Herodian era. The words of Tacitus show the popular aspect of the Roman's estimate of the Jewish character and customs: "For the 7th day they are said to have prescribed rest because this day ended their labors; then, in addition, being allured by their lack of energy, they also spend the 7th year in laziness. SABBATH, THE SABREUS, sa-bri'as (Σαβρεύς, Sabretos): In 1 Esd 9:32, the same as “Shemaijah” in Ex 10:31.

SABI, sâ'bi:
(2) AV = RV Sabie (q.v.).

SABIE, sâ'bi-bel (Σαβίθ, Sabith, or Σαβίθ, Sabit; AV Sabi): In 1 Esd 5:34 both AV and RV, following A, read “the sons of Phaceareth, the sons of Sabie” (AV “Sabith”) for the “Pochereth-hazzaiim” of Ex 2:57; Neh 7:59. B reads correctly as one proper name: “Phaceareth Sabit.”

SABTA, or SABTAH, sab'ta (סבתא, sabbathâ, סבתה, sabbâthâ): Third son of Cush (Gen 10:7 = 1 Ch 1:9). A place Sabita is probably to be looked for in South Arabia. Arab geographers give no exact equivalent of the name. Al Bekri (1685) quotes a line of early poetry in which Dhu ’l Sabta is mentioned, and the context might indicate a situation in Yemenah; but the word is possibly not a proper name. It is usually identified with Sabatha (Ptol., vi.7, 38) or with the Subota of Pliny (vi.32; xii.32), an old mercantile city in South Arabia celebrated for its trade in frankincense and, according to Ptolemy, possessing 60 temples. It is said also to have been the territory of a king Elishars, whose name presents a striking resemblance to Dhu ’l-Asihâr, one of the “Tubbâs” or Himyarite kings of Yemen. Another conjecture is the Saphtha of Ptolemy (vi.7, 30) near the Arabian shore of the Pers Gulf.

SABTECA, sab'te-ka (סבסכה, sabbathykhâ; Σαβσεκά, Sabakathâ, Σαβσεκά, Sabethachâ; AV Sabtechah): The 5th named of the sons of Cush in the genealogy of Gen 10:5-7. In 1 Ch 1:8-9 AV reads “Sabtechah” RV “Sabteca.” Many conjectures have been made as to the place here indicated. Recently Glazer (Skizer, II, 252) has revived the suggestion of Bochart that it is to be identified with Samydeca in Carmania on the E. of the Pers Gulf. This seems to rest on nothing more than superficial resemblance of the names; but the phonetic changes involved are difficult. Others have thought of various places in Arabia, toward the Pers Gulf; but the data necessary for any satisfactory decision are not now available.

SACAR, sâ'kar (סָכָר, sakhar): (1) Father of Ahiam, a follower of David (1 Ch 11:35, B, ‘Aqâp, Achôr, A, Ξαχρ, Sacar = “Sharar” of 2 S 23:33; Sharar is favored as the original reading).
(2) Eponym of a family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26:4).

SACKBUT, sak'but. See Music, III, 1, (f).

SACKCLOTH, sak'klôth. See Burial.

SACRAMENTS, sak'ra-ments: The word “sacrament” comes from the Lat sacramentum, which in the classical period of the language was used in two chief senses: (1) as a legal term to denote the sum of money deposited by two parties to a suit which was forfeited by the loser and appropriated to sacred uses; (2) as a military term to designate the oath of obedience taken by newly enlisted soldiers. Whether referring to an oath of obedience or to something similar, there is no room for a separate term. It is evident that sacramentum would readily lend itself to describe such ordinances as Baptism and the Lord’s Supper. In the Gr NT, however, there is no word nor even any general idea corresponding to “sacramentum,” nor does the earliest history of Christianity afford any trace of the application of the term to certain rites of the church. Pliny (c 112 AD) describes the Christians of Bithynia as “binding themselves by a sacramentum to commit no kind of crime” (Epp. x.97), but scholars are now quite generally agreed that Pliny here uses the word in its old Rom sense of an oath or solemn obligation, so that its occurrence in this passage is nothing more than an interesting coincidence.

It is in the writings of Tertullian (end of 2d and beginning of 3d cent.) that we find the first evidence of the adoption of the word as a technical term to designate Baptism, the Eucharist, and other rites of the Christian church. The word sacramentum may have been partly occasioned by the evident analogies which the word suggests with Baptism and the Eucharist; but what appears to have chiefly determined its history in this direction was the fact that in the Old Lat VSS (as afterward in the Vulg) it had been employed to translate the Gr ἱματισμός, ἱματισμός, “a mystery” (e.g. Eph 5:32; 1 Tim 3:16; Rev 1:20; 17:7)—an association of ideas which was greatly fostered in the early church by the rapidly growing tendency to an assimilation of Christian worship with the mystery-practices of the Gr-Rom world.

Though esp. employed to denote Baptism and the Eucharist, the name “sacraments” was for long used so loosely and vaguely that it was applied to facts and doctrines of and Christianity as well as to its symbolic rites. Augustine’s definition of a sacrament as “the visible form of an invisible grace” is far limited by its application by But we see how widely even a definition like this might be stretched when we find Hugo of St. Victor (12th cent.) enumerating as many as 30 sacraments that had been recognized in the church. The Council of Trent was more exact when it decreed that visible forms are sacraments only when they present an invisible grace and become its channels, and when it sought further to delimit the sacramental area by reissuing (1547) a decision of the Council of Florence (1439), in which for the first time the authority of the church was given to a suggestion of Peter Lombard (12th cent.) and other schoolmen that the number of the sacraments should be fixed at seven, viz. Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony—a suggestion which was supported by certain fanciful analogies designed to show that seven was a sacred number.

The divergence of the Protestant churches from this definition and scheme was based on the fact that these proceeded on no settled principles. The notion that there are seven sacraments has no NT authority, and must be described as purely arbitrary; while the definition of a sacrament is still so vague that anything but an arbitrary selection of particular rituals is perfectly arbitrary, for example, to place Baptism and the Lord’s Supper, which were instituted by Christ as ordinances of the church, in the same category with marriage, which rests not on His appointment but on a natural relationship between the sexes that is as old as the human race. While, therefore, the Reformers retained the term "sacrament" as a convenient one to express the general idea that has to be the object of the church, they found the distinguishing marks of sacraments (1) in their institution by Christ, (2) in their being enjoined by Him upon His followers, (3) in their being bound up with His word and revelation in such a way that they become "the expressions of Divine thoughts, the visible symbols of Divine acts." And as Baptism and the Lord's Supper are the only two rites for which such marks can be claimed, it follows that there are only two NT sacraments. Their unique place in modern Thought may be seen in separating them from all other rites and ceremonies that may have arisen in the history of the church, since it raises them to the dignity of forming an integral part of the historical gospel. A justification for their being classed together under a common name may be found, again, in the way in which they are associated in the NT (Acts 2 41.42; 1 Cor 10 1-4) and also in the analogy which Paul traces between Baptism and the Lord's Supper (1 Cor 11). In addition—those two most distinctive rites of the Old Covenant—on the other (Col 2 11; 1 Cor 5 7; 11 26).

The assumption made above, that both Baptism and the Lord's Supper owe their origin as sacraments of the church to their definite appointment by Christ Himself, has been strongly challenged by some modern critics.

In regard to Baptism it has been argued that as Mk 16 15f occurs in a passage (vs 9-20) which textual criticism has shown to have formed part of the original Gospel, Mt 28 19, standing by itself, is too slender a foundation to support the belief that the ordinance rests upon a infliction of Jesus, more esp. as its statements are inconsistent with the results of historical criticism. These results, it is affirmed, prove that all the narratives of the Forty Days are legendary, that Mt 28 19 in particular only canonizes a later ecclesiastical situation, that Universalism is contrary to the facts of early Christian history, and its Trinitarian formula "foreign to the mouth of Jesus" (see Harnack, History of Dogma, I, 79, and the references there given). It is evident, however, that some of these objections are based upon anti-supernatural pre-suppositions that really beg the question at issue, and others on conclusions for which real premises are wanting. Over against them all we have to set the positive and weighty fact that from the earliest days of Christianity Baptism appears as the rite of initiation into the fellowship of the church (Acts 2 38.41, et passim), and that even Paul, with all his freedom of thought and spiritual interpretation of the gospel, never questioned its necessity (of Rom 6 3ff; 1 Cor 13 14; Eph 4 5). On any other supposition than that of its appointment by Our Lord Himself it is difficult to conceive how within the brief space of years between the death of Jesus and the apostle's earliest references to the subject, the ordinance should not only have originated but have established itself in so absolute a manner for Jewish and gentile Christians alike.

(2) In the case of the Lord's Supper the challenge of its institution by Christ rests mainly upon the fact that the saying, "This do in remembrance of me," is absent from the Mk-Mt text, and is found only in the Supper-narratives of Paul (1 Cor 11 24.25) and his disciple Luke (Lk 22 19). Upon this circumstance large structures of critical hypothesis have been reared. It has been affirmed that in the upper room Jesus was only holding a farewell supper with His disciples, and that it never occurred to Him to institute a feast of commemoration. It has further been maintained that the views of Jesus regarding the speedy consummation of His kingdom make it impossible that He could have dreamed of instituting a sacrament to commemorate His death. The significance of the feast was eschatological merely; it was a pledge of a glorious future hour in the perfected kingdom of God (see Mt 26 and parallels). And the theory has even been advanced that the institution of this sacrament as an ordinance of the church designed to commemorate Christ's death was due to the initiative of Paul, who is supposed to have been influenced in the course of time by what he had seen in Corinth and elsewhere of the mystery-practices of the Greeks. All these hypothetical fabrics fall, of course, to the ground if the underlying assumption that Jesus never said, "This do in remembrance of me," is shown to be unwarrantable. And it is unwarrantable to assume that a saying of Jesus which is vouched for by Paul and Luke cannot be authentic because it does not occur in the corresponding narrative of the Synoptics, which are highly compressed in any case, the first two evangelists seem to have confined themselves to setting down those sayings which formed the essential moments of the Supper and gave its symbolic content. Moreover, they may have regarded as sufficiently embodied and expressed in the universal practice of the church from the earliest days. For as to that practice there is no question (Acts 2 42.46; 20 7; 1 Cor 11 20-26), and just as the church rested upon the belief that Christ had enjoined it. "Every assumption of its having originated in the church from the recollection of intercourse with Jesus at table, and the necessity felt for recalling His death, is precluded" (Weissäcker, Apostolic Age, II, 279). That the simple historical supper of Jesus with His disciples in the upper room was converted by Paul into an institution for the gentle and Jewish churches alike is altogether inconceivable. The primitive church had its bitter controversies, but there is no trace of any controversy as to the origin and institutional character of the Lord's Supper.

In the NT the sacraments are presented as means of grace. Forgiveness (Acts 2 38.41, et passim), spiritual quickening (Col 2 13), is associated with Baptism; the Lord's Supper is declared to be a participation in the body and blood of Christ (1 Cor 10 16). So far all Christians are agreed; but wide divergence shows itself thereafter. According to the doctrine of the Rom church, sacraments are efficacious ex opere operato, i.e. in virtue of a power inherent in themselves as outward acts whereby they communicate saving benefit to those who receive them without opposing any obstacle. The Reformed doctrine, on the other hand, teaches that their efficacy lies not in themselves as outward acts, but in the blessing of Christ and the operation of His Spirit, and that it is conditioned by faith in the recipient. The traditional Lutheran doctrine agrees with the Reformed in affirming that faith is necessary as the condition of saving benefits in the use of the sacraments, but resembles the Rom teaching in ascribing the efficacy of Baptism and the Lord's Supper not to the attendant working of the Holy Spirit, but to a real inherent and objective virtue resident in them—a virtue, however, which does not lie (as the Rom church says) in the mere elements and actions of the sacraments, but in the power of the Divine word which they embody. LITERATURE
I. TERMS AND DEFINITIONS.

1. zebah, "sacrifice":
   (a) 2638, "burnt offering";
   (b) 495, "sacrifice," "offering";
   (c) 13.18, "sacrifice," "guilt" or "trespass offering";
   (d) 13.18, "shemel," "peace offerings";
   (e) 13.9, "minhah," "offering";
   (f) 13.9, "zebhab shaltim," "sacrifice of peace offerings";
   (g) 13.9, "zebhab ha-todah," "thank offerings";
   (h) 13.9, "zebhab m'dahah," "free-will offerings";
   (i) 13.9, "zebhab netekh," "votive offerings";
   (j) 13.9, "tsnephah," "wave offering";
   (k) 13.9, "tsamah," "heave offering".

2. zebhab, "sacrificing animal."
3. sh'lamim, "burnt offerings," sometimes whole burnt offering.

4. Abel: a "sacrificed animal," a "sacrifice," general term for animals used in sacrifice, including burnt offerings, peace offerings, thank offerings, and all sacrifices offered to the Deity and eaten at the festivals. More particularly it refers to the flesh eaten by the worshippers after the sacrifice had been burnt on the altar, which the priest had received his portion.

5. Afodah: a "burnt offering," sometimes whole burnt offering. Derived from the vb. 'olah, "to go up." It may mean "that which goes up to the altar" (Knobel, Wellhausen. Nowack, etc.), or "that which goes up in smoke to the sky" (Bähr, Delitzsch, Dillmann, etc.).
6. ze'lah: a "peace offering," "transgression offering." Sometimes used synonymously with kal'alah, "compensation," the word applied to beast or fowl when entirely consumed upon the altar, the hide of the beast being taken by the priest. This was perhaps the most solemn of the sacrifices, and symbolized worship in the full sense, i.e. adoration, devotion, dedication and supplication, and at times expiation.

7. hattah: hattah: a "sin offering." A special kind first mentioned in the Mosaic legislation. It is essentially expiatory, intended to restore covenant relations with the Deity. The special features were: (1) the blood must be sprinkled before the sanctuary, put upon the horns of the altar of incense and poured out at the base of the altar of burnt offering; (2) the flesh was holy, not to be touched by worshipper, but eaten by the priest only. The special ritual of the Day of Atonement centers around the sin offering.

8. Shalem, sh'lamim, "peace offering," generally used in the pl., sh'lamim only once shalem (Am 522). These were sacrifices of friendship expressing or procuring peaceful relations with the Deity, and almost invariably accompanied by a meal or feast, an occasion of great joy.

9. Minhah, minhah, "offering," "offering," "trespass offering" (AV: in Isa 5310, AV and RV) "an offering for sin." AV: Minhah, "trespass offering, " sinnah, "sinner." A special kind of sin offering introduced into the Mosaic Law and concerned with offences against God and man that could be estimated by a money value and thus covered by consecration or restitution accompanying the offering. A ram of different degrees of value, equal at least two sheep, calves, was the usual victim, and it must be accompanied by full restitution with an additional fifth of the value of the damage. The leper and Nazirite could offer the "transgression offering," in which case the Deity was expiated by the blood poured out, and the guilt transferred upon the offering, and the leper was cleansed.

10. Ahnon: "gilt offering," "trespass offering." (AV: in Isa 5310, AV and RV) "an offering for sin." AV: Minhah, "trespass offering, " sinnah, "sinner." A special kind of sin offering introduced into the Mosaic Law and concerned with offences against God and man that could be estimated by a money value and thus covered by consecration or restitution accompanying the offering. A ram of different degrees of value, equal at least two sheep, calves, was the usual victim, and it must be accompanied by full restitution with an additional fifth of the value of the damage. The leper and Nazirite could offer the "transgression offering," in which case the Deity was expiated by the blood poured out, and the guilt transferred upon the offering, and the leper was cleansed.
to Deity and given back by Him to the offerer to be used in the priestly service. Trūnḥah: "heave offering," something lifted up, or, properly, separated from the rest and given to the service of Deity in the expressing homage or thanksgiving thus separated for the priest. The term is applied to products of the soil, or portion of land separated unto the Divine service, etc.

Korban: "an oblation," or "offering"; another generic term for all kinds of offerings, animal, vegetable, or even gold and silver. Derived from the vb. Kārah, "to draw near," it signifies what is drawn or brought near and given to God, thus a gift, although in a sort of etherized food.

Koll: "whole burnt offering," the entire animal being burned upon the altar. Sometimes used synonymously with "ōde." A technical term among the Cădrăgiuns.

Kaphra: a "feast," used metaphorically for a sacrificial feast because the meat of the sacrifices constituted the meat of the feast. "Līẖah: "frankincense," "incense," used in combination with the meal offerings and burnt offerings and burned also upon the altar in the holy place. See Incense.

Cīreḥ: "smoke," or "libation," a liquid offering of wine, rarely water, sometimes of oil, and usually accompanying the ṣidq, but often with the peace offerings.

keleton: "a feast," used metaphorically for a sacrificial feast because the meat of the sacrifices constituted the meat of the feast. "Līẖah: "frankincense," "incense," used in combination with the meal offerings and burnt offerings and burned also upon the altar in the holy place. See Incense.

Shemen: oil, generally olive oil, used with the meal offerings of cakes and wafers, etc.

Sacrifice is thus a complex and comprehensive term. In its simplest form it may be defined as "a gift to God." It is a presentation to Deity of some material object, the possession of the offerer, as an act of worship. It may be to attain, restore, maintain or to celebrate friendly relations with the Deity. It is religion in action—in early times, almost the whole of religion—an inseparable accompaniment to all religious exercises. Few or many motives may actuate it. It may be wholly pietistic and espontaneous, or an offering of food as a gift to God. It may be practically a Briah, or prayer, an expression of dependence, obligation and thanksgiving. It may express repentance, faith,adoration, or all of these combined. It was the one and only way of approach to God. Theophylact defined the sacrifice as "a sacred offering", and need. Hubert and Mauss define it as "a religious act which by the consecration of the victim modifies the moral state of the sacrificer, or of certain material objects which he has in view, i.e., either confers sanctity or removes it and its analogue, impurity."

II. Origin and Nature of Sacrifices.—The beginnings of sacrifice are hidden in the mysteries of prehistoric life. The earliest narrative in Gen records the fact, but gives no account of the origin and primary idea. The custom is sanctioned by the sacred writings, and later on the long-established custom was adopted and systematized in the Mosaic Law. The practice was almost universal. The Vedas have their elaborate rituals. Some Semitic peoples, Greeks, Romans, Africans, and Indians of Mexico offered human sacrifices. It is unknown in Australia, but even there something akin to it exists, for some natives offer a portion of a kind of honey, others offer a pebble or a spear to their god. For many years a universal habit of the race, several solutions are offered.

One view maintains that God Himself initiated the rite by Divine order at the beginnings of human history. Such a theory implies a monothestic faith on the part of primitive man. This theory was strongly held by many of the Rabbis. It formed these logians, and was based mainly on the narrative in Gen 4:14. Abel offered an acceptable sacrifice, and, according to He 11:4, this was a strong plea as follows: Since faith was a Divine Revelation what made the sacrifice acceptable to God, this faith must have been based upon a positive enactment of God in the past. Without this Divine positive enactment to guarantee its truthfulness, faith, in Abel, would have been superstition. In other words, faith, in order to be truly based and properly directed, must have a revelation from God, a positive expression of the Divine will. Fairbairn, in his Typology, goes further and says that the acts of Abel and Eve were clothed from animals which had been slain in sacrifices. This is entirely without support in the narrative. The theory of a Divine order cannot be maintained on the basis of the Bib. narrative. Moreover, it involves certain assumptions regarding the nature of faith and revelation which are not generally held in this age. A revelation is not necessarily a positive Divine command, an external thing, and faith may be just as real and true without such a revelation. It is possible that there may have been such a revelation cannot be denied, but it is not a necessary or probable explanation.

1. The gift-theory.—By this it is held that sacrifices were originally presented to the deity by the offerer for the good received or the good to be expected; thus the sacrifice offered for a harvest or for a child or for a victory or for a crop or for a rain or for a good fortune or for a blessing, etc. The sacrifice sought and expected was the return.
Sacraments, 75) first advocated this, holding that the efficacy of sacrifies is "the fact that eating and drinking were the ordinary symbols of friendship, and the burnt offerings were the usual rites in engaging in covenants and leagues." Thus sacrifies are more than gifts; they are tokens of hospitality, which knit god and worshipper together. W. R. Smith has expounded the idea into the modern economy of sacrifice—what actually the sacrifice partakes of it. Though this view may contain an element of truth in respect to certain Arabian customs, it does not help to account for all sacrifies. A. B. Davidson says, "it falls utterly to account for the burnt offering, which was one of the earliest, most solemn and at times the most important of all the sacrifies."

(4) The sacramental communion theory.—This is a modification of the table-bond theory. The basis of it is the totemistic theory of reverencing an animal which is believed to share with man the Divine nature. On certain solemn occasions this animal would be sacrificed to furnish a feast. At this meal, according to men's savage notions, they literally "ate the god," and thus incorporated into themselves the physical, the intellectual and the moral qualities which characterized the animal. If the Divine life dwelt in certain animals, then a part of that precious life would be distributed among all the people (Rs 5, 313). In some cases the blood is drunk by the worshippers, thus imbibing the life. Sometimes the case of a camel, this was devoured the quivering flesh before the animal was really dead, and the entire carcass was eaten up before morning.

The brilliant work of W. R. Smith has not been universally accepted. L. Marillier has criticized it along several lines. It is by no means certain that totemism prevailed so largely among Semites and there is no evidence of its existence in Israel. Also, if an original bond of friendship existed between the god and the kin, there is no need to maintain it by such sacrificial rites. There is no clear instance of this having been done. If on the other hand there was no common bond between the god and the people but that of a common meal, it does not appear that the god is a totem god. There is no reason why the animal should have been a totem. In any case, this idea of sacrifice could hardly have been anything but a slow growth, and consequently not the origin of sacrifice. Hubert and Mauss, however, put the development theory far from having established the historical or the logical connection between the common meal and the other kinds of sacrifies. Under piacula he confines purification, propitiation and expiations. His attempts to identify piacula with the sacrifice character are late and not sacrificial do not succeed. Smith's theory is mainly the sacramental, though he does recognize the honorific and piacular element. The theory may be applicable to some of the heathen or savage feasts of the Arabs, but not to the practices of the Hebrews (see Enc Brit, XXIII, 951).

(5) The hommage theory.—This has been advocated by Warburton and F. D. Maurice. The idea is that sacrifies were originally an expression of homage and dependence. Man naturally felt impelled to seek closer communion with God, so much from a sense of guilt as from a sense of dependence and a desire to show homage and obedience. In giving expression to this, primitive man had recourse to acts rather than words and thoughts. Thus sacrifice was an acted prayer, rather than a prayer in words. It was an expression of his longings and aspirations, his reverence and submission. There is much truth in this view; the elements of piacular and suppliant-enter with some sacrifies, the burnt offerings in particular; but it does not account for all kinds of offerings.

(6) The piacular theory.—This holds that sacrifies are fundamentally expiatory or atoning, and the death of the beast is a vicarious expiation of the sins of the offerer. Hubert and Mauss admit that in all sacrifies there are some ideas of purchase or substitution, though these may not have issued from some primitive form. The unifying principle in all sacrifies is that the Divine is put in communication with the profane by the intermediary—original victim—which actually the man partake of it. It is thus a messenger, a means of divination, a means of aliminating the eternal life of the species, a source of magical energy which the rite diffuses over objects in its neighborhood. Westermarck (Origin of Moral Ideas) makes the original idea in sacrifice a piacula, a substitute for the offerer.

This view is the most simple, the most natural, and the only one that can explain certain sacrifies. Man felt himself under liability to punishment or death. The animal was his, he had life, it was of value, and perchance the god would accept that life in place of his. He felt that it would be accepted, and thus the animal was sacrificed. The offerer in a sense gives up part of himself. The beast must be his own; no sacrifice can be made of another person's property (2 S 24 24a). The true spirit of sacrifice appears in a willingness to acknowledge God's right to what is best and dearest (Gen 12).

Object of sacrifice is raised to this by A. B. Davidson (OT Theology), who denies that all sacrifies were offered, others, on the ground that such an origin represents a too advanced stage of ethical thought and reflection for primitive man. We question seriously whether this be an advanced stage of moral reflection. On the contrary it represents a very simple, and primitive stage. The feeling that sin of some kind is never absent from human life, and that its true penalty is death, has been inseparable from the human heart's sense of sin. What could be more simple and natural than to take an innocent animal and offer it in place of himself, hoping that the Deity would accept it instead? Nor is there much force in Professor Paterson's objection that sacrifices were preponderantly joyous in character and therefore could not be offered as an expiation. This joyous character belongs to such sacrifies as peace offerings and thank offerings, but does not belong to the 'olah and others. In most cases the joyous feast followed the killing of the animal by which the expiation was accomplished. Smith offers a very simple explanation because atonement had been made. In fact, many sacrifies were of the most solemn character and represented the deepest and most serious emotions of the heart.

(7) Originating in religious instinct.—Neither the theory of an objective Divine revelation, nor of a human origin will account for the universality and variety of sacrifies. The truth lies in a proper combination of the two. The notion of offering a gift to the Deity arose out of the religious instincts of the human heart, which in an early period had a consciousness of something wrong between itself and God, and that this something would mean death sooner or later. Added to these true instincts was the Omn普遍 Spirit to guide men in giving expression. What could be more simple and primitive than to offer something possessing life? Of course the notion originated in simple and childlike ideas of God, and its real motive was not to gratify God by sharing a meal with Him, or to gain His favor by a bribe, but to present Him with something that represented a part of the offerer which might be accepted in his stead. Thus sacrifies became the leading features of the religious life of primitive man. Naturally other ideas would be added, such as a gift of food, to pacify the Deity, the peace offerings, etc, to celebrate the friendly relations with God, the thank offerings, the sin offerings, etc, all of which naturally and logically developed from the primitive idea. It might be expected that there would be many corruptions and abuses, that the sense of sin would be obscured or lost among some peoples, and the idea of sacrifice correspondingly degraded. Such has been the case, and as well might we try to understand man at his best by studying the aboriginal tribes of Africa and Australia, or in ancient times by the Babylonians and Assyrians, as to attempt to understand the Bible ideas in sacrifices by studying the cults of those heathen and savage tribes of Samites, etc.

III. Classification of Sacrifices.—Maimonides was among the first to classify them, and divided them into two kinds: (1) Those on behalf of the whole congregation, fixed by statute, time, manner, and number, designated in the Pentateuchal Codes as burnt offerings; (2) those intended to establish the bond between the god and his worshippers, as peace offerings. Other sacrifices are divided into two classes, viz.: (1) those which assume that the covenant relation is unaltered, and their offerings would be unchangeable, or to do away with any disturbance in the religious order which had been right, such as burnt, sin, and guilt offerings.

Professor Paterson and others divide them into three: (1) animal sacrifices, burnt offerings; (2) vegetable sacrifices, meal offerings, such as bread, etc.; (3) liquid and incense offerings; wine, oil, water, etc.

H. M. Wiener offers a more suggestive and scientific division (Reuel. Cr. Rel., 200 ff.): (1) customary lay offerings, such as har'ah offerings on route, altars of earth or stone, without priest, used and regulated by Moses and in more recent times, viz., burnt, meal and peace offerings; (2) statutory individual offerings, introduced by Moses, offered by laymen with priestly assistance and at the religious capital, i.e., burnt, peace, meal, sin and guilt offerings; (3) statutory national offerings introduced by Moses and offered by the priest at the religious capital, viz., burnt, meal, peace and sin offerings.

IV. Sacrifices in the Pre-Mosaic Age.—Out of the obscure period of origins emerge the dimly-lighted type of ancient history. Everywhere sacrifices existed and sometimes abounded as an essential part of religion. The space of the archaologist, and the researches of scholars help us understand the pre-Mosaic period.

1. In Egypt—probably from the beginning of the 9th millennium BC there were sacrifices and sacrificial systems. Temples at Abydos, Thebes, On, etc., were great priestly centers with high priests, lower priests, rituals and sacrifices in abundance. Burnt, meal and peace offerings predominated. Oxen, wild goats, pigs, geese were the chief animals offered. Besides these, wine, oil, beer, milk, cakes, grain, olive, flowers, fruit, vegetables were offered, but not human beings. In these offerings there were many resemblances to the Heb. gifts, and many significant exceptions. Moses would be somewhat familiar with these practices though not with the spirit of the ritual. He would appreciate the unifying power of a national religious center. It is inconceivable that in such an age a national leader and officer of the state would not take special care to institute such a system.

In Babylonia, from the year 3000 BC or thereabouts, according to teller (Geschichte des Althems), there were many centers of worship such as Babylon, Assur, Agade, Ur, Nippur, Larsa, Sippur, etc. These and others continued for centuries with elaborate systems of worship, sacrifices of animals, temples, priesthoods, etc. Considerably over 100 temples and sanctuaries are mentioned in the tablets, and several hundred in the stone tablets, so that Babylonia was studded with temples and edifices for the gods. At all these temples constantly offerings—animal, vegetable. A long list of the offerings of King Gudea includes oxen, sheep, goats, lambs, birds, fish, birds (Gen 12: 4). The sacrifices provided an income for the priests, as did the Mosaic system at a later time. It had long passed the stage when it was supposed to furnish a means of atonement for the sins of the god, and no one thought of their own self offered a daily sacrifice, as in the Mosaic law, and likewise of the preliminary sacrifice of offering two cups or wine, one for the priests and one for the will of the gods they served. It seems certain that in some of the larger centers of worship animals were offered up to twice a day. The ordinary and festive sacrificial rites were performed by priests. Special sacrifices on special occasions were offered in Babylonia and Chaldea, on the feast days and festival days, etc., in honor of the Mosaic saints, etc., both as regards the purely legal portions and those sections dealing with religious ritual. Babylonian methods of offering sacrifices were taken into consideration as determining factors.

We do not doubt that Moses made use of many elements found in the Egypt and Bab systems, and added to or subtracted from or parodied as occasion required. As sacrificial systems and ritual had been in use more than a millennium before Moses, there is absolutely no need to suppose that Israel's ritual was a thing simply and suddenly developing, and was completed after the exodus. To do so is to turn history upside down.

Among the Semitic tribes of Arabia and Syria, sacrifices had been common for millenniums before Moses. The word "sacrifice" is found in Babylonian tablets. Many scholars, especially Smith are valuable here, whatever one may think of their theories. The offer- ing of animal to a god as a gift has been noted, sometimes from the spoils taken in war and sometimes as a token to set in a temple. The occasions were many and various, and the ritual was very simple. A rude altar of earth or stone, a hole in the ground, the offerer killing the victim and burning it, or perhaps certain parts, perhaps with bread, wine, or other food of the family, constituted the customary details. Sometimes wild animals were offered, Babylonians, Phoenicians and Arabs offered a wide variety of animals. As to what animals were not, Arabs would sometimes sacrifice a captive youth, while the Carthaginians might present a young man and a virgin for offerings to a god. Assyrians sometimes sacrificed captive kings. The Canaanites and others constantly sacrificed children. The Phoenician word for custom. Cain's offering was cereal and is called mín kâd, "a gift" or "presentation." The same term is applied to Abel's. There is no hint that the bloody sacrifice was in itself better than the unbloody one, but it is shown that a sacrifice without blood is not acceptable to God. This same truth is emphasized by the prophets and others, and is needed in this day as much as then. In this case the altar would be of the common kind and no priest was needed. The sacrifices were an act of worship, adoration, dependence, prayer and possibly propitiation.

The sacrifices of Noah followed and celebrated the epochal awe-inspiring event of the ark and beginning life anew. He offered burnt offerings of all the clean animals (Gen 8: 20 ff. On such a solemn occasion only an 'ôlāh would suffice. The custom of using domestic animals had arisen at this time. The sacrifices expressed adoration, recognition of God's power and sovereignty, and a gift to please Him, for it was said He smelled a sweet savor and was pleased. It was an odor of satisfaction or restfulness. Whether or not the idea of expiation was included is difficult to prove.

Abraham lived at a time when sacrifices and religion were virtually synonymous. As a subordinate mode of his offering at Ur or Harn, but Abraham on his arrival at Shechem he erected an altar (Gen 127). At Beth-el also (verse 8), and on his return from Egypt he worshiped there (Gen 13: 4). Such sacrifices expressed adoration and prayer and probably propitiation. They constituted worship, which is a complex exercise. At Hebron he built an altar (Gen 13:18), officiating always as his own priest. In 16.4ff he offers a ‘covenant’ sacrifice, when the animals were slain, divided the loaves and the fat cut off, prepared for the appearance of the other party to the covenant. The exact idea in the killing of these animals may be difficult to find, but the effect is to give the occasion great solemnity and the highest religious sanction. What was done with the carcases afterward is not told. That animals were slain for food with no thought of sacrifice is shown by the narrative in ch 18, where Abraham had a calf slain for the meal. This is opposed to one of the chief tenets of the Wellhausen school, which maintains that all slaughtering of animals was sacrificial until the 7th cent. BC. In ch 22 Abraham attempts to offer up Isaac as a burnt offering, as was probably the custom of his neighbors. That he attempted it shows that the practice was not shocking to his ethical nature. It tested the strength of his devotion to God, shows the right spirit in sacrifices, and teaches for all time that God does not desire human sacrifice—a beast will do. What God does want is the obedient heart. Abraham continued his worship at Beer-sheba (Gen 21:33).

Whatever may be the date of the writing of the Book of Job, the saint himself is represented as living in the Patriarchal age. He constantly offered sacrifices on behalf of Job of his children (1.5), ‘sanctifying’ them. His purpose no doubt was to atone for possible sin. The sacrifices were mainly expiatory. This is true also of the sacrifices of his friends (42–7–9).

Isaac seems to have had a permanent altar at Beer-sheba and to have regularly offered sacrifices. Adoration, expiation and supplication would constitute his chief motives (Gen 26:26).

Jacob’s first recorded sacrifice was the pouring of the oil upon the stone at Bethel (Gen 28:18).

This was consecration or dedication of the place by the awe-inspiring presence of the Deity. After his covenant with Laban he offered sacrifices (zebhakim) and they ate bread (Gen 31.54). At Shechem, Jacob erected an altar (Gen 33.20). At Bethel (35:7) and at Beer-sheba he offered sacrifices to Isaac’s God (46:1).

While the Israelites were in Egypt they would be accustomed to spring sacrifices and spring feasts, for these had been common among the Arabs and Syrians, etc., for centuries. In Egypt sacrifices have been mentioned (see above). At these spring festivals it was probably customary to offer the firstlings of the flock (cf Ex 13:15). At the harvest festivals sacrificial feasts were celebrated. It was to some such feast Moses said Israel as a people wished to go in the wilderness (Ex 3:18; 5:3ff; 7:16). Pharaoh understood and asked who was to go (Ex 10:8). Moses demanded flocks and herds for the feast (30:9). Pharaoh would keep the flocks, etc (10:24), but Moses said they must offer sacrifices and burnt offerings (10:25f).

The sacrifice of the Passover soon occurs (Ex 12:3–11). That the Hebrews had been accustomed to sacrifice the firstborn, at this season has no support and is altogether improbable (Frazier, Golden Bough, pt. III, 175ff). The whole ceremony is very primitive and has retained its primitive use to the end. The choosing of the lamb or kid, the killing at a certain time, the family gathered in the home, the carcass roasted whole, eaten that night, and the remainder, if any, burned, while the feasters had staff in hand, etc, all this was continued. The blood in this case protected from the Deity, and the whole ceremony was “holy” and only for the circumcised. Frazier in his Golden Bough gives a lengthy treatise.

As a priest of Midian Jethro was an expert in sacrificing. On meeting Moses and the people he offered both ’olah and zebhakim and 11. Jethro made a feast (Ex 18:12).

From the above it is evident that sacrifices were almost the substance of religion in that ancient world. From hilltops and temples innumerable, the smoke of sacrifices was constantly rising heavenward. Burnt offerings and expiatory offerings were well known. Moses, in establishing a religion, must have a sacrificial system.

He had abundance of materials to choose from, and under Divine guidance would adopt such rules and regulations as the pedagogic plans and purposes of God would require in preparing for better things.

V. The Mosaic Sacrificial System.—The fundamental function of Moses’ work was to establish the covenant between Israel and God.

1. The This important transition took place Covenant at Sinai and was accompanied by Sacrifice solemn sacrifices. The foundation principle was obedience, not sacrifices (Ex 19:4–8). No mention is made of these at the time, as they were incidental—mere by-laws to the constitution. The center of gravity in Israel’s religion is now shifted from sacrifices to obedience and loyalty to Jehovah. Sacrifices were helpful to that end and without obedience they were worthless. This is in exact accordance with Jer 7:21ff. God did not speak unto the fathers at this time about sacrifices; He did speak about obedience.

The covenant having been made, the terms and conditions are laid down by Moses and accepted by the people (Ex 24:3). The Decalogue and Covenant Code are given, an altar is built, burnt and peace offerings of oxen are slain by young men servants of Moses, not by priests, and blood is sprinkled on the altar (24: 4ff). The blood would symbolize the community of life between Jehovah and Israel, and consecrate the altar. The Law was read, the pledge again given, and Moses sprinkled the representatives of the people, consecrating them also (24:7ff). Ascending the mount, they had a vision of God, held a feast before Him, and enjoyed the joys and privileges of the new relationship. The striking feature of these ceremonies is the use of the blood. It is expiatory and consecrating, it is life offered to God, it consecrates the altar and the people; they are now acceptable to God and dare approach Him and feast with Him. There is no idea of God’s drinking the blood. The entire ritual is far removed from the gross features of common Semitic worship.

In the Covenant Code, which the people accepted, the customary altars are not abolished, but regulated (Ex 20:24ff). This law expressly applies to the time when they shall be settled in Canaan. In the Altars whole place where I cause my name to be remembered,’ etc (ver 21m). No need to change the reading to “in every place where I cause,” etc, as the Wellhausen school does for obvious reasons. All the land was eligible. On such rude altars sacrifice was allowed. This same law is implied in Dt 16:21, a passage that has been explained away by the Wellhausen school (see Wiener, Essays in Pentateuchal Criticism, 201ff). Moses commanded Joshua in accordance with it (Dt 27:5ff). Joshua, Gideon, Jephthah, Samuel, Saul, David, Elijah and many others used such altars. There were altars at Shechem (Josh 24:1-26), Mizpah in Gilgal (Jgs 11:11), Gilgal (1 S 13:9). High places were chiefly used until the times of Hezekiah, when they were abolished because of their corruption and because the central altars were perfectly legitimate and in fact necessary, until there was a central capital and sanctuary in Jerusalem. The customary burnt and peace offerings with the worshipping officiating were the chief factors. Hence altars and the use of heathen altars were strictly forbidden (Ex 22:20 [Heb 19]; 34:15).

The altar used at the consecration of Aaron and his sons was a "horned" or official altar, the central one. The offerings were a bullock, two rams, unleavened bread, etc (Ex 29:1-4), and were brought to the door of the sanctuary. The ritual consisted of Aaron and his sons hand on the bullock's head, designating it as his substitute (29:10), killing it before the tent of meeting (ver 11), smearing some blood on the horns of the altar, and pouring the rest at its base (ver 12). The blood consecrated the altar, the life was given as atonement for its defilement, and the flesh was consumed as food for God, and the flesh and remainder were burned without the camp (vs 13,14). This is a sin-offering—burnt, for the altar is fire, the term is fire. Probably introduced by Moses, it was intended to be placid and to provide seven bullocks for the priest. The flesh was sprinkled round about the altar, flesh was cut in pieces, washed and piled on the altar, then burned as an offeringbringing to God. The burnt offering was an odor of a sweet savor (vs 15-18). The naive and primitive nature of this idea is apparent. The other ram, the ram of consecration, is slain, blood is smeared on Aaron's right ear, thumb and great toe; in the case of sons likewise. The blood is a sprinkled on the altar round about; some upon the garments of Aaron and his sons (vs 19-21). Certain parts were waved before God along with the bread, and are then burned upon the altar (vs 22-25). The breast is offered as a wave offering (tirshāh), the right thigh is offered as a heave offering (tiršāh). These portions here first mentioned were the central sanctuary offerings, alluding to the particular one went to Moses, since he officiated (vs 26-30). The flesh must be boiled in a holy place, and must be eaten by Aaron and his sons only, and at the sanctuary. What was left till morning must be burned (vs 31-34). Consecrated to a holy service it was dangerous for anyone else to touch it, or the Divine wrath would be committed. The same ceremony on each of the seven days attested for, cleansed and consecrated the altar to the service of Jehovah, and it was most holy (vs 35-37). The border of the altar is ordained (Ex 30:1), and Aaron is to put the blood of the sin offering once a year upon its horns to consecrate it.

When the golden calf was made an altar was erected, burnt and peace offerings were presented.

From the latter a feast was made, the sanctuary opened and the people rejoiced at such events before the festivals, went to excess and joined in Golden Calf revelry. Moses' ear quickly detected the nature of the sounds. The covenant was now broken and no sacrifice was available for this sin. Vengeance was executed on 3,000 Israelites. Moses mightily interceded with God. A moral reaction was begun; new tables of the Law were made with more stringent laws against idols and idol worship (Ex 32:1-55).

At the setting-up of the tabernacle burnt and meal offerings were sacrificed (Ex 40:29). The law of the burnt offering is found in Lev 1.

5. Law of the Burnt Offering ('olah)

Common altars and customary burnt offerings need no minute regulations, but this ritual was intended primarily for Aaron and his successors, and was brought to the people as needed. They were for the statutory individual and national offering upon the 'horned' altar before the sanctuary. Already the daily burnt offerings of the priests had been provided for (Ex 29:18). The burnt offering is here called korban, "oblation."

(1) The ritual for the offering (Lev 1:1-17).—This may be have from the herd or flock or fowls, brought to the tent of meeting; hands were laid (heavily) upon its head designating it as the offerer's substitute, it was killed, flayed and cut in pieces. If of the flock, it was to be killed on the north side of the altar; if a fowl, the priest must kill it.

(2) The ritual for the priest (Lev 1:3-17).—If a bullock, or one and seven bullocks, or a bullock and maleable torr

The sin offering was a sacrifice of a special kind, doubtless peculiar to Israel and first mentioned at the consecration of Aaron and his sons. It is not then spoken of as an offering innovation. It was of special value as an expiatory sacrifice.

(1) Use of the sin offering (Lev 4:2-21; Ezek 43:21; and his sons (Ex 29 10 ff.).—A bullock was killed before the altar, some blood was put upon the horns of the altar by Moses, the rest was poured out at the base. The fat of the inwards was burnt upon the altar, the flesh and skin were burned without the camp. Every day during the consecration this was done (Ex 29 36).

(2) The law of the sin offering (Lev 4 1 35; 6 24 30, etc.).—(a) The occasion and meaning: Specifically to atone for unwitting sins, sins of eternal sin, (zabanah), mistakes or rash acts, unknown at the time, but afterward made known. There were gradations of these for several classes of offenders: the anointed priest (vs 3 12), the whole congregation (vs 13 21), a ruler (vs 22 26), one of the common people (vs 27 31), etc). The congregation was also required to bring a young bullock before the tent of meeting, the elders were to lay their hands upon it and slay it before the Lord. The rafter must bring a he-goat and do the same. One of the common people might bring a fat tail of a lamb and do the same. If too poor for these, two turtle doves or young pigeons, one for a sin offering and one for a burnt offering would suffice. It must be without blemish, and be to the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour without oil or frankincense would it suffice.

(b) The ritual for the offering (Lev 4 1 5 13, etc.). The anointed priest must offer a bullock at the tent of meeting, lay his hands upon it and slay it before the Lord. The congregation was also required to bring a young bullock before the tent of meeting, the elders were to lay their hands upon it and slay it before the Lord. The rafter must bring a he-goat and do the same. One of the common people might bring a fat tail of a lamb and do the same. If too poor for these, two turtle doves or young pigeons, one for a sin offering and one for a burnt offering would suffice. It must be without blemish, and be to the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour without oil or frankincense would it suffice.

(c) The ritual for the priest (Lev 4 1 5 13, etc.). He must bring the bullock's blood to the tent of meeting, dip his finger into it and sprinkle blood 7 times before the veil of the sanctuary, and put some on the horns of the altar of incense, but most of this blood must be poured out at the base of the altar. The fat must be burnt upon the altar, all the rest of the carcass must be carried to a clean place without the camp and burnt. In the case of the whole congregation, the ritual is the same. In the case of a ruler, the blood of the horns of the altar of burnt offering, not the altar of incense. In the case of one of the common people, the ritual is simply substitution of the fat of his offering. In both cases the carcass belonged to the priest. If a bird, the priest must cut off its head, sing a song, and pour blood on the side of the altar and pour the rest at the base. Nothing is said of the disposal of the carcass. If of fine flour, the priest must take a handful of it and keep the remainder for himself. The use of fine flour for an offering was too low, it was to be eaten by the worshippers. At Aaron's consecration an ox and a ram were the peace offerings (Lev 9 4 13 22). The priest's portion was to be eaten in a clean place by the priest's family (Lev 10 14). When Israel should have a central sanctuary, all were to be burnt there (Lev 17 3 4). When they had no central place, the common altars would suffice. All peace offerings must be made in an acceptable manner (Lev 19 5). Votive offerings must be perfect (Lev 22 18 22), but certain imperfections are allowable in all freewill offerings (vs 23). At Pentecost two he-lambs of the first year could be offered as peace offerings (Lev 23 19). The Nazirite at the end of his separation must offer one ram for a peace offering with unleavened bread (Nu 6 14 17), and the hair shaved from his head must be burnt under the peace offerings (6 18). This has something to do the Nazirite and offered as a sacrifice by other nations. The various tribes brought peace offerings (ch 7, passim), and at the feast of trumpets the people were to rejoice and blow trumpets over the peace offerings (10 10). Some further regulations are given (15 9 f).

The sin offering was a sacrifice of a special kind, doubtless peculiar to Israel and first mentioned at the consecration of Aaron and his sons. It is not then spoken of as an offering innovation. It was of special value as an expiatory sacrifice.

The congregation was also required to bring a young bullock before the tent of meeting, the elders were to lay their hands upon it and slay it before the Lord. The rafter must bring a he-goat and do the same. One of the common people might bring a fat tail of a lamb and do the same. If too poor for these, two turtle doves or young pigeons, one for a sin offering and one for a burnt offering would suffice. It must be without blemish, and be to the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour without oil or frankincense would it suffice.

(c) The ritual for the priest (Lev 4 1 5 13, etc.). He must bring the bullock's blood to the tent of meeting, dip his finger into it and sprinkle blood 7 times before the veil of the sanctuary, and put some on the horns of the altar of incense, but most of this blood must be poured out at the base of the altar. The fat must be burnt upon the altar, all the rest of the carcass must be carried to a clean place without the camp and burnt. In the case of the whole congregation, the ritual is the same. In the case of a ruler, the blood of the horns of the altar of burnt offering, not the altar of incense. In the case of one of the common people, the ritual is simply substitution of the fat of his offering. In both cases the carcass belonged to the priest. If a bird, the priest must cut off its head, sing a song, and pour blood on the side of the altar and pour the rest at the base. Nothing is said of the disposal of the carcass. If of fine flour, the priest must take a handful of it and keep the remainder for himself. The use of fine flour for an offering was too low, it was to be eaten by the worshippers. At Aaron's consecration an ox and a ram were the peace offerings (Lev 9 4 13 22). The priest's portion was to be eaten in a clean place by the priest's family (Lev 10 14). When Israel should have a central sanctuary, all were to be burnt there (Lev 17 3 4). When they had no central place, the common altars would suffice. All peace offerings must be made in an acceptable manner (Lev 19 5). Votive offerings must be perfect (Lev 22 18 22), but certain imperfections are allowable in all freewill offerings (vs 23). At Pentecost two he-lambs of the first year could be offered as peace offerings (Lev 23 19). The Nazirite at the end of his separation must offer one ram for a peace offering with unleavened bread (Nu 6 14 17), and the hair shaved from his head must be burnt under the peace offerings (6 18). This has something to do the Nazirite and offered as a sacrifice by other nations. The various tribes brought peace offerings (ch 7, passim), and at the feast of trumpets the people were to rejoice and blow trumpets over the peace offerings (10 10). Some further regulations are given (15 9 f).
6—8). The leper must bring a guilt offering (a special kind of sin offering), a he-lamb (Lev 14:12—14.19); if too poor for a lamb, a turtledove or young pigeon (vs 22.31). Special use of the blood is required (ver 25). In uncleanness from issues a sin offering of a turtledove or young pigeon must be offered by the priest (Lev 16:15—30). (iii) On the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:1—28) Aaron must take a bullock for himself and house, two he-goats for the people, present the goats at the sanctuary, cast lots, one for Jehovah, as a sin offering, the other to be cast into the wilderness. The bullock was killed, sweet incense was burned within the rail, blood was sprinkled on the mercy-seat and before it 7 times. The one he-goat was killed and a similar ceremony was performed. Blood must be put on the horns of the altar and sprinkled 7 times about it. The other goat was presented, hands were laid on it, the sins of all confessed and put upon the goat, and it was sent into the wilderness. The earcuse of the bullock and he-goat were burnt without the camp. At the feast of first-fruits a he-goat was offered (Lev 23:19).

(iv) Other special instances were: in the case of defilement, the Nazirite must offer a turtledove or young pigeon on the 5th day after contrition (Lev 14:8); if this offering fulfilled a he-lamb with the other offerings (ver 14) was to be offered; the twelve tribes included in each case a he-goat for sin offering (7:16 ff); at the consecration of the Levites a young bullock (8:12). For unwitting sins at a religious congregation a he-goat was to be offered (15:21—25). If one person erred, a she-goat was permitted (ver 27). A sin offering was required at the feast of the new moon (28:15), at the Passover (ver 22), at Pentecost (ver 30), on the 1st day of the 7th month (Lev 23:26—27), on the 22nd day of the same month (ver 34—35). The ceremony of the red heifer (19:10—17.10) was a special sin offering for purification purposes only. It was of ancient and primitive origin. The young cow was brought without the camp and was slain before the priest's face, blood was sprinkled 7 times before the sanctuary, the entire carcase with cedar wood, hyssop and scarlet was burned, the ashes gathered and laid without the camp in a clean place to be kept for the water of impurity. It was to purify the city with the dead. In the case of the unknown homicide (Dt 21:1—9) a young unbroken heifer was brought to a running stream, its neck was broken, the elders washed their hands over the heifer in the presence of the priests, drank of the blood, and sprinkled it over the place where the body was found. The action was a judicial one, but essentially vicarious and expiatory and had doubtless a primitive origin.

The guilt offering (AV "trespass offering") (Lev 5:14—6:7) was a special kind of sin offering, always of a private character and accompanied by a fine. It expressed expiation and restitution. The classes of sin requiring a guilt offering with repARATION in money are: (1) a trespass in the holy things done unwittingly; (2) anything which the law forbade depriving God or the priest of their due; (3) dealing falsely with a neighbor in a deposit, or pledge, or robbery, or oppression; (4) swearing falsely regarding anything lost; (5) seduction of a betrothed girl (Lev 19:20—22). The first two of these are unwitting sins, the others cannot be. The clear statement is made in another place that sins done with a "high hand," i.e., in rebellion against the covenant and its provisions, can have no expiation. It is not possible, therefore, to add this a contrition, or a later development when it was found that the more stringent law would not work? (See J. M. P. Smith, et al., Atonement, 47 f.) Neither conclusion is probable. These conscious sins are of a kind that will admit of full reparation because against rights of property or in money matters. The sin offering makes atonement toward God, the restitution with the additional one-fifth makes full reparation to man. No such reparation can be made with the guilt offering, it is to be offered "a heifer of theouch hand." In the case of seduction, rights of property are violated (of Nu 5:5—8; Dt 22:29).

(1) The ritual (Lev 5:14—6:7).—A ram proportionately in value to the offence and worth at least two shekels as required. (2) The priest, by the mouth of the Lord, is to sprinkle the blood on the wine libation, and to offer a meal offering of unleavened bread, with it, and to "make atonement." (3) He is to offer one young ox and two young sheep as a sin offering for the unclean person. The priest shall offer a "inferior lamb," but sprinkled about the base of the altar, the fat and inside parts being burned, and the flesh eaten by the priests in a holy place.

(2) Special statutes.—The leper, when cleansed, on the 8th day must bring a guilt offering of two he-lambs and one ewe-lamb; the priest must wave one he-lamb before Jehovah, kill it, and smear blood on the right ear, thumb and toe of the leper. The guilt offering belongs to the priest (Lev 14:12—20). If the leper were too poor for two lambs, one sufficed, with a corresponding meal offering, or one turtledove and a young pigeon (vs 21.22). The Nazirite, if defiled during his period of separation, must bring a he-lamb for sin offering for his guilt offering were the priests' and most holy (18:9).

The wave offerings were parts of the peace offerings, and the custom was seemingly initiated at the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Ex 29:22—38). When the breast and bread were waved of the wave offering to Jehovah (Lev 7:30.34) fixes the law.

10. Wave Offerings. It must be brought from the peace offerings of the offerer himself. At Aaron's consecration Moses put the breast, etc. on Aaron's hands and waved them before Jehovah (Lev 8:27). On the 8th day Aaron and his sons waved the wave offerings to eat it in a clean place (Lev 10:14). The leper's he-lamb was to be waved by the priest, before being offered (Lev 14:22). When the peace offering was waved (Lev 14:24). At the feast of first-fruits the sheaf must be waved before Jehovah (Lev 23:10.11).5:5; two loaves also (vs 17.20). Of the Nazirite the priest took the boiled shoulder, a cake and a wafer, put them on the Nazirite's hand and waved them before Jehovah (Nu 6:19). Reheve offerings also are parts of the peace offerings, and refer particularly to what is lifted up, or separated unto the service of Jehovah. They are first mentioned at the consecration of Aaron's sons (Lev 27:28.29). The priest's fractions of the choice morsel of the offering of the peace offering must be heaved (Lev 7:14). The offering must be eaten in a clean place (Lev 7:14) by the priest's family only. The Nazirite's offering the heave of the peace offering also went to the priest (Nu 6:20). But when the Israelites were camped on the promised land to eat bread, they must offer a heave offering of the dough, a cake (Nu 15:19.20.21). The law is repeated with a slightly different wording to have to receive a tithe of the heave offerings of the people (ver 24). They were in turn to offer a tithe of this to the priests (vs 26—29). A portion of the spoil of Midian was a heave offering (31:29.41). Dt commands that all heave offerings be brought to the central sanctuary and eaten there (12:11).

Jacob poured oil on the stone he had set up (Gen 28:18) in honor of the Deity and consecrated the spot. Jacob later (Gen 35:14) set up a pillar where God had revealed Himself to him. Drink offerings or a libation of wine and drink offerings or libations. It probably wine was used. Drink offerings accompanied many of the sacrifices (Ex 29:40.41). None could be poured upon the altar of incense (Ex 30:9). At all set feasts the drink offerings must be presented (Lev 23:13.18.37). The Nazirite was not exempt (Nu 6:15.17). Wine and oil must accompany all votive and freewill offerings (18:4.5.7.10.24); the custom continued (28:7.8) in tabernacle and temple. All the drink offerings were set apart (Lev 2:13); 18:5—39, passions). That drink offerings were common among the heathen is shown by Dt 32:9.

The cultus is thoroughly in keeping with and adapted to the age, and yet an ideal system in many respects. The ethical side is in the background, the external has the emphasis. No sacrifices will avail for a breach of the covenant between God and the people. People thoroughly believed in the efficacy of the blood. It secured stone-wall and forgiveness. Their religious life found expression in the sacrifices. God was fed and pleased by the offerings by fire. Many of the customs are ancient and crude, so that it is difficult to imagine how such a primitive system could have been arranged and accepted afterward by the people who had the lofty ethical teachings of the prophets in their hands.

VI. Sacrifices in the History of Israel.—The tribes were outwardly consolidated, and a religious system was provided. Some of it was for the rulers, much for the people and the priests alone. The various laws were given in portions and afterward compiled. No one expected them to be observed until the nation had a capital and central sanctuary. Even then not every detail was always possible. They were not observed to any extent in the wilderness (Am 5:25), as it was impracticable. Even circumcision was left to the wanderers crossing the Jordan (Josh 5:2). The body of the system was not in full practice for 300 or 400 years. The ritual, as far as it could be observed, served as an educational agency, producing in the minds of the worshippers proper conceptions of the holiness of God, the sinfulness of man, and the proper spirit in approaching God.

the temple cult was in full operation according to Moses' Law (2 Ch 13 10 f). Asa removed many strange altars and high places because of their corruption (14 3), but not all (15 17; 20 35). In the days of Jehoshaphat and Jehoram, the altars were on different levels, according to Moses (23 18; 24 146; 2 K 12 4-16). Sin and guilt offerings were in sufficient numbers to be mentioned, but the money went to the priests. Kautzsch (HDB, V 91; Paterson, V 87) IV, with others, think these offerings were only fines and altogether different from those of lev 4, 5. Such a statement is wholly gratuitous. The guilt offerings must be accompanied by fines, but not necessarily by the sin offerings. The passage speaks of both as perfectly familiar and of long standing, but details are lacking and there can be no certainty in the matter, except that it proves nothing regarding a ritual of sin and guilt offerings existing or non-existent at that time. Kautzsch's and Paterson's motives are obvious. Having reversed the history and put the ritual law late, they must needs make adjustments in the records to have them agree. In the days of Ahaz, the regular offerings were observed for priests, kings and people (2 K 16 13-15). Hezekiah offered burning offerings in many high places (18 4). When repairing the temple, many sin offerings were presented to expiate the terrible sins of the previous reigns and the desecration of the temple (2 Ch 29 21-34); and so, also, burnt offerings (vs 27 f), peace and thank offerings, etc, in large number (vs 31). The High Priest of Isaa 1 10-17). The Passover was celebrated with peace offerings (2 Ch 30 1 2 15.22), oblations and tithes (31 12); courses of Levites were established (31 5), and the king's portion (ver 5). All the common altars were rebuilt and the religion and worship centralized in Jerusalem (22 12). Reversed by Manasseh (33 3 f), the high places were again used (ver 17). Josiah purged Jerus (34 3), and on the discovery of the Book of the Law, with its rule regarding a central sanctuary, that law was rigidly enforced (36 6-14). The reformation under Josiah did not change the hearts of the people, and the rule followed in spite of all the efforts of Jeremiah and other prophets.

That the temple was entirely suspended in Jerus from 586 to 536 BC seems certain. There is no support for G. F. Moore's statement (B, IV) that an altar was soon re-built and sacrificing was carried on there. Ezekiel used it on the third day of the exiles an altar was soon built and the continual burnt offerings began (Ezr 3 2 f), and likewise at the Feast of Tabernacles, new moons and set feasts (vs 4-7). Darius decreed that the Israelites should be given what was needed for the sacrifices (6 9 f). The band under Ezra offered many sin offerings on their return (8 35). At the dedication of the temple many burnt and sin offerings were made for all the tribes (6 17). Those who had married foreign wives offered guilt offerings (10 9). The firmans of Artaxerxes provided money for bullocks, rams, lambs, with meal and drink offerings (7 17). Under Nehemiah and after the formal acceptance of the Law, a more complete effort was made to observe it. The shewbread, continual burnt and meal offerings, subhaths, new moons, sabbaths, sin offerings, first-fruits, firstlings, first-fruits of dough, heave offerings of all trees, wine and oil, etc, were carefully attended to (Neh 10 33-37) and were in full force later (13 5). There is no hint of innovation, only a thoroughgoing attempt to observe laws that had been somewhat neglected.

At the time of Nehemiah and probably two or three centuries previous, there existed a temple on the island of Elephante in the Nile. It was built by a Jewish military colony, and a system of sacrifices was observed there, how far they conformed to, and what were their ideas of a central sanctuary are uncertain.

7. In the Southern Kingdom to the Exile. Several tribes continued in foreign countries, and the temple was not recognized by them as the place of sacrifice. Among the Phoenicians, Greeks and Romans human sacrifices were all too common. The customs were not transferred to the Israelites. Abraham felt called upon to prove his fidelity to the act, and a lesson was given for all time.

10. Human Sacrifices in Israel's History. The abominable practice is forbidden by the Law (Lev 18 19 f). Suffering was described as a passing through the fire to Moloch, referring to the Babylonish and Ammonitish practices. Anyone practising it was to be stoned (Lev 20 2). During this period, many people continued to offer sacrifices, and the practice was prevalent among the Israelites, especially in the south. The practice continued in the times of the Judges, and was prevalent among the Israelites throughout their history.

VII. The Prophets and Sacrifices. —The prophets were reformers, not innovators. Their emphasis was on the ethical, rather than the ritual. They gazed their teachings on the value of the covenant, not the incidents. They accepted sacrifices as part of the religious life, but would give them their right place. They accepted the law regarding common altars, and Samuel, David and Solomon, and the movements toward a national church and a central sanctuary, but the idea that public sacrifices were to be permitted in the temple was rejected. They did not hold that the whole nation was to be offered as a burnt offering in the temple.

11. Certain Heathen Sacrifices. —The Heathen sacrifices were quite different from the Jewish. The later books, such as Enoch, were written to show the difference between the two systems. The practice of human sacrifice was widespread among the Heathen, but the practice of sacrifice to the gods was not.

Sacrifice (OT)
but demands rather righteousness and justice. There is nothing here against the Mosaic origin of the laws.

In Hosea's time the hollow externalism of the cult had become worse, while vice, falsehood, murder, oppression, etc., were rampant. He utters an epoch-making sentence when he says, "I desire mercy, and not sacrifice," etc (6:6). This is no sweeping renunciation of sacrifices, as such; it is only putting the emphasis in the right place. Such sacrifices as Hosea speaks of were worse than worthless. It is somewhat extravagant for Kautzsch to say, "It is perfectly futile to read out of 6:6 anything else than a categorical rejection of sacrifices." Hosea recognizes their place in religion, and deplores the loss during exile (3:4). The corrupt cults he condemns (4:13f), for they are as bad as the Canaanitish cults (4:9). Jeh. will spurn them (8:13; 9:4). The defection of the nation began early (11:2), and they have multiplied altars (12:11; 13:2). He predicts the time when they shall render as bullocks the "calves" of their lips (14:2 AV).

Sacrifice is as emphatic. The sacrifices were more costly in his day, in order the more surely to purchase the favor of the Deity. Human sacrifices were in vogue, but Micah says God requires them "to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God" (6:8). The atonement does not only affect sacrifices of the right kind and with the right spirit.

Isaiah faces the same situation. There are multitudes of sacrifices, burnt offerings, blood of bullocks and goats, incense, "beasts," etc., but no justice, morality, love, truth or goodness. Thus their sacrifices, etc., are an abomination, though right in themselves (1:11-17; 61:8). The same is true of all pius performances today. If Micah'sMicah says that such worship was wrong in the temple (6:16). In his eschatological vision there is freedom to offer sacrifices in Egypt (19:19.21). The people are to worship in the holy mountain (27:13). Ariel must let the feasts come around (29:1).

Jeremiah maintains the same attitude. Your "frankincense from Sheba, and the sweet cane," burnt offerings and sacrifices are not pleasing to God (6:20; 14:12). They made the temple a den of robbers, in the streets they baked cakes to the Queen of Sheba, etc (Hag 1:6). He also says, "Add your burnt-offerings unto your sacrifices, and eat ye flesh. For I spake not unto your fathers . . . concerning . . . sacrifices: but . . . commanded . . . saying, Heurken unto me" (7:21-23). This was literally true, as we have seen above; the covenant was not based on sacrifices but on obedience. Such a statement does not deny the institution of sacrifices for those within the covenant who are obedient. It is no "subterfuge," as Kautzsch calls it, "to say that the prophets never polarize against sacrifice per se, but only against offerings presented hypocritically, without repentance and a right disposition, with blood-stained hands; against the opera operata of the carnally-minded, half-hearted mass of the people. This is exactly what they do, and they are in perfect harmony with the covenant constitution and with their own ethical and spiritual functions. Kautzsch can make such an extravagant assertion only by ignoring the fact that Jeremiah himself in predicting the future age of righteousness and blessedness makes sacrifice an important factor (33:11.18).

Picturing possible prosperity and glory, Jeremiah speaks of burnt and meal offerings, frankincense, thank offerings, etc, being brought into the house of the Lord (17:26). (We are aware of the historical reality.) In contrary case, the arbitrary transference of this passage to a later time.) Ezekiel is called by Kautzsch "the founder of the Levitical system. He is said to have preserved the fragment of the ritual that was broken up in the exile. But his references to the burnt, sin and trespass offerings presuppose familiarity with them (40:38-42).

He assigns the north and south chambers for the meal, sin and trespass offerings (42:13). The cleansing of the leper is required in the burnt offering; with burnt and peace offerings with a ritual similar to Lev 8:11 (Ex 29:18-27). Priests are to be ministers and slay burnt offerings and sacrifice for the people (44:11). The priest must offer his sin offering before offering the burnt offering. The national sanctuary is to be the meal, sin, and trespass offerings as in 44:29. In Mic 4, the people are to give ten lambs for meal, burnt and peace offerings, while the prince shall give the meal, burnt and drink offerings for the feasts, the new moons, and the sabbaths. He is to prepare them to make atonement (45:13-17). In cleansing the sanctuary the Levlcal ritual is followed with added details (45:18-20). The Passover requires the burnt, sin and meal offerings with an extra burnt offering. The prince's burnt and peace offerings (46:2-4.6.9-12) for the sabbaths, new moons, etc. The daily burnt offerings (vs 13-15) have a sixth instead of a tenth part of an ephah, as in Lev 1. The sin and guilt offerings are to be held in a certain place, and the meal offering baked (vs.20.26). Ezek varies from the Levitical Law in the quantity of the offerings, pictures a higher ideal situation than Moses. The people are all righteous, with new hearts, the Spirit in them enabling them to keep the Law (Ezk 36:26; 37:29) and yet holding the spirit of purification for them. Does this seem to indicate that the prophets would abolish sacrifices entirely? It is strange reasoning which makes the prophets denounced the whole sacrificial system, when one of the greatest achievements of humanity seeks to combine the natural and the spiritual for the blessed age in the future.

In the second part of Isa, God declares that He has not been honored by the people with burnt and meal offerings, etc., and that He has not burdened them with such offerings, but that they are in their sins (53:10). These foreigners who respect the covenant shall offer acceptable sacrifices (56:7) in the house of God. The servant of Jehovah is to be a guilt offering (53:10) to expiate the sins of Israel. Sacrifice is here for the first time lifted out of the animal sphere and found in the link between the OT and the NT. In the glorious age to come there shall be priests and Levites,新的一新, new moons, sabbaths and worship in Jerus (66:21.23).

Daniel speaks of the meal offering being caused to cease in the midst of the week (9:27).

Zechariah pictures the golden age to come when all nations shall go up to Jerusalem to keep the feast of tabernacles, which implies sacrifices. Pets are used, and all the worshippers shall use them in the ritual (14:16-21).

In Malachi's age the ritual was in practice, but grossly abused. They offered polluted bread (1:7), and a blind, lame and cripple sheep for sacrifice (1:3). They had the same attitude toward these as toward those in the times of Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah (Mal 1:10f). The Gentiles offer better ones (1:11). The Israelites covered the altar of Jah with tears by their hypocrisy. Mal. was literal, literalism is the arch-enemy of the Spirit of God. In the end he robbed God in withholding tithes and heavy offerings (3:8). It is the abuse of the cult that is denounced here, as in all the other Prophets.

A special use of the term "sacrifice" is made by Zephaniah (1:7f), applying it to the destruction of Israel by Jah. Bozrah and Edom are to be victims (Isa 34:6); also Gog and Magog (Ezk 39 17.19).

In summing up the general attitude of the prophets toward sacrifices, even G. F. Moore in his "Bible Dictionary" admits that the prophets only distinctly entertained the idea of a religion without a cultus, a purely spiritual worship. Sacrifice may well have seemed to them the natural expression of homage and gratitude. He might have added, "and a part of atonement." (J.M.)

VIII. Sacrifice in the "Writings."—Dates are very uncertain here. The Ps and Prov extend from David and Solomon into the Pers period.

The sages take the same attitude as the prophets. They enjoin the sacrifice of first-fruits (Prov 3:9). A feature frequently mentioned is the lot (Prov 18:11).

1. In the peace offerings (7:14). The trespass Proverbs offering (?) has no meaning to fools (14:9), and the sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to God (15:8; 21:27). Right-ousness and justice are more acceptable to Jeh than sacrifices (21:3), yet to them sacrifices are a regular part of worship. Kōhēleth speaks of sacrifices as quite the custom, and deprecates the offerings of fools (Eccl 5:1; 9:2).

The Psalmist is remarkable for the faithful to offer the sacrifices of righteousness, i.e., sacrifices offered in the right spirit (4:5). The drink offerings of idolaters are well known (16:4). Prayer is made for the acceptance of sacrifice (30:3). It is a coveted privilege to offer them (27:6; 84:1-4).

The true relation between sacrifice and obedience is expressed in 40:6-8. As in Jer 7:21 f., the emphasis is laid on obedience, without which sacrifices are worthless and repugnant to God. They are not the important thing in Israel's religion, for that religion could exist without them as in the wilderness and exile. The teaching corresponds exactly with that of the prophets and is probably late. Ps 80 is even more emphatic. The Psalmist knows that sacrifices are in the covenant regulations (ver 5), but repudiates the idea of giving anything to God or of feeding Him (vs 12,13). Everything belongs to Him. He is not hungry, He would scorn the idea of drinking the blood of goats, etc. The idea of the cultus being of any real value to God is scorned. Yet in the next verse the reader is admonished to offer sacrifices of thanksgiving and pay vows (ver 14). The sacrifices that express worship, penitence, prayer, thanksgiving and faith are acceptable. The penitent Psalmist speaks tenderly of sacrifices as such, no delight to God, the real sacrifice is a broken heart (61:16). When the heart is right, then, as an expression of true-heartedness, devotion, repentance and faith, burnt offerings are highly acceptable (Ps 50:14; Ps 109:3). He promises a free-will offering to God (64:6; 66:13, 15). Sacrifices of thanksgiving are advised (96:8; 107:22; 118:27) and promised (116:17). Prayer is likened to the evening sacrifice (141:2).

IX. The Idea and Efficacy of Sacrifices.—That the Hebrews thoroughly believed in the efficacy of sacrifices is without doubt. What ideas they entertained regarding them is not so clear. No single theory can account for all the facts. The unbloody sacrifices were regarded as food for the Deity, or a pleasant odor, in one instance, taking the place of a bloody offering (see above). The bloody offerings present some difficulties, and hence many different views.

Included among a host of gifts of food to the Deity would be the meal and peace offerings, in so far as they were consumed by fire, the burnt offerings and the shewbread, etc. They were fire-food, the fire-distilled essence or etherealized food for God which gave Him pleasure and disposed Him favorably toward the offerer. They were intended either to appease wrath, to win favor, or to express thanks and gratitude for favors experienced. The offering probably to win the favor of the Deity by a gift. Later, other ideas were expressed in the offerings.

The burnt offering best gave expression to the sentiments of adoration and devotion, though they may not be excluded from the meal and peace offerings. In other words, sacrifice meant worship, which is a complex exercise of the soul. Such was Abraham's attempted sacrifice of Isaac. The daily burnt offerings were intended to give value to God's unbroken course of adoration and devotion, to keep the right relations with the Deity. On particular occasions, special offerings were made to insure this relation which was specially needed at that time.

The burnt and sin offerings were the principal kinds used for the purpose of purification; water being used in case of uncleanness from contact with the dead. There were three classes of uncleanness: (1) those resulting from the touch of men and women; (2) those resulting from contact with a corpse; (3) the case of recovery from leprosy. Purification ceremonies were the condition of such persons enjoying the social and religious life of the community. They may be seen as occurring when most of them occurred in the regular course of nature and could not be guarded against, can be understood only as we consider that these offences were the effects of sin, or the weaknesses of the fleshly nature, due to sin. Such uncleannesses made the subject unfit for society, and that unfitness was an offence to God and required a particular offering.

Consecration was of men and things. The ceremonies at the sealing of the covenant and the consecration of the Levites and of Aaron. The altar and furniture of the tabernacle were consecrated by the blood of a sin offering, and the service in the temple, by sprinkling the blood consecrated them to the service of God. The blood being holy, it was made all holy (Ex. 29:19 f.).

In other words, it is a kind of sacred communion. The blood is the sacred cement between God and man. This is possible only because it contains the life and is appropriated by God as a symbol of the communion between Him and the believer.

5. To Establish a Community of Life between Worshippers and God

This blood "covers" all sin and defilement in man, permits him to enter God's presence and attests the communion with Him. This is the view of Schultz, and partly that of Kautzsch, in regard to earlier ideas of sacrifice. Such a view may have been held by certain peoples in primitive times, but it does not do justice to the Levitical system.

The view of Ritschl is that sacrifices served as a form of self-protection from God who was a recreation to a weak creature. Thus sacrifices have no moral value and no relation to sin and defilement. But they are only to man's creaturely weakness which is danger of destruction removes the presence of God. God's presence necessarily meant death to the creature without reference to his holiness, etc. Such a view banishes all real sense of sin, all ethical values, and furnishes no proper motives. It gives a false idea of the character of God, and is entirely out of accord with the sacred record.

That sacrifices were really a sacrament has been advocated by many. According to some theologians, the sacrifices were signs of spiritual realities, not only representing but serving as means of spiritual blessings, and their efficacy was proportionate to the faith of the offerer. By some Roman Catholic theologians it is held that the Pass-over was a sacrifice of a sacramental character, corresponding to the Eucharist. The purificatory rites corresponded to penance and the consecrating sacrifices to the sacrament of ordination. Bähr says that the acceptance of the sacrifice by Jeh and His gift of sanctification to the worshippers give to the sacrifice the character of a sacramental act. Cave also speaks of the unique sacramental signification, while refuting the position of Bähr. Though there may be a slight element of truth in some of these ideas, it is not the idea expressed in the cultus, and seems to read into the ritual the theology of the theologians themselves. This view is closely allied to a phase of the following view (see Paterson, HDB, IV).

It that is a symbol or expression of prayer is held by Maurice and to some extent by Schultz. Thus the sacrifices are supposed to be symbols of the guilt and reparation which are the conditions of acceptance with God. The victim serves as an index of what is in the worshipper's heart, and its virtue is exhausted when it is presented to God. Thus the aspiration or supplication, hatred of sin and surrender to God with confession and supplication. Bähr holds that a valuable and unblemished victim is selected as symbolical of the excellence and purity to which the offerer aspires, the death is necessary to procure life which may be offered to God, and the sprinkling of the blood is the presentation to God of the life still resident in the blood. Schultz thinks that the sin offering was distinctive. Hence the real ground of purification is that God accepts the sacrifice and thereby enters into communion with the sinner, granting him actual pardon, and that man in this offering enjoined by God as the embodied prayer of a penitent and confession of guilt, and its petition for forgiveness." While there is an element of truth in this, and it is particularly applicable to the burnt offering, it does not embrace all the facts. It represents the views of the prophets and psalmists more than that of the Levite code.

Kautzsch holds that the efficacy of sacrifices consists in this: God has given the accomplishment of atonement with the obedient discharge of the external prescriptions. Whoever fulfills these and gives the priest to perform the atoning usages, is forgiven. Thus the actual, essential, purgative condition of atonement, is the fulfillment of the Law, is not synonymous. Forgiveness of sin flows from the grace of God as taught by the prophets, only with them it is unnecessary, but with them it is necessary, as the Levite code. The Kautzsch teaches a fundamental contradiction between the prophets and the Law, which is utterly wrong and is made necessary by first turning the history upside down and making the PC a hideous anachronism. He says, "that the process of atonement is connected with the precious of blood, explains itself naturally as a powerful after-influence of primitive sacrificial usages, in which the process was a different, more solemn act. It was a symbolic (not real) satisfaction, as through the animal's life symbol the sin was given to God, in a manner that the sin is proceeded to God. But the main idea is that God has commanded it" (HDB, V, 721c). The half-truths in these statements will be obvious to most readers.

The theory that sacrifices were a vicarious expiation of sin and atonement, by a victim whose life is forfeited instead of the sinner's, is the only one that will complete the Levitical idea of sacrifices. This of course applies esp. to the sin offering. While there is an element of truth in the gift-theory, the prayer and sacramental theories and others, including that of Kautzsch, the idea of a vicarious suffering is necessary to complete the conception. Oehler recognizes the importance of these relations to the idea that in sacrifices man places the life of a pure, innocent, sacrificial animal between himself and God, because he is unable to approach God on account of his sinfulness and impurity. Thus it becomes for him, through the victim, not a punishment inflicted on the animal, although in the case of uncertain homicide it is (Dt 21 1-9). The law does not lay the emphasis upon the slaughter, but on the shedding of the blood and the sprinkling of it on certain articles. The spoil is regarded as a gift. The altar is not regarded as a place of execution, it is the means for "covering" the sins of the covenant people, a gracious ordination of God and well-pleasing to Him. But the gift can please God only as the gift of one who has given himself up to Him; therefore the ritual must represent this self-surrender, the life of the clean and guiltless animal in place of the impure and sinful soul of the offerer, and this pure soul, coming in between the offerer and the Holy God, lets Him see at the altar the life by which our life is covered. In the same way the pure element serves to cover the pollutions of the sanctuary and the altar, etc. Its meaning is specific, it is the self-sacrifice of the offerer vicariously accomplished. Thus self-sacrificial suffering and punishment, which is inflicted on the beast to which the guilt and sin are imputed, not imparted (see Oehler, OT Theol., 2781).

Objections have been raised by Dillmann, Kautzsch and others on the ground that it could not have been vicarious cause sacrifices were not allowed for sins which merited death, but only for venial transgressions (Nu 16 30). Certainly, but the more sacrificial system was for those who were in the covenant, who did not commit sins that merited death, and was never intended as a penal sacrifice, because the sins of those in the covenant were not of a penal nature. The sacrifices were 'to cover the sin and death penalty of one who broke the law' (Bähr). Again they object, a sacrificial offering may atone, and this excludes the substitute sacrifices, they are not strictly penal, and the ceremonial was an exception to the rule. In any case it represented the self-sacrifice of the offerer, and that was the important thing. Further, the victim was the person by the offerer's own hands, whereas it should have been put to death by God's own hands. This carries the idea that the essential thing was a sacrifice, and priests were not necessary for that. A more serious objection is that in the case of the substitution, the sins of the offerer and guilt are transferred to the animal, the flesh of that animal that is regarded as most holy is offered to the priest only, whereas it would necessarily be regarded as laden with guilt and curse, and hence polluted and unfit for use. According to this view, the substitution was not strictly penal, and, secondly, there is the fact that actual pollution is conveyed to the flesh of the animal or to the blood. Even if it were so, the shedding of the blood would expiate the sin and guilt, wipe out the pollution, and the flesh would be in no way affected. On the contrary, the flesh, having been the vehicle for the blood which has accomplished such a sacred and meritorious service, would necessarily be regarded as most holy. All the animal would be holy, rather than polluted, since it had performed such a holy service. Kautzsch's objection thus appears puerile.

The ritual on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16) by virtue of its many features. It is distinctly stated that the high priest confides the iniquities of the children of Israel over the scapegoat, and when the scapegoat is sent into the desert. Its blood is not shed, it is wholly clean, and the man carrying it away is his own property, and is not necessarily a vicarious act. In the case of the other goat, a sin offering, the sin and guilt are imputed to it, and the life is taken away, and so the explanation that the flesh of the victim used in such a holy service is most holy.

That this view of a vicarious expiation was generally accepted is evident on every hand. There was no need of a theoretical explanation in the cultus; it was self-evident; as Holtzmann says, "the most external indeed, but also the simplest and most generally intelligible and the readiest answer to the nature of expiation" (NT Theol., I, 68). This view is amply corroborated by the researches of S. I. Curtiss in his Primitive Sem Religion of Today. Of searching questions he found that the fundamental idea of bloody sacrifices was that the victim took the place of the man, redeemed him, or atoned for him as a substitute. The "bursting forth of the blood" was the essential thing (see pp. 218 f).

The typology and sin has been fully discussed. There can be no question that, from the standpoint of the NT, many of the sacrifices were typical. They prefigure, and designedly so, the great sacrifice of Christ. Thus they could really take a new place in that sense unreal. But the question is, were they typical to the people of Israel? Did Moses and the priests and prophets and people understand that they were merely figures, adumbrations of the true Sacrifice to come, which alone could take away sin? Did they understand that their Messiah was to be sacrificed, His blood shed, to make an atonement for them, and that their Law is but a Divinely given means of atonement all unreal? The answer must be an emphatic "No." There is no hint that their minds were directed to think of the Coming One as their sacrifice, foreshadowed by their offerings. That was the one thing they did not and could not understand, and to this day the cross is their chief stumbling-block. The statement that the Servant is to be a guilt-offering (Isa 53 10) is the nearest approach to it, but this is far from saying that the whole sacrificial system was understood as foreshadowing that event. The teaching is a total collapse of a sacrificial system in full vogue in the Messianic age.

We prefer to regard the sacrificial system as a great religious educational system, adapted to the capacity of the people at that age, intended to develop right conceptions of sin, proper appreciation of the holiness of God, correct ideas of how to approach God, a familiarity with the idea of sacrifice as the fundamental thing in redemption, life, and service to God and man.

I. TERMS OF SACRIFICE EPITOMISED.

The word "offering" (προσφορά, prosphorá) describes the death of Christ, once in Paul (Acts 8:32; Rom 5:8-10; Eph 5:2; Col 1:20; 2:13; 3:12). The same word, whether in the NT or OT sacrifices, occurs 116 times in LXX, usually as the tr of ἔκτασις, miššah, "sacrifice." This word recurs in Paul, in Acts 2:14; 7:17; 10:38; 26:23; 28:28; 1 Cor 3:14; 15:15; 1 Pet 5:2.

The word "sacred" (θύσια, thússia, translates in LXX a Heb word for various kinds of sacrifice, occurring about 190 times, in the NT as the death of Christ's sacrifice, once in Acts 7:1; 1 Cor 3:14; 11:16; 15:34; 26:23; 10:12; 13:15; 14:19). The same word, whether in the NT or OT sacrifices, occurs 13 times in He (7:27; 9:28: 13; 15; 17; 19:7; 20:12).

The word "sacrifice" (θυσία, thússia, translates in LXX a Heb word for various kinds of sacrifice, occurring about 190 times, in the NT as the death of Christ's sacrifice, once in Acts 7:1; 1 Cor 3:14; 11:16; 15:34; 26:23; 10:12; 13:15; 14:19).

or not the system of animal sacrifices would have ceased, not only in Judaism but also in all the ethnic religions, had not Jesus lived and taught and died, is a question of pure speculation. It must be conceded that the sect of the Jews (Essenes) attaining to the highest moral level and living the most unselfish lives of brotherhood and benevolence did not believe in animal sacrifices. But they exerted small influence over the Jewish nation as compared with the Pharisees. It is also to be noted that the prophets Amos, Hosea, Micah and Isaiah exalted the ethical standard and living the moral lives of men, and did not believe in animal sacrifices. But they exerted small influence over the Jewish nation of sacrifice. Sacrifice, Isa 21.10; 10:1; Mt 26:28. There is a sacrifice of the OT system as a whole. Christ is a superset of all sacrifices. Mt 16:21; Mk 8:31; Lk 9:22; Jn 10:14; 19:30. It is the central idea of the NT in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 26:26-29; Mk 14:17-25; Lk 22:19-20; 1 Cor 11:24). In the former He declares Jesus to be the Lamb of God. Luke 22:19, says that John saw Christ "suffering under the load of human sin." There are recorded in the Synoptic Gospels two unmistakable references by Jesus to His death as a sacrifice.

1. Teaching God," in the former passage adding of John the "that taketh away the sin of the world." Westcott (Comm. on St. John, 20) says: "The title as applied to Christ...is the title of one suffering, of patient submission, of sacrifice, of redemption, etc." There is scarcely any doubt that the Baptist looked upon the Christ as the one who came to make the great sacrifice for man's sins. Professor Burton (B. Ideas of Atonement, Burton, Smith and Smith, 107) says that John sees Christ "suffering under the load of human sin."

There are recorded in the Synoptic Gospels two unmistakable references by Jesus to His death as a sacrifice. Mt 26:28 refers to Him as "the Lamb of sacrifice." But as to whether there could be any doubt as to the sacrificial import of this passage, there is a clear case of the sacrificial idea in Mt 26:28; Mk 14:24; Pray that this divine prerogative, the continuance of sacrifice as a system, when He said, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many." The only important differences in the discontinuation of the system. "Thus it was that our Lord disavowed the inferiority of sin, and the divine necessity of the sacrifice of the new covenant, as superior to the sacrifices of the old system as the new covenant is superior to the old. Paul's estimate of the Jewish sacrifices was easily seen, although he does not often refer to them. The author of the Ep. to the Hebrews regards the OT sacrifices more fully than other NT writers. He regards the bloody sacrifices as superior to the unbloody and the yearly sacrifice on the Day of Atonement by the high priest as the climax of the OT system. The high priest under the old covenant was the type of Christ under the new. The sacrifices of the old covenant could not take away sin, or produce remission; Mt 27:22; and because God had appointed another high priest, His Son, to supplant those of the old covenremission of sins). In his first Ep. (1 18.19) he expressly declares that we are redeemed by the blood of the spotless Christ, thus giving the sacrificial significance to His death. The same is implied in 1 2; 3 18.

Paul ascribes saving efficacy to the blood of Christ in Rom 3 25; 5 9; 1 Cor 10 16; Eph 1 7; 2 13; Col 1 20. He identifies Christ with a sin offering in Rom 8 3, and perhaps also in 2 Cor 5 21, and with the paschal lamb in 1 Cor 5 7. In other passages he speaks of Christ's death as redemption, forgiveness of sins, justification and adoption (Rom 3 24-26; 5 10.11; 8 15.17, etc.).

The argument of the author of Heb to prove the finality of Christianity is that Christ is superior to the Aaronic high priest, being a royal, eternal high priest, according to the order of Melchizedek, and offering Himself as the final sacrifice for sin, and for the moral restoration of men (4 14; 10 18).

In the first of these NT teaching passages he speaks of Christ's death as the propitiation for sin. He identifies Himself with the Lamb of God (Rev 1 5; 5 6.9.12).

John ascribes deliverance (not washing or cleansing, according to best MSS) from sin to the blood of Christ. Several times he calls Christ the Lamb, making the sacrificial idea prominent. Once he speaks of Him as the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world (15 8).

To sum up, all the NT writers, except James and Jude, refer to Christ's death as the great sacrifice for sin. Jesus Himself regarded His death as such. In the various types of NT teaching Christ's death is presented (1) as the covenant sacrifice (Mk 14 24; Mt 26 28; Lk 22 19; He 9 15-22); (2) as the sin offering (Rom 8 3; 2 Cor 5 21); (3) as the offering of the paschal lamb (1 Cor 5 7); (4) as the sacrifice of the Day of Atonement (He 2 17; 9 12 ff).

IV. Relation of Christ's Sacrifice to Man's Salvation.—The saving benefits specified in the NT as resulting from the sacrificial death of Christ are as follows:

Redemption or deliverance from the curse of sin: This must be the implication in Jesus' words, 'Father... the Son of man came 1. Redeem-to give his life a ransom for many' (Mk 10 45; Mt 20 28). Man is a captive in sin, the Father sends His Son to pay the ransom price for the deliverance of the captive, and the Son's death is the price paid. Paul also uses the words "redeemed" and "redemption" in the same sense. In the great letters he asserts that we are "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: whom God set forth to be a propitiation... in his blood" (Rom 3 24.25). Here the apostle traces justification back to redemption as the means for securing it, and redemption back to the "blood" (Christ's death) as the cause of its procuring. This is Christ's death secures redemption and redemption procures justification. In Gal (3 13), he speaks of being redeemed "from the curse of the law." The law involved man in a curse because he could not keep it. This curse is the penalty of the broken law which the transgressor must bear, except deliverance from said penalty is somehow secured. Paul represents Christ by His death as securing for sinners deliverance from this curse of the broken law (cf Gal 4 5 for the same thought, though the word "curse" is not used). Peter emphasizes the same teaching in the Captivity Epistles: "In whom we have our redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses" (Rom 1 14). In the pastoral letters (1 Tim 2 6) he teaches that Christ gave "himself a ransom for all." This is the only NT passage in which occurs the strong word antilutron for "ransom." In his old age the apostle feels more positively than ever before that Christ's death is the ransom price of man's deliverance from sin.

The author of Heb as asserts that Christ by the sacrifice of Himself "obtained eternal redemption" for man (9 12). John says that Christ "loosed... us from our sins by his blood" (Rev 5 1). This idea of John is akin to that of redemption or deliverance by ransom. Peter teaches the same in 1 Pet 1 19. So, we see, Jesus and all the NT writers regard Christ's sacrifice as the procuring cause of human redemption.

The idea of reconciliation involves a personal difference between two parties. There is estrangement between God and man. Reconciliation is the restoration of favor between the two parties. Jesus does not utter any direct message on reconciliation, but he implies God's sin and strained relations between God and the unrepentant sinner (see Lk 18 13). He puts into the mouth of the praying tax-gatherer the words, 'God be propitiated to me' (see Thayer, Gr-Eng. Lex., hilaškein, etc), but Jesus is the one who makes the sacrifice. His death secures the reconciliation of God to the sinner. Paul, however, does. "For if, while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son," etc (Rom 5 10). There can be no doubt from this passage that Paul thought of the death of Christ as the procuring cause of reconciliation. In Eph 2 13.14.18 Paul makes the cross of Christ the means of reconciliation between the hostile races of men. Paul reaches the climax in his conception of the cross of Christ when he asserts the unifying results of Christ's death to be cosmic in extent (Eph 1 10).

The author of He also implies that Christ's death secures reconciliation when he regards this death as the ratification of the "better covenant" (6 6 ff), and when he plays on the double meaning of the word ἱλασθείς, 9 15 ff, now "covenant" and now "atonement." The death of Christ is necessary to secure the ratification of the new covenant which brings God and man into new relationships (8 12 ff). This is a word implying propitiation as wrought by the death of Christ. So the doctrine of reconciliation is also in the Ep. to the Hebrew, John teaching also that Christ is the Advocate through Christ our Advocate, but does not expressly connect it with His death as the reconciling cause (1 Jn 3 2). Peter is likewise silent on this point.

Reconciliation implies that God can forgive; yea, has forgiven. Jesus and the NT writers declare the death of Christ to be the basis of God's forgiveness. Jesus in instructing of Sins tating the memorial supper said, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many unto remission of sins" (Mt 26 28). It is true Mk and Lk do not record this last phrase, "unto remission of sins." But there is no intimation that this phrase is the result of Matthew's theologizing on the purpose of Christ's death (see Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, II, 239 ff, who claims this phrase is not from Jesus; also Allen in "Mt., ICC, in loc.). But Paul leaves no doubt as to the connection between man's forgiveness by God and Christ's sacrifice for him. This idea is rooted in the great passage on justification (Rom 3 21-4 21; see esp. 4 7) is positively declared in Eph 1 7; Col 1 14. The author of He teaches that the shedding of Christ's blood under the new covenant is as necessary for secure forgiveness of the offending of animal's blood under the old. John also implies that forgiveness is based on the blood (1 Jn 1 7-9).

True reconciliation and forgiveness include the canceling of the offender's guilt. Jesus has no direct word on the cancellation of guilt. Paul does his argument for the universality of human sin by asserting that "all the world may be brought 4. The under the judgment of God" (AV Cancellation "guilty before God," Rom 3 19). of Guilt Thayer (Gr-Eng. Lex. in loc.) says that this word "guilty" means "owing satisfaction to God" (liable to punishment by God). But in Rom 8 1 3 Paul exclaims, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus... God, sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh on earth (Rom 8 3 26; merely an offering for sin"). The guilt, or exposure of the sinner to God's wrath and so to punishment, is removed by the sin offering which Christ made. This idea is implied by the author of He (2 1 5), but is not expressed in Peter and John.

Right standing with God is also implied in the preceding idea. Forgive sin and canceling guilt are the negative, bringing into right standing with God the positive, acquisition of the same transaction. "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" (Rom 8 36). Right standing the sin offering; so Augustine and with God other Fathers, Ewald, Ritschl; see Meyer, Comm., in loc., who denies this meaning on our behalf that "he who has the righteousness of God in him" (2 Cor 5 21).

In this passage Paul makes justification the divine purpose of the sacrificial death of Christ. This thought is elaborated by the apostle in Gal and Rom, but is not expressed by Jesus, or in He, in Pet or in Jn.

Jesus does not connect our cleansing or sanctification with His death, but with His word (Jn 17 17). The subst. cleansing (καθαρισμός) is not used by Paul, and the sanctify. vb. "to cleanse" (καθαρίζω, καθαρίσα) occurs only twice in his later letters (Eph 5 26; Tit 2 14). He does use the idea of sanctification, and in Rom 6--8 teaches that sanctification is a logical consequence of justification which is secured by Christ's sacrificial death. In Phil 3 10.11, he views Christ's death and resurrection as the dynamic of transformation in the new life. The author of He (1 3; 9 14.22.23; 10 2), following the OT figures, uses the idea of cleansing for the whole process of putting away sin, from atonement to sanctification (see Westcott, Comm., in loc.). He makes Christ's death the procuring cause of the cleansing. John does the same (1 Jn 7 17--19).

Divine sonship of the believer is also traced by Paul to the sacrificial death of Christ (Rom 8 17), though this thought is not found in Sonship other NT writers.

So, we sum up, the whole process of salvation, from reconciliation with God to the adoption of the saved sinner into heaven's household, is ascribed, to some extent by Jesus, largely by Paul the theologian of the NT, and, in varying degrees, by other NT writers, to the sacrificial death of Christ. Even Holtzmann (Neutest. Theol., II, 111) admits "It is upon the moment of death that the grounding of salvation is exclusively concentrated.

V. How Christ's Sacrifice Procures Salvation.-- It must be conceded that the NT writers, much less Jesus, did not discuss this subject from the philosophical point of view. Jesus never philosophizes except incidentally. Paul, the author of He, and John had a philosophy underlying their theology, the first and second dealing most with the sacrificial work of Christ and the righteousness of God. But Paul and the author of He did not write their letters to produce a philosophical system explaining how Christ's sacrificial death can and does procure man's salvation.

By some it is claimed that the word "ransom" (Mk 10 45) gives us the key to the philosophy of the atonement, as presented in Paul's teaching. But the rules of exegesis are against this supposition. Jesus in the context is teaching his disciples the greatness of his greatness. To illustrate the truth he refers to his own example of coming to minister, and then giving his life to ransom (v. 45). This is not enforcing a practical principle and not elaborating a theoretical truth. Moreover, the word is used metaphorically, and the laws of exegesis forbid us to press the literal meaning of a figure. The figure suggests captivity, payment of a price (the price of the death of Christ). But Jesus does not tell us how his sacrifice procures the cleansing of man's redemption from sin. The word "ransom" does give the clue to the development of the vicarious sacrifice (elaborated later by Paul. Romans 3. 25; Thayer, Verfahrun, II, 85) does not do the word "ransom" justice when he claims that it merely reproduces the meaning of the Heb. דוד, kapher, "covering as a protection," and that Christ's death, like a covering, delivers us by stimulating us to lead the life of sacrificial service as Christ did. (Luders Jcsu, 237; Teaching of Jesus, II, 226 f) admits the "ransom" idea in the word, but says Christ delivers us from bondage to suffering and death, not by his death, but by His teaching which is illustrated by His sacrificial death. Boushler (Neutest. Th., I, 15) thinks that the word "ransom" refers to the whole body. Meyers (Comm., in loc.) does not go so far. He considers the word as an expression of "the deliverance of the sinner from the penalty of sin," and that Christ's death cancels the debt of the sinner, and so abolishes the debt. Moreover, as Paul says, Mar's death cancels all debts, and by implication he says that it cancels the debt of the sinner. But this statement fails to tell us how (that is, the sacrificial death) cancels the debt, or in other words, how Christ's sacrifice procures the cleansing of sin.

Now does Jesus' saying at the Last Supper, "This is my blood of the covenant" (Mt 26 28), mean the same as the takeable evidence of how His death saves men. It does teach that sinners on entering the kingdom come into a new covenant relation with God which implies forgiveness of sin and fellowship with God, and that, as the covenant sacrifice of Christ is made at Mt. Sinai (Exod. 24 10), there is an analogous covenant relation between God and His people, so that the death of Christ is a vicarious sacrificial death. In the account of grace between God and lost sinners, by virtue of which covenant God on His part forgives the penitent sinner, and the sinner enters into the covenant, there is an allusion to the sacrifice of Christ to God for the life of sacrifice. But this statement fails to tell us how (that is, the sacrificial death) procures the cleansing of sin.

Nor do Jesus' saying at the Last Supper, "This is my blood of the covenant" (Mt 26 28), mean the same as the takeable evidence of how His death saves men. It does teach that sinners on entering the kingdom come into a new covenant relation with God which implies forgiveness of sin and fellowship with God, and that, as the covenant sacrifice of Christ is made at Mt. Sinai (Exod. 24 10), there is an analogous covenant relation between God and His people, so that the death of Christ is a vicarious sacrificial death.
in His death. (c) The design of God in making such a propitiation was the exhibition of His righteousness; i.e., the vindication of that side of His character which demands the punishment of sin, which had not been shown in former generations when His forbearance had passed men’s sins by. See Sanday, Comm. on Rom, in loc. The classical passage containing the other word to redeem (καταλαλάτείον) is Gal 3:13: “Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us.” Professor E. D. Burton (Ant., p. 347, October, 1907) thinks: (a) Law here means “law legalistically understood.” (b) The “curse” was the verdict of the law of pure legalism, “a disclosure to man of his actual status before God on a basis of merit.” (c) The redemption meant is that Christ “brought to an end the régime of law . . . rather than deliverance of individuals through release from penalty.” He bases this argument largely on the use of ἐλεησόμενος, ἐλεηθήναι, “us,” meaning Jews in antithesis with ἐλεηθησαίτε, τί ἐλθήναι, the Gentiles (ver 14). Everett (The Gospel of Paul) thinks that Christ was cursed in that He was “crucified” (the manner not the fact of His death being the curse); that is, as Everett sees it, Christ became ceremonially unclean from the law. So does Paul follow in being crucified with Christ become ceremonially unclean and so free from the law. The passage seems to give us the following propositions: (a) Man under law (whether the revealed law of the OT or the moral law) is under a “curse,” that is, liable to the penalty which the broken law demands. (b) Christ by His death on the cross became a “curse for us.” (c) By means of Christ thus becoming a “curse for us” He delivered us, “not the Jews as a nation, but all of us, Jews and Gentiles, whom He believed.” (Rom 15:8). Professor Burton admits that the participle ἐλαλάτείον, γενέσθαι, “becoming,” may be a “participle of mean” (art. cited above, 615), and so we have “Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us.” The passage at least suggests, if it does not declare, that Christ saves us by vicariously enduring the penalty to which we were exposed.

(2) The idea of Reconciliation.—Paul uses the phrase “wrath of God” (Rom 1:18, etc) to express the attitude of God toward sin, an attitude of displeasure and of grief, of revulsion of holy character which demands the punishment of sin. On the other hand, God loves the sinner; love is the principle of the Christian idea of God. (Rom 5:8; 8:32). That is, wrath is love grieving and righteousness revolting because of sin, and both phases may act simultaneously (Simon, Redemption of Man, 216, to the contrary). So Paul says, “God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not reckoning unto them their trespasses” (2 Cor 5:19). Now this word “reconcile” (καταλαλάτείον) means in the active, “to receive into favor,” in the passive, “to be restored to favor” (Thayer, Syn. and Exeget. Lex., October, 1900, 600 ff, where Professor Estes shows, from Sophocles, Xenophon, Josephus, LXX and passages in the NT like Mt 5:24, that the word must mean a change in the attitude of God toward men and not merely a change of men toward God. Practically the same is in Emmert, Comm. on Rom, 2 Cor). Lipsius (Handb. zum NT); Sanday (Comm. on Rom); Denney (Exeget. Gr. Test. on Rom); Lietzmann (Handbuch zum NT); Holtmann (Neuest. Theol.); Weiss (Rel. of the NT); Pfleiderer (Paulinism); Stever (Christian Doctrine of Salvation); Liddon (Commen. on Rom and 2 Cor); and by all the writers on NT theology except Byschlag. See also Reconciliation; Rethorisation.

The idea of propitiation.—Only once (Rom 3:25) does Paul use the word “propitiation.” As we saw in (1) above, the redemption in Christ is based upon the propitiation which Christ made in His death. Thayer (Gr-Eng. Lex., in loc.) says the noun signifies “a means of appeasing, expiating, or propitiating, an expiatory sacrifice.” He thinks it has this meaning in Rom 3:25, but refers to it in the “mercy-seat” in He 9:5. Sanday (Comm. on Rom, 88) regards hilasterion as an adj., meaning “propitiatory.” De Wette, Fritzche, Meyer, Lipsius and many others take it in this sense; Gifford, Vaughan, Liddon, Ringgenberg think it means propitiation as in Heb. But with either meaning the blood of Christ is viewed as securing the mercy of God. Propitiation of God is made by the blood of Christ, and because of that men have access to the mercy-seat and forgiveness of sins. See Romans, Epistle to the, 9, (3).

The prepositions τῆς, ἐλαλάτειον, ἐλαλθήναι, etc.—Paul never uses ἐλαλάτειον ("for," instead of, "in place of," so Thayer) to express what Christ’s sacrifice does for the sinner, but ἐλαλθήναι ("for one’s safety and advantage," and correspondingly, the word ἐλαλάτειον, "instead of," so Thayer). See Rom 5:8; 8:32; 14:15; 1 Cor 11:24; 2 Cor 5:15; Gal 3:13; Eph 5:225; 1 Thess 5:10; 1 Tim 2:6; Tit 2:14. It is to be noted that in 1 Tim 3:6 Paul uses antiluton, "ransom," (and surrounded with the same qualifications) to follow it with ἐλαλάτειον, which may suggest that ἐλαλάτειον is here used in the sense of ἐλαλθήναι, "in place of."

Summing up Paul’s teaching as to how Christ’s sacrifice saves: (a) The propitiatory sacrifice does not “soften God, or assuage the anger of God”; but claims the advocates of the satisfaction theories assert, Victorinus, Sacrifice, 486. God is already willing to save men’s love makes the propitiatory sacrifice (Rom 5:8). God’s love makes the sacrifice, not the sacrifice His willingness to save men. (b) But God’s love makes the sacrifice (Rom 5:8), and so was under God’s wrath (Rom 1:18), i.e. man’s sin exposed him to punishment, while at the same time God’s love for the sinner was grieved. (c) Christ by His sacrificial death made it possible for God to show His righteousness and love at the same time; i.e. that He did punish sin, but did love the sinner and wish to save him (Rom 25:26; 5:8). (d) Christ, who was sinless, suffered vicariously for sinful men. His death was not due to His sins but those of men (2 Cor 5:21). (e) His death, followed by His resurrection which marked Him off as the sinless Saviour of God, and so appointed the Saviour of men (Rom 1:4), was designed by God to bring men into right relation with God (Rom 3:26; 2 Cor 5:21). So, we may say, Paul explains the relation of the sinner to Christ by the sinner’s spiritual life by thinking of a transfer of the sinner’s “curse” to Christ, which is followed by a transfer of God’s righteousness through Christ (Phil 3:9) to the sinner by faith in Christ. But we must not press this vicarious idea too far. It is not the sinner’s claim of the atonement and claim that the system is the teaching of Paul. The vicarious, compensatory, expiatory view is not in Paul’s mind. The language of redemption, propitiation, ransom, is largely figurative. We must feel the spiritual truth of a qualitative transfer of sin from man to Christ and of righteousness from Christ to man, and rest the matter there, so far as Paul’s teaching goes. Beyond this our conclusions as to substitution as the method of atonement are results of philosophising on Paul’s teaching.

The author of He adds nothing to Paul’s teaching respecting the method whereby Christ’s sacrifice operates in saving men. His purpose

3. Teach— to produce an apology showing forth of Hebrews—priestly sacrifice over that of the Apostolic priesthood, with its emphasis on the efficacy of the sacrifice rather than on its mode of operation. He does use the words “redemption” (9:12; of vers 15), “propitiation” (2:17), and emphasizes the opening up of the heavenly holy of holies by the high-priestly sacrifice of Christ. By the right of access to the holy place (the vineyard) Christ gave us data forming a system based on a real propitiation for sin and reconciliation of God similar to the Pauline teaching formulated above.

The International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia: Sacrifice (NT)
Peter asserts that Christ suffered vicariously (1 Pet 2:22-24), who, although He "did no sin," "his own self bare our sins in his body 4. Petrine on the tree;" who "suffered for and 19:18, John); for the righteousness of sinners., and was not evil to the unrighteous. (1 Pet 3:18). But Peter than Paul (perhaps not so far) in elaborating how Jesus' vicarious suffering saves the sinner. The Johannine writings contain the propitiatory idea (1 John 2:2; 4:10), although John with other emphasis on the work of the Incarnate One (1 John 1:18; 1 John 4:23).

To sum up the NT teachings on the mode or operation: Jesus asserts His vicarious suffering (Mk 10:45; cf. John 10:20) and hints at the mode of its operation by using the "ransom" figure. Paul, Peter and John teach that Christ's sacrifice was vicarious, and all but Peter suggest the idea of propitiation as to the mode of its operation. There is no direct discussion of what propitiation means.

VI. Rationale of the Efficacy of Christ's Sacrifice. - Jesus emphatically rejected the sacrifice. 1. Jesus' Teaching in Hebrews 14:10. Jesus asserted His vicarious suffering (Mk 10:45; cf. John 10:20) and hinted at the mode of its operation by using the "ransom" figure. Paul, Peter and John teach that Christ's sacrifice was vicarious, and all but Peter suggest the idea of propitiation as to the mode of its operation. There is no direct discussion of what propitiation means.

The author of Hebrews, most of all NT writers, elaborates the grounds of Christ's sacrifice. (1) It was a personal and not an animal sacrifice (9:12-14). (2) It was the sacrifice of himself (Heb 10:14). (3) It was a sacerdotal person who made the sacrifice (6:20; 7:1, "after the order of Melchizedek . . . king of Salem"). (4) It was a sinner person (7:26-27; 9:14; 10:10,12). When Christ entered Consecration, 286, well says: "It became necessary, therefore, in order to gain a complete view of the sacrifice to come, to crown him upon the Cross His fulfillment of the will of God from first to last, the sacrifice of Life with the sacrifice of Life (9:11) and the sinner person to whom it was offered," "for every one (7:16, "after the power of an endless [m 'insoluble'] life") who is asked to come to the climax of argument for the superior efficacy of Christ's sacrifice when he represents Him as entering the holy of holies in the very presence of God to complete the offering for man's sin (§ 1.2; § 11.12.24).

To sum up our conclusion as to the efficacy of Christ's sacrifice: Jesus and the leading NT writers intimate that the efficacy of His sacrifice centers in His personal character, who do not discuss the subject directly. Paul, though discussing it more extensively, does not do so fully, but the author of Hebrews and culminates his argument for the finality of Christianity, in the superior efficacy of Christian sacrifice, which is grounded in his personality, Divine, royal, sinless, eternal (see Menagé, Théol. de l'Ep. ou Hébreu). It is easy to see, from the position taken by the author of Hebrews, that Anselm in Cur Deus Homo developed his theory of a sufficient sacrifice, according to which the Divinity in Christ gave His atoning sacrifice its priceless worth in God's eyes.

VII. The Human Conditions of Application. - The sacrificial death of Christ is universal in its objective potentiality, according to Jesus (Luke 24:47, "unto all the nations"); according to Paul (Rom 1:5; 5:18; 11:32; 2 Cor 5:20). But the objective redemption to be efficacious must be subjectively applied. The blood of Christ is the universally efficacious remedy for the sin-sick souls of men, but it is efficacious when the sinner makes an application. Subjectively applied, how is the application made? And the threefold answer is, by repentance, by faith, and by obedience.

(1) By repentance. - The Baptist and Jesus emphasized repentance (change of mind, as to submission of all, change of course of life) as the condition of entrance into the kingdom of God, of the kingdom of the Messianic salvation (Matt 3:2; Mark 1:15). Peter, once he repented at Pentecost and immediately after as a means of obtaining forgiveness (Acts 2:38), although emphasizing faith, also stressed repentance as an element in the human process of salvation (Acts 20:21; Rom 2:4, 5; Rev 2:5, 6). Paul, however, stresses repentance, though not stressing it as a means of receiving the benefit of salvation.

(2) By faith. - Jesus connected faith with repentance (Mark 1:15) as the condition of receiving the Messianic salvation. Peter connected faith with repentance, applying the work of the Cross. The gospel is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth" (Rom 1:16); "whom God set forth to be a propitiation, through faith" (3:5). "Faith not works is reckoned for righteousness" (4:6). Paul, in the letters to the Cor. In the Captivity and the Pastoral Ep., he emphasizes faith as the condition of obtaining salvation. But what kind of faith is it that appropriates the saving benefit of Christ's death? Not historical faith, not intellectual assent, nor will, or will and intellect. Peter "heart" meant the seat or essence of the whole personality, a phrase which speaks of the faith which is in Christ the personal commitment of one's self to Christ as Saviour and Lord (2 Cor 5:15). See Thayer, Gr-Eng. Lex., "heart" and "faith," for a particular discussion of the meaning of faith in this sense. The author of Hebrews emphasizes faith as a concurring power, but also implies that it is the condition of entrance upon the life of spiritual rest and fellowship (chs 3:14). Peter and John also stress the saving benefit of the human condition of salvation when he shows how sanctification grows spontaneously out of justification (Rom 8:8) and when he says that what "avails" is "faith working through love" (Gal 5:6). The author of Hebrews says, "He became unto all them that obey Him the author of (Gr, arn, altis, cause) of eternal salvation" (Heb 2:3). Peter and John states that the latter esp. emphasizes the keeping of His commandments, the life of service, as the means of appropriation to the fullest the saving benefits of Christ's death. The theologians in classrooms and preachers in the pews have failed to emphasize this aspect of "saving faith," as did Jesus, Paul, the author of Hebrews, and John. In the NT salvation is a process as well as an objective benefit, which is wrought on the part of God, and the process is carried on by means of obedience, the life of service, which is appropriate by faith the dynamic of Christ's sacrifice.

VIII. The Christian Life's Life and the Life of Sacrifice. - This discussion of the faith that "obeys" leads to the consideration of that climactic thought of NT writers, namely, that the Christian's life is sacrificial living based on Christ's sacrifice for him. We note in outline the following:

The Christian life's life is the logical consequence of Christ's sacrificial death. The Christ who sacrificed Himself for the believer is now continuing the sacrifice in the believer's life...
exercise of all our gifts and graces is viewed by Peter as sacrificial living (1 Pet 2:5): "Ye also, as living stones, are built up a spiritual house, to be a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices," etc. All Christians daily live as they operate as God's mighty dynamite for the apostle's moral and spiritual transformation (Phil 3:10).

It is to be noted, Jesus also emphasized this kind of living, though not so expressly connecting the believer's sacrificial life with His sacrificial death (see Mk 8:34).

Christ's sacrificial death becomes the persuasive appeal for the Christian's sacrificial life, "Because we thus judge, that one died for all, therefore all died; and he died for all; that they that live should no longer live unto themselves, but unto him who for their sakes died and rose again" (2 Cor 5:15). Because He died for us, we should live for Him. But what is the appeal which Christ's sacrificial death makes to the saved sinner? "The love of Christ constraineth us" (2 Cor 5:14). Christ's death on the cross exhibits His love, unsurpassed, unthinkable, love for it was love for His "enemies" (Rom 5:10), and this love that He shed for the sinner's heart. He is willing to do anything, even to die, for his Saviour who died for him (Acts 21:13; Phil 2:29-30).

It is a greater privilege for the saved sinner to suffer for Christ than it is to believe on Him. Peter (1 Pet 3:17-18), the author of He (12:13) and John (1 John 3:16; 4:16-19) emphasize this truth.

The Christian's sacrifice is necessary to fill out Christ's sacrifice. 'Now I rejoice in my sufferings for you, and in my flesh I suffer with Christ (Col 1:24).

s. sacrifice

Roman Catholic exegetes have made the apostle teach that the sufferings of the saints, along with Christ's sufferings, have atoning efficacy. But Paul nowhere intimates that his sufferings avail for putting away sins. We may hold with Weiss (Comm. on the NT) that Paul longed to experience in his flesh the full measure of Christ's sacrificial suffering as Christ did; or with Alford (in loc.) that he wished to suffer his part of Christ's sufferings to be endured by him through his Church; or, as it seems to us, he longed to make effective by his ministry of sacrifice the spiritual benefit that all things in this sacrifice are to Christ's sacrifices avails in saving men only when Christians sacrifice their lives in making known this sacrifice of Christ.

(1) The Christian is to present his personality (Rom 15:16). Paul commends the Macedonians for "first" giving "their own selves to the Lord" (2 Cor 8:5). (2) Christians must present their "bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God" (Rom 12:1). In the old system the animals were offered as dead; Christians are to offer their bodies, all their members with their powers, to God a "living sacrifice," i.e. a sacrifice which operates in lives of holiness and service (see also Rom 6:15). (3) Christians receive many benefits. Their money is used up in the service of God. Paul speaks of the gift from the church at Philippi as "a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God" (Phil 4:18). This gift was to the apostle a beautiful expression of the sacrificial spirit imparted to them because they had the "mind of Christ who emptied himself ... becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross" (2:5-8). The author of He (13:16) exhorts his readers, "But to do good and to communicate forget not: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." (4) The general

5. The Supper as a sacrifice

Neither Jesus, Paul, the author of He, and Peter, nor John, ever hints that in eating the bread and drinking the wine, we offer a sacrifice to God in Christ. Paul tells that in partaking of the Supper we "proclaim the Lord's death till he come" (1 Cor 11:26). That is, instead of offering a sacrifice ourselves to God, in partaking of the Supper we proclaim the offering of Christ's sacrifice for us. Milligan argues that Jesus in heaven perpetually offers Himself for us, so we on earth, in the Supper, offer ourselves to Him (Heavenly Priesthood, 266).

Even Cavelly (Spiritual Doctrine of the Eucharist, 436) maintains, "In some sense saying the Lord's Supper may be called a sacrifice." See the above books for the argument supporting this position.

To sum up our conclusions on sacrifice in the NT:

(1) Jesus and NT writers regard the OT sacrificial system as from God, but imperfect, the various sacrifices serving only as types of the one great sacrifice which Christ made.

(2) All the writers, except James and Jude, with Jesus, emphasize the sacrificial idea. Jesus less, giving only a hint of His sacrificial death (in the Synoptic Gospels), the author of He putting the climactic emphasis on Christ's sacrifice as the sacrifice of atonement.

(3) As to the relation of Christ's sacrifice to man's salvation, the latter is the achievement of the former, so expressed only twice by Jesus, but emphatically so declared by Paul, the author of He, Peter, and John (Paul and He laying most emphasis on this point).

(4) As to how Christ's sacrifice saves men, Jesus, the author of He, Peter and John suggest the idea of propitiation, while Paul emphatically teaches that man is under a curse, exposed to the displeasure of God, and that Christ's sacrifice secured the reconciliation of God by vindicating His righteousness in punishing sin and His love in saving sinners.

(5) As to the rational basis of efficacy in Christ's sacrifice, there is no direct discussion in the NT except by the author of He who grounds its final, eternal efficacy in Christ's personality, Divine, royal, sinless and eternal.

(6) As to the conditions of applying Christ's sacrifice, repentance, faith, and all the leading NT writers as the means of appropriating the benefits of Christ's sacrifice.

(7) By Jesus, Paul, the author of He, Peter and John the Christian life is viewed as the life of sacrifice. Christ's death is at once the cause, motive, SACRIFICE, HUMAN, bû'man: As an expression of religious devotion, human sacrifice has been widespread at certain stages of the race's development. The tribes of Western Asia were deeply affected by the practice, probably prior to the settlement of the Hebrews in Palestine and it continued at least down to the 4th century B.C. At times of great calamity, anxiety and danger, parents sacrificed their children as the greatest and most costly offering which they could make to propitiate the anger of the gods and thus secure their favor and help. There is no indication in the Bible that strangers or captives were sacrificed; only the offering of children by their parents is mentioned. The belief that this offering possessed the proper recluse value is seen in Mic 6:6; where the sacrifice of the firstborn is the climax of a series of offerings which, in a rising scale of values, are suggested as a means of mitigating the angry Jeh. A striking example of the rite as actually practiced is seen in 2 K 3:27, where Mesha the king of Moab (made famous by the Moabite Stone), under the stress of a terrible siege, offered his eldest son, the heir-apparent to the throne, as a burnt offering upon the wall of Kir-hareseth. As a matter of fact this horrid act seems to have had the effect of driving off the allies.

Human sacrifice was ordinarily resorted to, no doubt, only in times of great distress, but it seems to have been practiced among the old Canaanitish tribes with some frequency (Dt 12:31). The Israelites are said to have borrowed it from their Canaan- neighbors (2 K 15:5; 2 Ch 28:3), and as a matter of fact human sacrifices were never offered to Jeh., but only to various gods of the land. The god who was most frequently worshipped in this way was Moled or Molech, the god of the Ammonites (2 K 21:12; Lev 18:21), the Heid. In Dn 1 we learn that the Phoen. god Baal was, at least in the later period of the history, also associated with Molech in receiving this worship (Jer 19:5; 32:35). As in the case of the Canaanites, the only specific cases of human sacrifice mentioned are among the Semites; the two kings of Judah who were most deeply affected by the surrounding heathen practices and who, at the same time, fell into great national disasters, are those of 67:5; Ezek 23:6; 2 Ch 36:6). But it is clear from many general statements that the custom was widespread among the masses of the people as well. It is forbidden in the Moabite legislature (Lev 18:21; 20:2-5; Dt 18:10); it is said in 2 K 17:17 that the sacrifice of sons and daughters was one of the causes of the captivity of the ten tribes. Jeremiah charges the people of the Southern Kingdom with doing the same thing (Jer 7:31; 19:5; 32:35); with those general statements agree the special references of the W. to the life of the period. The practice continued in the Northern Kingdom, and then only in the summary of the causes of their captivity (2 K 17:17), but the Southern Kingdom in its later years was evidently deeply affected. Thus there were various places where the bloody rite was celebrated (Jer 19:5), but the special high place, apparently built for the purpose, was in the Valley of Tophet or Hinnom (ge-hinnôm, Gehenna) near Jerus (2 Ch 29:3; 35:6). This great high place was built for the special purpose of human sacrifice (Jer 31:35; 32:35); was defiled by the good king Josiah in the hope of eradicating the cruel practice (2 K 23:10).

The Bib. writers without exception look upon the practice with horror as the supreme point of national and religious apostasy, and a chief cause of national disaster. They usually term the rite "passing through fire," probably being unwilling to use the sacred term "sacrifice" in reference to such a revolting custom. There is thus no evidence of a continuance of the practice in captivity nor after the return. It is said, however, that the heathen Sepharvites, settled by the Assyrians in the depopulated territory of the Northern Kingdom, buried their children in the fire of Adad-nirer, Adanelech and Ananaelech, the gods of Sepharvaim" (2 K 17:31). The practice is not heard of again, and probably rapidly died out. The restored Israelites were not affected by it. Cf. Sacrifices, I, VI, 10.

quasi-independence enjoyed by the Jews be taken from them, and with this the influence of the Sadducees would depart. An oligarchy is proverbially sensitive to anything that threatens its stability; a priesthood is unmindful of its vindictiveness; and the Sadducees were a priestly oligarchy. Hence it is not wonderful that only the death of Jesus would satisfy them.

After the resurrection, the Pharisees became less hostile to the followers of Christ; but the Sadducees maintained their attitude.

Antagonistic. Although a Pharisee, it was as agent to Apostles after the death of Christ.

Departure. In the Sanhedrin, and later, under the leadership of Annas, or as he is sometimes called by Jos, Ananus, the high priest, they put James the brother of Our Lord to death (Jos, Ant., XX, ix, 1) with many others, presumably Christians. The Pharisees were against these proceedings; and even sent messengers to meet Albinus who was coming to succeed Festus as governor to entreat him to remove Annas from the high-priesthood.

With the outbreak of the Jewish war, the Sadducees with their allies the Herodians were driven into the background by the Zealots, John of Gischala and Simon ben Gioras. Annas and Joshua, also called high priest by Jos, were both put to death by the Zealots and their Iudamaean allies (Jos, BJ, IV, v, 2).

With the destruction of the temple and the fall of the Jewish state the Sadducee party disappeared.

III. Doctrines of the Sadducees.—As the ascetic party, the Sadducees laid great stress on the ceremonial of sacrifices, and rejected the changes introduced by their opponents unless these found support in the words of the Law.

The most prominent doctrine of the Sadducees was the denial of the immortality of the soul and of the resurrection of the body. The Sadducees believed that Moses had decreed that there would be no resurrection. He who was not found by Moses—i.e. found to be conformable to the Jewish Law—would not come to a resurrection. We can only surmise how this doctrine was derived.

2. Disbelief in the immortality of the soul and in the resurrection of the body.

As appearances of angels are mentioned in the Law, it is difficult to harmonize their reverence for the Law with this denial. They may have regarded these angelophanies as phantasmata. Jos distinctly asserts (Ant., XVIII, i, 4) that the Sadducees believe that the soul dies with the body. They deny, he says, Divine providence (BJ, II, viii, 14). Their theology might be called "religion within the limits of mere sensation."

The Fathers, Hippolytus, Origen and Jerome, credit the Sadducees with regarding the Pentateuch as the Canon, or the ordinary rule of life, and its Canonicity of Pentateuch Alone. This may be due to a false identification of the views of the Sadducees with those of the Samaritans. Had they rejected all the rest of Scripture, it is hardly possible that they would fail to notice this.

The Talmud does not mention this among their errors. It is certain that they gave more importance to the Pentateuch than to any other of the books of Scripture. Hence Our Lord, in the passage commented on by Origen and Jerome, appeals to the Law rather than to the Prophets or the Ps. It follows from the little value they put upon the Prophets that they had no sympathy with the Messianic hopes of the Pharisees.

It need hardly be said that there was no real connection between Sadduceanism and the doctrine of the Resurrection. The Sadducees believed in no hope of immortality, and their chief characteristic was their flagrant unbelief. Their theory of the resurrection was purely accidental. Their favor for Hellenism would give a color to this identification.

IV. Character of the Sadducees.—Jos says that while the Pharisees have amiable manners and cultivate concord among all, the Sadducees are "very boorish" (BJ, II, viii, 14).

1. Characterized as Rough and Boorish.

The way in which it behooves us to write of this sect, towards the end of the 2nd century, is one of an aristocracy, or with supple diplomats, yet it suits what we find in the NT. The cruel horseplay indulged in when Our Lord was tried before the irregular meeting of the Sanhedrin (Mt. 26:67-68), the show of Annas at the trial of Paul before the same tribunal who "emite him on the mouth," show them to be rough and overbearing.

What Jos relates of the conduct of Annas (or Ananus) in regard to James, above referred to, agrees with this. Jos, however, does not express such condemnation. Ananus—in BJ (IV, v, 2)—calls him "a man venerable and most just." Only the violence which, as Jos relates in the chapter immediately preceding that from which we have quoted, Ananus resorted to against the Zealots better agrees with the dict of Jos than the latter. As to their general character Jos mentions that when the Sadducees became magistrates they confirmed their judgments to Pharisaic opinion, otherwise they would not have been tolerated by Ant, XVIII.

As noted above, the Talmud account is untrustworthy, late and Pharisaic. The Gemara from which most of the references were taken was not committed to writing till 7 centuries after Christ, when the traditions concerning the Sadducees, such as had survived, had filtered through 20 generations of Pharisaism.

Despite this lengthened time and suspicious medium, these may be some truth in the representations of the Talmudic rabbins. In Perekham 57a it is said, "Woe's me on account of the house of Hanan [Ananas], woe's me on account of the house of Phabi; woe's me on account of the house of Kaisros; woe's me on account of their pen; woe's me on account of their house; woe's me on account of their house; woe's me on account of their house; woe's me on account of their house." This shows, if anything, that the Sadducees were not a degraded lot, as later reported; they were, perhaps, more of a sort that would appeal to such a lofty study as that of the Talmud.

2. Talmudic Accounts of the Sadducees.

At any rate, the Sadducees were the temple's metalurgists; the more severe rabbis said that they were a "sacred people with sticks." As these are Sadducean names, this passage exhibits Pharisaic tradition as to the habits of the Sadducees.

The Sadducean high priests made Hophni and Phinehas too much their models. Annas and his sons had booths in the courts of the temple for the sale of sacrificial requisites, tables for money-changers, and their Worship into the shrines of the temple. From all these the priests of the high-priestly caste derived profit at the expense of deceiving the people (Edereram, Life and Times of Jesus, I, 371 ff.). They did not, as did the Pharisees, pay spiritual religion the homage of hypocrisy; they were frankly irreligious. While officials of religion, they were devoid of its spirit. This, however, represents a later stage.

The favor for the memory of John Hyrcanus shown by the writer of 1 Macce 16:23-24 renders probable Geiger's opinion that the author was a Sadducee. He shows that the history of Hyrcanus: his outlook on life is eminently sane, and his history is trustworthy. He has sympathy with the patriotism of the Sadducees, but none with the religious scruples which led them to desert Judas Maccabaeus.

That the writer of Eccles from his silence as to the national expectation of a Messiah and the hope of a future life was also a Sadducee, is almost certain.

V. The Relation of the Sadducees to Jesus.—As the doctrines and practices of the Sadducees were quite alien from the teaching of Our Lord, it is evident that any words He ever said to His disciples that were not in harmony with the Jewish Law, and in particular with the dietary laws, could have been taken to be derogatory of the Sadducees or had some other meaning. It is thus possible that the Sadducees were not in harmony with the Pharisees in their practice of the Law, but were more interested in the letter of the Law than the spirit of it. It is also possible that the Sadducees were not in harmony with the Pharisees in their views on the resurrection of the dead, and that the Sadducees held a different view from the Pharisees on this subject.

1. Less Denounced by Jesus than the Pharisees. Sadducees were quite alien from the teaching of Our Lord, and in particular from the teaching of His disciples. It is thus possible that the Sadducees were not in harmony with the Pharisees in their practice of the Law, but were more interested in the letter of the Law than the spirit of it. It is thus possible that the Sadducees were not in harmony with the Pharisees in their practice of the Law, but were more interested in the letter of the Law than the spirit of it. of the saints" (Rom 16:2) and as such "as becometh saints" (Eph 5:3). The thought of the holy character of the "saints," which is now so common as almost completely to obscure the real thought of the NT writers, already lay in their thinking very clearly, as a clear expression of saintliness and consecration by God to be His own. Sala, Salah, Salome THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

Salamin, sa-lā-mīn (A, Σαλαμήν, Salamīn, סאלמיא; An ancestor of Judith (Jth 8:1)) = AV “Samuel.”

Salamin (Σαλημία, Salamía): A town on the east coast of Cyprus, situated some 5 miles north of the N. of Medievea and a little south of the town of Famagusta. It lay near the river Pediaeus, at the eastern extremity of the great plain of the Mesoreia, which runs far into the interior of the island toward Nicosia (Lefkada, the present capital). It was a good harbor and was the most populous and flourishing town of Cyprus in the Hellenic and Rom periods, carrying on a vigorous trade with the ports of Cilicia and Syria. Its population was mixed, consisting of Gr and Phoen elements. The former, however, gave its tone and color to the city, and the chief cult and temple were those of Salaminian Zeus.

Tradition represented Salamin as founded soon after the fall of Troy by Teucer, the prince of Gr archers according to the narrative of the Iliad, who named it after his home, the island of Salamis off the Attic coast. In the 6th cent. BC it figures as an important Hellenic city, ruled by a line of kings reputed to be descended from Teucer and strengthened by an alliance with Cyrene (Herod. iv.162). Gorgus, who was on the throne in 496 BC, refused to join the Ionian revolt against Persia, but the townsmen, led by his brother Oenclus, took up arms in the struggle for freedom. A crushing defeat, however, inflicted under the walls of Salamis, restored the island to its Pers overlords, who reinstated Gorgus as a vassal prince (Reed, 1 c.196). In 432 a Gr fleet under Athenian leadership defeated the Phoen. navy, which was in the service of Persia, off Salamis; but the Athenian admiral which conducted the battle led to a decided anti-Hellenic reaction, until the able and vigorous Samian prince Euphorbas, who was a warm friend of the Athenians (Isocrates, Euph.) and a successful champion of Hellenism. In 306 a sensational battle was fought at Salamis, in which Demetrius Poliorcetes defeated the forces of Pharaoh Ptolemy (Sext. Alexander). 11 years after the town came into Ptolemy’s hands and, with the rest of the island, remained an appanage of the Egypt kingdom until the incorporation of Cyprus in the Rom Empire (58 BC).

When Barnabas and Paul, accompanied by John Mark, set out on their 1st missionary journey, they sailed from Seleucia, the seaport of 3. Visit of Antioch, and landed at Salamin, about the Apostles 150 miles distant, as the harbor nearest to the Syrian coast. There they preached the gospel in the “synagogues of the Jews” (Acts 13:5); the phrase is worse noting as pointing to the existence of several synagogues and thus of a large Jewish community in Salamin. Of work among the Gentiles we hear nothing, nor is any indication given either of the duration of the apostles’ visit or of the success of their mission; but it would seem that after a short stay they proceeded to the W. to Paphos. The words seem to imply that they visited all, or at least most, of the towns in which there were Jewish communities. Paul did not return to Salamin, but Barnabas doubtless went there on his 2nd missionary journey (Acts 15:29), and tradition states that he was martyred there in Nero’s reign, on the site marked by the monastery named after him.

In 116 AD the Jews in Cyprus rose in revolt and massacred 240,000 Greeks and Romans. The rising was crushed by the utmost severity of punishment. Salamin was almost completely depopulated, and its destruction was afterward consumed by earthquakes in 332 and 342 AD. It was rebuilt, though on a much smaller scale, by the emperor Constantine (A.D. 324) under the name Constantia, and became the metropolitan see of the island. The most famous of its bishops was Epiphanius, the staunch opponent of heresy, who held the see from 367 to 403. In 617 the city was finally destroyed by the Saracens. Considerable remains of ancient buildings still remain on the site; an account of the excavations carried on there in 1890 by Messrs. J. A. R. Munro and H. A. Tubbs under the auspices of the Cyprus Exploration Fund will be found in the Journal of Hellenic Studies, XII, 56–68.

Salathiel, sa-lā-thiāl (1) (Σαλαθήθι, Salathēthi): AV; Gr form of “Shealtiel” (thus RV). The father of Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5:48–56; 6:2; Mt 1:12; Lk 3:27). (2) RV Another name of Estars (2 Esd 3:1, “Salathiel”).

Sale, sāl (ם놀, mînkār): The word is used: (1) in the sense of the transaction (Lev 25:50); (2) in the sense of the limit of time involved in the transaction (Lev 25:27); (3) in the sense of the price paid in the transaction (Lev 19:8), though it may be the same as (1) above.

Salecah, sal’-kā, Salah, Salchah, Salcah (σαλκά, σαλκά, σαλχά, σαλχά; Aḥéth, אשה, Ašhá, Asha, Ḡāl, Ṣālī, Sālī, Sālī; Ḡāl, ʾĂḵā, Ṣalāh, Ṣalāh, Ṣūlāḥ): This place first appears in Dt 3:10 as marking the eastern boundary of Bashan. It is named as one of the cities in which Og, king of Bashan, ruled (Josh 12:5). It must certainly have been included in the portion given to the half-tribe of Manasseh, "all the kingdom of Og king of Bashan," although it is not named among the cities that fell to him (Josh 13:29ff). At a later time we are told that Gad dwelt over against the Reubenites in the land of Bashan unto Salecah (1 Ch 5:11). The boundaries of the tribes probably changed from time to time.

The ancient city is represented by the modern Salkhad, a city in a high and strong position at the southern end of Jebel ed-Drūze (the Mountain of Bashan). On a volcanic hill rising some 500 ft. above the town, in what must have been the crater, stands the castle. The view from the battlements, as the present writer can testify, is one of the finest of E. of the Jordan, including the rich hollow of the Hazarán, Mt. Hermon, and all the intervening country to the mountains of Samaria, with vast reaches of the desert to the S. and to the E. The old Rom roads are still clearly seen running without curve or deviation across the country to Bozrah and Der’ah, away to the S.E. over the desert to Kal‘at el-Drūz, and eastward to the Pers Gulf. The castle was probably built by the Romans. Restored by the Arabs, it was a place of strength in Crusading times. It has now fallen on evil days. The modern town, containing many ancient houses, lies mainly on the slopes S.E. of the castle. The inhabitants are Druzes, somewhat noted for turbulence. In the recent rising of the Druzees (1911) the place suffered heavily from bombardment by the Turks. For water-supply it is entirely dependent on cisterns filled during the rainy season.

SALEM, ᵐˁlem, ᵐ экономическ, ᵐאлем, ᵐאלם: The name of the city in which Melchizedek, king of Salem, was king (Gen 14: 18; Ps 76 1; 2). To all appearance it lay near and “the Vale of Shaveh,” described as “the King’s Vale.” The general opinion among the Jews was that Salem was the same as Jeru, as stated by Jos (Ant, i, 2), who adds (VII, iii, 2) that it was known as Solyym (Σαλμών, ᵐאולם, variants, according to Whiston, Salem and Hierosolyma) in the time of Abraham. It was also reported that the city and its temple were called Solyyma by Homer, and he adds that the name in Heb means “security.” This identification with Jerus was accepted by Orlkos and all the Tgs, as well as by the early Christians. The Samaritans have always identified Salem with Nazareth, but Jewish and Christian tradition is more likely to be correct, supported, as it is, by Ps 76 2.

1. Identification: The name of the city in which Melchizedek, king of Salem, was king (Gen 14: 18; Ps 76 1; 2).

2. Testimony on the Tab is apparently negative. Knudtzon’s no. 287 mentions “the land” and “the lands of the Urusalm called Bit-Ninigiy Tablets (Brit 128, 3: 2, 2). As there is no prefix of any kind before the element salim, it is not probable that this is the name of either a man (the city’s founder) or a god (like the Assyry Saliman). The form in Sennacherib’s inscriptions (cf Taylor Cylinder, II, 53, 54, Utartummi, gives the whole as a single word in the nominative, the double m implying that the i was long. As the Assyrians pronounced a as sh, it is likely that the Usurimites did the same, the Heb yāḏaḥānit, with sh. See Jerusalem.

SALEM (Σαλήμ, ᵐאלהם, AV Salum): An ancestor of Ezra (1 Esd 8 1) = “Shallum” in Ezr 7 2 = “Salmans” in 2 Esd 1 1.

SALEMAS, saꞌē-mas, saꞌē-mas (Lat Salome; AV Sadamia): An ancestor of Ezra (2 Esd 1 1) = “Shallum” in Ezr 7 2; called also “Salem” in 1 Esd 8 1.

SALIM, saꞌim (Σαλήμ, ᵐאלהם, Salém): A place evidently well known, since the position of Aeon, the springs where John was baptizing, was identified by reference to it: they were “near to Salim” (Jn 3 23). It must be sought on the W. of the Jordan, as will be seen from comparison of Jn 1 28; 3 26; 10 40. Many identifications have been proposed: e.g., that of Afford with Shilhim and Ain in the S. of Judah; that of Bleshin with “Ain Kārim, and that of Barday, who would place Salim in Wady Salem near Andā, making Aeon the springs in Wady Fā’rah. These are all ruled out by their distance from the district where John is known to have been at work. If there were no other objection to that suggested by Conder (Tent Work, 49 f) following Robinson (BR, III, 333) with Salim in the plain E. of Nablus, Aeon being “Ainān in Wady Far’ah,” it would be sufficient to say that this is in the very heart of Samaria, and therefore impossible. In any case the position of Aeon, 6 miles distant, with a high intervention, could hardly be defined by the village of Salim, with the important city of Shechem quite as near, and more easily accessible.

Onom places Aemon 8 Rom miles S. of Scythopolis (Beta), near Samim (Salim) and the Jordan. This points to Tell ʿRudhārā, on the northern side of which is a shrine known locally as Sīkār Salīm. Not far off, by the ruins of Um ʿum El-ʿAmārā, there are seven copious fountains which might well be called Aemon, “place of springs.”

There is reason to believe that this district did not belong to Samaria, but was included in the lands of Scythopolis, which was an important member of the league of ten cities. W. Ewing

SALIMOTH, salīm’oth (B, ᵐאלום, Salmith; A, ᵐאלוים, ᵐאשלום; the latter is due to a wrong division of syllables; AV Assalimoth): The same as “Shelmoth” (Ezr 8 10). S., the son of Josephias, of the family of Banias, and with him 130 men went up to Jerus with Ezra (1 Esd 8 36).

SALLAI, sal’ā-ī, sal’ā (ט’ י, sallyay; סָלָלִים, Salōm, א, Sālā, Sālā, Sālā, with variants):

1. (1) Eponym of a Benjamite family which settled at Jerus after the return, descendants of “Sallu” (1 Ch 9 7; Neh 11 7 8; Jer 14 1 3; 29 11 21). The pedigree of Sallu differ decidedly in the two passages. Curtius (ICC) suggests that “son of Hadaviah, the son of Hase- mhah (Ch) is a corruption or derivation of ‘Judah the son of Hassumah’ (Neh).”

2. Name of a priestly family (Neh 12 20), called “Salim” in ver 7.

SALLU, sal’ū. See Sallai.

SALLUMUS, sa-lat’mas, sa-lat’mas (Σαλλομοῦσα, Σαλλομώσα): One of the porters who had taken “strange wives” (1 Esd 9 25) = “Salum” in Ezr 10 24; called also “Salum” in 1 Esd 5 28.

SALMA, sa’lma. See Salom.

SALMAI, sa’lmî, sa’lmâ-ī (ט’ י, salmay; AV Shalmai [AV in Neh 7 48 is “Shalmai” = Ezr 2 40; RV “Salmoi”]): The eponym of a family of Nethinim, called “Shamlaiai” in Ezr 2 46 (K, ᵐאלוים, ᵐאשלם, ʿAin, Kithib, ᵐב Malone, av S. of Judah; that of Bleshin with “Ain Kārim, and that of Barday, who would place Salim in Wady Salem near Andā, making Aeon the springs in Wady Far’ah. These are all ruled out by their distance from the district where John is known to have been at work. If there were no other objection to that suggested by Conder (Tent Work, 49 f) following Robinson (BR, III, 333) with Salim in the plain E. of Nablus, Aeon being “Ainān in Wady Far’ah,” it would be sufficient to say that this is in the very heart of Samaria, and therefore impossible. In any case the position of Aeon, 6 miles distant, with a high intervention, could hardly be defined by the village of Salim, with the important city of Shechem quite as near, and more easily accessible.
SALOAS, salt'6-as (Σαλώας, Salōas; AV Talsus after LXX Thalass)); In 1 Esd 9 22, for “Elashah” of Ex 10 22.

SALOM, sāl'om (Σαλομ, Salōm):
1) The father of Heklas (Bar 1 7). Gr form of “Salt”.
2) AV=RV “Sahu” (1 Mace 2 26).

SALOME, sa-lō'mē (Σαλομή, Salōmē):
1) One of the holy women who accompanied with Jesus in Galilee and ministered to Him (Mk 16 40.41). She was present at the crucifixion (15 40), and was among those who came to the tomb of Jesus on the resurrection morning (16 1.2). Comparison with Mt 27 56 clearly identifies her with the wife of Zebedee. It is she, therefore, who made the ambitious request for her sons James and John is recorded in Mt 20 20-24; Mk 10 35-40. From Jn 19 25 many infer that she was a sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus (thus Meyer, Luthardt, Alford); others (see Godet, KJ) dispute the inference.
2) Salome was the name of the daughter of Herodias who danced before Herod, and obtained as reward the head of John the Baptist (Mt 14 3-11; Mk 6 17-28; of Jos, Ant, XVIII, v. 4). She is not named in the Gospels. JAMES ORR

SALT, sōlt (σάλτ, melôb; ἁλας, ἡδας, ἄλας, ἡδά): Common salt is considered by most authorities as an essential ingredient of our food. Most people intentionally season their cooking with more or less salt for the sake of palatability. Others depend upon the small quantities which naturally exist in water and many foods to furnish the necessary amount of salt for the body. Either too much salt or the lack of it creates undesirable disturbance in life. The Men and animals alike instinctively seek for this substance to supplement or improve their regular diet. The ancients appreciated the value of salt for seasoning food (Job 6 6). So necessary was it that they dignified it by making it a requisite part of sacrifices (Lev 2 13; Ex 3 6; 7 22; Ezk 43 24; Mk 9 49). In Nu 18 19; 2 Ch 13 5, a “covenant of salt” is mentioned (cf Mk 9 49). This custom of pledging friendship or confirming a compact by eating food containing salt was observed among Arab-speaking peoples. The Arab, word for “salt” and for its “compact” or “treaty” is the same. Doughty in Arabs appealed more than once to the superstitious belief of the Arabs in the “salt covenant,” to save his life. Once an Arab has received in his hand even his worst enemy and has eaten salt (food) with him, he is bound to protect his guest as long as he remains. See COVENANT OF SALT.

The chief source of salt in Pal is from the extensive deposits near the “sea of salt” (see Dead Sea), where there are literally mountains and valleys of salt (2 S 8 13; 2 K 14 7; 1 Ch 18 12; 2 Ch 25 11). On the seacoast the inhabitants frequently gather the sea salt. They fill the rock crevices with sea water and leave it for the hot summer sun to evaporate. After evaporation the salt crystal can be collected. As salt-gathering is a government monopoly in Turkey, the government sends men to pollute the salt which is being surreptitiously crystalized, so as to make it unfit for eating. Another extensive supply comes from the salt lakes in the Syrian desert E. of Damascus and toward Palmyra. All native salt is more or less bitter, due to the presence of other salts such as magnesium sulphate.

Salt was used not only as a food, but as an astringent in medicine. Newborn babes were bathed and salted (Exk 16 4), a custom still prevailing. The Arabs of the desert consider it so necessary, that in the absence of salt they bathe their infants in camels' urine. Elisha is said to have healed the waters of Jericho by casting a crust of salt into the spring (2 K 2 20 f). Abimelech sowed the ruins of Shechem with salt to prevent a new city from arising in its place (Jgs 9 45). Lot's wife turned to a pillar of salt (Gen 19 26).

Figuratively Salt is emblematic of loyalty and friendship (see above). A person who has once joined in a “salt covenant” with God and then breaks it is easily to be cast out (cf Mt 5 13; Mk 9 50). Saltiness typified barrenness (Dt 29 23; Jgs 17 6). Often compared with the same mouth giving forth blessings and cursings to a fountain yielding both sweet and salt water (Jas 3 11 f). JAMES A. PATCH

SALT, CITY OF, τ'ρ ho-melâh; Αι, πολείς (τας, τας πόλεις hand): One of the six cities in the wilderness of Judah mentioned between Nibshan and Engedi (Jos 15 62). The site is very uncertain. The large and important Tell el-Milh (i.e. “the salt hill”), on the route from Hebron to Akaba, is possible.

SALT, COVENANT OF. See COVENANT OF SALT.

SALT, PILLAR OF. See LOT; SALT; SIDDIM; SLIME.

SALT SEA. See Dead Sea.

SALT, VALLEY OF (τ'ρ ho-melâh), ge ho-melâh): The scene of battles, firstly, between David or his lieutenant Abishai and the Edomites (2 S 8 13; 1 Ch 18 12; Ps 60, title), and later between Amaziah and those same foes (2 K 14 7; 2 Ch 25 11). It is tempting to connect this “Valley of Salt” with et Sebelah, the marshy, salt-impregnated plain which extends from the southern end of the Dead Sea to the foot of the cliffs, but in its present condition it is an almost impossible place for a battle of any sort. The ground is so soft and spongy that a wide detour around the edges has to be made by those wishing to get from one side to the other. It is, too, highly probable that in earlier times the whole of this low-lying area was covered by the waters of the Dead Sea. It is far more natural to identify ge ho-melâh with the Wādy el-Milḥ (“Valley of Salt”), one of the three valleys which unite at Beersheba to form the Wādy es-Še'ba. These valleys, el-Milḥ and es-Še'ba, together make a natural frontier to Camaan.

SALT-WORT, sōlt'wurt (σαλτάρης, melâth, a word connected with melâb, “salt,” tr in LXX ἁλόμος, ἁλίμος; AV mallow): The halimos of the Greeks is the sea orache, Atriplex halimus, a silvery whithish shrub which flourishes upon the shores of the Dead Sea alongside the ruin (see JENIPER). Its leaves are oval and somewhat like those of an olive. They have a sour flavor and would never be eaten when better food was obtainable (Job 30 4). The “mallows” is due to the apparent similarity of the Heb melâb to the Gr melâth, melâchê, which is the Lat meloa and Eng. “mallow.” Certain species of meloa known in Arab, as 3lûlah, khubâzeh, are very commonly eaten by the poor of Pal.

SALU, sāl'û (Σαλού, salâ; LXX B, Σαλωναί, Salōnai, Σαλω, Salâ; AV has “Salom” in 1 Mace 2 26): A prince and the head of the tribe of Simeon and the father of Zimri who was slain by Phinehas along with the Midianitish woman. whom he had brought to the camp of Israel (Nu 25:14; 1 Mac 2:26).

SALUM, sālūm (Σαλούμ, Salaōm): The head of one of the families of porters (1 Esd 5:28; om. in B) = “Shallum” in Exr 2:42; 10:24; Neh 7:45 = “Sallumus” in 1 Esd 9:25.

SALUTATION, sal-ō-ū-thum (ἀσπασμός, aspas-mōs): A greeting which might be given in person, orally (Lk 1:20-14.44), or in writing, usually at the close of a letter (1 Cor 16:21; Col 4:18; 2 Thess 3:17). The use of salūm, “greeting,” “joy” (in Jas 1:1). The Pharisaic Jews loved salutations in public places (Mt 23:7; Mk 12:38, AV “greeting,” RV “salutation”); Lk 11:43; 20:46). Often these salutations were very elaborate, involving much time in prostrations, embraces, etc. When Jesus therefore sent out the Seventy, He forbade salutation by the way (Lk 10:4), though He ordinarily encouraged proper civilities of this sort (Mt 5:47; 10:12).

In EV the words “salvation,” “save,” are not technical theological terms, but denote simply “deliverance,” in almost any sense the latter word can have. In systematic theology, however, “salvation” denotes the whole process by which man is delivered from all that would prevent his attaining to the highest good that God has prepared for him. Or, by a transferred sense, “salvation” denotes the actual enjoyment of that good. So, while these technical senses are often associated with the Gr or Heb words τρ “save,” etc, yet they are still more often used in connection with other words or represented only by the general sense of a passage. And so a collection of the original terms for “save,” etc. is of use, not only for the student doing minute detailed work, while it is the purpose of the present article to present a general view of the Bib. doctrine of salvation.

*But a definite religious idea was present also, for the “land of milk and honey,” even under angelic protection, was worthless without access to God (Ex 33:1-4), to know whom gives happiness (Isa 1:19; Hab 2:14; Jer 31:34). Such a concept is normal for most of the OT, but there are eternal significances behind it. That Israel should receive God’s characteristic of righteousness is a part of the ideal (Isa 1:26; 4:3.4; 32:1-8; 33:24; Jer 31:33-34; Ezek 26:26; Zec 8; Dn 9:24; Ps 81:19-12). Good was found in the extension of Israel’s good to the surrounding nations (Mic 4:1-4; Isa 2:4-5; 45:5.6; Zec 2:11; 8:22-23; Is 60:66-19-21; Zec 14:16-17, etc), even to the extension of the legitimate sacrificial worship to the soil of Egypt (Isa 19:22). Paul was insufficient for the enjoyment of God’s gifts, and a new heaven and a new earth were to be received (Isa 66:17; 66:22), and a share in the glories was not to be denied even to the dead (Isa 26:19; Dn 12:2). And, among the people so glorified, God would dwell in person (Isa 60:19-20; Zec 2:10-15). (2) Salvation, then, means deliverance from all that interferes with the enjoyment of these blessings. So it takes countless forms—deliverance from natural plagues, from internal dissensions, from external enemies, or from the subjugation of conquerors (the exile, particularly). As far as enemies constitute the threatening danger, the prayer for deliverance is often based on their evil character (Ps 101, etc). But for the individual all these evils are summed up in the word “death,” which was thought to terminate all relation to God and all possibility of enjoying His blessings (Ps 115:17; Isa 38:18, etc). And so “death” became established as the antonym to “salvation,” and in this sense the word has persisted, although the equation of salvation = physical death has long been transcended. But death and its attendant evils are worked by God’s wrath, and so it is from this wrath that salvation is sought (Josh 7:26, etc). And thus, naturally, salvation is from everything that raises that wrath, above all from sin (Ezk 36:25-28, etc).

* (1) At first the “unit of salvation” was the nation (less prominently the family), i.e. a man through righteous could lose salvation through idolatry (2 S 21:1-14), a king on his subjects (2 S 24), or an unknown sinner could bring guilt on an entire community (Dt 21:1-9). (On the other hand, ten righteous would have saved Sodom (Gen 18:32). And the principle of personal responsibility was grasped but slowly. It is enunciated partly in Dt 24:16 (cf Jer 31:29-30), definitely in Ezek 14:12-20; 33:1-20, and fairly consistently in the Ps. But even Ezekiel still held that five-and-twenty could defile the whole nation (8:16), and he had not the premises for resolving the problem—that temporal disasters need not mean the loss of salvation. (2) But even when it was realized that a man lost salvation through his own fault, the converse did not follow. Salvation came, not by the man’s mere merit, but because the man belonged to a nation peculiarly chosen by God. God had made a covenant with Israel and His fidelity insured salvation: the salvation comes from God because of His promise or (in other words) because of His name. Indeed, the great failing of the people was to trust too blindly to this promise, an attitude denounced continually by the prophets throughout (from, say, Am 3:2 to Mt 3:9). And yet even the prophets admit a real truth in the attitude for despite Israel’s sins, eventual salvation is certain. Ezek 20 states this baldly: there has been nothing good in Israel and there is nothing good in her at the prophet’s own day, but, notwithstanding, God will give her restoration (cf Isa 8:17-18; Jer 32:15-18, etc).
Hence, of the human conditions, whole-hearted trust in God is the most important. (Belief in God is, of course, never argued in the Bible.)

3. Faith
Inconsistent with such trust are, for instance, seeking aid from other nations (Isa 30:5–8), putting reliance in human skill (2 Ch 16:12), or forsaking Pal through fear (Jer 42). In Isa 26:20 entire passivity is demanded, and in 2 K 13:19 lukewarmness in executing an apparently meaningless command is rebuked. (1) Next in importance is the attainment of a moral standard, expressed normally in the various codes of the Law. But fulfilment of the letter of the commandment was by no means all that was required. For instance, the Law permitted the selling of a debtor into slavery (Dt 15:12), but the rarely use of the creditor's right is sharply condemned (Neh 5:1–13). The prophets are never weary of giving short formulae that will exclude such supralegalism and reduce conduct to a puremotive: "Hate the evil, and love the good, and establish justice in the gate" (Am 5:15); "To do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God (Mic 6:8). And the chief emphasis is placed under the Law, esp. Ps 119 (cf Ps 147:20). (2) Certain breaches of the Law had no pardon, but were visited with death at once, even despite repentance and confession (Josh 7). But for the most part it is promised that men may remove the guilt of the sin if the sin be forsaken (Ezk 18) or, in the case of a sin that would not be repeated, if contrition be felt (2 S 12). Suffering played a part in salvation by bringing knowledge of sin to the conscience, the exile being the most important example (Ezk 33:21). But always it is assumed that the possibility of keeping the Law is in man's own power, Dt 30:11–14 stating this explicitly, while the Wisdom Books equate virtue with learning. Consequently, an immense advance was made when men felt the need of God's help to keep the Law, the need of the inscription of the Laws on the heart (Jer 31:31–34). So an outlook was opened to a future in which God would make the nation righteous (see references in 1, above), instead of repentance as expiating past sins was an act of God's mercy. And so His mercy instituted other and additional 5. Sacrifices means of expiation, most notably that of the sacrifices. But a theology of sacrifice is completely absent in the OT; for Lev 17 11 is too incidental and too obscure to be any exception. The Christian (or very late Jewish) interpretations of the ritual laws lack all solidity of exegetical foundation, despite their one-time prevalence. Nor is the study of origins of much help for the meaning attached to the rites by the Jews in historic times. General ideas of offering, of self-denial, of propitiation of wrath, and of entering into communion with God assuredly existed. But in the advanced stages of the religion there is no evidence that sacrifices were thought to produce their effect because of any of these things, but solely because God had commanded the sacrifices. (2) Most sins required a sacrifice as part of the act of repentance, although in case of injury done to the neighbor, only after reparation had been made. It is not quite true that for conscious sins no sacrifices were appointed, for in Lev 5:1; 6 1–3, sins are included that could not be committed through mere negligence. (1) Some rules of such 18:30–31 nature cannot be construed too rigorously. (3) Sacrifices as means of salvation are taught chiefly by Ezek, while at the rebuilding of the temple (Hag, Zec) and the depression that followed (Mal), they were much in the foreground, but the preexilic prophets have little to say about their positive value (Jer 7:22 is the nadir). Indeed, in prexilic times the danger was the exaltation of sacrifice at the expense of morality, esp. with the peace offering, which could be turned into the sowing of idolatry (Am 5:21–24; Isa 22:13; cf Prov 7:14). Attempts were made to "strengthen" the sacrifices to Jeh by the use of ethnic rites (Hos 4:14; Isa 66:1–5), even with the extreme of human sacrifice (Jer 7:31; Ezek 20:36). But insistence on the strict consecration of the sacrifices, giving increasing emphasis laid on the sin and trespass offerings did away with the worst of the abuses. And many of the Ps, esp. 66, 118, give beautiful evidence of the devotion that could be nourished by the sacrificial rites.

Of the other means of salvation the ritual law (not always sharply distinguishable from the moral law) bulks rather large in the legislation, but is not prominent in the Law prophets. Requisite to salvation was the abstention from certain acts, articles of food, etc., such abstinence seeming to lie at the background of the term "holiness." But a ritual breach was often a matter of moral duty (burying the dead, etc.), and, for such breaches, a ritual means of atonement was provided. But yet it is too widely dropped. Evidently such things lay rather on the circumference of the religion, even to Ezekiel, with his anxious zeal against the least defilement. The highest ritual point is touched by Zec 10:20,21, which would not be unif to use in the temple (cf Jer 31:38–40). Yet, even with this perfect holiness, sacrifices would still have a place as a means by which the holiness could be increased. Indeed, this more "positive" view of sacrifice was doubtless more prominent in the ant. II. Intermediate Literature.—(1) The great change, compared with the earlier period, is that the idea of God had become more 1. General transcendent. But this did not necessarily mean an increase in religious value, for there was a corresponding tendency to take God out of relation to the world by an intellectualizing process. This, when combined with the persistence of the older concept of salvation in this life only, resulted in an emptying of the religious instinct and in indifferentism. This tendency is well represented in Ecc, more acutely in Sir, and in NT times it dominated the thought of the Sadducees. On the other hand the expansion of the idea of salvation to correspond with the higher conception of God, and the thoroughgoing ethical life and created the new literary form of apocalyptic, represented in the OT esp. by Zec 9–14; Isa 24–27, and above all by Dnl. And in the intermediate literature all shades of thought between the two extremes are represented. But too much emphasis can hardly be laid on the fact that this intermediate teaching is in many regards simply faithful to the OT. Almost anything that can be found in the OT—with the important exception of the note of joyousness of Dt, etc.—can be found again here. (2) Of the conceptions of the highest good the lowest is the Epicureanism of Sir. The highest is probably that of 2 Esd 7:91–98 RY: "To behold the face of him whom in their lifetime they served," the last touch of materialism being eliminated. Indeed, real materialism is notably absent in the period, even En 10 17–19 being less exuberant than the fancies of such early Christian writers as Papias. Individualism is generally taken for granted, but that the opposite opinion was by no means dormant even at a late period is shown by Mt 3:9. The idea of a special privilege of Israel, however, of course pervades all the literature, Sib Or 6 and Jub being the most exclusive books and the XII Tests, the most broad-hearted. In place of national privilege, though, is sometimes found the still less edifying feature of party privilege (Ps Sol; En 94:105); the most offensive case being the assertion of En 90:6-9 that the (inactive) Israel will be saved by the exertions of the "little lamb" Pharisees, before whom every knee shall bow in the Messianic kingdom.

(1) The conceptions of the moral demands for salvation at times reach a very high level, esp. in the XII Tests. (making every allowance for Christian interpolations). The spirit of love worketh together with the law of God in long-suffering unto the salvation of men" (Test. Gad 4:7) is hardly unworthy of St. Paul, and even Job can say, "Let each love his brother in mercy and justice, and let none wish the other evil" (36:8). But the great tendency is to view God's law merely as a series of written statutes, making no demands except those gained from a rigid construing of the letter. In Lk 10:29, "Who is my neighbor?" is a real question—"if he is not my neighbor I need not love him!" So duties not literally commanded were settled by utilitarian motives, as outside the domain of religion, and the unhealthy phenomenon of works of supererogation made its appearance (Lk 17:10). The writer of Wisd. can feel the real need of salvation, and he saw too that idolatry had been abstained from (15:4; contrast St. Paul's polemic in Rom. 2). And discussions about "greatest commandments" caused character in its relation to religion to be forgotten. (2) As God's commands were viewed as statutes the distinction between the moral and the ritual was lost, and the ritual law attained enormous and familiar proportions. The beautiful story of Judith is designed chiefly to teach abstinence from ritual uncleanness (Lk 17:10). And the most extreme case is in Job 9:33-38—all of Israel's woes come from keeping the feasts by the actual moon instead of by a correct (theoretical) moon (1). (3) Where self-complacency ceased and a strong moral sense was present, despair makes its appearance with extraordinary frequency. The period is the period of penitential prayers, with an undercurrent of doubt as to how far mercy can be expected (Three vs 3-22; Pr Man; Bar 3:1-8, etc.). "What profit is it unto us, if there be promised us an immortal time, whereas we have done the works that Balak the son of Zippor hath commanded us?" (Ps. 119:11 RV). The vast majority of men are lost (9:16) and must be forgotten (6:55), and Ezra can trust for his own salvation only by a special revelation (77:77 RV). So, evidently, St. Paul's pre-Christian experience was very great. (4) The NT background is the extreme lack of prominence of the sacrifices. They are never given a theological interpretation (except in Philo, where they cease to be sacrifices). Indeed, in Sir 36:38 they are explicitly said to be devotions for the righteous only, apparently prized only as an inheritance from the past and "because of the commandment" (Sir 35:5; yet of 38:11). When the temple was destroyed and the sacrifices ceased, Judaism went on its way almost unaffected, showing that the sacrifices meant nothing essential to the people. And, even in earlier times the Essenes rejected sacrifices altogether, without losing thereby their recognition as Jews.

III. The Teaching of Christ.—The Baptist proclaimed authoritatively the near advent of the kingdom of God, prepared by a Messianic judgment that would bring fire for the wicked and the Holy Spirit for the righteous. Simple but incisive moral teaching and warning against trusting in national privileges, with baptism as an outward token of repentance, were to prepare men to face this judgment squarely. But we have no data to determine how much farther (if any) the Baptist conceived his teaching to lead.

It was in the full heat of this eschatological revival that the Baptist had fanned, that Christ began to teach, and He also began to 2. Kingdom with the eschatological phrase. The kingdom of God is a connotation of "judge-ment" and at hand," and in this context, "Repent ye" (Mk. 1:15) must mean "lost ye be judged." Hence, Our Lord's teaching about salvation had primarily a future content: positively, admission into the kingdom of God, and negatively, deliverance from the preceding judgment. So the kingdom of God is the "highest good" of Christ's teaching but, with His usual reserve, He has little to say about its externals. Man's nature is to be perfectly adapted to his spiritual environment (see RESURRECTION), and man is to be with Christ (Lk 22:30) and the patriarchs (Mt 8:11). But otherwise—and again as usual—the current descriptions are used without comment, even when they rest on rather materialistic imagery (Lk 9:60). Thus the kingdom of God is, however, its meaning is hardly certainly not exhausted by a mere reformulation of the present order of material things.

But the fate of man at judgment depends on what man is before judgment, so that the practical problem is salvation from the conditions that will bring judgment; i.e. present and Future and future salvation are inseparably connected, and any attempt to make rigid distinctions between the two results in logomachies. Occasional cases where Christ is said to be the kingdom of God as present, in the sense that citizens of the future kingdom are living already on this earth (Mt 11:11; Lk 17:21[?]: the meaning of the latter verse is very dubious). Such men are "saved" already (Lk 19:9; 7:50?), i.e. such men were delivered from the bad moral condition that was so extended that Satan could be said to hold sway over the world (Lk 10:18; 11:21).

That the individual wiles the name in this deliverance needs no proof. Still, the Divine privilege of the Jews was a reality and Christ's normal work was limited to them (Mt. 15:24). He admitted even that the position of the Jewish religious leaders rested on this recurrence (Mt 23:5). But the "good tidings" were so framed that their extension to all men would have been inevitable, even had there not been an explicit command of Christ in this regard. On the other hand, while the message involved in every case strict individual choice, yet the individual who accepted it entered into social relations with the others who had so chosen. So salvation involved admission to a community of service (Mt 9:35, etc.). And in the latter part of Christ's mission He withdrew from the bulk of His disciples to devote Himself to the training of an inner circle of Twelve, an act explicable only on the assumption that these were to be the leaders of the others after He was taken away. Such passages as Mt 15:18; 18:17 merely corroborate this.

Of the conditions for the individual, the primary (belief in God being taken for granted) was a correct moral ideal. Exclusion from salvation came from the Pharisaic casuistry Progress which had invented limits to righteous-ness (Lk 20:25, etc.) an undue regard to thought, or contempt for permitting angry thoughts if actual murder was avoided, and so on. In contrast is set the idea of character, of the single eye (Mt. 6:25), of the pure heart (6:8). Only so can the spiritual house he built on a rock foundation. But the mere ideal is not enough; persistent effort toward it and a certain amount of progress are demanded imperatively. Only those who have learned to forgive can ask for forgiveness (Mt 6 12; 18 35). They who desire mercy, love no sinner in the kingdom (25 31-46), for even idle words will be taken into account (12 36), and the most precious possession that interferes with moral progress is to be sacrificed ruthlessly (19 8-9, etc.). Men are known by their fruits (7 20); but if that doeth the will of the Father that shall enter into the kingdom (7 21), and the final ideal—which is likewise the goal—is becoming a son of the Father in moral likeness (5 45). That this progress is due to God's aid is so intimately a part of Christ's teaching on the entire dependence of the soul on God that it receives little explicit mention, but Christ refers even His own miracles to the Father's power (Lk 11 20).

Moral effort, through God's aid, is an indispensable condition for salvation. But complete success in the moral struggle is not at all a condition, in the sense that moral perfection is required. For Christ's disciples, to whom the kingdom is promised (Lk 17 21), who receive remission of sins (Mk 2 5), Zacchaeus who is said to have received salvation (Lk 19 9), were far from being models of sinlessness. The element in the character that Christ teaches as making up for the lack of moral perfection is being "a little child" (of Mk 10 15). Now the point here is not credulosity (for belief is not under discussion), nor is it meekness (for children are notoriously not meek). And it most certainly is not the pure passivity of the newly born infant, for it is gratuitous to assume that only such infants were meant even in Lk 18 15, while in Mt 18 2 (where the child comes in answer to a call) this interpretation is excluded. Now, in the wider teaching of Christ the meaning is made clear enough. Salvation is for the poor in spirit, for those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for the prodigal knowing his wretchedness. It is for the penitent publican, while the self-satisfied Pharisee is rejected. A sense of need and a desire that God will grant deliverance to the poor. A child does not argue that it has earned its father's benefits but looks to him in a feeling of dependence, with a readiness to do his bidding. So it is the soul that desires all of righteousness, strives toward it, knows the shortcoming, and trusts in its Father for the rest, that is the savable soul.

Christ speaks of the pardon of the publican (Lk 18 19 ff) and of the prodigal welcomed by the Father (Lk 15 20), both without Christ intermediate. And it is perhaps not of Christ necessary to assume that all of those finding the strait gate (Mt 7 14) were explicitly among Christ's disciples. But would Christ have admitted that anyone who had come to know Him and refused to obey Him would have been saved? To ask this question is to answer it in the negative (Mt 9 40 is irrelevant). Real knowledge of the Father is possible only through the understanding of the Son (Lk 10 21-22), and lack of knowledge of the Son (Lk 10 23) is the cause of the unbelief of the Jews (Lk 12 30-32), and lack of faith in the Son forfeits all blessings (Mk 6 56; 9 23). Faith in Him brings instant forgiveness of sins (Mk 2 5), and love directed to Him is an indisputable sign that forgiveness has been taken place (Lk 7 47). But Christ speaks of His "Son Messiah" (Mk 10 28) as Messiah "Messiah" is not to be emptied of its meaning, this made Him judge of the world (such verses as Mk 8 38 are hardly needed for direct evidence). And, since for Christ's consciousness an earthly judgship is unthinkable, a transcendental judgship is the sole alternative, corroborated by the use of the title Son of Man. But passage from simple humanity to the transcendent glory of the Son-of-Man Messiah involved a change hardly expressible except by death and resurrection. And the expectation of death was in Christ's mind from the beginning by Mk 8 18,19 (even without ver 20). That He could have viewed His death as void of significance for human salvation is simply inconceivable, and the ascription of Mk 10 45 to Pauline influence is in defiance of the facts. Nor is it credible that Christ conceived that in the interval between His death and His Parousia He would be out of relation to His own. To Him the unseen world was in the closest relation to the visible world, and His passage into glory would strengthen, not weaken, His power. So there is a complete justificatio of Mk 14 22-25: to Christ His death had a significance that could be paralleled only by the death of the Covenant victim in Ex 24 6-8, for by it an entirely new relation was established between God and man.

(1) Salvation from physical evil was a very real part, however subordinate, of Christ's teaching (Mk 1 34, etc.). (2) Ascetic practices as a necessary element in salvation can hardly claim Christ's authority. It is true that the paideia of the Law is not Christ's only disciples. Certainly not all of the hundred and twenty of Acts 1 15 (cf ver 21), nor of the five hundred of 1 Cor 15 6, were converted after the Passion. And they all certainly did not have learned to believe in Christ. So the demands made in the special case of the Twelve (still less in such an extremely special case as Mk 10 21) in no way represent Christ's normal practice, whatever readiness for self-sacrifice may have been asked of all. So the representations of Christ as ruthlessly exacting all from everyone are quite unwarranted by the facts. And it is well to remember that it is Mt 11 19 that contains the term of reproach that His adversaries gave Him.

IV. St. Paul.—Instead of laying primal stress on St. Paul's peculiar contributions to soteriology, it will be preferable to start from such Pauline passages as simply continue the explicit teaching of Christ. Particularly due to the chroniclers of the Gospel of St. Paul's emphasis of the spiritual element in the Messiah's deliverance from this judgment, need not be argued. And, accordingly, emphasis is thrown sometimes on the future deliverance and sometimes on the present conditions for the deliverance (contrast Rom 5 20 and 8 24), but the practical problem is the latter. More explicitly than in Christ's recorded teaching the nature and the blessings of the kingdom are described (see Kingdom of God), but the additional matter is without particular religious import. Certain privilege of the Jews appears (Rom 3 1-8; 9 11-13), but the practical content of the privilege seems to be eschatological only (11 26). Individual conversion is of course taken for granted, but the life after that becomes highly corporate (see Church).

(1) The moral ideal is distinctly that of character. St. Paul, indeed, is frequently obliged to give directions as to details, but the moral is not always in terms of the higher principle, e.g.

1. General
2. Moral
Tit 2 11-14). Only by good conduct can one please God (1 Thess 4 1), and the works of even Christians are sometimes tested by God's scrutiny (1 Cor 3 13; 4 5; 2 Cor 5 10) in a judgment not to be faced without the most earnest striving (1 Cor 10 12; Phil 2 12), not even by St. Paul himself (1 Cor 9 27; Phil 3 12-14). And the possibility of this, because of a lack of moral attainment must not be permitted to leave the mind (1 Cor 3 17; Gal 5 21; of Rom 8 12.13; 11 20; 1 Cor 10 12; Gal 6 7-9). Consequently, growth in actual righteousness is as vital in St. Paul's soteriology as it is in that teaching of Christ: Christians have "put off the old man with his doings" (Col 3 9).

That this growth is God's work is, however, a point where St. Paul has expanded Christ's quiet assumption rather elaborately. In particular, what Christ had made the source of His own supernatural power — the Holy Spirit — is specified as the source of the power of the Christian's ordinary life, as well as of the more special endowments (see 1 Cor 12, 13). In the Spirit the Christian has received the blessing promised to Abraham (Gal 3 14); by it the deeds of the body can be put to death and all virtues flow into the soul (Gal 5 16-20), if a man walks according to it (1 Cor 6 19.20; 1 Thess 4 3-7). In ch 7 St. Paul looks back with a shudder on his pre-Christian helplessness (it is naturally the extreme of exegetical perversity to argue that he dreaded not the sin itself but only God's penalty on sin). But the Spirit gives us the power to put to death the deeds of the body (8 13), to disregard the things of the flesh (8 5), and to fulfill the ordinance of the Law (8 4). Such moral power is the test of Christianity: as many as are led by the Spirit of God these are the sons of God (8 14).

This doctrine of the Spirit is simply that what Christ did on earth would be carried on with increased intensity after the Passion.

4. Mystical. That this work could be thought of out of relation to Christ, or that Christ Himself could have so thought of it (see above, III, 7) is incredible. So the exalted Christ appears as the source of moral and spiritual power (St. Paul speaks even more of Christ's resurrection being the power of the Holy Spirit (Rom 10 9) and the Holy Spirit being very closely combined in 2 Cor 3 17; Rom 8 9; Gal 4 6. Our old man has been crucified, so putting an end to the bondage of sin, and we can prevent sin from reigning in our mortal bodies, for we have been united to Christ's death to enable us to walk in newness of life (Rom 6 2-14). The resurrection is a source of power, and through Christ's strength all things can be done (Phil 4 13.20). Christ is the real center of the believer's personality (Gal 2 20; the man has become a new creature (2 Cor 5 17; cf Col 2 20; 3 3); we were joined to another that we might bring forth fruit to God (Rom 7 4). And by contact with the glory of the Lord we are transformed into the same image (2 Cor 3 18), the end being conformation to the image of the Son of God (Rom 8 29).)

(1) This growth in actual holiness, then, is fundamental with St. Paul: "If any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his" (Rom 8 9). And the acquisition of union with Christ is vitally connected with the remission of sins. In Rom 7 1-6 (cf Col 2 11.12), the mystical union with Christ makes His death ours (cf Col 3 8) and so provokes God's mercy (Rom 3 4; 8 15) in a way that has no relation to the dead. And by the life-giving power of this union the strength of sin is broken (Rom 6 6). (2) The condition in man that makes forgiveness possibleSt. Paul calls "faith" — for Christ to be "counted as justifying through faith" (1 Cor 3 13; 4 5; 2 Cor 5 10) in a judgment not to be faced without the most earnest striving (1 Cor 10 12; Phil 2 12), not even by St. Paul himself (1 Cor 9 27; Phil 3 12-14). And the possibility of this, because of a lack of moral attainment must not be permitted to leave the mind (1 Cor 3 17; Gal 5 21; of Rom 8 12.13; 11 20; 1 Cor 10 12; Gal 6 7-9). Consequently, growth in actual righteousness is as vital in St. Paul's soteriology as it is in that teaching of Christ: Christians have "put off the old man with his doings" (Col 3 9).

That this growth is God's work is, however, a point where St. Paul has expanded Christ's quiet assumption rather elaborately. In particular, what Christ had made the source of His own supernatural power — the Holy Spirit — is specified as the source of the power of the Christian's ordinary life, as well as of the more special endowments (see 1 Cor 12, 13). In ch 7 St. Paul looks back with a shudder on his pre-Christian helplessness (it is naturally the extreme of exegetical perversity to argue that he dreaded not the sin itself but only God's penalty on sin). But the Spirit gives us the power to put to death the deeds of the body (8 13), to disregard the things of the flesh (8 5), and to fulfill the ordinance of the Law (8 4). Such evils are real evils (1 Cor 11 30), but in God's hands they may become pure blessings (Rom 6 3; 2 Cor 12 7). (4) Salvation from sin after conversion is due to God's saving the man in terms of the acquired supernatural nature (Rom 8 14, etc). Yet certain sins may destroy the union with Christ altogether (1 Cor 3 17, etc), while others bring God's chastening judgment (1 Cor 11 30-23). Of course, there is no conflict with St. Paul himself (1 Cor 5 1-5; 1 Tim 1 20) or by the congregation (Gal 6 1; 2 Thess 3 10-15; 2 Cor 2 6).

V. Rest of NT. Summary.—(1) St. John had the task of presenting Christ to Gentiles, who were as unfamiliar with the technical meaning 1. St. John of such phrases as "kingdom of God" or "Son of Man" as is the world today, and to Gentiles who had instead a series of concepts unknown in the Old Testament. So a "translation of spiritual values" became necessary if the gospel were to make an immediate appeal, a translation accomplished so successfully that the Fourth Gospel has always been the most popular. The Synoptists, esp. the extremely literal St. Mark, imperatively demand a historical commentary, while St. John has successfully avoided this necessity. (2) The "kingdom of God," as a phrase (3 3.5; cf 18 36), is replaced by "eternal life." This life is given in the person of Christ (5 26; 6 47), but its full realization will be in the "mansion" of the Father's house (14 2), where the believer will be with Christ (17 24). A judgment of all men will precede the establishment of this glorified state, but the believer may face judgment with equanimity (5 24). So the believer is delivered from a state of things so bad as expressible as a world under Satan's rule (12 31; 14 30; 16 11), a world in darkness (3 19), in ignorance of God (17 25), and in sin (5 21), all expressive in the one word "death" (5 24). (3) The Jews had real privilege in the reception of Christ's message (1 11; 4 22, etc), but the extension of the good tidings to all men was inevitable (12 23,32, etc). Belief in Christ is a personal matter, but the believers enter a community of service (15 14), with the promise of the Father and Son as their ideal (17 21). (4) The nature of the moral ideal, reduced to the single word "love" (13 34; 16 12), is assumed as known and identified with "Christ's words" (5 24; 6 63, etc), and the necessity of progress toward it as sharply pointed as in the Synoptists. The sinner is the servant of sin (8 4), a total change of character is needed (3 6), and the blessing is only on him who does the commandments of Christ (17). This "doing" is the proof of love toward Christ (14 21); only by bearing fruit and more fruit can discipleship be maintained (16 1-6; of 14 21), and, indeed, by bearing fruit men actually become Christ's disciples (15 8, Gr). The knowledge of Christ and of God that is eternal life (17 2) comes only through moral effort (7 17). In St. John the contrasts are colored so vividly that it would almost appear as if perfection were demanded. But he does not present even the apostles as models of sanctity (21 13-16), and self-righteousness is condemned without compromise; the crowning sin is to say, "We see" (9 41). It is the Son who frees from sin (8 36), delivers from darkness (8 12; 12 46), and gives eternal life (11 25.26; cf 3 16; 5 24; 6 47). This emphasis on the Divine side of the process is probably the reason for the omission of the term "repent," "repentance," from the Gospel in favor of "faith" (6 29, esp.), but this "faith" involves in turn human effort, for, without "abiding," faith is useless (8 30.31). (6) An advance on the Synoptists is found in the number of times Christ speaks of His death (3 14.15; 10 11.15; 12 24.32; 17 19) and in the greater emphasis laid on it, but no more than in the Synoptists is there any explanation of how the Atonement became effective. A real advance consists in the prospect of Christ's work after His death, when, through the Paraclete (7 38.39; 14 16 ff), a hitherto unknown spiritual power would become available for the world. And spiritual power is due not only to a union of will with Christ, but also to an identification with Him (15 1-9). See above, III, 7, for the relation of these thoughts to the synoptic teaching.

(1) The emphasis of He is of course on the sacrificial work of Christ, but the Ep. makes practically no contribution to the theology of 2. Hebrews sacrifice. The argument is this: The OT sacrifices certainly had an efficacy; Christ's sacrifice fulfilled their types perfectly, therefore it had a perfect efficacy (9 13.14). This is a tremendously potent argument for He's own purpose, but it is of little help to the modern theologian. (2) More than in St. Paul is emphasized the human training of Christ for His high-priestly work. Since He laid hold of the seed of Abraham (2 16), He learned by experience all that man had to suffer (2 17; 4 15; 6 8, etc). In Heb the essence of the sacrifice lies not in the death but in what we call the ascension—the presentation of the blood in the heavenly tabernacle (9-11.14), see the comments). That the death was specifically of value (12 2) cannot be separated from the stage of training and had no especial significance in the sacrificial scheme. Christ's intercession for us in heaven receives more emphasis than in the rest of the biblical teaching.

The only other distinct contribution to NT soteriology is made in 1 Pet's evaluation of the vicarious suffering of the "Servant" of Isa 53.

3. St. Peter What Christ did through His sufferings we may do in some degree through our sufferings; as His pains helped not only living mankind, but even departed sinners, so we may face persecution more happily with the thought that our pains are benefiting other men (3 16-20). It is hardly possible that St. Peter thought of this comparison as conveying an exhaustive description of the Atonement (cf 1 10), but that the comparison should be made at all is significant.

(1) Salvation is both a present and a future matter for us. The full realization of that God promised in 1 Peter will not be ours until the end of human history (cf, indeed, there will be no opened infinite possibilities of eternal growth), but the enjoyment of these blessings depends on conditions fulfilled in us and by us. But a foretaste of the blessings of forgiveness of sins and growth in holiness is known on this earth. The pardon depends on the fact of God's mercy through the death of Christ—a fact for religious experience but probably incapable of expression as a complete philosophical dogma.
But strength comes from God through the glorified Christ (or through the Spirit), this vital union with God being fundamental. These lines are in large degree independent, and the selection of the proportions profitable to a given soul is the task of the pastor. (2) That human effort is an essential in salvation is not to be denied in the face of all the NT evidence, esp. St. Paul taken as a whole. And yet no one with the faintest conception of what religion means would think of coming before God to claim merit. Here the purely intellectual discussions of the subject and its psychological course in the soul run in different channels, and "anti-synergists" are required to be based on attempts to petrify psychological experience in terms of pure dogma. (3) Still more true is this of attempts to describe mathematically the steps in salvation—the ordo salutis of the older dogmatists—for this differs with different souls. In particular, NT data are lacking for the development of the individual born of Christian parents in a Christian country. (4) Further, the social side of salvation is an essentially Christian doctrine and cannot be detached from the corporate life of the Christian church. Salvation from temporal evils is equally, if secondarily, Christian. Nationalism in salvation is at present much in the background. But it is as true today as it was in ancient Israel that the sins of a nation tend to harm the souls of even those who have not participated actively in those sins.

LITERATURE.—The literature of salvation is virtually the literature of theology (see under separate arts., Atonement; Salvation; Sanctification; Purification of Christ; Johannine Theology; Pauline Theology, etc.), but a few recent works may be mentioned. Indispensable are the works of Stevens, The Christian Doctrine of Salvation and The Pauline Theology. Garvie's Romans in the "New Century" series should be used as a supplement to any other on Rom. The juridical theory of salvation is best defended in Eng. Denney's The Death of Christ. The ethical theory is best presented in the works of Du Bose, The Gospel and the Gospel. The Gospel according to St. Paul, and High-Friees, and Salvation (Sanday's Expos reviews of the two former, reprinted in The Life of Christ in Recent Research, should be read in any case).

SAMARIA, sa-mar'a, CITY OF (שָׂמָרָה, šôm-râ; שָם-רָה, Samârea, Szemâra, Semeron, and other forms):

(1) Shechem was the first capital of the Northern Kingdom (1 K 12 25). Jeroboam seems later to have removed the royal residence to Tirzah (14 17). After the brief reigns of Ehuk and Elah came that of Omri, who reigned 6 years in Tirzah, then he purchased the hill of Samaria and built a city there, which was thenceforth the metropolis of the kingdom of Israel (16 21). Here the hill and the city are said to have been named after Shechem, the original owner of the land. There is nothing intrinsically improbable in this. It may naturally be derived from šômor, and the name in the sense of "outlook" would fitly apply to a city in such a commanding position. The residence, it was also the burying-place, of the kings of Israel (1 K 15 28; 22 37; 2 K 10 35; 15 9 13; 14 16).

Toward the western edge of the Ephraimite uplands there is a broad fertile hollow called Wady esh-Sha'ir, "valley of barley." From the midst of it rises an oblong hill to a height of over 300 ft., with a level top. The sides are steep, esp. to the S. The greatest length is from E. to W. The surrounding mountains on three sides are much higher, and are well clad with olives and vineyards. To the W. the hills are lower, and from the crest a wide "upland" is obtained over the Plain of Sharon, with the yellow ribbon of sand that marks the coast line, and the white foam on the tumbling billows; while away beyond stretch the blue waters of the Mediterranean. On the eastern end of the hill, surrounded by olive and cactus, is the modern village of Sebotsiyeh, under which a low neck of land connects the hill with the eastern slopes. The position is one of great charm and beauty; and in days of ancient warfare it was one of remarkable strength. While it was overlooked from three sides, the battlements crowning the steep slopes were too far off to be reached by missiles from the only artillery known in those times—the sling and the catapult. For besiegers to attempt an assault at arms was only to court disaster. The methods adopted by her enemies show that they relied on famine to do their work for them (2 K 6 24 f., etc). Omri displayed excellent taste and good judgment in the choice he made.

The city wall can be traced in almost its entire length. Recent excavations conducted by American archaeologists have uncovered the foundations of Omri's palace, with remains of the work of Ahab and of Herod (probably here was Ahab's ivory palace), on the western end of the hill, while on the western slope the gigantic gateway, flanked by massive towers, has been exposed to view.

Under the influence of Jezebel, Samaria naturally became a center of idolatrous worship. Ahab "reared up an altar for Baal in the house of Baal, which he had built in Samaria. And Ahab made the Asherah" (1 K 16 32 f.). Jehoram his son put away the pillar of Baal (2 K 3 2), and within the temple Jehu made an end at once of the instruments of idolatry and of the priests (10 19 f.). There are many prophetic references to the enormities practised here, and to their inevitable consequences (Isa 8 1; 14 9; 10 9; 28 14 f.; 13 16; Jer 23 13; Ezk 23 4; Hos 7 1; 13 16; Am 3 12; Mic 1 6, etc).

Under pressure of Damascus Omri conceded to the Syrians the right to "make streets in Samaria" (1 K 20:34).

Ben-hadad II besieged the city but suffered ignominious defeat (20:21-24; Jos, Ant., XVIII, iv, 1). Persistent attempts by the Syrians to make the city the time of Jehoram were frustrated by Elijah (2 K 6:8 ff.; Jos, Ant., IX, iv, 3). At length, however, Ben-hadad again invested the city, and the besieged were reduced to dire straits, in which, urged by famine, a record of awful horror were enacted (2 K 6:24 ff.). A mysterious panic seized the Syrians. Their deserted camp was discovered by despairing lepers who carried the good news to the famished citizens of the plenty to be found there. Probably in the throng of the great western gateway occurred the crush in which the inordinate captain was trampled to death (ch 7; Jos, Ant., IX, iv, 5).

Here the 70 sons of Ahaz were slain by Jehu in the general destruction of the house of Ahaz (2 K 10:1 ff.). In Samaria, the Chronicle tells us, Ahaziah in vain hid from Jehu (2 Ch 22:9; cf. 2 K 9:27). Pekah brought hither much spoil from Jerus and many captives, whom, at the instance of the prophet Oded, he released (2 Ch 28:8 ff.). The siege of Samaria was begun by Shalmaneser in the 7th year of Hoshea, and the city was finally taken by Sargon II at the end of 3 years, 722 BC (2 K 17:5; 18:9; Jos, Ant., IX, iv, 1). This marked the downfall of the Northern Kingdom, the people henceforth by the Assyrians. That the work was not done in a thoroughgoing way is evident from the fact recorded in the inscriptions that two years later the country had to be subdue again. Colonists were brought from other parts to take the place of the deported (2 K 17:24; 2 Ch 36:26). And, great the took the city in 331 BC, killed many of the inhabitants, and settled others in Shechem, replacing them with a colony of Syro-Macedonians. He gave the adjoining country to the Jews (2 M 4:1, 4). The city suffered at the hands of Ptolemy Lagi and Demetrius Poliorcetes, but it was still a place of strength (Jos, Ant., XIII, x, 2) when John Hyrcanus came against it in 120 BC. It was taken after a year's siege, and the victor tried to destroy the city utterly. His turning of the water into trenches to undermine the foundations could only refer to the suburbs under the hill. From the only two sources, 'Ain Haruna and 'Ain Kef Rima, to the E. of the town, the water could not rise to the level of the mound. New Testament which Ben- jamin of Tudela says he saw on the top, from which water enough could be got to fill the trenches, are certainly not to be seen today, and they have left no trace behind them. The city was rebuilt by Pompey and, having again fallen under misfortune, was restored by Gabinius (Jos, Ant., XIV, iv, 4; v, 3; BJ, I, vii, 7; viii, 4). To Herod it owed the chief splendor of its later days. He extended, strengthened and adorned it on a scale of great magnitude, calling it Second (Caesarea Augusta) in honor of the emperor, a name which survives in the modern Sebasteiyeh. A temple also was dedicated to Caesar. Its site is probably marked by the impressive flight of steps, with the pedestal on which stood the gigantic statue of Augustus, which recent excavations in the site, somewhat mutilated, is also to be seen. Another of Herod's temples W. of the present village was cleared out by the same explorers. The remains of the great drummed street, which ran round the upper terrace of the hill, bear further testimony to the splendor of this great builder's work (Jos, Ant., XV, vii, 3; viii, 5; BJ, I, xx, 2). It was here that Herod killed perhaps the only human being whom he ever really loved, his wife Mariamme. Here also his sons perished by his hand (Jos, Ant., XV, vii, 5-7; XVI, iii, 1-5; xi, 7).

It is commonly thought that this city was the scene of Philip's preaching and the events that followed recorded in Acts 8, but the absence of the church, its doubtless here, was settled by Septimius Severus. From that time little is known of the history of the city; nor do we know to what the final catastrophe was due. It became the seat of a bishopric and was represented in the councils of Nicaea, Constantinople and Sardica. Its bishop attended the Synod of Jerus in 356 AD.

The Church of St. John, a Crusading structure beside the modern village, is now a Moslem mosque. It is the traditional burying-place of John the Baptist's body.

(2) Σαμαρία, η Σαμάρεια: A town mentioned in 1 Mac 5:66 as on the road followed by Judas from the district of Hebron to the land of the Philis. The name is probably a clerical error. The margin reads Marisa, and probably the place intended is Marisah, the site of which is at Tilh Sandathannah, about a mile S. of Beit Jibrin.

SAMARIA, COUNTRY OF (Σαμαρίτες), εδαφός Σαμαρείτικος: The name of the city was transferred to the country of which it was the capital, so that Samaria became synonymous with the Northern Kingdom (1 K 13:32; Jer 31:5, etc). The extent of territory covered by this appellation varied greatly at different times. At first it included the land held by Israel E. of the Jordan, Galilee and Mt. Ephraim, with the northern part of Benjamin. It was shorn of the eastern portion by the conquest of Tiglath-pilesar (1 Ch 5:26). Judah probably took some part in the territory of Dan in the S. In NT times Samaria had shrunk to still smaller dimensions. The region was the seat of the Kingdom after the capture of Samaria and the destruction of the kingdom. The boundaries are given in general terms by Jos (BJ, III, iii, 1, 4, 5). The southern edge of the Plain of Esdraelon and the lands of Scythopolis, the city of the Decapolis W. of the Jordan, formed the northern boundary. It reached S. as far as the toparchy of Acrabatta (modern 'Akaba), while on the border between Samaria and Judæa lay the villages of Annath and Borecos, the modern Khirbet 'Aina and Berkät, about 15 miles S. of Nablus. The Jordan of course formed the western boundary. On the W. the coast plain as far as Acra belonged to Judah, and the country thus indicated was much more open to approach than the high plateau of Judah with its steep rocky edges and difficult passes. The road from the N. indeed was comparatively easy of defence, following pretty closely the line of the watershed. But the gradual descent of the land to the W. with long, wide valleys, offered inviting avenues from the plain. The great trade routes, that to the forts of Jordan and the E., passing through the cities in the mountains of Shechem, and those connecting Egypt with the N. and the N.E., traversed Samarian territory, and brought her into constant intercourse with surrounding peoples. The influence of the heathen religions to which she was thus exposed made a swift impression upon her, leading to the corruptions of faith and life that heralded her doom (Jer 23:13; Hos 7:1 ff., etc). The Assyrians came as the scourge of God (2 K 17:5-26). Their attack centered on the capital. Shalmaneser began the siege, and after three years the city fell to Sargon II, his successor. With the fall of Samaria the kingdom came to an end. Following the usual Assyrian policy, great numbers of the inhabitants were deported from the conquered country, and their places taken by men brought from "Babylon", and from Cuthah, and from Avva, and from Hamath and Sepharvaim, cities which had already bowed to the Assyrian power (ver 24).

It appears from the Assyrian inscriptions that the number carried away was 27,290 (2 K 17:25). The number afterward deported from Judah was 200,000, and then the poorest of the land were left to be vine-dressers and husbandmen (2 K 25:12). It is evident that a similar policy must have been followed in northern Israel, as 283,000 could certainly not include the whole population of the cities and the country. But it would include the higher classes, and esp. the priests from whom the victors would have most to fear. The population therefore after the conquest contained a large proportion of Israelites. It was no doubt among these that Judah exercised his reforming energy (2 K 23:19 f; 2 Ch 34:6 f). Here also must have been that "remnant of Israel," Manasseh and Ephraim, who contributed for the repair of the house of God (ver 9). These people, left without their religious guides, mingling with the heathen who had brought their gods and, presumably, their priests with them, were apt to be turned from the purity of their faith. A further importation of pagan settlers took place under Assur-bani-pal. It was in the second year of Jehoiakim, 605 B.C. The latter is to be identified with Assur-bani-pal. What the proportions of the different elements in the population were, there is now no means of knowing. That there was some intermarriage is probable; but to racial exclusiveness, we cannot suppose that it was not common. When the Jews deny to them any relation to Israel, and call them Cuthaean, as if they were the descendants purely of the heathen settlers, the facts just mentioned should be borne in mind.

After the Assyrian conquest we are told that the people suffered from lions (2 K 17:25). Jos (Ant, IX, xiv, 3) says "a plague seized upon them." In accordance with the ideas of the time, the strangers thought this due to the anger of the tutelary deity of the land, because they worshipped other gods in his territory, while neglecting him. Ignorant of his special ritual ("manner"), they petitioned the Assyrian king, who sent one (Jos says "some") of the priests who had been carried away to teach them "how they should fear the Lord." How much is implied in this "fearing of the Lord" is not clear. They continued at the same time to serve their own gods. There is nothing to show that the Israelites among them fell into their idolatries. The interest of the people of a state of strain, in case of war, to which they may now have shared with the Jews, is proved by 2 Ch 34:9. In another place we are told that four score men "from Shechem, from Shiloh, and from Samaria," evidently Israelites, were going up with their offerings to the house of the Lord (Jer 41:5). Once the people of the country are called Samarians (2 K 17:29). Elsewhere this name has a purely religious significance. See Samarians.

Of the history of Samaria under Assyry and Babylonian rulers we know nothing. It reappears at the return of the Jews from Persia under the Jews. The Jews refused the proffered assistance of the Samarians in rebuilding the temple and the walls of Jerusalem (Ezr 4:1, 3). Highly offended, the latter sought to frustrate the purpose carried away (vs 4 ff; Neh 4:7 ff; 1 Esd 2:16 ff). That the Samarians were accustomed to worship in Jerusalem is perhaps implied by one phrase in the letter sent to the Persian king: "The Jews that came up from thee are come to us unto the temple, and upon the wall" (Ezr 4:4). They may have done this, as referred to in 6:21. Idolatry is not alleged against the "adversaries." We can hardly err if we ascribe the refusal in some degree to the old antagonism between the N. and the S., between Ephraim and Judah. Whatever the cause, it led to a wider estrangement and a deeper bitterness. For the history of the people and their temple on Gerizim, see Samarians.

Samaria, with Pal, fell to Alexander after the battle of Issus. The number of population was 9,300 (Ezr 4:1). The noble Ephiphanes, as the dowry of his daughter Cleopatra (Jos, Ant, XXII, iv, 1), John Hyrcanus reduced and desolated the country (Jos, BJ, I, ii, 6). After varying fortunes Samaria became part of the kingdom of Herod, at whose death it was given to Archelaus. Archelaus was excommunicated by the Jews (Ant, XXII, vi, 3). When Archelaus was banished it was joined to the Roman province of Syria (Jos, Ant, XVIII, xiii, 5; BJ, II, vii, 1).

Samaria is a country beautifully diversified with mountain and level valley and plain. The olive grows plentifully, and other fruit trees abound. There is much excellent soil, and fine crops of barley and wheat are reaped annually. The vine also is largely cultivated on the hill slopes. Remains of ancient forests are found in parts. As Jos said, it is not naturally watered by many rivers, but derives its chief moisture from rain water, of which there is no lack (BJ, III, iii, 4). He speaks also of the excellent grass, by reason of which the cows yield more milk than those in any other place. There is a good road connecting Samaria with Jaffa; and by a road not quite so good, it is now possible to drive a carriage from Jerus to Nazareth, passing through Samaria. W. EWING

SAMARITANS, sa-mar'i-tan, PENDATEUCH, THE. See Pentateuch, The Samaritan.

SAMARITANS, sa-mar'i-tan (σαμαριταί), shōmərətān; Ἴδαμαται, Samaritai, V. Ἱδαματίς [sing.], Samaritae); The name "Samaritans" in 2 K 17:29 clearly applies to the Israelitish inhabitants of the Northern Kingdom. In subsequent history it denotes a people of mixed origin, composed of the peoples brought by the conqueror from Babylon and elsewhere to take the places of the expropriated Israelites and those who were left in the land (722 BC). Sargon claims to have carried away only 27,290 of the inhabitants (KIB, II, 55). Doubtless these were, as in the case of Judah, the chief men, men of wealth and influence, without the priests, the humbler classes being left to till the land, tend the vineyards, etc. Hezekiah, who came to the throne of Judah probably in 715 BC, could still appeal to the tribes of Ephraim, Issachar, Asher, and Zebulun (2 Ch 30:10 ff; 18 f); and the presence of these tribesmen is implied in the narrative of Josiah's reformation (34:6 f). Although the number of the colonists was increased by Esar-haddon and Assurban-pal (Ezr 4:29 f), the population was not so large as to be feared (2 K 17:24 f). In the intermixture that followed "their own gods" seem to have fallen on evil days; and when the Samaritans asked permission to share in building the temple under Zerubbabel, they claimed, apparently with a good conscience, to serve God and to sacrifice to Him as the Jews did (Ezr 4:1 f). Whatever justification there was for this claim, their pious friendship was turned to deadly hostility by the blunt refusal of their request, and the enmity between north and south no doubt intensified the quarrel, and the antagonism of Jew and Samaritan, in its bitterness, was destined to pass into a proverb. The Samaritans set themselves, with great temporary success, to frustrate the work in which they were not permitted to share (Ezr 4:4 f, 7 f, etc).
SAMGAR-NEBO, sam-šar-ne-bō (סָ֫מָ֫אֶר נֶבּוּ, samgar nebô, a Bab name): An officer of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, who according to the LXX of Jer 39 3, took his seat with other nobles in the middle gate of Jerusalem after the Chaldaean army had taken the city. Schrader (COT, ii, 109) holds that the name is a Hebraized form of the Assyri Samgarunu ("be gracious, Nebo"), but Giesbrecht (Com., 211) conjectures for Samgar a corruption of Sar-mag (sar-mag), equivalent to Rab-mag (rab-mag), which implies virtual ditography. The number of variant readings exhibited by the LXX seems to confirm the belief that the text is corrupt. Nebo (nabo) is there joined with the following Sarsechim to agree with Nebushazban of ver 13. If the name Samgar-nebo is correct, the first Nergal-sharezer should perhaps be dropped; we would then read: "Samgar-nebo the Sarsechim, Nebushazban the Sar-sennis [of ver 18] and Nergal-sharezer the Rab-mag" (Sayce). See Rab-mag, Rab-saris.

SAMLAH, sā'm-lāh, sāmelāh: Σαλαμά, Salamá: One of the kings of Edom, of the city of Masrehah. He reigned before the Israelites had kings (Gen 36 30-37; 1 Ch 1 47-48). The fact that the city is mentioned in connection with the name of the king suggests that Edom was a confederacy at this time and the chief city was the metropolis of the whole country.

SAMMUS, sā'm-us (A. Samma, Sammos, B. Sama, Sammos): One of those who stood on Ezra's right hand as he expounded the Law (1 Ed 9 43) = "Shema" in Neh 8 4.

SAMOS, sā'mōs (Σάμος, Sámos, "height," "mountain" [see Strabo 548, 457]): One of the most famous of the Ionian islands, third in size of the group which includes Lesbos, Ciusos (q.v.) and Cos (q.v.). It is situated at the mouth of the bay of Ephesus, between the cities of Ephesus and Miletus (q.v.), and separated from the mainland of Ionia by the narrow strait where the Greeks once conquered the Pers fleet in the battle of Macele, 479 BC (Herod. ix.100 ff). The surface of the island is very rugged and mountainous, Mt. Kerkí (modern name) rising to a height of 4,700 ft., and it was due to this that the island received its name (see above; see also Samothrace).

Samos was renowned in antiquity as one of the noted centers of Ionian luxury, and reached its zenith of prosperity under the rule of the famous tyrant Polycrates (533-522 BC), who made himself master of the Aegean Sea. He carried on trade with Egypt, and his intercourse with that country, his friendship with Amasis, the famous "ring" story and the revolting manner of the death of Polycrates are all told in one of the most interesting stories of Herodotus (Herod. iii.39 ff).

In 84 BC, the island was joined to the province of Asia, and in 17 BC it became a civitas libera, through the favor of Augustus (Dio Cass. liv.9; Pliny, NH, vii.37). Both Marcus Agrippa and Herod visited the island; and according to Jos (Ant, XVI, ii, 2; BJ, I, xxi, 11) "bestowed a great many benefits" on it. In the Ape, Samos is mentioned among the places to which Lucius, consul of the Romans, wrote, asking their good will toward the Jews (1 Macc 15 25).
SAMOTHRACLE, sam-oth-rah-kle (Σαμοθράκη, Samothrakia, sam-oth-rah-kia), "the Thracian Samos"; AV Samothracia, sam-oth-rah-kia; the island was formerly Dardania; for change of name see Pausanias vii.4.3; Strabo x.457, and for a full discussion, Conze, Hauser and Benndorf, Neuntzusungen auf S., (1880); an island in the Aegean Sea, S. of Thrace opposite the mouth of the Hebrus River, and N.W. of Troas. The island is mountainous, as is the name indicates (see Samos), and towers above Imbros when viewed from the Trojan coast. The summit is about a mile high. It is mentioned in the Iliad (xiii.12), as the seat of Poseidon and referred to by Virgil Aeneid vii.208.

The island was always famous for sanctity, and the seat of a cult of the Caberi, which Herodotus (I.51) says was derived from the Pelasgian inhabitants (see also Aristophanes, Pax 277). The mysteries connected with the worship of these gods later rivaled the famous mysteries of Eleusis, and both Philip of Macedon and Olympias his wife were initiated there (Plut. Alex. 3).

Probably because of its sacred character the island did not figure to any extent in history, but in the expedition of Xerxes in 480 BC, one ship at least of the Samothracian contingent is mentioned as conspicuous in the battle of Salamis. The "mystery of Samothrace" (now in the Louvre) was set up here by Demetrios Poliorcetes c. 300 BC, and was discovered in 1883. Since that time (1873–75), the Austrian government carried on extensive excavations (see Conze, Hauser and Benndorf, op. cit.).

In the NT the island is mentioned in Acts 16 11. From Troas, Paul made a straight run to Samothrace, and the next day sailed to Neapolis (q.v.) on the Thracian coast, the port of Philippi (q.v.). At the northern end of S., was a town where the ship could anchor for the night, and on the return journey (Acts 20 6) a landing may have been made, but no details are given. Pliny characterizes the island as being most difficult for anchorage, but because of the hazards of sailing by night, the navigators always anchored somewhere if possible.

LITERATURE.—See under SAMOS.

SAMPSON, sam-sun (σαμσόν, Sampson): A place mentioned in 1 Mace 15 23, usually identified with Samsun, on the coast of the Black Sea. Vulg. with RVm, has "Lampsacus."
smeote the Philis in revenge, "hip and thigh" (15 1-8).

(2) When he escaped to Etam, an almost vertical rock cliff in Judah (by some identified with 'Aray Isra'el, a town of Judah), the Philis invaded Judah, encamped at Lehi above Etam, and demanded the surrender of their arch-enemy. The men of Judah were willing to hand S. over to the Philis, and accordingly went down to the cliff Etam, bound S. and brought him up where the Philis were encamped (15 9-13). When S. came to Lehi the Philis shouted as they met him, whereupon the spirit of Jeh came mightily upon him, so that he broke loose from the two new ropes with which the 3,000 men of Judah had bound him, and seizing a fresh jawbone of an ass he smote with it 1,000 men of the Philis, boasting as he did so in pun-lyke poetry, 'With the jawbone of an ass, m-ss upon m-ass'; or, as Dr. Moore translates the passage, 'With the bone of an ass, I ass-aile my ass-salute' (15 16). At the same time, S. reverently gave Jeh the glory of his victory (15 18). S. being thirsty, Jeh provided water for him at a place called En-hakkore, or 'Partridge Spring,' or "the Spring of the Caller"—another name for partridge (15 17-19).

(3) S. next went down to Gaza, to the very stronghold of the Philis, their chief city. There he saw a harlot, and, his passions not being under control, he went in unto her. It was soon noisy about that S., the Heb giant, was in the city. Accordingly, the Philis laid wait for him. But S. arose at midnight and laid hold of the doors of the gate and their two posts, and carried them a full quarter of a mile up to the top of the mountain that looketh toward Hebron (16 1-3). S. betook himself to the valley of Sorek where he fell in love with another Phili woman, named Delilah, through whose machinations he lost his spiritual power. The Phili lords bribed her with a very large sum to deliver him into their hands. Three times S. deceived her as to the secret of his strength, but at last he explains that he is a Nazirite, and that his hair, which has never been shorn, is the secret of his wonderfull power. J. G. Frazer ('Golden Bough, III, 390 f') has shown that the belief that some mysterious power resides in the hair is still widespread among savage peoples, e.g. the Fiji Islanders. Thus S. fell. By disclosing to Delilah this secret, he broke his covenant vow, and the Spirit of God departed from him (16 4). S. then held his head with his hands, but on his eyes, brought him down to Gaza, bound him with fetters, and forced him to grind in the prison house. Grinding was women's work! It is at this point that Milton catches the picture and writes, "Eyless in Gaza, at the mill with slaves." Howbeit, the hair of his head began to grow again; but his eyes did not (16 21,22).

(5) The final incident recorded of S. is in connection with a great sacrificial feast which the Phili lords gave in honor of Dagon, their god. In their joyous celebration they sang in rustic rhythm:

"Our god has given us into our hand Thine foe of our hand, Whom even our most powerful hand Was never able to withstand" (16 24).

This song was accompanied probably, as Mr. Macalister suggests, by hand-clapping ('Gezer, 120). When they heard it still more men came to call for S. to play the bufoon, and by his gaiety to entertain the assembled multitude. The house of Dagon was full of people; about 3,000 were upon the roof beholding as S. made sport. With the new gaiety of his new strength S. returned to him. The dismantled giant longed to be engaged on adversaries for at least one of his two eyes (16 28).

He prayed, and Jeh heard his prayer. Guided by his attendant, he took hold of the wooden posts of the two middle pillars upon which the portico of the house rested, and slipping them off their pedestals, the house fell down, the two pillars, and the house that were therein. "So the dead that he slew at his death were more than they that he slew in his life" (16 29,30). His kinsmen came and carried him up and buried him near his boyhood home, between Zorah and Eshtaol, "in the cave that his father had dug beneath the eave of his father. "And he judged Israel twenty years" (16 31).

The story of Samson is a faithful mirror of his times; "Every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (15 13). In those days, i.e. no central government. Each tribe was separately occupied driving out their individual enemies. For 40 years the Philis had oppressed S.'s tribal compatriots. Their superiority was also recognized by Judah (14 4; 15 11). S. was the hero of the tribe. The general historical account of his story cannot be impeached on the mere ground of improbability. His deeds were those which would most naturally be expected from a giant, filled with the energies of his race. His popularity which a man of extraordinary prowess would naturally be expected. All peoples sing of heroes. The theory that the record in Jgs 15-16 is based upon some "solar myth" is now generally abandoned. That there are incidents in his life too difficult to explain, is freely granted. For example, that he killed a lion with a single stone (14 6) is not without some support; and Beniah did the same (1 17 34,36; 2 2 23 20). God always inspires a man in the line of his natural endowments. For example, God miraculously enabled S. to put down the two Philis (1 19) no more marvelous than what God did for Elisha in the wilderness (2 K. 2). S. carried off the doors of the gate of Gaza and their two posts, far and all, must not confound us till we know more definitely their size and the distance from which he could throw the hill to which he carried them. The fact that he pulled down the roof on which there were 3,000 men and women is not at all impossible, as Mr. Macalister has shown. If we suppose that there was an immense portico to the temple of Dagon, as is outlome, it could be supported by two main pillars of wood resting on bases of stone, like the circular pillars of Solomon's temple (1 K. 7,2), all that S., therefore, necessarily did, was to push the wooden beams so that their feet would slide over the stone base on which they rested, and the whole portico would collapse. Moreover, it is not said that the whole of the 3,000 on the roof were destroyed (16 30). Many of those in the temple proper probably perished in the number (R. A. S. Macalister, 'Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer, 1906, 127-33).

Not a few important and suggestive lessons are deductible from the hero's life: (1) S. was the object of parental solicitude from even before 5. Religious his birth. One of the most suggestive Value and beautiful prayers in the OT is that child of the mind of his yet unborn child (13 8). Whatever our estimate of his personality is, S. was closely linked to the covenant. (2) He was endowed with the spirit of Jeh—the spirit of personal patriotism, the spirit of vengeance upon a foe of 40 years' standing (13 1,25; 14 6 19; 15 14). (3) He also prayed, and Jeh answered him, though in judgment (16 30). But he was prodigal of his strength. S. had spiritual power and performed feats which an ordinary man would hardly perform. But he was unconscious of his high vocation. In a moment of weakness he yielded to Delilah and divulged the secret of his strength. He was careless of his personal endowment. He did not realize that physical endowments may be used for spiritual purposes, and that to retain them we must be obedient. (4) He was passionate and therefore weak. The animal of his nature was never curbed, but rather ran unchained and free. He was given to sudden fury. S. was a wild man of Passion ruled. He could not resist the blandishments of women. In short, he was an overgrown schoolboy, without self-mastery. (5) He accordingly wrought no permanent deliverance for Israel; he lacked the spirit of cooperation. He undertook a task far too great for even a giant single-handed. Yet, it must be allowed that S. paved the way for Saul and David. He began the deliverance of Israel from the Philis. He must, therefore, be judged according to his times. In his days there was unrestrained individual independence on every side, each one doing as he pleased. The circumstances differed from his contemporaries in that he was a hero of faith (He 11:32). He was a Nazirite, and therefore dedicated to God. He was given to revenge, yet he was ready to sacrifice himself in order that his own and his people's enemies might be overthrown. He was willing to lay down his life for the sake of his fellow tribesmen—not to save his enemies, however, but to kill them. (Cf Mt 5:43f; Rom 5:10.)

SAMUEL, sam'ā-ēl (שָׂמַע, Sh'ma,' El), Sam'ud (שָׂמוּד, Sh'mud, Samud'); The word "Samuel" signifies "name of God," or "his name is El" (God). Other derivations of the name that have been offered are almost certainly mistaken. The play upon the name in 1 § 20 is not intended of course to be an explanation of its meaning, but is similar to the play upon Saul in Ex 6:19 and frequently elsewhere in similar instances. Thus by the addition of a few letters sh'maēl becomes shā'al maēl (שָׁאָל, māel), "asked of God," and recalls to the mother of Samuel the circumstances of the Divine gift to her of a son. Outside of the 1st Book of 8 the name of the great judge and prophet is found in I 11:21; Ps 99:6 a prophecy in I and frequently elsewhere in similar instances. The reference in Jer seems intended to convey the same impression that is given by the narrative of 1 S, that in some sense Samuel had come to be regarded as a second Moses, upon whom the mantle of the latter had fallen, and who had been once again the deliverer and guide of the people at a great national crisis.

The narrative of the events of the life of Samuel appears to be derived from more than one source (see Samuel, Books). The narrative is characterized by the combined into a single consecutive History. The completed picture of the prophet's position and character which is thus presented is on the whole harmonious and consistent, and gives a very high impression of his piety and loyalty to Jeh, and of the wide influence for good which he exerted. There are divergences apparent in detail and standpoint between the sources or traditions, some of which probably be due merely to misunderstanding of the true nature of the events recorded, or to the failure of the modern reader rightly to appreciate the exact circumstances and time. The greater part of the narrative of the life of Samuel, however, appears to have come from a single source.

In the portion of the general history of Israel contained in 1 S are narrated the circumstances of the future prophet's birth (ch 1); of his childhood and of the custom of his parents to present him to the sanctuary at Shiloh (2 11:18—21:26); of his vision, and the universal recognition of him as a prophet enjoying the special favor of Jeh (3—4 1). The narrative is then interrupted to describe the conflicts with the Philis, the fate of Eli and his sons, and the capture of the ark of God. It is only after the return of the ark, and apparently at the close of the 20 years during which it was retained at Kirjath-jearim, that Samuel again comes forward publicly, exhorting the people to repentance and promising them deliverance from the hand of their enemies. The narrative is then given of the summoning of a national council at Mizpah, at which Samuel "judged the children of Israel," and offered sacrifice to the Lord, and of Jeh's response in a great thunderstorm, which led to the defeat and panic-stricken flight of the Philis. Then follows the narrative of the erection of a commemorative stone or pillar, Eben-ezer, "the stone of help," and the recovery of the Israelite cities which the Philis had captured (7 5—14). The narrator adds that the Philis came no more within the border of Israel all the days of Samuel (7 13); perhaps with an intentional reference to the troubles and disasters of which this people was the cause in the time of Saul. A brief general statement is appended of Samuel's practice as a judge of going on annual circuit through the land, and of his home at Ramah (7 15—17).

No indication is given of the length of time occupied by these events. At their close, however, Samuel was an old man, and his sons who had been appointed judges in his place by the office proved unworthy (8 1—3). The elders of the people therefore came to Samuel demanding the appointment of a king who should be his successor, and should judge in his stead. The request was regarded by Samuel as the act of disloyalty to Jeh, but his protest was overruled by Divine direction, and at Samuel's bidding the people dispersed (8 4—22).

At this point the course of the narrative is again interrupted to describe the family and origin of Saul, his personal peculiar origin of the search for the lost asses of his father (9 1—5); his meeting with Samuel in a city in the land of Zuph, in or on the border of the territory of Benjamin (Zuph is the name of an ancestor of Elkanah, the father of Samuel, in 1 S 1), a meeting of which Samuel had received Divine pre-intimation (9 15f); the honorable place given to Saul at the feast; his anointing by Samuel as ruler of Israel, together with the announcement of three 'signs' which should be given in the case of the king, whereby is explained a proverbial saying which classed Saul among the prophets; and his silence which referred to what had passed between himself and Samuel on the subject of the kingdom (9 6—10 16).

It is usually, and probably rightly, believed that the narrative of these last incidents is derived from a different source from that of the preceding chapters. Slight differences of inconsistancy or disagreement lie on the surface. Samuel's home is not at Ramah, but a nameless city in the land of Zuph, where he is priest of the high place, with a local but, as far as the narrative goes, not a national influence or reputation; and it is anticipated that, while he will require the customary present at the hands of his visitors (9 6—8). He is described, moreover, not as a judge, nor does he discharge judicial functions, but expressly as a "seer," a name said to be an earlier title equivalent to that of a prophet in the later "prophets" sense; but, however, from the apparently different position which Samuel occupies, the tone and spirit of the narrative is altogether distinct from that of the preceding chapters. It suggests, both in its form and in the religious conceptions which are assumed or implied, an older and less elaborated tradition than that which has found expression in the greater part of the book; and it seems to represent events as it were from a more primitive standpoint than the highly religious and monothestic view of the later accounts. In this it differs from the previous unimpaired, but perhaps rather enhanced by its separate and independent position.

The narrative of the life of Samuel is contained as a whole in his completed narrative at the point at which he judged most suitable. To the same source and possibly to the same event attributed the announcement of Saul's rejection in 13 8—15.

The course of the narrative is resumed at 10 17 ff, where, in a second national assembly at Mizpah, Saul is selected by lot and accepted by the people as king (10:17-24); after which the people dispersed, and Saul returned to his home at Gibeah (vs. 25-27). At a solemn assembly at Gilgal, at which the king was again formally conferred upon Saul, Samuel delivered a farewell address to his fellow-countrymen. A thunderstorm terrified the people; they were reassured, however, by Samuel with promises of the protection and favor of Jeh, it being continued to clear and serve Him (11:12-15). A song of rejoicing on the occasion of the anointing of Samuel was composed, or sung, by Samuel (13:8-15). The commission to destroy Amalek is delivered to Saul by Samuel; and the rejection of the king is again pronounced because of his failure to carry out the command. Agag is then slain by Samuel with his own hand; and, the latter having returned to his home at Ramah, the narrator adds that he remained there in seclusion until the day of his death, "mourning" for Saul, but refusing to meet him again (ch. 31). Finally the death and burial of Samuel at Ramah, together with the lamentation of the people for him, are briefly recorded in 25:1, and referred to again in 28:3. Thus Samuel's life remain, in which he is brought into relation with the future king David.

No indication of date or circumstance is given except that the first incident apparently follows immediately upon the second and final rejection of Saul. In 16:1-13 is narrated the commission of Samuel to anoint a successor to Saul, and his fulfilment of the commission by the choice of David the son of Jesse, the Bethlehemite. And, in a later chapter (19:18-24), a second commission, namely on which the compelling spirit and prophecy came upon Saul, and again the proverbial saying, "Is Saul also among the prophets?" is quoted (19:2; of 10:11,12), and is apparently regarded as taking its origin from this event.

The anointing of David by Samuel is a natural sequel to his anointing of Saul. Saul, when the latter has been rejected and his authority and rights as king have ceased. There is nothing to determine absolutely whether the narrative is derived from the same source as the greater part of the preceding history. Slight differences of style and tradition appear to distinguish the composition of the latter from the former. The latter have among the most scholars to the conclusion that it has a distinct and separate existence. But the compiler of the Books of Samuel drew upon a third source for his narrative of the life of the seer, a source which there is no reason to regard as of later composition and independent. With the second incident related in 19:18-24, the case is different. In 19:18-20, Samuel was the direct author of the words he spake and penned into the book; in 19:21-24, the narrative is taken from the Book of Samuel, and there is not the slightest indication that Samuel's words were intended to be written down and committed to writing. Saul's death is the connecting link between the last two incidents. In the final composition of the book both accounts were then inserted, without notice being taken of the inconsistency which was apparent between them.

Yet later in the history Samuel is represented as appearing to Saul in a vision at Eeonor on the eve of his death (28:11-20). The witch also sees the prophet and is stricken with fear. He is described as in appearance an old man "covered with a robe" (ver. 14). In characteristic grave and measured tones he relates the death of Saul at Gilgal, the king for his disobedience to Jeh, and announces its execution on the morrow; Saul's sons also will die with him (ver. 19), and the whole nation will be involved in the penalty and suffering, as they all had been in sin. The high place which Samuel occupies in the thought of the writers and in the tradition and esteem of the people is manifest throughout the history. The different sources from which the narrative is derived are at one in this, although perhaps not to an equal degree. He is the last and greatest of the judges, the first of the prophets, and inaugurates under Divine direction the Israelite kingdom and the Davidic line. It is not without reason, therefore, that he has been regarded as in dignity and importance the occupying position of Samuel a second Moses in relation to the people. In his exhortations and warnings the Deuteronomic discourses of Moses are reflected and repeated. He delivers the nation from the hand of the Philistines, as Moses from Pharaoh and the Egyptians, and opens up for them a new national era of progress and order under the rule of the kings whom they have desired. Thus, like Moses, he closes the old order, and establishes the people with brighter prospects upon more assured foundations of a new and greater greatness. In nobility of character and utterance also, and in fidelity to Jeh, Samuel is not unworthy to be placed by the side of the older lawgiver. The record of his life is not marred by any act or word which would appear unworthy of his office or preceptive. And the few references to him in the later literature (Ps. 99:6; Jer. 15:1; 1 Ch. 6:28; 9:22; 11:3; 26:28; 29:29; 2 Ch. 35:18) show how high was the estimation in which his name and memory were held by his fellow-countrymen in subsequent ages.

SAMUEL, BOOKS OF:

I. Place in the Canon.—In the Heb Canon and enumeration of the sacred books of the OT, the two Books of Samuel were reckoned as one, and formed the third division of the earlier Prophets (ם"שנ, 'ם"שנ, n'b'hi'n r'sh'k'n). The one book bore the title "Samuel" (ם"שנ, sh'ma'el), not because the book was written by Samuel, but because his life and acts formed the main theme of the book, or at least of its earlier part. Nor was the Book of Samuel separated by any real division in subject-matter or continuity of style from the Book of Kings, which in the original formed a single book, not two as in the Eng. and other modern VSS. The history was carried forward without interruption; and the record of the life of David, begun in S, was completed in K. This continuity in the narrative of Israelite history was made more prominent in the LXX, where the four books were comprised under one title and were known as the four "Books of the Kingsdom" (βίβλοι βασιλείων, βιβλίοι βασιλείων). This name was probably due to the translators or scholars of Alexandria. The division into four books, but not the Or title, was then adopted in the Lat tr. where, however, the influence of Jerome secured the restoration of the Heb names, 1 and 2 S, and 1 and 2 K (Regum). Jerome's example was universally followed, and the fourfold division with the Heb title and a place in all subsequent VSS of the OT Scriptures. Ultimately the distinction of the first and second Books of Samuel, as well as the place of the first in the old Latin text, was received and printed editions of the Heb Bible. This was done for the first time in the editio princeps of the Rabbinic Bible, printed at Venice in 1516-17 AD.
II. Contents and Period of the History.—The narrative of the two Books of S covers a period of about a hundred years, from the close of the unsettled era of the Judges to the establishment and consolidation of the kingdom under David. It is therefore a record of the changes, national and constitutional, which accompanied this growth and development of the national life, at the close of which the Israelites found themselves a united people under the rule of a king to whom allowed allegiance, controlled and guided by more or less definitely established institutions and laws. This may be described as the general purpose and main theme of the books, to trace the advance of the people under Divine guidance to a state of settled prosperity and unity in the promised land, and to give prominence to the theocratic rule which was the essential condition of Israel’s life as the people of God under all the changing forms of early government. The narrative therefore centers itself around the lives of the three men, Samuel, Saul and David, who were chiefly instrumental in the establishment of the monarchy, and to whom it was due more than to any others that Israel emerged from the depressed and disunited state in which the tribes had remained during a period of the rule of the Judges, and came into possession of a combined and effective national life. If the formal separation therefore into two books be disregarded, the history of Israel as it is narrated in ‘Samuel’ is most naturally divided into three parts, which are followed by an appendix recording words and incidents which for some reason had not found a place in the general narrative:

A. The life and rule of Samuel (1 S 1-15) (death 1 S 8:2)
B. The life, reign and death of Saul (1 S 16-2 S 1)
C. The reign and acts of David to the suppression of the Ammonites and Philistines (2 S 2-25)
D. Appendix; other incidents in the reign of David, the names of David’s warriors and his Song or Psalm of Praise (2 S 21-34).

III. Summary and Analysis.—To present a brief and clear analysis of these Books of S is not altogether easy. For as in the Pent and the earlier historical Books of Josh and Jgs, repetitions and apparently duplicate accounts of the same event are an inevitable concomitant of the chronological development of the narrative. Even the main divisions, as stated above, to a certain extent overlap.

1. Life of Samuel (1 S 1-15)

27-30). Samuel’s vision at the sanctuary and his induction to the prophetic office (3 1-4).
2. Death of Jonathan and Saul (ch 14).
3. The death of Saul and Samuel (ch 28-31).
4. The destruction of the Philistines and of the temple (ch 29-30).
5. Assembly of Israel under Samuel at Mizpah, and victory over the Philistines (7 1-14).
6. Assembly of Israel under Samuel at Mizpah, and victory over the Philistines (7 1-14).
7. Assembly of Israel under Samuel at Mizpah, and victory over the Philistines (7 1-14).
8. Assembly of Israel under Samuel at Mizpah, and victory over the Philistines (7 1-14).
9. Assembly of Israel under Samuel at Mizpah, and victory over the Philistines (7 1-14).
10. Victory of Saul over the Ammonites and deliverance of Jabesh-gilead (11 1-15); Saul made king in Gath (vs 14-15).
11. Samuel’s address to the people in Gilgal, defending his own life and action, and exhorting them to fear and serve the Lord (ch 12).
12. Saul at Gilgal offers the burnt offering in Samuel’s absence; gathering of the Philistines to battle at Michmash; the brazen plates of the Philistines for weapons of iron (ch 13).
13. Jonathan’s surprise of the Philistines, and their sudden panic (14 1-23); Saul’s vow, unwittingly broken by Jonathan, with the people and the Philistines after its effects (14 24-25); victories of Saul over his enemies on every side (14 26-52).
14. War against Amalek, and Saul’s disobedience to the Divine command to exterminate the Amalekites (15).

(1) Anointing of David as Saul’s successor (16 1-13); his summons to the court of Saul as act as minstrel before the king (vs 14-23).
2. Reign of David (ch 17).
(2) David and Goliath (ch 17).
(3) The love of Jonathan and Saul (18 1-4); the former’s advancement and fame, the jealousy of Saul, and his attempt to kill David (18 5-16, 29-30); David’s marriage to the daughter of Saul (vs 17-25).
(4) Death of Saul (2 S 1). The second attempt to kill him (19 17-19).
2. Saul’s escape to Ramah, whither the king followed (vs 18-24).
(5) Jonathan’s warning to David of his father’s resolve and their parting (ch 20).
(6) David at Nob (21 1-9); and with Achish of Gath (vs 10-15).
(7) David’s band of outlaws at Adullam (22 1-3); his provision for the safety of his father and mother in Moab (vs 3-9); vengeance of Saul on those who had helped David (vs 6-23).
(8) Repeated attempts of Saul to take David (ch 23). Death of Saul (23 15); Abigail becomes David’s wife, after the death of her husband (ch 24).
(9) Saul’s further pursuit of David (ch 26).
(10) David’s return with Bahul of the men of Engedi (27 1-28).
(11) Saul and the witch of Endor (28 3-25).
(12) David’s pursuit of the Amalekites who had raided Ziklag, and victory over them (ch 30).
(13) Battle between the Philistines and Israel in Mt. Gilboa and the death of Saul (ch 31).
(14) News of Saul’s death brought to David at Ziklag (2 S 1 1-16); David’s lamentation over Saul and Jonathan (ch 32).
(15) David’s seven and a half years’ reign over Judah in Hebron (2 S 1 1-53).
(16) Consecration of David as king in 3. Reign of Hebron (2 S 1 4-45); message to the men of David (ch 2).
(17) Death of Abner and death of Asahel (ch 22).
(18) Increase of the fame and prosperity of David, and the names of his sons (3 1-5); Abner’s submission to David, and treacherous murder of the former by Joab (vs 6-39).
(19) Murder of Ish-bosheth and David’s vengeance upon his murderers (4 1-3,5-12); notice of the escape of Mephibosheth when Saul and Jonathan were slain at Jezreel (ver 4).
(20) David’s acceptance as king over all Israel (5 1-3).
(21) Reign of David in Jerusalem over United Israel (5 4-26).
(22) Taking of Jericho and victories over the Philistines (5 4-25).
(23) Return of the ark to the city of David (ch 6).
(24) David’s purpose to build a temple for the Lord (7 1-3); the Divine answer by the prophet Nathan, and the king’s prayer (vs 4-29).
(25) Victories over the Philistines, Syrians, and other peoples (ch 8).
(26) David’s reception of Mephibosheth (ch 9).
(27) Defeat of the Ammonites and Syrians by the men of Israel under the command of Joab (10 1-11).
(28) David and Uriah, the latter’s death in battle, and David’s marriage with Bath-sheba (ch 11).
(29) Nathan’s parable and David’s conviction of sin (12 1-16); the king’s grief and intercession for his sick son (vs 16-25); siege and capture of Rabbah, the Ammonite capital (vs 26-31).
(30) Amnon’s murder of Absalom (13 1-22); Absalom’s vengeance and murder of Amnon (vs 23-30); flight of Absalom (vs 37-39).
(31) Return of Absalom to Jerusalem (14 1-24); his beauty, and reconciliation with the king (vs 25-33).
(32) Absalom’s method of ingratiating himself with the people (15 1-6); his revolt and the flight of the king from Jerusalem (vs 7-31); meeting with Hushai (vs 32-37a); Absalom in Carmel (vs 38-44).
(33) David’s meeting with Zilpa (16 1-4), and Shimel (vs 5-14); counsel of Ahithophel and Hushai (16 15-17); the king carried to Mahanaim (17 23-27); death of Ahithophel (ver 23).
(34) David’s flight from Absalom (17 24-29).
(35) The revolt subdued, death of Absalom, and reception by David of the tidings (18 1-19 8e).
(36) Return of the king to Jerusalem, and meetings with Shimel, Mephibosheth, and Barzillai the Gileadite (19 85-49).

IV. Sources of the History.—The natural inference from the character and contents of the Books of S, as thus reviewed, is that the writer has made use of authorities, ‘sources’ or ‘documents,’” from which he has compiled a narrative of the events which it was his desire to place on record. The same characteristics are noticeable here which are found in parts of the Pentateuch and of the Books of Josh and Jgs, that in some instances duplicate or parallel accounts are given of one and the same event, which seems to be regarded from different points of view and is narrated in a style which is more or less divergent from that of the companion record. Examples of this so-called duplication are more frequent in the Books of S than in the later. There are presented, for instance, two accounts of Saul’s election as king, and an act of disobedience is twice followed, apparently quite independently, by the sentence of rejection. Independent also are the narrative accounts of Saul’s introduction to Saul (1 S 16 14-23; 17 31 f. 55 f); and the two accounts of the manner of the king’s death can be imperfectly reconciled only on the hypothesis that the young Amalekite actually sent forth to David to murder his own part in the matter. In these and other instances little or no attempt seems to be made to harmonize conflicting accounts, or to reconcile apparent discrepancies. In good faith the writer set down the records as he found them, making extracts or quotations from his authorities on the several events as they occurred, and thus building up his own history on the basis of the freest possible use of the materials and language of those who had preceded him.

However alien such a method of composition may appear to modern thought and usage in the West, it is characteristic of all early oriental writing. It would be almost impossible to find in any eastern literature a work of any long duration which was not thus silently indebted to its predecessors, and had incorporated their utterances, and had itself in turn suffered interpolation at the hands of later editors and transcribers. Accordingly, early Heb historical literature also, while unique in its spirit, conformed in its methods to the practice of the age and country in which it was composed. It would have been strange if it had been otherwise.

Apart from the appendix and minor additions, of which Hannah’s song on the birth of Samuel in 1 S 2:1-10 is an example, the bulk of the book is derived from two independent sources, which themselves in all probability formed part of a still larger, more or less consecutive history or histories that have now been lost. These source materials, however, have been, as others think, rather of a biographical nature, presenting and enforcing the teaching of the acts and experience of the great leaders and rulers of the nation. The predominance of the narrative is perhaps most evident in the history of Saul. The broad lines of distinction between the two branches of the book are defined without much difficulty or uncertainty. The greater part of the first eight chapters is in all probability derived from the one source, the earlier of the two, which has assigned more or less completely vs 10-12, 15, 17-19, 21-25 and 28. The other part has contributed 1 S 8 with parts of chs 10, 11, 13, 14, 16, 18, 20 and considerable portions of chs 22, 23, 26-27, 28-31, 2 S 1 (in part), 2-6, 9-20. Some details have probably been derived from other sources, and additions made by the editor or editors. This general determination of sources rests upon a number of texts, upon the evidence of repetition and exception, and upon simpler varieties of style which are neither so pronounced nor so readily distinguished as in the books of the Law. The writer’s own mind that a close and exact division or line of demarcation in evidence is not to be found.

V. Character and Date of Sources.—Attempts which have been made to determine the date of these two sources, or to identify them with one or other of the existing authorities from which the historical narratives of the Pentateuch are derived, have not been without some judgment of some, however, the later of the two sources should be regarded as a continuation of the narrative of the document known as E, and the earlier is ascribed to J. The style of the latter has much in common with the style of J, and is clear, vigorous and poetical; the religious connotations also that are apparent are of a simple and early type. The later writing has been supposed to give indications of the influence of the prophetic teaching of the 8th century. The indications, however, are not sufficiently decisive to enable this to be determined. If it be determined that J and E represent rather schools of teaching and thought than individuals, the characteristics of the two sources of the Books of S would not be out of harmony with the view that from those two schools respectively were derived the materials out of which the history was compiled. The “sources” then, would, according to the usual view, belong to the 9th century before the Christian era; and to a period not more than a century or a century and a half later should be assigned the final compilation of the complete form of the history as contained in the Heb Canon of Scripture.

VI. Greek Text.—The Hellenistic translation of the Hebrew Scriptures is represented in the LXX and in several other versions. The LXX had a great deal in common with the Massoretic text, and it is probable that in the course of transmission the Gr text has been exposed to much corruption in a very considerable extent. At least two recensions of the Gr text are in existence, represented by the Vatican and Alexandrian canons respectively, of which the former is nearer to the Heb original, and has apparently been corrupted to it at a later period with a view to remove discrepancies; and this process has naturally impaired its value as a witness to the primary shape of the Gr text itself. A few passages are entirely lost in the text of S; the Massoretic Heb and Gr and A in the Greek. The original form of the text as first recovered, would represent a text anterior to the Massoretic recension, differing from, but not necessarily superior to, the latter. For the restoration of this text, the Old Lat., where it is available, affords valuable help. It is evident then that in any given instance the agreement of these three types or recensions of the text is the strongest possible witness to the originality and authenticity of a reading; but that the weight attaching to the testimony of A will not in general, on account of the history of this text, be equivalent to that of either of the other two.

VII. Ethical and Religious Teaching.—The religious teaching and thought of the two Books of S it is not difficult to summarize. The books are in form a historical record of events; but they are intended by the same time that in addition they conformed to a definite purpose, and made to subsist a definite moral and religious aim. It is not a narrative of events solely, or the preservation of historical detail, that the writer has in view, but rather to elucidate and enforce from Israel’s experience the significance of the Divine and moral government of the nation. The duty of king and people alike is to obey Jah, to render strict and willing deference to His commands, and on this path of obedience and truth the nation’s independence and prosperity be secured. With this presupposition, and with uncompromising severity, sin even in the highest places is condemned; and an ideal of righteousness is set forth in language and with an earnestness which may be regarded as the consummation of Dt.

Thus the same is true of the Books of S; and in the earliest of the preceding books of the canonical OT: they are composed with a didactic aim. The experience of the past is made to afford lessons of warning and encouragement for the present. To the writer or writers the source materials, the legend and upbuilding of the Israelite kingdom is pregnant with a deeper meaning than lies on the surface, and this meaning he endeavors to make plain to his readers through the record. The issues of the events and the events themselves are under the guidance and control of Jeh, who always condemns and punishes wrong, and approves and rewards righteousness. Thus the narrative is history utilized to convey moral truth. And its value is to be estimated, not primarily as recording the great deeds of the past, but as conveying ethical teaching; that by means of the history, the moral and spiritual interest the people may be recalled to a sense of their high duty toward God, and be warned of the inevitable consequences of disobedience to Him.

SANAAS, san’a-as (A and Fritzsche, _Zedas, Sandas, B, Zaq, Sandi; AV Annaas): The sons of Sannah returned in large numbers with Zerubbabel (1 Es 2 12.15), and appear most prominently in 1 Es 5 18.10, a name appearing in many variations. Always reading Sanaasibop, Sanahassaros, B, Sanaasibarasi, Sanamassar, in 2 12[1] [RVZ Samannasar] Saan-avaspas, Samansaros, in 2 13[4], but Sanabaspas, Sanaasib, in 6 20[19]: He was "governor of Judaea" under Cyrus, conveyed the holy vessels of the temple from Babylon to Jerusalem 1 Es 6 7, and laid the foundations of the house of the Lord 1 Es 6 12. 15; 6 18–20) "Sennacherib [q.v.] the prince of Judah" (Ezr 1 8).

Some identify him with Zerubbabel as ATY in 1 Es 5 18: "Z., which is also S., the ruler." This view appears to be favored by the order of the words here, where, in the case of two persons, one might expect "S., the ruler," to come first. Zerubbabel appears as "governor of Judaea," also in 1 Es 6 27–29. Ezr 3 10 speaks of the foundation of the temple under Zerubbabel and 5 16 as under Zerrobai: Ezr 2 23. The name Sannah is interpreted as Ze- rub-ibael in Ez 10. 5, 40, where Nehemiah and Atharias refer to the same person. The name Sannah appears in the LXX with the same person, even with the same identification. Zerubbabel is not a styled ruler or governor either in Neh or Ezr, but in Hag 1 14, 22–21 he is pehul or governor of Jerusalem; no exact parallel to the double monarchy as in the text has survived. The name Sannah or Sannah is found as e.g. Daniel, Belteshazzar: the language of Ez 5 14 seems to refer to the position of a different person than Zerubbabel. Nor is there any reason against supposing a first return under Sheshbazzar (see above), and a foundation of the temple previous to the time of Zerubbabel—an undertaking into which the Jews did not enter heartily, perhaps because Sannah may have been a foreigner (though it is uncertain whether he was a Babylonian, a Persian, or a Jew). A later proposal is to identify Saniasib with Sheshbazzar, the uncle of Zerubbabel in 1 Ch 3 18. But either of these identifications must remain doubtful. See Sennacherib; Zerubbabel.

SANASIB, san’a-sib (Fritzsche, _Zedas, Sandas, B, and Swete, _Zedas, Sandas, A, Avadis, A, Avadis, Avadis, Anasib): Found only in 1 Es 5 24, where the sons of Jedu, the sons of Jesus, are a priestly family returning "among the sons of Sanasib." The name is not found in 1 Es 2 36; Neh 7 30; and is perhaps preserved in the Vulg. "Eliasib." The name is the leading opponent of the Jews at the time when Nehemiah undertook to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 2 10; 4 1: 6 1). He was related by marriage to the son of Eeliashib, the high priest at the time of the annulment of the mixed marriages forbidden by the Law (Neh 13 28).

Renewed interest has been awakened in Sanballat from the fact that he is mentioned in the papyri I and II of Sachau (Die olympischen Papyrusurkunden aus Elephantine, Berlin, 1908, and in his later work, _Arachneae Papyri und Ostaka, Leipzig, 1911;_ cf. Sturck's convenient ed in _Lituanus_(Kleina Texte zu Handbuch der Geschichte des Judentums, i3, 3, 4). In the OT, he acts as successor to the governor (pahath) of Samaria some time before the 17th year of Darius (Nothus), i.e., 408–407 BC, when Bagohi was governor of Judah. His two sons, Deliah and Shelemiah, received a letter from the king of Judah and his companions the priests who were in Yeb (Elephantine) in upper Egypt. This letter contained information concerning the state of affairs in the Jewish colony of Yeb, esp. concerning the destruction of the temple or synagogue _agora _which had been erected at that place.

The address of this letter reads as follows: "To our lord Bagohi, the governor of Judaea, his servants Jodinah and his companions, the priests in the fortress of Yeb [Elephantine], we say the God of heaven has inquire much at every time after the peace of our lord and put thee in thine favor before Darius the king, etc." The conclusion of the letter reads thus: "Now, therefore, the king and his companions and the Jews, all citizens of Yeb, may thus: If it seems good to the king and the king's council to think on the rebuilding of that temple the _agora _which had been destroyed by the Egyptians, since it has not been permitted since then to do those receivers of thy benefactions and favors here in Egypt. Let a letter with regard to the rebuilding of the temple of the God Jaho in the fortress of Yeb, as it was formerly built, be sent from thee. In thy name will they offer the meal offerings, the incense, and the burnt offerings upon the altar of the God Jaho; and we shall always pray for thee and thank thee and for the kingdom of the God Jaho in the fortress of Yeb. If it seems good to thee, do the Jews find here, until the temple has been rebuilt. And it will be to thee a meritorious work [mashikah] in the sight of Jaho, the God of Heaven, greater than the meritorious work of a man who offers to him a burnt offering and a sacrifice of a value equal to the value of 1,000 talents of silver. And as to the gold [probably that which was sent by the Jews to Bagohi as a bribe] we have sent word and given knowledge. Also, we have in our name communicated in a letter all [these] matters unto Deliah and Shelemiah, the sons of Sanballat, governor of Samaria. Also, from all that has been done thus far, Asram (the satrap of Egypt) has learned nothing. The 20th of Marcheshvan in the 17th year of Darius the king."

Sanballat is the Bab Sin-bubaili, "may Sin give him life," a name occurring a number of times in the contract tablets from the time of Nebuchadnezzar, Nabonidus, and Darius Hystaspis. (See Tellquast, _Newbablysionisches Namensbuch, 183_.)

The root is found in the OT in the Heb vb. _yadhash, _in the NT in the Gr vb. _aydaze, _agiasz. The noun "sanctification" does not occur in the OT, but the roots noted above appear in a group of important words which are of very frequent occurrence. These words are "holy," "hallow," "hallowed," "holiness," "consecrate," "saint, "sanctify," "sanctification." It must be borne in mind that these words are all tr of the same root, and that therefore one of them can be treated adequately without reference to the others. All have undergone a certain development. Broadly stated, this has been from the formal, or ritual, to the ethical, and these different meanings must be carefully distinguished.

1. The Formal Sense.—By sanctification is ordinarily meant that hallowing of the Christian believer by which he is freed from sin and enabled to realize the will of God in his life. This is not, however, the first or common meaning in the Scriptures. To sanctify is a common term of the Old Testament, that is, to separate from the world and consecrate to God.

To understand this primary meaning we must go back to the word "holy" in the OT. That is holy which belongs to Jehovah. There is an Ot character. It may refer to days and seasons, to places, to objects used for worship, or to persons. Exactly the same usage is shown with the word "sanctify." To sanctify something is to declare it as belonging to God, "Sanctify unto me all the first-born . . . it is mine" (Ex 13:2; cf Nu 3:13; 8:17). It applies thus to all that is connected with worship, to the Levites (Nu 3:12), the priests and the tent of meeting, the ark, and that touched it (Ex 29:362), and the offering (Ex 29:27; cf 2 Mace 2:18; 1 Esd 7:31). The feast and holy days are to be sanctified, that is, set apart from ordinary business as belonging to Jehovah (the Sabbath, Nu 15:29; Neh 1:14). One part of the nation as a whole is sanctified when Jehovah acknowledges it and receives it as His own, as "a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation" (Ex 19:5-6). A man may thus sanctify his house or his field (Lev 27:14-16), but not the firstling of the flock, for this is already Jehovah's (Lev 27:26).

It is this formal usage without moral implication that explains such a passage as Gen 38:21. The word tr meaning it, as elsewhere, the sanctified or consecrated one (kedashah); see margin and cf Dt 23:18; 1 K 14:24; Hos 4:14). It is the hierodule, the familiar figure of the old pagan temple, the sacred slave consecrated to God and the temple for immemorial purposes. The practice is protested against in Israel (Dt 23:17), but the use of the term illustrates clearly that it is essentially the same in its primary meaning (cf also 2 K 10:20, "and Jehu said, Set him a solemn assembly for Baal and they proclaimed it"); cf Joel 1:14).

Very suggestive is the transitive use of the word in the phrase, "to sanctify Jehovah." To understand this we must note the use of the word "holy" as applied to Jehovah in the OT. Its meaning is not primarily ethical. Jehovah's holiness is His supremacy, His sovereignty, His glory, His essential being as God. To say the Holy One is simply to say God. Jehovah's holiness is seen in His might, His manifested glory; it is that before which peoples tremble, which makes the nations dread (Ex 15:11-18; cf 1 S 6:20). Ps 68:1; 89:7; 95:3. Significance is in the way in which "jealous" and "holy" are almost identified (Jos 24:19; Ezek 38:23). It is God asserting His supremacy, His unique claim. To sanctify Jehovah, therefore, to make Him holy, is to assert or acknowledge or bring forth His being as God, His supreme power and glory, His sovereign claim. Ezekiel brings this out most clearly. Jehovah has been profaned in the eyes of the nations through Israel's defeat and captivity. True, it was because of Israel's sins, but the nations thought it was because of Jehovah's weakness. The ethical is not wanting in these passages. The people are to be separated from their sins and given a new heart (Ezek 36:25; 20:33). But the word "sanctify" is not used for this. It is applied to Jehovah, and it means the assertion of Jehovah's power in Israel's triumph, the vindication of her foes (20:41; 28:25; 36:23; 38:16; 39:27).

The sanctification of Jehovah is thus the assertion of His being and power as God, just as the sanctification of a person or object is the assertion of Jehovah's right and claim in the same.

The story of the waters of Meribah illustrates the same meaning. Mose's failure to sanctify Jehovah in his failure to declare Jehovah's glory and power in the miracle of the waters (Ex 15:22-23; cf Dt 32:10; Ps 95:1) has repeatedly been pointed out in the story of Nadab and Abihu points the same way. Here "I will be sanctified" is the same as "I will be glorified" (Lev 10:1-3). Jehovah is essentially the same in Ex 3:18; "Jehonathan is exalted in justice, and Jehovah the Holy One is sanctified in righteousness." Holiness again is the exaltedness of God, His supremacy, which is seen here in the judgment (justice, righteousness) rooted out to the disobedient people (cf the recurrent refrain of 5:26; 9:12-17:21; 10:4; see Justice; Justice of Pss. Isa 8:13; 29:22 suggest the same byes by which they "sanctify" to fear and awe. One NT passage brings us the same meaning (1 Pet 3:15): Sanctify your hearts in Christ as Lord, that is, exalt Him as supreme.

In a few NT passages the OT ritual sense reappears, as when Jesus speaks of the temple sanctifying the gold, and the altar the gift (Mt 21:13; cf 1 Tim 1:5). The prevailing meaning is that which we found in the OT. To sanctify is to consecrate or set apart. We may first take the few passages in the Fourth Gospel. As applied to Jesus in 10:36-39, to sanctify means to make holy in the ethical sense. As the whole context shows, it means to consecrate for His mission in the world. The reference to the disciples, "that they themselves also may be sanctified in truth," has much meaning. That they may be set apart (for Jesus sends them, as the Father sends Him), and that they may be made holy in truth.

This same meaning of consecration, or separation, appears when we study the word saint, which is the same as "sanctified one." Aside from its use in the NT, the word is found mainly in the OT. Outside the Gospels, where the term "disciples" is used, it is the common word to designate the followers of Jesus, occurring some 561. By "saint" is not meant the morally perfect, but the one who belongs to Christ, just as the sanctified priest or offering belonged to Jehovah. This Paul can salve the disputes at Corinth as saints and a little later rebuke them as carnal and babes, as those among whom are jealous and strife, who walk after the manner of men (1 Cor 1:2; 3:1-3). In the same way the phrase "the "holy" one" or "those sanctified" is used to designate the believers. By "the inheritance among all them that are sanctified" is meant the heritage of the Christian believer (Acts 20:32; 26:18; of 1 Cor 1:2; 6:11; Eph 1:18; Col 1:12). This is the meaning in which, which speaks of the believer as being sanctified by the blood of Christ. In 10:29 the writer speaks of one who has fallen away, who "hath counted the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing." Evidently it is not the inner and personal holiness of this apostate that is referred to. It is the fullness of the tene, but that he had been separated unto God by this sacrificial blood and had then counted the holy offering a common thing. The contrast is between the sacred and common, not between moral perfection and sin (cf 10:10; 13:12). The formal meaning appears again in 1 Cor 7:12-14, where the unbelieving husband is said to be sanctified by the wife, and vice versa. It is not moral character that is meant here, but a certain separation from the profane and unclean and a certain relation to God. This is made plain by the reference to the children: "Else were your children unclean; but now are they holy." The formal sense is less certain in other...
1. Transfiguration of Formal Scriptures stand as a monument. The ethical idea is not wanting at the beginning, but the supremacy of the moral and spiritual over against the formal, the ritual, the ceremonial, the national, is the clear direction in which life is to go. Now the pivot of this movement is the conception of God. As the thought of God grows more ethical, more spiritual, it molds and changes all other conceptions. Thus what it means to belong to God (homoio, sanctification) depends upon the nature of the God to whom man belongs. The hierodules of Corinth are women of shame because of the nature of the goddess to whose temple they belong. The prophets caught a vision of Jehovah, not jealous for His prerogative, not craving for His temple or puerile and pantheistic ceremonial, but with a gracious love for His people and a passion for righteousness. Their great message is: This now is Jehovah; hear what it means to belong to such a God and to serve Him. "What unto me is the multitude of your sacrifices? Wash you, make you clean; seek justice, relieve the oppressed" (Isa 11.16-17).

"When Israel was a child, then I loved him . . . I desire goodness, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt-offerings" (Hos 11.6).

In this way the formal idea that we have been considering becomes charged with moral meaning. To belong to God, to be His servant, His son, is no mere external matter. Jesus' teaching as in the Synoptic Gospels at all, but "sonship" with the Jews expressed this same relation of belonging. For them it meant a certain obedience on the one hand, a privilege on the other. Jesus declares that belonging to God means likeness to Him, sonship is sharing His spirit of loving good will (Mt 5.45-48). Brother and sister for Jesus are those who do God's will (Mk 3.35). Paul takes up the same thought, but joins it definitely to the words "sanctify." The religious means the ethical, those that are sanctified are called to be saints" (1 Cor 1.2). The significant phrase is the same as in Rom 1.1, "Paul . . . called to be an apostle."

In this light we read Eph 4.1, "Walk worthy of the calling wherewith ye were called." Eph 1.3, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you; who verily did foreordain us unto the adoption of sons by Jesus Christ to himself according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved."

2. Relation of Sanctification to God

Personal: should be thought of in a negative or passive way. Now the Christian's surrender is not to an outer authority but to an inner living fellow being. The sanctified life is thus a life of personal fellowship lived out with the Father in the spirit of Christ in loving trust and obedient service. This positive and vital meaning of sanctification dominates Paul's thought. He speaks of living unto God, of living to the Lord, and, most expressively of all, of being alive unto God (Rom 14.8; cf 6.13; Gal 2.19). So completely is his life filled by this fellowship that he can say, "It is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me" (Gal 2.20). But there is no quietism here. It is a very rich and active life, this life of fellowship to which we are surrendered. It is a life of sonship in trust and love, with the spirit that enables us to say, "Abba, Father" (Rom 8.15; Gal 4.6). Sanctification is not, therefore, a limited ethical, good will (Mt 5.43-48). It is a life of "faith working through love" (Gal 6), it is having the mind of Christ (Phil 3.5). The sanctified life, then, is the life so fully surrendered to fellowship with Christ day by day, not the inner spirit and outward expression are ruled by His spirit.

We come now to that aspect which is central for Christian interest, sanctification as the making holy of life, not by our act, but by God's act. Sanctification is no longer the work of the Christian, but the work of God. Sanctification as God's Gift in conformity with God's will, then sanctification is the deed or process by which that state is wrought. And this deed we are to consider now as the work of God. Jesus prays that the Father may sanctify His disciples in truth (John 17.17). So Paul prays for the Thessalonians (1 Thess 5.23), and declares that Christ is to sanctify His church (cf Rom 6.22; 2 Thess 3.3; 2 Tim 2.21; 1 Pet 1.2). Here sanctification means to make clean or holy in the ethical sense, though the idea of consecration is not necessarily lacking. But aside from special passages, we must take into account the whole NT teaching, according to which every part of life, soul, spirit, and body (1 Cor 6.20), is to be consecrated to God, that is, to be given over to the Spirit of God and wrought by His Spirit. "If I be the Lord that worketh in you both to will and to work" (Phil 2.13; cf Rom 8.12-14.16-26; Gal 5.22). Significant is the use of the words "creature" ("creation," see margin) and "workmanship" with Paul (2 Cor 5.17; Gal 6.15; Eph 2.10; 4.24). The new life is God's second work of creation.

When we ask, however, when and how this work is wrought, there is no such clear answer. What we have is on the one hand uncompromising ideal and demand, and on the other absolute confidence in God. By adding to these two the evident fact that the Christian believers seen in the NT are far from the attainment of such Christian perfection, some writers have assumed to have the foundation here for the doctrine that the state of complete holiness of life is a special experience in the Christian life wrought in a definite moment of time. It is well to realize that no NT passages give answer to these questions and time and method, and that our conclusions must be drawn from the general teaching of the NT as to the Christian life.

First, it must be noted that in the NT view sanctification in the ethical sense is an essential element.
and inevitable result of all Christian life and experience. Looked at from the religious point of view, we find two aspects of regeneration. Regeneration is the implanting of a new life in man. So far as that is a new life from God it is ipse facto Life. The doctrine of the Holy Spirit teaches the same (see HOLY SPIRIT).

There is no Christian life from the very beginning that is not the work of the Spirit. "No man can [even] say, Jesus is Lord, but in the ... Spirit!" (1 Cor 12:3). But this Spirit is the Holy Spirit, whether with Paul we say the Holy Spirit or Spirit of God (Rom 8:9). His presence, therefore, in our far forth means holiness of life. From the ethical standpoint the same thing is constantly declared. Jesus builds here upon the prophets: no religion without righteousness; clean hands, pure hearts, deeds of mercy are not mere conditions of worship, but joined to humble hearts are themselves the worship that God desires (Am 6:21-25; Mic 6:6-8). Jesus deepened the conception, but did not change it, and Paul was true to this succession. "If any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ is in you, ... the spirit is life because of righteousness" (Rom 8:9,10). There is nothing in Paul's teaching to suggest that sanctification is the special event of a unique experience, or that there are specific conditions or qualities for sanctification. All Christian living meant for him clean, pure, right living, and that was sanctification. The simple, practical way in which he attacks the bane of sexual impurity in his pagan congregations shows this. "This is the way of the ungodly. But you, having the Spirit of God, even the Spirit that makes you free from fornication; that each one of you know how to possess himself of his own vessel in sanctification and honor. For God called us not for uncleanness, but for sanctification" (1 Thess 4:4,7). The strength of Paul's teaching, indeed, lies here in this combination of moral earnestness with absolute dependence upon God.

The second general conclusion that we draw from the NT teaching is that Christian life is this: the sanctification which is a part of all that which we know as the Spirit of Christ. Such a fellowship is the supreme moral force for the molding of life, for the development of regeneration. It is an analogue of this, and we know with what power it works on life and character. It cannot, however, set forth either the intimacy or the power of this supreme and final relation where our Friend is not another but Himself inperson. So much we know: this fellowship means a new spirit in us, a renewed and daily renewing life.

It is noteworthy that Paul has no hard-and-fast forms for this life. The reality was too rich and great, and he uses his examples and illustrations upon theological forms which may serve to compress the truth instead of expressing it. Here are some of his expressions for this life in us: to "have the mind of Christ" (1 Cor 2:16; Phil 2:5), "the Spirit of Christ" (Rom 8:9), "Christ is in you" (Rom 8:10), "the spirit which is from God" (1 Cor 12:3), "the Spirit of God" (1 Cor 6:19), the Holy Spirit (Gal 4:6), the Lord of the Hosts (1 Cor 16:23), and the Lord the Spirit (2 Cor 3:18). But in all this one fact stands out, this life is personal, a new spirit in us, and that spirit is one that we have in personal fellowship with God; it is His Spirit. Especially significant is the way in which Paul relates this new life to Christ. We have already noted that Paul uses indifferently "Spirit of God" and "Spirit of Christ" (Rom 8:9). His great contribution to the doctrine of the Holy Spirit lies here. As he states it in 2 Cor 3:17: "Now the Lord is the Spirit, and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom. Conception of the Spirit gains moral content and personal character. The Spirit is light, life, love, nor some strange and magical power. The Spirit is ethical; there is a definite moral quality which is expressed when the Spirit is present in a man. Whether you call it the light of the mind or the light of the heart, the light of enthusiasm, the ecstatic utterance of the enthusiast, or some strange deed of power, but in the workaday qualities of kindness, compassion is the divine self-restraint (Gal 5:22f)."

With this identification of the Spirit and the Christ in mind, we can better understand the passages in which Paul brings out the relation of Christ to the sanctification of the believer. He is the goal (Rom 8:29). We are to grow up in Him to be formed in us (Gal 4:19). We are to behold Him and be changed into His image (2 Cor 3:18). This deepens into Paul's thought of the mystical relation with Christ. The Christian dies to sin with Him that he may live with Him a new life. Christ is now his real life. He dwells in Christ, Christ dwells in him. He can say Christ's thoughts. His mind can be known. See Rom 6:5-11; 8:9,10; 1 Cor 2:16; 15:22; Gal 2:20.

This vital and positive conception of the sanctification of the believer must be asserted against some popular interpretations. The symbols of fire and water, as suggesting cleansing, have some import as forming a hard-and-fast basis for a whole superstructure of doctrine. For the former, note Isa 6:6f; Lk 3:16; Acts 2:3; for the latter, Acts 5:32; Tit 3:5; He 10:22; Rev 1:5; 7:14.) There is a two-fold danger here from which we have escaped. The symbols suggest cleansing, and their over-emphasis has meant first a negative and narrow idea of sanctification as purification or defilement. This is a falling back to certain OT OT levels. Secondly, these symbols have been much literalized, and the result has been a sort of mechanical or magical conception of the work of the Spirit. But the soul is not a substance for mechanical action, however sublime. It is personal life that is to be hallowed, thought, affections, motives, desires, will, and only a personal agent through personal fellowship can work this end.

The clear recognition of the personal and vital character of sanctification will help us with another difficulty in the life of the Christian. Is it not possible for the Christian to maintain a high spiritual standard while he is not a Christian in his nature, as the phrase is? It is equally possible for the Christian to maintain this standard while he is in grace. The Christian is not in Christ, but he is in the Christ, and so the answer to the popular question "What is the Christian's standard?" is "He is in Christ!" Our whole Bible answers the question in the affirmative for the Christian: "What is the Christian's standard?" "He is in Christ!"

7. Is It Immediate or in the Same Time? His instantaneous deed, why should not this sanctification and Entire? be instantaneous and entire? And does not Paul imply this, not merely in his demands in his prayer for the Thessalonians, that God may establish their love, but that He may sanctify them wholly and preserve spirit and soul and body entire, without blame at the coming of Our Lord Jesus Christ (1 Thess 3:13; 5:23)?

In answer to this we must first discriminate between the ideal and the empirical with Paul. Like John (1 Jn 1:6; 3:9), Paul insists that the life of Christ and the life of sin cannot go together, and he knows no qualified obedience, no graduated standard. He brings the highest Christian demand to the highest degree of his pagan convert. Nor have we any finer proof of his faith than this uncompromising idealism. On the other hand, how could he ask less than this? God cannot require less than the highest, but it is another question how the ideal is to be achieved. In the gospel of the ideal it is always either . . . or. In the realm of life there is another category. The question is not simply, Is this man sinner or saint? It is rather, What is he becoming? This matter of becoming is the really vital issue. Is this man turned the right way with or without his own doing? Is he in the Divine fellowship? Not the degree of achievement, but the right attitude toward the ideal, is decisive. Paul does not stop to resolve paradoxes, but practically he reckons with this idea. Side by side with his prayer for the Thessalonians are his admonitions to growth and progress (1 Thess 3 12; 5 14). Neither the absolute demand or the promise of grace gives us the right to conclude how the consummation shall take place.

That conclusion we can reach only as we go back again to the fundamental principle of the personal character of the Christian life and the religious and the religious, All Christian life is work out your own salvation . . . for it is God who worketh in you” (Phil 2 12 f). All is from God; we can only live what God gives. But there is a converse to this: only as we live it out can God give it to us-what He gives is only as we take it as an offering to God. This appears in all Paul’s teaching as to sanctification. It is not only God’s gift, but our task. “This is the will of God, even your sanctification” (1 Thess 4 3). “Having therefore these promises let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness” (1 Pet 1:19). Significant is Paul’s use of the word “walk.” We are to “walk in newness of life,” “by [or in] the Spirit,” “in love,” and “in Christ Jesus the Lord” (Rom 6:4; Gal 5:16; Eph 5:2; Col 2:6). The gift in each case becomes the task, and indeed becomes real and effective only in this activity. It is only as we walk by the Spirit that this becomes powerful in overcoming the lusts of the flesh (Gal 5:16; cf. 5:25). But the ethical is the task that ends only when God gives it to us. If we cannot give all at once. Sanctification is then the matter of a life and not of a moment. The life may be consecrated in a moment, the right relation to God assumed and the man stand in saving fellowship with Him. The life is thus made holy in principle. But the real making holy is coextensive with the whole life of man. It is nothing less than the constant in-forming of the life of the inner spirit and outer deed with the Spirit of Christ until we speak truth in love and grow up in all things into Him, who is the Head” (Eph 4:15). Read also Rom 6; that the Christian is dead to sin is not some fixed static fact, but is true only as he refuses the lower and yields his members to a higher obedience. Note that in 1 Cor 5:7 Paul in the same verse denies “d_Game uncleaned,” and then exalts “Purge out the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump”; of else 1 Thess 5 5–10.

We may sum up as follows: The word “sanctify” is used with two broad meanings: 1. To devote, to make holy, to recognize as holy, that which is, as belonging to God. This is the regular OT usage and is most common in the NT. The prophets showed that this belonging to God demanded righteousness. The NT deepens this into a whole-hearted surrender to the fellowship of God and to the rule of His Spirit. (2) Though the word itself appears in but few passages with this sense, the NT is full of the thought of the making holy of the Christian life by the Spirit of God in that fellowship into which God lifts us by His grace and in which He gives Himself to us. This sanctifying, or hallowing, is not mechanical or magical. It is wrought out by God’s Spirit in a daily fellowship to which man gives himself in aspiration and trust and obedience, receiving with open heart, living out in obedient life. It is not negative, the mere separation from sin, but the progressive hallowing of a life that grows constantly in capacity, as in character, into the stature of full manhood as it is in Christ. Only open this for us. We, its actual nature it is not momentary, but the deed and the privilege of a whole life. See also Holy Spirit and the following article.

WESLEYAN DOCTRINE

1. Doctrine Stated

6. Wesley’s Personal Testimony

Christian perfection, through entire sanctification, by faith, here and now, was one of the doctrines by which John Wesley gave

1. Doctrine great offence to his clerical brethren

Stated in the Anglican church. From the beginning of his work in 1739, till 1760, he was formulating this doctrine. At the last date there suddenly arose a huge number of witnesses among his followers. Many of these he questioned with Baconian skill, the result being a confirmation of his theories on various points.

In public address he used the terms “Christian Perfection,” “Perfect Love,” and “Holiness,” as synonymous, though there are differences between them when examined critically. With St. Paul he taught that all regenerate persons are saints, i.e. holy ones, as the word “saint,” from Lat sanctus, signifies through the singular (1 Cor 1 2; 2 Cor 1 1). His theory is that in the normal Christian the principle of holiness, beginning with the new birth, gradually expands and strengthens as the believer grows in grace and in the knowledge of the truth, by a final or all-sacrificing act of faith in Christ, it reaches an instantaneous completion through the act of the Holy Spirit, the sanctifier: 2 Cor 7 1, “perfecting holiness,” etc; Eph 4 13, AV Till we all come . . . into a perfect man.” Thus sanctification is gradual, but entire sanctification is instantaneous (Rom 6 “our old man was crucified,” etc, a sudden death; Gal 2 20, “I have been crucified with Christ; and it is no longer I that live!”). In 1 Thess 2 5, the word “sanctify” is a Gr. sin (I, signifies an act and not a process, as also in Jn 17 19, “that they . . . may be sanctified in truth,” or truly. (See Meyer’s note.) Many Christians experience this change on their deathbeds. If death suddenly ends the life of a growing Christian before he inverts, then, Holy Spirit perfects the work. Wesley’s advice to the preachers of this evangelical perfection was to draw and not to drive, and never to quote any threatenings of God’s word against God’s children. The declaration, “Without sanctification no man shall see the Lord” (He 12 14), does not apply to the saints, “the holy ones.”
Wesley's perfection of love is not perfection of degree, but of kind. Pure love is perfect love. The gradual growth toward perfect purity of love is beautifully expressed in Mozod's hymn,

"O to utter shame and sorrow!
All of self, and none of Thee.
But after a view of Christ on earth, the answer is faintly,
Some of self, and some of Thee.
Then, after a period of growing love, the cry is,
Less of self, and more of Thee.
After another period, the final cry is,
None of self, and all of Thee!"
as an aspiration for pure love, without any selfishness.

The attainment of this grace is certified by the total cessation of all servile fear (1 Jn 4 18). Wesley added to this the witness of the Spirit, for which his only proof-text is 1 Cor 2 12.

1. (Phil 3 12, declares that he is not "made perfect": (a) in verse 15, he declares that he is perfect; (b) "made perfect" is a term, borrowed from the ancient games, signifying a finished course. This is one of the meanings of telic, as seen also in Lk 13 32 m, "The third day I end my course.
Paul no more disclaims spiritual perfection in these words than does Christ himself, "my Son shall make you free, etc., and in all those texts in the NT declaring sins forgiven.
(b) Bishop Westcott says that the expression, "to have sinned," is distinguished from "to sin," as the sinful principle is conceived from without, as distinct from sin, as the moral spirit, which is always holy; and, therefore, though guilty of all manner of things by not doing Christ's will, because they were untouched by sin, which existed only in their bodies, as it does in all matter. When told that this is the Son of God, John denied the reality of His body, saying that it was only a phantom. Hence, in the very first verse of this Ps., John writes evidently against the gnostic error, quoting three of the five senses to prove the reality of Christ's humanity. (By all means, see "The Emp. of St. John." Cambridge Bible for Schools, etc., 17-21.)

The relation of this doctrine to the Methodist Episcopal church in the United States is seen in the following questions, which have been affirmatively answered in public by all its preachers on their admission to the Conferences: "Are you going on to perfection?"; "Do you expect to be made perfect in love in this life?"
"Are you earnestly striving after it?"
The hymns of the Wesley's, still universally sung, are filled with this doctrine, in which occur such expressions as:

"Take away our bent to sinning.
Let us find that second best,
Make and keep me pure within.
'Tis done! Thou dost this moment save,
The full salvation, Lord, bestow!"

To the preaching of Christian perfection Wesley ascribed the success of his work in the conversion, religious training and intellectual education of the masses of Great Britain. It furnished him a multitude of consecrated workers, many of them lay preachers, who labored nearly every hardest, and when carried the gospel into all the British colonies, including America. It is declared by secular historians that this great evangelical movement, in which the doctrine of entire sanctification was so prominent, saved England from a disastrous revolution, like that which drenched France with the blood of its royal family and its nobility, in the last decade of the 18th cent. It is certain that the great Christian and humanitarian work of William Booth, originally a Methodist, was inspired by this doctrine which he constantly preached. This enabled his followers in the early years of the Salvation Army to endure the persecutions which befell them at that time.

Wesley's own experience of this grace is found in his journal, May 1760: "I felt my soul was all love. I was so stayed on God as I never felt"

6. Wesley's experience of this grace is found in his journal, May 1760: "I felt my soul was all love.

20 24–26, providing for the making of an altar of earth or stones, and emphasis is laid on the words "he built the place" for "the place" (Jgs 21:19)." (Jgs 21:19)."

2. The Graf-Wellhausen Hypothesis This, it is claimed, permits a plurality of sanctuaries. Illustrations are provided by the history. The patriarchs move about the country freely and build altars at various places. Later sacrifices or altars are mentioned in connection with Jethro (Ex 18:12), Moses (17:5, etc), Joshua (Josh 8:30), Gideon (Jgs 6:25 etc), Moses and Aaron (Num 18:19), and Elijah (1 K 18:32), to take but a few instances. Perhaps the most instructive case is that of Saul after the battle of Michmash. Observing that the people were eating meat with blood, he caused a large stone to be rolled to him, and we are expressly told that this was the first altar that he built to the Lord (1 S 14:35). While some of these examples might be accounted for by theophanies or other special circumstances, they are too numerous when taken together to explain them sufficiently. In many instances they represent the conduct of the most authoritative and religious leaders of the age, e.g. Samuel, and it must be presumed that such men knew and acted upon the Law of their own day. Hebrew and the Law are unison in permitting a multiplicity of sanctuaries. Wellhausen adds: "Altars as a rule are not built by the patriarchs according to their own private judgment whereover they please; on the contrary, a theophany calls attention to, or, at least afterward, confirms, the holiness of the place" (op. cit., 31).

(2) The second stage is represented by Dt, in the Law and Josiah's reformation in the history. Undoubtedly Dt 12 permits local non-sacrificial slaughter for the purposes of food, and enjoins the destruction of heathen places of worship, insisting with great vehemence on the central sanctuary. The narrative of Josiah's reformation in 2 K 23 tallies with these principles.

(3) The third great body of law (P) does not deal with the question (save in one passage, Lev 17). In Dt, "the unity of the cultus is commanded; in the PC it is presupposed. . . . What follows from this forms the question before us. To my thinking, this: the history and the Law of Ex 20 are in unison in permitting a multiplicity of sanctuaries.

Accordingly, this legislator strove to meet the difficulty by the new enactment. See Criticism (The Graf-Wellhausen Hypothesis).

(1) Slaughter not necessarily sacrificial. The general substratum afforded by the documentary falls within the scope of the art. PENTATEUCH. The present discussion is limited to the legal and historical outline traced above. The view that all slaughter of domestic animals was in every place by the edict of Josiah is refuted by the evidence of the early books. The following examples should be noted: in Gen 18:7 a calf is slain without any trace of a sacrifice, and in 27:9–14 (Jacob's substitute for veneration) no altar or religious rite can fairly be postulated. In 1 S 21:9–14 the sacrifice is performed by a woman, so that here again sacrifice is out of the question. If Gideon performed a sacrifice when he "made ready the wood and the bullock, and said, Let all who be for the LORD come near me, and take part in the sacrifice; but let them go, every man to his house." (Judges 17:19)."

(1) Lay, sojourn—The alternative view seeks to account for the whole of the facts noted above. In bald outline it is as follows: In pre-

4. The Alternative.

Mosaic times customary sacrifices were freely offered by laymen at altars of earth or stone which were not the procedure sanctuaries but places that could be used for the nonce and then abandoned. Slaughter, as shown by the instances cited, was not necessarily sacrificial. Moses did not forbid or discourage the custom he found. On the contrary, he regulated it in Ex 24:18—26; Dt 18:11 f. to prevent possible abuses. But he also superimposed two other kinds of sacrifice—certain new offerings to be brought by individuals to the religious capital and the national offerings of Nu 28, 29 and other passages. The reason is that this portion of the Law consists of teaching intrusted to the priests, embracing the procedure to be followed in these two classes of offerings, and does not refer at all to the procedure of lay sanctuaries, which was regulated by immemorial custom. Dt thunders not against the lay altars—which are never even mentioned in this connection—but against the Canaan-

It appears that the procedure of lay slaughter for food was due to the fact that the indi-fidelity of the Israelites in the wilderness (Lev 17:5—7) had led to the universal prohibition of lay slaughter for the period of the wanderings only, while it appears to be continued by Dt for those who lived near the House of God. (see 12:17, limited to the case “if the place . . . be too far from thee’)

(2) Three pilgrimfage festivals in JE—The JE legislation itself recognizes the three pilgrimage festivals of the House of God (Ex 34:22 f). One of these festivals is called “the feast of weeks, even of the bikkurim [a kind of first-fruits] of wheat harvest,” and as 20:11; 28:38 require these bikkurim to be brought to the House of God, and not to a temple altar, it follows that the pilgrimages are as firmly established here as in Dt. Thus we find a House (with a horned altar) served by priests and lay altars of earth or stone side by side in law and history till the all away. With the breaking of the continuity of tradition and practice paved the way for a new and artificial interpretation of the Law that was far removed from the intent of the lawgiver.

The Elephantine temple.—Papyri have recently been found at Elephantine which show us a Jewish community in Egypt which in 405 BC possessed a local temple. On the Wellhausen hypothesis it is usual to assume that P and Dt were still unknown and not recognized as authoritative in this community at that date, although the Deuteronomistic law of the central sanctuary goes back at least to 621. It is difficult to understand how a law which had been recognized as Divine by Jeremiah and others could still have been unknown or destitute of authority. On the alternative view this phenomenon will have been the result of an interpretation of the Law to suit the needs of an age subsequent to the death of Moses, and in circumstances he never contemplated. The Pent apparently permits sacrifice only in the land of Israel: in the altered circumstances the choice lay between interpreting the Law in this way or abandoning worship in public altogether; for the synagogue with its non-sacrificial form of public worship had not yet been invented. All old legislations have to be construed in this way to meet changing circumstances, and this example contains nothing exceptional or surprising.

SAND (סָנָד, הָדָד; ἡμός, ἀνήμος; a variant of the more usual ψάμμος, ψαμμίτης; cf ἡμός, ἀνήμος, ψάμμιτης)

Sand is primarily produced by the grinding action of waves. This is accompanied by chemical solution, with the result that the more soluble constituents of the rock diminish in amount or disappear, and the sands tend to become more or less purely silicious, silica or quartz being a common constituent of rocks and very insoluble. The rocks of Pal are so largely composed of limestone that the shore and dune sands are unusually calcareous, containing from 10 to 20 per cent of calcium carbonate. This is subject to solution and redeposition as a cement between the sand grains, binding them together to form the porous sandstone of the seashore, which is easily worked and is much used in building. See ROCK, III, (5).

Figurative: (1) Used most often as a symbol of countless multitude; esp. of the children of Israel (Gen 22:17; 32:12; 2 S 17:11; 1 K 4:20; Isa 10:22; 48:19; Jer 33:32; Hos 1:10; Rom 9:27; He 11:12); also of the enemies of Israel (Josh 11:4; Jgs 7:12; 1 S 13:5; cf Rev 20:8). Joseph laid up grain as a kind of sand of the sea (Ps 78:27; the Psalms say the thoughts of God). They are number more than the sand” (Ps 139:18); Jeremiah, speaking of the desolation of Judah, says that the number of widows is as the sand (Jer 15:8). (2) Sand is also a symbol of weight of Job 6:3; Prov 27:3), and (3) of instability (Mt 7:26).

It is a question what is meant by “the hidden treasures of the sand” in Dt 33:19.

SAND FLY, sand-fly ( böööö, kinnin [Ex 8:16 m; Wis 19:10 mm]; EV “lice.” See FLEA; GNAT; INSECTS; LICE.

SAND-GLOWING, gloö'ing. See MIRAGE.

SAND-LIZARD, sand-lizzard (סָנָד, ὁμέτ; LXX σαῦρος, σαῦρα; “lizard”; AV small): Ὁμέτ is 7th in the list of unclean “creeping things” in Lev 11:29,30, and occurs nowhere else. It is probably a skink or some species of Lacerta. See LIZARD; SNAIL.

SANHEDRIN, san’he’drin (סנֹּדהַרִין, sanhedrin), the Talmudic transcription of the Gr ἱερουσαλημίων, sunédria): The Sanhedrin was, at

1. Name and before the time of Christ, the name for the highest Jewish tribunal, of 71 members, in Jerusalem, and also for the lower tribunals, of 23 members, of which Jesus had two (Tégpfi) Ῥagascar 11 9; Ἰανός. 1 6; 11 2). It is derived from sín, “together,” and ἱερά, “seated.” In Gr and Rom literature the sestures of Sparta, Carthage, and even Rome, are so called (cf Pausan, iii.11, 2; Polyb, iii.22; Livy, 22 Cassius x.40). In Jos we meet with the word for the first time in connection with the governor Gabinius (67—55 BC), who divided the whole of Pal into 5 sunédria (Ant, XIV, v, 4; or sunanosity, BJ, i, vili, 5), and with the term sunédtrion for the high council in Jerusalem in Ant, XIV,

ALFRED ELY DAY
ix, 3-5, in connection with Herod, who, when a youth, had to appear before the sunedrin at Jerusalem to answer for his doings in Galilee. But before that date the word appears in the LXX version of Proverbs (c 130 BC), esp. in 22 10; 31 23, as an equivalent for the Mishnaic beth-din = "judgment-chamber."

In the NT the word sometimes, esp. when used in the pl. (Mt 10 17; Mk 13 9; cf Sanh 1 5), means simply "court of justice," i.e. any judicatory (Mt 5 22). But in most cases it is used to designate the supreme Jewish Court of Justice in Jerusalem, in which the processes against Our Lord was carried on, and before which the apostles (Peter, John, Stephen, and Paul) had to justify themselves (Mt 26 59; Mk 14 55; 16 1; Lk 22 66; Jn 11 47; Acts 4 15; 6 21 f; 12 16 f; 22 30; 23 1 f; 24 1). Sometimes prosbuterion (Lk 22 96; Acts 22 5) and gerousia (Acts 5 21) are substituted for sunedrin. See SANEDRIN.

In the Jewish tradition-literature the term "Sanhedrin" alternates with k'nlshta", "meeting-place" (M'phil'lah Ta'anith 10, compiled in the 1st cent. AD). The beth-din, "court of justice" (Sanh 11 134), as, according to Jewish tradition, there were two kinds of sunedria, viz. the supreme sunedrin in Jerusalem of 71 members, and lesser sunedria of 23 members, which were appointed by the supreme council, the "knesset g'dholah" (i.e. the "great Sanhedrin," or beth-din ha-g'dholah, "the great court of justice") (Midr. 5 4; Sanh 1 6), or sanhedrin g'dhol ha-yosheb b'-hashkhat ha-g'dol, "the great Sanhedrin which sits in the hall of hewn stone."

There is lack of positive historical information as to the origin of the Sanhedrin. According to Jewish tradition (cf Sanh 1 6) it was constituted by Moses (Nu 11 16-24 and History) and was reorganized by Ezra immediately after the return from exile (cf the Tg to Cant 6 1). But there is no historical evidence to show that previous to the Gr period there existed an organized aristocratic governing tribunal among the Jews. Its beginning is to be placed at the period in which Asia was convulsed by Alexander the Great and his successors.

The Hellenistic kings conceded a great amount of internal freedom to municipal communities, and Ptolemy was then practically under home rule, and was governed by the synagogues of Elders (1 Mac 12 6; 2 Mac 1 10; 4 44; 11 27; 3 Mac 1 8; cf Jos, Ant, XII, iii, 4; XIII, v, 8; M'phil'lah Ta'anith 10), the head of which was the hereditary high priest. The court was called Gerousia, which in Gr always signifies an aristocratic body (see Westermann in Paul's RE, III, 49). Subsequently this developed into the Sanhedrin.

During the Rom period (except for about 10 years at the time of Gabinus, who applied to Judea the Roman system of government; cf Marquart Römische Staatsverwaltung, 1, 501), the Sanhedrin's influence was most powerful, the internal government of the country being practically in its hands (Ant, XX, x), and it was religiously recognized as representing the Diaspora (cf Acts 9 25; 22 5; 25 13), according to Schürer (H.I.P., div.II, vol. 1, 171; GJV II, 236) the civil authority of the Sanhedrin, from the time of Archelaus, Herod the Great's son, was probably restricted to Judea proper, and for that reason, if true, this, it had no jurisdiction over Our Lord so long as He remained in Galilee (but see G. A. Smith, Jeros, 1, 416).

The Sanhedrin was abolished after the destruction of Jerusalem (70 AD). The beth-din (court of judgment) in Babatha (68-80); in Usah (80-116); in Shafrahn (140-63); in Seiphoris (163-93), in Tiberias (193-220), though regarded in the Talm (cf Rosh ha-shândib 32a) as having been the direct continuation of the Sanhedrin, had an essentially different character; it was merely an assembly of scribes, whose decisions had only a theoretical importance (cf Shâdh 9 11). The Great Sanhedrin in Jerusalem was formed (Mt 26 35-59; Mk 14 53; Acts 4 5 f; 5 21; 22 30) of high priests 3. Constitution (i.e. the acting high priest, those who had been high priests, and members of the privileged families from which the high priests were taken), elders (tribal and family heads of the people and priesthood), and scribes (i.e. legal assessors), Pharisees and Sadducees alike (cf Acts 4 1 f; 5 17-34; 23 6). In Mk 15 43; Lk 23 30, Joseph of Arimathea is called bouletou's, "councillor," i.e. member of the Sanhedrin.

According to Jos and the NT, the acting high priest was as such always head and president (Mt 26 35; Acts 5 17 f; 7 1; 9 1 f; 22 5; 23 24; 24 1; Acts, IV, vii, 17; XX, x). Caiphas is president at the trial of Our Lord, and at Paul's trial Annas is president. On the other hand, according to the Talm (esp. Hâghhâghâh 2 2), the Sanhedrin is represented as a judicial tribunal of scribes, in which one scribe acted as râšt, "prince," i.e. president, and another as abh-beth-din, father of the judgment-chamber i.e. vice-president. So far, it has not been found possible to reconcile these conflicting descriptions (see "Literature," below). Sanh 4 3 mentions the sôphrê-ka-dagaymin, "notaries," one of whom registered the reasons for acquittal, and the other those for condemnation. In the NT we read of huspârdâni, "constables" (Mt 5 25) and of the "servants of the high priest" (Mt 26 51; Mk 14 47; Jn 18 10), whom Jos describes as "enlisted from the rudest and most restless characters" (Ant, XX, viii, 8; ix, 2). Jos speaks of the "public whip," Matthew mentions "tormentors" (18 34), Luke speaks of "spies" (20 20).

The whole history of post-exilic Judaism circles round the high priests, and the priestly aristocracy always played the leading part in the Sanhedrin (cf Sanh 4 2). But the more the Pharisees grew in importance, the more were they represented in the Sanhedrin. In the time of Salome they were so powerful that "the queen ruling in name, but the Pharisees ruling in fact," (Ant, XIII, v, 6). In the time of Christ, the Sanhedrin was formally led by the Sadducean high priests, but practically ruled by the Pharisees (Ant, XVIII, i, 4)

In the time of Christ the Great Sanhedrin at Jerusalem enjoyed a very high measure of independence. It exercised not only civil jurisdiction, 4. Jurisdiction, according to Jewish law, but also, in some degree, criminal. It had administrative authority and could order arrests by its own officers of the Temple (Mt 26 47; Mk 14 43; Acts 4 3; 5 17 f; 9 2; cf Sanh 1 5). It was empowered to judge cases which did not involve capital punishment, which latter required the confirmation of the Roman procurator (Ant 19 31; cf Jeros Sanh 1 1; 7 2 p 24); Jos, Ant, XX, 15, 1. But, as a rule, the procurator arranged his judgment in accordance with the demands of the Sanhedrin.

For one offence the Sanhedrin could put to death, on their own authority, even a Rom citizen, namely, in the case of a Gentile passing the fence which divided the inner court of the Temple from that of the Gentiles (BJ, VI, ii, 4; Midr. 111 3; cf Acts 21 28). The only case of capital punishment in connection with which the superintendence of Our Lord. The stoning of Stephen (Acts 7 54 ff) was probably the illegal act of an enraged multitude.
The Talmudic tradition names "the hall of hewn stone," which, according to Middath 5,4, was on the south side of the great court, as the seat of the Great Sanhedrin (Peh ha-shem ha-bondim). But the last sittings of the Sanhedrin were held in the city outside the Temple area (Sanh. 141a; Shabath 15a; Peh ha-shem ha-bondim 31b; 'Ahadahb zarah 8c). Jos also mentions the place where the boulevards, "the councillors," met as the Beth ha-Ben, one of David's (2 S 21 18; 1 Ch 20 4). It is supposed by some that he was the son of the giant Goliath, but this is not proved. In 1 Ch 20 4, the same person is called "Sippai."

SAPH, saf, (�ח, saph, B; צח, safh, A, צוח, Saphh): A Philistine, one of the four champions of the race of Rapha ("giant") who was slain by the Shibeon, one of David's heroes (2 S 21 18; 1 Ch 20 4). It is supposed by some that he was the son of the giant Goliath, but this is not proved.

SAPHTIAH, saq-t'ia (צbestos, Saphthias), Saphthias, B, צbestos, Sapphatias; omitted in A: Name of one of the families of returning exiles (1 Esd 5 34) = "Shephatah" in Ezr 8 8. It Saphthas (1 Esd 5 34) = Saphat (6 9), as would appear, then part of the family went up with Zerubbabel and part with Ezra.

SAPPHIA, saq-t'ia (צbestos, Saphthias, B, צbestos, Sapphatias): Wife of Ananias (Acts 5 1-10). See ANANIAS, (1).

SAPPHIR, saq-t'ia (שַׁפָּר, shaphir). See SAPHIR.

SAPPHUTHI, saq-t'ia (שַׁפָּרְתִי, saft-thi) (A and Fritzsche, Saphethi, Saphthi, [B and Swete]; Saphethi; AV Sapheth): Name of one of the families of the sons of the servants of Solomon (1 Esd 5 33) = "Shephathia" in Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59.

SAPPHIRA, saq-t'ia (נַפְּרַא, shappira); Aram. for either "beautiful" or "sapphire"; [Saphthias, Sapphira]: Wife of Ananias (Acts 5 1-10). See ANANIAS, (1).

SAPPHIR, saq-t'ia. See STONES, Precious.

SARABIAS, sar-a-bias (צbestos, Saphthias, Sarabias): One of the Levites who taught and expounded the Law for Ezra (1 Esd 9 48) = "Shebrehai" in Neh 8 7, probably identical with the "Azebebias" in 1 Esd 8 47 (Ezr 8 18).

SARAH, sar-a, SARAI, sar-a'í: (1) In Gen 17 15 the woman who up to that time has been known as Sarai (שָׁרָי, saray; סָּרָה, Sora) receives by Divine command the name Sarah (שָׁרָה, sarâh; שַׁפָּרָה, Saphra). (This last form in Gr preserves the ancient doubling of the r, lost in the Heb and the Eng. forms.)

The former name appears to be derived from the root as Sarah, if, indeed, Gen 32 28 is intended as an etymology of Israel. "She that strives," a contentious person, is a name that might be given to a child at birth (of Hos 12 13; Jer 29 5, 17), or later when the child's character developed; in Gen 16 6 and 21 10 a contentious character appears. Yet comparison with the history of her husband's name (see ARNAB, G. von der) is not to operate solely upon the basis of the Heb language. Sarai was the one who first bore a child with her from Mesopotamia. On the other hand there can be little doubt that the name Sarah, which she received when her son was promised, means "princess," a fem. form of the extremely common title sar, used by the Semites to designate a ruler of greater or lesser rank.
In the verse following the one where this name is conferred, it is declared of Sarah that "kings of peoples shall be of her" (Gen 17:16).

We are introduced to Sarai in Gen 11:29. She is here mentioned as the wife that Abraham "took," while still in Ur of the Chaldees, that is, while Abraham was in Mesopotamia. It is immediately added that "Sarai was barren; she had no child." By this simple remark in the outset of his narrative, the writer sounds the motif that is to be developed in all the sequel. When the migration to Haran occurs, Sarai is named along with Abram and Lot as accompanying Terah. It has been held by the authors (or authors) of ch 11 knew nothing of the relationship announced in 20:12. But there can be no proof of such ignorance, even on the assumption of diversity of authorship in the two passages.

Sarai's career as described in ch 11 was not dependent on her being the daughter of Terah. Terah had other descendants who did not accompany him. Her movements were determined by her being Abram's wife. It appears, however, that she was a daughter of Terah by a different mother from the mother of Abram. The language of the OT would indeed admit of her being Abram's niece, but the fact that there was but 10 years' difference in age (Gen 20:17) renders this hypothesis less probable. Marriage with half-sisters seems to have been uncommon in antiquity (see the OT Deut 27:29-30).

This double relationship suggested to Abraham the expedient that he twice used when he lacked faith in God to protect his life and in cowardice sought his own safety at the price of his wife's honor. The first of these occasions was in the earlier period of their wanderings (ch 12). From Canaan they went down into Egypt. Sarai, though above 60 years of age according to the chronology of the sacred historian, made the impression on the Egyptians by her beauty that Abraham had anticipated, and the result was her temporary admission to the royal palace. But this was in direct contravention of the purpose of God for His own kingdom. The earthly majesty of Pharaoh had to bow before the Divine majesty, which plagued him and secured the stranger's exodus, thus leading to the exodus when Abraham's and Sarah's seed "spoiled the Egyptians."

We meet Sarah next in the narrative of the birth of Ishmael and of Isaac. Though 14 years separated the two births, they are closely associated in the story because their destiny paralleled each other's in barrenness. Sarah was born as the wife of Abraham and Sarah.

Such was in fact the position of Ishmael later. But the language of the 12th would argue the vindictive jealousy of the mistress and led to a painful scene of unjustified enmity between her and Sarah. But later, returning God's blessing she humbly herself before Sarah, and bore Ishmael in her own father's house. Here he remained the sole and rightful heir, until the miracle of Isaac's birth disappointed all human expectations and resulted in the ultimate expulsion of Hagar and her son.

The change of name from Sarai to Sarah when Isaac was promised has already been noted. Sarah's laudation in history when she hears the promise is of course associated with the origin of the name of Isaac, but it serves also to emphasize the miraculous character of his birth, coming as it does after his parents are both so "well stricken in age" as to make any such assurance appear impossible.

Before the birth of this child of promise, however, Sarah is again exposed, through the cowardice of her husband, to dishonor and ruin. Abimelech, king of Gerar, desiring to be allied by marriage with a man of Abraham's power, sends for Sarah, where she knows only as Abraham's sister, and for the second time she takes her place in the harem of a prince. But the Divine promise is not to be thwarted, even by persistent human weakness and sin. In a dream God reveals to Abraham the true state of the case, and Sarah is restored to her husband with an indemnity. Thereupon the long-delayed son is born, the jealous mother secures the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael, and her career culminates in the birth of a close at the age of 127, at Hebron, long time her home. The grief and anxiety are broadly displayed in ch 23, in which she seeks and obtains a burying-place for his wife. She is thus the first to be interred in that cave of the field of Machpelah, which was to be the common resting-place of the fathers and mothers of the future Israel.

The character of Sarah is of mingled light and shade. On the one hand we have seen that she was from Ur and his mother (Sapatas, in art.), Geschichte der Geschlechter Israels, 131). Yet on the other hand we see in Sarah, as the NT writers point out (He 11:11; 1 Pet 3:6), one who through a long life of companionship and as a son of Abraham and the promises with whom God had shared his hope in God, his faith in the promises, and his power to become God's agent for achieving what was humanly impossible. In fact, to Sarah is ascribed a sort of spiritual maternity, correlated with Abraham's position as "father of the faithful": "for all women are declared to be the (spiritual) daughters of Sarah, who like her are adorned in "the hidden man of the heart," and who are "doers of good" and "bearers of no terror" (1 Pet 1:16, literally rendered). That in spite of her outbreak about Hagar and Ishmael she was in general "in subjection to her husband" and of "a meek and quiet spirit," appears from her husband's genuine grief at her deacease, and still more clearly from her son's prolonged mourning for her (Gen 24:67; cf 17:17 and 25:1 with 25:20). And He who maketh even the wrath of man to praise Him used even Sarah's jealous anger to accomplish His purpose that "the son of the freewoman," Isaac, "born through promise," should alone inherit that promise (Gal 4:22-31).

Apart from the three NT passages already cited, Sarah is alluded to only in Isa 51:2 ("Sarah that bare you," as the mother of the nation), in Rom 4:19 ("the deadness of Sarah's womb"), and in Gal 3:9, 9.9, where God's promise in Gen 18:10 is quoted. Yet her existence and her history are of course presupposed wherever allusion is made to the stories of Abraham and of Isaac.

To many modern critics Sarah supplies, by her name, a welcome argument in support of the mythical view of Abraham. She has been held to be the local name to whom the case near Haran was sacred: or, the deity whose consort was worshipped in Arabia under the title Dusares, i.e. Husband-of-Sarah; or, the female associate of Sin the moon-god, worshipped at Haran. On these views the student will do well to consult Baethgen, Keitsch, 94, 95, and, for the most recent point of view, Grellmann's art., "Saga und Geschichte in den Patriarchenzeit." ZAW, 1910, and Eerdmans, Al- testamentliche Geschichten, 11, 13.

(2) The daughter of Raguel, and wife of Tobias (Tob 3:7,17, etc.). See Tobit, Book of.

SARAIAS, sar-a'yas, sar'-yas (Ezappas, Saraias, Lat. Sarimus).

(1) = Saraias, the high priest in the reign of Zedekiah (1 Esd 5:5, cf 1 Ch 6:14).

(2) Sares the father of Ezra (2 Esd 1:1) = "Saraias" in Ezr 7:1, sometimes identified with SARASAI under (1). He is probably identical with the "Azaraias" of 1 Esd 8 1. (3) AV=RV "Azaraias" (1 Esd 8 1). SARAMEL, sar'me-l: AV=RV ASARAMEL (q.v.). SARAPH, sar'af, sar'af (סָרָפָך, sârāph, "noible one"); cf סָרָפָך, sârāph, "burn," "shine"): A descendant of Judah through Shelah (1 Ch 4 22). SARCHEDONUS, sar-ked'o-nus (B S, Σαρχέδονος, Sarchedonos, A, Σαρκέδων, Sarcheddn, but Σαρχέδωνος, Sarchedonos in 1 Tim 2 22): An incorrect spelling, both in AV and RV, for Sarcheddonus in Tab 1 21 f, another form of Esar-haddon. SARDEUS, sar-dē'us: AV=RV ZARDEUS (q.v.). SARIDINE, sar'din, sar'din, SARDIUS. See Stones, Precious. SARDIS, sar'dis (Σάρδης, Sardés): Sardis is of special interest to the student of Herodotus and Xenophon, for these two Athenians, the brother of the Persian king Artaxerxes, was exiled from there Xerxes invaded Greece and Cyrus marched against his brother Artaxerxes; it is also of interest to the student of early Christian history as the home of one of the Seven Churches of Revelation (1 11; Rev 3 2). It was the oldest and most important cities of Asia Minor, and until 549 BC, the capital of the kingdom of Lydia. It stood on the northern slope of Mt. Tmolus; its acropolis occupied one of the spurs of the mountain. At the base flowed the river Pactolus which served as a moat, rendering the city practically impregnable. Through the failure to attack, however, the acropolis had been successfully scaled in 549 BC by a Median soldier, and in 218 by a Cretan (cf Rev 3 2 3). Because of its strength during the Persian period, the satrap here made their homes. However, the city was burned by the Ionians in 501 BC, but it was quickly rebuilt and regained its importance. In 394 BC it surrendered to Alexander the Great who gave it independence, but its period of independence was brief, for 12 years later in 322 BC it was taken by Antigonus. In 301 BC, it fell into the possession of the Seleucid kings who made it the residence of their governors. It became free again in 190 BC, when it formed a part of the empire of Pergamum, and later of the Roman province of Asia. In 17 AD, when it was destroyed by an earthquake, the Roman emperor Tiberius remitted the taxes of the people and rebuilt the city, and in his honor the citizens of that and of neighboring towns erected a large monument, but Sardis never recovered its former importance (cf Rev 3 12). Again in 295 AD, after the Roman province of Asia was broken up, Sardis became the capital of Lydia, and during the early Christian age it was the home of a bishop. The city continued to flourish until 1402, when it was so completely destroyed by Tamerlane that it was never rebuilt. Among the ruins there now stands a small village called Sert, a corruption of its ancient name. The ruins may be reached by rail from Smyrna, on the way to Philadelphia.

The ancient city was noted for its fruits and wool, and for its temple of the goddess Cybele, whose worship resembled that of Diana of Ephesus. Its wealth was also partly due to the gold which was found in the sand of the Pactolus river and was here worked, and silver coins were first struck. During the Roman period its coins formed a beautiful series, and are found in abundance by the peas-ant, who till the surrounding fields. The ruins of the buildings which stood at the base of the hill have now been covered over by the dirt that has washed down from above. The hill upon which the acropolis stood measures 900 ft. high; the triple walls still surround it. The more imposing of the ruins are on the lower slope of the hill, and among them the temple of Cybele is the most interesting, yet only two of its many stone columns are still standing. Equally imposing is the necropolis of the city, which is at a distance of two hours' ride from Sard, S. of the Gryazan lakes. The modern name of this necropolis is Bin Teye or Thousand Mounds, because of the large group of great mounds in which were buried many of the mounds were long ago excavated and plundered.

Coin of Sardis.

We quote the following from the Missionary Herald (Boston, Mass., August, 1911, pp. 361-62): Dr. C. C. Tracy, of Marsovan, has made a visit to ancient Sardis and the environs of Ephesus. Professor Butler, of Princeton University, who is uncovering the ruins of that famous city of the past. Already rich "finds" have been made; among the recoveries of a temple of Artemis, indicating a building of the same stupendous character as those at Ephesus and Baalbek, and the necropolis from whose tombs were unearthed three thousand relics, including utensils, ornaments of gold and precious stones, mirrors, etc. What chiefly impressed Dr. Tracy was the significance of those Seven Churches of Asia, of which Sardis holds one. "When I think of the myriads of various nationality and advanced civilization for whose evangelization these churches were responsible, the messages to the Christian communities occupying the splendid strategic centers filled me with awe. While establishing amid the splendid buildings of civilization they were set as candlesticks in the midst of gross spiritual darkness. Did they fulfill their mission?"

One of Dr. Butler's recoveries is the marble throne of the Bishop of Sardis; looking upon it the message to Sardis recurs to mind. A fact of current history questions the precise meaning of the visitor's appreciation of the word to "the angel" of that church. "Yonder among the mountains overlooking Sardis there is a robber gang led by the notorious Chakirjali. He rules in the mountains; no government force can take him. Again and again he swoops down like an eagle out of the sky, in one quarter of the region or another. From time immemorial these mountains have been the haunts of robbers; very likely it was so when Rev was written. 'I will come upon thee as a thief.' In each case the message was addressed to 'the angel of the church.' Over every church in the world there is a spirit representing it; in Sard it was a spirit representing that church and by whose name it can be addressed. The messages are as vital as they were at the first. 'He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.'"

SAREPTA, sa-rep'ta (Σαρεπτα, Sarepta): The name in Lit 24 26 AV, following the Gr, of the Phoen town to which Eliah was sent in the time of the great famine, in order to save the lives of a widow and her son (1 K 17 9.10). RV adopts the form of the name based upon the Heb, and so in the OT: ZAREPHATH (q.v.).

SARD, sar'd (סָרָד, sârād; B, "Essenehald, Essedokkoh, Sebedok, Seddonik, A, "Sârâd, Sarâd, Sarâd, Sarâd"): A place on the southern border of Zebulun to the W. of Chisloth-tabor (Josh 19 10.12). It is mentioned but not identified in Onom. Probably we should read "Sadad," and in that case may with Conder locate it at Tell Shaddad, an artificial mound with some modern ruins and good springs, which stands on the plain, about 5 miles W. of Isdud.

SARGON, săr'gon (722–705 BC): The name of this ruler is written šar-šar-ra in the OT, šar-ušū in the cuneiform inscriptions, Aprâ, Arnu, in the LXX, and Ἀργός, Ἀρκανός, in the Pseudo-Cyprian Canon. Sargon is mentioned but once by name in the OT (Isa 20:1), when he sent his Tartan (tartana) against Ashdod, but he is referred to in 2 K 17:6 as "the king of Assyria" who carried Israel into captivity.

Shalmanesser V had laid siege to Samaria and besieged it three years. But shortly before or very soon after its capitulation, Sargon, perhaps being responsible for the king's death, overthrew the dynasty, and in his annals credited himself with the capture of the city and the deportation of its inhabitants. Whether he assumed the name of the famous ancient founder of the Accad dynasty is not known.

Sargon at the beginning of his reign was confronted with a serious situation in Babylon. Merodach-baladan of Kish, who paid tribute to previous rulers, on the change of dynasty had himself proclaimed king, New Year's Day, 721 BC. At Dur-iblu, Sargon fought with the forces of Merodach-baladan and his ally Khumbangash of Elam, but although he claimed a victory the result was apparently indecisive. Rebellions followed in other parts of the kingdom.

In 720 Isuru (or Ya'u-bi'di), king of Hamath, formed a coalition against Sargon with Hanno of Gaza, Sib'u of Egypt, and with the cities Arpad, Simrra, Damascus, and Samaria. He claims that Sib'u fled, and that he captured and flayed Isuru; burned Karkar, and carried Hanno captive to Assyria. After destroying Raphash, he carried away 903 inhabitants to Assyria.

In the following year Ararat was invaded and the Hittite Carehemish fell before his armies. The territory of Russian, king of Ararat, as well as a part of Mehitene became Assyrian provinces.

In 710 Sargon directed his attention to Merodach-baladan, who no longer enjoyed the support of Elam, and whose rule over Babylon had not been popular with his subjects. He was driven out from Babylon and also from his former capital Bit-yakin, and Sargon himself crowned as the shakanak of Babylon.

In 706 the new city called Dür-Sharrukin was dedicated as his residence. A year later he was murdered. It was during his reign that the height of Assyrian ascendency had been reached.

SAROTHIE, sa'sô-thiô (A, סרوثי, סרוחתי; B and Swete, סרוטה, סרוהתי): Name of a family of "the sons of the servants of Solomon" who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5:34); it is wanting in the lists in Ezra 2:57; Neh 7:59.

SARSECHIM, sâr'Se-kím (םָרֹשְׁキ, sarškîm): A prince of Nebuchadnezzar, present at the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in the 11 th year of Zedekiah (Jer 39:3). The VSS with their various readings—"Naboushebar," "Nabousarach," "Sarscheim"—point to a corrupt text. The best emendation is the reading "Nôbôhashibôn" (= Nabûhashû-manni, "Nebô delivers me"); this is based on the reading in Jer 39:13.

SARUCH, săr'rûk (Σαροχή, Sarochè, Σαρούχ, Saroulê): AV; Gr form of Sarug (thus Lk 3:35 R.V.).

SATAN, sâ'tân (שָׁטָן, šâ'tân, "adversary," from the vb. שָׂתָן, šatân, "to lie in wait" [as adversary]; שָׁתָנוּ, šatānu, šatanā, "adversary," סדבולים, sdibölôs, "devil," "adversary" or "accuser," וַתַּזְגִּיר, vatăzgîr [altogether unclassical and un-Greek] [used once in Rev 12:10], "accuser").

I. Definition.—A created but superhuman, personal, evil, world-power, represented in Scripture as the adversary both of God and man.

II. Scriptural Facts concerning Satan.—The most important of these are the Heb and Gr equivalents noticed above. These words are used in the general sense justified by the fact of Satan's etymological significance. It is applied even to the angel of the Lord (Nu 22:22; cf. 1 S 29:4; 2 S 19:22; Ps 109:6, etc.). The word "Satan" is used 241 in the OT. In Job (1:6) and Zec (3:1) it has the prefixed definite article. In all cases but one when the article is omitted it is used in its general sense. One exception is 1 Ch 21:1 (cf. 2 S 24:1), where the word is generally conceded to be used as a proper name. This meaning is fixed in NT times. We are thus enabled to note in the term "Satan" (and Devil) the growth of a word from a general term to an appellation and later to a proper name. All the other names of Satan save only these two are descriptive titles. In addition to these two principal names a number of others derive specific enumeration. Tempter (Mt 4:3; 1 Thes 3:5); Beelzebub (Mt 12:24); Enemy (Mt 13:39); Evil One (Mt 13:19-38); 1 Jn 2:13, 14; 3:12, and particularly 5:18); Belial (2 Cor 6:15); Adversary (ἀπάθειας, antipathìas), (1 Pet 5:8); Deceiver (lit. "the one who deceives") (Rev 12:9); Dragon (Great) (Rev 12:5); Father of Lies (Jn 8:44); Murderer (Jn 8:44); Sinner (1 Jn 3:8)—these are isolated references occurring from 1 to 3 each. In the vast majority of passages (70 out of 83) either Satan or Devil is used.

Satan is consistently represented in the NT as the enemy both of God and man. The popular notion is that Satan is the enemy of 2. Charac- man and active in misleading and ter of Satan cursing humanity because of his intense hatred and opposition to God. Mt 13:39 would seem to point in this direction, but if one were to venture an opinion in a region where there are not enough facts to warrant a conviction, it would be that the general tenor of Scripture indicates quite the contrary, namely, that Satan's jealousy and hatred of men has led him to attempt to love and to destroy, to good works. The fundamental moral description of Satan is given by Our Lord when He describes Satan as the "evil one" (Mt 13:19,38; cf. Isaias's description of Jehovah as the "Holy One," 1:4 and often); that is, the one whose nature and will are given to evil. More, evil is his controlling attribute. It is evident that this description could not be applied to Satan as originally created. Ethical evil cannot be created. It is the creation of each free will for itself. We are not told in definite terms how Satan became the evil one, but certainly it could be no other process than a fall, whereby, in the mystery of free personality, an evil will takes the place of a good one.

The world-wide and age-long works of Satan are to be traced to one predominant motive. He hates both God and man and does all that 3. Works in him lies to defeat God's plan of Satan grace and to establish and maintain a kingdom of evil, in the seduction and ruin of man. The battle of the Spirit and the flesh of the Bible is nowhere more strikingly exhibited than in its treatment of the work of Satan. Not only is the Bible entirely free from the extravagances of popular Satanology, which is full of absurd stories concerning Satan's appearances, the movements of Satan among men, but it exhibits a dependable accuracy and consistency of statement which is most reassuring. Almost nothing is said concerning Satanic agency other than wicked men who misuse the power. The controversy with His opponents concerning exorcism (Mt 3:22; and John 4) Our Lord rebuts their slanderous assertion that He is in league with Satan by the simple proposition that Satan does not work against himself. But in so saying He does far more than refute this slander. He definitely aligns the Bible against the popular idea that a man may make a definite and conscious personal alliance with Satan for any purpose whatever. The agent of Satan is always a victim. Also the hint contained in this discussion that Satan has a kingdom, together with a few other not very definite allusions, are all that we have to go upon in this direction. Nor are we taught anywhere that Satan is able to exert direct personal physical power over persons in the lives of men. It is true that in Lk 13:16 Our Lord speaks of the woman who was bowed over as one "whom Satan has bound, lo, these eighteen years," and that in 2 Cor 12:7 Paul speaks of his infirmity as a "messenger of Satan sent to buffet him." Paul also speaks (1 Thess 2:18) of Satan's hindering him from visiting the church at Thessalonica. A careful study of these related passages (together with the prologue of Job) will reveal the fact that Satan's direct agency in the physical world is very limited. Satan may be said to be implicated in all the disasters and woes of human life, in so far as they are more or less directly contingent upon sin (see particularly He 2:14). On the contrary, it is perfectly evident that Satan's power consists principally in his ability to deceive. It is interesting and characteristic that according to the Bible Satan is fundamentally a liar and his kingdom is a kingdom founded upon lies and deceit. The description of Satan therefore corresponds in every important particular to the general description of emphasis upon truth. "The truth shall make you free" (Jn 8:32)—this is the way of deliverance from the power of Satan.

Now it would seem that to make Satan primarily the devil who would make men an innocent victim and thus relax the moral issue is. But a looking to the Bible man is particeps criminis in the process of his own deception. He is deceived only because he ceases to love the truth and comes first to lie and then to believe a lie (2 Cor 1:10). This really goes to the very bottom of the problem of temptation. Men are not tempted by evil, per se, but by a good which can be obtained only at the cost of doing wrong. The whole power of sin, at least in its final essence, consists in this fundamental falsehood that any good is really attainable by wrongdoing. Since temptation consists in this attack upon the moral sense, man is constitutionally guarded against deceit, and it is morally culpable in allowing himself to be deceived. The temptation of Our Lord Himself through the clearest possible light upon the methods ascribed to Satan. The temptation was addressed to Christ's consciousness of Divine sonship; it was a deceitful attack emphasizing the good, minimizing or covering up the evil; indeed, twisting evil into good. It was a deliberate, malignant attempt to obscure the truth and induce to evil through the acceptance of falsehood. The attack broke against a loyalty to truth which made self-deceit, and consequently self-deceit, self-deceit, and was punctured by the truth and the temptation lost its power (see Temptation of Christ). This incident reveals one of the methods of Satan—by immediate suggestion as in the case of Judas (Lk 22:3). In Lk 22:11-23, Satan's devices, (2 Cor 11:11) include human agents. Those who are given over to evil and who persuade others to evil are children and servants of Satan (see Mt 16:23; Mk 13:33; Lk 4:5; Acts 13:10; 1 Cor 3:15, 19:20). In the combination of passages here brought together, it is clearly evident that Satan is the instigator and fomenter of that spirit of lawlessness which exhibits itself as hatred both of truth and right, and which operated so widely and so disastrously in human life.

The history of Satan, including that phase of it which remains to be realized, can be set forth only along the most general lines. He belongs to the angelic order of beings. He is by nature one of the sons of Elohim (Job 1:6). He has fallen, and by virtue of his personal forcefulness has become the leader of the anarchic forces of wickedness. As a free being he has merged his life in evil and has become altogether and hopelessly evil. As a being of high intelligence he has gained great power and has exercised a wide sway over other beings. As a created being the utmost range of his power lies within the compass of that which is permitted. It is, therefore, hedged in by the providential government of God and essentially limited. The Biblical emphasis upon the element of falsehood in the career of Satan might be taken to imply that his kingdom may be less in extent than appears. At any rate, he is confined to the cosmic sphere and to a limited portion of time. It was in the closely related passages 2 Pet 2:4 and Jude 6 it is affirmed that God cast the angels, when they sinned, down to Tartarus and committed them to pits of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment. This both refers to the constant Divine control of these insurgent forces and also points to their final and utter destruction. The putting of Satan in bonds is evidently both constant and progressive. The Scriptural doctrine of the evil one and its ultimate overthrow are foreshadowed in the Book of Job (chs 38–41), where Jeh’s power extends even to the symbolized spirit of evil.

According to synoptic tradition, Our Lord in the crisis of temptation immediately following the baptism (Mk 1:12) is shown in the wilderness confronting Satan in his own personal adversary. This preliminary contest did not last but was the prelude of a complete victory. According to Lk 1 (18), when the Seventy returned from their mission flushed with victory over the power of evil, Jesus said: “Saw Satan enter (not ‘fallen’; see Plummer, “Lk,” IFC, in loc.) as lightnings forth. In fact, there are no precedents for the power of evil Christ beheld in vision the downfall of Satan. In connection with the coming of the Hellenists who wished to see Him, Jesus assured (Jn 12:31), “Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out.” In view of His approaching passion He says again (Jn 14:30), “The prince of the world cometh: and he hath nothing in me.” Once again in connection with the Son of God’s temptation, the Spirit would convert the world of judgment, “because the prince of this world hath had power over you” (Jn 14:15). It is said that Christ took upon Himself human nature in order “that through death He might destroy him who has the power of death, that is, the devil.” In 1 Jn 2:8 it is said, “To this end was the Son of God manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil.” In Rev 12:10 it is asserted, in connection with Christ’s ascension, that Satan was cast to the earth and his angels was snatched away to him. According to the passage immediately following (12:10–12), this casting down was not complete or final in the sense of annihilating his activities altogether, but it involves the potential and certain triumph of God as the final and equally certain defeat of Satan. In 1 Jn 2:13 the young men are addressed as those who “have overcome the evil one.” In Rev 20 the field of the future is covered in the story of Satan’s conviction and “bound a thousand years”: then loosed “for a little time,” and then finally “cast into the lake of fire.”

A comparison of these passages will convince the careful student that while we cannot construct a definite chronological program for the career of Satan, we are clear in the chief points. He is limited, judged, condemned, imprisoned, reserved for judgment from the beginning. The outcome is certain though the process may be tedious and slow. The victory of Christ is the defeat of Satan; first, for Himself as Leader and Saviour of men (Jn 14:30); then, for believers (Lk 22:31; Acts 26:16; Rom 16:20; Jas 4:7; 1 Jn 2:13; 5:18); and, finally, for the whole world (Rev 20:10). The work of Christ has already destroyed the empire of Satan.

III. General Considerations.—There are, no doubt, serious difficulties in the way of accepting the doctrine of a personal, superhuman, evil power as Satan is described to be. It is doubtful, however, whether these difficulties may not be due, at least in part, to a misunderstanding of the doctrine and certain of its implications. In addition, it must be acknowledged, that whatever difficulties there may be in the teaching, they cannot be fully met by the vague and irrational skepticism which denies without investigation. There are difficulties involved in any view of the world. To say the least, some problems are met by the view of a superhuman, evil world-power. In this section certain general considerations are urged with a view to lessening difficulties keenly felt by some minds. Necessarily, certain items gathered in the foregoing section are here emphasized again.

The Scriptural doctrine of Satan is nowhere systematically developed. For materials in this field we are shut up to scattered and incidental references. These passages, which even in the aggregate are not numerous, tell us what we need to know concerning the nature, history, kingdom and works of Satan, but offer scant satisfaction to the merely speculative temper. The comparative lack of development in this field is due partly to the fact that the Bib. writers are primarily interested in the reality and influence of evil; and partly to the fact that in the OT system the doctrine of Satan is found only as an auxiliary in the providential world-process which centers in Christ. It is a significant fact that the statements concerning Satan become numerous and definite only in the NT. The daylight of the Christian revelation was necessary in order to uncover the lurking foe, dimly disclosed but by no means fully known in the earlier revelation. The disclosure of Satan is, in form at least, historical, not dogmatic.

In the second place, the relationship of Satan to God, already emphasized, must be kept constantly in mind. The doctrine of Satan and God merges in the general doctrine concerning angels (see ANGELS). It has often been pointed out that the personal characteristics of God were the greatest temptation for Satan. It is necessary, however, to stress that the temptation of men is also a part of his providence, or that in the interval between the documents the personality of the tempter has more clearly emerged. In this case the account in Ch would nearly approach the NT teaching. In the Book of Job (1:6), however, Satan is among the Sons of God and his assaults upon Job are Divinely permitted. In Zec (3:1.2) Satan is also a servant of Jehovah. In both these passages there is the hint of opposition between Jehovah and Satan. In the former instance Satan assails unsuccessfully the character of one whom Jehovah honors; while in the latter Jehovah explicitly rebukes Satan for his attitude toward Israel (see G. A. Smith, BTP, II, 316f). The unveiling of Satan as a world-power was first done in the NT, and with this fuller teaching the symbolic treatment of temptation in Gen is connected. There is a sound pedagogical reason, from the viewpoint of revelation, for this earlier withholding of the whole truth concerning Satan. In the early stages of religious thinking it would seem to be difficult, if not impossible, to hold the sovereignty of God without attributing to His agency those evils in the world which are more or less directly connected with the world-power. (cf. Is 1:17; Am 3:6). The OT sufficiently emphasizes man’s responsibility for his own evil deeds, but superhuman evil is brought upon him from above. “When wilful souls have to be misled, the spirit who does so, as in Abuh’s case, comes from above” (G. A. Smith, op. cit., 317). The progressive revelation of God’s character and purpose, which more and more imperatively demands that the origin of moral evil, and consequently natural evil, must be traced to the created will in opposition to the Divine, leads to the late development of the doctrine of a morally fallen being whose conquest the Divine Power in history is pledged. There is, also, the distinct possibility that in the significant transition from the Satan of the OT to that of the NT we have the outlines of a biography and an indication of the way by which angel fell.
A third general consideration, based upon data given in the earlier section, should be urged in the same connection. In the NT delineation of Satan, his limitations are essentially clearly set forth. He is superhuman, Limited but not in any sense Divine. His activities are cosmic, but not universal or transcendent. He is a created being. His power is definitely circumscribed. He is doomed to final destruction as a world-power. His entire career is that of a secondary and dependent being who is permitted, though not created by God, to represent the scope of power—a temptation of activity (Lk 4:6).

These three general considerations have been grouped in this way because they dispose of three objections which are current against the doctrine of Satan.

4. Conclusions

(1) The first is, that it is mythological in origin. That it is not dogmatic is a priori evidence against this hypothesis. Mythology is primitive dogma. There is no evidence of a theology or philosophy of evil in the Bible, treatment of Satan. Moreover, while the Scriptural doctrine is unsystematic in form, it is rigidly limited in scope and everywhere essentially consistent. Even in the Apocalypse, where naturally more scope is allowed to the imagination, the scope of Satan's influence and power is correspondingly definite, item for item, to the intellectual sainess and ethical earnestness of the Bible, world-view as a whole. It is, therefore, not mythological. The restraint of chastened imagination, not the extravagance of the theological fancy, is in evidence throughout the entire Bible, treatment of the subject. Even the use of terms current in mythology (as perhaps Gen 3:13), as a means of conveying the idea conceived in the OT, is not more than a literary clothing of Satan in order to make it more acceptable to the Jews, and thus to mitigate and discourage forces.

(2) The second objection is that the doctrine is due to the influence of Perso dualism (see Persian Religion; Zoroastrianism). The answer to this is plain, on the basis of facts already adduced. The Bible, doctrine of Satan is not dualistic. Satan's empire had a beginning, it will have a definite and permanent end. Satan is God's great enemy in the cosmic sphere, but he is God's creation, exists by Divine will, and his power is commensurate with God's. Satan awaits his doom. Weiss says (concerning the NT representation of conflict between God and the powers of evil): "There lies in this no Manichean dualism, but only the deepest experience of the work of redemption as the definite destruction of the power from which all sin in the world of men proceeds" (Bib. Theol. NT, ET, II, 272; cf. G. A. Smith, op. cit., II, 318).

(3) The third objection is practically the same as the second, but addressed directly to the doctrine itself, apart from the question of its origin, namely, that it destroys the unity of God. The answer to this also is a simple negative. To some minds the reality of evil may be dualistic and therefore untenable. But a true doctrine of unity makes room for other than God's—all of those beings upon whom God has bestowed freedom. Herein stands the doctrine of sin and Satan. The doctrine of Satan no more militates against the unity of God than the idea, so necessary to morality and religion alike, of other created wills set in opposition to God's. Just as the conception of Satan merges, in one direction, in the general doctrine of angels, so, in the other, it blends with the broad and difficult subject of evil (cf. "Satan," HDB, IV, 412n). LITERATURE—All standard works on Bib. Theology, as well as Dicets, etc. treat with more or less thoroughness the doctrine of Satan. The German theologians of the more evangelical type, such as Weiss, Lange, Marcksen, Martensen (Danish), Dorner, while admitting a tendency toward excessive speculation, discern the deeper aspects of the doctrine. Of monographs known to the reviewer none are to be recommended. It is a subject on which the Bible is its own best interpreter.

SATAN, DEPTHS OF (τὰ βαθαῖα τοῦ Σατάνα, tā bathēa tou Satanaí): Found in Rev 22:1, and has reference to false teaching at Thyatira. It is a question (that perhaps may not be decided) whether this χάσαθεν Σατάνα, "chastened Satan," represents the claim of the false teachers, or is thrown in by the Lord. Did those false teachers claim to know "the depths" of Satan? Or was it that they claimed to know "the depths" of Deity, and the Lord said it was rather "the depths of Satan" when either case the antithesis to "depths of Satan" is "depths of God," as referred to in Rom 11:33; 1 Cor 2:10.

SATAN, SYNAGOGUE OF: The expression occurs neither in the Heb nor in the Gr of the OT, nor in Apoc. Three passages in the OT and one in Apoc suggest the idea conveyed in the expression. In Nu 14:27, 35, Jeh expresses His wrath against "the evil congregation" (LXX σωφρονή συνάγωγα, sunagōgē poroi, to which He threatens punishment). In the Wilderness. In Ps 21:21, 22, we find, "A company of evil doers (LXX σωφρονή συνάγωγα, sunagōgē poroi) who have inclosed me." In Sir 16:6, we read, "In the congregation of sinner, LXX σωφρονή συναγωγή, sunagōgē sunagōgē, shall a fire be kindled.

Only in the NT occurs the phrase "synagogue of Satan," and here only twice (Rev 2:9; 3:9). Three observations are evident as to who constituted the "synagogue of Satan" in Smyrna and Philadelphia. (1) They claimed to be Jews, i.e., they were descendants of Abraham, and so laid claim to the blessings promised by Jeh to him and his seed. (2) But they are not regarded by John as real Jews, i.e., they are not the genuine Israel of God (the same conclusion as Paul reached in Rom 2:28). (3) They are persecutors of the Christians in Smyrna. The Lord "knows their blasphemy," their sharp denunciations of Christ and Christians. They claim to be the true people of God, but really they are "antichrist" (1 Jn 2:18). The gen. Σατανά, Satana, is probably the possessive gen. These Jewish persecutors, instead of being God's people, are the "assembly of Satan," i.e., Satan's people. In Polyc., Mar. xvii.2 (c. 155 AD) the Jews of Smyrna were still persecutors of Christians and were conspicuous in demanding and planning the martyrdom of Polycarp the bishop of Smyrna, the same city in which the revelator calls persecuting Jews "the assembly of Satan." In the 2nd cent., in an inscription (C.I.J, 3148) describing the classes of population in Smyrna, we find the expression πολιτεία Ιουδαίων, hoi potē Ioudaioi, which Mommsen thinks means "Jews who had abandoned their religion," but which Ramsay says is a "mixture" of those who formerly were the nation of the Jews, but have lost the legal standing of a separate people.

Satisfaction, sat-ɪs-ɪfˈkæʃən: Occurs twice in AV (Nu 36 31,32) as a rendering of the Heb kopher (RV "ransom"). It means a price paid as compensation for the value of a life or for the loss of a life, for example, for the death of a vassal (Est 9 5). It is a prohibition against accepting such a compensation for the death of a vassal, or for the return of the man-slayer. Such compensation was permitted in ancient justice among many peoples. Cf also, point, which Liddell and Scott define as "properly quit-money for blood spilt, the fine paid by the slayer to the kinsman of the slain, as a ransom from all consequences." The same custom prevailed among Teutonic peoples, as seen in the Ger. Wereld and Old Eng. wergeld. The Heb laws of the OT permit it only in the case of a man or woman gored to death by an ox (Ex 21 30-32).

Sartars, sər-tər, sər-tär, sər-tər, sər-tər, sər-tər, lit. "he-goat"; cf רָעַר, sa'ir, "hair"; pl. כִּרְעָא, sər'tā'ā, sa'irām, sər'trā'm: For sər'trā'm in Lev 17 7 and 2 Ch 11 15, AV has "devils," RV "he-goats," ERVm "sat'ars," LXX τῶν μαλαίων, τῶν μαλαίων, "vain things." For sər'trā'm in Isa 13 21, AV and ERV have "sat'ars," ERVm "he-goats," ARV "wild goats," LXX Λάδανια, doimānia, "demons." For sər'tā in Isa 34 14, AV and ERV have "sat'ars," ERVm "he-goats," ARV "wild goat." LXX has ἀρχομένη πρὸς τὸν τρόπον, ἀνάλογον ἀνάλογον, "one to another," referring to doimānia, which here stands for γλύκιμ, "wild beasts of the desert." The text of AV in these passages is as follows: Lev 17 7, "And they shall no more sacrifice their sacrifices unto the he-goats, after which they play the harlot." 2 Ch 11 15, "And he [ Jeroboam] appointed him priests for the high places, and for the he-goats, and for the courts which he had made;" Isa 13 21, "(of Babylon), "But wild beasts of the desert [γλύκιμ] shall lie there; and the wolf shall dwell with the ostrich [οὐρία]; and the ostriches [οὐρία] and the wild goats [αὐρία] shall dwell there, and the wild goats shall dwell there. And wolves [γλύκιμ] shall dwell with the ostrich [οὐρία]; and the wild goats [αὐρία] shall dwell with the ostrich [οὐρία]; and the wild goats [αὐρία] shall dwell there. And wolves [γλύκιμ] shall dwell with the ostrich [οὐρία]; and the wild goats [αὐρία] shall dwell there. And wolves [γλύκιμ] shall dwell with the ostrich [οὐρία]; and the wild goats [αὐρία] shall dwell there. And wolves [γλύκιμ] shall dwell with the ostrich [οὐρία]; and the wild goats [αὐρία] shall dwell there. And wolves [γλύκιμ] shall dwell with the ostrich [οὐρία]; and the wild goats [αὐρία] shall dwell there."

The question is whether sər'tā and sər'trā'm in these passages stand for real or for fabulous animals. In Lev 17 7 and 2 Ch 11 15, it is clear that they are objects that still makes open the question of their nature, though it may to many minds make "devils" or "demons" or "sat'ars" seem preferable to "he-goats." In Isa 13 20 we read, "neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there, neither shall his tents make his flock to lie down there." This may very likely have influenced the American Committee of Revisers to use "wild goat" in Isa 13 21 and 34 14 instead of the "he-goat" of the other passages. In ARV, no fabulous creatures (except perhaps "night-monster") are mentioned here, but LXX employs doimānia, "demons," in Isa 13 21 for sər'tā and in 34 14 for γλύκιμ, οὐρίαναριν, οὐρίαναριν, from ὄς, ὄς, "ass," and καταιχόντες, καταιχόντες, "centaurs," in Isa 13 22 and 34 14 for γλύκιμ, and again in 14 for λιθίθ; στρατέρες, στρατείνες, "sirens," in Isa 13 21 for βρύθη γα'άνθ, and in 34 13 for τάνταρμ. We must bear in mind the uncertainty regarding the identity of γλύκιμ, οὐρία, "he-goat," as well as of some of the other names, and we must recall the tales that are hung about the name λιθίθ (AV "screech owl," AVm and RV "night-monster," RVm "Lilith"). While sər'tā is almost alone among these words in having ordinarily a well-understood meaning, i.e. "he-goat," there is good reason for considering that here it is used in an exceptional sense. The tr "sat'ary" has certainly much to be said for it. See GOAT; JACKAL.

The last verse contains a very curious scribal error, a ponds having slipped out of one word in it into another. It states that both Abner and Ner were sons of Abiel. These apparent inconsistencies are to be explained by the fact that in Heb, as in Arab., "son" is often used in the sense of grandson. Also, with the facility of divorce then prevalent, by "brother" and "sister" we must in most cases understand half-brother and half-sister. Moreover, Saul’s mother might have been the wife at different times of Kish and of his brother Ner (cf 1 S 20 34). This was quite common, and in some cases compulsory (De 25 8-9).

Saul’s home was at Gibeah (q.v.), which is also called Gibeah of Saul, i.e. Saul’s Hill (1 S 11 4, 10 5, 14 20, 20 30). It is usually identified with Tell el-Ful, but perhaps its site is marked rather by some ruins near but beneath that eminence. The tribe of Benjamin was the fighting tribe of Israel, and Kish seems to have been one of its most important members. Saul’s remarks in deprecation (1 S 9 21) are not to be taken literally.

The circumstances of Saul’s career are too well known to require recapitulation. It will be sufficient to refer to some of the recognized difficulties.
Saul

of the narrative. These difficulties arise from the fact that we appear to have two distinct biographies of Saul in the present Books of S.

4. Sources This may well be the case as it is the practice of the S, to set the events of one chapter against the opposite of the next event, without attempting to work these up into one consistent account. We shall call the duplicated narratives A and B, without postulating that either is a continuous whole. See Samar., Books of.

5. Election as King Saul was anointed king of Israel at Ramah by the prophet Samuel acting upon an inspiration from Jehovah, not only without consulting anyone, but in the strictest secrecy (1 S 9 1—10 16). According to B, the shekels of the tribes demanded a king. Samuel in vain tried to dissuade them. They would not listen, and a king was chosen by lot at Mizpah. The lot fell upon Saul, and Samuel immediately demitted office (ch 8; 10 17—27, omitting last clause; and ch 15).

There are three distinct reasons given in the text for the abolition of theocracy and institution of an elective or hereditary monarchy:

6. Reasons first, the incapacity of Samuel's sons (6 1—8); second, an invasion of the Philistines (12 12); and third, the Philis (9 16). These three motives are not mutually exclusive. The Philis formed the standing menace to the national existence, which would have necessitated the creation of a monarchy sooner or later. The other two were temporary circumstances, one of which aggravated the situation, while the other showed the hopelessness of expecting any improvement in it in the near future.

If. Reign and Fall.—The election of Saul at Mizpah was confirmed in the presence of the chief-tains of the clans; it is not to be

1. His First Action supposed that the whole nation was present. As soon as it was over, the electors went home, and Saul also returned to his father's farm and, like Cincinnatus, once more followed the plough. "Within about a month," however (10 27 LXX, for MT "But he held his peace"), the summons came. A message from the citizens of Jahaz-gilead (q.v.) was sent round the territory appealing for help against the Ammonites under Nahash. They, of course, knew nothing about what had taken place at Mizpah, and it was only by chance that their messengers arrived at Gibeah when they did. Saul rose to the occasion immediately after his anointing; was acknowledged king by the whole body of the people (ch 11). This double election, first by the chiefs and then by the people, is quite a regular proceeding.

This first success encouraged Saul to enter upon what was to be the mission of his life, namely, the throwing off of the Philis suzerainty.

2. Army From the first he had had the boldest organized spirits upon his side (10 26 LXX, RVm); he was now able to form a standing army of 3,000 men, under the command of himself and his son Jonathan (q.v.). The Philis, the last remnant of the Minain race, had the advantage of the possession of iron weapons. It was, in fact, they who introduced iron into Pal from Crete—the Israelites knowing only bronze, and having no weapon except of iron, or of the softer metals. They seem to have armed themselves—with the exception of the king and his son— with mattocks and ploughshares (13 19 ff).

The first encounter was the attack upon the Philis post at Mount Gibeon (1 S 14). The text of the narrative is uncertain, but the following outline is clear. On hearing that the Hebrews had revolted (13 3 LXX), the Philis gathered in great force, including 3,000 chariots (13 5 LXX; MT has 30,000) at Michmash. In dismay, Saul's troops deserted (vs 6 ff), until he was left with only 600 (14 2).

In spite of this, Jonathan precipitated a reckless attack upon the Philis forces. This was so successful that the whole Philis army was seized with panic, and the onset of Saul and the desertion of their Heb slaves completed their discomfiture. Saul followed up his victory by making predatory excursions on every side (14 47).

6. David

6a. Introduction The Saul is recorded as having been against the Amalekites under Agag, who were likewise completely defeated.

The fight was carried out with all the remorselessness common to tribal warfare. Warning was sent to the friendly Kenites to withdraw out of danger; then the hostile tribe was slaughtered to a man, their chief alone being spared for the time being. Even the women and children were not taken as slaves, but were all killed (1 S 15).

It is not clear what was the precise attitude of Samuel toward Saul. As the undoubted head of the theocracy he naturally objected to his powers being curtailed by the loss of the civil power (8 6). Even after the elections of Saul, Samuel was the ecclesiastical head of the state. He seems to have objected to Saul's offering the sacrifice before battle (13 10 ff), and to have considered him merely as his lieutenant (15 3) who could be dismissed for disobedience (15 14 ff).

Here again there seem to be two distinct accounts in the traditional text, which we may again call A and B. In A Saul is rejected because he does not wait long enough for Samuel at Gilgal (13 8; cf 10 8). Seven days, "of course, means eight, or even more, in short, until Samuel should return whenever that might be. The expression might almost be omitted in translating. In B Saul is rejected because he did not carry out Samuel's orders (15 3) to the letter. The two narratives are not mutually exclusive. The second offence was an aggravation of the first, and after it Samuel did not see Saul again (15 35).

He had good reason for not doing so. He had anointed a rival head of the state in opposition to Saul. (If in place of the discovery, would have cost him his head (cf 2 K 9 6.10). Saul did not at once accept his deposition, but he lost heart. One cannot but admire him, deserted by his people, he did not forsake his post, but playing a losing game, and yet continuing in office. To drive away his melancholy, his servants introduced to him a musician who played until his spirits revived (16 14 ff; cf 2 K 3 15).

By a strange coincidence (cf 1, 6, above) the minstrel was the very person whom Samuel had secretly anointed to supplant Saul. According to what looks like another account, however, it was his encounter with Goliah which led to the introduction of David to Saul (17 1 ff; see Dav,). In spite of all that has been said to the contrary, the two narratives are not incompatible, since we are not told the order of the events nor over how many years these events were spread. The theory of duplicate narratives is, therefore, the best explanation of all statements made by the dramatis personae in the Bible are to be taken at their face value. If chs 16 and 17 had formed part of a play of Shakespeare, they would have been considered a fine piece of construction. The assumption has been written to explain why Saul did not recognize David, and why Abner denied all knowledge of him. LXX, however, omits 17 12—31.41.50—18 5.
Whether Saul actually discovered that David had been anointed by Samuel or not, he soon saw in him his rival and inevitable successor, and he would hardly have been human if he had not felt envious of him. His dislike of David had two motives. The first was jealousy, because the women preferred the military genius of David to his own (18.7 f.). His consequent attempt upon the life of David (vs 8–11) is omitted in LXX.

Not least was the love of his own daughter for David (18.20); in ver 28 read with LXX “all Israelites,” and David was charged with an unnatural objection to see his son Jonathan supplanted in his rights to the throne, an objection which was aggravated by the devotion of that son to his own rival (20.30; see also DAVID; JONATHAN).

Saul could not believe that David could remain loyal to him (24.9); at the first favorable opportunity he would turn upon him, hurl him from the throne, and exterminate his enemies. In these circumstances, it was his first interest to get rid of him. His attempt to secure this (omitting with LXX 18.8–11) was to encourage him to make raids on the Philis in the hope that these might kill him (18.21 f.); his next, assassination by one of his prisoners (19.1), and then by his own hands (19.9 f.). When David was compelled to fly, the quarrel turned to civil war. The superstitious fear of hurting the chosen of Jehovah had given place to blind rage. Those who sheltered the fugitive, even priests, were slaughtered (22.17 f.). From one spot to another David was hunted, as he says, like a partridge (26.20).

It is generally maintained that here also we have duplicate accounts; for example, that there are two accounts of David’s taking refuge with Achish, king of Gath, and two of his sparing Saul’s life. The latter are contained in chs 24 and 26, but the points of resemblance are slight. Three thousand (24.2; 26.2) was the number of Saul’s picked men (cf 13.2). David uses the simile of “a flea” in 24.14, but in 26.20 for “a flea” LXX has “my soul,” which is no doubt original. The few other expressions would occur naturally in any narrative with the same contexts.

Obviously Saul’s divided energies could not hold out long; he could not put down the imaginary rebellion within, and at the same time keep at bay the foreign foe. No sooner had he got the fugitive within his grasp than Paul and David left him and made a clean breast of it. In the fraticide of the Philis (23.27 f.); but after his life had been twice spared, he seemed to realize at last that the latter were the real enemy, and he threw his whole strength into one desperate effort for existence.

Saul himself saw that his case was desperate, and that in fact the game was up. As a forlorn hope he determined to seek occult advice. He could no longer use the official means of divination (28.6), and was obliged to have recourse to a necromancer, one of a class whom he himself had taken means to suppress (28.3). The result of the séance confirmed his worst fears and filled his soul with despair (28.7 f.).

It says much for Saul that, hopeless as he was, he engaged in one last forlorn struggle with the enemy. The Philis had gathered in great force at Shunem. Saul drew up his army on the opposing hill of Gilboa. Between the two armies was the valley of Elah (14.4). The result was what had been foreseen. The Israelites, no doubt greatly reduced in numbers (contrast 11.8), were completely defeated, and Saul and his sons slain. Their arms were placed in the temple of Ashtaroth, and their bodies hung on the wall of Beth-shan, but Saul’s head was set in the temple of Dagon (1 Ch.10.10). The citizens of Jabesh-gilead, out of ancient gratitude, rescued the bodies and, in un-Semitic wise, burned them and buried the bones. Saul’s head was thus kept in the temple of Dagon.

Once more we have, according to most present-day critics, duplicate accounts of the death of Saul.

According to one, which we may name Accounts of Saul’s Death, he fell, like Ajax whom he much admired, and caused his own downfall, or being desperately wounded by the archers (1 S 31.4). According to the second (2 S 1.2 ff.), an Amalekite, who had been by accident a witness of the battle, dispatched Saul at his own request, to save him from the enemy. But B is simply the continuation of A, and tells us how David received the news of the battle. The Amalekite’s story is, of course, a fabrication, with a view to a reward. Similar claims for the reward of assassination are common (cf 9.9).

With Saul the first Israelite dynasty began and ended. The names of his sons are given in 1 S 14.49 as Jonathan, Ishvi and Melchishua. Ishvi or Ishvyo (LXX) is Post mortem, “after the death of,” and is a necromancer (q.v.). 1 Ch.8.33 adds Abinadab. Jonathan left a long line of descendants famous, like himself, as archers (1 Ch.8.34 f.). The rest of Saul’s posthumous story apparently died out.

Malchishua and Abinadab were slain at Gilboa (1 S 31.6; cf 26.20), and Ish-bosheth was assassinated shortly after (2 S 4.2 f.). Saul had also two natural sons by Rizpah who were put to death by David in accordance with a superstitious custom, as were the five sons of the Merib (2 S 21.8, not Michael; cf 1 S 18.19). Saul’s other daughter Michal apparently had no children. Saul had, it seems, other wives, who were taken into the harem of David in accordance with the practice of the times (2 S 12.8), but of them and their descendants we know nothing.

III. Character.—Saul’s life and character are disposed of in a somewhat summary fashion by the Chronicler (1 Ch.10, esp. vs. 13.14).

1. Book of Samuel.—This was rejected because he was disloyal to Jehovah, especially in consulting a necromancer. The major premise of this conclusion, however, is the ancient dictum, “Misfortune presupposes sin.” From a wider point of view Saul cannot be dismissed so cavalierly. Like everyone else, Saul had his virtues and his failings. His chief weakness seems to have been want of decision of character. He was easily swayed by events and by people.

2. Saul’s Failures and Successes.—The praises of David (1 S 18.7 f.) at once set his jealousy on fire. His persecution of David was largely due to the instigation of mischievous courtiers (24.9). Upon remonstrance his repentance was as deep as it was short-lived (24.16; 26.21). His impulsiveness was such that he did not know where to stop. His interdict (14.24 f.) was quite as uncalled for as his religious zeal (15.9) was out of place. He was always at one extreme. His hatred of David was only equal to his affection for him at first (18.2). His pusillanimity led him to commit crimes which his own judgment would have forbidden (22.17). Like everyone else, Saul was guilt-ridden; he became suspicious of everyone (22.7 f.), and, like those who are easily led, he soon found his evil genius (22.9.15.22). Saul’s inability to act alone appears from the fact that he never engaged in single combat with any other person; he set his fury or his pettiness to rouse to boiling-point (11.9). His mind was particularly sub-Savaran, Sceptr. Sceptre (AV = RV Avaran (q.v.).

Savaran

SAVE, sāv: In the sense "except," the word came into Eng. through the Fr. (sauf) and is fairly common (38 t., in addition to "saving," AV Eccl 5 11; Am 9 8; Mt 5 32; Lk 4 27; Rev 2 17). It represents no particular Heb or Gr terms but is employed wherever it seems useful. It is still in good (slightly archaic) use and RV has few good alternatives (Dt 16 4 AV; Ps 18 31b, etc), but ERV has "dropped" saving in Lk 4 27 and Rev 2 17 and ARV also in Eccl 5 11; Am 9 8, retaining it only in Mt 5 32.

SAVIAS, sa-v'as (Savioa, Sauvia): In 1 Esd 8 2, for Uzzi, an ancestor of Ezra, in Ezr 7 4.

SAVIOUR, sā-v'ār: (1) While that "God is the deliverer of his people" is the concept on which, virtually, the whole OT is based (see SALVATION), yet the Hebrews seem never to have felt the need of a title for God that would sum up this aspect of His relation to man. Nearest to our word "Saviour" is a participial form (פָּרֵס, פָּרְס) from the vb. פָּר, פָּרְ: פָּרְשָׁה (Qal not used; "savor" in Highl), but even this participle is not frequently applied to God (some 13 t. of which 7 are in Isa 43 63). (2) In the NT, however, the case is different, and Σωτήρ, Sóter, is used in as technical a way as is our "Saviour." But the distribution of the 24 occurrences of the word is strikingly different. For two-thirds of them are found in the later books of the NT—10 in the Pastoral 5 in 2 Pet, and one each in Jn, 1 Jn, and Jude—and the other instances are Lk 1 47; 21 11; Acts 3 31; 13 25; Eph 6 5; Phil 1 20f. And there are no occurrences in Mt, Mk, or the earlier Pauline Epp. The data are clear enough. As might be expected, the fact that the OT used no technical word for Saviour meant that neither did the earliest Christianity use any such word. Doubtless for Our Lord "Messiah" was felt to convey the meaning. But in Gr-speaking Christianity, "Christ," the tr of Messiah, soon became treated as a proper name, and a new word was needed. (3) Sóter expressed the exact meaning and had already been set apart in the language of the NT as a religious term, having one of the most popular Divine titles in use. Indeed, it was felt to be a most inappropriate word to apply to a human being. Cicero, for instance, arraigns Verres for using it: "Soter ... How much does this imply? So much that it cannot be expunged from the world in Latin" (Verr. i.2, 63, § 154). So the adoption of Sóter by Christianity was most natural, the word seemed ready-made. (4) That the NT writers derived the word from its contemporary use is shown, besides, by its occurrence in combination with such terms as "manifestation" (Rv. phanéria, 2 Tim 1 10; Tit 2 13), "love toward man" (philanthropia, Tit 3 4), "captain" (archégos, Acts 5 31; cf He 2 10), etc. These terms are found in the Gr sources many times in exactly the same combinations with Sóter. (5) In the NT Sóter is uniformly reserved for Christ, except in Lk 1 47; Jude ver 25, and the Pastoral. In 1 Tim (1 1; 2 3; 4 10) it is applied only to the Father, in 2 Tim (1 10, only) it is applied to Christ, while in Tit there seems to be a deliberate alternation: of the Father in 1 3; 2 10; 3 4; of Christ in 1 4; 2 13; 3 6.

SAVOR, sā'vār (סותר, ὁ ἱππόπηδος, ὁ ὁμηρίτικος): (1) The primary meaning of the word is "taste," "flavor" (from Lat savor, "taste"). So in Mt 5 13; Lk 14 34, "if the salt have lost its savor ( pulumiüt, μεκανίθη, "become tasteless," or as to lose its characteristic preserving virtue). (2) But generally it has the meaning of "smell," "odor": (a) once of evil odor: "Its stench shall come up, and its ill savor shall come up" (Joel 2 20); (b) elsewhere in the sense of "worthlessness." Instead of the exception of Ex 5 21 and AV Cant 1 3 (RV "fragrance"), it is always accompanied by the adj. "sweet." It stands for the smell of sacrifices and oblations, in agreement with the ancient anthropomorphic idea that God smells and is pleased with the fragrance of sacrifices (e.g. "Jeh smelled the sweet savor," Gen 8 21; "to make a sweet savor unto Jeh," Nu 16 3; and frequently). In the NT, "savor" in the sense of smell is used metaphorically: (a) once the metaphor is borrowed from the ince which attends the victor's triumphal procession; God is said to make manifest through His apostles "the savor of his knowledge in every place" as He "ledeth" them "in triumph in Christ" (2 Cor 2 14; Lk 24 50; Acts 4 30). The metaphor is borrowed from the fragment of smell of the sacrifices. The apostles "are a sweet savor of Christ unto God" (2 Cor 2 15), i.e. they are, as it were, a sweet odor for God to smell, an odor which is pleasing to God, even though its effect upon men varies (to some it is a"savor from death unto death," i.e. such as is emitted by death and itself causes death; to others it is "a savor from life unto life," ver 10). By the same sacrificial metaphor, Christ's offering of Himself to God is said to be "for a sweet smelling savor" (Eph 5 2 AV, RV "for an odor of a sweet smell"); the same phrase is used in Phil 4 18 of acts of kindness to Paul, which were "a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God".

(3) Once it is used in the figurative sense of reputation: "Ye have made our savor to be abhorred (lit. "our smell to stink") in the eyes of Pharaoh" (Ex 5 21). Of the Eng. phrase, "to be in bad odor.

The vb. "to savor" means: (1) Intransitively, to taste or smell of or partake of the odor of. A meaning as in the Preface of AV: "to savour more of curiosity than wisdom," or (2) transitively, to perceive by the taste or smell, to discern: "thy savour be of God" (AV Mt 16 23; Mk 8 33, RV "mindest"; cf., however, Phr. περιφρεσκεύομαι, to "savour," only in Gen 27 14, 17, 14. 31 ("savour food") and RV Isa 30 24 (m. "salted").

The common pest of these are the forms now named eczema, herpes and, perhaps, psoriasis, all of which are common in Bible lands. Milder cases in which the disease was localized and in small patches (the semassía of LXX) did not render the bearer unclean, and they were to be distinguished from the priest (Lev 13:26) from the more virulent and spreading eruptions which (ver 7) were regarded as causes of ceremonial uncleanness. These severer forms are the lechîth of LXX mentioned in Lev 21:20, which disqualified any son of Aaron from serving as his priest, and when affecting an animal rendered it unfit to be offered as a burnt offering (Lev 22:22). Hippocrates speaks of these cases as obstinate and persistent, and Galen believed that they might degenerate into leprosy; hence the terms in which Aschylus speaks of it (Chosporhi 218). Celsius, however, recognized that lechîth was a popular eruption, not a true scab. The name yallâpheth seems to have been given to it on account of the firmness of attachment of the scales, while mipapâthhh refers to its tendency to spread and cover the surface. A cognate word in Ezek 13:18 is the name of a large tallith or prayer veil used by the false propheteesses in Israel (Kt.2 k'erchef). Scabs were esp. disfiguring on the head, and this infestation was threatened as a punishment on the daughters of Zion for their wanton haughtiness (Isa 3:17). In Middle Eng., "scab" is used for itch or mange, and as a term of opprobrium, as in Greene, Bacon and Bunyan, 35, 1591.

Scabbard, skâ'bard, SHEATH, shêth. See Armor, III, 5; War, 9.

Scaffold, skâf'old (קְּבָר, kiyôg): The Eng. word is used once of Solomon's "brazen scaffold" on which he knelt at the dedication of the temple (2 Ch 6:13).

Scale, skâl. See Siege, 4, (c); Weights and Measures.

Scales, skâlz [11], kâskêth, "fish-scales"; [2] רָמָה, mîghînnâh, מִגִּנְה, mîghân, "scales of the crocodile"; [3] לְּסָפָה, lepsâh, with vb. לִפָּסָה, lipâsâh, "scale away" [Top 3:17; 11:13]: (1) the first Heb word kâskêth means the indiscriminated scales of fish, which together with the dorsal fin were distinguishing marks of all fish allowed as food to the Israelite (Lev 11:9 f; Dt 14:9 f). In the figurative sense the word is used of a cost of meat (1 S 17:33): (2) Mîghînnâh from mîghâh, lit. "buckler" or "small shield" (2 Ch 13:5; Jer 46:3), is used in the description of the crocodile (see Leviathan) for the horny scales or scutes imbedded in the skin, not imbricated upon it (Job 41:15 [Heb ver 7]). (3) The Gr lepsâ, which in classical language has a much wider range of meaning than the above Heb words ("round" = "horsk," "shell," "fish-scale," "scale of snake," "flake of metal and of snow," etc.), is found in the NT description of St. Paul's recovery from temporary blindness, "And straightway there fell from his eyes as it were scales, and he received his sight" (Acts 9:18). There is nothing in the words of the sacred text which compels us to think of literal scales. (In Tob, however, a literal flaking-off of foreign substance is meant.) We have here rather a description of the sensation which terminated the three days' period of blindness which the apostle suffered after his meeting with the risen Lord on the road to Damascus. The apostle himself does not use this expression in his own graphic description of the same experience: "In that very hour I looked upon him" (22:13). The phrase has, however, come to us for we speak of "scales falling from one's eyes" when we mean a sudden illumination or remission of a dissipation of harassing doubt.

Scall, skôl (גָּלֶת, nethek; ἑρώτωσα, thrâma): This only occurs in Lev 13 and 14 where it is used 14:2 to describe bald or scaly patches of eruption on the skin. Such patches are generally the result of the action of parasitic organisms. The common form known now as scalled head is produced by a microscopic plant, Achârion schoenelini. In Old and Middle Eng., scall was used for scaliness of the head. (Chaucer and Spenser.) See also Skent, Concise Etymol. Dict. of Eng. Language.

Scent, sent: (1) In Hos 14:7, "The scent [in his memorial] thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon." Scent" is used for כָּרְחָק, zuktur (so MT, but the pointing is uncertain), properly "memorial," whence RVm. The Eng. tr. comes through the LXX which took זָרָה as "offering of sweet savour," and so "sweet savour." For the sense of Lebanon see WNT. If this tr is not right, the alternative is "memorial" in the sense of "renown." (2) Job 14:9; Jer 48:11 for מַרְדָּק, râ'dâk, "odor." (3) "Scent" of the water in Job 14:9 is poetic for "contact with." (5) Wisd. 11:16, 18 (RSV) has "filthy scents of scattered smoke," where "scent" is used in the obsolete sense of "disagreeable odor." The tr is, however, very loose, and "scents" is a gloss; RV "noisome smoke." BURTON SCOTT EASTON

SCION

The name of Scion (θρύσκος, skhrophos): A rod or mace used by a sovereign as a symbol of royal authority. The Heb שֶׁבֶת (shēbet) is the ordinary word for rod or club, and is used of an ordinary rod (cf 2 S 7 14), of the shepherd's crook (Ps 23 4), scribe's baton or marshal's staff (dgs 6 14), as well as of the symbol of royalty. Its symbolism may be connected with the use of the שֶׁבֶת for protection (2 S 23 21; Ps 23 4) or for punishment (Isa 10 21; 30 31). It is used with reference to the royal line descended from Judah (Gen 49 10), and figuratively of sovereignty in general and possibly of conquest (Nu 24 17, in Israel; Isa 14 5, in Babylonia; Am 1 5, in Syria, among Philis; Zac 10 11, in Egypt), the disappearance or cutting off of him that holdeth the scepter being tantamount to loss of national independence. The kingship of Jash is spoken of as a scepter (Ps 45 6 [Heb ver 7] quoted in He 1 8).

The manner of using the scepter by an oriental monarch is suggested in the act of Ahasuerus, who holds it out to Esther as a mark of favor. The scepter touches the top of it, perhaps simply as an act of homage or possibly to indicate a desire to be heard. The scepter of Ahasuerus is spoken of as "golden" (Est 5 2), but it is probable that scepters were ordinarily made of straight branches (match) of certain kinds of trees (Ezk 17 2), and the crook, or rod of iron (Prov 22 8, "rod of his wrath"). Another word, מָרָה (marah), lit. "prescribing" (person or thing), formerly tr uniformly "lawgiver," is now generally taken, on the basis of parallelism, to mean "sceptre in our proper sense" (Gen 49 24). In the "payagogos," or "tutor's staff," to avoid repetition; Nu 21 18; Ps 60 7; 108 8).

SCOPE, σκοπός (Skoupo, Skou).] A Jew, a chief priest, resident in Ephesus, whose seven sons were exorcists (Acts 19 14 f.). Ewald regards the name as being Heb שֶׁבֶת (shēbet), He was not an officiating priest, as there were only synagogues in Asia Minor. He may have belonged to a high-priestly family, or perhaps at one time he had been at the head of some course in the temple. In the narrative the construction is loose. There were seven sons (ver 14), and it would appear (ver 16) that in this particular case all were present. But (ver 16) the demon-possessed man overpowered them. Was it done under the difficulty by omitting "both," but συνάδελφον, so Tisch., WH, Soden, and best critics, retain the difficult reading. The explanation is that ver 14 states the custom: "who did this" being μὴ τολμᾶν ποιονται, "who used to do this." Vs 15 and 16 state a particular case in which two took part, but the incident is introduced in a careless manner. Ewald would translate ἀμφότερον as "in both sides," but this is impossible. Bauer understood "disciples" for "sons." D and Syriac have an interesting expansion which Blass considers original (ver 14): "Among whom also the sons [Syr 'seven'] of a certain Sevea, a priest, wished to do the same, [who] were in the custom of exorcising such. And entering into the demon-possessed man they began to call upon the Name, saying, 'We charge you by Jesus, whom Paul preaches to come out.'"

SCISM, σκισία (Skisia, skisia), σκίζον (Skizon): Only in 1 Cor 12 25. The same Gr word is lit. "a split," "a breach." In 1 Cor 12 16; Mk 2 21; and "divorce," in Jn 7 43; 9 16; 10 19. It designates "a separation," not from, but within, the church, interfering with the harmonious coördination and cooperation of the members described in the preceding verses (1 Cor 12 18 f.). The ecclesiastical meaning is that of a break from a church organization, that may or may not be connected with a doctrinal dissent.

SCHOOL, σχολή (Skholē, schollē). See Tyrannus.

SCHOOLMASTER, σχολικός (Skolikos). Gal 3 24 f. AV reads: "The law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith. But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster. "Schoolmaster" is a tr of παιδισ- γως, παιδιος, lit. "child-leader." This παιδιος was not a teacher but a slave, to whom in wealthy families the general oversight of a boy was committed. It was his duty to accompany his charge to and from school, never to lose sight of him in public, to prevent associations with objectionable companions, to inculcate moral lessons at every opportunity, etc. He was a familiar figure in the streets, and the (sour) "face of a παιδιος" and "to follow one like a παιδιος" were proverbial expressions. Naturally, to the average boy the παιδιός was tantamount to the incorporation of everything objectionable. Hence St. Paul's figure may be paraphrased: "The law was a παιδιός, necessary but irksome, to direct us until the time of Christ. Then was the time of our spiritual confirmations come, that the control of the παιδιός ceased." The word παιδιός was taken over into Aram. at an early date, and St. Paul's language, which is hardly that of a mere adult observer, suggests that he had personal experience with the institution. Wealthy and intensely orthodox Jewish parents living in a gentle city may well have adopted such a precaution for the protection of their children.

No Eng. word renders παιδιός adequately. "Schoolmaster" is quite wrong. But RV's "tutor" (cf 1 Cor 4 15) is little better in modern Eng.

SCIENCE, σιές: This word as found in AV means simply "knowledge." "Science" occurs in AV only in two places, Dul 1 4, "children . . . understanding science" ((Unknown) "skeintos", "skeintos", "skeintos"); those who understand science"). The meaning of the term here is "knowledge," "wisdom." The only other occurrence of "science" is in the NT (1 Tim 6 20, "avoiding the "knowledge," "wisdom." The only other occurrence of "science" is in the NT (1 Tim 6 20, "avoiding the "knowledge," "wisdom." The only other occurrence of "science" is in the NT (1 Tim 6 20, "avoiding the has occurred in the NT. "Science" is the tr of the Gr γνωσις, which in the NT is usually rendered "knowledge." The science here referred to was a higher knowledge of Christian and Divine things, which false teachers alleged that they possessed, and of which they boasted. It was an incoherent form of Gnosticism, and it prevailed to a considerable extent in the churches of protocentral Asia, e.g. in Colossae and Ephesus. Timothy is put on his guard against the teaching of this γνωσις falsely so called, for it set itself in opposition to the gospel. See Gnosticism.

"Science" in the modern sense of the word, as the discovery and orderly classification and exposition of the phenomena and of the laws of Nature, has not been found either in the OT or the NT unless the passage in Dul be interpreted as meaning the scientific knowledge which the learned men of Babylon possessed of mathematics and astronomy, etc. See also Acts 14 22. The Heb word all natural phenomena meant the working of the hand of God in the world, directly and immediately, without the intervention of any secondary laws.

SCIMITAR, sim'-tar, -tär (אָכָדָא, ἀκιδάκκα): Formerly given as "fauchion" in AV Jzh 13 6; 18 9 where it is found which Judith took down from the rail of the bed at Holopherne's banquet and with which she severed his head from his body.

SCOFF, skof, SCOFER, skof'r: The vb. indicates the manifestation of contempt by insulting words or actions; it combines bitterness with ridicule. It is much more frequent in RV than in AV, replacing "scorn" of the latter in Ps 1 1; Prov 22, etc. "Scorn" refers rather to an inner emotion based on a sense of superiority; "scuff," to the outward expression of this emotion.

SCORN, skorn: Fox Talbot connects this Eng. word with the Danish skorn, "dirt," "ordure," "mud," "mire." As distinguished from such words as "mock," "deride," " scoff," all of which refer specifically to the various ways in which scorn finds outward expression, scorn itself denotes a subjective state or reaction.

Further, this state or reaction is not simple but complex. It involves a sense of superiority, resentment, and aver- sion. This reaction occurs when one is confronted with a person or a proposition that by challenging certain things for which he holds himself to be great, either by his superioritv or weakness, awakens mingled resentment, repulsion and contempt by the nullness of its claims and its intrinsic inferiority or weakness. Scorn is a bitter, fiercer emotion than disdain or contempt. It is obvious that scorn may—indeed, it often—arise in comparison with an ungrounded, arrogant sense of self-esteem.

The word, outside of the phrase "laugh to scorn," is found only in the OT, and then only 4 t (Est 3 6; AV Ps 44 13; 79 4; Hab 1 10), and it represents three different Heb words for none of which it is a suitable rendering. The two words "thought scorn" in Est 3 6 represent but one in Heb, viz. הבזד, for which "disdain" would be a nearer equivalent. In Hab 1 10 AV the word trd "scorn" is מָזְדַפ, "an object of laughter," "laughing-stock." In Ps 44 13; 79 4 the Heb word is לֹאֵעה, a root, probably meaning "to stouter," "stammer," for which "mocking" is a better Eng. equivalent. In AV Job 34 7; Ps 123 4, לֹאֵעה is rendered "scourging" (the rendering given in Prov 12 22 to לֹאֵעה) from a totally different root and one much more nearly approximating the fundamental idea of the Eng. word "scorn." In Prov 29 8 and Isa 28 14 לֹאֵעה is rendered "scornful").

As a vb. the word is the tr given to לשׁנָה, "to mock." (Job 22 19; 22 21; Isa 22 19; 22 27; "all laugh to scorn"); כָּלָה = to scoff (Ezk 16 31, m. "Gr scophē", but text still "scorneth"); for the noun זָהָה, "laugh to scorn" (Ezk 25 2): skopē = to laugh; laugh at" (Job 39 7 18; 2 Ch 30 10, with the note זָהָה, "laugh to scoff" (RV "laughing-stock"); Job 12 4); לֹאֵעה = to scoff (as used in Ethical and religious connections) (Job 16 20; Prov 33 4, 9 12; all "scorn" in RV); in Prov 19 28 RV, not happily "make at". RV is warranted in substituting "scorn" for "scorn" because the context indicates some form of outward expression of scorn.

RV always (except Job 12 4; Sir 6 4; 1 Mac 10 70) retains "laugh to scorn" (2 K 19 21; 2 Ch 30 10; Neh 2 19; Job 22 19; Ps 22 7; Isa 37 22; Ezek 16 31; 32 32; 2 Esd 2 21; Jzh 12 12; Sir 12 17; 41 24; 2 Macc 10 17; Mt 5 14; Mk 6 40; Lk 8 53). The vb. in Apoc and the NT is usually καταχαίνω, καταγαίνω, but in Wisd 4 1 γεγένιον, γεγενεῖ; in Sir 13 7 καταμαχώνω, καταμαχωδάω; and in 2 Esd 2 21 ἀμαραντεῖ. In addition "scorn" is translated in Est 5 6; Job 39 7 18; 2 Esd 2 21 (contemno). It is also used of "mock at," but elsewhere invariably to "scorn.

Scornor is the tr of the participle of לֹאֵעה, and once of the participle of לֹאֵעה. For "scornor" RV everywhere substitutes—properly—"scougher." Outside of Prov (and Hos 2 7) the word is to be found only in Ps 1 2. The force of the word has been well indicated by Cheyne, who says that the "scorner [scouffer] is one who despises that which is holy and avoids the company of the noble 'wise men,' but yet in his own vain way seeks for truth, his character is marked by arrogance as of that the wise is characterized by devout caution."

SCORPION, skōr'pi-ən (σκορπίον, ἄραβρον; of Arab. أَبِّر, 'abrab, "scorpion"); μαύδιθ 'ακραβήμι, the "ascent of Krakbam"; σκορπίος, skorpios. Note that the Gr and Heb may be akin; cf. omitting the vowels, 'kbr and skp). In Dt 8 15, we have, "who led thee through the great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents [nādāšā šārdāp] and scorpions ['alqbrāb]."

Rehoboam (1 K 12 11 14; 2 Ch 10 11 14) says, "My father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions." Ezekiel is told to prophesy to the children of Israel (2 6), and "Be not afraid of them, neither be afraid of their words, though brers and thorns are with thee, and thou dost dwell among scorpions." (The ascent of Krakbam), the north end of Wād-îl-'Arabah, S. of the Dead Sea, is mentioned as a boundary 3 t (Nu 34 4; Josh 15 5; Jdg 11 19; 2 K 18 20). In the Seventy (Lv 10 19), "Behold, I have given you authority to tread upon serpents and scorpions," and again in Lk 11 12 He says, "Or if he shall ask an egg, will he give him a scorpion?"

Note that we have here three doublets, the loaf and the stone, the fish and the serpent, and the egg and the scorpio, whereas in the passage in Mt (7 9 f) we have only the loaf and the stone and the fish and serpent. EB (s.v. "Scorpion") ingeniously seeks to bring Lk into nearer agreement with Mt by omitting from Lk the second doublet. From the context and the serpent, inasmuch as the several texts as authority for the omission, and reading ἑγρωτώ, ἀπαντήσω, ἂν, "Thou hast won, thy egg.

In Rev 9 2 10 there come out of the smoke of the abyss winged creatures (locusta, ἄγρωτα, ἄγρωτες) like war-horses with crowns of gold, with the faces of men, hair of women, teeth of lions, breasts of iron, and with streaming tails like scorpions. In Ecc 26 7 it is said of an evil wife, "He that taketh hold of her is as one that graspeth a scorpion." In 1 Mac 6 61 we find mention of "bees (σκοπίδα, σκοπιδία, diminutive of skorpio) to cast darts." In Plutarch skorpios is used in the same sense (Liddell and Scott, s.v. scorpion).

In the passage cited from Dt, and probably also in the name of the ascent of Krakbam, we find references to the abundance of scorpions, esp. in the warmer parts of the country. Though there is a Gr proverb, "Look for a scorpion under every stone," few would agree with the categorical statement of Tristram (NHB) that "every third stone is sure to conceal one."

Nevertheless, campers and people sleeping on the ground need to exercise care in order to avoid their stings, which, though often exceedingly painful for several hours, are seldom fatal. Occasionally the mere contact with the body of the scorpion may cause a painful redness of the skin, with itching and a feeling of burning. Scorpions are not proper insects, but belong with spiders, mites and ticks to the Arachnidae. The scorpions of Pal are usually 2 or 3 in. long. The short cephalothorax bears two powerful pincers or saws terminating with pincers, which make the creature look like a small crayfish or lobster, but four feet and a long, slender tail which carries the stinger. The rest of the body consists of the abdomen, a broad part continuous with the cephalothorax, and a slender part forming the tail which is clubbed at the end. The tail is usually carried curved over the back and is used for striking the prey into insensibility. Scorpions feed mostly on insects for which they lie in wait. The scorpion family is remarkable for having existed with very little change from the Silurian age to the present time.

It does not seem necessary to consider that the words of Rehoboam (1 K 12 11, etc) refer to a whip that was called a scorpion, but rather that as the sting of a scorpion is worse than a lash, so his treatment would be harsher than his father's.

SCOURGE, skôrj, SCOURGING, skôr'jing (mâstik, mësâs, mástîgo, mästîdô; in Acts 22 25 märstîgo, mästîsô; in Mk 15 15, Mt 27 26 párgiâ-lê, párgiâ, lêgô, lêoth). A Roman implement for severe bodily punishment. Horace calls it "horrible flagellum." It consisted of a handle, to which several cords or leather thongs were affixed, which were weighted with jagged pieces of bone or metal, to make the blow more painful and effective. It is comparable, in its horrid effects, only with the Russian knout. The victim was tied to a post (Acts 22 25) and the blows were applied to the back and loins, sometimes even, in the wanton cruelty of the executioner, to the face and the bowels. In the tense position of the body, the effect can easily be imagined. So hideous was the punishment that the victim could not faint and not rarely died under it. Eusebius draws a horribly realistic picture of the torture of scourging (HE, IV, 15). By its application secrets and confessions were wrung from the victim (Acts 22 24). It usually preceded capital punishment (v. 21). It was illegal to apply the flagellum to a Roman citizen (Acts 22 25), since the Porcian and Sempronian laws, 248 and 123 BC, although these laws were not rarely broken in the provinces (Tac. Hist. iv. 27; Cic. Verr. v. 6, 62; Jos. BJ, II, xiv, 9). As among the Russians today, the number of blows was not usually fixed, the severity of the punishment depending entirely on the commanding officer. In the punishment of Jews described in the words of Ps 129 3. Among the Jews the punishment of flagellation was well known since the Egyptian days, as the monuments abundantly testify. The word "scourge" is used in Lev 19 20, but ARV translates "punished," the original word bibbërîth expressing the idea of investigation. De 25 3 fixed the mode of a Jewish flogging and limits the number of blows to 40. Apparently the flogging was administered by a rod. The Syrians reintroduced true scourging into Jewish life, when Antiochus Epiphanes forced them by means of it to eat swine's flesh (2 Mac 6 30; 7 1). Later it was legalized by Jewish law and became customary (Mt 10 17; 23 34; Acts 22 19; 26 11), but the traditional limitation of the number of blows was still preserved. Says Paul in his "polish boasting": "in stripes above measure," "of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one," distinguishing it from the "beatings with rods," thrice repeated (2 Cor 11 23-25).

The other OT references (Job 5 21; 9 23; Isa 10 26; 28 15 18 [sôw, sôph]; Josh 23 13 [sôw, sôphê], sôphê) are figurative for "affliction." Notice the common use of metaphors in the phrase "over-flowing scourge" (Isa 28 15 18).

SCRABBLE, skrabl'l: Occurs only in 1 S 21 13, as the tr of rôs, tawâh: "David . . . feigned himself mad and scrawled on the doors of the gate." "To scrawble" (modern Eng. 'scrawl') is here to make unmeaning marks; tawâh means "to make a mark" from lâw, "a mark," esp. as a cross (Ezk 9 4), a signature (Job 31 35, see RV), the name of the letter َ (n), originally made in the form of a cross; RV m has "made marks" and LXX has tâmpaiâdâ, "to beat as the form," which the Hellenistic Jew Doder and others follow ("beat upon" or "drummed on the doors of the city," which seems more probable).

SCRIBES, skrîbz: The existence of law leads necessarily to a profession whose business is the study and knowledge of the law; at any rate, if the law is extensive and complicated. At the time of Ezra and probably for some time after, this was chiefly the business of the priests. Ezra was both priest and scholar (נביא, sôphârêh). It was chiefly in the interest of the priestly cult that the most important part of the Pent  (P) was written. The priests were therefore also in the first instance the scholars and the guardians of the Law; but in the course of time this was changed. The more highly esteemed the Law became in the eyes of the people, the more its study and interpretation became a life-work by itself, and thus there developed a class of scholars who, though not priests, devoted themselves assiduously to the Law. These became known as the scribes, that is, the non-Clerical students of the Law. During the Hellenistic period, the priests, esp. those of the upper class, became tainted with the Hellenism of the age and frequently turned their attention to paganistic culture, thus neglecting the Law and its study. The scribes, on the other hand, devoted themselves assiduously to the Law. These became known as the scribes, that is, the non-Clerical students of the Law. In the NT they are usually called γραμματεία, grammatai, i.e. "students of the Scriptures," "scholars," corresponding to the Heb נביא, sôphârîm = ἀνωτάτοις ἔργα, differing in the words and thus they make a profession of literary studies, which, in this case, of course, meant chiefly the Law. Besides this general designation, we also find the specific word νομικοῦ, nômikoi, i.e. "students of the Law," "lawyers" (Mt 22 35; Lk 7 30; 10 25; 11 45.52; 14 3); and in so far as they do not only know the Law but also teach it they are called χατάκαλοι, χατακαλοί, "doctors of the Law" (Lk 5 17; Acts 5 34).

The extraordinary honors bestowed on these scholars on the part of the people are expressed in their honorary titles. Most common was the apppellative "rabbi" or "my lord." (Mt 23 7 and otherwise). This word of polite address gradually became a title. The word rabbanî (MK 10 31; Mt 20 16) is an extensive form, and was employed by the disciples to give expression to their veneration of Christ. In the Gr NT "rabbi" in τεταγμένος, kathêgôs, "teacher" (Mt 23 9 f).

From their students the rabbis demanded honors even surpassing those bestowed on parents. "Let the honor of thy friend border on the honor of thy teacher, and the honor of thy teacher on the fear of God" (ABBâb, 12). "The honor of thy teacher must surpass the honor bestowed on thy father; for son and father are both in duty bound to honor the teacher" (KRÎTHôTH 6 9). Everywhere the rabbis demanded the position of first rank (Mt 23 6f; Mk 12 38; Lk 11 31; 20 46). They defended that of the nobility. They wore στριάτα, στριάτα, "tunics," and these were the mark of the upper class.
Since the scribes were lawyers (see LAWYER), much of their time was occupied in teaching and in judicial functions, and both these activities must be pursued gratuitously. Rabbi Zadok said: "Make the knowledge of the Law neither a crown in which to glory nor a spade with which to dig." Hillel used to say: "He who employs the crown [of the Law] in teaching and in judicial functions, and in caring for his livelihood, that the judge should not receive presents or bribes was written in the Law (Ex 23 8; Dt 16 19); hence the Mish: "If anyone accept pay for rendering judgment, his judgment is null and void." The rabbis were therefore obliged to make their living by other means. Some of them, like Joseph ben Judah and his father, had inherited wealth; others pursued a handicraft besides their study of the Law. Rabbi Gamaliel II emphatically advised the pursuit of a business in addition to the pursuit of the Law. It is well known that the apostle Paul kept up his handicraft even after he had become a preacher of the gospel (Acts 18 3; 20 34; 1 Cor 4 12; 9 6; 2 Cor 11 7; 1 Thess 2 9; 2 Thess 3 8), and the same is reported of many rabbis. But in every instance the Law is not the work of the scribes; addition and warning is given not to overestimate the value of the ordinary avocation. It was a saying of Hillel: 'He that devotes himself to trade will not become wise.' The principle of gratitude was purely carried out in practice only in connection with the judicial activity of the scribes; hardly in connection with their work as teachers. Even the Gospels, in spite of the admonition that the disciples should give without pay because they had received without pay (Mt 10 8), nevertheless absolve the workman of his hire (Mt. 10 10; Lk 10 7); and Paul (1 Cor 9 14) states it as his just due that he receive his livelihood from those to whom he preaches the gospel, even though he makes use of this right only in exceptional cases (1 Cor 9 3-18; 2 Cor 11 8; Gal 6 6; Phil 4 10.18). Since this appears to have been the thought of the times, we are undoubtedly justified in assuming that the Jewish teachers of the Law also demanded pay for their services. Indeed, the admonitions above referred to, not to make instruction in the Law the object of self-interest, lead to the conclusion that gratitude was not the rule; and in Christ's philippies against the scribes and Pharisees He makes special mention of their greed (Mt 23 14). The scribes, though they ostensibly gave instruction in the Law gratuitously, they must have practised methods by which they indirectly secured their fees.

Naturally the place of chief influence for the scribes up to the year 70 AD was Judaea. But not only there were they to be found. Wherever the zeal for the law of the fathers was a perceptible force, they were indispensable; hence we find them also in Galilee (Lk 5 17) and in the Diaspora. In the Jewish epitaphs in Rome, dating from the latter days of the empire, gemmatae are frequently mentioned; and the Bab. scribes of the 5th and 6th cents. were the authors of the most monumental work of rabbinical Judaism—the Talmud.

Since the separation of the Pharisaic and the Sadducean tendencies in Judaism, the scribes generally belonged to the Pharisaic class; for this latter is none other than the party which recognized the interpretations or "traditions" which the scribes in the course of time had developed out of the body of the written Law and employed as the binding rule of life. Since, however, "scribes" are merely "students of the Law," there must also have been scribes of the Sadducean type; for it is not to be imagined that this party, which recognized only the written Law as binding, should not have had some opposing students in the other class. Indeed, various passages of the NT which speak of the "scribes of the Pharisees" (Mt 2 19; Lk 5 30; Acts 23 9) indicate that there were also "scribes of the Sadducees."

Under the reign and leadership of the scribes, it became the ambition of every Israelite to know more or less of the Law. The aim of education in family, school and study was "to dwell in the midst of the people of the Law. Even the common laborer should know what was written in the Law; and not only know it, but also do it. His entire life should be governed according to the norm of the Law, and, on the whole, this purpose was realized in a high degree. Jews owe to the scribes the rich endowment of our riches and our cities and our other goods, the Law remains our possession forever. And no Jew can be so far removed from the land of his fathers nor will he fear a hostile commander to such a degree that he would not fear his Law more than his commander." So loyal were the majority of the Jews toward their Law that they would gladly endure the tortures of the rack and even death for it. This frame of mind was due almost wholly to the systematic and wholehearted instruction of the scribes.

The motive underlying this enthusiasm for the Law was the belief in Divine retribution in the strictest judicial sense. The prophetic idea of a covenant which God had made with His select people was interpreted purely in the judicial sense. The covenant was a contract between God and His parties were mutually bound. The people are bound to observe the Divine Law literally and conscientiously; and, in return for this, God is in duty bound to render the promised reward in proportion to the services rendered. This applies to the people as a whole as well as to the individual. Services and reward must always stand in mutual relation to each other. He who renders great services may expect from the justice of God that he will receive great returns as his portion, while, on the other hand, every transgression also must be followed by its corresponding punishment.

The results corresponded to the motives. Just as the motives in the main were superficial, so the results were an exceedingly shallow view of religious and moral life. Religion was reduced to legal formality. All religious and moral life was dragged down to the level of law, and this must necessarily lead to the following results: (1) The individual is governed by the written Law, he is always under the Law; he has only evil results when applied in this realm. Law has the purpose of regulating the relations of men to each other according to certain standards. Its object is not the individual, but only the body of society. In the law, the individual must find the proper rule for his conduct toward society as an organism. This is a matter of obligation and of government on the part of society. But religion is not a matter of government; where it is found, it is a matter of freedom, of the choice and of the product. (2) By reducing the practice of religion to the form of law, all acts are placed on a par with each other. The motives are no longer taken into consideration, but only the deed itself. (3) From this it follows that the highest ethical attainment was the formal satisfaction of the Law. It was a matter of finical literalism. (4) Finally, moral life must, under such circumstances, lose its unity and be split up into manifold precepts and duties. Law always affords opportunity for casuistry, and it was in the development of the "interpretation of the Law," Jewish religious life through the "precepts of the elders" which called forth Christ's repeated denunciation of the work of the scribes.

SCRIP, skrip: A word connected with "scrip," and meaning a "bag," either as made from a "scrip" writers, and the description of them given by Herodotus in book IV of his history represents a race of savages, inhabiting a region of rather indefinite boundaries, north of the Black and Caspian seas and the Caucasus Mountains. They were nomads who neither plowed nor sowed (iv. 19), moving about in wagons and carrying their dwellings with them (ib. 46); they had the most filthy habits and never washed in water (ib. 75); they drank the blood of their annual victims in battle, and made napkins of the scalps and drinking bowls of the skulls of the slain (ib. 64–65). Their deities were many of them identified with those of the Greeks, but the most characteristic rite was the worship of the naked sword (ib. 62), and they sacrificed every hundredth man taken in war to this deity. War was their chief business, and they were a terrible scourge to the nations of Western Asia. They broke through the barrier of the Caspian in 632 BC and swept down like a swarm of locusts upon Media and Assyria, turning the fruitful fields into a desert; pushing across Mesopotamia, they ravaged Syria and were about to invade Egypt when Psammitichus I, who was besieging Ashdod, bought them off by rich gifts, but they remained for another 28 years, according to Herodotus. It is supposed that a company of them settled in Beth-shean, and from this circumstance it received the name Scythopolis. Various branches of the race appeared at different times, among the most noted of which were the Parthians (q.v.).

SEA, στηρίγμα, ἱερόν, θάλασσα, θάλασσα; in Acts 27 5 παλαιος, πελαγος): The Mediterranean is called ha-yam ha-gadol, "the great sea" (Nu 34 6; Josh 1 4; Ezek 47 10, etc); ha-yam ha-aharon, "the hinder," or "western sea" (Dt 11 24; 34 2; Joel 2 20; Zec 14 8); yam ʿphilim, "the sea of the Philistines" (Ex 23 31); AV translates translated yom ḫappeh in Ex 3 7 by "sea of Joppa," perhaps rightly.

The Dead Sea is called yam ha-melakh, "the Salt Sea" (Nu 34 3; Dt 3 17; Josh 3 16, etc); ha-yam ha-baadonim, "the east sea" (Ezek 18 17; Joel 3 20; Zec 14 17, ha-yam ha-gevulim, "the sea of the Arabah" (Dt 3 17; Josh 3 16; 2 14; 2 K 14 25).

The Red Sea is called yam ʿḥoph, lit. "sea of weeds" (Ex 10 19; Nu 14 25; Dt 1 1; Joel 2 10; Jgs 11 16; 1 K 9 26; Neh 9 9; Ps 106 7; Jer 49 21, etc); ṭebesarion, θησαυρος, thalassa, lit. "red sea" (Wisd 19 7; Acts 7 30; He 11 29); yam miryam, "the Egypt sea" (Isa 11 15).

Yém is used of the Nile in Nah 3 8 and probably also in Isa 19 5, as in modern Arab. baḥr, "sea," is used of the Nile and its affluents. Yem is often used for "west" or "western," as "look from the place where thou art, westward" (Gen 13 14); "western border" (Nu 34 6). Yám is used for "sea" in general (Ex 20 11); also for "molten sea" of the temple (1 K 7 23).

The Sea of Galilee is called knennereth, "Chimmereth" (Nu 34 11); kinnoroth, Chinnereth (A Josh 11 2); kinneneth, Chinnereth (1 K 15 20); yam knennereth, the sea of Chinnereth (Nu 34 11; Josh 13 27); yam knīneth, "the sea of Chinnereth" (Josh 12 3); ḥm knennereth, ἡ θάλασσα Gennesaret, "the lake of Gennesaret" (Lk 5 1); and ḫm knennereth, to ḫatrus Gennesaret, η θαλασσα τας Γαλαταιας, ἡ θαλασσα τας Γαλιλαιας, "the sea of Galilee;" (Mt 4 18; 15 29; Mk 1 16; 7 31; Jn 6 1); ḥm knennereth, the Tiberias, ἡ θαλασσα τας Σιβεριαδος, the "sea of Tiberias" (Jn 21 1; if Jn 6 1).

SEA-MEW, só’mû (םנָפָפ, shābaph; lápos, láron; Lat Larus canus): The sea-gull. Used by modern translators in the list of abominations in the place of the cuckoo (Lev 11:16; Dt 14:15). It is very probable that the sea-gull comes closer to the bird intended than the Cuckoo (q.v.). The sea-gull is a “slender” bird, but not “lean” as the root shābaph implies. However, with its stretch of wing and restless flight it gives this impression. Gulls are common all along the Mediterranean coast and around the Sea of Galilee. They are thought to have more intelligence than the average bird, and to share with some eagles, hawks, vultures and the raven the knowledge that if they find a mollusk they cannot break they can carry it aloft and drop it on the rocks. Only a wise bird learns this. Most feathered creatures pick at an unyielding surface a few times and then seek food elsewhere. There are two reasons why these birds went on the abomination list: To a steady diet of fish they add carrion. Then they are birds of such nervous energy, so exhaustless flight, so daring in flying directly into the face of fierce winds, that the Moslems believed them to be the spirits of the dammed. Moses was reared and educated among the Egyptians, and the laws he formulated often are tinged by traces of his early life. History fails to record any instance of a man reared in Egypt who permitted the killing of a gull, ibis, or hoopoe.

It is also called “the hinder sea” (Heb ha-yám ha-abbānîm), i.e. the western sea (Dt 11 24; 34 2; Jos 2 20; Zec 14 8), and “the sea of the Philis” (Ex 23 31), which, of course, applies esp. to the part washing the shore of Philistia, from Jaffa southward. Generally, when the word “sea” is used, and no other is definitely indicated, the Mediterranean is intended (Gen 49 12; Nu 13 20, etc.). It was the largest sheet of water with which the Hebrews had any acquaintance. Its glistening mirror, stretching away to the sunset, could be seen from many an inland height.

It buckled large in the minds of the landsmen—for Israel produced few mariners—impressing itself upon their speech, so that “seaward!”

2. Israel was the common term for “westward” and the Sea (Ex 26 22; Josh 5 1, etc.). Its mystery was wondrously unfolded to the Jews as the storm, and the sound of “sorrow on the sea,” borne to their upland ears, infected them with a strange dread of its wide waters, to which the seer of Patmos gave the last Scriptural expression in his vision of the new earth, where “the sea is no more” (Rev 21 1).

Along the coast lay the tribal territories assigned to Asher, Zebulun, Manasséh, Dan and Judáh. Many of the cities along the shore were ports and their commerce thrived at and reigned, coasting, for the making of harbors. The one seaport of which in ancient times the Hebrews seem to have made much use was Joppa—the modern Jaffa (2 Ch 2 16, etc.). From this place, probably, argosses of Solomon turned their prows westward. Here, at least, “ships of Tarshish” were wont to set out upon their adventurous voyages (Jon 1:3). The ships on this sea figure in the beautiful vision of Isaiah (60:8 f.). See ACCO; JERUSALEM.

The boy Jesus, from the heights above Nazareth, must often have looked on the waters of the great sea, as they broke in foam on the curving shore, from the roots of Carmel to the point at Acre. Once only in His journeys, so far as we know, did He approach the sea, namely on His ever-memorable visit to the “borders of Tyre and Sidon” (Mt 16:21; Mk 7:24). The sea, in all its moods, was well known to the great apostle of the Gentiles. The three shipwrecks, which he suffered (2 Cor 11:25), were doubtless due to the power of its angry billows over the frail craft of those old days. See PAUL.

The land owes much to the great sea. During the hot months of summer, a soft breeze from the water springs up at dawn, fanning all the seaward face of the Central Palestine to Range. At sunset the chilled air the sea ships down the slopes and the higher stages drift toward the uplands, charged with priceless moisture, giving rise to the refreshing dews which make the Palestinian morning so sweet. SEA, THE MOLTEN, מֹלֶטְן, or BRAZEN (מִלְטְנָן, מִלְטְטָן, מִלְטַטָן, מִלְטַטָן): This was a large brazen (bronze) reservoir for water which stood in the court of Solomon’s Temple between the altar and the temple porch, against the S. (1 K 7:23–26; 2 Ch 4:2–5:10). The bronze from which it was made is stated in 1 Ch 18:8 to have been taken by David from the cities Tibhath and Cun. It replaced the laver of the tabernacle, and, like that, was used for storing the water in which the priests washed their hands and their feet (cf Ex 30:18; 38:8). It rested on 12 brazen (bronze) oxen, facing in four groups the four quarters of heaven. For particulars of shape, size and ornamentation, see TEMPLE. The “sea” served its purpose till the time of Ahaz, who took away the brazen oxen, and placed the sea upon a pavement (2 K 16:17). It is recorded that the oxen were afterward taken to Babylon (Jer 52:20). The sea itself shared the same fate, being first broken to pieces (2 K 25:13:16).

SEAH, se‘ā (םֵיא, שֵיא): A dry measure equal to about one and one-half pecks. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

A seal is an instrument of stone, metal or other hard substance (sometimes set in a ring), on which is engraved some device or figure, and is used for making an impression on some soft substance, as clay or wax, affixed to a document or other object, in token of authenticity.

The use of seals goes back to a very remote antiquity, esp. in Egypt, Babylonia and Assyria. Herodotus (i.195) records the Babylon custom of wearing signs. In Babylonia the seal generally took the form of a cylinder cut in clay or some hard stone, which was bored through from end to end and a cord passed through it. The design, often accompanied by the owner’s name, was engraved on the curved part. The signet was then suspended by the cord round the neck or wrist (cf RV “cord,” in Gen 39:18; “signet on heart . . . upon thine arm,” i.e. one Antiquity seal hanging down from the neck and another round the wrist; Cant 8:6).

In Egypt, too, as in Babylonia, the cylinder was the earliest form used for the purpose of a seal; but this form was in Egypt gradually superseded by the scarab (= beetle-shaped) as the prevailing type. Other forms, such as the cone-shaped, were also in use. From the earliest period of civilization the finger-ring on which some distinguishing badge was engraved was in use as a convenient way of carrying the signet, the earliest extant rings being those found in Egypt tombs. Other ancient peoples, such as the Phoenicians, also used seals. From the East the custom passed into Greece and other western countries. Devices of a variety of sorts were in use at Rome, both by the emperors and by private individuals. In ancient times, almost every variety of precious stones was used for seals, as well as cheaper material, such as limestone or terracotta. In the West wax came early into use as the material for receiving the impression of the seal, but in the ancient East clay was the medium used (cf Job 38:14). Pigment and ink also came into use.

That the Israelites were acquainted with the use in Egypt of signets set in rings is seen in the statement that Pharaoh delivered to Joseph his royal signet as a token of deputed authority (Gen 41:41). They were also acquainted with the use of seals among the Persians and Medes (Est 3:12; 8:10; Dnl 6:17). The Hebrews themselves used them at an early period, the first recorded instance being Gen 38:15:25, where the patriarch Judah is said to have pledged his word to Tamar by leaving her his signet, cord and staff. We have evidence of engraved signets being in important use among them in early times in the description of the two stones on the high priest’s ephod (Ex 28:11; 39:6), of his golden plate (Ex 28:36; 39:30), and breastplate (39:14). Ben-Sira mentions as a distinct occupation the work of engraving on signets.
(Sir 38:27). From the case of Judah and the common usage in other countries, we may infer that every Hebrew of any standing wore a seal. In the case of the signet ring, it was usual to wear it on one of the fingers of the right hand (Jer 22:24). The Hebrews do not seem to have developed an original type of signets. The seals so far discovered in Palestine to prove that the predominating type was the Babylonian, and that this use continued to the Persian era and the Ptolemies (1 Macc 6:15). But there was a later change, and the new type, which was more like the one used in Egypt, was introduced into the Jews by the Hellenists. (1) Of the important uses of sealing in antiquity was to give a proof of authenticity and authority to letters, royal commands, etc.

3. Uses of Seals: It served the purposes of a modern signature at a time when the art of writing was not common to many. Thus Jezebel "wrote letters in Ahab's name, and sealed them with his seal" (1 K 21:8); the written commands of Ahaseurus were "sealed with the king's ring," "for the writing which is written in the king's name, and sealed with the king's ring, may no man reverse" (Est 8:10; 3:12). (2) Allied to this is the formal ratification of a transaction or covenant. Jeremiah sealed the deeds of the field which he bought from Hanamel (Jer 32:10-14); he also sealed an alliance with Hanamel. His seal, however, had the form of a cuneiform tablet with his name written on it; it was not used as an impression (Isa 44:3-5; Jer 32:14; 44:3). In sealing the roll, it was wrapped round with flaxen thread or string, then a lump of clay was attached to it impressed with a seal. The seal would have to be broken by an authorized person before the book could be read (Rev 5:2,5,9; 6:1,3, etc.). (4) Sealing was a badge of deputed authority and power, as when a king handed over his signet ring to one of his officers (Gen 41:42; Est 3:10; 8:2; 1 Mac 6:15). (5) Closed doors were often sealed to prevent the entrance of any unauthorized person.

So the door of the lion's den (Dan 6:17; Bel and the Dragon) was locked with a seal. So we read of the chief priests and Pharaoh sealing the stone shut at the mouth of Our Lord's tomb in order to "make the sepulchre sure" against the intrusion of the disciples (Mt 27:60). Cf. the sealing of the abyss to prevent Satan's escape (Rev 20:3). A door was sealed by stretching a cord over the stone which blocked the entrance, spreading clay or wax on the cord, and then impressing it with a seal. (6) To any other object might a seal be affixed, as an official mark of ownership; e.g., a large number of clay stoppers of wine jars are still preserved, on which seal impressions of the cylinder type were stamped, by rolling the cylinder along the surface of the clay when it was still soft (Cant 8:14).

II. Metaphorical Use of the Term. —The word "seal," both subst. and vb., is often used figuratively for the act or token of authentication, confirmation, proof, security, completion or possession. Seal was not to be forgotten by God, but treasured and stored up with Him against the sinner, under a seal (Dt 32:34; Job 14:17). A lover's signet is the emblem of love as an inalienable possession (Cant 8:6); an unrepentant sinner is "a spring shut up, a fountain sealed" (Cant 4:12). To seal is sometime a metaphor for sorcery. That which is beyond the comprehension of the unintiated is sealed to be a "book that is sealed" (Isa 49:14; see also the book of seven seals, Rev 5:1ff.). Daniel is bidden to "shut up the words" of his prophecy "and seal the book, even to the time of the end," i.e. to keep his prophecy a secret till it shall be revealed (Dan 11:39; cf. Rev 10:4). Elsewhere it stands for the ratification of prophecy (Isa 29:14). The exact meaning of "book that is sealed" is sometimes ambiguous (as in Job 33:16; Ezek 28:12). In the NT the main ideas in the figure are those of authentication, ratification, and security. The believer in Christ is said to "set his seal to this, that God is true" (1 John 3:33), i.e. to attest the veracity of God, to stamp it with the believer's own endorsement and confirmation. The Father has sealed the Son, i.e. authenticated Him as the bestower of life-giving bread (John 6:27). The circumcision of Abraham was a "sign" and "seal," an outward ratification, of the righteousness of faith which he had already received while uncircumcised (Rom 4:11; cf. the prayer offered at the circumcision of a child, "Blessed be He who sanctified His beloved from the womb, and sealed His name, sealed His seal, sealed His offering with the sign of a holy covenant"; also 1 Thess 5:28: "The seal of circumcision is in your flesh as it was sealed in the flesh of Abraham"). Paul describes his act in making over to the saints at Jerusalem the contribution of the Gentiles as "sealing them to this fruit" (Rom 15:8); the meaning of the phrase is doubtful, but the figure seems to be based on sealing as ratifying a commercial transaction, expressing Paul's intention formally to hand over to the churches at Jerusalem the spiritual blessings which through him the Gentiles had enjoyed, and to mark it as their own property. Paul's converts are the "seal," the authentic confirmation, of his apostleship (1 Cor 9:2). God, by His Spirit indicates who are His, as the owner sets his seal on his property; and just as documents are sealed up until the proper time for opening them, so Christians are sealed up by the Holy Spirit "unto the day of redemption" (Eph 1:13; 4:30; 2 Cor 1:22). Ownership, security, and authentication are implied in the words, "The firm foundation of God standeth, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his" (2 Tim 2:19). The seal of God on the foreheads of His servants (Rev 7:2-4) marks them, not as His own, but as God's "seals of the external security, whereas those that have not the seal of God on their foreheads" (Rev 9:4) have no such guaranty.

On the analogy of the rite of circumcision (see above), the term "seal" (σφαράγιον) was at a very early period applied to Christian baptism. But there is no sufficient ground for referring such passages as Eph 1:13; 4:30; 2 Cor 1:22 to the rite of baptism (as some do). The use of the metaphor in connection with baptism came after NT times (early instances are given in Cerin, "in the foot of 2 Clem 7:6"). Harnack and Hatch maintain that the name "seal" for baptism was taken from the mysteries, but Anschel and Sander-Headlam hold that it was borrowed from the Jewish view of circumcision as a seal. See MYSTERIES.

SEALED, Seal, Fountain: These words, applied to the bride (Cant 4:12), find their explanation under Seal (q.v.). Anything that was to be authorized only protected by water was one of the most precious things, as in the East, fountains and wells were often sealed (Gen 29:3; Prov 5:15-18).

SEALSKIN, seal-skin: The rendering of RV (Ex 26:5; Eze 16:10) for מַעַלְקָה, "or tashah, RVm "pangur-skin," AV "kalgder's skin." A seal, Monachus albidens, is found in the Mediterranean, though not in the Red Sea, but it is likely that tahosh means the dungon, which is found in the Red Sea. See Bagdad; Porpoise.

SEAM, sēn, SEAMLESS, sēn-es: The coat or inner garment (χαλέν chlōn) of Jesus is described in 14:12 as "without seam" (ἀκατάστρεφον, ἀρραφός), i.e. woven in one piece.

SEAR, sēr: In 1 Tim 4:2 for κατασκαλίζω kataskalίζω, "burn with a hot iron" (cf. "cauterizer"); AV "having their conscience seared with a hot iron," and RV "having their conscience seared in this case means "made insensible," like the surface of a deep burn after heating. The vb., however, probably means "brand" (so RV). "Criminals are branded on their forehead, so that all men may know their infamy. The consciences of certain men are branded just as truly, so that there is an inward consciousness of hypocrisy." See the comns.

SEARCH, sērch: Some peculiar senses are:
1. In the books of Moses, esp. in Num, "searching out the land" means to spy out (γνωρίζειν, γνωρίζεται), to investigate carefully, to examine with a view to giving a full and accurate report on. (2) When applied to the Scriptures, as in Ezr 4:15.19 (ἀνακάλυψις, ἀνακαλύπτω); Jn 5:39; 1 Pet 1:11 (κατασκαλίζω, κατασκαλίζεται); to examine, to study out the meaning. In Acts 1:27; 20:27; 21:9; "searching" (3) (ἀνακάλυψις, ἀνασκαλύψις) of AV. See SEARCHINGS.
2. "Search out" often means to study critically, to investigate carefully, e.g. Job 8:8; 29:16; Ezek 1:13; Lam 3:40; Mt 2:8; 1 Cor 2:10; 1 Pet 1:10. (4) When the word is applied to God's searching the heart or spirit, it means His opening up, laying bare, disclosing what was hidden, e.g. 1 Ch 28:9; Ps 44:21; 139:1; Prov 20:27; Jer 17:10; Rom 8:27.

SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES: The sentence beginning with διασκεδάζειν, διασκεδάζοντα, in Jn 5:39 AV has been almost universally regarded as meaning "Search the scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life." But one cannot read as far as διασκεδάζειν, διασκεδάζοντα, without feeling that there is something wrong with the ordinary version. This vb. is at least a disturbing element in the current of thought (if not superfluous), and only when the first vb. is taken as an indicative does the meaning of the writer become clear. The utterance is not a command, but a declaration: "Ye search the scriptures, because ye think that in them," etc. Robert Barclay as early as 1675, in his Apology for the True Christian Divinity (91 f), refers to two scholars before him who had handed down the correct tradition: "Moreover, that place may be taken in the indicative mood, Ye search the Scriptures, which interpretation the Gr word will bear, and so Pasor supposed, which by the reproof following seemeth also to be genuine interpretation, as Cyrilus long ago hath observed." So Dr. Edwin A. Abbott, in his Johannine Grammar (London, 1906, §2439 [i]). See also Transactions American PhIlological Association, 1901, 64f. J. E. HARRY

SEARCHINGS, sērch'zings (t)kra'laḥ, bāšēr [lōh], from bāšar, to "search," "explore," "examine thoroughly": In the song of Deborah the Reubenites are taunted because their great resolves of heart, bāšēr [lōh], led to nothing but great "searching of heart, bāšēr [lōh], and no activity other than to remain among their flocks (Jgs 5:15f.). The first of the two Heb expressions so emphatically contrasted (though questioned by commentators on the authority of 5 MSS as a corruption of the second) can with reasonable certainty be interpreted "acts prescribed by one's understanding" (cf. the expressions hākham lēb, mibbāh lēb, in which the heart is looked upon as the seat of the understanding). The second expression may mean either irresolution or hesitation based on selfish motives, as the heart was also considered the seat of the feelings, or answerability to God (cf Jer 17:10; Prov 25:3); this rendering would explain the form lēhaphāyāh in Jgs 5:16, lit. "for the water courses of Reuben, great the searchings of heart!"

SEASONS, sēz'z'nz [summer; γαύρ, kagyr, Chald ḫayyī, ḫayyī [Dnl 2:35]; ἄπος, theros; winter; γεωργία, gevĪroγία] The four seasons in Pal are not so marked as in more northern countries, summer gradually fading into winter and winter into summer. The range of temperature is not great. In the Bible we have no reference to spring or autumn; the only seasons mentioned are "summer and winter" (Gen 8:22; Ps 74:17; Zec 14:8).

Winter is the season of rain lasting from November to May. The winter is past; the rain is over (20:24). Paul asks Timothy to "come before winter" (2 Tim 4:2). It is the season of harvesting and threshing (Dnl 2:35). "He that gathereth in summer is a wise son" (Prov 10:9). See Cold, Heat, Astronomy, I, 5.

SEAT, sēt: This word is used to translate the Heb words בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, בָּשָׂר, bāšā; סא网站地图, sabāh (Gen 10:7; 1 Ch 1:9); Gr ἁδῶν, but B has ἁδῶν, ἁδῶν; in Isral 1:17). The first son of Israel's brothers 1. Forms of being: Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Name, and Sabtechah. In Ps 72:10 and Isra 43:3 Parentage (where the Gr has ἀδῶν, ἀδῶν, of Seba Seba is mentioned with Egypt and Ethiopia, and must therefore have been a southern people. In Isra 45:14 we meet with the gentile form, ἀδῶν, ἀδῶν (Sabaētou, Sabaētou), rendered "Sabaæans," who are described as "men of stature" (i.e. tall), and were to come over to Cyrus in chains, and acknowledge that God was in him—their merchandise, and that of the Ethiopians, and the labor of Egypt, were to be his.
Their country is regarded as being, most likely, the district of Saba, N. of Adulis, on the west coast of the Red Sea. There is just a possibility that the Saba River, stretching from the coast to the Zambezi and the Limpopo, which was utilized as a waterway by the states in that region, though, through sitting, not suitable now, may contain a trace of the name, and perhaps testifies to still more southern extensions of the power and influence of the Sebaian. (See Th. Bent, The Ruined Cities of Mashonaland, 1892.) The ruins of this tract are regarded as being the works of those other than the black negro of the country. Dillmann, however, suggests (on Gen 10 7) that the people of Saba were another branch of the Cushites E. of Napatia by the Arabian Sea, of which Strabo (xvi. 4, 8, 10) and Ptolemy (iv. 7, 7 f.) give information. See SHEBA and HDS, s.v.

SEBAM, se'bamm (שְׁבָם), s'h'baham; se'babam, Sebamb; AV Shebam: A town in the upland pasture land given to the tribes of Reuben and Gad. It is named along with Heshbon, Eleach and Nebo (Nu 32 39). It is probably the same place as Sibmah (AV “Shibmah” inJer 49 22). It also gives a city of Moab in the land of Gilead which fell to the tribe of Reuben. Jerome (Comm. in Isa 5) says it was about 500 paces from Heshbon, and he describes it as one of the strong places of that region. It may be represented by the modern STwia, which stands on the south side of Wady Hissân, about 2 miles from Hissân. The ancient ruins are considerable, with large sarcophagi; and in the neighboring rock wine presses are cut (Pepf., “Eastern Pal., 220 f.”). W. EWING

SECACAH, se-kâ'ka, sek'a-kâ (שֶׁכַּקָּה), se'khâkah; B, A, 'kkofâ, 'kkôfâ; A, Zcovych, Sochechel: One of the 12 cities “in the wilderness of Judah” (Josh 15 61), that is, in the uncultivated lands to the W. of the Dead Sea, where a scanty pasture is still obtained by wandering Bedouin tribes. There are many signs in this district of more settled habitation in ancient times, but the name Seacah is lost. Conder proposed the Kh. el Dikkeh (also called Kh. es Sikkah), “the ruin of the path,” some 2 miles S. of Bethany. Though an ancient site, it is too near the inhabited area; the name, too, is uncertain (Pepf., III, 111, Sh XVII).

SECHENIAS, sek-ê-ñ'as: (1) (A, Xcovychas, Sechenias; omitted in B and Swete): 1 Ess 8 29 = “Shecaniah” in Ezr 8 3; the arrangement in Ezr is different. (2) (A, Sechenias, but B and Swete, Eleciasia, Elecchionias): Name of a person who went up at the head of a family in the return with Ezra (1 Ess 8 32) = “Shecaniah” in Ezr 8 5.

SECOND DEATH. See DEATH; ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT, X, (6).

SECOND SABBATH. See Sabbath, Second.

SECONDARYLY, sek'un-da-ri-li: AV for sé'ropar, deuteron (1 Cor 12 28). Probably without distinction from “secondly” (so RV, and so AV also for deuteron in 1 Cor 23 23). Still AV may have wished to emphasize that the prophets have a lower rank than the apostles.

SECRET, sek'ret: In Ezk 7 27, “secret” for šophan, “hide,” “treasure.” A correct tr tron. They shall be there a man cherished place (Jerus), and there is no reference to the Holy of Holies. The other uses of “secret” in RV are obvious, but RV’s corrections of AV in Jgs 13 18; 1 S 5 9; Job 16 11 should be noted.

SECT, sect (ἀἵρεσις, hairesis): “Sect” (Lat secta, from sequi, “to follow”) is in the NT the tr of hairesis, from hairê, “to take,” “to choose”; also τρε “heresy,” not heresy in the later ecclesiastical sense, but a school or party, a sect, without any bad meaning attached to it. The word is applied to schools of philosophy; to the Pharisees and Sadducees among the Jews who adhered to a common religious faith and worship; and to the Christians. It is τρ “sect” (Acts 5 17, of the Sadducees; 15 5, of the Pharisees; 24 1, of the Pharisees; 28 22, of the Christians); also RV 24 14 (AV and ERVm “heresy”), “After the Way which they call a sect, so serve I the God of our fathers” (just as the Pharisees were “a sect”); it is τρ “heresies” (1 Cor 13 19, “sects,” AV “factions,” m “Gr ‘heresies’); RV reverses the ARV text and margin; Gal 5 20, ARV “parties,” m “heresies”; RV reverses text and margin; 2 Pet 2 1, “damnable heresies,” RV “destructive heresies,” m “sects of perdition”); the “sect” in itself might be harmless; it was the teaching or principles which should be followed by those sects which would make them “destructive.” Hairesis occurs in 1 Mace 8 30 (“They shall do it at their pleasure,” i.e. “choice”); of LXX Lev 26 25, 21. See HERESY.

SECU, se'ku (שֶׁכִּה), sekhâ; B, iv se'phel, et se'phel, iv Sokel; AV Sechu: This name occurs only in the account of David’s visit to Samuel (1 S 19 22). Saul, we are told, went to “Ramah, and came to the great wood that is in Secu,” where he inquired after Samuel and David. It evidently lies between the residence of Saul at Gibeah and Ramah. It is impossible to come to any sure conclusion regarding it. Conder suggested its identification with Khirbet Sowkeshek, which lies to the S. of Bireh. This is possible, but perhaps we should read with LXX B, “He came to the cistern of the threshing-floor that is on the bare hill” (en to Sephel). The threshing-floors in the East are naturally on high exposed ground where this is possible, and often form part of the area whence water in the rainy season is conducted to cisterns. This might have been a place actually within the city of Ramah.

SECUNDUS, se-kun'dus (WH, Σκοουδος, Sekouodos, TH, Σκοουδος, Sekoudos): A Thessalonian who was among those who accompanied Paul from Greece to Asia (Acts 20 4). They had preceded Paul and waited for him at Troas. If he were one of the representatives of the churches in Macedonia and Greece, including the church contributions to Jerus (Acts 24 17; 2 Cor 8 23), he probably accompanied Paul as far as Jerus. The name is found in a list of polities on a Thessalonian inscription.

SECURE, se-kū'ri, SECURITY, se-kū'-ri-ti: The word בַּעֲרָב, and its derivatives in Heb point to security, either real or imaginary. Thus we read of a host that “was secure” (Jgs 8 11) and of those that “provoked God [and] are secure” (Job 12 6); but also of a security that rests in hope and is safe (Job 18 10). The NT words ἀσφαλέω, πεποιθημένος, used in Mt 28 14 [AV “secure you”], guarantee the safety of the soldiers, who witnessed against themselves, in the telling of the story of the disappearance of the body of Christ.

Securely is used in the sense of “trustful,” “not anticipating danger” (Prov 3 29; Mic 2 8; Eccles 4 15).

SEER, sē'ēr, sēr: The word in EV represents two Heb. words, הָשָּׁא, rēch (1 Sg 9.11.18.19; 2 Sg 15 27; 1 Ch 9 22, etc.), and וי, hōzēk (2 Sg 24 11; 2 K 17 13; 1 Ch 21 9; 25 5; 29 29, etc.). The former designation is from the ordinary vb. "to see;" the latter is connected with the vb. used of prophetic vision. It appears from 1 Sg 9 9 that 'seer' (rēch) was the older name for those who, after the regular prophetic orders, were called "prophets." It is not just, however, to speak of the "seers" or "prophets" of Samuel's time as on the level of mere fortune-tellers. What insight or vision they possessed is traced to God's Spirit. Samuel was the rēch by preeminence, and the name is little used after his time. Individuals who bear the title "seer" (hōzēk) are mentioned in connection with the kings and as historiographers (2 Sg 24 11; 1 Ch 21 9; 25 5; 29 29; 2 Ch 9 29; 12 15; 19 2, etc.), and distinction is sometimes made between "prophets" and "seers" (2 K 17 13; 1 Ch 29 29, etc.). Hävernick thinks that "seer" denotes one who does not belong to the regular prophetic order (Intro to OT, 50 f., ET), but it is not easy to fix a precise distinction. See PROPHESY, PROPHECY.

SEETHÉ, sēth: Old Eng. for "boil!"; past tense, "sood" (Gen 29 29), past participle, "sodden" (Lam 4 10). See Ex 23 19 AV.

SEGUB, sē'gub (םֶגֵע, sēghabh [Kî transl., hē'gh, sēghabh [Kî transl.]; B, Zeyōb, Zegob; A, Zeyōb, Segob):

(1) The youngest son of Hiel, the builder of Jericho (1 K 15 34). The death of Segub is probably connected with the primitive custom of laying foundations with blood, as, indeed, skulls were found built in with the brickwork when the tower of Bel at Nippur was excavated. See Gezer. If the death of the two sons was based on the custom just mentioned, the circumstance was deliberately obscured in the present account. The death of Segub may have had the death of Hiel's eldest and youngest sons with a curse said to have been pronounced by Joshua to the city that should venture to rebuild Jericho (Josh 6 26).

(2) Son of Herson and father of Jair (1 Ch 2 21). Horace J. Wolfe

SEIR, sē'îr:

(1) (סֵיֵיר, har sē'îr, "Mt. Seir") [Gen 14 6, etc]. רַעְשָׂא, סַנְא, סַעְוָה (Gen 38 3; Deut 29 3). אִשֶּׁר סֵעְלִי, יִשְׂרָא (ya Şer, ge Şer): In Gen 32 3 "the land of Seir" is equated with "the field of Edom." The Mount and the Land of Seir are alternative appellations of the mountainous tract which runs along the eastern side of the Arabah, occupied by the descendants of Esau, who succeeded the ancient Horites (Gen 14 6; 36 20), "cave-dwellers," in possession. For a description of the land see Edom.

(2) (סֵיֵיר, har sē'îr; B, 'Assād, Assār, A, Sēdār, Sēdār): A landmark on the boundary of Judah (Josh 15 10), not far from Kiriath-jearim and Chesalon. The name means "shaggy," and probably refers to a wooded height. It may be that the rise of the range which runs N.E. from Sāfis by Karyat el-'Anab and Bīdūl to the plateau of el-Ḥb. Traces of an ancient forest are still to be seen here.

SEIRATH, sē'îr-ath, sē'î-i-ath (סֵיֵרְה, ha-sē'î-rēh; B, Zegobā, Seliethā, A, Seliethā, Seeruthā; AV Seirath): The place to which Ehud escaped after his assassination of Eglon, king of Moab (Jgs 3 20). The name is the same as the region dwelt in, and probably applied to some shaggy forest. The quarries by which he passed are said to have been by Gilgal (ver 19), but there is nothing to guide us to an identification. Onom gives the name, but no indication of the site.

Seerah, sē'ri-th, sē'ri-rath. See Seirah.

SELA, sē'la (סֵלָה, sela', סֵלָה, ha-sela; [with the art.]; pipā, petra, ĕ petra, Ṣē petra; AV Selah [2 K 14 7]). AV renders this name in a number of other ways: in 2 K 14 17; Isa 16 1. In Jgs 1 30; 2 Ch 25 12; and Ob ver 3, it translates lit. "rock;" but RVm in each case "Sela." It is impossible to assume with Hull (HDB, s.v.) that this name, when it appears in Scripture, always refers to the capital of Edom, the great city in Wady Musa. In Jgs 1 36 its association with the Ascent of Akribabbm shuts us up to a position toward the southwestern end of the Dead Sea. Probably in that case it does not denote a city, but some prominent crag. Moore (Judges, [CC, 56), defining Buhl, with es-Sābīth, "a bare and dazzlingly white sandstone promontory 1,000 ft. high, E. of the mud flats of es-Siekhab, and 2 miles S. of the Dead Sea." A more probable identification is a high cliff which commands the road leading from the Dead Sea, "the spring of Salt," to Edom, over the pass of Akribabbm. This was a position of strategic importance, and if fortified would be of great strength. (In this passage "Edomites" must be read for Amorites.) The victory of Amaziah was won in the Valley of Salt. He would naturally turn his arms at once against this stronghold (2 K 14 17); and it may well be the rock from the top of which he hurled his prisoners (2 Ch 25 12). He called it Jokteel, a name the meaning of which is obscure. Possibly it is the same as Jekuthiild (1 Ch 4 18), and may mean "preservation of God" (OHI, s.v.). No trace of this name has been found. The narratives in which the place is mentioned put identification with Petra out of the question.

"The rock" (RVm "Sela") in Ob ver 3, in the phrase "thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock" is only a vivid and picturesque description of Edom. The purple mountains into which the wild rocks of Eeau clambered run out from Syria upon the desert, some hundred miles west. On the extreme E.

They are said to be the finest rock scenery in the world. "Salvator Rosæ never conceived so savage and so suitable a haunt for a handkerchief." They are the white cliffs notorious for their wild and naked beauty, by defiles so narrow that two horsemen may scarcely side abreast, and the sun is shut out by the overlapping rocks. . . . Little else than wild fowls' nests are the villages: human fringes perched on high shelves of hidden away in caves at the ends of the deep gorges" (C. A. Smith, The Book of the Twelve Prophets, II, 178 f).

In Isa 16 1; 42 11 RV, perhaps we have a reference to the great city of Petra. Jos (Ant, IV, viii, 1) tells us that among the kings of the Midities who fell before Moses was one Rekem, king of Rekem (akeb, or rekemo), the city deriving its name from its founder. This he says was the Arab name, the Greeks called it Petra. Onom says Petra is a city of Arabia in the land of Edom. It is called Jechthol; but the Syrians call it Rekem. Jokter, as we have seen, must be sought elsewhere. There can be no doubt that Jos intended the city in Wady Mīsīr. Its OT name was Bozrah (Am 1 12, etc). Wetstein (Excursus in Delitseh's Iat, 696 f) hazards the conjecture that the proper ancient name was Bṣram hate-Sela, "Bozrah of the Rock.

This "rose-red city half as old as Time" was for long difficult of access, and the attempt to visit it was fraught with danger. In recent years, however, it has been seen by many tourists and from the Dead Sea, and just N. of the watershed between that sea and the Gulf of Aqaba. The valley owes its modern name, Wády Mùṣá, “Valley of Moses,” to its connection with Moses in Mohomedan legends. While not wholly inaccessible from other directions, the two usual approaches are that from the S.W. by a rough path, partly artificial, and that from the E. The latter is by far the more important. The valley closes to the E., the only opening being through a deep and narrow defile, called the Sīk, “shaft,” about a mile in length. In the bottom of the Sīk flows westward the stream that rises at ‘Ain Mùṣá. E. of the cleft is the village of ‘Uli, an ancient site, corresponding to Gaia of Onom. Passing this village, the road threads its way along the shadowy winding gorge, overhung by lofty cliffs. When the valley is reached, a sight of extraordinary beauty and impressiveness opens to the beholder. The temples, the tombs, the theater, etc., hewn with great skill and infinite pains from the living rock, have defied to an astonishing degree the tooth of time, many of the carvings being as fresh as if they had been cut yesterday. An idea of the scale on which the work was done may be gathered from the size of the theater, which furnished accommodation for no fewer than 3,000 spectators.

Such a position could not have been overlooked in ancient times; and we are safe to assume that a city of importance must always have existed here. It is under the Nabataeans, however, that Petra begins to play a prominent part in history. This people took possession about the end of the 4th cent. B.C., and continued their sway until overcome by Hadrian, who gave his own name to the city—Hadrianopolis. This name, however, soon disappeared. Under the Romans Petra saw the days of her greatest splendor.

According to old tradition St. Paul visited Petra when he went into Arabia (Gal. 1:17). Of this there is no certainty; but Christianity was early introduced, and the city became the seat of a bishopric. Under the Nabataeans she was the center of the great caravan trade of that time. The merchandise of the East was brought hither; and hence set out the caravans for the South, the West, and the North. The great highway across the desert to the Pers Gulf was practically in her hands. The fall of the Nabataean power gave Palmyra her chance; and her supremacy in the commerce of Northern Arabia dates from that time. Petra shared in the declining fortunes of Rome; and her death blow was dealt by the conquering Moslems, who desolated Arabia Petraea in 629–32 A.D. The place now furnishes a retreat for a few poor Bedaw families.

SELH, sela. See Music, II, 1.

SELED, sel·ed (סֶלֶד, qeledh): A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2:30 bis).

SELEMIA, sel·e·mì·a: One of the swift scribes whose services Ezra was commanded to secure (2 Esd 14:21). The name is probably identical with Selémias of 1 Esd 9:34 (q.v.).

SELEMIAS, sel·e·mi·as (Σελημίας, Selémias): One of those who put away their “strange wives” (1 Esd 9:34) = “Selémias” in Ezr 10:39, and probably identical with “Selémia” in 2 Esd 14:24.

SELEUCIA, sel·é·u·kì·a (Σελεύκεια, Seleukía): The seaport of Antioch from which it is 16 miles distant. It is situated 5 miles N. of the mouth of the Orontes, in the northeastern corner of a fruitful plain at the base of Mt. Rousa or Plera, the modern Jebel multis, a spur of the Amanus Range. Built by Seleucus Nikator (d. 280 B.C.) it was one of the Syrian Tetrapolis, the others being Apamea, Laodicea and Antioch. The city was protected by nature on the mountain side, and, being strongly fortified on the S. and W., was considered invulnerable and the key to Syria (Strabo 751; Polyb. v.58).

It was taken, however, by Ptolemy Euergetes (1 Mac 11 8) and remained in his family till 219 BC, when it was recovered for the Seleucids by Antiochus I, who then newly adorned it. Captured again by Ptolemy Philometer in 146 BC, it remained for a short time in the hands of the Egyptians. Pompey made it a free city in 64 BC in return for its energy in resisting Tigranes (Pliny, NH, v.18), and it was then greatly improved by the Romans, so that in the 1st cent. AD it was in a most flourishing condition.

On their first missionary journey Paul and Barnabas passed through it (Acts 13 4; 14 26), and though it is not named in Acts 15 30-36, this route is again implied; while it is excluded in Acts 15 3.

The ruins are very extensive and cover the whole space within the line of the old walls, which shows a circuit of four miles. The position of the Old Town, where the City and the ruins may still be identified, as also that of the Antioch Gate, the Market Gate and the King's Gate, which last leads to the Upper City. There are rock-cut tombs, broken statuary and sarcophagi at the base of the Upper City, a position which probably represents the burial place of the Seleucids. The outline of a circus or amphitheater can also be traced, while the inner harbor is in perfect condition and full of water. It is 2,000 ft. long by 1,200 ft. broad, and covers 47 acres, being oval or pear-shaped. The passage seaward, now silted up, was protected by two strong piers or mole, which are locally named after Barnabas and Paul. The most remarkable of the remains, however, is the great water canal behind the city, which the emperor Constantius cut through the solid rock in 338 AD. It is 3,074 ft. long, has an average breadth of 20 ft., and is in some places 120 ft. deep. Two portions of 102 and 293 ft. in length are tunneled. The object of the work was clearly to carry the mountain torrent direct to the sea, and so protect the city from the risk of flood during the wet season.

Church synods occasionally met in Seleucia in the early centuries, but it gradually sank into decay, and long before the advent of Islam it had lost all its significance.

SELEUCIDAE, sél-é-úk'dé-a. See Seleucus.

SELEUCUS, sél-ú-kús (Σελεύκος, Seleukos):

(1) Seleucus I (Nicator, "The Conqueror"), the founder of the Seleucidæ or House of Seleucus, was an officer in the grand and thoroughly equipped army, which was perhaps the most important part of the inheritance that came to Alexander the Great from his father, Philip of Macedon. He took part in Alexander's Asiatic conquests, and on the division of these on Alexander's death he obtained the satrapy of Babylonia. By later conquests and under the name of king, which he assumed in the year 294, he became ruler of Syria and the greater part of Asia Minor. His rule extended from 312 to 280 BC, the year of his death; at least the Seleucid era which seems to be referred to in 1 Macc 16 is reckoned from Seleucus I, 312 BC to 65 BC, when Pompey reduced the kingdom of Syria to a Roman province. He followed generally the policy of Alexander in spreading Gr civilization. He founded Antioch and its port Seleucia, and is said by Jos (Ant. XII, iii, 1) to have conferred civic privileges on the Jews. The reference in Dan 11 5 which is usual to be to this ruler.

(2) Seleucus II (Callinicus, "The Gloriously Triumphant"), who reigned from 246 to 226 BC, was the son of Antiochus Soter and is the "king of the north" in Dan 11 7-9, who was expelled from his kingdom by Ptolemy Euergetes.

(3) Seleucus III (Ceroanus, "Thunderbolt"), son of Seleucus II, was assassinated in a campaign which he undertook into Asia Minor. He had a short reign of rather more than 2 years (220-223 BC) and is referred to in DRL 11 13-19.

(4) Seleucus IV (Philopator, "Fond of his Father") was the son and successor of Antiochus the Great and reigned from 187 to 175 BC. He is called 'King of Asia' (2 Macc 3 3), a title claimed by the Seleucidæ even after their serious losses in Asia Minor (see 1 Macc 8 6; 11 13; 12 29; 13 32). He was present at the decisive battle of Magnesia (190 BC). He was murdered by Heleodorus (q.v.), one of his own courtiers whom he had sent to plunder the Temple (2 Macc 3 1-40; Dan 11 20).

For the connection of the above-named Seleucidæ with the "ten horns" of Dan 7 24, the commentators must be consulted.

Seleucus V (125-124 BC) and Seleucus VI (95-93 BC) have no connection with the sacred narrative.

SELF-CONTROL, self-kon-trôl (ὑγείατεια, eghyd-tei-a): Rendered in AV "temperance" (cf Lat temperatio and continenda), but more accurately "self-control," as in RV (Acts 5 25; Gal 5 23; 2 Pet 1 6): adj. of same, ἐγκράτεια, egkratrēia, "self-controlled" (Tit 1 8 RV); cf vb. forms in 1 Cor 7 9, "have . . . continency"; 9 25, the athlete "exercised self-control." Self-control is therefore repeatedly set forth in the NT as among the important Christian virtues.

SELF-RIGHTEOUSNESS, self-r'fh-e-us-nes: A term that has come to designate moral living as a way of salvation; or as a ground for neglecting the redemptive work of Jesus Christ. The thought is present in the teaching of Jesus, who spoke one parable particularly to such as reckoned themselves to be righteous (Lk 18 9 ff). The Pharisees quite generally resented the idea of Jesus that all men needed repentance and that they were regarded as sinners and looked with contempt on "sinners." Paul in all his writings, esp. Rom 3; Gal 3; Eph 2; Phil 3, contrasts the righteousness that is God's gift to men of faith in Jesus Christ, with righteousness "of the law" and "in the flesh." By this latter he means formal conformity to legal requirements in the strength of unregenerate human nature. He is careful to maintain (cf Rom 7) that the Law is never really kept by one's own power. On the other hand, in full agreement with Jesus, Paul looks to genuine righteousness in living as the demand and achievement of salvation based on faith. God's gift here consists in the capacity progressively to realize righteousness in life (cf Rom 8 1 ff). See also SancTIFICATION. WILLIAM OWEN CAYVER

SELF-SURRENDER, self-su-ren'dé: The struggle between the natural human impulses of self-seeking, self-defence and the like, on the one hand, and the more altruistic impulse toward self-denial, self-surrender, on the other, is as old as the race. All religions imply some conception of surrender of self to deity, ranging in ethical quality from a heathen fanaticism which impels to complete physical exhaustion or rapture, superinduced by more or less mechanical means, to the high spiritual quality of self-sacrifice to the divinest aims and achievements. The Scriptures represent self-surrender as among the noblest of human virtues.
I. In the OT.—In the OT self-surrender is taught in the early account of the first pair. Each was to be given to the other (Gen 2 24; 3 16b) according to their gender, and was the loss of personality; it was the finding of the true selfhood (Mk 8 35; Mt 10 39). Our Lord not only taught self-surrender, but practised it. As a child, He submitted Himself to His parents (Lk 2 51).

Self-surrender marked His baptism and temptation (Mt 3 15; 4 1 f.). It is shown in His life of physical privation (8 20). He had come not to do His own will, but the Father's (Jn 4 34; 5 30; 6 38). He refuses to use force for His own deliverance (Mt 25 36; Jn 18 11). In His person God's will, not His own, must be done (Mt 26 28; Lk 22 42); and to the Father He at last surrendered His spiritual life (Lk 23 46). So that while He was no ascetic, and did not demand asceticism of His followers, He "emptied himself . . . becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross" (Phil 2 7; see Kenosia).

The early disciples practised the virtue of self-surrender. Counting none of their possessions their own, they gave to the good of all (Acts 2 44-45; 4 32-37). Stephen and Apostles others throw themselves in their witnessing with the perfect abandon of the martyr; and Stephen's successor, Paul, counted not his life dear unto himself that he might finish the Divinely appointed course (20 22 f.).

The Epp. of Peter are permeated with the doctrine of self-surrender. The Pauline Epp. are particularly full of it. The Christian life is conceived of as a dying self to and of Christ's world—a dying with Christ, a crucifixion of the old man, that a new man may live (Gal 2 20; 6 14; Col 2 20; 3 3; Rom 6 6), so that no longer the man lives but Christ lives in him (Gal 2 20; Phil 1 21). The Christian is no longer his own but Christ's (1 Cor 6 19-20). He is to be a living sacrifice (Rom 12 1); to die daily (1 Cor 15 31). As a corollary to surrender to God, the Christian must surrender himself to the welfare of his neighbor, just as Christ pleased not Himself (Rom 15 5); also to leaders (1 Cor 16 15), and to earthly rulers (Rom 13 1).

In the Epp. of Peter self-surrender is taught more than once. Those who were once like sheep astray now submit to the guidance of the Shepherd of souls (1 Pet 2 25).

II. In the NT.—In the NT self-surrender is still more clearly set forth. Christ's teachings and examples as presented in the Gospels, give it special emphasis. It is a prime requisite for becoming His disciple (Mt 10 38; 16 21; Lk 9 23-24). 50 f.; 14 27-33; cf Mt 19 27; Mk 8 34). When certain of the disciples were called they left all and followed (Mt 4 20; 9 9; Mk 2 14; Lk 5 27). His followers must so completely surrender as, that father, mother, kindred, and one's own life must be, as it were, hated for His sake (Lk 14 26). The rich young ruler must renounce self as an end and give his own life to the service of men (Mt 19 21; Mk 10 21; cf Lk 12 33). But this surrender of self was never a loss of personality; it was the finding of the true selfhood (Mk 8 35; Mt 10 39). Our Lord not only taught self-surrender, but practised it. As a child, He submitted Himself to His parents (Lk 2 51).

Self-surrender marked His baptism and temptation (Mt 3 15; 4 1 f.). It is shown in His life of physical privation (8 20). He had come not to do His own will, but the Father's (Jn 4 34; 5 30; 6 38). He refuses to use force for His own deliverance (Mt 25 36; Jn 18 11). In His person God's will, not His own, must be done (Mt 26 28; Lk 22 42); and to the Father He at last surrendered His spiritual life (Lk 23 46). So that while He was no ascetic, and did not demand asceticism of His followers, He "emptied himself . . . becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross" (Phil 2 7; see Kenosia).

The early disciples practised the virtue of self-surrender. Counting none of their possessions their own, they gave to the good of all (Acts 2 44-45; 4 32-37). Stephen and Apostles others throw themselves in their witnessing with the perfect abandon of the martyr; and Stephen's successor, Paul, counted not his life dear unto himself that he might finish the Divinely appointed course (20 22 f.).

The Christian is no longer his own but Christ's (1 Cor 6 19-20). He is to be a living sacrifice (Rom 12 1); to die daily (1 Cor 15 31). In the Epp. of Peter self-surrender is taught more than once. Those who were once like sheep astray now submit to the guidance of the Shepherd of souls (1 Pet 2 25)

Epistles of Peter: The Christian is to be like a child under the mighty hand of God (5 6); the younger to be subject to the elder (5 5); and all to civil ordinances for the Lord's sake (2 13).

So also in other Epp. The Christian is to subject himself to God (Jas 4 7; He 12 9).

SELF-WILL, self-will (τὸ ἐναρκτύνα; αὐτοδιάτυν), αὐτοθαλάττω: Found once in the OT (Gen 49 6, "In their self-will they hocked an ox") in the death song of Jacob (see Hock). The idea is found twice in the NT in the sense of "pleasing oneself": "not self-willed, not soon angry" (Tit 1 7); and"daring, self-willed", they tremble not to raise at digestion (2 Pet 2 10). In all these texts it stands for a false pride, for obstinacy, for "a pertinacious adherence to one's will or wish, esp. in opposition to the dictates of wisdom or propriety or the wishes of others." —Henry E. Dusker

SELL, SELLER, sellér. See TRADE; LYDIA.

SELVEDGE, sel'vej, k pérdì: The word occurs only in the description of the tabernacle (Ex 26 1; 36 19) —the seven curtains which oversee the boards of the sanctuary. Five of these formed one set and five another.
These were "coupled" at the center by 50 loops of blue connected by "clips" (q.v.) with 50 others on the opposite side. The "self-edge" (self-edge), is the extremity of the curtain in which the loops were.

SEM, sem (סֵם, סְמ): AV from the Gr form of Shem; thus RV (Lk 3:36).

SEMACHIAH, sem-a-khi (סְמַעְחָה, semakhāhā), "Jeh has sustained": A Korahite family of gatekeepers (1 Ch 26:7). Perhaps the same name should be substituted for "Ismaeliah" in 2 Ch 31:13 (see HFN, 201, 205).

SEMEI, sem-e'i: (1) (A, שֵׂמֶל, Seminar, B, שֵׂמֶל, Semel): One of those who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9:33) = "Shimei" of the sons of Hashum" in Est 10:33. (2) AV = RV "Semelos" (Ad. Est 11:2). (3) AV form of RV "Semelos" (Lk 3:26).

SEMEIAS, sē-mē'ē-as (Σαμέιας, Semeias; B, Σεμείας, Semeias; AV Semei): An ancestor of Mordecai (Ad. Est 11:2) = "Shimei" (Est 2:5).

SEMEIN, sē-mē'ē-in (Σαμέιν, Semein, A, Σαμείη, Seminar, B, Σαιμέη, Semait; AV Semei): An ancestor of Jesus in Lk's genealogy (Lk 3:26).

SEMEIS, sē-mē'ē-is (A and Fritzsche, Σαιμείας; B, Σαιμέης, Semeis; AV Semeis): One of the Levites who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9:23) = "Shimei" in Est 10:23.

SEMELIUS, sē-mēl'i-us: AV = RV Semellius (q.v.).

SEMIS, sē-mi's: AV = RV Semeis (q.v.).

SEMITES, sem'īt's, SEMITIC, sem'i't-ik.

LITERATURE
The words "Semites," "Semitic," do not occur in the Bible, but are derived from the name of Noah's eldest son, Shem (Gen 5:22; 6:10).

Euphrates. The greatest uncertainty is in the identification of Arpachshad, the most distinct ancestor of the Semitic branch of those of the Bible, and more recent importance.

2. The Five Sons
From him descended the Hebrews and of Shem the Arab tribes, probably also some East African colonies (Gen 10:24-30; 11:12-26). The form of his name (ןָרָֽפָֽכְּחָד, arpakshad) has given endless trouble to ethnographers. Most commonly divides the two words, Arpach or Arpath, unidentified, and keseth, the sing. of kaseth, i.e. the Chaldeans; Schrader also holds to the Chaldaean interpretation, and the Chaldeans themselves traced their descent from Arpachshad (Jos, Ant, i, vi, 4); it has been suggested also to interpret as the "border of the Chaldeans" (BDB; Dillmann, in loc.). But the historic, ordinary and most satisfactory identification is with Arapachyitis, N.E. of Assyria at the headwaters of the Upper Zab in the Armenian highlands (so Ptolemy, classical geographers, Gesenius, Delitzsch). Delitzsch calls attention to the Armenian termination shahd (Comm. on Gen, in loc.).

If we accept, then, this identification of Arpachshad as the most northeasterly of the five Sem families (Gen 10:22), we are still faced by the problem of the primitive origin of the racial and cultural groups of the Semites.

3. Original Home of the Semites
Various theories of course have been proposed; fancy and surmise have ranged from Africa to Central Asia. (1) The most common, almost generally accepted, theory places their beginnings in Arabia because of the conservative and primitive Semitic of the Arabic language, the desert characteristics of the various branches of the race, and the historic movements of Sem tribes northward and westward from Arabia. But this theory does not account for some of the most significant facts: e.g. that the Sem developments of Arabia are the last, not the first, in time, as must have been the case if Arabia was the cradle of the race. This theory does not explain the Sem origin of the Elamites, except by denial; much less does it account for the location of Arpachshad still farther north. It is not difficult to understand a racial movement from the mountains of the N.E. to the lowlands of the South and West. But a primitive Semites could have migrated uphill, as it were, to settle in the Median and Armenian hills is a much more difficult proposition.

(2) We must return to the historic and the more natural location of the ancient Sem home on the highlands and in the valleys of Asia Minor. The Sem branches of the eldest branch migrated in prehistoric times southward to become historic Elam; Lud moved westward into Asia Minor; Assur found his way down the Tigris to become the sturdy pastoral people of the middle Mesopotamian plain up to the time of the Bab colonists and civilization; Aram found a home in Upper Mesopotamia; while Arpachshad, remaining longer in the original home, gave his name to at least a part of it. There in the fertile valleys along the high hills the ancient Semites developed their distinctive tribal life, emphasizing the beauty and close relationship of Nature, the sacredness of the family, the moral obligation, and faith in a personal God of whom they thought as a member of the tribe or friend of the family. The confinements of the mountain valleys is just as adequate an explanation of the Sem traits as the isolation of the oasis. So from the purer life of their highland home, where had been developed the distinctive and virile elements which were to impress the Sem face of the history of the world, and increasing multitudes of Semites poured over the mountain barriers into the broader levels of the plains. As their own mountain springs and torrents sought a way to the sea down the Tigris and Euphrates beds, so the Sem tribes followed the same natural pathways. Edomites, Babylon, Assyria, Medo-Persia, Arabia, Pal. Then, when Aryan invaders pushed Arabia further into the interior of Africa as well as reascending into the desert west of the Euphrates, Syria and Pal. Thus Western Asia became the arena of Sem life, whose influences also reached Egypt. Through Phoenicia, the far-away West-Mediterranean.

While we may properly call Western and Southwestern Asia the home of the Sem peoples, there still remains the difficulty of separating the Sem from the other races that they possessed, and which became prevalent among them. The historic

4. Confusion with Babylonians, e.g., were Sem; yet Races they dispossessed an earlier non-Sem people, and were themselves frequently invaded by other races, such as the Hittites, and even the Egyptians. It is not certain which gods, customs, laws, etc., of the Babylonians were Sem, and not adopted from them as they superseded.

Assyria was racially purely Sem, but her laws, customs, language, and even her system of writing were acquired from Babylonia; to such an extent was this true that we are inclined to say that the Sem language is untrustworthy for much that we know of Bab religion, literature and tradition. In Syra also the same mixed conditions prevailed, for the same reason. Semitic was the language of the Pharaohs throughout the history of the nations, and Hittite and Mitannian at various times shared the land with her, and left their influence in Sem. Possibly in Arabia Sem blood ran purest, but even in Arabia there are tribes from other races; and the table of the nations in Gen divides that land among the descendants of both Ham and Sem (see Table of Nations). In Palestine, the Sem and Hittite influences were not separated until after the time of the conquest. The archaic remains of Hebrew, Aramaic, and Arabic must be regarded as true representations of the races of the land, holding outposts from their northern empire, even in the extreme south of Pal. Though the blue eyes and fair complexions of the Sem were common throughout the land, the typical Sem was a Semite, although uniformly these are represented in the OT as foreigners and enmities of alien races which the Hebrews were commanded to exterminate. The adoption of the Sem could be, and was, inimical to their own ancestral faith. Because of this, and eventually the language of the Sem, appropriated his art and conveniences, did traffic in his ships, and in Ahab's reign adopted his Baal and Anarchy, the Sem were not warranted at all in rushing to the conclusion that the Hebrews were a Sem type. Racial identification by linguistic argument is always precarious, as history clearly shows. One might as well say that Latin and the gospel were Saxon. There are indications that the Sem were the human race, and the language of the Hebrews were different from those of the people whom they subdued and dispossessed. Such is the consistent tradition of their race, the Bible always emphasizing the irreconcilable difference between the Sem and the other races of the land and the people of Canaan. We may conclude that the reasons for disregarding the classification of Gen with reference to the Semites and neighboring races are not final. Out from that fruitful womb of nations, the Cauc- casus, the Semites, one branch of the Caucasian peoples, were flung by the Persian and Aryan invaders. The Hamites went earlier toward the South and as their younger relatives, the Aryans, were to go northward and westward—with marked racial traits and a pronounced religious development, to play a leading part in the life of man.

6. Semitic Languages

The phrase Semitic Language is used of a group of languages which have marked features in common, which also set them off from other languages. We must avoid any erroneous inference that nations using the same or similar languages must be akin. There are other explanations of linguistic affinity than racial, as the Indians of Mexico may speak Spanish and yet have Sem systems of thought, etc. So also neighboring or intermingled nations may just as naturally have used branches of the Sem language stock. However, it is true that the nations which were truly Sem used languages which are strikingly akin. These have been grouped as (1) Eastern Sem, including Bab and Assy; (2) Northern, including Syrian and Aramaic; (3) Western, including Canaanite, or Phoenician, and Hebrew; and (4) Southern, including Arabic, Sabaeans and Ethiopic (of Gedem, Intro to the Heb Bible, 14-25). The distinctive features of this family of languages are (1) a tri-root, tri-consonantal, root; (2) the monosyllabic writing, vowel indications being frequently marked by a diacritic name or sign; (3) the usage of moods of verbs and in terms of the inflection, every action being graphically viewed as belonging to one of two standard classes. The inflection is incomplete, (4) the paucity of parts of speech, and (3) the frequent use of internal change in the inflection of words, e.g., the doubling of a consonant or the change of a vowel, and (6) the use of prefixes or suffixes in inflection. These are parts of speech or the words as a residuum of speech and writing.

Bab and Assy being ideographic and syllabic, and written from right to left. The Semitic alphabets were alphabetical and written from right to left. The Semitic forms and inflections of the group are best preserved in the Sem, by reason of the conservatism of the Sem peoples, and in the Assy by the sudden destruction of that empire and the burial of the records. The Semitic language in a comparatively pure state, to be brought back to light by Germany of 19th century, the characteristics given above are clearly manifest in the Heb of the OT.

In the study of Sem Religion there are two tendencies toward error: (1) the Western pragmatic method and unadulterated oriental Nature-symbols and vividly imaginative speech. Because the Semites used the figure of the rock (De 32, 4.18.30) in describing God, or poetically conceived of the storm as the chariot of the Chariot God, we must not be led into believing that his religion was a savage animism, or that Jeh of Israel was only the Zeus of the Greeks. How should an imaginative child of Nature speak of the unseen Spiritual Power, except in the richest analogies of Nature? (2) The second error is the tendency to treat the acceptions acquired by contact with other nations as the essence of Sem religion, e.g., the golden calf following the Egyptian bondage, and the sexual abominations of the Can. But the facts are just the opposite.

The primitive and distinctive beliefs of the Sem peoples lie still in great uncertainty because of the long association with other peoples, whose practices they readily took over, and because of the lack of records of the primitive periods of Sem development, their origin and dispersion among the nations being prehistoric. Our sources of information are the Bab and Assy tablets and monuments, the Egypt inscriptions, Phoen history, Arabian traditions and inscriptions, etc. These provide the data.

We can never know perhaps how much the pure Semitism of Babylonians and Assyrians was corrupted and distorted by the development civilization which they invaded and appropriated; Egypt was only indirectly affected by Sem life; Sem development in Arabia was the latest in the Sem areas in which the monuments and roots of Arabian antiquity which have come down to us are comparatively few; and the Phoen development was corrupted by the semiology of the ancient Canaanitish cults, while the Bible of the Hebrews emphasized the theism of the unwholesome religions of Pal their own faith, which was ancestral, revealed and pure. Was that Bible faith the primitive Sem cult? At least we must take the Heb tradition at its face value, for it enshrines Hebraic features of an ancient faith, preserved through one branch of the Sem group. We are met frequently in these Heb records by the claim that the religion they present is not a new development, nor a thing apart from the origin of their race, but rather the preservation of an ancient worship, Abraham, Moses, and the prophets appearing not as originators, but reformers, or revivers, who sought to keep their people true to an inherited religion. Its elemental features are the following:

(1) It was pronouncedly theistic; not that other religions do not affirm a god; but the theism of the Semites was such as to give their religion a unique place among all others. To say the least, it had the germ of or the tendency toward monothelism, if not enough evidence to form its mature theism, and to rate the later polytheistic representations of Babylonia and Assyria as local perversions. If the old view that Sem religion was essentially monothelistic be incapable of proof, it is true that the necessity of the concept of God must ultimately arrive at monothelism. This came to verification in Abram the Hebrew, Jesus the Messiah (Jo 4 21–24) and Mohammed the false prophet. A city-state exclusively, a nation predominantly, worshipped one god, often through some nature-symbol, as sun or star or element. With the coming of world-conquest, intercourse and vision, the one god of the city or the chief god of the nation became universalized. The ignorant and materialistic Hebrew might localize the God of Israel in a city or on a hilltop; but to the spiritual mind of Amos or in the universal vision of Isaiah He was Jehovah, Lord of all the earth.

(2) Closely related to this high conception of Deity was the apparently contradictory but really potent idea of the Deity as a personality. The Semite did not grossly materialize his God as did the savage, nor vacantly abstract and eterealize Him and so eliminate Him from the experience of man as did the Greek; but to him the Deity was a god personal and intimate. The Hebrew ran the risk of conditioning the spirituality of God in order to maintain His real personality. Possibly this has been the most potent element in Sem religion; God was not far from every one of them. He came into the closest relations as father or friend. He was the companion of king and priest. The affairs of the nation were under His immediate care; He went to war with armies, was a partner in harvest rejoicings, the home of peace. This conception of Deity carried with it the necessary implication of revelation (Am 3 8). The office, message and power of the Heb prophet were also the logical consequence of knowing God as a Person.

(3) Its peculiar view of Nature was another feature of Sem religion. God was everywhere and always present in Nature; consequently its symbolism was the natural and ready expression of His nature and presence. Simle, parable and Nature-marvels cover the pages and tablets of their records. Unfortunately this poetic conception of Nature qualified to some extent the “natural path in which wayward feet and carnal minds might travel toward Nature-worship with all of its formalism and its degrading excesses. This feature of Sem religion offers an interesting commentary on their philosophy. With them the doctrine of Second Causes received no emphasis; God worked directly in Nature, which became to them therefore the continuous arena of signs and marvels. The thunder was His voice, the sunshne reflected the light of His countenance, the winds were His messengers. And so through this imaginative view of the world the Semite dwelt in an enchanted realm of the miraculous.

(4) The Semite believed in a God who is a moral being. Such a faith in the nature of it was certain to influence profoundly their own moral development, making for them a racial character which has been distinctive and persistent through the changes of centuries. By it also they have impressed other nations and religions, with which they have had contact. The CH is an expression of the moral issues of the theism. The Law and the Prophets of Israel arose out of the conviction of God’s righteousness and of the moral order of His universe (Ex 19 6–5; Le 19 18–20).

While these elements are not absent altogether from other ancient religions, they are pronouncedly characteristic of the Sem to the extent that they have given to it its permanent place in its development, and its primacy among the religions of the human race. To know God, to hear His eternal word in Nature, to clothe Him with light as with a garment, to establish His throne in righteousness, to perceive the immensity and the holiness of His presence — such convictions were bound to affect the life and progress of a race, and to concentrate them as a nation of priests for all mankind.

Sennacherib, in his first campaign marched into Babylonia. He found Merodach-baladan in-trenched at Kish, about 9 miles from Babylon, and defeated him; after which he entered the gates of Babylon, which had been thrown open to him. He placed a Babylonian, named Bél-ibni, on the throne.

This campaign was followed by an invasion of the country of the Cassites and Isuabigalleans. In his third campaign he directed his attention to the W., where the people had become restless under the Assyry yoke. Hezekiah had been victorious over the Philis (2 K 18 8). In preparation to with-stand a siege, Hezekiah had built a conduit to bring water within the city walls (2 K 20 20). Although strongly opposed by the prophet Isaiah, gifts were sent to Egypt, whence assistance was promised (Isa 30 1-4). Apparently also the Phoenicians and Philis, who had been sore pressed by Assyry, had made provision to resist Assyry. The first move was at Ekron, where the Assyr governor Padi was put into chains and sent to Hezekiah at Jerus.

Sennacherib, in 701, moved against the cities in the W. He ravaged the environs of Tyre, but made no attempt to take the city. He then turned his naval force. After Eluæus the king of Sidon fled, the city surrendered without a battle, and Ethbaal was appointed king. Numerous cities at once sent presents to the king of Assyry. Ashkelon and other cities were also taken. They were entirely routed at Eltekeh, and Ekron was destroyed. He claims to have conquered 46 strongholds of Heze-kiah's territory, but he did not capture Jerus, for concerning the king he said, in his annals, "himself like a bird in a cage in Jerus, his royal city, I penned him." He states, also, how he reduced his territory, and how Hezekiah sent to him 30 talents of gold and 800 talents of silver, besides hostages.

The Bib. account of this invasion is found in 2 K 18 13-19 37; Isa 36, 37. The Assy account differs considerably from it; but at the same time it corroborates it in many details. One of the striking parallels is the exact amount of gold which Hezekiah sent to the Assyr king (see EXPO P, XII 225, 336).

In the following year Sennacherib returned to Babylonia to put down a rebellion by Bél-ibni and Merodach-baladan. The former was sent to Assyry, and the latter soon afterward died. Ashur-nadin-shum, the son of Sennacherib, was then crowned king of Babylon. A campaign into Cili-cia and Cappadoicia followed.

In 694 Sennacherib attacked the Elamites, who were in league with the Babylonians. In revenge, the Elamites invaded Babylonia and carried off Ashur-nadin-shum to Elam, and made Nergal-ushēzib king of Babylon. He was later captured and in turn carried off to Assyria. In 691 Sennacherib again directed his attention to the S., and at Khatulé fought with the combined forces. Two years later he took Babylon, and razed it to the ground.

In 681 Sennacherib was murdered by his two sons (2 K 19 37; see SAREZER). Esar-haddon their younger brother, who was at the time conducting a campaign against Ararat, was declared king in his stead. A. T. CLAY

SENSES, sensiz; The tr of ἀναθέτειν, anathe- teîn (He 5 14, "those who by reason of use have their sensibilities exercised to death"). The word means, primarily, the seat of the senses, the region of feeling; in the LXX of Jer 4 19, it represents the Heb שיר, "the walls of the heart" (see RV), and is used to denote the internal sense or faculty of perceiving and judging, which in He 5 14 is regarded as becoming perfected by use or exercise (cf Eph 4 12 f; 1 Tim 4 7; 2 Pet 3 18).

In 2 Esd 10 36 we have "Or is my sense deceived, or my soul in a dream?" Lat sensus, here "mind" rather than "sense." W. L. Walker

SENSUAL, sen'shənal (ψυχικός, psuchikós, "animal, "natural"): Bib. psychology has no Eng equivalent for this Gr original. Man subject to the lower appetites, "sarkiche, "fleshly," in the communion of his spirit with God he is "πνευματικός, pneumatikós, "spiritual." Between the two is the ψυχή, psuché, "soul," the center of his personal being. This ψυχή or "I" in each man is bound to the spirit, the higher nature; and to the body or lower nature.

The soul (psuché) as the seat of the senses, desires, affections, appetites, passions, i.e. the lower animal nature common to man with the beasts, was distinguished in the Pythagorean and Platonic philosophy from the higher rational nature (nous, poiein).

The subjection of the soul to the animal nature is man's debasement, to the spirit indwelt by God is his exaltation. The Eng equivalent for psuchikos, "psychic," does not express this debasement. In the NT 'sensual' indicates man's subjection to self and self-interest, whether animal or intellectual—the selfish man in whom the spirit is degraded into subordination to the debased psuché, "soul." This debasement may be (1) intellectual, "not wisdom from above, but earthly, sensual" (Jas 3 15); (2) carnal (and of course moral), "sensual, having not the Spirit" (Jude ver 19). It ranges all the way from sensuality to self-indulgence in gross immorality. In the utter subjection of the spirit to sense it is the utter exclusion of God from the life. Hence the "natural [psychikon] man receives not the things of the Spirit of God" (1 Cor 2 14).

SENT (σήμερα, shēlāh; οἰκητικος, apostēlō): "Sent" in the OT is the tr of shēlāh, "to send!" (of presents, messengers, etc, Gen 26 18; 44 3; Josh 6 14; 1 K 14 6; Est 3 13; Prov 17 11; Jer 49 14; Ezk 3 25, 39; Dtn 10 11; Ob ver 1); of ευδοκία, ευδοκιματικός, "sent" (Ex 15 10; 29 5, and psuchikos, "psychic," does not express this debasement. In the NT "sensual" indicates man's subjection to self and self-interest, whether animal or intellectual—the selfish man in whom the spirit is degraded into subordination to the debased psuché, "soul." Literature

I. Importance.—The Gr VS of the OT commonly known as the Septuagint holds a unique place among translations. Its importance is many-sided. Its chief value lies in the fact that it is a VS of a Heb text earlier by about a millennium than the earliest dated Heb MS extant (916 AD), a VS, in particular, prior to the formal rabbinical revision of the Heb which took place early in the 2d cent. AD. It supplies the materials for the reconstruction of an older form of the Heb than the MT reproduced in our modern Bibles. It is, moreover, a pioneering work; there was probably no precedent in the world's history for a series of translations from one language into another on so extensive a scale. It was the first attempt to reproduce the Heb Scriptures in another tongue. It is one of the outstanding results of the breaking-down of international barriers by the conquests of Alexander the Great and the dissemination of the Gr language, which were fraught with such vital consequences for the history of religion. The cosmopolitan city which he founded in the Delta witnessed the first attempt to bridge the gulf between Jewish and Gr thought. The Jewish commercial settlers at Alexandria, forced by circumstances to abandon their language, clung tenaciously to their faith; and the tr of the Scriptures into their adopted language, produced to meet their own needs, had the further result of isolating the outside world from the edge of their history and religion. Then came the most momentous event in its history, the starting-point of a new life; the tr was taken over from the Jews by the Christian church. It was the Bible of most writers of the NT. Not only are most of their express citations from Scripture borrowed from it, but their writings contain numerous reminiscences of its language. Its words are household words to them. It laid for them the foundations of a new religious and literary weapon for missionary work, and, when VS of the Scriptures into other languages became necessary, it was in most cases the LXX and not the Heb from which they were made. Prescient among these daughter VSs was the Old Lat which preceded the Vulg. Jerome's VS, for the most part a direct tr from the Heb, was in portions a mere revision of the Old Lat; our Prayer-book VS of the Psalter preserves peculiarities of the LXX, transmitted through the medium of the Old Lat. The LXX was also the Bible of the early Gr Fathers, and helped to mold dogma; it furnished proofs-texts to both parties in the Arian controversy. Its language gives it another strong claim to recognition. Unrapid and unclassical as much of it appears, we now know that this is not wholly due to the hampering effects of translation. "Biblical Greek," once considered a distinct species, is now a rather discredited term. The hundreds of contemporary papyrus records (letters, business and legal documents, etc) recently discovered in Egypt illustrate much of the vocabulary and grammar and go to show that many so-called "Hebraisms" were in truth integral parts of the koino, or "common language," i.e. the international form of Greek which, since the time of Alexander, replaced the old dialects, and of which the spoken Gr of today is the lineal descendant. The VS was made for the populace and written in large measure in the language of their everyday life.

II. Name.—The name "Septuagint" is an abbreviation of Interpretatio secentum (or justa) Septuaginta senioris (or viros), i.e. the Gr tr of the OT of which the first instalment was, according to the Alexandrian legend (see III, below), contributed by 70 (or 72) elders sent from Jesus to Alexandria for the purpose at the request of Ptolemy II. The legend in its oldest form restricts their labors to the Pent, but they were afterward credited with the tr of the whole Bible, and before the 4th cent. It had become customary to apply the title to the whole collection: Aug., De Civ. Dei, xvii.42, "quorum interpretatio ut Septuaginta vocetur iam obtinuit consuetudo" ("whose tr is now by custom called the Septuagint"), The "Septuagint" is a Greek translation of the Old Testament under the abbreviation of o' ("the seventy") or o'q' ("the seventy-two"). The "Septuagint" and the abbreviated form "LXX" have been the usual designations hitherto, but, as these are based on a now discredited legend, they are coming to be replaced by "the OT in Greek," or "the Alexandrian version" with the abbreviation of Β.

III. Traditional Origin.—The traditional account of the tr of the Pent is contained in the so-called De Aristarchus text (Ed Ostr text, W. Wendland, Teubner series, 1890, and Thackeray in the App. to Swete's Life of Ptolemy introd to the OT in Gr, 1900, etc; Wendland's sections cited below appear in Swete's Life, introd ed 2; ET by Thackeray, Macmillan, 1904, reprinted from JQR, XV, 357, and by H. T. Andrews in Charles' Apocr. and Pseudepigrapha of the OT, II, 53-122, Oxford, 1913).

The writer professes to be a high official at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphia (285-247 BC), a Greek interested in Jewish antiquities.

1. Letter of Aristeas. The Philohistorian Aristeas he describes an embassy to Jesus on which he has recently been sent with another courtier, Andreas. According to his narrative, Demetris of Phalerum, a prominent figure in later Athenian history, who here appears as a royal librarian at Alexandria, convinced the king of the importance of securing for his library a tr of the Jewish Law. The king at the same time, to propitiate the nation from whom he was asking a favor, consented on the suggestion of Aristeas, to liberate all Jewish slaves in Egypt: he seventy), of the letters which passed between Ptolemy and Eleazar, the high priest at Jerusalem. Ptolemy requests Eleazar to select and dispatch to Alexandria 72 elders, proficient in the Law, 6 from each tribe, to undertake the tr, the importance of which task requiring the services of a large number to secure an accurate VS. Eleazar complies with the request and names of the selected translators are appended to his letter.

A translation follows a detailed description of the offerings sent by Ptolemy for the temple: (2) a sketch of the temple and its services, and the geography of Alexandria; (3) a list of the books of the Law, and the explanation of each book, its history, and the setting of the story of the book's discovery in the temple; (4) an exposition of the Law.

The translators arrive at Alexandria, bringing a copy of the Law written in letters of gold on rolls of skins, and are honorably received by Ptolemy. A seven days' banquet follows, at which the king tests the proficiency of each in the task questions. Three days later Demetrius conducts them across the mole known as the Heptastadion to the island of Pharos, where, with all necessary provisions for their convenience, they complete their task, as by a miracle, in 20 days; they told that their work was the result of collaboration and comparison. The completed VS was read by Demetrius to the Jewish community, who received it with enthusiasm and begged that a copy might be intrusted to their leaders; a solemn curse was pronounced on any who should venture to add to or subtract from or make any alteration in the tr. The whole VS was then read aloud to the king who expressed his admiration and his priest Gr writers had remained in ignorance of its contents; he directed that the books should be preserved with scrupulous care.

To set aside this account we have two pre-Christian allusions in Jewish writings. Aristobulus, addressing a Ptolemy who has been identified as Philometer (182-146 BC), repeats the statement that the Pent was tr under Philadelphia at the instance of Demetrius Phalerus (Euseb., Hist. Eccl. III, 12.614); but the author of Aristeas, in 11.12.664b, says that the Ptolemaic kings, the Linaves, alsoadd the missing tr, adding a tr of the significance of the passage is doubtful. Philo, 7.11.685ff, accepts the Aristeas text. The main features of the story were believed at Alexandria within a century of the date assigned by Aristeas to the tr. Philo (Vit. Mosis, ii.5 ff) repeats the story of the sending of the trs by Eleazar at the request of Philadelphia, adding that in his day the completion of the undertaking was celebrated by an annual festival on the island of Phares. It is improbable that an artificial production like the Aristeas text should have been accepted by the Jews of Philadelphia; Philo's evidence seems therefore to rest in part on an independent tradition. His account in one particular paved the way for later accretions; he hints at the inspiration of the translators and the miraculous agreement of their separate trs. We may suppose that they prophezed like men possessed, not one in one way and one in another, but all producing the same words and phrases as though some unseen promter were at the ears of each.
4. Criticism
It is unhistorical, in particular the reported fessed date and nationality of the Aristaea writer. Its claims are not authenticated.

Yet it has long been recognized that much of the text is unhistorical, in particular the reported fessed date and nationality of the Aristaea writer. Its claims are not authenticated.

5. Date
In discussing the date and nationality of the Aristaea writer, it is important to note that the manuscript is believed to be from the first century, although the exact date is not known. The manuscript is believed to have been written in Alexandria, as the name of the city is mentioned in several places. The manuscript is also believed to have been written in Greek, as indicated by the use of the Greek alphabet.

6. Prolegomena to Strach.
The translator dates his work from the time of the emperor Augustus, using the same dates as those used in Strach's work. He argues that the manuscript was written in Alexandria, as the name of the city is mentioned in several places.

its own. Used for centuries by both Jews and Christians it underwent corruption and interpolation, and, notwithstanding the multitude of materials for its restoration, the original text has yet to be recovered. We have now more certain knowledge of the rabbinic "spesissima verba" of the NT writers than of the original Alexandrian VS of the OT. This does not apply to all portions alike. The Gr Pent., e.g., has survived in a relatively pure form. But everywhere we have to be on our guard against interpolations, sometimes extending to whole paragraphs. Not a verse is without its array of variant readings. An indication of the amount of "mixture" which has taken place is afforded by the numerous "doubtlets" or alternative renderings of a single Heb word or phrase which appear side by side in the transmitted text.

Textual corruption began early, before the Christian era. We have seen indications of this in the letter of Aristene (III, 5, 9) above. Traces of corruption appear in Philo's Corrup. Text (e.g. his comment, in Quis Rer. Div. 1:6, 15, on the interpretation of the Heb text which place about this time. No actual record of this revision exists, but it is beyond doubt that it originated in the rabbinical school, of which Rabbi Akiba was the chief representative, and which had its center at Jamnia in the years following the destruction of Jerus. The Jewish doctors, their temple in ruins, concentrated their attention on the settlement of the text of the Scriptures which remained to them. This school of eminent critics, precursors of the Masoretes, besides settling outstanding questions concerning the Canon, laid down strict rules for Bib. interpretation, and in all probability established the official revis. of the text.

But another cause widened still farther the distance between the texts of Jesus and Alexandria.

2. Official Revision of Hebrew Text c 100 AD

This was the adoption of the LXX by the Christian church. When Christ and the Palestinian Heb text reached an acute stage. One cause of this was the revision of the Heb text which took place about this time. No actual record of this revision exists, but it is beyond doubt that it originated in the rabbinical school, of which Rabbi Akiba was the chief representative, and which had its center at Jamnia in the years following the destruction of Jerus. The Jewish doctors, their temple in ruins, concentrated their attention on the settlement of the text of the Scriptures which remained to them. This school of eminent critics, precursors of the Massoretes, besides settling outstanding questions concerning the Canon, laid down strict rules for Bib. interpretation, and in all probability established the official revis. of the text.

But another cause widened still farther the distance between the texts of Jesus and Alexandria.

3. Adoption of LXX by the Christian Church

This was the adoption of the LXX by the Christian Church. The Christians, in proof of their doctrines, the Jews began to question its accuracy. Hence mutual recriminations which are reflected in the pages of Justin's Dialogue with Trypho. "They dare to assert," says Justin (Dial., 68), "that the interpretation produced by your seventy elders under Ptolemy of Egypt is in some points inaccurate." A crucial instance cited by the Jews was the rendering "virgin" in Isa 7:14, where they claimed with justice that "virginwoman" would be a more accurate. Justin refutes by charging the Jews with deliberate excision of passages favorable to Christianity.

That such accusations should be made in those critical years was inevitable, yet there is no evidence of any material interpolations having been introduced by either party. But the Alexandrian VS, in view of the revised text and the new and stricter rules of interpretation, was adopted by the Jews to be inadequate, and a group of new translations of Scripture in the 2d cent. AD supplied the demand. We possess considerable fragments of the work of three of these translators, viz. Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion, besides scanty remnants of further anonymous VSS.

The earliest of the three was Aquila. A proselyte to Judaism, and, like his NT namesake, a native of Pontus. He flourished, probably, about 117-135 AD. He is known to have translated his OT, not wholly trustworthy, under Hadrian (117-138 AD) and was related to that emperor: there is no impossibility for "philosophus" that Hadrian intrusted to Aquila the superintendence of the building of the Septuagint; and an old tradition has it that there was he converted to Christianity by Christian eyes returning from Pella, but that his refusal to abandon paganism he was forced to recant, and was put to death as a Jew and was actuated by a bias against Christianity in his translation. This view of the OT is that is certain of the New Testament, in particular of Rabbi Akiba (95-135 AD), and that his VS was an attempt to reproduce exactly the revised official text. The result was an extraordinary production, unparalleled in Gr Lat., if it can be classed under that category at all. No jot or tittle of the Heb might be neglected. Consistency was the rule of each Heb word must be preserved and the etymological kinship of different Heb words represented. Such were some of his leading principles. The opening words of his tr (Gen 1:1) may be rendered. In heading founded food with the heavens and with the earth, or "summary" was selected because the Heb word for "beginning" (r'sh'm'a) is a derivative word and, hence, may be a corruption of the word (Heb) prefixed to the verse of the case, but indistinguishable from the preposition "with." Hence, the NT translators, as seen in the Acc., had not tr, but written in archaic Heb characters.

A slave to the Heb text," as Origen has aptly been described by a modern writer as "a colossal crib" (Burkitt, JQR, October, 1896, 207 ff). Yet it was a great success in its time. It must be regarded as the standard of Heb, and continued in use for several centuries; Justinian expressly sanctioned its use in the synagogues (Nov., 146). Its lack of style and violation of the laws of grammar were not due to ignorance of Gr, of which the writer shows himself acquainted, or to a considerable command, its importance lay and lies (as far as it is preserved) in its exact reproduction of the rabbinical text of the 2d cent. AD. It may be regarded as the beginning of the scientific study of the Heb Scriptures. Though it was bold attempt at the translation, it cannot be charged with being intentionally antagonistic to Christianity. If the original was not only confined to extracts in MS, the latest fragments were recovered from the Cairo Geniza in 1897 and edited by F. C. Burkitt (Fragnments of the Books of Kings, 1897; Hebrew-Gr Greek Palimpsest, 1900). The student of Swete's OT will trace Aquila's unmistakable style in the footnotes to the Books of S and K: the order and shorter B text in those books has constantly been supplemented in the A text from Aquila. A longer specimen of his work occurs in his translation of the Psalms. It is no claim to be regarded as "Septuagint"; Jerome refers to a second ed of Aquila's VS, and the Gr Eccl. is perhaps his ed of this book. Aquila's VS was an invaluable Heb text (McNicol, Introd. to Eccl. Cambridge, 1904, App. 4). The suggestion of the Vulgate translator, with Onkelos, author of the Tg of that name, has been generally accepted.

Epiphanius gives an account of the dates and history of Theodotion and Symmachus is trustworthy. He mentions their being reversed or probably misted by the order of the tre in the columns of the Hexapla (see below). He also apparently confused Aquila and Theodotion in calling the latter a native of Pontus. As regards date, Theodotion's critics are alleged, preceded Symmachus and probably flourished under M. Aurelius (161-80), whereas Symmachus lived under Commodus (180-192). Irenaeus mentions both Aquila and Theodotion, and that of Symmachus had in his day either been produced or at least not widely circulated. According to the testimony of Irenaeus, Theodotion was an Ephesian and a convert to Judaism. He constantly agrees with the LXX, and was rather a revision of it, to bring it into accord with the current Heb text, than an independent work. The supplementation of the LXX by "laxness in the LXX, and the fact that the older VS of some books did not aim at completeness, but merely to reproduce them from the base line of some lacunae were greatest in job and his VS of that book was much longer than the LXX. The text of job printed in Swete's ed is the patchwork of old and new. A learned and careful reader may detect the Theodotion portions by transliterations and other peculiarities. Theodotion's VS is preserved in cod. Q in Jer. As regards the additional matter contained in LXX, Theodotion was inconsistent. It is admitted, e.g., that in Ps 119:164 (Sus, Bel and the Three), but did not apparently admit the non-canonical books and adopted his Dn in place of the inadequate LXX VS, which has survived in only one Gr MS; but the date when the change took place is unknown and the early history of the two Gr texts is obscure. Theodotion's renderings have been found in writings before his time ('aet. vic.) and, it is reasonably conjectured, that even before the 3rd cent. AD the LXX text had been discarded and that Theodotion's VS IS but a working copy of the anti-Hebraic VS. Theodotion is from the barbarisms of Aquila, but is addicted to transliteration and to the proliferation of the Heb. text into Gr letters. His reasons for this habit are not always clear; ignorance of Heb will not account for all (cf VIII. 1, (a), below).

Beside the two VSS produced by, and primarily intended for, the Septuagint, there are other materials in the Hebrew which have some affinity to the text of either the LXX or the Heb. The first of these is the so-called Hexapla; the second, probably in the main, is the set of manuscripts, which have been given the name of the so-called Targums. Both will be considered in the sequel.
then, with the complete array of signs, we should not have "the original LXX," but merely, after removing the asterisked passages, a text current in the 3d cent. The fact has to be emphasized that Origen's gigantic work was framed on erroneous principles. He assumed (1) the purity of the current Heb text, (2) the corruption of the current LXX text where it deviated from the Heb. The modern critic recognizes that the LXX on the whole represents the older text, the divergencies of which from the Heb are largely due to the official revision of the latter early in the Christian era. He recognizes also that in some books (e.g. Job) the old Gr VS was only a partial one. To reconstruct the original text he must therefore recourse to other authorities beside Origen.

Such assistance is partly furnished by two other recensions made in the century after Origen. Jerome (Prefat. in Paralip.), ref. to Ado. Ref., II, 27) states that in the 4th cent. three recensions circulated in different parts of the Christian world: "Alexandria and Jerome Egypt in their Septuagint acclaim Hesychius as their authority, the region from Constantinople to Antioch approves the copies of LXX there, the interior, the Palestinian provinces recognized the MSS which were promulgated by Eusebius and Pamphilus on the basis of Origen's labors, and the whole world is divided between these three varieties of text.

Hesychius is probably to be identified with the martyr bishop mentioned by Eusebius (HE, VIII, 13) along with another scholarly martyr, Hesych Phileus bishop of Thmuis, and it is thought that these two were engaged in revising the LXX text at the time when Pamphilus and Eusebius were employed on a similar task under similar conditions. How far existing MSS preserve the Hesychian recension is uncertain; agreement of their text with that of the Egyptian, VSS and Fathers (Cyril in particular) is the criterion. For the Prophets Ceriani has identified cod. Q and its kin as Hesychian. For the Octateuch N. McLean (JTS, II, 306) finds the Hesychian text in a group of cursive MSS, 44, 74, 78, 84, 106, 154, etc. Consult the first installment of the Cambridge LXX the raise the question whether cod. B (Vaticanus) may not itself be Hesychian; its text is more closely allied to that of Cyril Alex. than to any other patristic text, and the consensus of these two witnesses against the readings of the text (Exx. 31:16, 34:12) is early striking.

In the Psalter also Rahlfis (Septuaginta- Studien, 2, Heft, 1907, 235) traces the Hesychian text in B and partially in S (Sinait.). Cf von Soden's solution for the NT and see TEXT and MSS of the NT.

The Lucianic recension was the work of another martyr, Lucian of Antioch (d. 311-12), probably with the collaboration of the Hebraist.

12. Lucianic Dorotheus. There are, as Hort has Recension shown, reasons for associating Lucian with a "Syrian" recension of the NT in the 4th cent., which became the dominant type of text. That he produced a Syrian recension of the Gr OT is expressly stated by Jerome, and we are moreover able with considerable certainty to identify the extant MSS which exhibit it. The identification, due to Field and Lagarde, rests on these grounds: (1) certain verses in 2 K are in the Arab. Syro-Hexaplar marked with the letter L, and a note explains that the letter indicates Lucianic readings; (2) the readings so marked occur in the text of the Syro-Hexaplar, (3) the MSS in the historical books agree with the LXX citations of the Antiochene Fathers Chrysostom and Theodoret. This clue enabled Lagarde to construct a Lucianic text of the historical books (Librorum Vet. Test. canonici pars prior, Gottingen, 1883); his death prevented the completion of the work. Lagarde's edition is vitiated by the fact that he does not quote the readings of the individual MSS composing the group, and it can be regarded only an approximate reconstruction. It is evident, however, that the Lucianic LXX possessed much the same qualities as the Syrian recension of the NT; lucidity and completeness were the main objects. It is a full text, the outcome of a desire to include, so far as possible, the evidence to which the Lucianic text is consequently numerous. While this confutation of texts detracts from its value, the Lucianic recension gains importance from the fact that the sources from which it gleaned include an element of antiquity which the Hexapla lacks; where it unites with the Old Lat VS against all other authorities its evidence is invaluable.

VI. RECONSTRUCTION OF LXX TEXT; VERSIONS, MANUSCRIPTS AND PRINTED EDITIONS. The task of restoring the original text is beset with difficulties. The materials (MSS, VSS, patristic citations) are abundant, but none has escaped "mixture," and the principles for reconstruction are not yet securely established (Swete, Uro, iv—vi; III, vi).

Among the chief aids to restoration are the daughter VSS made from the LXX, and above all the Hexapla, more especially (pre-Hieronymian) Vs, for the earliest Latin Old Lat. Old Lat. of the 2d cent. AD, i.e. before Origen, and contains a text from which the astierisked passages in Hexapla to VSS are absent; it thus "brings us the best independent proof that we have that the Hexapla signs introduced by Origen can be relied on for the reconstruction of the LXX" (Buxtorf). The Old Lat also enables us to recognize the ancient element in the Lucianic recension. But the Lat evidence itself is not by any means a pure Egyptian text and the 16th speaks of the infinite variety of Late, though they may ultimately prove all to fall into two main families, African and European. The addition of patristic quotations from the Old Lat is still useful, though tending verified by recent editions of the Fathers. Of Old Lat MSS one of the most important is the cod. Lugdunensis, edited by U. Robert (Pentateuch e cod. Lugd., vers. Lat. antiquissima, Paris, 1831; Stutt- tatech. partis post. vers. Lat. antiqu. e cod. Lugd., Lyon, 1909). The student should consult also Burkitt's ed. of The Rules of Tertullian ("Texts and Studies," III, 1, Cambridge, 1894) and The Old Latin and the Ita (ib., IV, 3, 1896). Jerome's Vulgate is mainly a direct text from the Heb, but the Vulg. Psalter, the so-called Gallican, is one of Jerome's two revisions of the LXX. His later VS from the Heb, and some details in our Prayer-Book Psalter are ultimately derived from the VSS made from the LXX. Parts of the Apocalypse (Wis. Ecclus. Bar. 1 and 2 Macce) are also pure Old Lat., untouched by Jerem.

The early date (3d cent. AD) once claimed for the VSS or Origenic (Bohajian, Lower Egypt, Sahidic or Upper Egypt, and Middle Egypt) has not been confirmed by later researches, at least as regards the first-named, which is probably not earlier than the 3d or 4th cent. AD. Rahlfis (Septuaginte-Studien, 1, 1907) identifies the Boharian Psalter as the Hesychian recension. The Sahidic VS of Job has fortunately preserved the shorter text lacking the later insertions from Theodotion (Lagarde). As regards the rest of the VS, this does not conclusively prove that it is pre-Origenic; it may be merely a Hexaplar text with the asterisked passages omitted (Buxtorf, E.B., IV, 5027). The influence of the Hexapla is traceable elsewhere in this VS.

The Ethiopic MS is made from the Gr and in part at least from an early text; Rahlfis (Sept Stud., 1, 1904) considers its text of S-K, with that of cod. B, to be pre-Hexaplar.

The Vulg or Peshitta Syriac VS was made from the Heb, though partly influenced by the LXX, and another Syriac MS of primary importance is the LXX text, viz. that of Paul, bishop of Todla (Constantin in Mesopotamia) executed at Alexandria, known as the Syro-Hexaplar. This is a half VS of the LXX column of the Hexapla, containing the Hexaplar signs. MS of the present and previously MS of the present are extant (Lagarde and Rahlfis, Bibliotheca Syrian, Gottingen, 1892). This VS supplements the Gr Hexapla, the principal authority for Origen's text. For the original VS of Dult, which has survived in only one late MS, the
The Armenian VS (ascribed to the 5th cent.) also owes its character largely to its MSS: its text of the Octateuch is largely Hexaplaric.

A bare mention must suffice of the Arabic VS (of which the chief, the Sakhīrāt, was rendered from the LXX); the fragments of the Gothic VS (made from the Luscinian recension), and the Savtian (party of the Tiberian) Hebrew and Greek MSS, were also early renderings from the LXX.

For a full description of the Gr MSS see Swete, Intro, I, ch v. They will accordingly be treated in three groups (variants or minuscules) into uncials and cursives, the former ranging from the 4th cent. (Pist perfecta, 397 a.d.) to the 10th cent. (Nestle in πîνακα, xxiii, 208) to the 13th cent. (Glycon, 1252) to the 16th cent. (AD). Complete Bibliae are few: the majority contain groups of books only, such as the Pent, Octateuch (Gen-Ruth), the later historical books, the Psalter, the 3 or 5 "Solomonic" books, the Prophets (major, minor, propheticas, or common)—commonly denoted by capital letters (in the ed of Holm in Göttinger Pausch Roman figures); cursives, of which over 800 are known, by Arabic figures; in the larger Cambridge LXX the selected cursives are denoted by small Roman letters.

The following are the chief uncials containing, or wholly or partly, the Bible (by place of discovery): at Rome (4th cent. AD), adopted as the standard text in the Vulgate; 8 or T (Sinaïticus, at St. Petersburg and Leipzig, 4th cent. AD), discovered by Tischendorf in 1844 and subsequent years in St. Catherine's, Mt. Sinai, British Museum, Paris, 5th cent. AD; C (Ephraemi scriptor Paris, probably of the 5th cent., underlies a medieval Gr text of works of Ephraem the Syrian. For the Octateuch and historical books: D (Cottonianus, British Museum, 5th cent. AD); E (Vindobonensis, Vienna, 6th cent. AD), fragment of the Octateuch; G (Sarrazinianus, fragments at Leyden, Paris and St. Petersburg, 4th to 5th cent.); H (Vindobonensis, Vienna, 7th cent.), fragments of the New Testament on purple leaves; M (Cambridgianus, Paris, 7th cent.), important on account of its marginal Hexaplaric matter. For the Prophets: Q (Marshallianus, Rome, 6th cent.) is valuable, both for its text, which is "Hesychian" (see above), and for its abundant marginal Hexaplaric matter. A curious mixture of uncials and cursives is found in E (Bodleianus, probably 5th cent.), fragments of the historical books (3 R 18 258) preserved at Oxford. Cambridge (1 leaf), St. Petersburg and London; Tischendorf, who brought the MS from his Oxford visit, described it as being quite a first-aid guide to the Hexaplaric leab; that which the translation from uncial to cursive script occurs, until his death. The long-concealed fact that the scribes were for a part of a series of MS cameras in light through Swete's identification of the Cambridge leab: the main MSS were not included. Many of the cursives still await investigation, as do also the lectionaries. The latter, though the MSS are mainly late, the use of the LXX lectionary purposes was inherited by the church from the second and third stages. MSS may represent an old system; light may also be expected from them at the local distribution of various types of text.

Of the printed text the first four editions were (1) the Complutensian Polyglot of Cardinal Ximenes, 1514-17, comprising the Heb, Vulg, and LXX texts the last in the middle place of honor being compared to Jesus in the midst between them, and was based on MSS from the Vatican and one from Venice; it exhibits on the whole the Luscinian recension, as the Hesychian is by a curious coincidence represented in (2) the Aldine ed of 1518, based on Venetian MSS. (3) The ed, published at Rome in 1726 under the auspices of Pope Sixtus V and frequently reprinted until the 19th cent., based on the cod. Sinaiticus, the authorship of which text is justly recognized in the inestimable past, (printed in Swete's Intro). (4) The English Bible began by being based on (id. 1712) was based on the cod. Alexandrinus, with aid from other MSS, and had the authority of the principal employed Origen's corrector, and different sizes of letters to show the divergence between the GR and the Heb. Of more recent importance, (5) the great Oxford ed of Holmes and Parsons (Oxford, 1818-1827, 5 vols) was the first attempt to bring together in a gigantic synopsis the evidence of the oldest and critical MSS (upward of 200). VSS and early citations from Pseudepigrapha are also mentioned. (6) The most important of Swete's ed (8th cent.), ed 3, 1901-7, 3 vols, or, in the hands of all serious LXX students. The text is that of B, or where B fails of A, and the apparatus contains the readings of the principal uncials MSS. New materials discovered since the ed of H and P, especially the former, are employed. In the presentation of the other evidence has been made possible by photography. The fact that the text here printed is but a provisional one explains why it is the Office of the Pent has (1913) appeared (The OT in Gr, ed A. E. Brooke and N. Mclean, Cambridge, 1911 pt. III, 5 vols, and D). These MSS, all that from Ex onward a few alterations of errors in the original MS have been corrected, and while the editors have rejected a few old readings without sufficient regard to the peculiarities of Hellenistic GT, the importance and the work of correcting the LXX text on the basis of the cursives. The materials of H and P are brought to date and presented in a more reliable and convenient form. Besides these, there is (7) a facsimile of the LXX text on the basis of the reconstruction of the Luscinian of the historical books, which, as stated, must be used with caution (see above).

The task of reconstructing the oldest text is still unaccomplished. Materials have accumulated, and much preliminary "spade-work" has been done, but the task remains almost as great as in Swete, Intro, 484 ff. and more recently by Nestle and Rahlfs; but the principles of the editor must be finally determined. The extent to which "critical" editions of the LXX are the stumbling-block. Clearly no single MS presents the oldest text. That of cod. B, as in the NT, is in the whole, the purest. In the first (1-2 K), e.g., it has escaped the grosser interpolations found in most VSS. The editors agree in regarding its text as pre-Origenic. It is, however, of unequal value and by no means an infallible guide; in gr, e.g., its text is undoubtedly late, in earlier periods. To 4th cent. AD, according to one authority, (Moore, "Jgs," TIC) in relation to two of the 4th cent. MSS, and to 5th cent. AD, one or neither predominantly Luscinian nor Hexaplaric; but it has been regarded by some authorities as Hesychian. Possibly the text reconstructed in the present work introduced the LXX adhered more closely than others to the primitive text. In L (H. Rahlfs, 1923) the text is of course older, and may prove to be original. Still even its purest portions contain marks of editorial revision and corrupt corrections. Cod. A presents a quite different type of text, approximating to that of the MT. In the books of "gen" it is practically Hexaplaric text without the critical signs, the additional matter being mainly derived from Aquila. Yet that it contains an ancient element is shown by the large support given to its readings by the NT and early Christian writers. Individual MSS must give place to groups. In order to reconstruct the texts current here, the evidence of the groups containing the three 4th cent. MSS, and to eliminate from the readings of the other MSS, the Hexaplaric matter and such changes as appear to have been introduced by the authors of those MSS. Other groups, it is true, have not yet been brought to account. The attempt to penetrate into the earlier stages is the hardest task. The Old Lat. VS is here the surest guide: it has preserved readings which have disappeared from all Gr MSS, some of which the LXX may preserve. The antiquity of the Gr variants. The evidence of early Christian and Jewish citations is also invaluable. Ultimately, after elimination of all readings proved to be recessional or late, the decision between outstanding variants must depend on internal evidence. These variants will fall into two classes: (1) those merely affecting the Gr text, and for the larger number, those affecting the Heb text. In adjudicating on the latter Lagarde's main custom have been born in the Roman Church, and are preferred to a slavishly literal one, and a tr presupposing another Hebrew original MS based on the MT.

VII. Numbers, Titles and Order of Books. In addition to the Heb canons, the classical LXX contains the only known Hebrew LXX includes all the books in the Eng, Apoc.

1. Contents except 2 Esd (Pr Man only finds a place among the canticles appended in some MSS to the Ps) besides a 3d and 4th book of Macc. Swete's ed (1887) is the standard text. An appendix of Gr books on the borderland of canonicy the Ps of Sol (found in some cursives and mentioned in the list in cod. A), the Gr fragments of the Book of En and the ecclesiastical canticles above enumerated, are in the late MSS in quoting freely from these additional books the editors less perpetuate a tradition inherited from the Jews of Alexandria. Most of the books being original Gr compositions were ipso facto excluded from a place in the Heb Canon. Greater latitude as regards canonicity prevailed at Alexandria; the Pent occupied a place apart, but as regards later books no very sharp line of differentiation between "canonical" and "uncanonical" appears to have been drawn.

Palestinian Jews employed the first word or words of each book of the Pent to serve as its title; Gen e.g. was denoted "in the beginning," the other books have similar titles. It is to the LXX, through the medium of the Lat VSS, that we owe the familiar descriptive titles, mostly suggested by phrases in the Gr VS. In some books there are traces of rival titles in the Ptolemaic age. Exodus ("outgoing") is also called Ezoqogê ("leading out") by Philo and by the Hel- lenist Ezekiel who gave that name to his drama on the deliverance from Egypt. Philo has also alternative names for Dt—Epinomis ("after-law") borrowed from the title of a pseudo-Platonic treatise, and for Jgs "the Book of Judgments." The last title resembles the Alexandrian name for the books of

2. Titles

Ex ("and these are the names") of the other arrangements is, however, indicated in cod. B by the insertion at the end of 1 R, 3 R, 1 Ch of the first sentence of the succeeding book, a reminder to the reader that a continuation is to follow. Ezr-Neh, the Gr VS (2 Esd) being more under the influence of Palestinian tradition, remains undivided. Originally Ch-Ezr-Neh formed a unit, as was apparently still the case when the oldest Gr VS (1 Esd) was made.

In the arrangement of books there is a radical departure from Palestinian practice. There were three main unalterable divisions in the

3. Bipartition of Books

Ezr-Neh form respectively one book apiece. In the LXX the first three of these collections are subdivided into two volumes as in modern Bibles; an acquaintance with the Order the formation of the Canon: Law, Books of Prophets ("Former," i.e. Josh, Jgs, S, K, and "Latter") and "Writings." This arrangement was known at Alexandria at the end of the 2d cent. BC (Sir, prol.) but was not followed. The "Writings" were a miscellaneous collection of history and poetry with one prophethical book (Dan). Alexandrian scholars introduced a philological and systematic system of bringing together the books of each class and arranging them with some regard to the supposed chronological order of their authors. The Law, long before the Gr tr, had secured a position of supreme sanctity; this group works up independently, it kept its precedence and the individual books their order (Lev and Nu, however, exchange places in a few lists). The other two groups are broken up. Ruth is removed from the "Writings" and attached to Jgs. Ch and Ezr-Neh are similarly rearranged to the end of the historical books. This group, from chronological considerations, is followed by the poetical and other "Writings," the Prophets coming last (so in B, etc; in SA prophets precede poets). The internal order of the Gr Hagiothrapha, which includes quasi-historical (Est, Tob, Jth) and Wisdom books, is variable. Dn then first finds a place among the Prophets. The 12 minor prophets usually precede the major (for the Western order see above). The order of the first half of their company is shuffled, apparently on chronological grounds, Hos being followed by Am, Mic, Joel, Ob, Jon. Jer has his train of satelites, Bar, Lam (transferred from the "Writings") and Ep. Jer; Sus and Bel are not considered in the present book. The arrangement in the order of books is partly attributable to the practice of writing each book on a separate papyrus roll, kept in a cylindrical case; rolls containing kindred matter would tend to be placed in the same tube: hence priority would be given to these separate items until the copying of large groups in book-form came into vogue (Swete, Intro, 225 f., 229 f.).

VIII. Characteristic of the Version and Its Component Papyri—Notwithstanding the uncertain state of the text, some general characteristic of the VS are patent. It is clear that, like the Heb itself, it is not a single book, but a library. It is a series of VS and Gr compositions covering well-nigh 400 years, since pre-Christian versions of the 2d cent. AD; the bulk of the tr, however, fall within the first half of the period (Sir, prol.).

The tr may be grouped and their chronological order approximately determined from certain characteristic marks.

1. Grouping of LXX Books on Evidence of the tr is to be found in the composition of different parts of the text from different parts of the VS. This is not an infallible proof that different hands have been employed, since irrevocable uniformity in tr is difficult of attainment and indeed was not the aim of the transcribers. The modern critic is therefore to have studied the style of individual hands, the various traditions that may be ascribed to them, the order and arrangement of the text, and the evidence of the apparatus criticus. It is not possible to determine the style of any single hand that was used to transcribe the Pentateuch (Swete, Intro, 229 f.).

2. Books on

When we come to the Pentateuch (the first five books of the OT) it is not possible to determine the style of any single hand that was used to transcribe the Pentateuch (Swete, Intro, 229 f.).

The Heb Word is consistently rendered by one Gr word in Genesis and by another elsewhere, and if each of the two portions has other features peculiar to itself, it becomes quite probable that the two portions are the work of different schools. Among "text-words" which yield results of this kind are "servant" in "Moses the servant of the Lord," "Hosts" in "Lord of Hosts," "Philistines" (Swete, Intro, 317 f.) Thackeray, Grammar of the OT, 7 f. (2) We may compare the Gr with that of the Peshitta and the Syriac. The LXX was written in the koine or "common Gr, most of them in the vernacular ... the language of its evolution. The Peshitta, of the Petoite and Hiphe yappa the 3d cent. BC afford the closest parallels to the Gr Pent. The following facts are of importance: the translation of the "Atiticl" school which persistently struggled, with indifferent success, to recover the original Gr, was the most successful. This is one of the Gr masterpieces. This style is represented in the LXX by most of the original Gr writings and by the paraphrases of some of the "Writings." (3) We may compare the Gr books as translations, noting in which books license is allowed and which adhere strictly to the Heb. The general movement is in the direction of greater literary verba. the later books show an increasing reverence for the letter of Scripture, recalling the tendency of pedantically literal VSS: the tendency culminated in the 2d cent. AD in the barbarisms of Aquila. Some of the "Writings" were freely handled, because they had not yet obtained canonical rank at the time of tr. In

The Hexateuch may be placed in the 3d cent. BC. The Prophets mainly in the 2d and 1st cent. BC.

(1) The Hexateuch.—The Pent should undoubtedly be regarded as a unit: the Aristes story may so far be credited. It is uniformly held that the common vernacular style, combined with faithfulness to the Heb, rarely lapsing into literalism. It set the standard which later translators tried to imitate. The text is more securely established in this portion, and substantial variant readings are comparatively few. The latter part of Ex is an exception; the Heb had here not reached its final form in the 3rd cent. BC, and there is some reason for thinking that the VS is not the work of the translator of the first half. In 40 a few new features in vocabulary appear (e.g. coklesea; see Hort, Christian Ecclesia, 4 ff.). The Gr VS of Jos forms a link between the Pent and the later historical books. The text was not yet fixed, and variants are more abundant than in the Pent. The earliest VS, probably from selections only, appears from certain common features to have been nearly coeval with that of the LXX.

The earliest, VS, probably from selections only, appears from certain common features to have been nearly coeval with that of the LXX. The best or tr of the LXX, 2 vols, Gr text of A, tr and notes, Cambridge, 1904-6, with review in JTS, X, 299). Jer, Ezek and the Minor Prophets were probably tr in bloc or nearly so. The Palestinian Gr, no doubt, included a second group of Scriptures and this stimulated a desire among Alexandrian Jews to possess the entire collection of the Prophets in Gr. The undertaking seems to have been a formal and quasi-official one, not a haphazard growth. For it has been ascertained that Jer and Ezek were divided for tr purposes into two nearly equal parts; a change in the Gr style occurs at the junctures. In Jer the break occurs in ch 29 (LXX order); the clearest criterion of the two is probably a shift of tone. "Thus saith the Lord." The last ch (52) is probably a later addition in the Gr. The translator of the second half of Jer also tr the first half of Bar (1-38); he was incompetent and his work, if our text may be relied on, affords flagrant examples of Gr words being selected to render Heb words which he did not understand merely because of their similar sound. Ezek is similarly divided, but here the translator of the first half (chs 1-27) undertook the difficult labor, though the entire record. The second half was left to a second worker. An outstanding test is afforded by the renderings of the refrain, "They shall know that I am the Lord." The Gr VS of "the twelve" shows no trace of a similar division; the chs 5-24, however, are probably by the same hand (JTS, IV, 245, 398, 578). But this official VS of the Prophets had probably been preceded by VSS of short passages selected to be read on the festivals in the synagogue.

Lectionary requirements occasioned the earliest VSS of the Prophets, possibly of the Pent as well. Two indications of this have been traced. There exist in four MSS a Gr VS of the Psalms of Habakkuk (Hab 3), a chapter which has been a Jewish lesson for Pentecost from the earliest times, independent of and apparently older than the LXX and made for synagogue use. Similarly in Ezek LXX there is a section of sixteen verses (36-24-38) with a style quite distinct from that of its context. This passage was also an early Christian lesson for Pentecost, and its lectionary use was inherited from Judaism. Here the LXX translators seem to have incorporated the older VS, whereas in Hab 3 they rejected it (JTS, XII, 191, 199). The characteristic contents of the "former Prophets" (1-3 B.).—The Gr style indicates that the history of the monarchy was not all tr at once. Ulfilas is said to have omitted these books from the Gothic VS as likely to inflame the military temerity of his race; for another reason the Gr translators were at first content with a partial VS. They omitted as unifying the more disastrous portions, David's sin with the subsequent calamities of his reign and the later history of the divided monarchy culminating in the captivity. Probably the earliest VSS embodied only (1) 1 R, (2) 2 R 1-11 (David's early reign), (3) 3 R 12-21 13 (Solomon and the beginning of the divided monarchy); the third book of "Reigns" opened with the accession of Solomon (as in Lucian's text), not at the point where 1 R opens. These earlier portions are written in a freer style than the rest of the Gr "Reigns," and the Heb original differed widely in places from that tr in the Eng. Bible (JTS, VIII, 262).

The "Writings."—The Hagiographa at the end of the 2nd cent. BC were regarded as national lit. (Sir, prol. "the other books of our fathers"), but not as canonical. The translators did not scruple to treat these with great freedom, undeterred by the prohibition against alteration of Scripture (Deut 4:2; 12:32). Free paraphrases of extracts were produced, sometimes with legendary additions. A partial VS of Job (one-sixth being omitted) was among the first; Arias, the historian of the 2nd cent. BC, seems to have used an English version (Freudenthal, Hellenistische Studien, 1875, 136 ff.). The translator was a student of the Gr poets; his VS was probably produced for the general reader, not for the synagogues. Hatch's theory (Essays in B. Gr, 1880, 214) that his text was shorter than ours and was expanded later is untenable; avoidance of anthropomorphisms explains some omissions, the reason for others is obscure. The first Gr narrative of the return from exile (1 Esd) was probably composed from a lost Heb collection only from Chs 25, Neh, grouped round a fable of non-Jewish origin, the story of the 3 youths at the court of Darius. The work is a fragment, the end being lost, and it has been contended by some critics that the VS once embraced the whole of Ch-Ezr-Neh (C. C. Torrey, Ezra Studies, Chicago, 1910). The Gr is obviously earlier than Esd B and is of great value for the reconstruction of the Heb. The same translator appears from peculiarities of diction to have produced the two tr additions to the earlier form, the freedom and incorporating extraneous matter (the Three Children, Sus, Bel). The maximum of interpolation is reached in Est, where the Gr additions make up two-thirds of the story. The Gr Prov also is probably 1st cent. BC in the Heb; some of these appear to be derived from a lost Heb collection, others are of purely Gr origin. This translator also knew and imitated the Gr classics; the numerous fragments of iambic and hexameter verse in the tr cannot be accidental (JTS, XIII, 46). The Psalter is the one tr in this category in which libraries have not been taken; in Ps 13 (14) 3 the extracts from other parts of Ps and from Isa included in the B text must be an interpolation possible before St. Paul's time (Rom 3 13 3 ff.), or else taken from Rom. The little Ps 161 in LXX, described in the title as an "autograph" work of David and as "outside the number," is clearly a late Gr production, perhaps an appendix added after the VS was complete.

The latest LXX translations.—The latest VSS included in the LXX are the productions of the Jewish translators of the 2d cent. AD; some books may be rather earlier, the work of pioneers in the new school which advocated strict adherence to the Heb. The books of "Reigns," perhaps, by Theodotion, perhaps, or by one of his school; the later portions (2 R 11 2-3 R 21 11, David's downfall, and 3 R 22-1 R end, the downfall of the monarchy) are by one hand, as shown by pecu-
2. General Characteristics — (Heb "for" or "as God"); 15. 3. "The Lord is a breaker of battles" (Heb "a Man of war"); 24. 10. "They saw the place where the God of Israel dwelt!" (Jos 23. 15; 1 Kings 8. 19; 2 Kings 23. 12, 28, 31). verse 11. "Of the elect of Israel not one perished and they were seen in the place of God" (Heb "Upon the nobles . . . He laid not His hand, and they beheld God"). The comparison of God to the rock was commonly, but sometimes as idolatrous, as was sometimes the comparison to the sun from fear of sun-worship (Ps 83 [84] 12. "The Lord loves mercy and truth" for Heb "The Lord is a sun and shield"). The sons of God" (Gen 6. 2) becomes "the children of God" (Heb 11. 12-16). e.g. slight amplifications, interpretation of difficult words, substitution of Gr for Heb coinage, tr of place-names, see Swete, Intro, 323 ff. Blunders in tr are not uncommon, but the difficulties which these pioneers had to face must be remembered, esp. the paleographical character of the Heb originals. These were written on flimsy papyrus rolls, in a script probably in a transitional stage between the archaic and the later square characters; the words were not separated, and the difference in the ratio of the radicals (yāqōb and yōdāh) were also frequently omitted. Add to this the absence at Alexandria, for parts at least of the Scriptures, of any sound tradition as to the meaning. On the other hand the vocalization adopted for the translation, e.g. e.g. in the proper names, is of great value in the history of early Sem pronunciation. It must further be remembered that the Sem language most familiar to them was not Heb but Aram., and some mistakes are due to Aram. or even Arab. colloquialisms (Swete, Intro, 310).

IX. Salient Differences between Greek and Hebrew Texts. — Differences indicating a Heb original other than the MT affect either the sequence or the subject-matter (cf Swete, Intro, 254 ff.). The most extensive discrepancies in arrangement of materials occur in (1) Ex 35-39, the construction of the Tabernacle and the ornaments (Swete, Intro, 310).

1. Sequence of its ministers, (2) 3 R 4-11, Solomon's reign, (3) Jer. (last half), (4) Prov (end). (1) In Ex the LXX gives precedence to the priests' offerings, which in the Heb follow the account of the Tabernacle, and omits altogether the altar of incense. The whole section describing the execution of the instructions given in the previous chapters in almost identical form in the LXX and the text has clearly not been finally fixed in the 3rd cent. BC; the section was perhaps absent from the oldest Gr VS. In Ex 20. 13-15 cod. B arranges three of the commandments in the Alexandrian order (7, 8, 6), attested in Philo and in the NT. (2) Deliberate rearrangement has taken place in the history of Solomon, and the LXX unquestionably preserves the older text. The narrative of the building of the Temple, like that of other thoroughgoing LXX passages, was replaced. Theodotion's Dtl, as above stated, superseded in the Christian church the older VS. A new and complete VS of Ch-Err-Neh was made (Edel B), though the older VS retained its place in the Codex on account of the interesting legend imbedded in it: the new VS is here again possibly the work of Theodotion; the numerous transiterations are characteristic of him (Torrey, Ezra Studies; the theory had previously been advanced by Sir H. Howorth). In the Gr Edel we have a specimen of Aquila's style (see McNeile's ed., Cambridge, 1904). Canticles is another VS.

A marked feature of the whole tr is the scrupulous avoidance of anthropomorphisms and phrases derogatory to the Divine transcendence and majesty. Thus Ex 4. 10, "Thou shalt be to him in things pertaining to God" (Heb "for" or "as God"); 15. 3. "The Lord is a breaker of battles" (Heb "a Man of war"); 24. 10. "They saw the place where the God of Israel dwelt!" (1 Kings 8. 19; 2 Kings 23. 12, 28, 31; 1 Kings 22. 19; 2 Kings 23. 12, 28, 31). verse 11. "Of the elect of Israel not one perished and they were seen in the place of God" (Heb "Upon the nobles . . . He laid not His hand, and they beheld God"). Thus in the comparison of God to the rock was commonly, but sometimes as idolatrous, as was sometimes the comparison to the sun from fear of sun-worship (Ps 83 [84] 12. "The Lord loves mercy and truth" for Heb "The Lord is a sun and shield"). The sons of God" (Gen 6. 2) becomes "the children of God" (Heb 11. 12-16). e.g. slight amplifications, interpretation of difficult words, substitution of Gr for Heb coinage, tr of place-names, see Swete, Intro, 323 ff. Blunders in tr are not uncommon, but the difficulties which these pioneers had to face must be remembered, esp. the paleographical character of the Heb originals. These were written on flimsy papyrus rolls, in a script probably in a transitional stage between the archaic and the later square characters; the words were not separated, and the difference in the ratio of the radicals (yāqōb and yōdāh) were also frequently omitted. SERAH, _sera_ (םֶרֶא, _serah_, “abundance”): Daughter of Asher (Gen 46 17; Nu 26 46, AV “Sarah”); 1 Ch 7 30.

SERAIЯ, _sera_ (םֶרֶא, _serah_, _serah_): (1) Secretary of David (2 Sam 17); in 2 Sam 20 25 he is called Sheva, in 1 K 4 3 the name appears as Shisha. This last or Shasha would be elsewhere restored elsewhere; others prefer the form Shavsha, which is found in 1 Ch 19 16.

(2) A high priest in the reign of Zedekiah; executed with other prominent captives at Riblah by order of Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25 18.21; Jer 52 24.27). Mentioned in the list of high priests (1 Ch 6 4). Ezra claims descent from him (Ezr 7 13). See AZARIAH; SARAS.

(3) The son of Tanhumeth the Netophathite, and one of the heroic band of men who saved themselves from the fury of Nebuchadnezzar when he stormed Jerusalem. They repaired to Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, but killed him on account of his allegiance to the Chaldeans (2 K 25 23.25).

(4) Son of Kenaz, and younger brother of Othniel, and father of Joab, the chief of Ge-harashim (1 Ch 4 13.14).

(5) Grandfather of Jehu, of the tribe of Simeon (1 Ch 4 35).

(6) A priest, the third in the list of those who returned from Babylon to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7, here called Azariah; 12 1), and third also (if the same person is meant) in the record of those who sealed the covenant binding all Jews not to take foreign wives (Neh 10 2). As the son of Hilkiah, and consequently a direct descendant of the priestly family, he became governor of the temple rebuild (Neh 11 11). He is mentioned (under the name Azariah) also in 1 Ch 9 11. Neh 12 2 adds that “in the days of Joiakin” the head of Serah's house was Merariah.

(7) Son of Arzel, one of those whom Jehoiakim commanded to imprison Jeremiah and Baruch, the son of Neriah (Jer 36 26).

(8) The son of Neriah, who went into exile with Zedekiah. He was also called Sar M'nâkah (“prince of repose”). The Tg renders _Sar_ M'nâkah by _Rabh_ T'khâbârâh, “prince of battle,” and _LXX_ by _sêpâr_ ᵉpotential, ᵉdorân ᵉdôrân, “prince of gifts,” reading M'nâkah for M'nâkah. At the request of Jeremiah he carried with him in his exile the passages containing the prophet's warning of the fall of Babylon, written in a book which he was hidden to bind to a stone and cast into the Euphrates, to symbolize the fall of Babylon (Jer 51 59–64).

HORACE J. WOLF

SERAPHIM, _sera_-(םֶרֶא, _seraphim_): A pl. word occurring only in Isa 6 2ff—Isaiah’s vision of Jehovah. The origin of the term in Heb is uncertain, when it was rebuilt. _Sêraphî_ in Nu 21 6; Isa 14 20, etc, signifies a fiery serpent. A Bab name for the fire-god, Nergal, was Sharrapu. In Egypt there have been found eagle-lion-shaped figures guarding a grave, to which is applied the name _seraph_. The equivalent Egr term is “girân.”

It is probable enough that popular mythology connected fire with the attendants of the deity in various ways among different peoples, and that burning lies at the base of the idea in all these suggested etymologies. It remains, however, that in Isaiah’s use there is nothing of the popular legend or superstition. These seraphim are august beings whose forms are not at all fully described. They had faces, feet, hands and wings. The six wings, in three pairs, covered their faces and feet in humility and reverence, and were used for sustaining them in their positions about the throne of Jehovah. One of them is the agent for (burning with a coal off the altar, not with his own power or person) the sin from the lips of the prophet.

Seraphim are in Jewish theology connected with cherubim and the dome as the three highest orders of attendants on Jehovah, and are superior to the angels who are messengers sent on various errands. As the cherubim in popular fancy were represented by the storm-clouds, so the seraphim were by the serpentine flashes of the lightning; but none of this appears in Isaiah’s vision.

In the NT the only possible equivalent is in “the living ones” ("beasts" of _AV_) in Rev 4, 5, etc. Here, as in Isa, they appear nearest Jehovah’s throne, supreme in praise of His holiness.

SERAR, _sera_ (סֶרֶא, _Serar_; AV _Asser_): Name of one of the families which returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 6 52) = "Sera" of Ezr 2 53; Neh 7 53.

SERED, _sered_ (םֶרֶד, _sered_): Son of Zebluun (Gen 46 14; Nu 26 26).

SERJENTS, _sërj-nts_ (pâbôôivox, _rabôôchoi_): In Acts 16 35.38 the word (lit. "holders of rods") corresponding to Rom "lectors," thus RVm is used of the officers in attendance on the Philippian magistrates, whose duty it was to execute orders in scourging, etc, in this case in setting prisoners free. Paul and Silas, however, as Romans, refused thus to be "privily" dismissed.

VII. PRINCIPLES

LITERATURE

The Sermon on the Mount is the title commonly given to the collection of sayings recorded in Mt 5–7 and in Lk 6 20–49. The latter is sometimes called the Sermon on the Plain from the fact that it is said to have been delivered on a level space somewhere on the descent of the mountain. The Sermon appears to be an epitome of the teachings of Jesus concerning the kingdom of heaven, its subjects and their life. For this reason it has always held the first place of attention and esteem among the sayings of Jesus. See SERMON ON THE PLAIN.

I. PARALLEL ACCOUNTS.—As indicated above, the Sermon is reported by both Matthew and Luke.
A comparison of the two accounts reveals certain striking differences. A total of 47 verses of the account in Mt have no parallel in Lk, while but 44 verses of the latter are wanting in the former. On the other hand, many of Mt that are lacking in the Sermon of Lk, amounting in all to 34 verses, appear elsewhere distributed throughout the Lukan narrative and in some instances connected with different incidents and circumstances.

These facts give rise to some interesting literary and historical questions. There are evidently two distinct discourses dealt with in the same general theme but spoken on different occasions, or are they simply different repetitions of the same discourse? If it be held that the Sermon was delivered but once, which of the aspects, the pedagogic, the apocalyptic, or the ethical address, is the discourse in Mt homogeneous or does it include sayings originally spoken on other occasions and early incorporated in the Sermon?

II. Historicity of the Discourse. — There have been attempts to regard the sermons recorded in Mt and Lk as collections of sayings spoken on different occasions, and maintain that they do not represent any connected discourse ever delivered by Jesus. In their view the Sermon is either a free compilation by the evangelists or a product of apostolic teaching and oral tradition.

The prevailing opinion among NT scholars is, however, that the Gospel reports represent a composite historical discourse. The Sermon as recorded in Mt bears such marks of inner unity of theme and exposition as to indicate the likelihood of a single delivery. Jesus should deliver a discourse of this kind accords with all the circumstances. His ministry was a continuous and purposeful undertaking. Besides, we know that in His teaching He was accustomed to speak to the multitudes at length, and we should expect Him to give early in His ministry some formal exposure of the kingdom, the burden of His first preaching. That such a continuous and important discourse should have been preserved is altogether probable.

On the other hand, it may be conceded that the accounts need not necessarily be regarded as full or exact reports of the discourse but possibly and probably much abridged summaries of its theme and substance. Our Lord was accustomed to teach at length, but this discourse was delivered in a few words. And while His popular teaching was marked by a unique wealth of illustration the Sermon is mostly gnomic in form. This gnomic style and the paucity of the usual concrete and illustrative elements suggest the probability of condensation in transmission. Moreover, it is hardly probable that such an address of Jesus would be recorded at the time of its delivery or would be remembered in detail by the evangelists.

There is evidence that the account in Mt 5–7 contains some sayings not included in the original discourse. This view is confirmed by the fact that a number of the sayings are given in Luke's Gospel in settings that appear more original. It is, however, easy to show that other occasions may have been associated with the Sermon in apostolic teaching and thus handed down with it, but if the discourse were well known in a specific form, such as that recorded in Mt, it is hardly conceivable that Luke or anyone else would break it up and distribute the fragments or associate them with other incidents, as some of the sayings recorded in both Gospels are found associated in Lk.

III. Time and Occasion. — Both Matthew and Luke agree on the scene of the delivery of the Sermon to the first half of the Galilean ministry. The former apparently places it a little earlier than the latter, in whose account it follows immediately after the appointment of the twelve apostles. While the time cannot be accurately determined, the position assigned to it by Luke and the Gospels is approximately correct and is supported by the internal evidence. Portions of the Sermon imply that the opposition of the religious teachers was already in evidence, but it clearly belongs to the first year of Our Lord's ministry before the opposition had become serious. On the other hand, the occasion was sufficiently late for the popularity of the new Teacher to have reached its climax. In the early Galilean ministry Jesus confined His teaching to the synagogues, but later, when the great crowds pressed about Him, He resolved to open-air preaching after the manner of the Sermon. Along with the growth in His popularity there is observed a change in the character of His teaching. His teaching in Mt that amounts to a unique lack in the Sermon of Lk, amounting in all to 34 verses, appears elsewhere distributed throughout the Lukan narrative and in some instances connected with different incidents and circumstances.

These facts give rise to some interesting literary and historical questions. There are evidently two distinct discourses dealt with in the same general theme but spoken on different occasions, or are they simply different repetitions of the same discourse? If it be held that the Sermon was delivered but once, which of the aspects, the pedagogic, the apocalyptic, or the ethical address, is the discourse in Mt homogeneous or does it include sayings originally spoken on other occasions and early incorporated in the Sermon?

IV. Scene. — According to the evangelists, the scene of the delivery of the Sermon was one of the mountains or foothills surrounding the Galilean plain. Probably one of the hills lying N.W. of Capernaum is meant, for shortly after the Sermon we find Jesus and His disciples entering that city. There are no data justifying a closer identification of the place. There is a tradition dating from the time of the Crusades that identifies the mount of the Sermon with Carmel, a two-peaked hill on the road from Tiberias to Nazareth. But there is no means of confirming this late tradition and the identification is rather improbable.

V. The Hearers. — The Sermon was evidently addressed, primarily, to the disciples of Jesus. This is the apparent meaning of the account of both evangelists. According to Matthew, Jesus, "seeing the multitudes, ... went up into the mountain: and when he had sat down, his disciples came unto him: and he opened his mouth and taught them." The separation from the multitude of "some distance" and of His words to the disciples seem clear, and the distinction appears intentional on the part of the writer. However, it must be observed that in the closing comments on the Sermon the presence of the multitudes is implied. In Luke’s account the distinction is less marked. Here the order of events is: the night of prayer in the mountain, the choice of the twelve apostles, the descent with them into the presence of the multitude of His disciples and a great number of "round about Judaea, and Jerusalem, and the coasts of the sea country," and, finally, the address. While the continued presence of the multitudes is implied, the plain meaning of the words, "And he lifted up his eyes on them, and blessed them: and he addressed them a word," is that His address was intended esp. for the latter. This view is borne out by the address itself as recorded in both accounts. Observe the use of the second person in the reference to suffering, poverty and persecution for the sake of the Son of Man. Further the sayings concerning the "salt of the earth" and the "light of the world" could hardly have been addressed to any but His disciples. The term disciple, however, was doubtless employed in the broader sense by both evangelists. This is clearly the case in Matthew’s account in which the Twelve had not yet been appointed.

VI. The Message: A Summary. — It is hardly proper to speak of the Sermon on the Mount as a digest of the teaching of Jesus, for it does not include any reference to some very important subjects discussed by Our Lord on other occasions in the course of His ministry. It is, however, the most comprehensive and important collection or summary of His sayings that is preserved to us in the gospel record. For us, as modern readers, the Sermon on the Mount in Christian thought the first place of esteem among all the NT messages. As an exposition of the ideal life and the program of the new society which Jesus proposed to create, its interpretation is of the deepest interest and the profoundest concern.
It may assist the student of the Sermon in arriving at a clear appreciation of the argument and the salient features of the discourse if the whole is presented in outline. There is some difference of opinion among scholars as to the relative order of features of the discourse, and consequently various outlines have been presented by different writers. Those of C. W. Volmar in HDB, Canon Gore in The Sermon on the Mount, and H. C. Kline in The Ethics of Jesus are worthy of special mention. The following outline as given by Matthew is given as the basis of the present discussion. It is not implied that there was any such formal plan before the speech as He made it, but it is believed that the outline presents a faithful syllabus of the argument of the Sermon as preserved to us.

Theme: The Kingdom of God (Heaven), its Subjects and Righteousness (5:1–27).

1. The subjects of the kingdom (5:3–16).
   1. The qualities of character essential to happiness and influence (vs. 3–12).
   2. The vocation of the seeker (vs. 13–16).

2. The relation of the new righteousness to the Mosaic Law (5:17–18).
   1. The relation defined as that of continuance in a higher fulfillment (vs. 17–20).
   2. The higher fulfillment of the new righteousness illustrated by a comparison of its principles with the Mosaic Law as currently taught and practiced (vs. 21–48).
   (1) The higher law of brotherhood judges ill will as murder (vs. 21–26).
   (2) The higher law of purity condemns lust as adultery (vs. 27–30).
   (3) The higher law of truth forbids oaths as witness for good and evil (vs. 33–37).
   (4) The higher law of rights substitutes self-restraint and generosity for retaliation and resistance (vs. 38–40).
   (5) The higher law of love demands universal goodwill as a supernatural quality like that of the Father (vs. 45–48).

3. The new righteousness. Its motives as applied to religious, practical, and social duties, or the principles of conduct (6:1–7:12).
   1. Reverence toward the Father essential in all acts of worship (6:1–18).
   (1) In all duties (ver 1).
   (2) In self-denying (ver 2).
   (3) In prayer (ver 5–10).
   (4) In fasting (ver 16–18).
   2. Loyalty toward the Father fundamental in all social relations (6:19–34).
   (1) Critical estimate of self instead of censorious judgment of others (vs. 1–5).
   (2) The communication and communication of spiritual values (vs. 6–8).
   (3) Kindness toward others in all things (vs. 9–11). One's kindness toward all His children (vs. 7–12).

IV. Hortatory conclusion (7:13–27).
   1. The two gates and the two ways (vs. 13–14).
   2. The tests of character (vs. 15–27).

(1) Characteristics of the subjects (5:3–12).—The Sermon opens with the familiar Beatitudes. Unlike many reformers, Jesus begins the exposition of His program with a promise of happiness, with a blessing rather than a curse. He thus connects His program directly with the hopes of His hearers, for the central features in the current Messianic conception were deliverance and happiness. But the conditions of happiness proposed were in strong contrast with those in the popular thought. Happiness does not consist in the Jesus, in what one possesses, in lands and houses, in social position, in intellectual attainments, but in the wealth of the inner life, in moral strength, in self-control, in spiritual insight, in the character one is able to form within himself and in the service he is able to render to his fellowmen. Thus, like character, is a by-product of right living. It is presented as the fruit, not as the object of endeavor.

It is interesting to note that character is the secret of happiness both for the individual and for society. There are two groups of Beatitudes. The first four deal with personal qualities: humility, penitence, self-control, desire for righteousness. These are the sources of inner peace. The second group deals with social qualities; mercifulness toward others, purity of heart or reverence for personality, peace-making or solicitude for others, self-sacrificing loyalty to righteousness. These are the sources of social rest. The blessings of the kingdom are social as well as individual.

(2) Vocation of the subjects (5:13–16).—Men of the qualities described in the Beatitudes are called "the salt of the earth," the "light of the world." True happiness is not, then, in themselves or for themselves alone. Their mission is the hope of the kingdom: Salt is a preservative element; light is a life-giving one; but the world is not eager to be preserved or willing to receive life. Therefore such men must expect opposition and persecution, but they are not on that account to withdraw from the world. On the contrary, by the leave of character and the light of example they are to help others in the appreciation and the attainment of the ideal life. By their character and deeds they are to make their influence a force for good in the lives of men. In this sense the men of the kingdom are the salt of the earth, the light of the world.

(3) The relation of the new righteousness to the Mosaic Law (5:17–48).—(a) Relation defined (5:17–20): The qualities of character thus set before the citizens of the kingdom were so surprising and revolutionary as to suggest the inquiry: What is the relation of the new teaching to the Mosaic Law? This Jesus defines as continuance and fulfillment. His hearers are not to think that He has come to destroy the law. On the contrary, He has come to fulfill and fulfill. The old law is imperfect, but God does not despair of what is imperfect. Men and institutions are judged, not by the level of present attainment, but by character and direction. The law moves in the right direction and is so valuable that those who violate even its least precepts have a very low place in the kingdom.

The new righteousness then does not set aside the law or offer an easier religion, but one that is more exacting. The kingdom is concerned, not so much with ceremonies and external rules, as with motives and with social virtues such as purity, honesty and generosity. So much higher are the new standards of righteousness that Jesus is constrained to warn His hearers that to secure even a place in the kingdom, their righteousness must exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees.

(b) The relation illustrated (5:21–48): In illustration of the deeper meaning of the new righteousness and its relation to the Mosaic Law, Jesus proceeds to deal in detail with the precepts of the old moral law, deepening it as He proceeds into the higher law of the kingdom. In each instance the standard of judgment is raised and the individual precepts are deepened into spiritual principles that call for perfect fulfillment. In considering specific precepts no account is taken of overt acts, for in the new righteousness they are impossible. All acts are treated as expressions of the inner life. The law is carried back to the impulse and the will to sin, and these are judged as in the old law the completed acts were judged. Therefore all anger and lust in the heart are strictly enjoined. Likewise every word is raised to a sacredness equal with that of the most solemn religious vow or oath. Finally, the instinct to avenge is entirely forbidden, and universal love is that of the Father and the fundamental law of the new social life. Thus Jesus does not abrogate any law but interprets its precepts in terms that call for a deeper and more perfect fulfillment.
(4) Motives and principles of conduct (6 1—7 12).—The relation of His teaching to the law defined, Jesus proceeds to explain the motives and principles of conduct as applied to religious and social duties.

(a) In worship (6 1—18). In the section 6 1—12 there is one motive in particular that makes its appearance. It is a motive of personal aspiration and hope. It looks toward God. He is at once the source and the aim of life. Therefore worship aims alone at Divine praise. If acts of worship are performed before men to be seen of them there is no reward for the Father. In this Jesus is passing no slight on public worship. He Himself instituted the Lord’s Supper and authorized the continuance of the rite of baptism. Such acts have their proper value. His censure is aimed at the love of ostentation so often associated with them. The root of ostentation is selfishness, and selfishness has no part in the new righteousness. Any selfish desire for the approval of men thwart the purpose of all worship. The object of almsgiving, of prayer or of fasting is the expression of brotherly love, commination with God or spiritual enrichment. The possibility of any of these is excluded by the presence of the desire for the approval of men. It is not merely a Divine fiat but one of the deeper laws of life which decrees that the only possible reward for acts of worship is such motives is the cheap approval of men as well as the impoverishment of the inner life.

(b) In life’s purpose (6 19—34): The same principle holds, says Jesus, in the matter of life’s purpose. There is only one treasure worthy of man’s search, only one object worthy of his highest endeavor, and that is the kingdom of God and His righteousness. Besides, there can be no division of aim. God will be first and only. Material blessing can be set over men. With any lower aim the new righteousness would be no better than that of the Gentiles. And such a demand is reasonable, for God’s gracious providence is ample guaranty that He will supply all things needful for the accomplishment of the purposes He has planned for our lives. So in our vocations as in our worship, God is the supreme and effectual motive.

(c) In social relations (7 1—12): Then again he begins to explain that the Father and the supreme object of desire for all men, great reverence is due toward others. Considerate helpfulness must replace the censorious spirit. For the same reason men will have no greater reverence for spiritual values to cast them carelessly aside. Furthermore, men must be set on guard and men. With any lower aim the new righteousness would be no better than that of the Gentiles. Thus in the perfect law of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of men the new righteousness makes perfect the Law and the Prophets.

VII. Sermon on Mount is

(b) The tests of character (7 15—27): The test of the higher fulfilment is fruit. By their fruits alone the subjects of the kingdom will be known. In the presence of the Father there is no room for those who bring nothing but the leaves of empty professions. The kingdom is for those alone who do His will. The test of righteousness is illustrated in conclusion by a beautiful picture of brothers and Builders. The difference between the two is essentially one of character. It is largely a question of fundamental honesty. The one is superficial and thinks only of that which is visible to the eye and builds only for himself. In the other is honest enough to build well where only God can see, to build for others and for all time. Thus he builds also for himself. The character of the builder is revealed by the building.
SERMON ON THE PLAIN, THE: This title is sometimes given to the discourse recorded in Lk 6:20–49, because according to the Gospel (ver 17) it was delivered on a plain at the foot of the mountain. In many respects this address resembles the one recorded in Mt 5–7, but in general the two are so different as to make it uncertain whether they are different reports of the same discourse or reports of different addresses given on different occasions. See SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

In contrast with the Sermon on the Mount which is assigned a place early in the Galilean ministry, and prior to the appointment of the Twelve, this event is further represented as the occasion of this discourse. If the two accounts are reports of the same address the setting of Lk is probably the historical one.

The Sermon of Lk includes a little less than one-third of the matter recorded in the Sermon on the Mount. The Lukan discourse includes

1. The Occasion: That event which is represented as the occasion of this discourse. If the two accounts are reports of the same address the setting of Lk is probably the historical one.

2. Contents: Only a portion of the Beatitudes, with a set of four " woes," a rather brief section on the social duties, and the concluding parable of the Two Houseos.

3. Message: Prominent in the Sermon. Here the Beatitudes deal with social differences. In Mt they refer to spiritual conditions. Here Jesus speaks of those who hunger now, probably meaning bodily hunger. In Mt the invectives are addressed against the self-satisfied religious teachers and their religious formalism. Here the rich and their unsocial spirit are the subject of the woes. This social interest is further emphasized by the fact that in addition to this social bearing of the Beatitudes, Lk's discourse omits the remainder of the Sermon on the Mount, except those portions that deal with social relations, such as those on the Golden Rule, the duty of universal love, the equality of servant and master, and the obligation of a charitable spirit.

RUSSELL BENJAMIN MILLER

SERON, sérōn (Σέρων, Strōn): "The commander of the host of Syria" of Antiochus Epiphanes, who was defeated at Beth-horon by Judas in 166 BC (1 Mac 3:13ff). Not a Gr name; "perhaps it represents the Phoen Hiram" (Rawlinson, ad loc.).

SERPENT, sarpent: Serpents are not particularly abundant in Pal, but they are often mentioned in the Bible. In the Heb there are 11 general names. The NT has four Gr names and LXX employs two of these and three others as well. A compound of expressions, such as ὁ ἄγαλμα, ὁ ἀριστομέλης, "flying serpent," ὁ ἄραχνα, ὁ ἄραχνιον, "deadly serpent," and ὁ ἄγαλμα, ὁ ἄγαλμιον, "biting" or "stinging serpent." Notwithstanding this large vocabulary, it is impossible to identify satisfactorily a single species. Nearly every reference states or implies poisonous qualities, and in no case is there so much as a hint that a snake may be harmless, except in several expressions referring to the millennium, where their harmlessness is not natural but miraculous. In Arab. there is a score or more of names of serpents very few of them are employed at all definitely. It may be too much to say that the inhabitants of Syria and Pal consider all snakes to be poisonous, but they do not clearly distinguish the non-poisonous ones, and there are several common and well-known serpents which are universally believed to be poisonous, though actually harmless. Of nearly 25 species which are certainly known to be found in Syria and Pal, four are deadly poisonous, five are somewhat poisonous, and the rest are absolutely harmless. With the exception of kippoz, "dart-serpent" (Jaa 34:15), which is probably the name of a bird and not of a snake, every one of the Heb and Gr names occurs in passages where poisonous character is expressed or implied. The deadly poisonous snakes have large perforated poison fangs situated in the upper jaw, an efficient apparatus like a hypodermic syringe for conveying the poison into the depths of the wound. In the somewhat poisonous snakes, the poison fangs are less favorably situated, being farther back, and nearly under the eye, which are usually taken into the stomach while living, the peculiar structure of the jaws and the absence of a breastbone enabling snakes to swallow animals which exceed the ordinary size of their own bodies.

The following list includes all the serpents which are certainly known to exist in Pal and Syria, omitting the names of several which have been reported but whose occurrence does not seem to be confirmed. A few of each species is given.

2. Somewhat poisonous serpents. — Tarbophis saururus Bgr., Syria, Pal, Egypt; T. tesselatus Fitz., Balkan Peninsula, Iran, Syria, Pal; Ophiosaurus carinatus L., Turkey, Greece, Italy, Asia Minor, Syria, Pal; Ophiophagus hannah Leach., Turkey, Greece, Italy, Asia Minor, Syria, Pal.

To this list should be added the sceloporus, a large snake-like lizard, harmless except to Arabs. Found throughout Southwestern Europe, Asia Minor, Persia, Syria, and Pal, which while perfectly harmless is commonly classed with vipers. Of all these the commonest is Zamenis numifer, Arabian adder, "string of walnuts," a fierce but non-poisonous snake which attains the length of a meter. Its ground color is pale yellow and it has a dorsal series of indistinct diamond-shaped spots, each terminating with spots of the dorsal row on each side two lateral rows of less distinct dark spots. It is everywhere considered to be fatal. Another common snake is Zamenis gemonensis, Arabian snake, which attains the length of two meters. It is usually black and much resembles the American black snake, Zamenis constrictor. Like all species of Zamenis, these are harmless. Other common harmless snakes are Zamenis daubii, Tropidonos tus tesselatus which is often found in pools and streams. Certain caloselphus a small, nearly toothless snake with the crown of the head coal black. Among the somewhat poisonous snakes, a very common hanash, "to hiss." It is about a tiger long, slender, and white with dark stripes. Many marvelous and utterly improbable tales are told of its jumping powers, as for instance that it can shoot through the air for more than a hundred feet and penetrate a tree like a rifle bullet. The commonest of the deadly poisonous snakes is Vipera lebetina, which attains the length of a meter, has a thick body, a short tail, a broad head and a narrow neck. It is spotted somewhat as Zamenis numifer, but the spots are less regular and distinct and the ground color is grey rather than yellow. It does not seem to have a distinct name. Cerastes cornutus, having two small horns, which are modified scales, over the eyes, is a rather common species. It is found in the desert. Not only are the species of poisonous serpents fewer than the non-poisonous species, but the individuals also appear to be less numerous than the latter. The vast majority of the snakes which are encountered are harmless.

As stated above, all of the Heb and Gr names except kippôs, which occurs only in Isa 34 15, are used of snakes actually or supposedly poisonous. This absence of discrimination between poisonous and non-poisonous kinds makes determination of the species difficult. Further, but few of the Heb names are from roots whose meanings are clear, and there is time evident that many names to Arab.
five to Arab.

(1) The commonest Heb word is סנֵרָפ, nâhâsh, which occurs 31 t and seems to be a generic word for serpent. While not always clearly indicating a venomous serpent, it frequently does: e.g. Ps 58
4; 140 3; Prov 23 32; Eccl 10 8 11; Isa 14 29; Jer 8 17; Am 8 19. According to BDB it is perhaps from an onomatopoetic נ nâhâsh, "to hiss." It may be akin to the Arab. ﷲ، hâsh, which means "snake" in general, or esp.
the black snake. Cf Ir-nâhâsh (Ch 4 12);
Nahash (a) (1 S 11 1; 2 S 10 2), (b) (2 S 17 27),
(c) (2 S 17 25); also אֲרָפָ, m'âshâth, "copper" or "brass"; and הַשָּׁ, hâshshāh (Nehushtan), the brazen serpent (2 K 18 4). But BDB derives the last two words from a different root.

(2) נֵרָפ, sarâph, apparently from נ, sarâph, "to burn," is used of the fiery serpents of the wilderness. In Nu 21 8, it occurs in the sing.: "Make thee a fiery serpent, and set it upon a standard."
Ver 6 we have נַסָּרָפ, ha-nâsârîm ha-sârîhâm, "fiery serpents"; in Dt 8 15 the same in the sing.: נֵרָפ, nâhâsh sarâph, also tr-
"fiery serpents"; in Isa 14 29; 30 6 we have נָרָפ, sarâph m'ôphâph, "fiery flying serpent." The same word in the pl. נָרָפ, sarîphm, is trl "seraphim" in Is 6 2 5.

(3) נֵרָפ, sarâph, elsewhere "dragon" or "sea-serpent" (q.v.), is used of the serpents into which the rods of Aaron and the magicians were transformed (Ex 7 9 10 12), these serpents being designated by nâmâsh in Ex 4 3; 7 15. Tannîn is rendered, "serpent" (AV "dragon") in Dt 32 33; their special species of poisonous serpents, and Ps 91 13, "the young lion and the serpent shalt thou trample under foot." On the other hand, nâmâsh seems in three passages to refer to a mythical creature or dragon: "His hand hath pierced the swift serpent" (Job 26 13); "In that day Jeh . . . will punish leviathan the swift serpent and leviathan the crooked serpent" (Isa 27 1); " . . . though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, then will I command the serpent, and it shall bite them" (Am. 9 3)

(4) נֵרָפ, zôhâlêh, is tr, "crawling things" in Dt 32
24 (AV "serpents") and in Mic 7 17 (AV "worms").

(5) נֵרָפ, 'akkâbâhâsh, occurs only in Ps 140 3, where it is trd "adder" (LXX Íkóis, Ípsi, Vulg asîps, "adders' poison is under their lips." It has been suggested (BDB) that the reading should be נֵרָפ, 'akkâbâhâsh, "spider" (q.v.). The word in the previous line is nâmâsh.

(6) נֵרָפ, peîhes, like most of the other names of a word of uncertain etymology, occurs 6 t and it is trd "asp," except in Ps 91 13, "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder." According to Liddell and Scott, asîps is the name of the Egyptian cobra, Naâa haîe L, which is not included in (2) above, because it does not certainly appear to have been used. The name "adder" is applied to various snakes all of which may perhaps be supposed to be poisonous but some of which are actually harmless. Asîps occurs in Rom 3 13 in a paraphrase of Ps 140 9 (see [5] above), it occurs frequently, though not uniformly, in LXX for (2), (5), (6), (7), (8) and (10).

(7) נֵרָפ, cepha', occurs only in Isa 14 29 where it is tr "adder" (AV "cockatrice"); ERV "basilisk," LXX kâsivos Íkris, Ípsi asîpsîn, Vulg regula. The word Ìkâsivos, of (7) and (8) may be an onomatopoetic word meaning "to hiss" (BDB).

(8) נֵרָפ, or נֵרָפ, qôphînt, occurs, in Prov 32 33, "At the last it biteth like a serpent [nâmâsh], and stungeth like an adder" (qôphînt). In Is 11 8; 59 5, and Jer 8 17, ARV has "adder," while AV has "cockatrice" and ERV has "basilisk."

(9) נֵרָפ, shâphîphôn, occurs only in Gen 49
17: "Dan shall be a serpent [nâmâsh] in the way,
An adder (shâphîphôn) in the path.
That biteth the horse's heels,
So that his rider falleth backward."

This has been thought to be Cerastes cornutus, the authority of Tristram (NNB), who says that lying in the path it will attack the passer-by and sometimes bite the legs of the person who tries to approach a person of large animal. He adds that his horse was much frightened at seeing one of these serpents coiled up in a camel's footprint.
The word is perhaps akin to the Arab.

sîf, or עַפָּש, suff, which denotes a spotted and deadly snake.

(10) נֵרָפ, 'eph'eh, is found in Job 30 16; Isa

It is the same as the Arab. ﷲ، af'a, which is usually trd "viper," though the writer has never found anyone who could tell what snake the name belongs to. In Arab. as in Heb a poisonous snake is always understood.

(11) נֵרָפ, kippôs, ARV "dart-snake," ERV
"arrowsnake," AV "great owl," only in Isa 34 15,
"There shall the dart-snake make her nest, and lay, and hatch, and gather under her shade;" yes, there mate." This is the concluding verse in a vivid picture of the desolation of Edom. The renderings "dart-snake" and "arrowsnake" rest on the authority of Bochart, but LXX has ἥξιων, echinos, "hedgehog," and Vulg ericetus, "hedgehog." The rendering of AV "great owl" seems preferable to the others, because the words "make her nest, and lay" and "and gather under her shade" are as a whole quite inapplicable to a mammal or to a reptile. The derivation from ἐ_buffers, ἐ襁as (cf Arab. ḏąaf, "to spring," "to dart," suits it, it is true, a snake, and not a hedgehog, but may also suit an owl. Finally, the next word in Isa 34:15 is "kites," ר'א, yayyāh; cf Arab. ɓālāt, "bird of prey.

See BITTERN; OWL; PORCUPINE.

(12) ὑβων, ὁφις, a general term for "serpent," occurs in numerous passages of the NT and LXX, and is fairly equivalent to נָבָשׁ.

(13) אֱרִיס, ascis, occurs in the NT only in Rom 3:13 | to Ps 140:3. See under (5) ἀκτήσωλθ or and (6) then found in LXX for these words, and also for ἑφθϊκ (Isa 30:6).

That the different Heb and Gr names are used without clear distinction seen from several examples of the employment of two different names in one expression:

Their poison is like the poison of a serpent [נָבָשׁ];

... twine round their close places (Mic 7:17).

... and they shall bite thee, saith Jehovah (Ps 99:8).

... Thus shall the herb seem a like a serpent [נָבָשׁ];

... 'Their wine is the poison of serpents (ךውן); and the venom of asps (ךואן), and the venom of adders and vipers, and the venom of all unclean things,' (Dt 8:16).

... "And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp [ךואון], and the weaned child shall put his hand on the adder's [ךְֽוִָבָּנָא] den" (Isa 11:8). See also (8) and (9) above.

Most of the Biblical references to serpents are of a figurative nature, and they usually imply poisonous qualities. The wicked (Ps 68:4), the persecutor (Ps 140:4), and the enemy (Jas 17:17) are likened to venomous serpents. The effects of wine are compared to the bites of serpents (Prov 23:32). Satan is a serpent (Gen 3:5; Rev 12:9; 20:2). The term "serpent" of vipers" is applied by John the Baptist to the Pharisees and Sadducees (Mt 3:7) or to the multitudes (Lk 3:7) who came to hear him; and by Jesus to the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 12:34; 23:33). Dan is a "serpent in the way" (Gen 49:17). Serpents are among the terrors of the wilderness (Dt 8:15; Isa 30:6). Among the signs accompanying believers is that "they shall take up serpents" (Mt 16:18; cf Acts 28:8). It is said of him that trusts in Jehovah:

"Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder; The young lion and the serpent shalt thou trample under foot" (Ps 91:13).

In the millennium, "the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the adder's den" (Isa 11:8). The serpent is subtle (Gen 3:1; 2 Cor 11:3); wise (Mt 10:16); accused (Gen 3:14); eats dust (Gen 3:14; Isa 65:25; Mic 7:17). The adder is deaf (Ps 58:4). The serpent lurks in unexpected places (Gen 49:17-19; Eccl 10:8; Am 5:19). Serpents may be charmed (Ps 58:5; Eccl 10:11; Jer 8:17). Among four wonderful things is "the way of a serpent upon a rock" (Prov 30:19).

SERPENT, BRAZEN, בִּרְצַן. See NEHEM. SHAN.

SERPENT-CHARMING. -charming: Allusion to this art, widely practised by the ancients (see references in DB, s.v.; esp. Bochart, Hieron., III, 161, 164, etc.), as by modern Orientals, is found in Ps 68:5; Ex 10:11; Jer 8:17; Sir 12:13, perhaps in Isa 3:7. The skill displayed in taming snakes, often without removing the poison fangs, is very surprising. Bruce, Davy and other travelers give striking illustrations. See esp. the interesting account of serpent-charming in Hengstenberg's Egypt and the Books of Moses, ET, 100-104.

SERPENT, CROOKED, קָרְךֶּק. With reference to the constellation round the North Pole, in mention of which "serpent-charming" (Gen 49:17) is changed in RV to "swift serpent," in "gliding" or "slithering." See ASTRONOMY, 11, 1.

SERPENT, FIERY. See Serpent, 3, (2).

SERPENT WORSHIP, wūrShip: Traces of this superstition are thought by certain critics to be discoverable in the religion of Israel. Stade mentions that W. R. Smith supposed the serpent to be the totem of the house of David (Geschichte, I, 465). H. P. Smith says: "We know of a Serpent's Stone near Jerus, which was the site of a sanctuary (1 K 1:9), and this sanctuary was dedicated to Jeh" (Hist of OT, 233, 240).

Special reliance is placed on the narrative of the bruised serpent, which, according to Num 21:8, is declared to have destroyed the idolatry (2 K 18:4). "In that case," says H. P. Smith, "we must treat the Nehushtan as a veritable idol of the people of Israel, which had been worshipped in the temple as a charm of the same type as his resentment. Serpent worship is so widespread that we should be surprised not to find traces of it in Israel" (ut supra). In the same line, see G. B. Gray, Nu, 275-76. The fancifulness of these deductions is obvious. See NEHEMIAH.

SEURUG, סֵּרֵעַ (Serrēq, sē'rōgh; Σαροκχ, Scratch): Son of Reu and great-grandfather of Abraham (Gen 11:20 f; 1 Ch 1:26; Lk 3:33).

SERVANT, sūrŠē (םֶּרֶשֶׁת; δουλος, doulos, doulos): A very common word with a variety of meanings, all implying a greater or less degree of inferiority and want of freedom: (1) The most frequent usage is as the equivalent of "slave" (q.v.), with its various shades in position (Gen 9:25; 24:9; Ex 21:5; Mt 10:24; Lk 17:7, and often); but also a hired worker where "hired servant" translates Heb and Gr expressions which differ from the above. (2) An attendant in the service of someone, as Joshua was the "servant," RV "minister," of Moses (Nu 11:28). (3) In a term of respectful self-deprecation: referring to one's self, "thy servant" or "your servant" is used in place of the personal pronoun of the first person: (a) in the presence of superiors (Gen 19 2; 32 18, and often); (6) in addressing the Supreme Being (1 S 3 9; Ps 19 11; 27 9; Lk 2 20, and often). (4) Officials of every grade are called the 'servants' of kings, princes, etc (1 S 29 3; 2 S 16 19; 1 K 12 25; Prov 14 35, and often). (5) The position of the king is often reflected in the phrase 'the people in 1 K 12 7). (6) One who is distinguished as obedient and faithful to God or Christ (Josh 1 2; 2 K 8 19; 2 Sa 6 20; Col 4 12; 2 Tim 2 24). (7) One who is ensnared by sin (Hb 8 34).

A century and a half had passed since the great days of Isaiah in Jerusalem. The world had vastly changed during those long decades when politicians had planned, armies summoned back and forth, and tribes and nations had lost or won in the struggle for existence, place and power. The center of the world had changed—for Assyria had gone to its long home, and the city claiming pre-eminence was not Nineveh but Babylon.

Nowhere perhaps had time left a heavier hand than on the city of Jerusalem and the country of Judah. For city and land had come to desolation, and the inhabitants of the country had become familiar with the strange sights and sounds of Babylon, whither they had been carried by their conquerors. Many had found graves in the land of the exile, and new generations had arisen who had no memory of the hill country of their fathers. It is the situation of these captive Jews in Babylon wh ich is reflected and the people who are addressed at the waning of the long night of captivity by the stirring message recorded in Isa chs 40—66 (leaving out of account here disputed passages in chs 40—66).

The more one studies the problem of the authorship of these chapters, the more unlikely does it seem that their author penned them 150 years before the time with which they are vitally connected. It is obviously impossible to treat that problem here. But one may sum up the arguments by saying that in theological ideas, in style, and in use of words they show such differences from the assured productions of Isaiah's pen as to point to a different authorship. And the great argument, the argument which carries the most weight to the author of this article, is that these late chapters are written from the standpoint of the exile. The exile is assumed in what is said. These chapters do not prophesy the exile, do not say it is coming, but they all the time speak as though it had come. The message is not that an exile is to be, but beginning with the fact that the exile already is, it foretell s deliverance. Now of course it is conceivable that God might inspire a man to put himself forward 150 years, and with some excuse to prophesy how the life was considered being their circumstances as a background of what he said, but it is improbable to the last degree. To put it in plain, almost gruff, English, it is not the way God did things. The prophet's message was always primarily a message to his own age. Then there is nothing in the chapters themselves that Isaiah was their author. And having once been so that it was supposed they were by Isaiah—placed so through causes we do not know—the fact that in speaking of passages from these chapters NT authors referred to them by a name the people would recognize, is not a valid argument that they meant to teach anything as to their authorship. The problem has been debated in NT times by Rom 9 10—44, Gal 4 24—31, Rom 11 20—25, and 1 Tim 4 1—6, as Professor Davidson has suggested, has a parallel in the Book of Job, each the production of a great mind, each from an author we do not know (cf. Isaiah).

OUT of the deep gloom of the exile—when the Jew was a man without a country, when it seemed as if the nation's sins had murdered hope—

3. The Prophet of the Exile:

The Prophets of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel are known to have written in the OT life. In the midst of the proud, confident civilization of Babylon, with its seeming wealth and exhaustless splendor, came a man who dared to speak for Jehovah—a man of such power to see reality that to him Babylon was already doomed, and he could summon the people to prepare for God's deliverance.

In recent criticism, esp. in Germany, there has been a strong tendency to assign the last chapters of this section to different authors and to different auditors. But the background it is claimed is not Bab; rather K is a group of people who were at home in Judea, and in at least one passage the temple at Jerusalem seems to be standing. That these chapters need not be disputed, but it seems to me that again and again in them one can find the hand of Second Isaiah. Then undoubtedly the author quotes from previous prophesies which we can recognize, and the suggestion that some of the difficult passages may be quotations from other older prophesies which are not preserved to us, I think an exceedingly good one. The quotation of passages and the use of words in the prophets' mouths and the prophet's feeling of the need of the people, would seem to me not at all unnatural. If a later hand is responsible for some utterances in the latter part of the section, it seems to me fairly clear that most of it is from the hand of the great unknown prophet of the OT.

The questions regarding the Servant-passage as affecting the unity of the book will be treated later.

The first part of this section vividly contrasts Jehovah and the idols worshiped with such splendor and ceremony. All the resources of irony and satire are used to point and effect the contrast. The prophet's satirical style is genuine. The Satanic as instrument in the deliverance. The Idols are described in process of manufacture; they are addressed in scornful apostrophe, they are seen carried away helpless. On the other side Jehovah, with imitable foresight and incisive judgment, reveals the future. They know and reveal nothing. He brings to pass what He has planned. They do nothing. Not only the idols but Babylon itself is made the victim of satire—and the prophet hurst a taunt song at the proud but impotent city.

Israel—the people of Jehovah—the elect of God—is given the prophet's message. The past is called up as a witness to Jehovah's dealings. His righteousness—His faithfulness to His people—shall not fail. They are worshiping all the wrong gods, but their salvation is provided. And with joy of this salvation from exile and from sin the book rings and rings. The Zion of the restored Israel is pictured with all the power of color and richness of imagery at the prophet's command. And I think we are to have a world mission. His light is to fall upon all lands. It is to minister salvation to all races of men.

But back of and under these pictures of great hope is the prophet's sense of his people's sin and their struggle with it. In Isaiah 5:1—6, 16:9—12, 65:24—25, and 66:4—16 this comes out clearly. And the mood of these chapters is exposed as the saying out of the deep things of the Servant-passages came. There is no need to insist that the chapters as they stand are in the order in which they were written. We know from other prophecies that this was not always true. But even if a man were convinced that the chapters now occurring as the Servant-passages were all written after them, he could still hold, and I think would be justified in holding, that places in those chapters the reader finds the record of a state of the prophet’s mind before the writing of those passages. The former view would be, I think, the preferable one, and that places in those chapters the point of view is logically that out of which some of the deep things in the Servant-passages came.

In profoundness of meaning the climax of the book is reached in these passages where the deliverance from the sin and guilt, once the man’s sin and guilt connected with one great figure—the Servant of Jeh.

The word “servant,” as applied to servants of God, is not an unfamiliar one to readers of the OT. It is applied to different individuals and by Jeremiah to the nation (of Jer Servant- Passages 30 10; 46 27); but its message is on the whole so distinct and complete in Second Isa that we can study it without any further reference to previous usage.

The “servant” first appears in Isa. 41 8. Here the reference is undoubtedly to Israel, chosen and called of God and to be upheld by Him. Here Israel is promised victory over its enemies. In vivid picture their destruction and Israel’s future triumph over them are portrayed.

There are several incident references to Israel as Jeh’s servant: created by Jeh and not to be forgotten (41 8); Cyrus is said to be called for the sake of His servant Jacob (44 4); Jeh is said to have redeemed his servant Jacob (48 20).

In 44 20 “servant” seems to be used with the meaning of prophet. It is said of Jeh that He “confirmeth the word of his servant, and performeth the counsel of his messiah.”

In 45 19 we find the failure and inadequacy of Israel presented in the words, “Who is blind, but my servant? or dumb, but the prophet that I send? This passage is an explanation of the exile. Israel proved unworthy and sinned, hence His punishment, but even in the exile the lesson had not been taken to heart.

In 43 8 if Jeh summons Israel the servant, who in spite of blindness and deafness yet is His witness. It has at least seen enough to be able to witness for Him in the presence of the heathen.

In 44 1–3, leaving the unworthiness of the actual Israel, there comes what seems to me a summons in the name of a Servant. The prevailing thought is call to the high future which God has ready to give.

This covers the reference to the servant outside the great Servant-passages to which we now come. There are four of these: 42 1–9; 49 1–20; 50 4–11; 52 13–53 12. 61 1–4 perhaps represents words of the prophet, but may refer to words of the prophet; and, as at any rate it adds no new feature to the picture of the Servant already given in the passages undoubtedly referring to him, we will not discuss it.

(1) Date of the Servant-passages.—Ewald long ago suggested that the last of the Servant-passages must have been borrowed from an earlier composition, which he assigned to the age of Manasseh. “If we find in the study of the passage reason for its vividness, we shall not need to seek its origin in the description of some past martyrdom.”

Cheyne thinks the Servant-passages post-exilic. The gentleness and quiet activity of the Servant for one thing, according to Duhm, suggest the age of the scribes, rather than that of the exile. But might not an age of suffering be the explanation of gentleness? According to Skinner, Duhm thinks the passages were inserted almost haphazard, but Skinner also refers to Kosters, showing that the passages cannot be lifted without carrying some of the succeeding verses with them. This is particularly significant in view of recent popularity of other theories which deny the Servant-passages to the hand and time of Second Isa. The theory that these passages form by themselves a poem or a set of poems which have been inserted here can boast of distinguished names.

There does not seem much to commend it, however. As to the argument from difference as to rhythm, there is disagreement, and the data are probably not of a sort to warrant much significance between the writing of those passages. The former view would be, I think, the preferable one. The fact that the passages are not always a part of a connected narrative, but give to the reader points of view that are logically that out of which some of the deep things in the Servant-passages came.

This passage concludes with a promise to Jeh. He is promised victory over his enemies. It is a vivid picture their destruction and Israel’s future triumph over them are portrayed.

(2) Discussion of the passages.—42 1–9: In these verses Jeh Himself is the speaker, describing the Servant as His chosen, in whom His soul delights, upon whom He has put His spirit. He is to bring justice to the Gentiles. He is to be quiet and gentle, and the very forlorn hope of goodness He will not quench. He is to set justice in the earth, and remote countries are described as waiting for His law. Then comes a declaration by the prophet that Jeh, the Creator of all, is the speaker of words declaring the Servant’s call in righteousness to be a covenant for the people, a light to the Gentiles, a helper to those in need—the blind and imprisoned. His glory is not to be given to another, nor to use the phrase of Deutero-Isaianic prophecies have come to pass. New things He now declares. One’s attention needs to be called to the distinction of the Servant from Israel in this passage. He is to be a covenant of the people: according to Delitzsch, “in whom and through whom Jeh makes a new covenant with His people in place of the old one that has been broken.”

49 1–20: Here the Servant himself speaks, telling of his calling from the beginning of his life, of the might of his word, of his shelter in God, of a time of discouragement andplash, of deliverance and praise, of the bonds that are broken. “It is a difficult matter to decide whether the prophecy is a true picture of the Servant or not. But it may be pointed out that the picture parts of the Servant as the Servant。”

50 4–11: In the first part of this passage the Servant is not mentioned directly, but it seems clear that he is speaking. He is taught of God continually, that he may bring a message to the weary. He has opened his ear so that he may fully understand Jeth's message. The Servant and after Him coming to the fullness of time will be distinguished because of his obedience. He was not rebellious and did not turn back from his mission. Flint-like he set his face and walked in the confidence in God, that the shame which came upon him. After language vivid with a sense of personal confessions, assured consciousness of victory and faith in God are expressed.

In vs 10-11, according to Delitzsch, Jeth speaks, first explaining that he addressed the Servant, then addressing those who despise his word. Cheyne thinks this passage is not illy understood in vs 10 may be the prophet, I prefer Delitzsch's view.

52 13—53 12: The present division of 52 13—53 12 is unfortunate, for obviously it is all of a piece and ought to stand together in one chapter. In 52 13-15 Jeh speaks of the humiliation and later of the exaltation of the Servant. He shall deal wisely—the idea here including the success resulting from wisdom—and shall be exalted. Words are piled upon each other here to express his exaltation. But the appearance of the Servant is such as to suggest the very opposite of his dignity, which will astonish nations and kings when they come to understand all this. Entering upon ch 53 we find the people of Israel speaking confessing their former unbelieving, and giving as a reason the repulsive aspect of the Servant—despised, sad, sick with a visage to make men turn from him. They are described as though he had been a leper. They thought all this had come upon him as a stroke from God, but they now see how he went even to death, not for his own transgression but for theirs. Their peace and healing came through his suffering and death. They have been sinful and erring; the result of it all God has caused to light upon him.

They look back in wonder at the way he bore his sufferings—like a lamb led to the slaughter, with a false judicial procedure he was led away, no one dividing his spoils and greatness—the phrases suggesting kingly glory: all this is to be his because of his suffering. The great fact of ch 53 is vicarious suffering.

(3) Whom did the prophet mean by the Servant?—(a) Obviously not all of Israel always, for the Servant is distinguished from Israel. (b) Not the godly remnant, for he is distinguished from them. Then the godly remnant does not attain to any such proportions as to fit the description of ch 53. (c) And other passages as Deutero-Isaiah's too, show what the prophet's order is intended. The whole order is not great enough to exhaust the meaning of one of a half-dozen of the greatest lines in ch 53.

Professor A. B. Davidson's OT Prophecy contains a brilliant and radical new interpretation of the whole basis of the approaches from the standpoint of Bib. rather than simply exegetical theology. His fundamental position is that in the prophet's outlook the restoration is the consummation. In his mind the Servant and his work do not come at the restoration. The Servant, if a real person, must be one whose work lies in the past or present, as there is not room in the future for him, for the restoration which is at the door brings felicity, but no victory over sin, and is not realized receivable. But there is no actual person in the past and none in the present who could be the Servant. Hence the Servant cannot be to the prophet's mind a real person (see CONIAH).

Of course Davidson relates the result to his larger conception of the Servant, but I consider his interpretation of the Messianic significance of the passages in relation to their fulfillment in our Lord. The ideas they contain are realized in Him.

But coming back to the prophet's mind—if the Servant was not a personal figure to him, what figure is it? The answer according to Davidson is, He is a great personification of the ideal Israel, and Israel according to its ideal. To quote more fully, "The prophet has created out of the Divine determinations imposed on Israel, election, creation and forsaking, endowment with the word or spirit of Jeth, and the Divine purpose in those operations, an ideal Being, an inner Israel in the heart of the phenomenal or actual Israel, an indestructible Being having these Divine attributes or endowments, present in the outward Israel in all ages, powerful and effectual because really composed, if I can say so, of Divine forces, who cannot fail in God's purpose, and who as an inner power within Israel by his inspiration causes all Israel to become a true servant" (cf. Davidson, OT Prophecy, p. 263).

Now it seems to me that Davidson is more effective in his destructive than in his constructive work. One must confess that he presents real difficulties in holding to a personal Servant as the prophet's conception. But on the other hand when he presents a more adequate conception, I do not think he conspicuously succeeds.

The greatest of the Servant-passage's (it seems to me) presents more than can be successfully dealt with under any conception of the Servant as the ideal Israel. The very great emphasis on vicarious suffering in ch 53 simply is not answered by the theory. Words would not leap with such a flame of reality in describing the suffering of a personification. The case of sin back to the passage is not a thing whose problem could be solved by a glittering figure of speech. There it surges—the movement of an aroused conscience—and the answer to it could never be anything less than a real deed by a real person. My own feeling is that if language can express anything it expresses the fact that the prophet had a real personal Servant in view.

But what of the difficulties Davidson suggests? Even if the answer were not easy to find, one could rest on the total impression the passages make. One cannot consider a passage not in the environment in which it belongs. As Cheyne in other days said, "In the sublime descriptions of the Servant I am unable to resist the impression that we have the presentment of an historical personage, each forcibly stated, each cut off, yet each really seen in the colors of the present. Then we must remember that the prophets did not relate all their conceptions. They stated truths whose meaning and articulation they did not understand. They were not philosophers for a total view of life, and when we try to read them from this standpoint we misjudge them. Then we must remember that the prophet may here have been lifted to a height of prophetic receptiveness where he received and uttered what went beyond his understanding. To be sure there was a point of contact, but I see no objection to the thought that in a place of unique significance and importance like this, God might use a man to utter words which reached far beyond the limits of his own understanding. In this connection revealed to him Professor Hermann Schultz are worth quoting: "If it is true anywhere, in the history of poetry and prophecy, it is true here that the writer being full of the spirit has said more than he himself meant to say and more than he himself understood."
(4) The psychology of the prophecy.—This does not mean that something may not be said about the connection of the Servant-passages with the prophet's own thought. Using Delitzsch's illustration, we can see how from regarding all Israel as the servant the prophet could narrow down to the godly part of Israel as experience taught him the faithlessness of many, and it ought not to be impossible for us to see how all that Israel really meant at its best could have focused itself in his thought upon one person. Despite Davidson's objection, I can see nothing artificial about this movement in the prophet's mind. There was probably more progression in his thought than Professor Davidson is willing to allow. If it is asked, Where was the prophet when he spoke of the prophet could ascribe such greatness, conceiving as he did that he was to come at once? surely a similar question would be fair in relation to Isaiah's Messiah. The truth is that even on the threshold of the restoration there was typological surety boldly to assert. As John the Baptist on the Jordan watched for the coming One whom he knew not, yet who was 'aliter,' so the great prophet of the exile may have watched even day by day for the coming Servant whose work had been revealed to him.

But deep in the psychology of the prophecy is the sense of sin out of which these passages came and indications of which I think are found in the latter part of the book. The great guilt-laden past lay terribly behind the prophet, and as he mused over the sufferings of the righteous, perhaps esp. drawn to the heart-rent Jeremiah, the thought of redemptive suffering may haveawned upon him. And if in its light, and with a personal sense of sin drawn from what experiences we know not, he grapples with the problem, can we not understand, can we not see that God might flash upon him the great conception of a sin-bearer?

At last the idea of vicarious suffering had been connected with deep things of the nation's life, and henceforward was a part of its heritage. To the profoundest souls of the Servant— it would be a part of the nation's forward look. The priestly idea had been deepened and filled with new moral meaning. The Servant was a prophet too—so priest and prophet met in one. And I think Cheyne was right when he suggested that in the Servant's exultation in ch 53, the Servant is brought near to this in a fashion which we shall want to be more told, and which we shall want to be more suggested. In his thought to him as we do not think. So in suggestion, at least, prophet, priest and king meet in the great figure of the suffering Servant.

A new rich stream had entered into prophecy, full of power to fertilize whatever shores of thought it touched. In the thoughts of these passages prophecy seemed pressing with impatient eagerness to its goal, and though centuries were to pass before that goal was reached, its promise is seen here, full of assurance and of knowledge of the kind of goal it was. But whatever our view of the meaning of the prophet, we must agree (of Mt 8 17; 12 18-21; 26 67; Jn 12 41, et al.) that the conception he so boldly and powerfully put upon his canvas had its realization in its fulfillment in the One who spoke to the world from the cross on Calvary. And in its darkly glorious shadow the Christian, with all the sadness and joy and wonder of it, with a sense of its solving all its problems and meeting in the deepest and most secret of his life, can feel a strange companion-ship with the exilic prophet whose

Significance with of the the yearning for a sin-bearer and belief in the Servant— His coming call across the long and slowly moving years. In the light and penetration of that hour he may be trusted to know what the prophet meant. Professor Delitzsch well said of that passage, "Every word is as it were written under the cross at Golgotha."

SERVANTS. SOLOMON'S. See SOLOMON'S SERVANTS.

SERVICE, sêr'vis; Six Heb, two Aram. and four Gr words are so rendered.

1. In the OT the word most used for "service" is 1 'abhadh, from 'abhadh, which is the general word, meaning "to work" and so "to serve," "to till," also "to enslave." The noun means "bondage," "labor," "ministering," "service," "service," "work," "use." This word is used in desert work in the fields (Ex 1 14, et al.), work in the tabernacle (Ex 27 19, et al.), sanctuary service (Nu 7 9), service of Jeh (Nu 8 11), Levitical or priestly service (Nu 8 22), kingly service (1 Ch 26 30, etc.). Reference is made to instruments, wood vessels, cattle, herbs, shekels for the service in the house of Jeh. (2) 'Abhadh itself is t°r service in Nu 8 15; 18 23; Jer 22 13. (3) Serdâ means "standing," i.e. piercing with a needle; it occurs only 4 t, and in each case in RV instead of "service" is used finely wrought garments" (Ex 31 10; 35 19; 39 11). (4) Shôdâth means primarily "to attend" as a servant or worshipping, and to contribute to or render service, wait on, and hence service; occurs only 3 t (Ex 35 19; 39 141 AV) and in ARV is rendered "for ministering." (5) Câbâl is found 7 t, used in the same connection each time, and refers to those numbered for service in the tent of meeting. Its primary root meaning refers to service for war, campaign, hardship (Nu 4 30 35 39 43; 8 24). (6) Yâh means 'to give,' lit. an "opening," a direction, power, and so ministry as in 1 Ch 6 31, where David appoints certain ones to have direction of the music, in 1 Ch 29 5, RV not service, but himself. (7) 'Abhadh means "business," "labor," "service," "work," "service," "service," "service," "service," "work." (8) Pôldân, from root meaning "to worship," "minister to," and so in Ez 7 19 vessels given for service.

The following are the use in the NT: (1) Diakonia, from root meaning "to run on errands," and so attendance, aid as a servant, ministry. 2. In the OT, instead, of NT Eng. word "deacon"; Paul: "that I might minister unto you" (2 Cor 11 8); also found in Rom 15 31 ("ministration") and Rev 2 19 ("ministry"). (2) Doulos, lit. "to be a slave," in bondage, service (Gal 4 8, "bondage"); Eph 6 6, "service"; 1 Tim 6 2, "serve"). (3) Latría, from root meaning "to render religious homage," menial service to God, and so worship (Jn 15 2, "service"; Rom 12 1, "service"; Rom 12 1, "service"; He 9 11, "service"; "services"). (4) Leitourgía, from root "to perform religious or charitable functions," worship, relieve, obey, minister, and hence a public function, priestly or charitable (liturgy) (2 Cor 9 12, "service"); also in Phil 2 17 30). See Servant of Jehovah.

WILLIAM EDWARD RUFFETTY
Thus (a) To attack: Jgs 9 33, AV "and set upon the city." (b) To impiant: Gen 4 15, AV "The Lord saw that a mark was upon Cain." (c) To stand: 1 K 2 15, "And that all Israel set their faces on me." (d) To place: 1 K 20 12, Ben-hadad shouted one word to his allies: "Set," i.e. set the armies in array, the battering-rams and engines of attack in their place. (e) To incline toward: Ezk 40 4, "Set thy heart upon all that I shall show thee." (f) To trust: Ps 62 10, "If riches increase, set not your heart thereon." (g) To place before: Ps 90 8, "Thou hast set our iniquities before thee;" Ps 141 3, "Set a watch, O JeH, before my mouth." (h) To go down: of the setting of the sun: Mk 13 19; Lk 4 4; He 12 22. To be proud: Mal 3 15, AV "They that work wickedness are set up." (j) To fill in: Ex 36 9, "stones to be set for the ephod." (k) To plant: Mk 12 1, "set a hedge about it." (l) To mock: Lk 23 11, "Herod . . . set him at nought." (m) To honor: 1 S 18 30, "so that his name was much set by." (n) To start: Acts 21 2, "We went aboard, and set sail." As may be seen the word is used in an endless variety of meanings.

SETH, sett, SHETH, sheth (סֵתָה; יָאָשָׁה; סֵתָה; סֵתָה),

(1) The son born to Adam and Eve after the death of Abel (Gen 4 25f.; 5 3f.; 1 Ch 1 1; Sir 49 16; Lk 3 38). In Gen 4 25 the derivation of the name is not given in the text, but E. Ellenhorn (Gen Name Schriften, 1899, p. 22), says God hath appointed [Sha'ah] me another seed instead of Abel. In 1 Ch 1 1 AV, the form is "Seth"; elsewhere in AV and in RV throughout the form is "Seth." (2) AV "the father of Sheth," RV "the sons of Tumak." According to AV rendering, the name of an unknown race mentioned in Balaam's parable (Nu 24 17).

S. F. HUntER

SETHUR, seth-ur (םַתּוּר), Sethur (Σαθοῦρ, Greek: An Asherite spy (Nu 13 13 [14]).

SETTING, set'ing (מַסָּטָה; μίλλυ'αθ, lit. "a filling"); The word is used in the description of the manufacture of the breastplate of judgment (Ex 28 17). The instruction runs: Thou shalt set in it settings of stones, four rows of precious stones. The same word is rendered "inclosings" in ver 20, and in 39 13 AV.

SETTLE, set'l (מַסַּטַּר, תַּתָּה), "a settling": For this word in Ex 43 14,17,20; 46 10, AVs and ERVs substitute more correctly "ledge." See Temple.

SETTLE: The Heb language has 8 words which are thus trs: יָאָשָׁה, נִבָּע, עַנָּא, שֶׁבַּת, תַּתָּה, נַעַב, מַצָּב, כְּבָדָה. Now the meaning is to settle down, to cause to occur (Ex 43 11; AV, 1 Ch 17 14); then it denotes fixedness (2 K 8 11; Ps 119 89; Prov 8 25) again it points to a condition of absolute quiescence, as the settings on the les (Jer 48 11); and in still another place it means packing solidly together (Ps 66 10). In the NT the words ἐγκαταστάσεως, ἐγκαθίστασιν, ἀποκατάστασιν, and ἐστήσατο, ἐκκαθάρισαν, have been trs "settle." RV in 1 Pet 5 10 has trs "establish," and the context unquestionably points to the idea of a fixed establishment in the faith. In Lk 21 14 the word the "settle" evidences points to a fixed determination. HENRY E. DÓKER

SEVEN, sev'n (שֶׁבָּה; שֶׁבָּה; שֶׁבָּה), See Number.

SEVEN CHURCHES. See Churches, Seven.

SEVEN STARS. See Astronmy.
SEVENEH, sē-ven'ē, se-ve'ne (Seveneh, gweneth): For AV "the tower of Syene," in Exk 29 10; 30 6, RV reads, "the tower of Seveneh," with note n, "or, from Migdol to Syene." Seveneh is the town at the First Cataract on the Nile at Assuan. Fresh interest has recently been given to it by the Elephantine discoveries bearing on the ancient Jewish colony and temple of Jeh in that place in the 5th cent. BC. See ARAMAIC; EGYPT; PAPYRI; SANC SEVENTH, sev'nth, DAY. See SABBATH.

SEVENTY, sev'n-ty (Heb. sev'yan, sev'yâ'â, sôyôûkh-yôâ, hebdomôkhôna). See NUMBER.

SEVENTY DISCIPLES: The account of the designation and mission of these is found only in Lk 10. Some have therefore sought to maintain that we have here only a confused variant of the appointment of the Twelve; but this is impossible in the light of Luke's account of the Twelve in ch 9.

The documents vary as between the numbers seventy and seventy-two, so that it is impossible to determine which is the correct reading; and internal evidence cannot help settle the question in this case. There is nothing in the function or circumstances of the TWELVE to indicate any reason for the specific number.

Commentators have sought parallels in the seventy elders chosen to assist Moses (Nu 11) and supposed that Jesus was indicating His kinship with the "prophet like unto Moses" whom God would raise up.

Again, the Jews popularly reckoned the "number of the nations of the earth" at seventy (cf Gen 10); and some have supposed Jesus to be thus indicating that His Church would embrace the whole world. But the variation of the angel's declaration is the same as that of the Seventy are not forbidden to go to Gentiles, and that their commission probably included Persia, where the Seventy were to be found. Some, again, have supposed that Jesus had in mind the Jewish Sanhedrin, composed of seventy (or seventy-two), and that the appointment of a like number to extend the work of His kingdom was a parabolic recognition that as the Jews were officially rejecting Him, so He was rejecting them as agents for the work of the kingdom. It is impossible to speak with any certainty as to any of these suggestions. It is to be noted that there is the same confusion between the numbers seventy and seventy-two in all four Jewish traditions as to the number of translators of the LXX.

Inasmuch as no further mention is made of these workers, it is to be understood that they were appointed to a temporary ministry. Tradition assigns to them no further or permanent role after Pentecost. While it is probable that some of these were witnesses later, the tradition is worthless in details. The mission of these and this reason assigned for their appointment are essentially the same as in the case of the Twelve. Jesus is now completing His last public campaign in preaching and introducing the kingdom of heaven. The employing of these in this service is in line with the permanent ideal of Christian ministry which is not a distinction between the "laymen" and the "clergy" in responsibility and service. Jesus was perhaps employing all whose experience and sympathy made them fit for work in the harvest that was so plenteous while the laborers were few. He found seventy-two weeks from the ascension and He would find a hundred and twenty such after His ascension (Acts 1 15). WILLIAM OWEN CARVER SEVENEH YEARS: The period assigned by Jeremiah for the duration of the Jewish exile in Babylon (Jer 25 11 12; 29 10; cf. 2 Ch 36 21 f; Ezr 1 1; Dn 9 2). If the period be reckoned from the date of the first deportation in the 4th year of Jehoiachin (2522 BC) Dn 36 6 f, Dn 1 1 by another reckoning calls it the 3d year), i.e. 606 BC, till the decree of Cyrus, 536 BC, the prediction was fulfilled to a year. See CAPTIVITY.

SEVER, sev'ér: The three Heb words bâdhal, pâdâth and parâdâth are thus tr 1. The idea conveyed is that of setting apart (Lev 20 26 AV) or of setting someone or something apart in a miraculous way (Ex 8 22; 9 4 AV, ERV), or, again, of simple separation on one's own volition (Jgs 11 11 AV, ERV). The Gr word âphorís, aphorís (Mt 26 23) stands for final judicial segregation.

SEVERAL, sev'er-al, SEVERALLY, sev'er-al-ly: The Heb word usually sevâh, sevâh is rendered tr 1 "several" in AV, ERV, 2 K 15 5; 2 Ch 26 21; in both cases tr 1 "separate!" in ARV, and indicate ceremonial uncleanness and consequent severance on account of leprosy. In the parable of the Talenta (Mt 25:15) and also in 1 Cor 12:11 the word ἄγαν̣, ἄδιος, is τρίτον “several,” “severally.” In both cases it points to the individuality of the recipients of the gift bestowed.

SHAALBIM, shā-a-lb'īn (םשׁלָבִים, sha'lālab'īn; B, שֶׁלֶבָּה, Shelelah, A, סֶלֶבָּה, Salcelim): A town in the Dan area of Ben-shemesh and Ajalon (Josh 19:42). It seems to be identical with Shaalbim.

SHAALBONITE, shā-al-bōnīt (םשׁלָבּוֹנִי, sha'lābōnī); A, שֶלֶבּוֹן, Shelbon; in Josh B A, Shelabim, Salceleim): The place of residence of the Amorites who forced the children of Dan to seek new homes. Elahha the Shaalbonite. This village is the site of the ancient city of Arad, and the name of a people who were descended from Shemesh, listed in 1 Ch 11:33, which again is probably identical with Shaalbim. Onom identifies it with Salaha, a large village in the district of Sebaste (Samaria), which apparently Eusebius and Jerome thought to be in the territory of Dan. It seems, however, too far to the N. Jerome in his comm. on Ezk 48:19 speaks of the towers of Ajalon and Selebi and Emmaus. Conder would identify Selebi with Selbí, 3 miles N.W. of Ajalon (Yādo), and 8 miles N. of Beth-shemesh. This would suit for Shaalbim, as far as position is concerned; but it is difficult to account for the heavy τ, if the name, derived from Shaalbonite.

W. EWING

SHAALBIM, shā-al-bīm (םשׁלֹבִים, sha'lābīm; B, שֶלֶבּי, Shelbī; A, סֶלֶבּי, Salbī): A town in the Dan area of Ben-shemesh and Ajalon (Josh 19:42). It seems to be identical with Shaalbim.

SHAALIM, shā'a-līm, LAND OF (םשׁלָלִים, sha'lālīm), one of the territory of Judah, given to Caleb the son of Jefuneh (Josh 15:30). It includes both the Shephelah and the district of Jerahmeel, Jeshua the son of Nun and Caleb are said, (Josh 15:17), to pass through this land.

W. EWING

SHAAPH, sha‘af (שׁאַפָּה, sha‘aph): (1) A son of Jablai (1 Ch 2:47). (2) The son of Masach, a convert of Caleb, the brother of Jerahmeel. Shapph is called the “father,” or founder, of the city Madmannah (1 Ch 2:48 f).

SHAARAIM, shā-a-rā'im (שׁאורַיָם, sha‘ārayim), “two gates”; A, שֶׁלֶרְיָם, Shelarim; AV Sharamim): (1) A city in the Shephelah or “lowland” of Judah mentioned (Josh 15:36) in close association with Sooch and Azekah; the vanquished army of the Philistines passed a Shaaraim in their flight from Sooch toward Gath and Ekron (1 S 17:52). It is possible that in this latter reference the “two gates” may refer—as LXX implies—to the two Philistine strongholds of themselves. Shaaraim has been identified with Tell Zakariya (see however Azekah) and with Kh. Sa‘rekh (PEF, III, 114, Sh XVII), an old site W. of Beth Atîb. Both proposals are hazardous.

(2) One of the towns of Simeon (1 Ch 4:31), called (Josh 19:6) “Shaarhun” and, as one of the uttermost cities of Judah, called (Josh 18:32) “Shekhim.” This town was in Southwestern Pal and is very probably identical with the fortress Sharrana, a place of some importance on the road from Gaza to Egypt. Ashmus (XVIIIth Dynasty) besieged and captured this city in the 5th year of his reign in his pursuit of the flying Hyksos (Petrie, Hist, II, 22, 35), and a century later Tahutmes III, in the 23rd year of his reign, took the city of Sharrana on his way to the siege and capture of Megiddo (Petrie, Hist, II, 104). On philological grounds Tell esh-Sherkiya, 12 miles N.W. of Beerseba, a large ruin, has been proposed, but it does not suit at all the Egypt data (PEF, III, 399, Sh XXIV).

E. W. WESTCOTT

SHAAHGAZ, sha‘ah-gaz (שׁאָהַגָּז, sha‘agaz): LXX reads Ρακί, Gai, the same name it gives to the official referred to in Est 2:15; the name may go back to the Old Bactrian word Ζάσκακάντω, “one anxious to learn” (Scheff); most commentators suggest no explanation: A chamberlain of Ahasuerus, king of Persia; as keeper of “the second house of women,” he had Esther under his charge (ver 14).

SHABBETHAI, shab‘ē-thāi (שׁבְבֶתְי, sabḥothay), “one born on the Sabbath”; B, סָבָטָּה, Sabatha; A, קַבְבָּתָּה, Kabbathah; “Sabbatute” of 1 Esd 3:14: A Levite who opposed (?) Ezra’s suggestion that the men who had married foreign wives put them aside (Ezk 10:15). Kenken, however, renders the phrase פַּרְשֵׁי עֵדָה, Pārṣē‘i ‘al ‘odh, of which Ashiel and Jahaziah are the subjects, to mean “stand against,” “oppose” (Gesammelte Abhandlungen, 247 f); this would make Shabbethai, who was in accord with the two men mentioned above, an ally rather than an opponent of Ezra. We incline toward Kenken’s view of the people’s interest with a position attained by Shabbethai under Nehemiah—one he would have been unlikely to attain had he been hostile to Ezra. He is mentioned among those appointed to explain the Law (Neh 8:7), and as one of the chiefes of the Levites who had the oversight of “the outward business of the house of God” (Neh 11:16).

HORACE J. WOLF

SHACHIA, sha-ki’a, shak‘i-ā (שׁחֵיא, sakh‘yā; so Baer, Ginsberg; some see red sakh‘rā, or מִכת, sakhr‘yā; also מִכת, sakhr‘yāh, and מִכת, shaḥhr‘yāh, sakhhr‘yāh). This last reading is favored by the Syriac and the LXX [B, סָבָתָה, Sabia, A, סָבָתָה, Sabith; but Luke, יָבָת, Yabat, Sequiah]: the form in ḫh (2) instead of b (2) have the support of the Vulg, Sequia, “Yahweh has forgotten”?: A name in a genealogy of Benjamin (1 Ch 10:10).

SHADDAI, shad‘ā-i, shad‘i. See God, Names of, 11, 8.

SHADE, shād, SHADOW, shad‘ā-ing (נִשְׂאָד, nis‘ā-ad; skud, skid): A shadow is any obscuration of the light and heat with the form of the intervening object, obscurly projected, constantly changing and passing away. "Shadow" is used lit. of a roof (Gen 19:8), of mountains (Jgs 9:36), of trees (Jgs 9:15, etc.), of wings (Ps 17:8, etc.), of a cloud (Isa 25:5), of a great rock (Isa 30:32), the Name of Jehovah (Acts 5:15), of the shadow on the dial (2 K 20:9, etc.), of Jonah’s gourd (Jon 4:5f). It is used also figuratively (1) of shelter and protection (of man, Gen 19:8; Cant 2:3; Isa 16:3, etc.; of God, Ps 36:7; 91:1; Isa 4:6, etc.); (2) of anything fleeting or transient, as of the days of man’s life on earth (1 Ch 29:15; Job 8:9; Ps 109:23); (3) with the idea of obscurity or imperfection (in He 8:5; 10:1, of the Law; of Col 2:17); (4) of darkness, gloom, see Shadow of Death. In Jps 1:17, we have in AV, “the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning” (aposkiasma), RV “shadow that is cast by turning”; the reference is to the unchangeableness of God as contrasted with the changes of the heavenly bodies. RV “has of the most frequent usage, for ‘shadowing with wings’ in Isa 18:1; ARV has ‘shade’ for ‘shadow’ in various places (Jgs 9:15; Job 40:22; Isa 4:6, etc.). In Job 40:21-22, for “shady trees” RV has “lotus-trees.”

W. L. WALKER

SHADOW OF DEATH (דָּיָּם, qalma’ath): The Heb word דָּיָּם “shadow of death” is used poetically for thick darkness (Job 3:5), as descriptive of Sheol (Job 30:21; 12:22; 38:17), figuratively of deep distress (Job 12:22; 16:16; 24:17bis; 28:3; 34:22 [in the last three passages ARV has “thick darkness” and “thick gloom”]; Ps 23:4, RV “deep darkness [and so elsewhere]”); 44:19; 107:10; 14:2; Jer 2:6; 13:16; Am 5:8; Mt 4:16; Lk 1:79, 80). The word of Jehovah and the Heb word used for “shadowing with wings” in the last two passages is כֵּל, “shadow,” and מַעֲעָת, “death,” and the idea of “the valley of the shadow of death” was most probably derived from the deep ravines, darkened by over-hanging briers, etc., through which the shepherd had sometimes to lead or drive his sheep to new and better pastures.

W. L. WALKER

SHADRACH, sha’drmk: The Bab name of one of the so-called Heb children. Shadrach is probably the Sumerian name of the Bab Kudurri-U-Aki, “servant of Sin.” It has been suggested by Meinhof that we should read Merodach instead of Shadrach. Since there were no vowels in the original Heb or Arum, and since sh and m as well as r and d are much the same in the old alphabet in which Dnl was written, this change is quite possible.

Shadrach and his two companions were trained along with Daniel at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, who had carried all four captive in the expedition against Jerus in the 5th year of Joho’akim (Dnl 1:1). They all refused to eat of the food provided by Ashpenaz, the master who had been set over them by the king, but preferred to eat pulse (Dnl 1:12). The effect was much to their advantage, as they appeared far fatter and fatter than those who ate of the king’s meat. At the end of the appointed time they passed satisfactory examinations, both as to their physical appearance and their intellectual acquirements, so that none were found like them among all with whom the king communed, and they stood before the king (see Dnl 1).

When Daniel heard that the wise men of Babylon were to be slain because they could not tell the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, after he had gained a relative from the king, he made this thing known to his three companions that they might unite with him in prayer to the God of heaven that they all might not perish with the rest of the wise men of Babylon. After God had heard their prayer and the dream was made known to the king by Daniel, Nebuchadnezzar, at Daniel’s request, set Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego over the affairs of the province of Babylon (Dnl 2). With Meshach and Abed-nego, Shadrach was cast into a fiery furnace, but escaped unhurt (Dnl 3). See Abed-nego; Hananiah; Song of Three Children.

R. Dick Wilson

SHADY, shad’di, TREES (Job 40:21f). See LOTUS TREES.

SHAF'T, shaft: Isa 49:2 for תַּמָּם, hág “an arrow”; also Ex 25:31; 37:17; Nu 8:4 AV for a part of the candlestick of the tabernacle somewhat vaguely designated by the word יֹתֶה, yárēkh, “thigh.” The context in the first 2 verses shows that the upright stem or “shaft” is intended, but in Nu 8:4 a different context has caused RV to substitute “base.” See also Archery; Armor, Arms.

SHAGEE, sha’gē (שַּגֵּה, shagēh); B, Sôla, Sôla, A, Sâği, Sâgê; AV Shage: The father of Jonathan, one of David’s heroes (1 Ch 11:34).

SHAHARAIM, sha-ha’rîm (צַהְרָיִים, shâhâr’ayim); B, Sâleri katâ Shâdôn, Sulejm katâ Thêthûn, Sulejm katâ Thulûs, Sulejm katâ Shôlûs, Saarem; AV Shchem; SSA. A Benjamite name (1 Ch 8:8). The passage is corrupt beyond only the most tentative emendation. “Sharáim” has no connection with the foregoing text. One note of varia, readings: “And Shahraraim dwelt in the field of Moab, after he had driven them [i.e. the Moabites] out, from Hodesh his wife, Jobah,” etc (Curtis, ICC).

SHAHAZUMAH, sha-ha-zo’ma, shah-ha’dô-ma (צַהֲזוּמָה, shâhâzûmâh; B, Sulejm katâ Thâdôn, Sulejm katâ Thalûs, Sulejm katâ Thulûs, Sulejm katâ Shôlûs, Shaarem; AV Shchem; SSA. A Benjamite name (1 Ch 8:8). A town in the territory of Issachar on the boundary which run from Tabor to the Jordan (Josh 19:22). The site, which has not yet been recovered, must be sought, probably, to the S.E. of the mountain.

SHALEM, sha’lem (שַּלֵּם, shâlêm; es Sâlôm, es Salîm): The word as a place-name occurs only in Gen 34:18. With Luther, following LXX, Pesh and Vul, AV reads “And Jacob came to Shalem, a city of Shechem, with the Tgs Orkôlos and the Sôla [Sulém, Sulejm, Sulejm].” This should be emended to: “And Sharahaim dwelt, came in peace to the city of Shchem.” There is a heavy balance of opinion among scholars in favor of the latter reading. It is certainly a remarkable fact, supporting AV, that about 4 miles E. of Shechem (Wâbluos), there is a village bearing the name Sâlôm. If AV is right, this must represent the city referred to; and E. of Sâlôm would transpire the events recorded in Gen 44. Against this is the old tradition locating Jacob’s well and Joseph’s tomb near to Shechem. Onam gets over the difficulty by identifying Shechem with Shalem. W. Ewing

SHALIM, sha’lîm. See SHALIM.

SHALISHAH, sha-lî’asha, sha-lî’e-hâš, LAND OF (נְפָיִשׁ, efer shališâhâh; B, h 24 Sâlek, h 24 Sâlek, h 24 Selîk, A, h 24 Sâlem, h 24 Salîsâh): If the general indication of the route followed by the Soul, given under Sâlem, is correct, the land of Shališah (1 S 8:9) will lie to the N.E. of Lydica on the western slope of the range. Baal-shalishah would most likely be in the district, and may indeed have given its name to it. If Conder is right in identifying this city with Khirbet Kefr Thilith, about 10 miles N.E. of Jaffa, it meets well enough the general indication given above. Onom knows the name, but gives no guidance as to where the district is.

Menahem, then at Tirah, one of the minor capitals of the kingdom, went up to Samaria, slew him and took his place.

It was probably at this time that Syria threw off the yoke of Assyrian to Israel (see Jer 3:12), as when next we meet with that kingdom, it is under its own king and in alliance with Samaria (2 K 15 5).

The 10 years of rule given to Menahem (2 K 15 17) may be taken to include the last stage of his military violence under Zechariah and Shallum, and cover the full years 758-750, with portions of years before and after counted as whole ones. The unsuccessful usurpation of Shallum may therefore be put in 758 BC (some date lower).

W. Shaw Caldecott

SHALLUN, shall'um, shall'ān, not in LXX; another form of Shallum, son of Col-hozeh. He was the ruler of the district of Mizpah. He assisted Nehemiah in building the wall of Jerus and in repairing the gate by the Pool of Siloah at the King's Gardens (Neh 3 13).

SHALMACH, shall'mān, AV form in Ezr 2 46; "Samlam"; Neh 7 45 "Salmai" (q.v.).

SHALMANESER, shall-mān'ē-sēr (םלמנכ, shallmeneser; LXX Σαλμανας, Sammansas, Σαλμάνας, Salmanasor, Salmanazar): The name of several Assyrian kings. See Assyria; Assyrian Captivity.

It is Shalmaneser IV who is mentioned in the Bible under this name (2 K 17 3; 18 9). He succeeded Tiglath-pileser on the throne in 727 BC, but whether he was a son of his predecessor, or a usurper, is not apparent. His reign was short, and, as no annals of it have come to light, we have only the accounts contained in 2 K for his history. In the passages referred to above, we learn that Hoshea, king of Israel, who had become his vassal, refused to continue the payment of tribute, relying upon help from So, king of Egypt. No help, however, came from Egypt, and Hoshea had to face the charging forces of his suzerain with his own unaided resources, the result being that he was taken prisoner outside Samaria and most likely carried away to Nineveh.

The Bible narrative goes on to say that the king of Assyria came up throughout all the land, and went up to Samaria and besieged it 3 years. There is reason to believe that, as the siege of Samaria was proceeding, Shalmaneser retired to Nineveh and died, for, when the city was taken in 722 BC, it is Sargon who claims, in his copious annals, to have captured it and carried its inhabitants into captivity. It is just a contradiction that Shalman (Hos 10 14) is a contraction for Shalmaneser, but the identity of Shalman and of Beth-arbel named in the same passage is not sufficiently made out.

SHAMA, šā'ma (שָׁמָא, šāmā): One of David's heroes (1 Ch 11 44).

SHAMAI, šam'ā-ri. See Salm.

SHAMARIAH, šam-ar'i-a, ša-mār'-ya. See Shemariah.

SHAMBLES, shamb'liz (mackellon, makdellen): A slaughter-house; then a butcher's stall, meat-market. The word is once used in the NT in 1 Cor 10 25.

SHAME, šā'm (שָׁמָה; bōshh, "to be ashamed," בוש, "shame," בוש, "bāsheth; shame," בָּשָׁה; ʿāshān; ašān, ašān, "ignominy," ʿātūm, ṣattūm, "dishonor," and other words): An oft-recurring word in Scripture almost uniformly bound up with a sense of sin and guilt. It is figuratively set forth as a wild beast (Jer 3 24), a Nessus-garment (3 25), a blight (20 18), a sin against one's own soul (Hab 2 10), and twice as the condensed symbol of Heb abomination—Baal (Jer 11 13; Hos 9 10 m; see Isa-Borheith). It is bracketed with defeat (Isa 30 3), reproach (Ps 69 7; Isa 64 4; Mic 2 6), confusion (Isa 6 7), nakedness (Isa 47 3; Mic 1 11), everlasting contempt (Dan 12 2), folly (Prov 18 13), cruelty (Isa 50 6; He 12 2), poverty (Prov 13 18), nothingness (Prov 9 7 AV), unseemliness (1 Cor 11 6; 14 35 AV; Eph 5 12), and "those that go down to the pit" (Ezk 32 25). In the first Bib. reference to this emotion, "shame" appears as "the correlative of sin and guilt" (Delitzsch, New Comm. on Gen and Bib. Psychology). Shamelessness is characteristic of abandoned wickedness (Phil 3 19; Jude ver 13, n "Gr 'shames').

Manifestly, then, shame is a concomitant of the Divine judgment upon sin; the very worst that a Hebrew could wish for an enemy was that he might be carried away before some (Ps 109 29; Mic 2 6): confusion, the judgment of God might rest upon him visibly.

Naturally, to the Hebrew, shame was the portion of those who were idolaters, who were faithless to Jeh or who were unfriendly to themselves—the elect people of Jeh. Shame is to come upon Moab because Moab held Israel in derision (Jer 48 39 27), and upon Edom "for violence against his brother Jacob" (Ob ver 10). But also, and impartially, shame is the portion of faithless Israelites who deny Jeh and follow after strange gods (Ezk 7 18; Mic 7 10; Hos 10 6, and often). But shame, too, comes upon those who exult themselves against God, who trust in earthly power and the show of material strength (2 Ch 31 21; Isa 30 3); and upon those who make a mock of righteousness (Jeb 8 22; Ps 56 26; 132 18). With a fine sense of ethical distinctions the Bib. writers recognize that in confessing to a sense of shame there is hope for better things. Only in the most desperate cases is there no shame (Isa of 15; Zeph 3 5; Phil 3 19; Jude ver 13); in pardon God is said to remove shame (Isa 64 4 bis; 61 7).

On conditions beyond the grave the Bib. revelation is exceedingly reticent, but here and there are hints that shame waits upon the wicked here and hereafter. Such an expression as that in Dn 12 2 cannot be ignored, and though the writing itself may belong to a late period and a somewhat sophisticated theological development, the idea is but a reflection of the earlier and more elementary period, when the voice of crime and cruelty went up from earth to be heard in the audience chamber of God (Gen 4 11; 6 13). In the NT there is similar reticence but also similar implications. It cannot be much amiss to say that in the mind of the Bib. writers sin was a shameful thing; that part of the punishment for sin was a consciousness of guilt in the sense of shame; and that from this consciousness of guilt there was no deliverance while the sin was unconfessed and unforgiven. "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting contempt.

From one's own past there is no deliverance, save through contrition of spirit and the grace and forgiveness of God. While the sense of shame persists, or, in other words, while the moral constitution of man's nature remains as it is, there will never be wanting an avenger of sin.

SHAMED, šā'med. See Shem.

SHAMEFACEDNESS, šām-fas'-nes, šām-f'as'-ned. See Shamefacedness.

SHAMEFACEDNESS, šām-fas'-nes: The original AV tr of ἀἰδής, aībā, in Sir 41 16 and 1 Tim 2 9. Perhaps half a century later the term, "shamefacedness" supplant the better form, and continues in the ordinary editions of the King James Version. RV, however, rightly restores "shamefacedness."

SHAMER, šā'mer. See Shem.

SHAMGAR, sham'gār (סָמָגָר, shagār): One of the judges, son of Anath (Anathah), in whose days, which preceded the time of Deborah and Barak (Jgs 5 7), there was no deliverance in Israel, from the oppression of the Moabites and Ammonites, and which was the last of the most celebrated of the "judges" of Israel (Jgs 3 31). According to a tradition represented in Jos (Ant. V. iv. 8), Shaggar died in the year he became judge.

Several writers have challenged the Bib. account on the following grounds: that in Jgs 6 no mention is made of any deliverance; that the 2. Critical name "Shaggar" resembles the name Hypotheses of a Hittite king and the name "Anath" that of a Syrian goddess; that the deed recorded in Jgs 3 31 is analogous to that of Samson (Jgs 15 15), and that of Shamshon, son of Age (2 8 23 11 f); and lastly, that in a group of Gr MSS and other VSS this verse is inserted after the account of Samson's exploits. None of these is necessarily inconsistent with the traditional account. Nevertheless, they have been used as a basis not only for overthrowing the tradition, but also for constructive theories such as that which makes Shaggar a foreign oppressor and not a judge, and so the father of the anathah. There is, of course, no limit to which this kind of interesting speculation cannot lead.

(For a complete account of these views see Moore, 'Jgs,' in ICC, 1805, 104 f, and same author..."
in Journal of the American Oriental Society, XIX, 2, 159-60.)

SHAMHUTH, sham'uth. See SHAMMUAH, IV.

SHAMIR, šāmîr (םָמִיר, šāmîr; Σαμείρ, Sameir): (1) Mentioned along with Jattir and Socoh (Josh 16 48) as one of the cities of Judah in the hill country. Possibly it is Kh. (or Umm) Sômerah, 2,000 ft. above sea-level, a site with ancient walls, caves, cisterns, and tombs not far W. of Debir (Edh Dhatberghi) and 2 miles N. of Anab (Anah) (PEF, III, 262, 286, Sh XIX). (2) A place in the hill country of Ephraim (Jgs 10 1) from which came "Tola, the son of Pual, a man of Issachar," who judged Israel 23 years; he died and was buried by Jesse and brother of David. Together with his two other brothers he fought under Saul in the campaign against the Philistines and was with the army in the valley of Elah when David slew Goliath (1 Sam 17 12). One reductor states that his name is rendered by David by the name of Shamueli (1 Sam 16 13). He was the father of Jonadab, the friend of Amnon (2 Sam 13 3), and that Jonathan whose victory over the Philistines is narrated in 2 Sam 21 20 was also his son. His name is rendered "Shamir" (1 Sam 16 9; 17 13), "Shimshah" (2 Sam 13 32), "Shemei" (2 Sam 21 21), and "Shime" (1 Ch 2 13; 20 7). (3) The son of Agee, a Hararite, one of the "three mighty men" of David (2 Sam 23 11), LXX Σαμαίον, Samadai, who held the field against the Philistines. The passage (1 Ch 11 10) ascribes this deed to Eleazar, the son of Dodo. The succeeding incident (2 Sam 23 13), viz., the famous act of three of David's heroes who risked their lives to bring their leader water from the well of Bethlehem, has frequently been credited to Shamshah and two other members of the "three brothers"; but the three warriors are plainly said (ver 13) to belong to "the thirty"; ver 33 should read "Jonathan, son of Shamshah, the Hararite." Jonathan, one of David's "thirty," was a son of Shamshah; the word "son" has been accidentally omitted (Driver, Buide, Kittel, etc.). The passage (1 Ch 11 34) has "son of Shacheh," which is probably a misreading for "son of Agee." Lucian's version, "son of Shamshah," is most plausible. "Shimei the son of Elea" (1 K 4 18) should also appear in this passage if Lucian's reading of "Ela" for "Agee" (2 Sam 23 11) be correct. (4) A Harodite (2 Sam 25 33), i.e., probably a native of 'Ain-barod ('Ain Jalid, Jgs 7 1; see Harod). One of the "thirty" and captain of Solomon's 5th month course. In the lists (1 Ch 11 27) he is called "the Harorite" (this last being a scribal error for Harodite) and "Shamhuth the Izrahite" (1 Ch 27 8).

SHAMMAI, sham'mā, sham 'mā (םָמָא, šamma':) (1) A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2 28 32). (2) The son of Dekem and father of Maon (1 Ch 2 44 ft). (3) A Judahite (1 Ch 4 17).

SHAMMOTH, sham'oth, sham 'oth. See SHAM- man, (4).

SHAMMUAWA, SHAMMUAH, sha-mu'a, sham'a-a (םָמָעָה, šammu'ah): (1) The Reubenite spy (Nu 13 4, Σαμουα, Samouah, and other forms). (2) One of David's sons (2 S 5 14; 1 Ch 14 4, Σαμουα, Samoah). In 1 Ch 3 5 he is called "Shimea."] (3) A Levite (Neh 11 17); he is called "Shemaijah" in 1 Ch 9 16. (4) The head of a priestly family (Neh 12 18); a contemporary of Joiakim.

SHAMSHERA, sham'shē-ri, sham-shē-ri (םָמָשֵּׁר, shamshēry): A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 26).

SHAPA, sháp, shāp (שָׂפָה, šāpah): In AV the tr of elōs, elōs, "form," "appearance" (Lk 3 22; In 5 37), and of ḫāṣoq, homolōma, "likeness," "semblance" (Rev 9 7). The meaning of these words is not so much "tangible shape," in which sense we use the word in modern Eng., but rather "aspect," "appearance," the looks of a person or a thing. This is especially the case where the word is joined with the adj. shawāra, shōmēs, "bodily," as in the passage Lk 3 22, "The Holy Spirit descended in a bodily form [i.e. "in a corporeal appearance," AV "in a bodily shape"], as a dove, upon him." The second passage also refers to the "appearance" of God, and cannot therefore be regarded as material shape: "Ye have neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his form" (AV "shape") (Jn 5 37). As has been seen from the above quotations, RV, which retains the tr "shape" for homolōma, has tr elōs with "form" which also serves to render several other Gr synonyms, such as μορφή, morφhē (Mk 16 12; Phil 2 6), μορφωσις, morφhōsis (Rom 2 20; 2 Tim 3 5), τάφος, táphas (RvM "pattern," RvM "form," Rom 6 17), and ἵππος, ἵππωσις (RvM "pattern," 2 Tim 1 13). In AV Wisd 18 1 "shape" translates morφhē, RV "form.

SHAPHAM, šāfām (שָׁפָם, šāfām; Σαφαμ, Sapham, Σαφά, Σαβά): Name of a Gadite chief, who had the second place in command of his tribe (1 Ch 5 12). So far as the fragmentary genealogies are intelligible, they seem to indicate that Shapham and his chief, Joel, lived in the time of Saul and shared in the war against the Hagarites (1 Ch 5 7-10 18 22), but it is to be noted that these lists were first recorded between the years 750 and 740 BC, just before the eastern tribes were carried into captivity.

SHAPHAN, šāfān (שָׁפָן, šāfān, "rock-badger," EV "coney"; Σαφάν, Saphān): An old totem clan name (so W. R. Smith; cf, however, art. Totemism: Gray, HPN. 103 fi, and Jacob's Studies in Bib. Archaeology, 54 ff). (1) Son of Azaliah and scribe of King Josiah. He received from Hilkiah the Book of the Law which had been found in the Temple (2 K 22 3 ff; 2 Ch 34 8–28). It was from Shaphan’s lips that Josiah heard the Law read. Shaphan was also one of those sent by the king to the prophetess Huldah (2 K 22; 2 Ch 34). He was undoubtedly one of the staunchest supporters of Josiah in his work of reform. He was the father of Ahikam (2 K 22 12; 2 Ch 24 30; Jer 26 54), who befriended and protected the prophet Jeremiah. Another son, Elasah, was one of the two men instigated by Jeremiah with his letter to the captives in Babylon (Jer 29 2). A third son, Gemariah, vizi (of Judah) and prophetic adviser to King Jehoiakim from burning “the roll” (Jer 36 10.11.12. 25). The Micaiah of Jer 36 11.12, and Gedaliah, the governor of Judaea after the captivity of 586 BC, were his grandsons (Jer 39 14).

(2) Perhaps the father of Jaaazaniah, one of the 70 men whom Ezekiel saw in his vision of the Temple, sacrificing to idols (Ezk 8 11).

HORACE J. WOLF

SHAPHAT, shāfət ([שָׁפָט], šaphēt):
(1) The Simeonite spy (Nu 13 5, Ṣaphər, Saphat).
(2) The father of the prophet Elisha (1 K 19 16; 2 K 4 1, LXX Saphath).
(3) A name in the royal genealogy of Judah (1 Ch 3 22).
(4) A Gadite (1 Ch 5 12).
(5) One of David’s herdsman (1 Ch 27 29).

SHAPFER, shāfər. See SHEEPER.

SHAPHIR, shāfər ([שָׁפִּיר], šaphir), “glittering”; ḵaləsōš, kalōš; AV Saphir): One of a group of towns mentioned in Mic 1 10–15. From the association with Gath, Aschur (of Judah) and Mareshah, it would seem that the places mentioned were in Southwestern Pal. According to Onom, there was a Ṣafēph, Saphir, “in the hill country” (from a confusion with Shamir [Josh 15 48], where LXX A ḫaš Saphir) between E琉theropolis and Aṣcalon. The name probably survives in that of three villages called es-Saiṭār, in the plain, some 34 miles S.E. of Ashdod (PEF, 11, 413, 5b XV). Cheyne (EB, col. 432) suggests the white “glittering” hill Tell es-Saïṭār, at the entrance to the Wādy es-Sant, which is known to the Crusaders as Blanchegarde, but this site seems a more probable one for Gath (q.v.).

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

SHARAI, shārə’ā, šā’rī ([שָׁרִי], šāroy): One of the sons of Bani who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 40).

SHARAIM, ša-rə’ām. See SHARAIM.

SHARAR, ša-rə’ār. See SACAR.

SHARE, šār. See FLOW.

SHAREZER, ša-rə’ēzər ([שָׁרֵזֶר], sar’er, ‘ẓ; ša-rēzər): Connected to the Assyrian Shar-usur, “protect the king”; found otherwise, not as a complete name, but as elements in personal names, e.g. Bel-shar-usur, “may Bel protect the king,” which is the equivalent of Belshazzar (Dan 5 1). The name is borne by two persons in the OT:
(1) The son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, who was active in Judah in the days of Ahaz (2 K 18 37; Isa 37 38). The Bab Chronicle says concerning Sennacherib’s death: “On the 20th day of Tibet Sennacherib, king of Assyria, was slain by his son in a revolt.” This differs from the OT account in that it speaks of only one murderer, and does not give his name. How the two accounts can be harmonized is still uncertain. Hitzig, (Kritik, 1914), following Ahlström, as quoted by Eusebius, completed the name of Sennacherib’s son, so as to read Nergal-shar-ezer = Nergal-shar-usur (Jer 30 3.13), and this is accepted by many modern scholars. Johns thinks that Sharezer (šar-e’er or sar-e’er) may be a corruption from Shar-etir Ashur, the name of a son of Sennacherib (1-vol HDB, s.v.). The question cannot be definitely settled.

(2) A contemporary of the prophet Zechariah, mentioned in connection with the sending of a delegation to the spiritual heads of the community to inquire concerning the propriety of continuing the “sacred harlotry” of Sennacherib (Zez 7 2). This creates a difficulty in connection with the succeeding words, lit. “and his men.” The Revisers place in the margin as an alternative rendering, “They of Beth-el, even Sharezer, . . . had sent.” Sharezer sounds peculiar in apposition to “they of Beth-el”; hence some have thought, esp. since Sharezer seems incomplete, that in the two words Beth-el and Sharezer we have a corruption of what was originally a single proper name, perhaps Bel-sharezer = Bel-shar-usur = Bel-shazzar. The present text, no matter how it is presented, presents difficulties. See REGEM-MELECH.

SHARON, šārə’n ([שָׁרוֹן], ha-sharon, with the det. art. possibly meaning “the plain”; ℓο ῥόμος, to pedion, S. and L. ὁ δρόμος, ho drumos, ho Sarōn):
(1) This name is attached to the strip of fairly level land which runs between the mountains and the shore of the Mediterranean, stretching from Nahr Robin in the S. to Mt. Carmel in the N. There are considerable rolling hills; but, compared with the mountains to the E., it is quite properly described as a plain. The soil is a deep rich loam, which is favorable to the growth of cereals. The orange, the vine and the olive grow to great perfection. Withal the many-colored flowers are in bloom it is a scene of rare beauty.

Of the streams in the plain four carry the bulk of the water from the western slopes of the mountains to the sea. They are also perennial, being fed by fountains. Nah el-Mɛfîr enters the sea to the N. of Jaffa; Nahar el-Iranceh makes its way to Caesarea; and Nahar ez-Zerâb (“Crocodile River”), 1/2 miles N. of Caesarea. Naher el-Fâlik runs its short course about 12 miles N. of Nahar el-Mefîr, and at almost any point it may be obtained by digging. Deep, finely built wells near some of the villages are among the most precious legacies left by the Crusaders. The breadth of the plain varies from 8 to 12 miles, being broadest in the S. There are traces of a great forest in the northern part, which accounts for the use of the term drusom. Jos (Art, XIV, xiii, 3) speaks of “the woods” (hōi drōmol) and Strabo (xvi) of “a great wood.” There is still a considerable oak wood in this district. The “excellency” of Carmel and Sharon (Isa 35 2) is probably an allusion to the luxuriant oak forests.

As in ancient times, great breadths are given up to the pasturing of cattle. Over David’s herds that fed in Sharon was Shimi (the Sharonite (1 Ch 27 29).

In the day of Israel’s exaltation, “within the land shall be a fold of flocks” (Isa 66 10). Jerome speaks of the fine cattle fed in the pastures of Sharon, and also sings the praises of its wine (Comm. on Isa 33 and 65). Toward the S. no doubt there was more cultivation than there is at present. On the day.

The Ger. colonists to the N. of Jaffa, preserving in its name, Sarōn, the old Gr. name of the plain, and several Jewish colonies are proving the wonderful productiveness of the soil. The orange groves of Jaffa are famous far and wide.
Sharon is mentioned in the NT only in Acts 9:35.
(2) A district E. of the Jordan, occupied by the tribe of Gad (1 Ch 5:16; here the name is without the art.). Kittel ("Ch.," SBOT) suggests that this is a corruption from "Sirion," which again is synonymous with Hermon. He would therefore identify Sharon with the pasture lands of Hermon. Others think that the mtsəh or table-land of Gilead is intended.

(3) In Josh 12:18 we should perhaps read "the king of Aphek in Sharon." See Lasharon. The order seems to point to some place N.E. of Tabor. Perhaps this is to be identified with the Sarona of Onom in the district between Tabor and Tiberias. If so, the name may be preserved in that of Sarona on the plateau to the S.W. of Tiberias.

Canaanitish descent. The patronymic Shaulites is found in Nu 26:13.
(3) An ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6:24 [Heb 9]); in ver 36 he is called "Joel."

SHAVEH, shā've, VALE OF (אש מים, amph); "emek shaveh). See King's Vale.

SHAVEH-KIRIAITHAIM, shā've-keir-ya-thā'īm (אש מים, shaveh kiryathaim; אש מים לוד, en Soud tê polei): Here Chedorlaomer is said to have defeated the Enim (Gen 14:5). RV reads "the plain of Kiriaithaim." If this rendering is right, we must look for the place in the neighborhood of Kiriaithaim of Moab (Jer 48:1, etc), which is probably represented today by el-Kareyūt, about 7 miles to the N. of Dibon.

SHARONITE, shār'ōn-īt, "ha-shāren; אֱֶ֑ם שֶׁרֶן, ho Sarovenitā): Applied in Scripture only to Shitrai (1 Ch 27:29). See SHARON.

SHARUHEN, sha-ro'hen (אֵשׁ מים, shārench; Οψαλ, ὁ ἀγρός αὐτοῦ): One of the cities in the territory of Judah assigned to Simeon (Josh 19:6). In 13:32 it is called "Shilhim," and in 1 Ch 4:31, "Shaaraim" (q.v.).

SHASHAI, šā'shāi (אש שָׁשָּה, šāshay; סֵס, Sees): One of the sons of Bani who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10:40) = "Sesai" in 1 Esd 9:34.

SHASHEL, šā'shāk (אֵשׁ שָׁשָּה, šāshak): Eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8:14:25).

SHAUL, šā'ul, SHAULITES, ša'ǔl-ītēs (אשׁ בּוּל, sha'ül; סאואל, Seaul):
(1) A king of Edom (Gen 36:37 ff = 1 Ch 1:48 ff).
(2) A son of Simeon (Gen 46:10; Ex 6:15; Nu 26:13; 1 Ch 24:24). The clan was of notoriety in stock, and, therefore, Saul is called "the son of a Canaanitish woman" (Gen 46:10; Ex 6:15); the clan was of mixed Israelitish and SHAVING, shaving (in Job 1:20, אֵשׁ, gāzaz, usually אֵשׁ, gālāh; in Acts 21:24, ἀπόθεμνατο, xurdo): Customs as to shaving differ in different countries, and in ancient and modern times. Among the Egyptians it was customary to shave the whole body (cf Gen 41:14). With the Israelites, shaving the head was a sign of mourning (Dt 21:12; Job 1:20); ordinarily the hair was allowed to grow long, and was only cut at intervals (cf Absalom, 2 S 14:26). Nazarites were forbidden to use a razor, but when their vow was expired, or if they were defiled, they were to shave the whole head (Nu 6:5.9.18 ff; cf Acts 21:24). The shaving of the beard was not permitted to the Israelites; they were prohibited from shaving off even "the corner of their beard" (Lev 21:5). It was an unpardonable insult when Hanaun, king of the Ammonites, cut off the half of the beards of the Israelites whom David had sent to him (2 S 10:4; 1 Ch 19:4).

Shaving "with a razor that is hired" is Issiah's graphic figure to denote the complete devastation of Judah by the Assyrian army (Isa 7:20).

SHAVSHA, shav'sha (אֶשׁ וְ, shavesh'; in 2 S 20:25, קְתִיב, נָשׁ, shay'd; קְתִיב, נָשׁ, sh'va', EV "Sheva," are refuted by LXX; in 2 S 8:15-18, in other respects identical with Ch, "Seraiah" is found in LX. Determinies greatly in all passages; it is the general consensus that Shavesha is correct: State secretary or scribe during the reign of David (1 Ch 18:16; 2 S 20:25). He was the first occupant of this office, which was created by David. It is significant that his father's name is omitted in the very exact list of David's officers of state (1 Ch 27:15-16). This fact, coupled with the foreign sound of his name, points to his being an 'alien': the assumption that the state secretary handled correspondence with other countries may explain David's choice of a foreigner for this post. Shavesha's two sons, Eliehoth and Aiah, were secretaries of state under Solomon; they are called "sons of Shisha" (1 K 4:3), "Shisha" probably being a variant of "Shavesha."

SHEAF, shôf. SHEAVES, shâv (םשָׁב, †דמָמָה, יָמִר, אַמֶּר, יָמִר, יָמִּיר): When the grain is reaped, it is laid in handwheels back of the reaper to be gathered by children or those who cannot stand the harder work of reaping (Ps 129:7). The handwheels are bound into large sheaves, two of which are laden at a time on the shoulder of the reaper (cf Neh 5:19). In some districts carts are used (cf Am 2:13). The sheaves are piled about the threshing-floors until threshing time, which may be several weeks after harvest. It is an impressive sight to see the huge stacks of sheaves piled about the threshing-floors, the piles often covering an area greater than the nearby villages (see Agriculture). The ancient Egyptians bound their grain into small sheaves, forming the bundles with care so that the heads were equally distributed between the two ends (see Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, 1878, II, 22; cf Joseph's dream, Gen 37:5-8). The sheaves mentioned in Lev 32:10-12,15 must have been handwheels. It is a custom in parts of Syria for the gatherers of the sheaves to run toward a passing horseman and wave a handful of grain, shouting kemehti, kemeht (lit. "handful"). They want the horseman to feed the grain to his horse. In OT times forgotten sheaves had to be left for the sojourner (Dt 24:19); cf the kindness shown to Ruth by the reapers of Boaz (Ruth 2:7,10).

Figurative: "Being hungry they carry the sheaves" is a picture of torment similar to that of the hungry horse urged to go by the bundle of hay tied before him (Job 24:10). The joyful sight of the sheaves of an abundant harvest was used by the Psalmist to typify the joy of the returning captives (Ps 126:6).

JAMES A. PATCH

SHEAL, shē' al (םשֵׁל, shē' al, "request"): One of the Israelites of the sons of Bani who had taken foreign wives (Ezr 10:29, LXX, Saldou, LXX Luc, Asshid; 1 Esd 1:90, "Jahudus").

SHEALTIEL, shē-ôlt'î-uhl (םשָׁלִתֶל, shēôlt'î-uhl), but in Hag 1:12,14; 2:2, letsh'î-uhl; LXX and the NT always Zechariah, Salathiel, hence "Sala-thiel" of 1 Esd 5:48,56; 6:2; AV of Mt 1:12; Lk 3:27: Father of Zerubbabel (Ex 3:2:8; 5:2; Mt 1:12,14; 2:1; Lk 3:27; and Mt 2:2). But, according to 1 Ch 3:17, Shealtiel was the oldest son of King Jeconiah; in ver 19 the NT makes Pedaiah, a brother of Shealtiel, the father of Zerubbabel (cf Curtis, ICC).

SHEAR, shâr. See Sheep; Sheep Tending.

SHEAH, shē-a'-ri'a, shē-är'ya (שֵׁיָרִיָּה, shē'aryâ): A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8:38; 9:44).

SHEARING, shêr'ing, HOUSE (מִשְׂרָאֵל, mish'râ'âl, bêt mish'râ'âl, "house of binding of the shepherds"); B, Bashârah [A, Bashârah] בָּשַׁרָה (Bashârah) followed by "a man" (Gen 30:42). Here in the course of his extinction of the house of Ahab, Jehu met and destroyed 42 men, "the brethren of Aha-ziah king of Judah" (2 K 10:12-14). Onom takes the phrase as a proper name, Bethacath, and locates the village a few miles from Legion in the plain. This seems to point to identification with Beil Kâd, about 3 miles E. of Jenin.

SHEAR-JASHUB, shē-är-jash'ub or jash'ub (םשֶׁר יָשֹׁב, shē' yer yash'ob, "a remnant shall return"); LXX ho katarakephtheis Jassoub: The son of Isaiah, who accompanied him when he set out to meet Ahaz (Isa 7:3). The name like that of other children of prophets (cf "Immanuel," "Mahe-sha'al-hash-baz," "Lo-ruhamah," etc) is symbolic of a prophecy or message which the prophet wishes to emphasize. Thus Isaiah uses the very words shē' yer yash'ob to express his oft-repeated statement that a remnant of Israel will return to Jeh (Isa 10:21).

SHEATH, shēth. See Sword.

SHEBA, shē'ba (ספר, shē'bah); Zebâ, Saba: (1) Sheba and Dedan are the two sons of Raamah son of Cush (Gen 10:7). (2) Sheba and Dedan are the two sons of Jokshan the son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen 25:3). (3) Sheba the son of Eber who was a descendant of Shem (10:28).

From the above statements it would appear that Sheba was the name of an Arab tribe, and consequently of Sem descent. The fact that Sheba and Dedan are represented as Cushite (Gen 10:7) would point to a migration of part of these tribes to Ethiopia, and similarly their derivation from Abraham (25:3) would indicate that some families were located in Syria. In point of fact Sheba was a South-Arabian or Joktanite tribe (Gen 10:26), and his own name and that of some of his brothers (e.g. Hazarravem = Hadhramaut) are place-names in Southern Arabia.

The Sabaeans or people of Saba or Sheba, are referred to as traders in gold and spices, and as inhabiting a country remote from Pal (1 K 10:1; Isa 60:6; Jer 6:20; Ezek 27:22; Ps 72:15; Mt 12:42), also as slave-traders (Joel 3:8), or even desert-rovers (Job 1:15; 6:19; cf CTS 84:3).

By the Arab genealogists Saba is represented as great-grandson of Kajlah (=Joktan) and ancestor of all the South-Arabian tribes. He is the father of Himyar and Kahlah. He is said to have been named Saba because he was the first to take prisoners (shâbah) in war. He founded the capital of Saba and built its citadel Marib (Mariba), famous for its mighty barrage.

The authentic history of the Sabaeans, so far as known, and the topography of their country are derived from South-Arabian inscriptions.

1. History begins, which began to be discovered about the middle of the last century, and from coins dating from about 150 BC to 150 AD, the first collection of which was published in 1850, and from the South-Arabian geographer Marzandân, who was later made known to European scholars. One of the Sabaeans kings is known in Assyrian inscriptions of the year 715 BC; and he is apparently not the earliest. The native monuments are scattered over the period extending from before that time until the 6th cent. AD, when the Sabaeans.

2. Religion (Bib. 'isra')—Rimmon, the Sun, and others. The Sun and Athtar were further defined by the addition of the name of a place or tribe, just as Baal in the OT. Worship took the form of gifts to the temples, of sacrifices, and incense, of pilgrimages and prayers. Ceremonial ablution, and abstinence from certain things, as well as formal dedication of the worshipper and his household and goods to the deity, were also religious acts. In return the deity took care of his people's castle, storehouses, and belongings, and supplied him with cereals, vegetables and fruits, as well as granted him male issue.

(1) The chief occupations of the Sabaeans were riding and trade. The chief products of their country are enumerated in Isaiah 60:6, which agrees with the Assyrian inscriptions. The most important of all commodities was incense, and it is significant that the same word which in the other Sem languages means "gold," in Sabean means "perfume" (and also "gold"). To judge, however, from the number of times they are mentioned upon the inscriptions, agriculture bulked much more largely in the thoughts of the Sabaeans than commerce, and was of equal importance with religion.

(2) The high position occupied by women among the Sabaeans is reflected in the story of the Queen of Sheba and Solomon. In almost all respects women appear to have been considered the equal of men, and to have discharged the same and other religious and even military functions. Polygamy does not seem to have been practised. The Sabean inscriptions do not go back far enough to throw any light upon the queen who was contemporary with Solomon, and the Arab tradition that she was the mother of Ishmael is merely due to the latter being the only Sabaean queen known to them. Bilkis must have lived several centuries later than the Heb monarch.

(3) The alphabet used in the Sabean inscriptions is considered by some scholars to be the original Sem alphabet, from which the others are derived. In other respects Sabean art seems to be dependent on that of Assyria, Persia and Greece. The coins are Gr and Rom in style, while the system of weights employed is Persian. See further Sabaeans.

3. Civilization

Sheba, shebal, sheba (ם) Sheba; Dábas, Dáber, or Dáma, Dáma); The name of one of the towns allotted to Simeon (Josh 19:2). AV mentions it as an independent town, but as it is not mentioned at all in the parallel list (1 Chr 4:28), and is omitted in Josh 19:2 in some MSS, it is probable that RV is correct in its tr "Iteer-sheba or Sheba." Only in this way can the total of towns in this group be made 13 (Josh 19:6). If it is a separate name, it is probably the same as Shema (v. q.).

Sheba, queen of. See Queen of Sheba.

Shebah, sheba. See Shehba.

Shebham, shebham. See Shebam.

Shebaniyah, sheb-an-m‘a, she-ban‘ya (ם) Shebanyah, in 1 Ch 15:24, shebanyahā; (1) Name of a Levite or a Levitical family that participated in the religious rites that followed the reading of the Law (Neh 9:4). The name is given in Neh 10:10 among those that sealed the covenant.

(2) A priest or Levite who took part in the sealing of the covenant (Neh 10:4; 12:14). See Shecaniah.

(3) Another Levi who sealed the covenant (Neh 10:12).

(4) A priest in the time of David (1 Ch 15:24).

Shebarim, sheb‘arim, she‘barim (ם), shebarim, ka-sh‘barim; c‘tir‘bu, c‘tir‘pu; After the repulse of the first attack on their city the men of Ai chased the Israelites "even unto Shebarim" (Josh 7:5). RV reads "the quarries"; so Keil, Steuerwald, etc. LXX reads "until they were broken," and still the sense is complete. The direction of the flight was of course from Ai toward Gilgal in the Jordan valley. No trace of such a name has yet been found.

Shebat, she-bat (ם, sh‘bat); The 11th month of the Jewish year (See 1:7), corresponding to February. See Calendar.

Sheber, sheb‘er (ם, sh‘ber); Sheber, B. Zabib, Zabib, A. Zabib, Sibeb; A son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah (1 Ch 2:48).

Shebna, sheb‘na (ם, sh‘bna); Zebinos, Sames; but sh‘bna, Shebna, in 2 K 18:13,26; meaning uncertain [2 K 18 18:26,37 and 19 2 = Isa 36 3.11.22 and 37 2; Isa 22 15]:

In Isa 22 15 Shebna is referred to as "he who is over the house," or household, apparently that of the king. The phrase is tri "steward of the house"; in RV of Gen 43:16,19; 44; in Isa 22 and occurs also in 39 4, "overseer"; 44 4. It is used of an officer of the Northern Kingdom in 1 K 16 9; 22 2; 24 5; 1 K 10 5. This officer is distinguished from him "that was over the city" in 2 K 10 5, and it is said in 2 K 15 5 that after his father Azariah was stricken with leprosy, "Jotham, the king's son, was over the household, judging all the people of the land." Again Isa 22 15 speaks of "this shebna," a phrase that must apply to Shebna if the prophecy refers to him. This word is the participle of a vb. meaning "to be of use or service," so to 'benefit in Job 16 3; 22 2; 34 9. The fem. participle is employed of Ahishag in 1 K 1 24, where AV translates "cherisher"; DBD renders it "servitor" or "steward" in Isa 22 15. It occurs also as a Can. gloss in the Am Talm (Wickemer no. 2379). The shebna was a high officer: Shebna had splendid chariots (v. 48), but what the name exactly was is not certain. The other reference to Shebna in the title of the prophecy would lead one to conclude that it denoted him "who was over the household," i.e. governor of the palace, probably, or major-domo. The word sōkēn is thus a general title; others deny this, maintaining that it would then occur more frequently.

In 2 K 18 f = Isa 36 f we find too a Shebna mentioned among the officers of Hezekiah. There he is called the ἱπήρη, “scribe” or “secretary,” the position of state of some kind, whereas Eliakim is he “who is over the household.” Is then the Shebna of Isa 22 the same as this officer? It is of course possible that two men of the same name should hold high office about the same time. We find Shebna (Heb. Shubhal) mentioned (a) under Hezekiah (2 K 18 18) and a Joash (ben Joahzz) having the very same position under Josia a century later (2 Ch 34 8). But such a coincidence is rare. Had there been two high officers of state bearing this name, it is most probable that they would somehow have been distinguished one from the other. Shebna’s name is thought to be Aram., thus pointing to a foreign descent, but G. B. Gray, “Isa.,” ICC, 373 f., denies this. We can perhaps safely infer that he was a native from the fact that he was hewing himself a sepulchre in Jerus., apparently among those of the Heb nobility, whereas a native would have an ancestral burial-place in the land.

However, in 2 K 21, Shebna is the scribe and not the governor of the palace. How is this to be explained? The answer is in Isaiah’s prophecy.

The prophecy of Isa 22 divides itself into 3 sections. The words “against [not as RV “unto”] the man who is over the house,” or over the palace, are properly the title of the 15 ff. prophecy, and should come therefore at the very beginning of ver 15.

(1) Vs 15–18 form one whole. In ver 16 the words “hewing him out a sepulchre, etc. should be placed immediately before the rest of the verse as ver 16a with the rest of the section is in the second person. We thus read (vs 15–17): “Against Shebna who was over the house. Thus saith the Lord, Jeh of hosts, Go unto this steward [RVM] that is hewing him out a sepulchre on high, graving a habitation for himself in the rock, [and say] What dost thou here and whom hast thou here that thou hast hewed thee out here a sepulchre? Be hold, Jeh of hosts.” Box (Isa) would further transpose some parts of vs 17 f. Shebna is to be tossed like a ball into “a land wide of sides,” i.e. a broad extensive land. He is addressed as a disgrace to the house of his royal master. The prophet’s language is that of personal invective and one asks what had made him so indignant. Some (e.g. Dillmann, Delitzsch) suggest that Shebna was the leader of a pro-Egypt party, while others (e.g. Cheyne) believe that the party was pro-Assyr (c. 650–640). The actual date of the prophecy can only be inferred.

(2) Isa 22 19–23 contains a prophecy, which states that Eliakim is to be given someone’s post, apparently that of Shebna, if this section be by Isaiah; ver 23, however, is held by many to be a gloss. These verses are not so vehement in tone as the previous ones. Some maintain that the section is not by Isaiah (Duhm, Marti). It can, however, be Isaiahic, only later in date than vs 15 ff., being possibly meant to modify the former utterance. The palace governor is to lose his office and to be succeeded by Eliakim, who is seen to hold that post in 2 K 18 f (see Eliakim).

(3) Vs 24 f are additions to the two utterances by a later hand; they predict the ruin of some such office to his own family.

There is nothing a priori against believing that these three sections are entirely independent one of another, but there seems to be some connection between (1) and (2), and again between (2) and (3). No one question the necessity of being added.

4. Date is that of the relation of Isa 22 15 ff. of the Prophecy given the events of 701 BC. We have the following facts: (a) Shebna is scribe in 701, and Eliakim is governor of the palace in Isa 22 15, and is to be deposed; (b) if Isa 22 18–22 be by Isaiah, Eliakim was to succeed Shebna in that post. Omitting for the moment everything but (a) and (b), the only solution that is to any extent satisfactory is that vs 15–18 is to be dated prior to 701 BC. This is the view preferred by G. B. Gray, op. cit. And this is the most satisfactory theory if we take (2) above into consideration. The prophecy then contained in (1) had not been as yet fulfilled in 701, but (3) had come to pass; Shebna was no longer governor of the palace, but held the position of scribe. Exile might still be in store for him.

Another explanation is put forward by K. Fullerton in 2 Ch 36 17, 19; (see 2 K 21 16) and in X, 675–86 (1900). Fullerton rejects vs 24 f as not due to Isaiah, and maintains that Isa 22 15–18 was spoken by the prophet early in his career, i.e. later than 2 K 18 f. “not so much as a prophecy, a simple pronouncement as an attempt to forsake the office.” ... It must be admitted that Isaiah probably did not succeed. The reactionary party seems to have remained in control during the reign of Manasseh. Fortunately, the moral significance of Isaiah does not depend on the fulfillment of this or of that specific prophecy. We are dealing not with a walking oracle, but with a great character and a noble life” (p. 659). He then infers from vs 23 onwards “that a conspiracy had been formed against him by the prophetic party which proposed to place Eliakim on the throne” (p. 660). Isaiah he thinks would not “resort to such violent measures,” and so the character of Isaiah makes it questionable whether he was the author of vs 20–23. This part would then be due to the prophetic party who went a step farther than their great leader would approve.” This view assumes too much. (a) that the terms that in vs 20–23 refer to kingy power; (b) that Eliakim was of Davidic descent, unless we have a man of non-Davidic origin aiming at the throne, which is again a thing unheard of in Isaiah; and (c) that there was such a plot in the reign of Manasseh, of which we have no proof.

DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

SHEBUEL, she-bu’el, sheb-’el, shēb’a-el, shēb’-a-el, Shēb’un, Shēbūn, Shōba‘el, Shōb vehículo; (LXX), Suaubal.

(1) A son of Gershom and grandson of Moses (1 Ch 23 10). He was “ruler over the treasures” (26 24). In 24 20 he is called “Shubahel,” which is probably the original form of the name (see Gray, HPN, 310).

(2) A son of Heman (1 Ch 25 4), called in ver 20 “Shubahel” (LXX as in ver 4).

SHECANIAH, SHECHANIAD, shek-ah-ni’a, shek-ah-nya, shek-an’ya, shek-ah-ni’a, shek’-ah-na, shek’-ah-na, ish-ah-ni’a. Ish-i-ah-ni’a, ish-ah-ni’a, shek’-ah-na, Shekaniah; Sekenai;

(1) A descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 21 22). This is the same Shecaniah mentioned in Ezr 8 8.

(2) “The sons of Shecaniah,” so the MT of Ezr 8 5 reads, were among those who returned with Ezra, but a name appears to have been lost from the text, and we should probably read “the sons of Shecaniah the son of Jahanai” (cf 1 Esd 8 32, “of the sons of Zathan, or Szecheni the son of Jezliah”).

(3) Chief of the tenth course of priests (1 Ch 24 11).

(4) A priest in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31 15).

(5) A contemporary of Ezra who supported him in his opposition to foreign marriages (Ezr 10 2).

(6) The father of Shecaniah, “the keeper of the east gate” (Neh 3 29).
(7) The father-in-law of Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh 6:18).

(8) The eponym of a family which returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:3). It is the same name which, by an interchange of (2) bh and (2) kh, appears as Shebaniah (see SHEBANIAH, [2]) in Neh 10:4-12.14.

SeaCHEM, she'kem (Σήκημ; sh'khem, “shoulder”); Συχέμ, Suchém, ΔΣκίμα, ἴδι Σικίμα, ΤΣικίμα, τὰ Σικίμα, τά Σικίμα, etc; AV gives “Shechem” in

1. Historical—Gen 12:6; and “Sychem” in Acts 7:16; 15:2. This place is first mentioned in connection with Abraham’s journey from Haran. At the oak of Moreh in the vicinity he reared his first altar to the Lord in Pal (Gen 12:6 f). It was doubtless by this oak that Jacob, on his return from Paddan-aram, buried “the strange [ARV “foreign”] gods” (35:4). Hither he had come after his meeting with Esau (33:18). Onom here identifies Shechem with Shalem; but see SHALEM. To the E. of the city Jacob pitched his tent in a "parcel of ground" which he had bought from Hamor, Shechem’s father (ver 19). Here also he raised an altar and called it El-Elohe-Israel, “God, the God of Israel” (ver 20). Then follows the story of Dinah’s defilement by Shechem, son of the city’s chief; and of the treacherous and terrible vengeance exacted by Simeon and Levi (ch 34). To the rich pasture land near Shechem Joseph came to sell his brethren (37:2). It is mentioned as lying to the W. of Michmethath (el-Mu’khneh) on the boundary of Manasseh (Josh 17:7). It was in the territory of Ephraim; it was made a city of refuge, and assigned to the Kohathite Levites (20:7; 21:21). Near the city the Law was promulgated (Dt 27:11; Josh 8:33). When his end was approaching Joshua gathered the tribes of Israel here, and addressed to them his final words of counsel and exhortation (ch 24). Under the oak in the neighboring sanctuary he set up the stone of witness (ver 26).

The war of conquest being done, Joseph’s bones were buried in the parcel of ground which Jacob had bought, and which fell to the lot of Joseph’s descendants (ver 33). Abimelech, whose mother was a native of the city, persuaded the men of Shechem to make him king (Jgs 9:1-6), evidently seeking a certain consecration from association with "the oak of the pillar that was in Shechem."

Joatham’s parable was spoken from the cliff of Gerizim overhanging the town (vs 7 f). After a reign of three years Abimelech was rejected by the people. He captured the city, razed it to the foundations, and sowed it with salt. It was then the seat of Can. idolatry, the temple of Baal-berith being here (Jgs 9:44). In the time of the kings we find that the city was once more a gathering-place of the nation. It was evidently the center, esp. for the northern tribes; and hither Rehoboam came in the hope of getting his succession to the throne confirmed (1 K 12:1; 2 Ch 10:1). At the disruption Jeroboam fortified the city and made it his residence (ver 25; Ant, VIII, viii, 4). The capital of the Northern Kingdom was moved, however, first to Tirzah and then to Samaria, and Shechem declined in political importance. Indeed it is not named again in the history of the monarchy. Apparently there were Israelites in it after the captivity, some of whom on their way to the house of the Lord at Jerusalem passed through the hands of Ishmael and Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 41 5 ff). It became the central city of the Samaritans, whose shrine was built on Mt. Gerizim (Sir 50 26; Asc. XI, viii, 6; XII, i, 1; XIII, iii, 4). Shechem was captured by John Hyrcanus in 135 B.C. (A.V. XIII, ix, 1; B. J. i, 6). It appears in the NT only in the speech of Stephen (Acts 7, 16, A.V. “Sychem”). Some (e.g. Smith, DB, s.v.) would identify it with Sychar of Jn 4 5; but see SYCHAR. Under the Romans it became Philocharis. In later times it has been a bishopric; the names of five occupants of the see are known.

There is no doubt as to the situation of ancient Shechem. It lay in the pass which cuts through the plateau of Ephraim, Ebal and Gerizim. It is in a position guarding it on the N. and S. respectively, and physically. Along this line runs the great inland road which from time immemorial has formed the easiest and the quickest means of communication between the E. of the Jordan and the sea. It must have been a place of strength from antiquity. The name seems to occur in Travels of a Mohar (Max Muller, Asien u. Europa, 394), “Mountain of Sahams” probably referring to Elbal. One of the ancient cities may have been the somewhat farther E. than the modern Nablus, in which the Rom name Neapolis survives. The situation is one of great beauty. The city lies close to the foot of Gerizim. The terraced slopes of the mountain rise immediately on the S. side of the valley, musical with the sound of running water, the great bulk of Ebal rises on the N., its sides, shaggy with prickly pear, sliding down into corn fields and orchards. The equis springs which supply abundance of water rise at the base of Gerizim. The fruitful and well-wooded valley winds westward among the hills. It is traversed by the carriage road leading to Jaffa and the sea. Eastward the valley opens upon the plain of Makheeh. To the E. of the city, in a recess at the base of Gerizim, is the sanctuary known as Ḥaj el-Emad, lit. “men of the column” or “pillar,” where some would locate the ancient “oak of Moreh” or “of the pillar.” Others would find it in a little village farther E. with a fine spring named Ballati, which may be connected with ballati, “oak.” Still farther to the E. and near the base of Ebal is the traditional tomb of Joseph, a little white-domed building beside a luxuriant orchard. On the slope of the mountain beyond is the village of Shechar, see SYCHAR, on the S. of the vale is the traditional Well of Jacob; see JACOS’S WELL. To the S.W. of the city is a small mosque on the spot where Jacob is said to have mourned over the blood-stained coat of Joseph. In the neighboring minaret is a stone whereon the Ten Commandments are engraved in Samaritan characters. The main center of the town is the synagogue of the Samaritans, with their ancient MS of the Pent.

The modern town contains about 20,000 inhabitants, the great body of them being Moslems. There are some 700 or 800 Christians, chiefly belonging to the Gr Orthodox church. The Samaritans do not total more than 200. The place is still the market for a wide district, both E. and W. of Jordan. A considerable trade is done in cotton and wool. Soap is manufactured in large quantities, oil for this purpose being plentifully supplied by the olive groves. Sheep raising and manufacture of leather goods are carried on. In old times the slopes of Ebal were covered with vineyards; but these formed a source of temptation to the “faithful.” They were therefore removed by authority, and their place taken by the prickly pears mentioned above.

SHECHEMITES, shek’em-its (םשךמ, hašshēḵmim; סֵפִּיָּם, Suchemi); The descendants of Shechem the son of Gilead, a clan of Eastern Mannasseh (Nu 26 31; Josh 17 3).

SHEDEUR, she’d’ur, she’d’è-r, “daybreak”; B. Seboul, Sedouir, “daybreak” (Gen. xi, 26). The name of Reubem (Nu 1 5; 2 10; 7 30). Fr. Delitzsch correctly conceives the name as an Assyrian compound, sad uri, “daybreak.” Cf., however, Gray, HPN, 169, 197, who emends the text to read Shaddai’Ur, “Shaddai is flame.”

SHEEP, šēp, the usual Heb word is נֵי (N, cōn), which is often trsl “flock,” e.g. “Abel... brought of the firstlings of his flock” (Gen 4 4).

1. Names “butter of the herd, and milk of the flock” (De 32 14). A.V. and ERV have “milk of sheep.” Cf Arab. دُّكَان, ḍān. The Gr word is ἐκζαφαῖον, probatōn. For other names, see notes under CATTLE; EWE; LAMB; RAM.

The origin of domestic sheep is unknown. There are 11 wild species, the majority of which are found in Asia, and it is conceivable that they may have spread from the highlands of Central Asia to the other portions of their habitat. In North America is found the “bighorn,” which is very closely related to a Kamchatkan species. Two species, the so-called “Ovis” that may be, are the Barbary sheep, Ovis aegagrus, also known as the ovicapricorn or argali, which inhabits the Arctic region of North-West Africa. It is thought by Tristram to be zemer, EV “chamois” of Dt 14 5, but there is no good evidence that this animal ranges eastward into Biblical lands. Geographically nearest is the Armenian wild sheep, Ovis aries, of Asia Minor and Persia. The Cyprian wild sheep may be only a variety of the last, and the moufond of Corseca and Sardinia is an allied species. It is not easy to draw the line between wild and sheep and goats. Among the more obvious distinctions are the chin beard and strong odor of male goats. The pelage of all wild sheep consists of hair, not wool, and this indeed is true of some domestic sheep as the fat-rumped short-tailed sheep of Abyssinia and Central Asia. The yellowish or tawny shades of this breed have short curly wool which is the estrachan of commerce. Sheep are geologically recent, their horns and teeth not being as early as those of the pliocene or pleistocene. They were, however, among the first of domesticated animals.

The sheep of Syria and Pal are characterized by the possession of an enormous fat tail which weighs many pounds and is known in Arab. "līyāt. This is the הָנֶּן, "alghā, "fat tail" (AV “rump”) (Ex 29 22; Lev 3 9; 7 3; 8 25; 9 19), which was burned in sacrifice. This is at the present day esteemed a great delicacy. Sheep are kept in large numbers by the Bedawin, but a large portion of the supply of mutton for the cities is from the sheep of Armenia and Kurdistan, of which great droves are literally crammed by one of the women of the household, who keeps the creature's jaw moving with one hand while with the other she stuffs its mouth with vine or mulberry leaves. Even after noon she washes it at the village fountain. When slaughtered in the fall it is called ملأ, maːl̚af, "fed," and is very fat and the flesh very tender. Some of the meat and fat are eaten at once, but the greater part, fat and lean, is cut up fine, cooked together in a large vessel with pepper and salt, and stored in an earthen jar. This, the so-called لَغْرُض, laγraːnat, is used as needed through the winter.

In the mountains the sheep are gathered at night into folds, which may be caves or enclosures of rough stones. Fierce dogs assist the shepherd in warding off the attacks of wolves, and remain at the fold throughout the day to guard the slight bedding and simple utensils. In going to pasture the sheep are not driven but are led, following the shepherd as he walks before them and calls them. "When he hath put forth all his own, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him: for they know his voice" (Jn 10:4).

The sheepfolds of Reuben on the plain of Gilead are referred to in Nu 32:16 and Jgs 5:10. A cave is mentioned in 1 S 24:3 in connection with the pursuit of David by Saul. The shepherd origin of David is referred to in Ps 78:70: "He chose David also his servant, / And took him from the sheepfolds..."

Cf also 2 S 7:8 and 1 Ch 17:7.

The shearing of the sheep was a large operation and evidently became a sort of festival. Absalom invited the king's sons to his sheep-shearing in Baal-hazor in order that he might find an opportunity to put Amasa to death while his heart was "full of wool" (2 S 13:23-29). The character of the occasion is evident also from the indignation of David at Nabal when the latter refused to provide entertainment at his sheep-shearing for David's young men who had previously protected the flock of Nabal (1 S 25:2-19). There is also mention of the sheep-shearing of Judah (Gen 38:12) and of Laban (Gen 31:19), on which occasion Jacob stole away with his wives and children and his flocks.

Sheep were the most important sacrificial animals, a ram or a young male being often specified.

In the Books of Ch we find statements of enormous numbers of animals consumed in sacrifice: "And king Solomon offered in peace offerings and burnt offerings before the LORD our God a very great offering: twelve thousand oxen, and a hundred and twenty thousand sheep" (2 Ch 7:5); "And they sacrificed unto Jehovah in that day in the Valley of Asa comforts, seven hundred oxen and three thousand sheep" (2 Ch 15:11); at the cleansing of the temple by Hezekiah: "he consecrated things to Jehovah, two thousand head of oxen, and three thousand sheep, but the priests were too few that they could not kill all the burnt offerings: wherefore their brethren the Levites did help them" (2 Ch 29:33); and "Hosekiah king of Judah did give to the assembly offerings for burnt offerings, two thousand head of oxen and seven thousand sheep; and the princes gave to the assembly a thousand bullocks and ten thousand sheep" (2 Ch 30:24). In the account of the war of the sons of Reuben and their allies with the Hagrites, we read: "And they took away their cattle; of their camels fifty thousand, and of sheep two hundred and fifty thousand, and of asses two thousand, and of men a hundred thousand" (1 Ch 5:21). Josiah king of Judah is called a "sheep-master," and we read that he "rendered unto the king of Israel the wool of a hundred thousand lambs, and of a hundred thousand rams" (2 K 3:4).

Christ is represented as the Lamb of God (Isa 53:7; Jn 1:29; Rev 5:6). Some of the most beautiful passages in the Bible represent God as a shepherd: "From thence is the shepherd, the stone of Israel" (Gen 49:24); "Jeh is my shepherd; I shall not want" (Ps 23:1; cf Isa 40:11; Ezek 34:12-16). Jesus said "I am the good shepherd; and I know mine own, and mine own know me... and I lay down my life for the sheep" (Jn 10:14). The people without leaders are likened to sheep without a shepherd (Nu 27:17; 1 K 22:17; 2 Ch 18:16; Ezek 34:5). Jesus at the Last Supper applies to Himself the words of Zec 13:7; "I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad" (Mt 26:31; Mk 14:27). The enemies of Jeh are compared to the fat of the sacrifice that is consumed away in smoke (Ps 37:20). God's people are "the sheep of his pasture" (Ps 79:13; 96:7; 100:3). In sinning they become like lost sheep (Isa 53:6; Jer 50:6; Ezek 34:6; Lk 15:3). In the mouth of Nathan the poor man's one little ewe lamb is a vivid image of the treasure of which the king David has robbed Uriah the Hittite (2 S 12:3). In Cant 6:6, the teeth of the bride are likened to a flock of ewes, so that "the wolf shall dwell with the lamb" (Isa 11:6) and that "the wolf and the lamb shall feed together" (Isa 65:25). Jesus says to His disciples, "I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves" (Mt 10:16; cf Lk 10:3). In the parable of the lost sheep Shepherd we read: "He is a hireling, and not a shepherd, whose own sheep are not, beholdeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth" (Jn 10:12).

SHEEPFOLD, שֵׁפֶּלֶד, shewflep, shewflid (שׁפֶלֶד, gâvehôdâh, פֶּלֶד, mikhâlah, פֶלֶספֶלֶד, mishp̄ṭayhum, פֶּלֶכ, nāshôh; אָעָלָה, qôleh): At night the sheep are driven into a sheepfold if they are in a district where there is danger from robbers or wild beasts. These folds are simple walled enclosures (Nu 32:16; Jgs 5:16; 2 Ch 32:28; Ps 78:70; Ezek 2:6; Zeph 2:6). In the north of Israel a shed or even a heap of earth and brushwood is used as a further safeguard. Sometimes there is a covered hut in the corner for the shepherd. Where there is no danger the sheep huddle together in the open until daylight, while the shepherd feeds them (Gen 33:13; 1 S 28:3; 2 S 2:8). In the winter time caves are sought after (1 S 24:3; Zeph 2:6). The antiquity of the use of some of the caves for this purpose is indicated by the thick deposit of potassium nitrate formed from the decomposition of the sheep dung.

SHEEP GATE (אַשְׁפָּה תַּחְתָּא), sha'or ha-go'ón (Neh 3 1,32; 12 39): One of the gates of Jerusalem, probably near the northeast corner. See Jerusalem: Sheep Market.

SHEEP MARKET (Jn 5 2, RV 'sheep gate'): The Gr (πορτας, ἡ προβατική) means something simply that pertains to sheep. See Bethesda; Sheep Market.

SHEEP-SHEARING, šep'še-ring: The sheep-shearing is done in the springtime, either by the owner (Gen 31 19; 38 15; Dt 15 19; 1 S 26 24) or by regular "shearers" (יִמֵּשָׁנ, gōsa'ān) (1 S 26 7,11; Isa 63 7). There were special houses for this work in OT times (2 K 10 12,14). The shearing was carefully done so as to keep the fleece whole (Jgs 6 37). The sheep of a flock are not branded but spotted: Lime or some dyestuff is painted in one or more spots on the wool of the back as a distinguishing mark. In 2 K 5 4, Mesha, the chief or sheik of Moab, was a sheep-master, lit. "a sheep spotter." JAMES A. PATCH

SHEEPSKIN, šep'skin. See Bottle; Dress; Rams' Skins, etc.

SHEEP TENDING, ten'ding: The Scriptural allusions to pastoral life and the similes drawn from that life are the most familiar and revered in the Bible. Among the first verses that a child learns is "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want" (Ps 23 1 AV, ERV). What follower of the Master does not love to dwell on the words of the "Good Shepherd" chapter in the Gospel of John (Jn 10)? Jesus must have drawn a sympathetic response when he referred to the relationship of sheep to shepherd, a relationship familiar to all His hearers and doubtful shared by some of them with their flocks. As a rule the modern traveler in the Holy Land meets with disappointment if he comes expecting to see things as they were depicted in the Bible. An exception to this is the pastoral life, which has not changed one whit since Abraham and his descendants fed their flocks on the rich plateaus E. of the Jordan or on the mountains of Pal and Syria. One may count among his most prized experiences the days and nights spent under the spell of Syrian shepherd life. JAMES A. PATCH

SHEERAH, še'era (אַשְׁפָּה, še'ērāh; A, Še'eād, Saorā, B omits): A daughter of Ephraim, who, according to the MT of 1 Ch 7 24 (AV "Sheerah"), built the two Beth-horons and Uzzen-sheerah. The verse has been suspected because elsewhere in the OT the founders of cities are men. Uzzen-sheerah as a place is unidentified; Conder suggests as the site Beth She'rā, a village 2 miles S.W. of the Lower Beth-horôn (Mem 3 10).

SHEET, še't. See Dress; cf Acts 10 11, "as it were a great sheet" (δεσμόν, othōnē). H. PORTER

SHEHARIAH, še-ha-ra'ā (שֶׁהָרִיא, šeharyaḥ): A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 26).

SHEKEL, šek'ēl, šek'el, šek'ēl (שְׁכֵל, shekel): A weight and a coin. The Hcb shekel was the 50th part of a mina, and as a weight about 224 grains, and as money (silver) was worth about 2s. 9d., or 66 cents. No gold shekel has been found, and hence it is inferred that such a coin was not used; but as a certain amount of gold, by weight, it is mentioned in 2 Ch 3 9 and is probably intended to be supplied in 2 K 5 5. The gold shekel was 1/60 of the heavy Bab mina and weighed about 252 grains. In value it was about equal to £2 1s. 9d., or $10. See Money; Weights and Measures. In RV of Mt 17 27 "shekel" replaces "piece of money" of AV, the tr of σηχνή, stater. See Stater.

SHEKEL OF THE KING'S WEIGHT, or ROYAL SHEKEL (תְּשֶׁלֶק, 'ebhen ha-melekh, "stone r. of the king"): The shekel by which Absalom's hair was weighed (2 S 14 26), probably the light shekel of 130 grains. See Weights and Measures.

SHEKEL OF THE SANCTUARY, or SACRED SHEKEL (תְּשֶׁלֶק לִי, shekel ha-kódsheh [Nu 7 passim]): The same as the silver shekel mentioned under shekel (q.v.), except in Ex 38 24, where it is used in measuring gold. The term is used for offerings made for sacred purposes.

SHEKINAH, še-kī'nah (עַשְׁקִינָה, še'kînāh, "that which dwells," from the vb. לִשְׁקַן, lishkan, or לִשְׁקָה, lishkā, "to dwell," "reside"): This word is not found in the Bible, but there are allusions to it in Isa 60 2; Mt 17 5; Lk 2 9; Rom 9 4. It is first found in the Tgs. See Glory.

SHELAL, še-ləl (שֶׁלָל), še'lāh; Zōhā, Sālā): (1) The youngest son of Judah and the daughter of Shan the Canaanite (Gen 36 11,14,26; 46 12; Nu 26 20 [16]; 1 Ch 2 3; 4 21). He gave his name to the family of the Shelalites (Nu 26 20 [16]). Probably "the Shelalite" should be substituted for "the Shilonite" of Neh 11 5; 1 Ch 9 5.

(2) (תְּשֶׁלֶק, shelēk): The son or (LXX) grandson of Arpachshad and father of Eber (Gen 10 24; 11 13 [12],14,15; 1 Ch 1 18,24; Lk 3 35).

SHELEMIAH, shel-ə-mi'ā, še-lē-mī'ya (שֶׁלֶם יָה, šelēmyāh; B, Șălēmi, Selemé, A, Șălēmis, Selemiās): (1) One of the sons of Bani who married foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezr 10 39), called "Selemites" in 1 Esd 9 34.

(2) Father of Hananiah who restored part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 30) (B, Tēsâud, Telēmiū, N, Tēmulas, Telēmius).

(3) A priest who was appointed one of the treasurers to distribute the Levitical tithes by Nehemiah (Neh 13 13).

(4) The father of Jehucal (or Jucal) in the reign of Zedekiah (Jer 37 3; 38 1); in the second passage the name is 'Thelemiah (Jer 39 1). (5) The father of lrijah, the captain of the ward, who arrested Jeremiah as a deserter to the Chaldeans (Jer 37 13).

(6) 1 Ch 26 14. See Meshelemiah.

(7) Another of the sons of Bani who married foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezr 10 41). It is of interest to note that the order of names in this passage—Shari, Azarel, and Shelemiah—is almost identical with the names in Jer 30 26, viz. Semariah, Azriel, Shelemiah.

(8) Ancestor of Jehudi (Jer 36 14).

(9) (LXX omits.) Son of Abedel, one of the men sent by Jehoiakim to seize Baruch and Jeremiah after Baruch had read the "roll" in the king's presence (Jer 36 26).

SHELEPH, shē'lef (שְֹלֶף, šāleph), in pause; LXX Σαλα'φ, Salaph; Son of Joktan (Gen 10:26; 1 Ch 1:20). Sheleph is the name of a Yemenite tribe or district, named on Sabaean inscriptions and also by Arab transcriptionists, located in Southern Arabia.

SHELESH, shē'lesh (שְֹלֶשׁ, šēlōsheh; B, Σαλα'θ, Σαβαθ; A, Σαλαθ, Salōth); An Asherite, son of Helam (1 Ch 7:35).

SHELOMITH, shē'lō'mīth, shē'lo-mith (שְֹלוֹמִית, šēlōmīṯ); in Ezra 8:10, קֶשֶׁלוֹמִית, keshēlōmīṯ; (1) The mother of the man who was stone for blasphemy (Lev 24:11) (B, Sələw̄mēḏ, Salomēḏ, Luc., Σαλομήθ, Salomith). (2) Daughter of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3:19) (B, Sələw̄mēḏ, Salomēḏ, A, Sələw̄mēḏ, Salomēḏ, Luc., Σαλωμήθ, Salomith). (2a) One of the “sons of Ishah” (1 Ch 2:18) (B, Sələw̄mēḏ, Salomēḏ, A, Sələw̄mēḏ, Salomēḏ, Luc., Σαλωμήθ, Salomith), called “Shelemith” in 24:22. (4) The name of a family whose representatives returned with Ezra (Ezr 8:10) (B, Sələw̄mēḏ, Salomēḏ, A, Sələw̄mēḏ, Salomēḏ, Luc., Σαλωμήθ, Salomith). The MT here should read, “and the sons of Bani; Shelomith, son of Josephiah” and in 1 Esd 8:36, “of the sons of Banias, Salimoth, son of Josiphas.”

SHEMOT, shē'mō'th, she'lo-moth, -moth (שֵֹם, shēm; שֹמֹת, shōmōṯ); both the punctuation and interpretation are in doubt. MT punctuates the first element as a passive participle; the use of the participle in compounds is common in Assyri but rare in Heb (cf Gen 21:13, Tiberian, ה'ת, ה'ת). The meaning of the present form, if it be correct, is “as peace with God” (Gen 24:25, KJV; 26:30, “my friend is God”). LXX reads Σαλωμῆθ, Salomēḏ; Prince of the tribe of Simeon (Nu 1:6; 2:12; 7:36-41; 10:19). The genealogy of Judith (8:1) is carried back to this Shelumiel or Shelamiel, called here “Salamiel.”

SHEM, shē'm (שֵֹם, sham; Σήμ, Sēm); The eldest son of Noah, from whom the Jews, as well as the Semitic (“Semitic”) nations in general have descended. When giving the names of Noah’s three sons, Shem is always mentioned first (Gen 9:18; Gen 10:21) and the “elders” in “Shem the brother of Japheth the elder” (10:21 m) is explained as referring to Shem, though the rendering of “elders” (qayyim) is common in the translation of the MT into Greek. His five sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, are the people of the greater part of West Asia’s finest tracts, from Elam on the one end of the Mediterranean to the West, though traditionally regarded as a “black” (cf the Assyrian Bnon—also Ham—possibly “black,” Japheth, “fair”); it is considered possible that Shem may have been the usual Heb word for “name” (shēm), given him because he was the firstborn—a parallel to the Assy-Sabine usage, in which “son.”

“name” (šēm) are synonyms (W. A. INSCRIPTIONS, V, pl. 23, lii. 29-32a). Shem, who is called “the father of all the children of Eber,” was born when Noah had attained the age of 500 years (Gen 5:32). Though he married at the time of the Flood, Shem and Japheth, with their children. Alied by Japheth, the Nations which Ham, the youngest brother, had from him revealed to them; but unlike the last, Shem and Japheth, in their filial piety, approached their father walking backward, in order not to look at him. Two years after the Flood Shem was then 100 years old, his son Arpachshad was born (Gen 11:10), and was followed by further sons and daughters during the remaining 500 years which preceded Shem’s death. Noah’s prophecic blessing, on awakening from his sleep, may be regarded as having been fulfilled in his descendants, who occupied Syria (Aram), Pal (Canaan), Chaldaea (Arpachshad), Assyria (Asshur), part of Persia (Elam), and Arabia (Joktan). In the first three of these (as well as in Elam, Canaanites had settled in the other districts), but Shemites were ruled, at some time or other, over the Canaanites, and Canaan thus became “his servant” (Gen 9:25). The tablets found in Cappadocia seem to show that Shemites (Assyrians) had settled in that district also, but this was apparently an unimportant colony. Though designated sons of Shem, some of his descendants (e.g. the Elamites) did not speak a Semitic language, while other nationalities, not his descendants (e.g. the Canaanites), did. See Ham; Japheth; Table of Nations.

SHEMA, shē'ma (שֵֹמה, shēma'), Σαμα'Δ, Samāḏ; A city of Judah in the Negeb (Jos 15:26). If, as some think, identical with SHEMA (q.v.) of Josh 19:2, then the latter must have been inserted here from Jos 15:26. It is noticeable that the root letters (שֵֹמה) were those from which Simeon is derived. SHEMA is probably identical with Joshua (Neh 11:26). The place was clearly far S., and it may be Kh. Sa’wah, a ruin upon a prominent hilltop between Kh. Alīf and Kh. al-Milh. There is a wall around the ruins, of large blocks of conglomerate flint (PEF, III, 409, Sh XXV).

SHEMAH, shē'ma' (שֵֹמה, shēma'); (1) A Reubenite (1 Ch 5:8, 8, BA, Σαμα', Sāma', Luc., Σαμα'Δ, Samāḏ). See Samāḏ. (2) One of the heads of “fathers’ houses” in Aijalon, who put to flight the inhabitants of Gath (1 Ch 12:3, BA, Σαμα, Sāma', Luc., Σαμα'Δ, Samāḏ); in ver 21 he is called “Shemai.” The statement is very obscure and the whole incident is probably due to some marginal note.

(3) One of those who stood at Ezra’s right during the reading of the Law (Neh 8:4, Σαμα'Δ, Samāḏas). He is called “Samaias” in 1 Esd 9:43.

SHEMAH, shē'ma' (שֵֹמה, shēma'); hō-šēm'āḏ; B, Αμα', Amā', A, Σαμα', Samāḏ, Luc., Αμα', Amā'Δ, Asmā'D; A Benjamite, who was the father, according to the MT, of Ahiezer and Joash; but according to the LXX, hōusōis = hōsāma' (ben) instead of しか (bne) of Joash alone (1 Ch 12:3). The original text may have read שֶֹמָא, šēma'āḏ; a son of hōshēmāḏ' (cf שֶֹמָא, šēma'āḏ) of 3:18; then a dittography of the following S. (h) caused the error (Curtis, ICC).

SHEMAIH, shē'ma'īya, shē'ma'īya' (שֶֹמָיָה, šēma'īya', šēma'īya'), Son of Jacob in 2 Ch 11:2; 17:8; 31:15; 35:9; Jer 26:20; 29:24; 36:12, shēma'īyaḥh, “Jaheb hears”;

SHEMAIAH, shē'ma'īya, shē'ma'īya' (שֶֹמָיָה, šēma'īya', šēma'īya')...
The name is most frequently borne by priests, Levites and prophets.

(1) B, Σαμιας, Samias, A, ᾿Σαμιας, Samaías (2 Ch 12 5.7). A prophet who, together with Ahijah, protested against Rehoboam's contemplated war against the ten revolted tribes (1 K 12 22-24 = 2 Ch 11 2-4). He declared that the rebellion had Divine sanction. The second Gr account knows nothing of Ahijah in this connection and introduces Shemaiah at the gathering at Shechem where both Jeroboam and Rehoboam were present; it narrates that on this occasion Shemaiah (not Ahijah) rent his garment and gave ten parts to Jeroboam to signify the ten tribes over which he was to become king. (This version, however, is not taken very seriously, because of its numerous inconsistencies.) Shemaiah also prophesied at the invasion of Judah by Shishak (2 Ch 12 5-7). His message was to the effect that as the princes of Israel had humbled themselves, God's wrath against their idolatrous practices would not be poured out upon Jerus by the hand of Shishak (2 Ch 13 7). He is mentioned as the author of a history of Rehoboam (2 Ch 12 15).

(2) Son of Shecaniah (1 Ch 3 22, ᾿Σαμιας, Samias, A, Σαμιας, Samaías, descendant of Zerubbabel. This is also the name of one of the men who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3 29, ᾿Σαμεια, Samet, A, Σαμαία, Samia, Neh 6 17-24 of 1 Ch 3)).

(3) A simeonite (1 Ch 4 37, B, ᾿Σαμειον, Samiwn, A, ᾿Σαμιας, Samaías, identical, perhaps, with the Shimei of 1 Ch 4 26.27.

(4) A Reubenite (1 Ch 5 4, B, ᾿Σαμειετ, Samet, A, Σειετ, Seiēt), called Shema in ver 8.

(5) A Merarite Levite (1 Ch 9 14; Neh 11 15, ᾿Σαμαία, Samia, Samias; ver 11, B, ᾿Σαμαία, Samia, Σαμιας, Samaías, ver 11, B, ᾿Σαμαία, Samia, Σαμιας, Samaías, Samias, Samias, Samias; ver 11, B, ᾿Σαμαία, SHEMRATOMITH, shē-mir'a-mOTH, shē-mir'-RA-moth; shem-in-rā-mōth (吸入, shemirāmōth); in 2 Ch 17:8, ḳ'tībīh ḳanīrīm; Scheunemann, Semeiramoth): The name of a Levitical family.

In 1 Ch 18:16, 19:16, 26:4, 26:15 Shemirath lists among the names of David's chieftains. In 2 Ch 17:8 the same name is given among the Levites delegated by Jehoshaphat to teach the Law in the cities of Judah. According to Schrader (KAT 2), 366 the name is to be identified with the Assyri Summaram, the latter occurring as a woman's name on the monuments, more esp. on the statues of Nebor from Nimrod. Another suggestion is that Shemirath was originally a place-name meaning "image of Shemiram" (= name of Ram or "the Exalted One").

SHEMITES, shem'-i'tes. See SEMITES.

SHEMUHEL, shē-mú'-el, shem'-u-EL (吸入, šemā'el), "name of God" ([1 Ch 6:33 (18)]; RV Samuel, the prophet [see Samuel]; of Gray, HPN, 200, n. 3): (1) The Simeonite appointed to assist in the division of the land (Nu 34:20). The MT should be emended to ṣemā'el, to correspond with the form found in 1 6:2; 12:7; 36:41; 10:19. LXX has uniformly Ἀλαμεθί, Salameith.

SHEN, shēn (吸入, ḥa-shēn, "the tooth" or "peak"); τῆς φαλάδας, ἡς φαλάδας): A place named only in 1 S 7:12 to indicate the position of the stone set up by Samuel in connection with the victory over the Philis, "between Mizpah and Shen." LXX evidently read yāshān, "old." Probably we should here read υς'èshān, as in 2 Ch 13:19 (OHL, s.v.). Then it may be represented by 'Anti Sinia to the N. of Beitha.

SHENAZAR, shē-nā'-zAR: AV = RV Shennazar (q.v.).

SHENAZAR, shē-nā'-zAR (吸入, shen'azar): A son of Jeconiah (Jehoiachin) and uncle of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3:18, BA, *Sēnar, Sēnaer, Luc. Sēnarap, Sēnaar, Vulg Sennaer, Sennaser). It is highly probable that Sheshbazzar (Ezr 1 8:11), "the prince of Judah," and Shennazar are identical (so Meyer, Rothstein, etc.). The name is difficult; some suggest a corruption of ḳanīrīm, shēkbal'azar, and as equivalent to Sin-urus, shin [the moon-god] protected.6

SHENIR, shē-nir (吸入, s-'ir, rish'ir, shnir): Only found in Cant 4:8 (MT). See SENIR.

SHEOL, še-öl (吸入, še-'ol):

1. The Name
2. The Abode of the Dead
3. Post-canaical Period

This word is often trd in AV "grave" (e.g. Gen 37:35; 1 S 2:6; Job 7:9; 14:13; Ps 6:5; 49:14; Isa 14:11, etc.) or "hell" (e.g. Dt 32:22; Ps 9:17; 18:5; Isa 14:9; Am Name 9:2, etc.); in 3 places by "pit" (Nu 16:30-33; Job 17:16) it means really the unseen world, the state or abode of the dead, and is the equivalent of the Gr ἱδέας, by which word it is trd in LXX. The Eng. Revisers have acted somewhat inconsistently in leaving "grave" or "pit" in the historical books and putting "Sheol" in the margin, while substituting "Sheol" in the poetical writings, and putting "grave" in the margin ("hell") is retained in Isa 14:14. Cf their "Preface. The American Revisers more properly use "Sheol" throughout in the etymology of the Hebrew word, a derivation. A favorite derivation is from shādāl, "to ask" (cf Prov 1:12; 27:20; 30:15.16; Isa 5:14; Hab 2:5); others prefer the ḳādāl, "to be hollow." The Babylonians are said to have a similar word Sutbu, though this is questioned by some.

Into Sheol, when life is ended, the dead are gathered in their tribes and families. Hence the expression frequently occurring in the Dead (Ps 22; to go to one's fathers, etc) (Gen 15:17; 25:8.17; 49:33; Jer 32:18; 31:2; Dt 32:50; 34:5). It is figured as an underworld (Isa 44:23; Ezek 26:20, etc.), and is described by other terms, as "the pit" (Job 33:24; Ps 28:1; 30:3; Prov 1:12; Isa 38:16, etc), Anaddon (q.v.) or Destruction (Job 26:6; 28:22; Prov 15:11), the place of "silence" (Ps 94:17; 115:17), "the land of darkness and the shadow of death" (Job 10:21). It is, as the antithesis of the living condition, the synonym for everything that is gloomy, insubstantial, the abode of the shades, Job 26:5; Prov 2:18; 21:16; Isa 14:9; 26:14). It is a "land of forgetfulness," where God's "wonders" are unknown (Ps 88:10-12). There is no remembrance or praise of God (Ps 6:5; 88:12; 115:7-18, etc.). In its stillness, powerlessness, lack of knowledge and inactivity, it is a true abode of death (see DEATH); hence is regarded by the living with shrinking, horror and dismay (Ps 39:13; Isa 38:17-19), though to the weary and tired it may present the aspect of a welcome rest or sleep (Job 3:17-22; 14:12). The Gr idea of Hades was not dissimilar.

(1) Not a state of unconsciousness.—Yet it would be a mistake to infer, because of these strong and sometimes poetically heightened contrasts to the world of the living, that Sheol was conceived of as absolutely a place without consciousness, or some dim remembrance of the world above. This is not the case. Necromancy rested on the idea that there was some communication between the world above and the world below (Dt 18:11): a Samuel could be summoned from the dead (1 S 28:11-15); Sheol from beneath was stirred at the descent of the king of Babylon (Isa 14:9 ff). The state is rather that of abode; unconscious, semi-conscious, insubstantial (the abode of the shades), the abode of forgetfulness from which in a partial way the spirit might temporarily be aroused. Such conceptions, it need hardly be said, did not rest on revelation, but were rather the natural ideas formed of the future state, in contrast with life in the body, in the absence of revelation.

(2) Not removed from God's jurisdiction.—It would be yet more erroneous to speak with Dr. Charles (Eschatology, 35 ff) of Sheol as a region "quite independent of Yahweh, and outside the sphere of His rule." "Sheol is naked before God," says Job, "and Abaddon hath no covering" (36:6). "If I make my bed in Sheol," says the Psalmist, "behold thou art there" (Ps 139:8). The wrath of Jeh burns unto the lowest Sheol (Dt 32:22). As a rule there is little sense of moral distinctions in the OT representations of Sheol, yet possibly these are not altogether wanting (on the above and others points in the theology of Sheol, see Eschatology of the OT).

(3) Related to human mortality.—To apprehend fully the OT conception of Sheol one must view it in its relation to the idea of death as something unnatural and abnormal for man; a result of sin. The believer's hope for the future, so far as this had place, was not prolonged existence in Sheol, but deliverance from it and restoration to new life in Shephelah, the international standard bible encyclopaedia

God's presence (Job 14:13–15; 19:25–27; Ps 18:10.11); 17:15; 49:15; 73:24–26; see IMMORTALITY; ESCHATOLOGY of the OT; RESURRECTION).

Dr. Charles probably goes too far in thinking of Sheol in Ps 49 and 73 as "the future abode of the wicked only; heaven as that of the righteous" (op. cit., 74); but different destinies are clearly indicated.

There is no doubt, at all events, that in the post-canonical Jewish lit. (Apoc and apocalyptic) a very considerable development is manifest in the idea of Sheol. Distinction between good and bad in Israel is emphasized; Sheol becomes for certain classes an intermediate state between death and resurrection; for the wicked and for Gentiles it is nearly a synonym for Gehenna (hell). For the various views, with relevant lit. on the whole subject, see Eschatology of the NT; also Death; Hades; Hell, etc.

Shephelah, sheáf ‘ā-‘ā (σεφήλα, σεφήλα, σφήλα, σφῆλα, σφῆλα, saphethah, "Jeh has judged"): (1) A son of David, by Abital (2 S 3: 4; 1 Ch 3: 9); (2) A Benjamite, father of Mesebhum, of Jerus (1 Ch 9: 8); (3) A Benjamite, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12: 5).

(4) A prince of the Simeonites in the time of David (1 Ch 27: 16).

(5) A son of King Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 21: 2).

(6) A family, 372 of whom returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2: 4; Neh 7: 9); 80 more males of this family, with their head, returned with Ezra (Ezr 8: 8).

(7) A servant of Solomon, 392 of whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2: 57 f; Neh 7: 59 f); "Saphat" in 1 Esd 5: 9 and "Saphatthas" in 1 Esd 8: 34.

(8) A Perezite (Judahite), some of whose descendants dwelt at Jerus in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 11: 4).

(9) A son of Mattan, a contemporary of Jeremiah (Jer 38: 1).

Shephelah, sheéph’á-lám (σεφήλαι, ho-šphéláh; σφήλα, σφήλα, σφῆλα, saphedh, saphelh, sapfelh, sapfelh), "lowland": The word denotes "lowland" and is variously 1. Name rendered in AV. It is "vale" in Dt and Refer- ences 1:7; Josh 10: 40; 1 K 10: 27; 2 Ch 15: 11; Jer 33: 13; "valley" in Josh 9: 11; 11: 12; 12: 8; 15: 35; Jer 5: 9; Jer 32: 44; "low plain" in 1 Ch 27: 28; 2 Ch 9: 27; "plain" in Jer 17: 26; Ob 19: 10; Zec 7: 7; and "low country" in 2 Ch 28: 18. RV renders uniformly "lowland." As the word always occurs with the definite art., indicating a distinct district, it might have been well to retain it without tr. The boundaries of the district are clearly marked and include much broken country; the hills being low compared with the mountains to the E., but much higher than the plain that runs to the shore. If a tr was to be made, perhaps "lowlands" would have been the best, as applied to the "Low-lands" of Scotland, "which likewise are not entirely plain, but have their groups and ranges of hills" (HGH, 203). In the wide sense the Shephelah included the territory originally given to the tribe of Dan, and also a considerable part of Western and Southwestern Judaea. By the early days the tribes of Dan and Simeon were practically absorbed by Judah, and hence we find in Josh 15 many cities in the Shephelah which belonged to that tribe (LB, 1: 211).

(1) The names of many ancient cities named in the Shephelah have been identified. They all lie within the strip of hill country that includes districts and mountains of Judah, terminating in the N. at the Valley of Ajalon. Once indeed the name appears to apply to the low hills N. of this (Josh 11: 16, "the mount of Israel and its Shephelah"). Every other reference applies only to the S.

Principal G. A. Smith has pointed out the difference between the districts to the N. and that to the S. of Ajalon (HGH, 203 f.). "North of Ajalon the low hills which run over into Sharon are separated by mountains behind them. You ascend to the latter from Sharon either by long sloping ridges, such as that which today carries the Jerus. road, or by a hill road from Jaffa to Nablus; or else you climb up terraces, such as the succession of terraces and ranges characterizing the plain, into which by which the country rises from Lydda to Bethel. That is, the low hills west of Samaria are (to use the Heb name, "eastern plains") separated by ranges or slopes of the hills, and are not part of a separate group. But S. of Ajalon the low hills do not so hang upon the Central Range, but are separated from the mountains of Judah by a series of valleys, both wide and narrow, which run all the way from Ajalon to near Hebron: and it is only when the low hills are flung off the Central Range into an independent group, separating Judaea from Philistia, that the name Shephelah seems to be applied to them."

(2) On the E. of the Shephelah, then, taking the name in this more limited sense, rises the steep wall of the mountain, into which access is gained only by narrow and difficult defiles. The hills of the Shephelah are from 500 to 800 ft. high, with nothing over 1,500. The formation is soft limestone. In the valleys and upland plains there is much excellent land which supports a fairly good population still. Wheat, barley and olives are the chief products. But western wine, produced in such regions, is a notable testimony to the culture of the vine in old times. The district is almost entirely dependent on the rain for its water-supply. This is collected in great cisterns, partly natural. The rocks are in many places honeycombed with caves.

The western boundary is not so definite as that on the E. Some have held that it included the Philis plain. This contention draws support from the mention of the Philis cities immediately after those of Judah, which are said to be in the Shephelah (Josh 15: 45 f); these verses can hardly be ruled out as of a later date). On the other hand the Philis are said to have invaded the cities of the Shephelah (2 Ch 28: 18), which implies that it was outside their country. In later times the Talm (Jerus Shiloh, 3: 2) distinguishes the Shephelah, the Shephelah, and the Plain. See, however, discussion in Buhl (GAP, 104 n.; and G. A. Smith, Expos, 1896, 404 f).

The Shephelah is crossed by five wide valleys which furnish easy passes from the plain. These are of importance chiefly because from each of them a way, crossing the "foss," enters one of the defiles by which alone armies could approach the uplands of Judaea. The hills of Judaea are much steeper on the east than on the west, where they fall away to Philistia in long-rolling hills, forming the Shephelah.

(3) The Five of them a way, crossing the "foss," enters one of the defiles by which alone armies could approach the uplands of Judaea. The hills of Judaea are much steeper on the east than on the west, where they fall away to Philistia in long-rolling hills, forming the Shephelah.

(1) The most noteworthy of these is the Vale of Ajalon. It winds its way first in a northeasterly direction, past the Beth-horons, then, turning to the S.E., it reaches the plateau at el-Jib, the ancient Gibeon, fully 5 miles N.W. of Jerusalem. This is the eastern limit of all the avenues leading from the plain to the heights, and it is the one along which the routes of battle most frequently rolled from the days of Joshua (Josh 10:12) to those of the Maccabees (1 Macc 3:16 ff., etc.). It occupies also a prominent place in the records of the Crusades.

(2) Wādy es-Sūrār, the Valley of Sorek, crosses the Shephelah S. of Gezer, and pursues a tortuous course past Beth-shemesh and Kirjath-jearim to the plateau S.W. of Jerusalem. This is the line followed by the Jaffa-Jerusalem Railway.

(3) Wādy es-Sunt runs eastward from the N. of Tell el-'Afranj (Gatli) up the Vale of Elah to its confluence with Wādy es-Sur which comes in from the S. near Kirbet Shavech (Socoh); and from that point, as Wādy el-Jinjūn, pursues its way S. of Timnah to the uplands W. of Bethlehem.

(4) Wādy el-Afranj crosses the plain from Ashdod (Bethul), passes Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis), and winds up through the mountains toward Hebron.

(5) Wādy el-Hevy, from the sea about 7 miles N. of Gaza, runs eastward with many windings, passes to the N. of Lachish, and finds its way to the plateau some 6 miles S.W. of Hebron.

From the Shephelah thus opened the gateways by which Judaea and Jerusalem might be assailed: and the course of these avenues determined the course of much of the history. It is evident that the Shephelah lay open to attack from both sides, and for centuries it was the beatabile land between Israel and the Philistines. The ark for a time sojourned in this region (1 S 5:1 ff.). In this district is laid the scene of Samson’s exploits (Jgs 14–16). The scene of David’s memorable victory over the giant was in the Wādy es-Sunt, between Socoh and Azekah (1 S 17:1). David found refuge here in the cave of Adullam (1 S 22:1). For picturesque and vivid accounts of the Shephelah and of the part it played in history see Smith, HGL, 201 ff.; A. Henderson, Palestine, Its Historical Geography, 1894.

W. EWING

SHEPHERD, shep'èr (נָעַר, shepher, “beauty”): A mount near which the Israelites encamped (Nu 33:23). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

SHEPHERD, shep'èrd (נָעַר, בָּיִחُ, נֵעַר, נָעַר; παπάς, ποιμήν, “a feeder”): The sheep owner frequently tends the flocks himself (Gen 4:4; 30:40; cf. Ezek 34:12), but more often he delegates the work to his children (Gen 29:9; 1 S 16:19; 17:15) or relatives (Gen 31:6). In such cases the sheep have good care because the keepers have a personal interest in the well-being of the animals, but when they are attended by a herding (1 S 17:20) the flocks may be neglected or abused (Isa 55:10 ff.; Ezek 34:8 ff.; Zec 11:17 ff.; Jn 10:12).

The chief care of the shepherd is to see that the sheep find plenty to eat and drink. The flocks are not fed in pens or folds, but, summer and winter, must depend upon foraging for their sustenance (Ps 23:2). In the winter of 1910–11 an unprecedented storm ravaged Northern Syria. It was accompanied by a snowfall of more than 3 ft., which covered the ground for weeks. During that time, hundreds of thousands of sheep and goats perished, not so much from the cold as from the fact that they could get no food. Goats hunt out the best feeding-

The shepherd frequently carries with him a pail from which the sheep can drink when the water is not accessible to them. On the mountain tops the melting snows supply the needed water. In other districts it is drawn from deep wells (Gen 29:2; Jn 4:6). The usual time for watering is at noon, at which time the flocks are led to the watering-places (Gen 29:2,3). After drinking, the animals lie down or huddle together in the shade of a rock while the shepherd sleeps. At the first sound of his call, which is usually a peculiar guttural sound, hard to imitate, the flock follow off to new feeding-grounds. Even should two shepherds call their flocks at the same time and the sheep be intermingled, they never mistake their own master's voice (Jn 10:3-5).

The shepherd's equipment is a simple one. His chief garment is a cloak woven from wool or made from sheepskins. This is sleeveless, and so made that it hangs like a cloak on his shoulders. When he sleeps he curls up under it, head and all. During the summer a lighter, short-sleeved 'abu or coat is worn (Jb 9:25). In the autumn a 'shaf or cloak (see 'SHAPP'), and a characteristic attitude is to make a rest for his arms by placing his staff on his shoulders against the back of his neck. When an esp. productive spot is found, the shepherd may pass the time, while the sheep play and lie down on his pipe (Jgs 5:16). He sometimes carries a sling ( Hebrew , kela') of goat's hair (1 S 17:40). His chief belongings are kept in a skin pouch or bag ( Hebrew , k'lit) (1 S 17:40).

This bag is usually a whole tawed skin turned wrong side out, with the legs tied up and the neck forming the opening. He is usually aided in the keeping and the defending of the sheep by a dog (Job 30:1). In Syria the Khabur dogs make the best protectors of the sheep, as, unlike the cowardly city dogs, they are fearless and will drive away the wild beasts. The shepherd is often called upon to aid in defending the sheep (Gen 21:39; 1 S 17:54,65; 1sa 31:4; Jer 5:6; Am 3:12).

Figurative: The frequent use of the word 'shepherd' to indicate a spiritual overseer is familiar to Bible readers (Ps 23:1; 80:1; Eccl 12:11; Isa 40:4; 63:14; Jer 31:10; Ezk 34:23,37:24; Ju 21:15-17; Eph 4:11; 1 Pet 5:1-4). We still use the term "pastor," lit. "a shepherd." Leaders in temporal affairs were also called shepherds (Gen 47:17 m; Isa 44:28; 63:11). "Sheep without a shepherd" typified individuals or nations who (Jgs forgotten Jch (Nu 27:17; 1 K 22:17; 2 Ch 18:16; Ezk 34:5,8; Zec 10:2; Mt 9:36; Mk 6:34).

Jesus is spoken of as the good shepherd (Jn 10:14); chief shepherd (1 Pet 5:4); great shepherd (He 13:20); the one shepherd (Ju 19:16). "He will feed his flock like a shepherd, he will gather the lambs in his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and will gently lead those that have their young" (Isa 40:11) is a picture drawn from pasteur life over His church. A strong sympathy for helpless animals, though sometimes misdirected, is a marked characteristic of the people of Bible lands. The birth of offspring in a flock often occurs far off on the mountain side. The shepherd solicitously guards the mother during her helpless moments and picks up the lamb and carries it to the fold. For the few days, until it is able to walk, he may carry it in his arms or in the loose folds of his coat above his girdle. See also SHEEP.

SHEPHER, shef'eh, SHEPHER, sheh'e'fo ( Hebrew , sheph'lih; B, Zeb, Sefh, A, Zbph, Saph, Luc, Shephel, Sapheil [1 Ch 1:40]; or Shepho, shph'; A, Zeph, Sph, Luc, Zbph, Saph, Saphon [Gen 36:23]): A Horite chief.

SHEPHUPHAM, SHEPHUPHAN, sheh-fus'han fam or c'an ( Hebrew , shph‘olphim; B, Zbph, Saphan, Luc, Zeph, Saphan [Nu 26:39,43]); or Shephuphan, shph‘olphim; B, Zbph, Saphan, Shaphaphak, A, Zbph, Saph, Luc, Zeph, Shefphah [1 Ch 8:5], "a kind of serpent," Gray, HPN, 95: Eponym of a Benjamite family. The name occurs in Gen 46:21 as "Muppim" and in 1 Ch 7:12,15; 26:16 as "Shephupim." It is almost impossible to arrive at the original form; the gentle "Shuphamites" appears in Nu 26:39 (43).

SHERAH, sheh'ra. See SHERAH.

SHERD, sher'd. See POTSHERD.

SHEREBIAH, sher'e-b'yah ( Hebrew , shereb'yahh, "God has sent burning heat" [7]; the form is doubtful): A post-exilic priest and family. Shereibiah, who joined Ezra at the river Ahava (Ezr 8:18; LXX omits), and had charge, along with eleven others, of the silver and gold and vessels for the Temple (ver 24, BA, Zep, Zar, Luc, Za'phata, Sarbata). He aided in the exposition of the Law ( Neh 8:7 ), was among those who made public confession (9:4) and sealed the covenant (10:12 [13]). His name also appears in 12:24. In every passage listed above except 10:12 (13), BA read Za'phata, Sarbata, Luc, Za'phata, Sarbata. In 1 Esd 8:47 the name appears as "Asebehia"; RV "Asebelia"; in ver 54, "Esebria", RV "Esrebiens," and 1 Esd 13:48, "Sarbi." Many of the companion-names on the lists are plainly ethnic (Cheyne).

SHERESH, sheh'resh ( Hebrew , sharesh; B, Zbpos, Sapos, A, Zepos, Sors, Luc, Zepos, Phares, Papos, Pharos): A Machirite name in a genealogy of Manasseh (1 Ch 7:16).

SHEREZER, sheh-re'zer (Zec 7:2 AV). See SHAREZER.

SHERGHAT, sheh'gar, sheh'gat, ASSHUR, ASSUR: The name of the first capital city of Assyria is known by the Arabs as Kala'at Sherghat, or the Fortress of Sherghat. Its ancient name was Assur or Assur (Gen 10:11 m). From it was derived the name of the country, Assyria, and of the people, Assyrians. The date of the founding of the city is not known. Apparently about 2000 BC a colony of Babylonians migrated northward along the Tigris River and settled up the right shore about halfway between the Upper and Lower Zab, or halfway between the modern cities of Mosul and Bagdad. Assur, the local deity of the place, became the national god of Assyria. It is uncertain whether the deity gave the name to the city, or the city to the deity, but probably an early shrine of Assur stood there, and the people, building their city about it, became known as the Assyrians. At first the city was a Bab dependency, governed by priests from Babylonia. In time, as the city acquired a political significance, the power of the priesthood declined; allegiance to Babylonia ceased, and the Assy empire came into existence. About 1200 BC the political power had so increased that a new capital, Nimrud (Calah) was built to the N. near the junction of the Upper Zab with the Tigris. In 722 BC the capital was transferred by Sargon to his new city, Dur-Sharrukin, and in 705 BC Sennacherib enlarged Nineveh, and it remained the capital city till the fall of the empire in 605 BC. Assur, however, as the seat of the national deity, never ceased to be the chief religious center.

The mounds of Assur are among the largest in Mesopotamia. They rise abruptly from the Tigris, which they follow for about half a mile, and extend a quarter of a mile inland. In the surrounding plain are other mounds, marking the sites of temples, and indicating that a part of the city was without the walls. At the northern end the mounds are surmounted by a high conical peak, which represents the tower or zigurrat of the temple of Assur.

Of the early excavators Layard and Rassam examined the ruins, but the fanaticism of the surrounding Arabs prevented extensive excavations. In 1904 Dr. W. Andrae, for the Deutsche Orientgesellschaft, began the systematic excavations which have been continued by Dr. P. Maresch for ten years. Discoveries of the greatest importance have been made. The city was found to have been surrounded on the land side by a double wall. The space between the walls, several rods in width, was occupied by houses, possibly the homes of the soldiers. The base of the outer wall was of stone; above it were mud bricks strengthened at intervals with courses of burned bricks. Along the outer upper edge was a parapet, protected by battlements. From the floor of the parapet small holes were bored vertically downward, so that the soldiers, without exposing themselves, might discharge their arrows at the enemy close to the base of the wall. Many of the holes are still visible. The wall was pierced with several gateways; the names “Gate of Assur,” “Gate of the Tigris,” “Gate of the Sun God” have survived. At the sides of the gateways were small chambers for the guards, and from them passageways led to the parapet above. The gates were reached by bridges which spanned the moat. Along the river side the city was protected by a high steep embankment, which was built partly of limestone, but chiefly of square bricks laid in bitumen.

The temple of Assur at the northern end of the city has been thoroughly excavated. With its outer and inner court and tower it conformed in its general plan to the older Bah temples. Several of the palaces of the early kings were discovered, but the best-preserved of the palaces was one which the excavators have called the residence of the mayor. It stood near the western edge of the city on the main street which ran from the western gate to the Tigris. It consisted of two courts surrounded by chambers. Grooves in the paved floor conducted fresh water to the kitchen, the baths and the chambers, and round tiles beneath the floor carried away the waste water to the arched city sewer and to the Tigris. To the rear of the mayor’s house was a crowded residential quarter. The streets were very narrow and winding. The houses were exceedingly small; in some of them one could not lie at full length upon the floor. Among their ruins appeared little but stone mortars and broken pottery and other essential household implements.

Near the southern end of the city a most remarkable discovery was made. About a hundred monuments, from 4 to 8 ft. high, were found standing erect. On the side of each one, near the top, was an inscription on several lines, dedicating the stone to some individual who had been of great service to the state. They were not tombstones; apparently they had been erected during the lifetime of the people whom they honored. Of the greatest interest was one which bore the name of Samsuratmat or Semiramis, the once supposed mythical queen of Nineveh. Its tr reads: “The column of Sa-an-mu-ri-mat, the palace wife of Samsi-Adad, king of the world, king of Assyria, the mother of Adad-Nirari, king of the world, king of Assyria, the . . . of Shalmaneser, king of the four regions.” The inscription not only makes Semiramis a historical character, but places her among the foremost rulers of Assyria.

The tombs of the kings and nobles were found deep in the ruins in the very center of the city. They were rectangular structures of cut stone, covered above with a rounded arch of burned bricks. In some cases the massive stone doors still turned in their sockets. The roofs of many of them had fallen in; others, which were intact, were filled with dust. From the tombs a vast amount of silver, gold and copper jewelry and stone beads and ornaments were recovered.

One of the chief temples of the city stood at a short distance without the eastern wall. Nothing but its foundations remain. However, the temple was surrounded by a park, traces of which still exist. The soil of the surrounding plain is a hard clay, incapable of supporting vegetable life. Into the clay large holes, several feet in diameter, were dug and filled with loam. Long lines of the holes may still be traced, each marking the spot where a tree, probably the date palm, stood in the temple park. A modern cemetery on the summit of the main mound is still used by the neighboring Arabs, and therefore it will likely prevent the complete excavation of this oldest of the capital cities of Assyria. See further Assyria.

SHERIFF, sher’if (Aram. שריף, tıphayyê, “judicial,” “a lawyer,” “a sheriff” [Dn 3 29]): Probably a “lawyer” or “juriat” whose business it was to decide points of law. At best, however, the tr “sheriff” is but a conjecture.

SHESHACH, shēshak (תְּשֶׁשֶׁךְ, sheshakh, as if “humiliation”; cf תְּשָׁכָה, shakhakh, “to crouch”): The general explanation is that this is “a cypheform of ‘Babel’ Babylon” which is the word given as equivalent to “Sheshach” by the Tg (Jer 25 26; 51 41; LXX omits in both passages). By the device known as Atbas (אֲתָבָס), i.e. disguising a name by substituting the last letter of the alphabet for the first, the letter next to the last for the second, etc. תְּשֶׁשֶׁךְ is substituted for תבבל, bādoll. This theory has not failed of opposition. Delitzsch holds that “Sheshach” represents Shish-Ki of an old Bab regal register, which may have stood for a part of the city of Babylon. (For a refutation of this interpretation see Schrader, KAT, 415; COT, 11, 108.) Lauth, too, takes “Sheshach” to be a Hebrewization of Sikku, a Bab district. Winckler and Sayce read Gur-ussur. Finally, Cheyne and a number of critics hold that the word has crept into the text, being “a conceit of later editors.” See further Jeremiah, 6.

SHESHAZZAR, shesh-baz’ar (מֹשֶׁשׁבַּזַּר, shēsh-ba-zar), or “בֶּשֶׁה בַזַּר, shēeshire-bazar). Sheshazzar is the Hebrew or Aramaic name of the Bab Shamsah-abu-usur, or Shamsush-ban-usur: “Oh Shamash, protect the father.” It is possible that the full name was Shamasah-ban-suri-Babil-usur, “Oh Shamash, protect the father (builder) of the seed of Babylon.” (See Zerubbabel, and compare the Bab names Ashur-ban-usur, Ban-siri, Nebi-ban-siri, Shamas-ban-apal, Shamas-apil-usur, Shamsah-ban-usur, and others in Tallequist’s Neubabylonischer Namenbuch, and the Aram. names on nos. 35, 44, 38, and 45 of Clay’s Aramäisches Dokumenten.) If this was the name of the king, there would be little doubt that Sheshazzar may have been the same person as Zerubbabel, since the former is called in Ex 5:14 the governor of Judah, and the latter is called by the same title in Hag 1:11; 2:21. More probable, however, that Sheshazzar and Zerubbabel were different persons, and that Sheshazzar was governor of Judah in the time of Cyrus and Zerubbabel in that of Darius. It is possible that Sheshazzar came to Jerusalem in the time of Cyrus and laid the foundations, and that Zerubbabel came later in the time of Darius Hystaspis and completed the building of the temple (cf Ex 2:65; 4:2; Hag 1:14).

According to Ex 1:8 Sheshazzar was the prince (Hamnas) of Judah into whose hands Cyrus put the vessels of the house of the Lord which Nebuchadnezzar had brought forth out of Jerusalem and had put in the house of his gods. It is further said in ver 11 that Sheshazzar brought these vessels with them of the captivity which he brought up from Babylon into Jerusalem. In Ex 5:14 it is said that these vessels had been delivered by Cyrus unto one whose name was Sheshazzar, whom he had made governor (pehed), and that Sheshazzar came and laid the foundations of the house of God which was in Jerusalem. See SANABBASSAR.

SHESHAI, shesh’i (שֵׁשָׁאֵי, shēshā’î), one of the sons of Anak, perhaps an old Hebronite clan name. (Sayce combines the name with Ṣuwa, יָשָׁא, the Egyptian name for the Syrian Bedouins.) The clan lived in Hebron at the time of the conquest and was expelled by Caleb (Nu 13:22, B, Ṣuwa, Ṣasa, Ά, Ṣuwa, Semei; Josh 15:14, B, Ṣuwa, Sasa, A, Ṣuwa, Sousai; Judges 1:10, B, Ṣuwa, Ṣasa, A, Gedhi, Gedhih).

SHESHA, shēsheh (שֶׁשֶׁה, šēsheh: Šēphān, Šēṭān): A Jerahmeelite whose daughter married his servant Jara (1 Ch 2:31.34.35). The genealogical list which follows embraces some very early names (cf Curtis, ICC, ed loc.).

SHEH. See Seth.

SHEETHAR, shēth’ār (שֶׁתְחָר, shēther; B and Luc., Ἀσσαρόνας, Ἀσσαρόνας, A, Ἀσσαρόν, Ἀσσαρόνας). One of the “seven princes” at the court of Ahaseurus (Est 1:14); these princes “sat first in the kingdom” and had the right of entrance to the king’s presence at any time, except when he was in the company of one of his wives. (According to Marquart, Fund., 69, Shethar comes from רְשָׁו, with which the Pers šīštāta, “joy,” is to be compared.) The word has never really been satisfactorily explained; it is presumably Pers.

SHE’THAR-BOZNAI, shē’thar-boz’ni, SHE’THAR-BOZNAI, shē’thar-boz’ni, -boz’ni, -boz’ni (םְתַח רְבֹנָי, šṭhar rō’nā, meaning uncertain): The name of a Pers (? official mentioned with Tattenai in connection with the correspondence with Darius relative to the rebuilding of the Temple (Ezr 5:3, 6; 6:12; B, Zabudavni, Satharsonu, A, Baradzi, Satharsonu, Satharsonu, Satharsonu). SHETAH, shēt’ā (שְׇתַה, šēthāh). See § 2.

SHEVA, shēva (בְּשֶׁבָ, bē’seḇ; B, Σαῦο, Sāu; A, Σαῦο, Sāu, Luc., Σαῦ, Sāu): (1) A son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah (1 Ch 2:49). (2) See Shavah.

SHEV, ZEWAH, ZEWAH, shē-ā (שֵׁה, shēh); ZEWAH, shē-ā (שֵׁה, shēh); ZEWAH, shē-ā (שֵׁה, shēh); shē (שֶׁה, shēh; or שֶׁה, shēh; or שֶׁה, shēh), “Show” (so always ARV) is simply a modernized spelling of “shew” (so always in AV and generally in ERV), and it should be carefully noted that “shew” is never pronounced “shoo,” not even in the combination “showbread”; cf “saw.” In AV “saw” as a vb. is the tr of a very large number of terms in the original. This number is reduced considerably by RV (esp. in the NT), but most of these changes are to secure uniformity of rendition, rather than to correct obscurities. The proper sense of the vb., of course, is “to cause a person to see” (Gen 12:1, etc.) or “to cause a thing to be seen” (Dt 4:35; Jgs 2:22, etc.). “Seeing,” naturally, can be taken intellectually or morally (Jer 38:21; Ps 16:11, etc.), and can even be used for “hearing” (Isa 43:9, etc.; contrast RV 1:8-9, 27). Hence “saw” can be used as a general tr for the most various phrases, as “be shewed!” for γεματίζει, γεματίζει, “come to pass” (Acts 4:22, RV “the wrought!”); “saw forth themselves” for ὁράω, ὁράω, “be active” (Mt 14:2, RV “work”); “shew” for παρειδολογεῖται, παρειδολογεῖται, “do” (Acts 7:36, RV “having wrought!”); for παρειδολογεῖται, παρειδολογεῖται, “relate” (Lk 8:39, RV “declare”); for ὅρω, ὅρω, “make clear” (2 Pet 1:14, RV “signify”), etc. In Cant 2:9 Ave (ERV) “showing himself” and ARV (ERVm) “glanceth” both miss the poetry of the original: His eyes shine in the forehead (לָיָה, liyāh, “blossom,” “sparkle”).

AV’s uses of the noun “show” usually connote appearance in contrast to reality. So Lk 20:47, “for a show” (ὑποδοθέα, ὑποδοθέα, “apparent cause,” RV “pretense”); Col 2:23, “show of wisdom” (so RV, μισθός, “worthless product”); Gal 6:12, “make a fair show” (so RV, εἰσπράξεσθαι, εἰσπράξεσθαι, “have a fair face”); Ps 39:6, “vain show” (so AV דֶּעָב, dē’āb, “image,” RVm “shadow”). However, in 2 Cor 13:1 (ἐφαντάζω, ἔφαντάζω, “spectacle” [so RV]) and in Col 2:15 (δεικνυόμαι, δεικνυόμαι, “to display” “shew” = “spectacle.”
In Isa 3 9 “the shew of their countenance” is a bad term for “their respect of persons” (so RVm for ἐκκαθάρασθε πρὸς ἐμοί). The “shewing” of the Baptist (Mt 1 20 AV; Lk 1 79 AV; Nu 4 7 IV) is of course his appearing to begin his ministry.

SHEWBREAD, shîb’rē, THE, (םִּבְרֵד), lehem ha-pa’alim, “bread of the presence”; ἡ πρόθεσις τῶν ἄρτων, ἡ πρόθεσις τὸν ἱερόν [He 9 2]; ARV shewbread. 1. The Term See Nu 15:4. The marginal reading of Ex 25 30; 33 13, RV “Presence-bread,” exactly gives the meaning of the Heb. In 2 Ch 2 4 it is spoken of as “the continual shewbread,” because it was to be before Jeh “always” (Ex 25 30).

Later Judaism has much to say as to the number and size of the loaves, more properly thin cakes, which bore this name, together with the ritualistic legislation required was that, once in every week, there should be twelve cakes of unleavened bread, each containing about four-fifths of a peck of fine flour, placed in two piles upon a pure table with frankincense beside each pile and changed every Sabbath day (Lev 24:3–5). From the description of the table upon which the flat cakes were to lie (Ex 25 23–30; 37 10–16), it held a series of golden vessels comprising dishes, spoons, flagons and bowls. As it is unlikely that empty cups were set before Jeh—they being described as “the vessels which were upon the table”—we may conclude that the table held presentation offerings of “grain and wine and oil,” the three chief products of the land (Dt 7 13). The “dishes” were probably the salvers on which the thin cakes were piled, six on each. The “dishes” would contain wine, and the bowls (made with spouts, “to pour withal”), the oil, while the “spoons” held the frankincense, which was burned as a memorial, “even an offering made by fire unto Jeh.” The cakes themselves were eaten by the priests on every Sabbath day, as being among the “most holy” sacrifices. Each of the synagogists refers to the incident of David and his companions having eaten of the shewbread (καὶ ἔφαγον τὰς πρόθεσιν) as told in 1 S 21 4–6 (Mt 12:11; Mk 2:26; Lk 6 4).

At such times as the removal of the tabernacle took place, the separate appointments of the table of incense were not parted from it, but were carried with it—dishes, Journeyings spoons, bowls, and cups (Nu 4 7). These, like other furniture, were borne by the Kohathite Levites, but a few articles of lighter weight were in the personal care of the high priest. These comprised the oil for the candlestick, the sweet incense, the holy oil of consecration, and the meal-offering and the continual burnt-offering (Nu 4 7 8–16). Small quantities of these alone would be borne from place to place, such as would be needed with the least delay to refurbish the vessels of the sanctuary on every re erection of the tent of meeting.

With this view of the nature, we have a natural and adequate sense of the meanings and importance of the shewbread, in the economy of the temple ritual and service. It was a continual reminder to the worshippers of the truth that man does not live by bread alone, emphasized by the fact that these most holy offerings were afterward eaten. It was the OT version of the prayer, “Give us this day our daily bread”; and in the fact that the holy table was never for a moment left without some loaves lying on it, we have the symbol of man’s continu- ing and unbroken dependence upon God. Even during the travels of the table of shewbread with the tabernacle, the “continual shewbread” was required to be in its place thereon (Nu 4 7).

It has been usual to say that “frankincense in golden urns stood beside the twelve loaves” (EB, IV, col. 4212); but this is a mere repetition of a Jewish legend, as spoons were the recognized holders of the frankincense (cf. burnt-offering of Nu 7 14). Such spoons formed a part of the equipment of the shewbread table, and on the removal of the week-old cakes the spoons were carried forth and the frankincense in them burned on the great altar on the Sabbath day. If this were done while the grain and wine and oil were being consumed, it would derive additional significance, as betokening the gratitude andadoration of the representative recipients of the bounties of Nature, just as the daily burning of incense in the holy place betokened the worship and adoration of the praying multitudes without the temple (Lk 1 10). SHEWBREAD, TABLE OF, (םִּבְרֵד), shūbdān [Ex 25 25–30, etc]; ἡ πρόθεσις καὶ ἡ πρόθεσις τῶν ἄρτων, ἡ πρόθεσις καὶ ἡ πρόθεσις τὸν ἱερόν [He 9 2]; For construction, see TABERNACLE; TEMPLE. A rude representation of the table is given on the Arch of Titus in Rome. The bas-relief was measured by Professor Boni in 1905, and the height and width of the represented tables were found to be 48 cms., or nearly 19 in. The table represented is, of course, that of Herod’s temple, taken at the fall of Jerusalem in 70 AD. See the author’s art. “The Temple Spoils” in PEFS, 1906, 306 ff.

The table of shewbread is to be distinguished from the altar of incense. It has become the fashion of the newer criticism to deny the existence of the altar of incense in preexilic times, and to explain the allusion to it in 1 K 6 20 as the table of shewbread (so in Ezk 41 22). The other references (1 K 6 22; 7 48; 9 25) are dismissed as interpolations. The procedure is radically vicious. The table of shewbread is not an “altar,” though the altar is once spoken of as a “table” (Ezk 41 22). There was only one altar of incense (1 K 6 20), but in 2 Ch 4 8 ten tables of shewbread. See SHEWBREAD.

SHIBAH, shīb’a (םִּבְרֵד), shib’ith, “seven”; ἡ ἀρτοφέρησις, ἡ ἀρτοφέρησις [He 9 2]; shibbōleth, “test of speech” applied by the men of Gilead to the Ephraimites, who wished to cross the Jordan, after defeat. If they pronounced the word shibbōleth, their dialectic variety of speech betrayed them (Jgs 12 6). The word probably has the sound of “stream” or “flood” (cf Ps 69 2).

SHIBMAH, shīb’ma (םִּבְרֵד), shibmāh). See Sibmah.

SHICRON, shīk’rōn (םִּבְרֵד), shikkōrōn). See Shikkeron.

SHIELD, shēl. See ARMOR, IV, 1.

SHIGGAION, shi-gā’yon, shi-gō’n (םִּבְרֵד), shig-gāyōn): Occurs in the title of Ps 7, and in the pl., in the verse introducing Habakkuk’s prayer (Hab 3 1). Derived from a vb. meaning “to wander,” it is generally taken to mean a dishyramb, or rhapsody.
This is not supported by the Gr VSS, but they are evidently quite at a loss. See Psalms, Book of.

SHIHON, shih’hon (שִׁוהָן, shi’m). See Shion.

SHIHOR, shih’hor (שִׁהוֹר, shih’hor), also written without "r" in Heb and incorrectly "Sihor" in Eng. A stream of water mentioned in connection with Egypt. Joshua 13:3 speaks of the "Sihor, which is before Egypt," a stream which commentators have thought to be "the brook of Egypt," the stream which separated Egypt from Pals, now called Wady el-Arish. Jeremiah 2:18 AV says, "Do you take the safety of Egypt, to drink the waters of Sihor?" Commentators have thought Shihor in this case to be a name for the Nile. Both interpretations cannot be correct. Whatever the name S. means, at least it did not denote a movable river. It must be the same stream in both these passages, and no identification of the stream can be correct that does not satisfy both of them. Professor Naville has recently shown conclusively (Proc. Soc. Bib. Arch., January, 1913) that neither interpretation is strictly correct, and has made clear the Bib. references to S. In the northeasternmost province of ancient Egypt, Khentahi ("Fronting on the East"), was a canal, a fresh-water stream drawn off from the Nile, called in the neighbors' language "the Hapyor Canal" (the -t- is an Egypt fem. ending). There have been many changes in the branches and canals from the Nile in the Delta, and this one with many others has been lost altogether; but there is a tradition among the Bedouin of Wady el-Arish, or this day that once a branch of the Nile came over to that point. This Shi-h-Hor, "Stream of Horus," makes perfectly clear and harmonious the different references of Scripture to S. It was "before Egypt," as Josh describes it, and it was the first sweet water of Egypt which the traveler from Pals in those days was able to obtain, as the words of Jeremiah indicate. "To drink the waters of S." meant to reach the supply of the fresh water of the Nile at the edge of the desert. The two other references to S. (1 Ch 13:5; Is 23:3) are perfectly satisfied by this identification. The "seed of S." (Isa 23:3 AV) would be grains from Egypt by way of the Sihor.

SHIHOR-LIBNATH, shih’hor-lib’nat (שִׁהוֹר לִבְנָת, shih’hor-lib’nat). A place named on the boundary of Asher (Josh 19:26). It seems to mark with Carmel the western limit, and may have been on the S. of that mountain. Pesh, Syr, and Ono. take this as two distinct names attaching to cities in this region. So far, however, no trace of either name has been found in the course of very careful exploration. More probably Shihor was the name of a river, "Libnath" distinguishing it from the Nile, which was called Shihor of Egypt. It may have been called Shihor because, like the Nile, it contained crocodiles. The boundary of Asher included Dor (Tantanah), so the river may be sought S. of that town. Crocodiles are said still to be found in the Kishon; but this river runs N. of Carmel. The Crocodedon of Ploemcy (V. xxv.5; xvi.2) and Piny (v.19), which the latter makes the southern boundary of Phoenix, may possibly be Nahr ez-Zerka, which enters the sea about 5 miles S. of Tantur. Here also it is said the crocodile is sometimes seen. Perhaps therefore we may identify this stream with Shihor-libnath.

SHIKKERON, shik’ker-on (שִׁקְקְרֶן, shik’ker’en). AV Shicoron: A place mentioned in Josh 15:11 as being on the northern border of Judah, between Ekron and Beer-sheba, and beyond, toward the sea. The site is unknown, but Rev. C. Hauer (PEFS, 1907, 259) suggests Tell es-Sellaha, N.W. of Akir, remarking that if this were the site the boundary would follow a natural course over the mountain to Beer-sheba.

SHILHI, shil’hi (שִׁלחִי, shilhi). Father of Jehovah's mother (1 K 22:42=2 Ch 20:31; BA in 2 Ch, Zeal, Solel, B in 1 K, Zeal, Semeri, A in 1 K, Zal, Shilh, Solel, Luke, etc., in both, Zal, Shile, Semei). C. H. W. Charnie (EB, art. "Shilhi") ventures the supposition that "Shilhi" is a misreading for "Shihim" (Josh 15:32), and is therefore the name of a place rather than that of a person; he holds it to be the name of the birthplace of Azubah, the king's mother.

SHILHIM, shil’him (שִׁלחִים, shilhim) [Josh 15:32]: See Sharaaim. (2) Possibly Azubah the mother of Jehovah, who is called "the daughter of Shilhi" (1 K 22:42; 2 Ch 20:31), was a native of Shilhim.

SHILLEM, shil’em, SHILLEMITEs, shil’em-its (שִׁלֶלֶם, shil’em, shi-lem’it, ka-shilemt): Shilleh is found in Gen 46:24, a son of Naphtali; Shillems, his descendants, are mentioned in Nu 26:49; Shallum (q.v.) is found in 1 Ch 7:13.

SHILOH, shil’oh (שִׂלוֹה, shiloh): The prophecy in Gen 49:10, "The scepter shall not depart from Judah; ... until Shiloh come," etc., has been the subject of very diverse interpretations. RV gives as alternative renderings, "Till he come to Shiloh having the obedience of the peoples' Or, acc. to Syr, 'Till he come whose it is, etc." (1) From the earliest times the passage has been regarded as Messianic, but the rendering in the text, which takes "Shiloh" as a proper name, bearing a meaning such as "peaceful" (of Isa 9:6, "Prince of Peace"), labors under the difficulty that Shiloh is not found elsewhere as a personal name in the OT, nor is it easy to extract from it the meaning desired. Further, the word was not personally applied to the Messiah in any of the ancient VSS, which rather assume a different reading (see below). Apart from a purely fanciful passage in the Talm (cf Driver, Gen, 413), this application does not occur earlier than the version of Seba Münster in the 16th cent. (1584).

(2) The rendering, "Till he come to Shiloh," where Shiloh is taken as the name of a place, not a person, is plausible, but is felt to yield no suitable sense in the context. It is, therefore, now also set aside by most recent scholars. (3) The 3rd rendering, which regards Shiloh as representing the Heb shiloh - (sheloth) = Sheloh, from כָּעָשֶׁר (k’as’er), "a shivah, "whose [it is]," has in its favor the fact that this is evidently the reading presupposed in the LXX, the Pesh, and the Jewish Tgs, and seems to be alluded to in Ecc 21:27, "until he come whose right it is." In this view the passage has still a Messianic reference, though critics argue that it must then be regarded as late in origin. Other interpretations need not detain us. See for details the full discussion in Driver's "Ezekiel's Christology," 1:42 ff, ET, the comms. of Delitzsch, Driver, and Skinner, Gen (esp. Excursus II in Driver), and the arts. in the various Bible dict.; see also Prophecy.

SHIMEAM, shim'e-am. See Shimeah.

SHIMEATHITES, shim'bath-its (שִׁמֵּא, shimm'āth), or גַּל, shimm'āth; LXX in 2 K, "Tómos, Tomonath, B in 2 Ch, Saúd, Samod, A, Saúd, Samad, Luc., Saúd, Samad): Father of Jozacar (2 K 21 22), one of the murderers of Joash, king of Judah. According to 2 Ch 24 26 Shimeam is an Ammonites and the mother, not the father, of Jozacar. Many textual emendations have been suggested (many HDB, art. "Shimeath"), but they are unnecessary, as the Chronicler's revised version of the incident in K was a deliberate one. The Chronicler was a sturdy opponent of intermarriage, and in the story of the assassination of King Joash he saw an opportunity to strike a blow against the hated practices. In the original account, the two conspirators are given as "Jozakar the son of גַּל [shimm'āth], and Jehozabad the son of יָוֶן [shemen]." The two names are both masc.; but the final א of the former looked to the Chronicler like the fem. ending and offered him his opportunity. In his account, the one of the two murderers (dastardly villains, even though the king had merited death) was "the son of גַּל [shimm'āth], the Ammonite," and the other was "the son of יָוֶן [shimm'ath], the Moabite" (cf Torrey, Ezra Studies, 212).

SHIMEATHITES, shim'bath-its (שִׁמֵּא, shimm'āth); BA, Saúd, Samod, Samathim, Luc., Saúd, Samathim: A sub-division of the tribe of Caleb (1 Ch 2 55). In the three families mentioned in this passage Jerome saw three distinct classes of religious functionaries: Vulg concutes atque resonantes et in tabernaculis commorantes. The Tg has a similar explanation, except that the "Suceathytes" are those "covered" with a spirit of prophecy. Beissner (Handbuch zum AT) accepts Jerome's explanation, except that he regards the first class as gate-keepers (Aram, דָּמָּה, t̄irāh, a technical term for sacred music-making, גַּל, shimm'āth, the Halachah or sacred tradition. Buhl (HWB) derives Shimeathites and Simeathites from unknown places. Keil interprets as descendants from the unknown Shemeth (cf Curtis, ICC). The passage is hopelessly obscure. Horace A. Wolf

SHIMEI, shim'ē (םִימֵא, shim'ē), possibly "hear me [El]", or "(Jah)"; שֵׁמֵי, Semei, Seme, Sime, Shim; Shim'on; Sime, Sime'on; Simeathites, Shim'ites. A frequent occurrence throughout the OT records, sometimes varying slightly in form in EV. AV has "Shimi" in Ex 6 17; "Shimhi" in 1 Ch 8 21; "Shimeah" in 2 S 21 21. RV has "Shimeites" in Zec 12 13, where AV has "Shimeathites". Shimi in Ex 6 13 has "Shema" in 1 Ch 13 21 for the "Shime" of ver 21. In all others of the many occurrences in AV and RV the form is "Shimei."

(1) A family name among the Levites before and after the exile, at least five of whom bore it: (a) Son of Gerahon and grandson of Levi (Ex 6 17; Nu 3 18; 1 Ch 6 17; 23 7.10). The text of 1 Ch 6 and 23 is corrupt, making difficult the tracing of the various genealogies and the identification of the several Shimees. Evidently that of 23 7 is more for one of the four sons of Ladan or Libni, whose names are given in the preceding verse. (b) An ancestor of Asaph the musician (1 Ch 6 42), possibly the same as (a) above, Jahath the son of Sh. (of 23 10) being by a copyist's error transposed to 23 7. (c) The father of the Merarite branch of the Levites (1 Ch 6 29). (d) One of the 288 trained singers in the service of the sanctuary under Asaph (1 Ch 25 17). (e) One of the Levites who helped to cleanse the Temple in Hezekiah's reformation (2 Ch 29 14). He was a descendant of Heman the musician. Hezekiah afterward appointed him with Conaniah to have chief oversight of "the oblations and the tithes and the dedicated things" which were brought into the chambers of Jeh's house prepared for them (2 Ch 31 11.12). (f) A Levite who under Ezra put away his foreign wife (Ezr 10 23), "Semeic" in 1 Esd 9 23.

(2) The best-known Bible character of this name is the Benjamite, of the family of Saul (2 S 16 5-12; 19 16-20; 1 K 2 8.9.36-46), who met David at Bahurim as he was fleeing from Absalom, and in bitter and cowardly fashion cursed and attacked the hard-pressed king. Apparently David's flight to the wilds led through a narrow ravine, on one side of which, a king in his rage climbed up the ridge above, stood Shimeath and in safety as he cast stones at David and his men, cursing as he threw (2 S 16 5.6). His hatred of David who had displaced his royal kinsman Saul had smouldered long in his mean heart; and now the flame bursts out, as the aged and apparently helpless king flees before his own son. S. seizes the long-coveted opportunity to pour out the acid hate of his heart. But when David's faithful companion would have the ravine to make quick work of S., the noble king forbade him with the remarkable words: "Behold, my son, who came forth from my bowels, seeketh my life: how much more may this Benjamite now do it? let him alone, and let him curse; for Jeh hath hidden him. It may be that Jeh ... will require me good for his cursing" (2 S 16 11.12). After Absalom's overthrow, as the king was returning victorious and vindicated, S. met him at the Jordan with most abject confession and with vows of allegiance (2 S 19 16-23).

The king spared his life; but shortly before his death charged his son Solomon to see that due punishment should come to Shime for his sins: "Thou shalt bring his bones down from his sepulcher to the land of Ab, to the land of his fathers" (1 K 2 8-9). When he came to the throne Solomon summoned Shimeathite and Shimeathite who fled in Jerus., as he desired that he be come and from which he must not go out on pain of death (1 K 2 36-38). Feeding secure after some years, Shimei left his home in Jerus to recapture some escaped slaves (vs 39-41), and in consequence he was promptly dispatched by that gruesome avenger of blood, the royal executioner, "Be stoned to death", "fell upon him," as he had upon Adonijah and Joab, "so that he died" (ver 40).

(3) Another Benjamite, mentioned with Rei as an officer in the king's bodyguard, who was faithful to David in the rebellion of Adonijah (1 K 4 5). Jos reads Rei as a common noun, describing S. as "the friend of David." He is to be identified with the son of Elah (1 K 4 18), whom Solomon, probably because of his fidelity, named as one of the 12 chief commissary officers appointed over all Israel, "who provided victuals for the king and his household."

(4) A man of some prominence in the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 2), whose home was in Ajalon, where he was a "head of fathers' houses" (ver 13), but his descendants lived in Jerus. (ver 28). In AV he is called "Shimhi"; in ver 13 he is called "Shema."

(5) Another Benjamite, an ancestor of Mordecai (Est 2 5), "Semeias" in AD 41 2. (6) A brother of David (2 S 21 21; AV "Shimeah"); in 1 S 18 9 he is called "Shammah"; cf "Shimeathite; Shim'ma."

(7) A man of Judah, called "the Ramathite," who was "over the vineyard" in David's reign (1 Ch 27 27).

(8) A Simeonite living in the time of David (1 Ch 4 26.27), whose chief claim to distinction was that he was father of 10 sons and 6 daughters. The descendants of such a numerous progeny, not being able to maintain themselves in their ancestral home in Beer-sheba, in the days of Hezekiah fell upon Gerar, and dispossessed "the sons of Ham" (ver 20 LXX), and upon Mt. Seir, driving out the Amalekites (43).

(9) A man of Reuben, son of Gog (1 Ch 5 4).

(10) (11) Two men of "Israel," i.e., not priests or Levites, one of the sons of Hasenuah (Est 10 33), the other "of the sons of Bani" (10 35), who put away their foreign wives at Ezra's command. In 1 Esd called respectively "Seme" (9 35) and "Semeath" (9 34).

(12) A brother of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 19).

The Shimeathites were descendants of Shimei, grandson of Levi; cf (1) (a) above (Nu 3 21; Zec 12 13).

SHIMEON, shim'ōn (םֵימֵון, shim'ōn; else where "Simeon"): One of the sons of Harim who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 31; BA, Zechar, Semach, Luc, Zechar, Semach; Simeath = 1 Esd 9 32, "Simon Chosamuss").

SHIMHI, shim'hī. See SHIMEI.

SHIMI, shim'i, sh'īm, SHIMITES, sh'mîts. See SHIMEI.

SHIMMA, shim'a. See SHAMMAR.

SHIMON, shim'ōn (םים, shim'ōn; B, Simeon, Sem'mih, A, Zechar, Sem'meth, Luc, Simeath, Sam't): A name in the Judahite genealogy (1 Ch 4 20).

SHIRMATH, shir'math (םימה, shir'math; Simeath; Semar'ath, Samar'ath): The last of nine sons of Shime of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 21).

SHIRMI, shir'mi (שימר, shir'mi; various forms in LXX): There are four Hebrews mentioned in the Bible who bear this name:

(1) A Simeonite, a son of Shemaiah and father of Jediah, a chief of his tribe (1 Ch 4 37).

(2) The father of Jediael, a bodyguard of King David (1 Ch 1 45).

(3) A son of Hoshah, a Levite. He was appointed by David to be doorkeeper in the house of the Lord. He was made chief of the tribe, although not the firstborn of his family (1 Ch 26 10).
(4) One of the sons of Elizaphan, a Levite. He assisted in purifying the temple in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29:13).

S. L. UMBACH

SHIMRITH, shim'riθ (םירית, shimrith, "guard," fem.): A Moabitess, the mother of Jehozabad, one of those that conspired against King Joash (2 Ch 24:26). Elsewhere (2 K 12:21) Jehozabad is described as the son of Shomer (q.v.), the same name without the fem. ending.

SHIMRON, shim'ron (םירון, shimron), "watch"): The 4th son of Issacchar (Gen 46:13; Nu 26:24; 1 Ch 7:1), and ancestor of the Shimronites (Nu 26:24).

SHIMRON-MERON, shim'ron-mə'ron (םירתון, shimron mariθ; שים, Shimón . . . מירון, Shimón . . .Mariθ, Shimón . . . Mārōn; שים, Shimôn . . . Ma'rōn . . . Phasgi . . . Marōn): A royal city of the Canaanites, the king of which was slain by Joshua (12:20). Here the name is followed by that of Adashaph, which also follows the name of Shimron in 11:1. This suggests that the two are in reality one, and that Shimron-meron may only be the full name. A royal Can. city, Samimuruna, is mentioned in the inscriptions of Senacherib, Esarhaddon and Assur-bani-pal, which with Schrader (KAT, 163) would identify with this, and thinks it may now be represented by es-Semearīyeh. See Shimron.

SHIMSHAI, shîm'shî, shîm'shâ'î (שימשאי, shimshai): B, Šamōd, Sumōd, Smōd, A, Šamūd, Sumōd, and other forms): A town whose king was tributary to Jabin king of Hazor, and who joined in the attempt to resist the invasion under Joshua (Josh 11:1). It was in the territory allotted to Zebulun (19:15). No sure identification is possible. Other Eq. and Talm both omit the r from the name; and Neubauer would identify it with Simonías (Vita, 24), the Simonia of the Talm, which is now represented by Semmānīyeh, a village about 3 miles W. of Nazareth, on the edge of the plain (Geog. du Talm). Be'īl Lāmīn, named by Jos along with it, is a short distance to the N.W. Es-Semearīyeh, about 3 miles N. of Acre, has also been suggested; but it is perhaps too far to the W.

1. Identity
2. Possible Babylonian Form of the Name
3. Sumerian Equivalents

The principal difficulty lies in 2. Possible the fact that what might be regarded Babylonian as the non-dialectical form Šinār Form (which would alone furnish a satisfactory basis of comparison, if not found, and would, if existent, apply to the southern portion of Babylonia. The northern tract was called Akkad, after the name of its capital city (see ACCAN). The Gr form Šēn(n)āwr shows that, at the time the LXX tr was made, there was no tradition that the 'qēn was guttural, as the supposed Bab forms would lead us to expect. As the Bib. form Šinār indicates the whole of Babylonia, it corresponds with the native (Sumerian) Šingu-Ura, rendered "Sumer and Akkad," from which, by changing K into Š and Š into S (found in Sumerian), Šinār may have been derived, but this explanation is not free from difficulties.

This twofold designation, Šingu-Ura, is that which is commonly used in the inscriptions of the earlier kings, though it cannot, then have indicated always the whole country, but only such parts of it as acknowledged their overlordship. Later Equivalents er on the corresponding term seems to have been Kūnū ("the territory of the Akkadians") to all appearance a term introduced by the Kassite rulers). Nabonassar and his successors seem to have-contented themselves with the title "king of Babylon," rule in the city implying also the dominion over the whole SHINAB, shîn'âb (שִׁנַּב, shinâb), Sum.  nâb, shinâr, سَنَب, Sennâr; Senndâr): King of Admah (q.v.). He is mentioned with Shemeber, king of Zeboiim; he was attacked by Chedorlaomer and his allies (Gen 14:2). The reading is very uncertain. If the incident narrated is founded on fact, Shinab may be identical with Sanib, an Ammonite king in the time of Tiglath-pileser III (so Fr. Delitzsch, Wo lag der Paradies 254); or the name may be equated by the Assyrian Shennazzar (cf. She'nnazzar), and Shemba, with the Assyrian Shams-abbâl (Sayce, Epexege. T. VII, 463). Jewish exegesis gives a sinister explanation of all four names (ver 2). The Mishr. (Br. Rab. 42) explains Shinab as שִׁנֶב כְּבָּד, shônâb kâbâd, "one who draws money [wherever he can]." It is of interest to note that the names fall into two alliterative pairs and that each king's name contains exactly as many letters as his city. On the whole, however, the list leaves an impression of artificiality; as the names are not repeated in ver 8, it is highly probable that they are later additions to the text.

country. Often, however, the equivalent term for Babylonia is Ešu, probably an abbreviation of Šedu, and here standing for the land belonging to that sacred city—"the good city," a type of Paradise, Babylonia being, in fact, situated upon the Edinu, or "plain" (see Eden).

All these comparisons tend to show that the Bab equivalent of Shinar is not any of the above, and as yet has not, in fact, been found. This is also implied by the fact, that Sen'ar was used in Syr for the country around Bagdad, and annually included may be supposed) the plain upon which the ruins of Babylon stand. Sen'ar was therefore in all probability an ancient Bab designation of the tract, now lost, but regarded by the Hebrews as synonymous with Babylon.

From the inscriptions it would seem that the primitive language of Shinar was not Semitic, but the agglutinative idiom now named

5. Primitive Sumerian—a tongue long regarded as Tongue of Turanian, and having, it is thought, Turanian Chinese affinities, is, the "language" of Turkish an-ma'ak (a-ana), "mother," Turkish ana; abba, 'old man,' Turkish baba, "father"; bâh, "house," Turkish ev, etc. The Chinese affinities seem less close, but the following may be quoted: ak(y), "father." Chinese ye (Amoy iâ); ge, "night," Chinese ye; gu, "to speak," Chinese yâ; shu, "hand," Chinese shêu; kin, "business," Chinese kâng, "work"; etc. Chinese and Turkish, however, have had time to pass through many changes since Sumerian was current in Shinar. Many words of the Sumerian language were borrowed by the Sem Babylonians, and a few (like kâkel, "temple," Sem bâgal, "great house") entered the other Sem languages.

Häfley's contention that Sumerian is simply "an idiom" for the expression of Sem Bab, seems to be untenable, as they differ not only in words, but also in grammar; moreover, Sumerian had a dialect, called by the natives "woman's tongue." For the rest, the principal differences between Sumerian and Sem Bab are:

(1) a different opposition of nouns instead of prepositions;
(2) verbs with long strings of particles and affixes to denote persons and regiments, instead of a prefix and a suffix;
(3) compound words, both nouns and verbs, are common instead of being exceedingly rare; Sumerian seems to have borrowed several words from Sem Bab.

Not only the language, but also the sculptures which they have left, point to the probability that the earlier inhabitants of Shinar belonged to a different race from the Sem. The Semites of Babylonia, Sculptures, etc.

7. Testimony of the later The Semites of Babylonia, etc.

8. Sumerians Probably Preceded Semites in Shinar

9. State of Shinar (1) Sippar or Sippar-Auru (Ya' rura), possibly including Accad (Gen 10 10), some distance S.W. of Bagdad. It is the modern 'Abu-kabbah, "father of grain." Though it seems to have fallen early under the dominion of the Semites, it was at first Sumerian, as its native name, Zimhir, and the ideographic writing thereof show. According to Berossus, who calls it Panta-Pantilón, one of its earliest kings was Amelon or Amilarius, who reigned 13 sær, or 45,800 years. Later on came Evedereshesh (Nusku), the native Eunu-dur-an-ki, renowned as a priest favored by the gods. His descendants, if of pure race, inherited the divine grace which he enjoyed. It is said to have been in Sippara (Sippar) that Ut-napisim, the Bab Noah, buried the records before entering the ark.

(2) About 18 miles N. of Babylon lay Kîš, now Ohtime—a foundation which seems to have preceded Babylon as the capital of Shinar. Its early name, Assur-Bau, is said to have been the wife of a wine-merchant and to have reigned 100 years.

(3) Babylon, for which see BABEL; BABYLON. As one of its early kings, Berosus mentions Alorus, "the shepherd of the people," as having reigned for 10 sær, or 36,000 years. The state of Babylon probably included Cuthah (Tel Ibrahim), which once had kings of its own, and possessed a special legend of the Creation. Belonging to Babylon, also, was the renowned city Borsippa, now Birs, or the Birs Nimroud, the traditional site of the Tower of Babel (see BABEL, TOWER OF).

(4) Some distance S.E. of Babylon lay Nippur or Niffer, now Niffer (Noufar), identified by the rabbis with the 'Calneh' of Gen 10 9. It was a place of considerable importance from the beginning of the worship of Enlil and Ninlil, later, also, of their son Ninip and his spouse (see Calneh). The American excavations on this site have thrown a flood of light upon almost every branch of Assyriological research.

(5) Adab, now called Bismaya, the city of Mah, the goddess of reproduction. One of the earliest rulers of Adab was seemingly called Lugal-dalu, of whom a fine statue, discovered by the American explorers, exists. It was apparently renowned as a necropolis.

(6) S. and a little W. of Adab was Šurrupak, now Fara. This was the birthplace of the Bab Noah, Ut-napisim, son of Opames (Unbaru-Talu), a Chaldæan of Lachish. The coming of the Flood was revealed to Ut-napisim here.

(7) Practically E. of Fara lay Umma or Giših (or Gišuh), now Jochha. This city was apparently of considerable importance, and the traditional site of Lugalzaggis.

(8) S. of Fara lay Unuga, Sem Uruk, the Bib. Erech (q.v.), now Warka. Its most celebrated king, after Gilgamesh, was Lugal-aggisi, one of the opponents of the rulers of Lagāš.

(9) Some distance E. of Warka was the territory of Lagāš, now Tel-fah—"a little state, rather inaccessible, but of considerable importance to the antiquarian, which is a testimonial to the advance in civilization which it had made. Its kings and viceroys were among the most renowned, though apparently unknown outside their own domains. The most celebrated were the reformer Ur-Nina-gina and viceroy Gudea, to whom many erections in the city were due. (See Gudea’s remarkable statue in the Louvre.)

(10) Somewhat to the S.E. of Waraka lay Larsa, the “Ellasar” of Gen 14 1 (q.v.). This center of learning maintained its independence even after the other states had been absorbed by Amurru and his dynasty into the Bab empire.

(11) To the S.E. of Waraka and Senaga lies the site of the ancient Ur of the Chaldees (q.v.). This was given in 15; Henry said (p. 43, 200, and in whose time the Musurus Oannes, or Annedotus, arose out of the Pers Gulf. In Sumerian the word for “king” is usually a type of the tree of life songs. The later kings of Babylon sometimes bore the title “king of Eridu,” as though rulers of the domain of Paradise.

(13) The Land of the Sea (that bordering on the Pers Gulf), in which, seemingly, the Chaldeans afterward settled, seems to have played an important part in the early history of Shinar. Berosus speaks of its king Ammenon, who reigned 12 sari, or 43,200 years, and in whose time the Musurus Oannes, or Annedotus, arose out of the Pers Gulf. In Sumerian the word for “king” is usually a type of the tree of life songs.

(14) Of the Ur lay Eridu, or, in full, Gubern, “the good city,” wherein, apparently, lay the earthly Paradise. This is identified with the present Abu-shahrein, and was the seat of Ea or Enki, god of the sea and of fertilizing streams. According to the tradition, it was there that the “dark vine grew,” a type seemingly of the tree of life songs. The later kings of Babylon sometimes bore the title “king of Eridu,” as though rulers of the domain of Paradise.

(15) Upû or Upia, the Gr Opis, apparently obtained renown at a very early date, its kings being given in the great chronological list before those of Kish.

(16) Other well-known cities, possibly state-capitals, were Larak, Gr Laranne; Amarda, one of the centers of the worship of Nergal; Aminana, a province E. of the present Bagdad; Dilmu, now Nuru, Ennigi, and Kabara, seemingly centers of the worship of Hadad; Tilman, at the head of the Pers Gulf, and including the island of Bahrein; the province of Saba; Sebe or Bagdadu, possibly the modern Bagdad; and several others.

Whether the country was in the same seemingly unscarred-for state, as anciently as at present is unknown; but one cannot help admiring the courage of the original immigrants into such a district, for example, as that of Lagash. This, which belongs to the land of Shinar, is thus described:

10. Shinar and Its Climate

The southern region, is very inaccessible on account of the watercourses and marshes. Like the whole of Shinar in general, it is more or less dried up in summer, and unhealthy for Europeans. The alterations in the waterways, owing to changes in the irrigation-dams, must then, as now, have hindered communication. Sharp cold, with frost, succeeds the heat of summer, and from time to time sand-storms sweep across the plain. Notwithstanding the destruction sometimes wrought, the floods were always welcomed in consequence of the fruitfulness which followed, and which was such as to make Babylonia one of the most fertile tracts known.

The reference to the Sumerian sculptures in (7) above will have shown that the inhabitants of the Shinar peninsula seem to have had a certain order and of some antiquity, even at the time when it first presents itself to our notice. It is true that many specimens are crude and uncurious, but this is probably due to the sculptors having been, often enough, the slaves of their material. Their stones were frequently more or less pebble-shaped, and they had neither the skill nor the tools to reduce them to better proportions—moreover, reduction of bulk would have meant a diminution of their importance. The broad, squat figures which they produced, however, gave them bad models for their bas-reliefs, and it was long ere this defect was removed, notwithstanding the superintendents of the old lists were produced by their seal-engravers during and after the 4th millennium BC.

But in all probability special renown will always be attached to the non-Semitic inhabitants of Shinar as the inventors, or at least the

12. First to earliest users known to us, of the cuneiform script, is that known as the Sumerian type. This, as we may see, was employed in Western Asia that the system which they introduced was cumbersome and imperfect, but they knew of nothing simpler, and modern Chaldeans, with which their script has been compared, is far less practical. Briefly, the system may be described as syllabic for the prefixes and suffixes, and ideographical for the roots. To show this the following transcribed example will probably suffice:

E nu-DU URU nu-DIM. A house was not built, a city was not constructed;

URU nu-DIM ADAM nu-mn-MA. A city was not constructed, a community had not formed;

ABZU nu-DU GURDUUGA nu-DIM. The abyss was not built, Eridu was not constructed;

AZAGA DINGIRena KI-DURA-bi nu-DIM. The holy gods of the gods, its seat was not constructed;

SU-nUNIN KUBURAGA ABBAGA. The whole of the lands was sea.

The nominal and verbal roots of the above extract from the bilingual account of the Creation are in capitals, and the pronominal prefixes and suffixes, with a couple of lengthening and prefixing of the nouns, are used. Such form and pronunciation of the nouns, in small letters. This will not only give an idea of the poetical form of the Sumerian legend of the Creation by Merodach and Arru, but also show how short and concise, as a language, was the speech of Shinar, before Sem supremacy.

SHINE, shin: The Heb words ‘āhāl, ‘ōr, hādāl, zāhar, zāur, yāḇāh, nāḇāth, ‘ēḇshath and kārān are all derivations of the root shin: “shine.” All indicate either the direct or indirect diffusion of beams of light. In a direct and literal sense the word “shine” is used of the heavenly bodies, or of candles, and fire (Job 18 5; 26 5 AV; 29 3; 31 20; 2 K 3 22). In a figurative sense it is used of reflected light which increases in any sense (Ex 34 29 f.35; Isa 60 1; Ezk 43 2; Dn 12 3). God as the sun of righteousness is thus depicted in Ps 50 2. The NT words aistropiō, apraxo, lumnō and phainō are all the same. Thus literally it is said of the lighting that it shines (Mt 24 27; Lk 21 24; 1 Th 5 23). It is also applied to the life of faith or to men prominent in the kingdom of God (Mt 5 16; Jn 8 35; 2 Cor 4 6; Phil 2 15; 2 Pet 1 19); to the glory of God (Lk 2 9); to angelic appearances (Lk 24 4; Acts 12 7); or to Christ as He appeared to John on Patmos (Rev 1 10).

In a direct and literal sense the word “shine” is used of the heavenly bodies, or of candles, and fire (Job 18 5; 26 5 AV; 29 3; 31 20; 2 K 3 22). In a figurative sense it is used of reflected light which increases in any sense (Ex 34 29 f.35; Isa 60 1; Ezk 43 2; Dn 12 3). God as the sun of righteousness is thus depicted in Ps 50 2. The NT words aistropiō, apraxo, lumnō and phainō are all the same. Thus literally it is said of the lighting that it shines (Mt 24 27; Lk 21 24; 1 Th 5 23). It is also applied to the life of faith or to men prominent in the kingdom of God (Mt 5 16; Jn 8 35; 2 Cor 4 6; Phil 2 15; 2 Pet 1 19); to the glory of God (Lk 2 9); to angelic appearances (Lk 24 4; Acts 12 7); or to Christ as He appeared to John on Patmos (Rev 1 10).

H. E. DOSEK
The Hebrews and the Sea.—The Hebrews were a pastoral and agricultural people, and had no inducements to follow a seafaring life. They were possessed of a considerable seaboards along the Mediterranean, but the charm of their coast gave little encouragement to navigation. The coast of the land of Israel from Carmel southward had no bays and no estuaries or river-mouths to offer shelter from storm or to be havens of ships. Solomon landed his timber and other materials for the Temple at Joppa, and tradition has handed down what is called “Solomon’s Harbor” there. The builders of the second temple also got timber from Lebanon and conveyed it to Joppa. It was Simon Maccabaeus, however, who built its harbor, and the harbor at Joppa was “the first and only harbor of the Jews” (G. A. Smith, HIGHL, 136). Caesarea in NT times was a place of shipping and possessed a harbor which Jos declared to be greater than the Piraeus, but it was Herodian and more Gr and Rom than Jewish. It was mostly inhabited by Greeks (Jos. B. I, 111, ix, 1). Now Caesarea has disappeared; and Joppa has only an open roadstead where vessels lie without shelter, and receive and discharge cargo and passengers by means of boats pulling between the pier and the shore. It was in other directions that Israel made acquaintance with the activities of the sea. Of internal navigation, beyond the fishing-boats on the Sea of Galilee which belong exclusively to the NT, the ferry boat on the Jordan (2 S 19, 18, 19; 1 K 19, 4) and ship are recognized, and even that is not perfectly clear (Rv “convoy,” but “a ford” is doubtless meant). It is from Tyre and Egypt and even Assyria and Babylonia, rather than from their own waters, that the Hebrew prophets and psalmists drew their pictures of seafaring life.

II. Ships in the OT and Apoc.—(1) In early times. —In the early books of the OT there are references connecting certain of the tribes, and the northern tribes, with the activities of the sea. (Gen 49 13; Dt 33 19); and in Deborah’s Song, which is acknowledged to be a very early fragment of Thoth. In Joshua, a “valley with a river” (Gen 49 13; Dt 33 19). The Oracle of Balaam (Nu 24 24) looks forward to a day when a fleet from Kittim should take the sea for the destruction of Assyria. “Ships of Kittim” are mentioned in Dnl (11 30). Kittim is referred to in the three greater Prophets (Isa 23 112; Jer 2 10; Ezek 27 6). The land of Kittim is Cyprus, and in the references in Isaiah it is associated with Tyre and the ships of Tarshish.

(2) During the monarchies.—It is not till the time of the monarchy that the Hebrews begin to figure as a commercial people. Already in the time of David commercial relations had been established between Israel and Tyre (2 Sm 5 11). The friendly cooperation was continued by Solomon, who acquired himself a fleet of cedar and the fir at Hiram’s command on Lebanon, but also of the skilled service of Hiram’s men to bring the timber from the mountains to the sea. Hiram also undertook to make the cedar and the fir into rafts (1 K 5 9, 13). The boats “floats” AV, “floats” RV) to go by sea and to deliver them to Solomon’s men.
at the place appointed, which the Chronicler tells us was Joppa. From this cooperation in the building of the Temple there grew up a larger connection in the pursuit of sea-borne commerce. It was at Ezion-geber near to Elath on the Red Sea, in the land of Edom which David had conquered, that Solomon had his fleet, "a hang-dry of ships" (1 K 9 26-28). Hiram joined Solomon in these enterprises which had their center on the Red Sea, and thus the Phoenicians had water communication with the coasts of Arabia and Africa, and even of India. The partnership existed for the commerce of the West. "For the king [Solomon] had at sea a navy of Tarshish with the navy of Hiram: once every three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold, and silver, and ivory, and apes, and peacocks" (1 K 10 22).

Tarshish is the name of the Phoen colony on the river Tartessus, called also Baetis, the modern Guadalquivir. It was the farthest limit of the western world as known to the Hebrews. They had commerce with it with Tarsum of Cilicia, but they are not convincing. It is conceived of in Heb. lit. as remote (Isa 60 19; Jon 3; 4 2), as rich (Ps 72 10; Jer 16 9), as powerful in commerce (Ezk 27 13). Ships of Tarshish were no doubt ships actually built for the Tarshish trade (2 Ch 20 36f; Jon 1 3), but the expression became a general designation for large sea-going vessels to any quarter. Ships of Tarshish made a deep impression upon the imagination of the Heb people. The Psalmist takes it as a proof of the power of Jehovah that He breaks the ships of Tarshish with an east wind (Ps 48 7). Isaiah includes them among the vessels he hears living in the farthest region of power and glory which the terror of the Lord would certainly overtake (Isa 2 16). Ezekiel regards them as the carries that bore the merchandise of the mistress of the seas (27 25). It is in ships of Tarshish that the prophet of the Return sees the exiles home in crowds to Jerusalem as their natural home (Isa 60 9).

From Solomon's time onward the kings of Judah retained their hold upon Eloth (1 K 22 48f; 2 Ch 20 35-37) till it was seized by the Syrians in the days of Ahaz (2 K 16 6).

(3) In later times. - As Solomon had the cooperation of Hiram in securing materials and craftsmen for the building of the first Temple, so Joshua and Zerubbabel by the favor of Cyrus obtained timber from Lebanon, and masons and carpenters from Sidon and Tyre for the building of the second. After, cedar trees were brought from Lebanon by sea to Joppa, and thence conveyed to Jerusalem (Ezr 3 7).

From Joppa Jonah fled to avoid compliance with God's command to preach repentance there (Jon 1 1f). He found a ship bound for Tarshish as far toward the W. as Nainveh to the E. The fare (pakhakh) paid by a passenger is a monopoly charge, in which he stowed himself away (pakhakh), the crew (malakhiy), the captain or shipmaster (raash ha-kibkele), the storm, the angry sea, the terrified mariners and their cry to their gods, and the casting of Jonah overboard to appease the raging waters - all make a lifelike picture.

It was in the time of Simon, the last survivor of the Maccabean brothers, that Joppa became a seaport with a harbor for shipping. "Amid all his glory he took Joppa for a haven, and made it an entrance for the isles of the sea" (1 Mac 14 3). When Simon reared his monument over the sepulcher of his father and brothers, and at Modin, he set up seven pyramids with pillars, upon which were carved figures of ships to be "seen of all that sail on the sea" (1 Mac 13 29). About this period we hear of ships in naval warfare. When Antiochus IV Epiphanes planned his expedition against Egypt, he had with other armaments "a great navy," presumably ships of war (1 Mac 1 17); and at a later time Antiochus VII speaks expressly of "ships of war" (1 Mac 15 3).

(1) Egypt. - The Egyptians, like other nations of antiquity, had a great horror of the open sea, although they were expert enough in their own navigation. As the neighboring Pharaoh-necho built up a powerful navy to serve him both in commerce and in war. See PHARAOH-NECHO.

Of explicit references to Egypt ships in the OT there are but few. Isaiah speaks of vessels of papyrus upon the waters" of the Upper Nile, on board of which are the messengers of Cush or Ethiopia returning to tell the tidings of the overthrow of Assyria to the inhabitants of those remote lands (18 2 AV has "balsashes" instead of "papyrus"). Ezekiel also, foretelling the overthrow of Egypt, speaks of messengers traveling with the news on swift Nile boats to strike terror into the hearts of the "curious Ethiopians" (30 9). When Jeh compares his days to "the swift ships" ("the ships of reed" RVm), the allusion is most likely to Egypt's, these being skiffs with a wooden keel and the rest of buoys, sufficient to carry one person, or at most two, and light, to travel swiftly (9 20).

(2) Assyria and Babylonia. - The Assyrians and Babylonians were mainly an inland people, but their rivers gave them considerable scope for navigation. The Assyrian monuments contain representations of naval engagements and of operations on the seacoast. When Isaiah pictures Jeh as a better defender of Judah than the rivers and streams, and compares himself to them in which he stowed himself away (pakhakh), the crew (malakhiy), the captain or shipmaster (raash ha-kibkele), the storm, the angry sea, the terrified mariners and their cry to their gods, and the casting of Jonah overboard to appease the raging waters - all make a lifelike picture.

There are mentions in the Assyrian annals of "seamen" being driven to ship as refugees by war, and coming into the sea "in the days of Sennacherib" (18 2), to which the prophet refers (21 3). Speaking of Jeh's wonders to be performed toward His people after Babylon had been overthrown, the prophet declares: "Thus saith Jeh, your Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel: For your sake I have sent to Babylon, and I will bring down all of them as fugitives, even the Chaldeans, in the ships of their rejoicing" (43 14). In this case, however, the ships are not passenger ships, but more probably merchant ships, or ships for pleasure, sailing in the Euphrates.

(3) Phoenicia. - It was from the Phoenicians that the Mediterranean people learned seamanship and skill in navigation. It is strange, therefore, that in his dirge over the downfall of the mistress of the sea, Ezekiel should represent Tyre as a gallant ship, well built, well furnished, and well manned, broken by the seas in the depths of the waters, fallen into the heart of the seas in the day of her ruin. Ezekiel's description (ch 27, with Davidson's notes) brings together more of the features of the ship of antiquity than any other that has come down to us. Her builders have made her perfect in beauty with planks of fir or cypress, most of cedar, cars of the oak of Bashan, benches or deck of ivory inlaid with boxwood, sail of fine linen with brodered work from Egypt, and an awning of blue and purple from the coasts of Eliahah (possibly Sicily). She is named with oarsmen of Sidon and Arvad, pilots of the wise men of Tyre, calkers from Gebal to stop up the cracks and seams in her timbers, mariners and men of war from other lands who enhanced her beauty by hanging up the shield and helmet with figs. She is fitted with the most varied cargo, the produce of the lands around, her customers, or as they are called, her traffickers, being Tarshish in the far W., Sheba and Arabia in the S., Haran and Asshur in the E., Javan which is Greece, and Tarshish, which is Spain, in the W.

One or two of the particulars of this description may be commented upon. (a) As regards rigging, the Phoenician ships of the time of Ezekiel, as seen in Assyrian representations, had one mast with one yard and carried a square sail. Egyptian ships on the Red Sea about the time of the Exodus, from relics of the XIXth Dynasty, had one mast and two yards, and carried also one large square sail. The masts and yards were made of fir or of pine, and the sails of linen, but the fiber of macephorus was employed as well as flax in the manufacture of sail-cloth. The sail had also to serve "for an ensign" (Ezek. Ekk. 77). The flag proper," says Davidson (ad loc.), "seems not to have been used in ancient navigation; its purpose was to indicate as for example in the battle Actium the ship of Antony was distinguished by its purple sail.

(b) As regards the crew, in the two-hanked Phoenician ship the rowers of the first bank work their oars over the gunwale, while those of the second banks lower down, so that each may have free play for his oar. The calkers were those who filled up seams or cracks in the planking and covered them with tar and wax, after the manner of the instruction given to Noah regarding the Ark. "Then shalt thou set pitch within and without with pitch" (Gen 6 14).

(c) As regards cargo, it is to be noted that "the persons of men, that is, slaves, formed an article of merchandise in which Javan, Tubal, and Meshech, countries to the N., traded with Tyre.

Of general references to shipping and seafaring life there are comparatively few in the OT. In his great series of Nature-pictures in 3. General Ps 104, the Psalmist finds a place for References the sea and ships (vs 25 ff), and in Ps 107 there is a picture of the storm overtaking them that go down to the sea in ships, and of the deliverance that comes to them when God "bringeth them into their desired haven" (vs 23 ff). In the Book of Prov the ideal woman who brings her food from far is like "the merchant ships" (31 14). In the same book the drunkard, because of his unnatural insensibility to danger, is likened to a man "that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast" (33 34); and among the inscrutable things of the world the writer includes "the way of a ship in the midst of the sea" (30 19). In Wisd, human life is described "as a ship passing through the billoowy water, whereof, when it is gone by, there is no trace to be found, neither pathway of its keel in the billoows" (5 10). The same book notes it as a striking example of the case of a divine and beneficent Providence that "men intrust their lives to a little piece of wood, and passing through the surge on a raft are brought safe to land" (14 1 5). The Jews like the Egyptians and the Assyrians had a natural shrinking from the sea, and the Ecclesiasticus interprets their feeling when he says: "They that sail on the sea tell of the danger thereof; and when we hear it with our ears, we marvel" (43 24).

III. Ships in the NT. - It is the fishing-boats of the Sea of Galilee which exclusively occupy attention in the Gospels. In the time of Our Lord's ministry in Galilee the shores of the Sea were densely peopled, and there must have been many boats engaged in the fishing industry. Bethsaida at the northern end of the Lake and Tarichaeas at the southern end were great centers of the trade. The boats were probably of a size and built similar to the few employed on the Lake today, which are between 20 and 30 ft. in length and 7 ft. in breadth. The word "launch," of putting a boat or a ship into the sea, has disappeared from RV, except in Lk 8 22, where it is more appropriate to an inland lake. They were propelled by oars, but no doubt also made use of the sail when the wind was favorable (Lk 8 23), though the pictures which we have in the Gospels are mostly of the boatmen toiling in rowing in the teeth of a gale (Mk 6 48), and struggling with the threatening waves (Mt 14 24). In the boat on which Jesus and the disciples were crossing the Lake after the feeding of the 5,000, Jesus was in the stern "asleep on the cushion" (Mk 4 38, AV "a pillow"; Gr proskephtasian, "headrest"). More than once Jesus made special use of a boat. As He was by the seashore a great concourse of people from all parts made it desirable that "a small boat" (ploiarion) should be in attendance off the shore to receive Him in case of need, though He does not seem to have required it (Mk 3 9). On another occasion, when the crowds were still greater, He went into a boat and sat "in the sea with the multitude on the sloping beach before Him (Mk 4 1; Lk 5 3). This boat is said in St. Luke's narrative to have been Simon's, and it seems from references to it as "the boat" on other occasions to have been generally at the disposal of Jesus. It is St. Paul's voyages which yield us the knowledge that we possess from Bib. sources of ships in NT times. They are recorded for us in the Acts by St. Luke, who, as Sir William Ramsay puts it, had the true Apostles' feeling for the sea (St. Paul the Traveller, 21). In St. Luke's writings there are many nautical terms, peculiar to him, used with great exactitude and precision.

When St. Paul was at Malta and was proceeding to Rome in charge of Julius, the centurion, along with other prisoners, a ship of Adramytium, a coasting vessel, carried the party from Caesarea along the Syrian coast, northward of Cyprus, past Cilicia and Pamphylia, to Myra of Lycia. There the centurion found a ship of Alexandria sailing for Italy, one of the great corn fleet carrying grain from Egypt for the multitudes of Rome. (After the capture of Jerusalem by Titus returned to Italy in such a vessel, touching at Rhegium and landing at Puteoli.) The size of the vessel is indicated by the fact that there were 276 persons on board, crew and passengers all told (Acts 27 37). St. Luke has made no note of the name of this or of the previous vessels in which St. Paul had voyaged. Of the presumably larger vessel, also an Alexandrian corn ship bound for Rome, which had wintered in Melita, and which afterward took on board the shipwrecked party (Acts 28:11), "the sign! (παράσημον, parásēmon) is given, and she is called "The Twin Brothers." The expression shows that it was in painting or relief; a figurehead, with the Twin Brothers represented, would be given by τέμνων, epítemn. The cargo (φορτίον, phortion, Acts 27:20, AV and RV "lading") in this case was wheat (27:38), but another word is used, γάνος, gánmos, by St. Luke of a ship's load of wheat (Acts 21:36; cf. Rev 18:11 ff.).

Roman Ship from Tomb at Pompeii.

Of those engaged in handling the ship we find (ver 11) the master (κυρίερην, kuríēren), the owner (παλαιός, παλαϊός, although this expression seems not quite consistent with the ownership of a cargo ship, cf. the commercial service, and Ramsay's distinction between the words, meaning the former "sailing-master" and the latter "captain," may be better), the sailors (vers 30, who treacherously sought to lower the ship's boat on the pretence of laying out anchors from the "foreship" or prow, and to get away from the doomed vessel).

Of operations belonging to the navigation of the vessel in the storm there were (1) the taking on board of the ship's boat and securing it with ropes (ver 16, in which operation St. Luke seems to have taken part; cf. ver 32), (2) the undergirding of the ship (ver 17, using helps, that is taking making use of certain means of relief, adopting the eldritch, only resorted to in extremities, of passing cables under the keel of the ship to keep the hull together (ver 19, taking soundings (ver 28), (5) letting go four anchors from the stern (ver 29, stern-anchoring being very unusual, but a necessity in the circumstances), (7) further lightening the ship by throwing the wheat into the sea (ver 28), (8) cutting the anchor cables, unlashing the rudders, hoisting up the foresail to the wind, and holding straight for the beach (ver 40).

Of the parts of the ship's equipment there are mentioned "the sounding lead" (βολίτ, bolús, though it is the vb. which is here used), "the anchors" (ἐξωρία, ἐξωρια, of which every ship carried several, and which at successive periods have been made of stone, iron, lead and perhaps other metals, each having two flukes and being held by a cable or a chain), "the rudders" (παράθων, pàrathōn, of which every ship had two for steering, which in this case had been lifted out of the water and secured by "bands" to the side of the ship and unlashed when the critical moment came), "the foresail" (στόμια, στόμιa), not the mainail, but the small sail at the bow of the vessel which at the right moment was hoisted to the wind to run her ashore), and "the boat" (σκάπη, skápē, which had been in tow in the wake of the vessel, according to custom still prevalent in those "coasting-vessels being sometimes bcalmed, when the crew got into the small boat and take the ship in tow, using the oars to get her round a promontory or into a position more favorable for the wind)." The season for navigation in those seas in ancient times was from April to October. During the winter the vessels were laid up, or remained in the shelter of some suitable haven. The reason for this was not simply the tempestuous character of the weather, but the obscurity of the heavens which prevented observations being taken for the steering of the ship (Acts 27:20).

In 2 Cor 11:25 St. Paul mentions among sufferings he had endured for Christ's sake that thrice he had suffered shipwreck, and that he had been "a night and a day in the deep," implying that he had been in danger of his life clinging to a spar, or borne upon the vessel's constructed raft. It may be a reminiscence of the sea when St. Paul in the very earliest of his Epistles (1 Thess 2:19), speaking of the coming of the Lord, says, "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven, with a shout! (ἐφ ορθέων, εἰκωθείς, with a voice, and a trumpet, as the angel of the covenant, hēlēw, giving the time to the rowers on board the ship. Although ἀνάρρυτος, ἀνάρρυτας, was "an underrover," and ἀνάρρυτος, ἀνάρρυτας, "the crew of a ship," as contrasted with κυρίερην, kuríēren, "the sailing-master," the derived meaning of "serving," or "officer," has lost in the NT all trace of its origin (Mt 5:25; Lk 1:2 and many passages; of σέβαλεν, sēbālein, and σεβάλειν, sēbālein, where the idea of "furling" or "shifting a sail" is entirely lost: 1 Cor 7:29; 2 Cor 8:20).

Figurative: In the hope of the godly is figured as "an anchor, sure and steadfast, entering into that which is within the veil" (6:19, esp. with Ebrard's note in Oxford, etc. ad loc. in St. James, showing how a simple thing, that is, the anchor and ship, adorns the hearth, which is the ship, and the anchor the ship). The anchor, as the steersman wills, is a "keeper of the door." In Rev there is a representation of the fall of Babylon in the New Jerusalem reminiscence of Judges "Jeho's in Egypt." In Egypt, in what lamentations arises from the merchants of the earth who can no more buy her varied merchandise (τον γάνον, τον γάνον, "cargo" RV) and shipmasters and passengers and seafaring people look in terror and stand upon the smoke of her burning (Rev 18:13-16).

LITERATURE—The usual books on Gr and Rom antiquities furnish descriptions and illustrations, Works on the monuments like Layard, Niniveh. 379 ff.; Maspero, Ancient Egypt and Assyria; Ball, Light from the East, and Reissner, Cairo Museum Catalogue, "Models of Ships and Boats," 1903, contain descriptions and figured representations which are instructive. On shipping and navigation in classical antiquity Smith of Jordanhill. Voyages and Shipwreck of St. Paul, is still the standard authority.

SHISHIA, shiš'ha (σίσια, shishā): One of Solomon's officers of state (1 K 4:3).

SHISHAK, shiš'ak (σισακ, shišak [1 K 14:25]; Σωφρατός, Sowfratós): Sheshonk or Sheshonq I, who is called on his monuments the "conqueror of Gebal" (1 K 15:19). He is the founder of the XXIIId Dynasty, was 952-930 BC in all probability of Libyan origin. It is possible that his claim to the throne was that of the sword, but it is more likely that he acquired it by marriage with a princess of the dynasty preceding. On the death of Pasekbanhu II, the last of the kings of the XXIst Dynasty, 952 BC, Shishak ascended the throne, with an efficient army and a well-equipped treasury at his command. He was a warlike prince and cherished dreams of Asiatic dominion. He had not long been seated on the throne when Jeroboam the son of Nebat, of the tribe of Ephraim, whom Solomon had promoted but whom Rehoboam had cast aside, had called on the court of Shishak (1 K 11:26 ff.).

2. Patron of Erez. Shishak had cast aside Jeroboam from the displeasure of his sovereign to the court of Shishak (1 K 11:26 ff.).

There Jeroboam remained till the death of Solomon, when he returned to Canaan, and, on Rehoboam's retiring, and an unsatisfactory answer to the people's demands for relief from their burdens, headed the revolt of the Ten Tribes, over whom he was chosen king with his capital at Shechem (1 K 12:25 ff.). Whether there was not in the XXIst Dynasty some kind of suzerainty of Egypt over Fal, when Solomon married Pharaoh's daughter and received with her Gezer as a dowry, seems not to be clearly established.
It is, however, natural that Jeroboam's patron in the day of adversity should take sides with him against Rehoboam, now that the kingdom was divided. Active support of Jeroboam would be in the line of his dreams of an eastern empire.

So it came to pass that in the 5th year of Rehoboam, Shishak came up against Jerus with 1,200 chariots, and 60,000 horsemen, and people without number out of Egypt, the Libyans, Sukkites, and Ethiopians, and took the fenced cities of Judah, and came to Jerusalem. At the preaching of the prophet

3. Syrian Campaign

Shemaijah, Rehoboam, and his people repeat, and Jerus was saved from destruction, though not from plunder nor from servitude, for he became Shishak's servant. (2 Ch 12 8). Shishak took away the treasures of the house of the Lord and the treasures of the king's house, carrying off among the most precious of the spoils all the shields of gold which Solomon had made (1 K 14 25 ff; 2 Ch 12 1–9). From the Scripture narrative it does not appear that there was any occupation of Pal by the Egypt forces on this occasion.

There is, however, a remarkable contemporary record of the campaign engraved on the south wall of the Temple of Amon at Karnak by Shishak himself. Not only is the expedition recorded, but there is a list of districts and towns of Pal granted to his victories by Amon-Ra and the goddess of Thebes engraved there. A number of towns mentioned in the Book of Jos have been identified, and among the names of the list are Rabbath, Taannach, Gibeon, Mahanaim, Beth-horon and other towns both of Israel and Judah. That names of places in the Northern Kingdom are mentioned in the list does not imply that Shishak had directed his armies against Jeroboam and plundered his territories. It was the custom in antiquity for a victorious monarch to include among conquered cities any place that paid tribute or was under suspicion, whether captured in war or not; and it was sufficient reason for Shishak to include these Israelite places that Jeroboam, as soon probably, had invited him to come to his aid. Among the names in the list was "Jud-ha-malek"—Yehudah, the kingdom of Judah, which was at first believed to be the name of the king of Judah, with a flourish which passed for Rehoboam. Being, however, a place-name, it is now recognized to be the town Yehudah, belonging to the king. On the death of Shishak his successor assumed a nominal suzerainty over the land of Canaan.
SHOBAB, shō'bab (םֹבָב, shōḇāḇ; סֹבָב, Sōḇāḇ): (1) One of the sons of David (2 S 5 14; 1 Ch 3 5; 14 4). (2) A son of Caleb (1 Ch 2 18).

SHOBACH, shō'bak (םֹבָך, shōḇāḵ; סֹבָך, Sōḇāḵ; Sōḇāḵ, Sōḇāḵ): Captain of the Syrian host (2 S 10 16 18); but “Shochach” (םֹבָך, shōḇāḵ) in 1 Ch 19 16 18.

SHOBAL, shō’bal (םֹבַל, shōḇāl; סֹבַל, Sōḇāl, Sōḇāl; Sōḇāl, Sōḇāl): The head of one of the families which returned from the Bab captivity (Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45).

SHOBAL, shō’bal (םֹבַל, shōḇāl; סֹבַל, Sōḇāl, Sōḇāl): One of those who sealed the covenant under Nehemiah after the Bab captivity (Neh 10 24).

SHOBI, shō’bi (םֹבִי, shoḇī; Osēbē, Osēbē): One of those who remained faithful to David during the rebellion of Absalom (2 S 17 27).

SHOCHOH, shō’kō (םֹכֹה, shoḵōh; ב, Sōḵō; Sōḵō, Sōḵō; Sōḵō, Sōḵō): This in 1 S 17 1 AV is a variant of Sōcoh (q.v.).

SHOES, sho’ēs, SHOE-LATCHET, sho’ēlach-ēt (שֹׁלֶחֶט, ‘šōlēḵēt, ‘šōlēḵēt), na’al, lit. “that which is fastened,” with denominative vb. šēmāl, “to provide with 27): The na’al was a simple piece of leather tied on the foot with the šēmāl, so easy of construction that its low cost was proverbial (Am 2 6; 8 6; Sir 46 19; cf Gen 14 23), and to be without it was a sign of extreme poverty (2 Ch 23 15; Isa 20 2). Women, however, might have ornamental sandals (Cant 1 17; 2 Ch 18 9, 10), and Ezekiel names “sealskin” (16 10) as a particularly luxurious material, but the omission of sandals from the list of Isa 3 18 23 shows that they were not commonly made articles of great expense. The hupōdēma was likewise properly a sandal, but the word was also used to denote a shoe that covered the foot. The contrast between hupōdēma in Mt 10 10 and sandalōn in Mk 6 9 seems to show that this meaning is not unknown in the NT, the “shoe” being regarded as an article of luxury (cf Lk 15 22). But in Mt 3 11 and 5, only the sandal can be meant.

Sandals were not worn indoors, so that putting them on was a sign of readiness for activity (Ex 12 11; Acts 12 8; Eph 6 15), the more wealthy having them brought (Mt 3 11) and fastened (Mk 1 7 and 18) by slaves. When one entered a house they were removed; all the more, naturally, on entering a sanctuary (Ex 3 5; Josh 15 18; Jer 7 33). Mourners, however, did not wear them even out of doors, as a sign of grief (Ezk 24 17 23), perhaps for the same reason that other duties of the toilet were neglected (2 S 12 20, etc.). A single long journey out of a pair of sandals (Josh 7 15; 9 15), and the preservation of the “latchet of their shoes” from being broken (Isa 5 27) would require almost miraculous help.

Ruth 4 7 states as a “custom in former times in Israel,” that when any bargain was closed, “a man drew off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbor.” This was of course simply a special form of earnest-money, used in all transactions. In Dt 25 9 it the custom appears in a different light. If a man refused to perform his duty to his deceased brother’s wife, the seller of the land were to remove his shoe and disarm him publicly. “And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed.” The removal of the shoe is apparently connected with the rite in Ruth 4 7 as a remanuence of the man’s privilege. But the general custom seems to have become obsolete, for the removal of the shoe is now a reproach.

The meaning of Ps 60 8 108 9, “Upon [m unto]” Edom will I cast my shoe,” is uncertain. דָּעַל, ‘al, may mean either “upon” or “unto.” If the former, some otherwise unsubstantiated custom of asserting ownership of the land may be meant. If the latter, this meaning is “Edom I will treat as a slave,” to whom the shoe is cast on entering a house.

SHORE, shōr: (1) רֹאשׁ, ṭōšh, always of the Mediterranean, variously transl. as, “beach,” “shore,” “seashore,” “coast,” “sea-coast,” “sea-shore” (Gen 19 13; Dt 1 7; Josh 9 1; Jgs 5 17; Jer 47 7; Ezek 25 16). (2) רְפָּף, ṣāḇāph, lit. “lip,” “lip’” of Arab. ạ̀bà, shafad, “lip’” of the sand upon the seashore, a figure of multitude (Gen 23 17; Ex 14 30; Josh 11 4; Jgs 7 12; 1 S 13 5; 1 K 4 29); the shore of the Red Sea or Gulf of ’Ahabah.
by Ezion-geber (1 K 9 26; 2 Ch 8 17), the brink of the River Nile (Gen 41 13 17); the edge (AV “brink”) of the valley of Arnon (Dt 2 36). (3) ἐμφύεσθαι, kōpōth, lit. “end,” “extremity,” the uttermost part (AV “shore”) of the Salt Sea (Josh 15 2); ἐμφύεσθαι, ἐχθαρβήσαι, “the end of the earth” (Ps 46 9; cf. Arab. ḏhāl-rāb, “the uttermost parts of the earth.”) (4) kēlōs, Ūkēlōs, lit. “height” as the upper part is by the sea shore” (He 11 12). (5) aigavlōs, aigalōs, the beach (AV “shore”) of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 13 2. 48; Jn 21 4); of the Mediterranean (Acts 21 5; 27 39. 40). (6) ἀσσον παρελθόντα τῷ Κρήτῃ, ἄσσον παρελθόντοι τῷ Κρήτῃ, doubtful reading, “sailed along Crete, close in shore” (AV “sailed, won by Crete”) (Acts 27 13). See COAST; HAVEN; SAND.

SHORTEN, shōr-tən: The Heb word shārēr and the Gr kolōdōl lit. indicate abbreviation of time or space (Ps 89 45; Prov 10 27; Ezk 43 5); figuratively they point to limitation of power or of suffering (Nu 11 23; Isa 50 2; 59 1; Mt 24 22; Mk 13 20).

SHOSHANNIM EDUTH, shō-shan-im ʾe-dūth. See Song; Psalms.

SHOULDER, shōldér (םְשֵׁלד, ʾskhem, ʾšē, kāthēp, נְשֵׁלד, נְשׁוֹד, נְשַׁד, אֵשׁוֹד; ʾšōs, ʾšōs; ʾbēshōk, ʾbēshōw, ʾbēshōw, ʾbēchōn; ʾšōkāni, ʾšōkāni, ʾšōkāni, ᾿kāhēph): The shoulder of the body is used as the head of the altar on which heavy loads are carried (Gen 21 14; 24 15.45; Ex 12 34; Josh 4 5; Jgs 9 48). King Saul's impressive personality is thus described: "There was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he: from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people" (1 S 9 2; 10 23). To carry loads on the shoulder or to have "a staff on the shoulder" is expressive of subjection and servitude, yea, of oppression and cruel punishment, and the removal of such burdens or of the rod of the oppressor connotes delivery and freedom ( Isa 9 4; 14 25).

Figuratively: The shoulders also bear responsibility and power. Thus it is said of King Messiah, "He shall take upon his shoulders... the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder; and he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open" (22 22). Job declares that he will refute all accusations of unlawful conduct made against him, in the words: "Oh that I had the indictment which mine adversary hath written! Surely I would carry it upon my shoulder." (Job 31 35, 36.

The Heb word kāthēp comes very close in meaning to the above, though it is occasionally used in the sense of arm- and shoulder-piece of a garment. It is used to describe the part of the body accustomed to carry loads. On it the Levites carried the implements of the sanctuary (Nu 7 9; 1 Ch 15 15; 2 Ch 35 3). Oriental mothers and fathers carried their children on the shoulder astride (Isa 49 22; cf 60 4); thus also the Holy Land folk carried their babies (Ezk 12 1; 12).

The loaded shoulder is likely to be "worn" or chafed under the burden (29 18). In the two passages of the NT in which we find the Gr equivalent of shoulder (ὅμος, fairly common in Apoc.), it corresponds most closely with this use (Mt 23 4; Lk 15 5). Of the shoulders of animals the word kāthēp is used in Ezk 34 21 (of sheep, where, however, men are intended) and in Isa 30 6 (of asses).

Stubborn opposition and unwillingness is expressed by "withdrew the shoulder" (Neh 9 29), or "pulled away the shoulder" (Zec 7 11), where the meaning of "shoulder" is this: they gave "turned the shoulder," a stubborn shoulder." Contrast "how the shoulder," i.e. "submit" (Bar 2 21). Of "stiffnecked"; see NECK. Somewhat difficult for the understanding of Occidentals is the poetical passage in the blessing of David to his son Solomon (1 K 4 21). The belief of Jeh shall dwell in safety by him; he covereth him all the day long, and he dwelleth between his shoulders" (Dt 33 12). The "shoulders" refer here to the mountain saddles and proclivities of the territory of Benjamin between which Jesus, the beloved of Jeh, which belonged to Judah, lay nestling close upon the confines of the neighboring tribe, or even built in part on ground belonging to Benjamin.

Much less frequently than the above-mentioned words, we find ἐρν, ἐρνα, which is used of the "bald shoulder of the ram" which was a wave offering at the consecration of a Nazirite (Nu 6 19) and of one of the priests' portions in the sacrifice (Dt 18 3); in Sir 7 31 this portion is called brachion, properly "arm," but both AV and RV translate "shoulder." In the OT no and heave offerings see SACRIFICE. AV frequently translates Heb ᾿adak, lit. "leg," "thigh" (q.v.) by shoulder, which RV occasionally retains (e.g. Neh 6 20).

SHOULDER-BLADE, shōldér-blād (םְשֵׁלד, ʾšīkmānāh): "Then let my shoulder [kāthēph] fall from the shoulder-blade [šīkmānāh], and mine arm [z’ro'] be broken from the bone [kānekān]" (Job 31 32). The Heb word is the fem. form of šīkmēn (see SHOULDER). It is found only in this passage.

SHOULDER-PIECE, shōldér-pīs (םֵעֲצָת, ʾkāhēph): The word designates the two straps or pieces of cloth which passed from the back of the ephod (see EPHOD) of the high priest over the shoulder and were fastened at the front. These shoulder-pieces seem to have been made of a precious texture of linen (or byssos) with threads of gold, blue, purple and scarlet, to which two onyx (or beryl) stones were attached bearing the names of six tribes of Israel each. These are called the "stones of memorial" (Ex 39 18). Each of these stones was fastened the plaited or woven bands ("wreathed chains") from which, by means of two golden rings, the breastplate was suspended. It is by no means clear from the descriptions (Ex 28 7.12-25; 39 4.7.18.20) how we have to imagine the form and attachment of these shoulder-pieces. It has been thought that the ephod might be of Egypt origin, which is not very probable, though V. Ancessi, Annales de philosophie chrétienne, 1872, 45 ff, reproduces some representations from the great work of Lepsius, Denkmäler, where costly royal garments have two shoulder straps, like the ephod. Usually Egyptian garments have no shoulder strap, or at most one.

SHOVEL, shōv’l: (1) ʾṣōqō, ṭūrab, is a wooden shovel used on the threshing floor for winnowing the grain (Isa 30 24). (2) ᾿γαθ, ᾿γαθ, is used in various passages to indicate some instrument employed to carry away ashes from the altar ( Ex 27 3; 38 3; Nu 14; 1 K 7 40.45; 2 K 25 16; 2 Ch 4 11.16; Jer 52 15). It was very likely a small shovel or those used in connection with modern fireplaces for cleaning away the ashes of (Heb ᾿adāh, "to sweep away") or for carrying live coals to start a new fire. (3) ᾿γαθ, ᾿yādēth (Dt 23 13 RVm).

SHOWER, shō'ər. (1) הַשָּׁוָר, ṣḥāḇḥām, a pl. form apparently denoting gentle rain, usually used figuratively, as in Dt 32:2; Ps 72:6; Mic 5:7. (2) סְבֹּר, geshem, used of gentle rain in Job 37:6: “shower of rain,” AV “small rain”; used of the flood in Gen 7:12. Figuratively, of blessing, “showers of blessing” (Ex 34:26): of destruction: “There shall be an overflowing shower in mine anger, and great hailstones in wrath to consume it” (Ezk 13:13). (3) רֹב, zeren, usually storm or tempest (cf Isa 4:28; 26:2): “They are wet with the showers of the mountain” (Job 24:8). (4) נְדוֹס, ṣmārōn (Lk 12:54). Rain is unknown in Pal in the long summer of 5 or 6 months. A few showers usually fall in September, succeeded by fine weather for some weeks before the beginning of the heavy and long-continued winter rains.

SHRINE, shrin (rōaṣ, nādē): In Acts 19:24 small models of temples for Diana.

SHROUD, shroud (םֹר, holēs, “bough”): Winding-sheet for the dead. See BURLA. Used also in AV, ERS Exk 31:3 in the rare old sense of “shelter,” “covering.” ARV has “a forest-like shade” (םֹר, ḫōresh, “wood,” “wooded height”) (Isa 17,9, etc.). Cf Milton, Comus, 147.

SHUA, SHUAH, šō'ā: (1) (םוֹר, šō'ā), “prosperity”: A Canaanite whose daughter Judah took to wife (Gen 38:2.12; 1 Ch 2:3; see BATH-SHA).

(2) (םוֹר, šādāʾ, “prosperity”): Daughter of Heber, an Asherite (1 Ch 7:32).

(3) (םוֹר, šāb, “depression”): A son of Keturah by Abraham (Gen 25:2; 1 Ch 1:32), and his posterity. See BILDAD.

(4) A brother of Caleb (1 Ch 4:11). See SHUHAH.

SHUAL, shō'āl (םוֹר, šādāl): An Asherite (1 Ch 7:36).

SHUAL, LAND OF (םוֹר, šphēl, “ereq šhāl; Ḥ šaal, hē Sāqēl): From their encampment at Michmash the Philis sent out marauding bands, one going westward toward Beth-horon, another eastward, “the way of the border that looketh down upon the valley of Zeboim.” The pass to the S. was held against them by Israel. The third party therefore went northward, turning “unto the way that leadeth to Ophrah, unto the land of Shual” (1 S 13:17). Ophrah is probably identical with et-Tanibeh, a village which lies some 5 miles E. of Beitin (Bethel). It is in this district therefore that the land of Shual must be sought, but no definite identification is possible.

SHUMATHITES, shō'math-its (םוֹר, шуматі, shumātī): One of the families of Kirath-jeearim (1 Ch 2:53).

SHUNAMMITE, shō'na-mit (םוֹר, шумаміт, šhumamīt, šhamamīt, šhunamīt; B, Šumamīt, Šumamīt, A, Šoumamīt, Šoumamīl): Applied to natives of Shunem.

(1) Abishag, who was brought to minister to the aged king David, love for whom led Adonijah to his doom (1 K 1:315; 2 17, etc.).

(2) The woman, name unknown, whose son Elisha raised from the dead (2 K 12, etc). Later when apparently she had become a widow, after seven years’ absence on account of famine, in the land of the Philis, she returned to find her property in the hands of others. Elisha’s intervention secured its restoration (8:1-6).

(3) The Shulamite (Cant 6:13). In this name there is the exchange of ṭ for ṣ which is common.

SHUNEM, shō'nom (םוֹר, шнен, šānem; B, Šonav, Šounān, A, Šoumav, Šoudnā): A town in the territory of Issachar named with Jezreel and Chesolith (Josh 19:18). Before the battle of Gilboa the Philis pitched their camp here. They and the army of Saul, stationed on Gilboa, were in full view of each other (1 S 28:4). It was the scene of the touching story recorded in 2 K 4:8-37, in which the prophet Elisha raises to life the son of his Shunamite benefactress. Onom describes it as a village called Sulem, 5 Roman miles S. of Mt. Tabor. This points to the modern Safaim, a village surrounded by cactus hedges and orchards on the lower south-western slope of Jebel ed-Duby ("Hill of Moreh"). It commands an uninterrupted view across the plain of Esdraelon to Mt. Carmel, which is about 15 miles distant. It also looks out across the valley of Jezreel to the slopes of Gilboa on the S. It therefore meets satisfactorily the conditions of Josh and 1 S. A question has, however, been raised as to its identity with the Shunem of 2 K 4. Elisha’s home was in Samaria. Apparently Carmel was one of his favorite haunts. If he passed Shunem “continually” (ver 9), going to and coming from the mountain, it involved a very long detour if this were the village visited. It would seem more natural to identify the Shunem of Elisha with the Samim of Onom, which is said to be in the territory of Sebaste (Samaria), in the region of Akkrabatta, or perhaps with Sulem, fully a mile N. of Taanach, as nearer the line of travel between Samaria and Carmel.

There is, however, nothing to show that Elisha’s visits to Shunem were paid on his journeys between Samaria and Carmel. It may have been his custom to visit certain cities on circuit, on business calling for his personal attention, e.g. in connection with the “schools of the prophets” materials do not exist on which any certain conclusion can rest. Both Suleam and Safaim are on the edge of the splendid grain fields of Esdraelon (2 K 4:18).

SHUNI, sbe'òl(h), SHUNITES, sbe'òlnits (šùnî, šùnît): One of the sons of Gad and his descendants (Gen 46:16; Nu 26:15).

SHUPHAM, sīòfam, SHUPHAMITES, sīòf-' fam-īts. See SHEEPHUPHAM.

SHUPPIM, sīòp'm (šùpš, shuppim): (1) One of the descendants of Benjamin (1 Ch 7 12.15). (2) One of the porters in the temple (1 Ch 26:16). See MUPPIN; SHEEPHUPHAM.

SHUR, šūr, šbôr (šùr, šâr; Šîbû, Šôr): The name of a desert E. of the Gulf of Suez. The word means a “wall,” and may probably refer to the mountain wall of the Tib plateau as visible from the shore plains. In Gen 16:7 Hagar at Kadesh (‘āín ḳādēš) (see ver 14) is said to have been “in the way to Shur.” Abraham also lived “between Kadesh and Shur” (Gen 20:1). The position of Shur is defined (Gen 25:18) as being “opposite Egypt on the south to Assur.” After crossing the Red Sea (Ex 15:4) the Hebrews entered the desert of Shur (ver 22), which extended southward a distance of three days’ journey. It is again noticed (1 S 17:5 7) as being opposite Egypt, and (28:7) as near Egypt. The place thus no longer occupies the same site, for on the E. of the Red Sea, and of the Bitter Lakes.

Bruesch, however, proposed to regard Shur (“the wall”) as equivalent to the Egyptian sêdîw (“wall”), the name of a fortification of some kind apparently near Aswan (2), probably covering the incursion to Egypt on the road from Pelusium to Zosam. The extent of this “wall” is unknown, but Bruesch connects it with the wall mentioned by Diodorus Siculus (1.4) who wrote about 8 B.C., and who attributed it to Sesostris II. He identifies the “east side of Egypt against the irrigations of the Syrians and Arabs” with a wall drawn from Pelusium through the deserts as far as to Heliopolis, for a space of 1,500 furigens.” Heliopolis lies 90 miles (not 185) S.W. of Pelusium; this wall, if it existed at all, would have run on the edge of the desert which extends N. of Ḥady (Transvaal from Kantoeh to Tilk-eh-Chir; but this then on the borders of Goshen, is evidently much too far W. to have any connection with the desert of Shur E. of the Gulf of Suez. See Budge, Hist. Egypt, 90; Bruesch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, abridged edition, 320.

1. Position, (Elamite) Šāban, is the modern Shush Etyymology (Sus) in Southwestern Persia, a series and Forms of ruins-mounds on the banks of the of its Name river Karkha. The ancient etymology of the city (Arabic illi and “of horses”) are probably worthless, as an etymology in the language of the place would rather be expected; the name therefore connect the name withšāna, meaning “farther,” and pointing to some much more distant city. It is frequently mentioned in the Bab inscriptions of the 3rd millennium BC, and is expressed by the characters for the goddess Sitar and for “oeder,” implying that it was regarded as the place of the “divine grove” (see 3, below). In later days, the Assyrians substituted for the second character, that having the value of šès, possibly indicating its pronunciation. Radau (Early Bab History, 236) identifies Shushan (Susa) with the Sāša of the Bab king Kuri-galzu (11th cent. BC, if the first of the name), who dedicates to the Bab goddess Ninlil an inscription of a certain Stele, who had at an earlier date, dedicated it to Sitar for the life of the Bab king Dungi (c 2500 BC).

The surface still covered with ruins is about 2,000 hectares (1,940 acres), though this is but a fraction compared with the ancient extent of the city, which is estimated to have been between 12,000 and 15,000 hectares (29,640–37,000 acres). Though considerable, the extent of Susa was small compared with Nineveh and Babylon.

2. The Ruins The ruins are divided by the French explorers into four tracts: (1) The mound of the Archemenian period (5th cent. BC), c 1,476 by 820 ft., dominating the plain (height c 124 ft.). (2) The Royal City on the E. of the Citadel, composed of two parts: the Apadana (N.E.), and a nearly triangular tract extending to the E. and the S. This contains the remains of the palace of Darius and his successors, and occupies rather more than 123 acres. The palace proper and the throne-room were separated from the rest of the official buildings. (3) The City, occupied by artisans, merchants, etc. (4) The district on the right bank, similarly inhabited. This area was extended into all the lower plain, between the Shaur and the Kerkha. Besides these, there were many isolated ruins, and the suburbs contained a number of villages and separate constructions.

Most of the constructions at Susa are of the Peri period. In the northern corner of the Royal City, a part of the Apadana, the only great monument of which remains were found on the level. The principal portion is a half-baked column hall called the “sala” or the “sala of the Apadana,” which was destroyed by fire in the time of Artaxerses I. The columns apparently had capitals of the style common in Persia—the foot parts of two bulls kneeling back to back. In the Citadel a palace built by Xerxes seems to have existed, the base of one of his columns having been found there. Bricks bearing the inscriptions of early Elamite kings, and the foundations of the later buildings, show the antiquity of the original part of this palace. According to the explorers, this was the portion of the city reserved for the temples.

The number of important antiquities found on the site is considerable. Among the finds may be mentioned the triumphal stele of Naram-Sin, 3rd millennium BC; the statuettes of the Bab king Disovered Dungi (c 2360 BC); the reliefs and inscriptions of the Elamite king Bag-Shia-Sinak (c 2340 BC); the obelisk inscribed with the laws of Hammurabi of Babylon; the bronze bas-relief of the Elamite king Sutruk-Nahhunte (c 1120 BC), who carried off from Babylon the stele of Naram-Sin and Hammurabi above mentioned, together with a considerable number of other Babylonic inscriptions—most precious archaeological find.

Shushan passed through many serious crises, one of the severest being its capture and destruction by the armies of the Assyrian king Assurbanipal about 610 BC. According to Assurbanipal’s account, the ziggiurat or temple-tower of Susa was built of enamelled bricks imitating lapis-lazuli, and was adorned with pinnacles of bright bronze. The god of the city was Shusinak, who dwelt in a secret place, and none ever saw the form of his divinity. Lagamaru (Lammaru) and five other of the city’s deities were adored with incense by kings, and their images, with those of 12 more (worshipped by the people), were carried off as spoil to Assyria. Winged bulls and genius adored Susa’s temples, and figures of wild bulls protected the entrances to their shrines. Other noteworthy things were the sacred groves into which no stranger was allowed to enter, and the burial-places of the Elamite kings. After recovering from the blow inflicted by the Assyrians, Shushan ultimately regained its old importance, and, as the summer residence of the Pers kings, became the home of Abasurus and Queen Esther (Neh 1 1; Est 1 25; 2 3; 3 15; 9 11 ff; Dan 8 2; cf. Est 11 3).

SICK, sik. SICKNESS, sik’nes (ﬠֶשַּה, ḥālah; Gen 48 1; etc, ḥēl [Dt 28 61, etc], נָשָה, nasha‘a’ [Dt 29 21, etc], נָמשָה, moshāh [Ex 23 25, etc], דָּעָה, dauaḥ [Lev 16 33, etc, דִּשַּׁך, dishaḥ]. ḥālah [2 S 12 15, etc]; ḥāloth, asthenē [Mt 10 8, etc; cf. Macc 9 22], κακῶς ἰχθύων, kokōs ochōn [Lk 7 2], κακῶς ἵχοντας, kokōn echonitas [Mt 4 24, etc.], ἄρρωστος, ἄρρηστος [Sir 7 33; Mt 14 12], ἀμφότερα, orkhōtēn [Sir 10 10, etc], with various cognates, κακῶς, ἀχάριον [Jas 5 15]; Λατ. morbus [2 Esd 8 31]: Compared with the number of deaths recorded in the historical books of the Bible the instances in which diseases are mentioned are few. “Sick” and “sickness” (including “disease,” etc) are the trs of 6 Heb and 9 Gr words and occur 56 t in the OT and 57 t in the NT. The number of references in the latter is significant as showing how much the healing of the sick was characteristic of the Lord’s ministry. The diseases specified are varied. Of infantile sickness there is an instance in Bath-sheba’s child (2 S 12 15), whose disease is termed ṭan’ash, not improbably trismus nascentium, a common disease in Palestine. In Psalms there are recorded the unspecified sickness of Abijah (1 K 14 1), of the widow’s son at Zarephath (1 K 17 17), the sunstroke of the Shunammite’s son (2 K 4 19), the epileptic boy (Mt 17 15), sharia’s daughter (Mt 9 18), and the widow’s son (Jn 4 46). At the other extreme of life Jacob’s death was preceded by sickness (Gen 48 1). Sickness resulted from accident (Ahaziah, 2 K 1 2), wounds (Joram, 2 K 8 29), from the violence of passion (Ammon, 2 S 13 2), or mental emotion (Dol 8 27); see also in this connection Cant 2 5; 5 8. Sickness the result of drunkenness is mentioned (Hos 7 5), and as a consequence of famine (Jer 14 18) or violence (Mic 6 13). Đakos or periodic sickness is referred to (Lev 15 33; 20 18), and an extreme case is that of Lk 8 43.

In some examples the nature of the disease is specified, as a’sa’s disease in his feet (1 K 15 23), for which he sought the aid of physicians in vain (2 Ch 16 12). Hezekiah and Job suffered from sore boils, and the same disease (leprosy) attacks (2 Ch 21 19), as did Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc 9 5). Probably the sudden and fatal disease of Herod was similar, as in both cases there is reference to the presence of worms (cf. Acts 12 23 and 2 Macc 9 9). The disease of Publius’ father was also dysentery (Acts 28 8). Other diseases specified are paralysis (Mt 8 6; 9 2), and fever (Mt 8 14). Not improbably the sudden illness of the young Egyptian at Ziklag (1 S 30 11), and the illness of Ben-hadad which weakened him so that he could not resist the violence of Hazael, were also the common Pal fever (2 K 8 15) of whose symptoms and effects there is a graphic description in Ps 38. Unspecified fatal illnesses were those of Elisha (2 K 13 14), Lazarus (Jn 11 1), Tabitha (Acts 9 37). In the language of the Bible, leprous is spoken as of a defilement to be cleansed, rather than as a disease to be cured.

The proverb concerning the sick quoted by the Lord at Capernaum (Mk 6 10) has come down to us in several forms in apocryphal and rabbinical writings (Babda’ Kammad 26 13; Sanhedrāt 176), but is nowhere so terse as in the form in which He expresses it. The Lord performed His healing of the sick to the word or thought, and one of the most emphatic charges which He gave to His disciples when sending them out was to heal the sick. One of the methods used by them, the anointing with oil, is mentioned in Mk 6 13 and enjoined by James (5 15). In later times the anointing which was at first used as a remedial agent became a ceremonial in preparation for death, one of the seven sacraments of the Rom church (Aquinas, Summa Theologiae suppl. ad P III. 29).

The duty of visiting the sick is referred to in Ezk 34 4 16. and by the Lord in the description of the Judgment scene (Mt 25 36 43). It is implicit in some of the rabbinical tractates. “He that visits the sick lengthens his life, he who refrains shortens it,” says Rabbi Ishahan in N’drārīm 29. In Shulhan ‘Arakh, Yoreh De’ēth there is a chapter devoted to this duty, which is regarded as incumbent on the Jew, even though the sick person be a Gentile (Gitra 61a). The church’s duty to the sick, so long neglected, has now, within the last 70 years, been recognized in the mission field, and has proved, in heathen lands, to be the most important of all pioneer aggressive methods.

While we find that the apostles freely exercised their gifts of healing, it is noteworthy that we read of the sickness of two of St. Paul's companions, Epaphroditus (Phil 2:26) and Trophimus (2 Tim 4:20), for whose recovery he seems to have used no other means than prayer. See also Disease.

SICKLE, sik'1 (סֵכֶל, ἱρματισ), hermitish [Dt 16:19; 23:25], sickle, maggâl; cf Arab. minjâl [Jer 50:16; Joel 3:13]; ἱματων, ἱματων [Mt 4:29; Rev 14:14–19]: Although the ancients pulled much of their grain by hand, we know that they also used sickles. The form of this instrument varied, as is evidenced by the Egypt sculptures. The earliest sickle was probably of wood, shaped like the modern scythe, although much smaller, with the cutting edge made of sharp flats set into the wood. Sickle blades were found at Tel el-Hesi. Crescent-shaped iron sickles were found in the same mound. In Pal and Syria the sickle varies in size. It is usually made wholly of iron or steel and shaped much like the instrument used in western lands. The smaller-sized sickles are used both for pruning and for reaping.

SIKONY, sîkî-on (Σικόνιον, Sikón, Σικόνιον, Sukô-n, Σικόν, Sukôn): Mentioned in 1 Mac 16:25 in the list of countries and cities to which Lucas the Babylonian sent his friend and companion to Chedorlaomer (burned in 139 BC) wrote, asking them to be friendly to the Jews. The Jewish dispersion had already taken place, and Jews were living in most of the seaports and cities of Asia Minor, Greece and Egypt (cf Str Pls C.14:37 and Plao). Sicyon was situated 18 miles W. of Corinth on the south side of the Gulf of Corinth. Its antiquity and ancient importance are seen by its coins still extant, dating from the 5th cent. Though not as important as Corinth in its sea trade, the burning of that city in 143 BC, and the favor shown to Sicyon by the Roman authorities in adding to its territory and assigning to it the direction of the Isthmian games, increased its wealth and influence for a time.

SIDDIM, sid'dim, VALE OF (םיד理論, ים, ʾemek ha-siddim; LXX ἡ φάραγγὶς [or κόλας] ἡ ἀλκος, ἡ φάραγγς [κόλας] ἡ καλύτερη): The place mentioned in Gen 14:3–8 as being the scene of encounter between Chedorlaomer and his allies with the kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim and Zoar. In Gen 19 it is identified with the Salt Sea, and in ver 10 it is said to have been full of slime pits (“bitumen”).

According to the traditional view, the Vale of Siddim was at the southern end of the Dead Sea. But in recent years a number of eminent authorities have maintained that it was at the northern end of the Dead Sea, in the vicinity of Jericho. Their argument has mainly been based on incidental references in the scene (Gen 13:1–13) describing the parting of Lot and Abram, and in the account of Moses' vision from Pisgah (Dt 34:3).

In the account of Abram and Lot, it is said that from Bethel to the plain of the Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, before Jehovah destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah. The word here in the plain means “circle,” and well describes the view which one has of the plain about Jericho as Bethel as he looks down the valley past Arah. But it seems to go beyond the point to assume that the Vale of Siddim was within that circle of the plain as Gen 13:13 itself simply that Lot dwelt “in the cities of the plain, and went out from his tent as far as Sodom.” In the vision of Moses, likewise, we have a very general and convenient description in which it is said that he was shown “the plain of the valley of Jehoshaphat, the reed-tracks, unto the utmost Swift, which, as we learn from Gen 19:22, was not far from the Vale of Siddim. It is true that from the traditional site of Pisgah Lot the original ancestor of the couch, nor the district, has been pushed to the main part of the depression by the Jordan, and various smaller streams descending from the highlands on either side. In

The tendency at the present time is to return to the traditional view that the Vale of Siddim was at the south end of the Dead Sea. The people by the fact that Jebel Uдум, the salt mountain at the southwestern corner of the Dead Sea, still bears the name of Sodom, Uдум being simply another form of the word Soum, still stronger argument, however, is drawn from the general topographical and geological conditions. In the first place, Zoar, to which Lot is said to have fled, was not far away. The most natural site for it is near the mouth of the Wady Kerak, which comes down from Meab into the southern end of the Dead Sea, and the city was ever afterward spoken of as a Moabite city, which would not have been the case if it had been at the north end of the sea. It is notable in Josh 13:15–21, where the cities given to Reuben are enumerated, that, though the slopes of Pisgah are mentioned, Zoar is not mentioned.

In Gen 14, where the battle between Amraphel and his allies with Sodom and the other cities of the plain is described, the south end of the Dead Sea comes in later to the end of their conquest, and special mention is made of the salt and bitumen pits which occurred in the valley, and evidently played an important part in the outcome of the battle.

At the south end of the Dead Sea there is an extensive cirque or plain which is better supplied with water for irrigation than is the region about Jericho, and which, on the supposition of slight topographical changes, may have been frequently in ancient times; while there are many indications of such fertility in the ruins that have been described by travelers about the mouth of the Kerak and other localities nearby. The description, therefore, of the fertility of the region in the Vale of Siddim may well have applied to this region at the time of Lot's entrance into it.

There are very persistent traditions that great topographical changes took place around the south end of the Dead Sea in connection with the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, while the opinion has been universally prevalent among the earlier historical writers that the site of Sodom and Gomorrah is beneath the waters of the Dead Sea.

Geological investigations, so far from disproving these traditions, render them altogether possible and credible. There is a remarkable contrast between the northern and southern ends of the Dead Sea and of the south end. Near the north end the depth descends to 1,300 ft., whereas for many miles out from the south end it is very shallow, so that at low water a ford exists, and is occasionally used, from the north end of the salt mountain across to el-Lisân.

The precipitous salt cliffs of Jebel Uдум which border the southwest corner of the Dead Sea would indicate that, in comparatively recent times, there had been an abrupt subsidence of a good many feet in the bottom of the Dead Sea at the date of Abraham.

Such subsidences of limited areas and in connection with earthquakes are by no means uncommon. In 1819 an area of 2,000 sq. miles about the delta of the Indus River sank beneath the level of the sea, so that the tops of the houses were barely seen above the water. A smaller area in the delta of the Suez Delta sank during the last century beneath the waters of Lake Baikal. Professor K. S. Tarl of Cornell University has recently described the effects of the partial subsidence of Alaska, in which there was a change of level of 47 ft.

More probably (see ABRAHAM; DEAD SEA) there has been a rise in the waters of the Dead Sea since Abraham's time, caused by the encroachment upon the original area of the sea that has not been spoken of. But we are by no means sure that the traditional site of Pisgah and the tent of Lot is not to be supported. To the extent that the import of this land-grown to be restricted to the points which are actually within range of vision.
The equilibrium between precipitation and evaporation could have been maintained only by a rise in the water causing it to spread over the shallow shelf at the south end, thus covering a large part of the Vale of Sidon with the shoal water now found between el-Lisân and Jebel Ushûn.

SIDE, aît-dé (Ṣūth, Sîd): An ancient town of Pamphylia, occupying a triangular promontory on the coast. It was one of the towns to which a letter favorable to the Jews was sent by the Roman consul Lucius (1 Macc 15:23). The town seems to have been of considerable antiquity, for it had existed long before it fell into the possession of Alexander the Great, and for a time it was the metropolis of Pamphylia. Off the coast the fleet of Antiochus was defeated by the Rhodians. During the 1st century. Side was noted as one of the chief ports of pirates who disposed of much of their booty there. The ruins of the city, which are now very extensive, bear the name Zeki Adale, but among them there are no occupied houses. The two harbours protected by a sea wall may still be traced, but they are now filled with sand. The wall on the land side of the city was provided with a gate which was protected with round towers; the walls themselves are still in good preservation. Within these walls the most important of the remains are three theaters leading from the city gate to the harbors. Without the walls, the street leading to the city gate is lined with tombs, and among the shambles of the neighboring fields are traces of many buildings and of an aqueduct.

SIDES, sîd (ṣīd, yarkhâh, "thigh," "flank"): RV substitutes "innermost parts" for AV "sides" in Jon 1:5; cf 1 S 24:3.

SIDON, sîdôn (ṣîthôn): The eldest son of Canaan (Gen 10:15).

SIDON, sîdôn (ṣîthôn, Szādāv, Sîdôn; AV Sidon and Zidon; RV SİDON only): One of the oldest Phoenician cities, situated on a narrow plain between the range of Lebanon and the sea, in lat. 33° 34' nearly. The plain is well watered and convenient for habitation. The city has spread from a little N. of Sarepta to the Bestrenus (Nahr el-Auly). The ancient city was situated near the northern end of the plain, surrounded with a strong wall. It possessed two harbors, the northern one about 500 yds. long by 200 wide, well protected by little islets and a breakwater. There are about 600 by 400 yds., surrounded on three sides by land, but open to the W., and thus exposed in bad weather. The date of the founding of the city is unknown, but we find it mentioned in the Am Tabs. 14, 15, and in Gen 10:19 it is the chief city of the Canaanites, and Joshua (Josh 11:8) calls it Great S. It led all the Phoenician cities in its early development of maritime affairs, its sailors being the first to launch out into the open sea out of sight of land and to sail by night, guiding themselves by the stars. They were the first to come into contact with the Greeks and we find the mention of them several times in Homer, while other Phoenician towns are not noticed. S. became early distinguished for its manufactures and the skill of its artisans, such as beautiful metal-work in silver and bronze and textile fabrics embroidered and dyed with the famous purple dye which became known as Tyrian, but which was earlier produced at S. Notices of these choice articles are found in Homer, both in the Iliad and the Odyssey. S. had a monarchical form of government, as did all the Phoenician towns, but it also held a sort of hegemony over those to the S. as far as the limit of Phoenicia. It likewise made claims to the lands of Sidon with the shoal water now found between el-Lisân and Jebel Ushûn.

The attempt was not renewed, but many colonies were established over-sea. Citium, in Cyprus, was one of the earliest.

(1) The independence of S. was lost when the kings of the XVIIIth and XIXth Dynasties of Egypt added Pal and Syria to their dominions (1580-1250 BC). The kings of S. were allowed to remain on the throne as long as they paid tribute, and perhaps still exercised authority over the towns that had before been subject to them. When the power of Egypt declined under Amenhotep IV (1375-1358), the king of S. seems to have thrown off the yoke, as appears from the Am Tabs. Ribaddi of Gebal writes to the king of Egypt that Zimri, king of S., had joined the enemy, but Zimri, himself claims, in the letters he wrote, to be loyal, declaring that the town belonging to him had been taken by those who had fled from the Hittites (Tab. 147). During the 12th century, the city was eventually made independent of Egypt, and she retained the hegemony of the southern towns and perhaps added Dor, claimed by the Philistines, to her dominion. This may have been the reason for the war that took place about the middle of the 12th century BC, in which the Phœnicians took and plundered S., whose inhabitants fled to Tyre and gave the latter a great impetus. S., however, recovered from the disaster and became powerful again. The Book of Jgs claims that Israel was an inland colony by S. (10:12), but it is probable S. stands here for Phœnicia in general, as being the chief town.

(2) S. submitted to the Assyrians as did the Phœnican cities generally, but revolted against Senacherib and again under Esarhaddon. The latter destroyed a large part of the city and carried off most of the inhabitants, replacing them by captives from Babylon and Elam, and renamed it Ir-Esar-haddon ("City of Esar-haddun"). The settlers readily mingled with the Phœnicians, and the city continued to be a Phœnician city even after S. was captured by the Persians, who made it into a Persian colony.

azar, he is probably Strato I who reigned about 374–363 BC, and hence his grandfather, Esmaunazar I, must have reigned in 400 BC or earlier. Strato II was on the throne when Alexander took possession of Phoenicia and made no resistance to him, and even aided him in the siege of Tyre, which shows that S.

had recovered after the terrible disaster it suffered in the time of Ochus. It perhaps looked upon the advance of Alexander with content as its avenger. The devastation of Tyre increased the importance of S., and after the death of Alexander it became attached to the kingdom of the Ptolemies and remained so until the victory of Antiochus III over Seleucus (198 BC), when it passed to the Seleucids and from them to the Romans, who granted it a degree of autonomy with native magistrates and a council, and it was allowed to coin money in bronze.

S. comes into view several times in the NT; first when Christ passed into the borders of Tyre and S. and healed the daughter of the Syro-

St. Paul, on his way to Rome, was permitted to visit some friends at S. (Acts 27 3). See also Mt 11 21 f and Mk 3 8.

It was noted for its school of philosophy under Augustus and Tiberius, its inhabitants being largely Greek; and when Berytos was destroyed by an earthquake in 551, its great law school was removed to S. It was not of great importance during the Crusades, being far surpassed by Acre, and in modern times it is a small town of some 15,000.

LITERATURE

In early Heb history, siege operations are not described and can have been little known. Although the Israelites had acquired a certain degree of military discipline in the wilderness, when they entered Canaan they had no experience of the operations of a siege and were without the engines of war necessary for the purpose. Jericho, with its strongly fortified wall, was indeed formally invested—it “was straitly shut up because of the children of Israel: none went out, and none came in” (Josh 6 1)—but it fell into their hands without a siege. Other cities seem to have yielded after pitched battles, or to have been taken by assault.

Many of the Canaanite fortresses, like Gezer (2 S 5 25; Josh 16 10), Taanach and Megiddo (Jgs 1 27), remained unreduced. Jerus was captured by the men of Judah (Jgs 1 8), but the fort of Jebus remained unconquered till the time of David (2 S 5 6).

In the days of the monarchy more is heard of siege operations. At the siege of Rabbath-Ammon Joab seems to have deprived the city of its water-supply and, captured it (2 S 11 1; 12 27). At Abel of Beth-maccah siege operations are described in which Joab distinguished himself (2 S 20 15). David and Solomon, and, after the disruption of the kingdom, Rehoboam and Jeroboam built fortresses which are long become the scene of siege operations. The war between Assyria and Israel in the days of Nadab, Baasha, and Elah was, for the most part, a war of sieges. It was while besieging Gibbethon that Nadah, the son of Jeroboam, was slain by Baasha (1 K 15 27), and 27 years after, while they were still investing the same place, the soldiery chose their commander Omri to be king over Israel (1 K 16 16). From the Egyptians, the Syrians, the Assyrians, and the Chaldaeans, with whom they came into relations in later times as allies or as enemies, the people of the Southern and of the Northern Kingdoms learned much regarding the art, both of attack and of defence of fortified places.

It was an instruction of the Deuteronomistic Law that before it was invested for a long siege, it should be summoned to capitulate. 3. Pre-(Dt 20 10; cf 2 S 20 18; 2 K 18 liminaries 17 ff). If the offer of peace be to Siege declined, then the siege is to be proceeded with, and if the city be captured, all the male population is to be put to death, and the women and children reserved as a prey for the captors. To this humane reservation the cities of the Canaanites were to be an exception: their inhabitants were to be wholly exterminated (Dt 20 16–18).

The same law prescribed that there should be no unnecessary destruction of fruit trees in the prosecution of a long siege. Trees not yielding fruit for human subsistence might be cut down: “And thou shalt build bulwarks [māgōr, “siege works”] against the city that maketh war with thee, until it fall” (Dt 20 19 20). This instruction to have regard to the fruit trees around a hostile city seems to have been more honored in the breach than in the observance, even in Israel. When the allied kings of Israel, Judah, and Edom were invading Moab and had instruction to “smite every fortified city,” the prophet Elisha bade them also “fell every good tree, and stop all fountains of water, and mar every good piece of hand of stones” (2 K 3 19 25). When the assault of Jerus by the Chaldaeans was imminent, Jeh commanded them to stand down only “until the king’s [Aramean] war be over; and the Arabian warfare, we are told, the destruction of the enemy’s palm groves was a favorite exploit (Robertson Smith, OTT, 369). And the Assyrians when they captured a city had no compunction in destroying its plantations (inscription of Shalmanasar II on Black Obelisk).

From passages in the Prophets, upon which much light has been thrown by the ancient monuments of Assyria and Chaldaea, we gain a very clear idea of the siege works directed against a city by Assyry or Chaldaean invaders. The siege of Lachish (2 K 18 13 14; Isa 36 1; Jer 34 1) is the subject of a series of magnificent reliefs from the mound of Koyunjik (Layard, Monuments of Nineveh, II, plates 20, 21, 22). The downfall of Nineveh as predicted in Nahumi’s prophecy lets us see the siege operations proceeding with striking realism (see Der Untergang Ninive's by A. Jeremias and Colonel Billerbeck). Nowhere, however, are the incidents of a siege—the gathering of hostile forces, the slaughter of peaceful inhabitants, the straits endured by the besieged, the raising of siege works, the setting of engines of war against the walls, the demolition of the towers, the breach in the principal wall, the rush of men and the clatter of horses' hoofs through the streets, the slaughter, the pilage, the destruction of walls and houses—more fully and faithfully recorded than by Ezekiel when predicting the capture of Tyre by Nebuchadrezzar (Ezk 26:7–12). The siege of Tyre lasted 13 years, and Ezekiel tells how every head was made bald and every shoulder torn by the hard service of the besiegers (Ezk 29:18). There were various ways in which an invading army might deal with a fortified city so as to secure its possession. Terms might be offered to secure a capitulation (1 K 20:1 ff; 2 K 18:14 ff). An attempt might be made to reduce the city by starvation (2 K 6:24 ff; 2 K 17:5 ff). The city might be invested and captured by assault and storm, as Lachish was by Sennacherib (2 K 18:13; 19:9; see Layard, op. cit., II, plates 20–24). The chief operations of the besiegers were as follows: (1) There was the investment of the city by the besieging army. It was sometimes necessary to establish a fortified camp, like that of Sennacherib at Lachish to guard against sorties by the defenders. Of the siege of Jerus we read that Nebuchadrezzar came, "he and all his army" down on Jerus, and "he camped against it" (Jer 52:4; cf 2 K 25:1). From the commencement of the siege, slingers and archers were posted where they could keep the defenders engaged; and it is to this that reference is made when Jeremiah says they "came and took the archers against Babylon, all them that bend the bow; encamp against her round about; let none thereof escape" (Jer 50:29).

(2) There was next the drawing of a line of circumvallation (därakh) with entrenchments round about the walls. These forts were towered manned by archers, or they were used as stations from which to discharge missiles (Jer 62:4; Ezk 17:17). In this connection the word "munitio" in AV and ERV (see Ezk 11:1) disappears in ARV and is replaced by "fortress."

(3) Following upon this was the mound (qāḏlāh), or earthworks, built up to the height of the walls, so as to command the streets of the city, and strike terror into the besieged. The mound, now the height above the ground, was largely manned by men who were able to batter the lower and weaker part of the city wall (2 S 20:15; Isa 37:33; Jer 6:6; Ezk 4:2; Dn 11:15; Lam 4:18). If, however, the town, or fortress, was built upon an eminence, an inclined plane reaching to the height of the eminence might be formed of earth or stones, or trees, and the besiegers would be able to bring their engines to the foot of the walls. This road was even covered with bricks, forming a kind of paved way, up which the ponderous machines could be drawn without difficulty. To such roads there are references in Scripture (Job 19:12; Isa 29:3, "siege works"); cf Layard, Nineveh and Its Remains, II, 366 f). In the case of Tyre this mound, or way of approach, was a dam thrown across the narrow strait to obtain access to the walls (Ezk 26:8). It was, often, too, there was a trench, sometimes filled with water, at the foot of the wall, which had to be dealt with previous to an assault.

(4) The earthworks having been thrown up, and approaches to the walls secured, it was possible to set and to work the batters (bāṭirām) which were used to be employed in breaching the walls (Ezk 4:2), or in bursting open the gates (Ezk 21:22). The battering-rams were of different kinds. On metal forming its head, they can hardly fail to make an impression, and gradually, by the constantly repeated shocks, a breach is opened and the besiegers are able to rush in and bear down the defenders. It is to the shelter furnished by these towers that the prophet Nahum refers (2:5) when he says, "The mantlet is prepared," and that Isaiah points when he declares that the king of Assyria "shall not come unto this city, nor shall shoot an arrow there, neither shall be come before it with shield (māḏāṅ), nor cast up a mound against it" (Isa 37:33). Ezekiel has the same figure when, describing the siege of Tyre by Nebuchadrezzar, he declares that he shall "cast up a mound" against her, and "raise up the buckler," the buckler (gīwāḵ) being like the Rom testudo, or roof of shields, under cover of which the besiegers carried on operations (Ezk 26:6; Colonel Billerbeck [op. cit., 178] is doubtful whether this device was known to the Assyrians). Under the shelter of their movable towers the besiegers could push forward mines, an operation known as part of siegecraft from a high antiquity (see 2 S 20:15, where ARV and ERV give "undermined" as an alternative to "battered"; tunneling was known in antiquity, as the Sibon tunnel shows).

(5) The culminating operation would be the storming of the walls, the rushing of the breach. Scaling-ladders were employed to cross the encircling trench or ditch (Prov 21:22); and Joel in his powerful description of the army of locusts which had devastated the land says that they "climb the wall like men of war" (Joel 2:7). Attempts were made to set fire to the gates and to break them open with axes (Job 9:7; 2:3; Ezk 26:9). Jeremiah tells of the breach that was made in the city when Jerus was captured (Jer 39:2). The breaches in the wall of Samaria are referred to by Amos (4:3), who pictures the women rushing forth headlong like a herd of kine with hooks and fishhooks in their nostrils.

While the besiegers employed this variety of means of attack, the besieged were equally ingenious and active in maintaining the defence.

5. Siege Operations. All sorts of obstructions were placed in the way of the besieging army. The defence of the walls make them impasseable. As the siege-works of the enemy approached the main wall, it was usual to build inner fortifications, and for this purpose houses were pulled down to provide the needed space and also to supply building materials (Isa 22 10). Slingers placed upon the walls hurled stones upon the advancing enemy, and archers from loopholes and protected battlements discharged arrows against the warriors in their movable towers.

Sorties were made to damage the siege-works of the enemy and to prevent the battering-rams from being placed in position. To counteract the assaults of the battering-rams, sacks of chalk were let down in front of the position where the engine operated—a contrivance counted again by pales with osythes upon which cut off the sacks (Jos, BJ, III, 79, 20). So, too, the defenders, by dropping a doubled chain or rope from the battlements, caught the ram and broke the force of its blows. Attempts were made to destroy the ram also by fire. In the great bas-relief of the siege of Lachish an inhabitant is seen hurling a lighted torch from the wall; and it was a common device to pour boiling water or oil from the wall upon the assailants. Missiles, too, were thrown with deadly effect from the battlements by the defenders, and it was by a piece of a millstone thrown by a woman that Abimelech met his death at Thebez (Jgs 9 53).

While Uzziah of Judah furnished his soldiers with shields and spears and helmets and coats of mail and bows and slingers, he also "made in Jerusalem engines, invented by skilful men, to be on the towers and upon the battlements, wherewith to shoot arrows and great stones" (2 Ch 26 15). The Jews had, for the defense of Jerusalem against the army of Titus, engines which they had taken from the Twelfth Legion at Beth-horon which seem to have had a range of 1,200 ft. Many ingenious devices are described by Jos as employed by himself when conducting the defence of Jotapata in Galilee against Vespasian and the forces of Rome (BJ, III, vii).

When Nahash king of the Ammonites laid siege to Jabesh-gilead in the opening days of the reign of Saul, the terms of peace offered to 6. Raising the inhabitants were so humiliating of the Siege and cruel that they sought a respite of seven days and appealed to Saul in their distress. When the newly chosen king heard of their desperate condition he assembled a great army, scattered the Ammonites, and raised the siege of Jabesh-gilead, thus earning the lasting gratitude of the inhabitants (I S 11; cf I S 31 12, 13). When Zelekiah of Judah found himself besieged in Jerusalem by the Chaldaeans under Nebuzaradan, he sent intelligence to Pharaoh Hophra who crossed the frontier with his army to attack the Chaldaeans and obliged them to desist from the siege. The Chaldaeans withdrew for the moment from the walls of Jerusalem and offered battle to Pharaoh Hophra and his host, but the courage of the Egyptians failed him and he retired in haste without encountering the Chaldaeans in a pitched battle. The siege was prosecuted to the bitter end, and Jerusalem was captured and completely overrun (2 K 25 1; Jer 37 3-10; Ezek 17 17).

In the ancient law of Israel "siege" is classed with drought and pestilence and exile as punishments with which Jehovah would visit His people 7. Horrors of Siege. Of the horrors there described they had seen and again described. At the siege of Samaria by Ben-hadad II, so terrible were the straits to which the besieged were reduced that they cooked and ate their own children (2 K 6 28). In the siege of Jerusalem by the Chaldaeans, which ended in the overthrow of the city and the destruction of the Temple, the sufferings of the inhabitants from hunger and disease were incredible (2 K 25 3; Jer 32 24; Lam 2 20; 4 8-10). The horrors of siege have, perhaps, reached their climax in the account given by Jos of the tragedy of Masada. To escape capture by the Romans, ten men were chosen by lot from among the occupants of the fortress, 960 in number, including combatants and non-combatants, men, women and children, to slay the rest. From these ten one was similarly chosen to slay the survivors, and he, having accomplished his awful task, ran his sword into his own body (Jos, BJ, VII, ix, 1). While all the inhabitants of a city under siege suffered the famine of bread and the thirst for water, the combatants ran the risk of impalement and other forms of torture to which prisoners in Assyria and Chaldaea and Rome were subjected.

The horrors attending the siege of a city were only surpassed by the barbarities perpetrated at its capture. The emptying of a city by its capture is likened to the hurling of a stone from a sling (Jer 10 17, 18). Deportation of the whole of the inhabitants often followed (2 K 17 6; 24 14). Not only were the inhabitants of the captured city deported, but their gods were carried off with them and the idols broken in pieces. This is predicted or recorded of Babylon (Isa 21 9; 46 1; Jer 50 2), of Egypt (Jer 43 12), of Samaria (Hos 10 6). Indiscriminate slaughter followed the entrance of the assaulting, and the city was usually given over to the flames (Jer 39 8, 9; Lam 4 18). "Cities without number," says Shalmaneser II in one of his inscriptions, "I wrecked, razed, burned with fire." Houses were destroyed and women dishonored (Zeal 14 2). When Darius took Babylon, he impaled three thousand prisoners (Herod, iii.159). The Scythians scalped and flayed their enemies and used their skins for horse trappings (ib, iv.64). The Assyrian sculptures show prisoners subjected to horrible torments, or carried away into slavery. The captured Zelekiah had his eyes put out after he had seen his own sons cruelly put to death (2 K 25 7). It is only employing the imagery familiar to Assyrian warfare when Isaiah represents Jeh as saying: "Therefore will I put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle into thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way by which thou camest" (Isa 37 29). Anticipating the savage barbarities that would follow the capture of Samaria by the Assyrians, Hosca foresees the infants being dashed to pieces and the women with child being ripped open (2 Ki 19 36; 2 Ch 32 24). The prophet Nahum predicting the overthrow of Nineveh recalls how at the capture of N-unam (Egypt Thebes) by the Assy conqueror, Ashurbanipal, "her young children also were dashed in pieces at the head of all the streets; and they cast lots for her honorable men, and all her great men were bound in chains" (Nah 3 10).

The only explicit reference to siege operations in the NT is Our Lord's prediction of the complete destruction of Jerusalem when He wept over it: "...and shall dash thee to the ground, and thy children within thee, and shall not leave in thee one stone upon another" (Lk 19 44). The order and particulars of the siege are in accordance with the accounts of siege operations in the OT. How completely the prediction was fulfilled we see from Jl 3 1-9.

Figurative: In St. Paul's Epp. there are figures taken from siege operations. In 2 Cor 10 4 we have the "casting down of strongholds," where the Gr word κατακαίην, κατακαίησαν, from κατακαίνω, κατακαίων, is the regular word used in LXX in the reduction of a fortress (Prov 21 22; Lam 2 2; 1 Mac 5 65). In Eph 6 16 there is allusion to siege-works, for the subtle temptations of Satan are set forth as the flaming darts hurled by the besiegers of a fortress which the Christian soldier is to quench with the shield of faith.

SIGN, sīn (סינ, "a sign," "mark," יד, שקר, מופת, "wonder"); σημεῖον, σημελον, "a sign," "signal," "mark": A mark by which persons or things are distinguished and made known. In Scripture used generally of an address to the senses to attest the existence of supersensible and therefore Divine power. Thus the plagues of Egypt were "signs" of Divine displeasure against the Egyptians (Ex 4 8 ff; Josh 24 17; and often); and the miracles of Jesus were "signs" to attest His unique relationship with God (Mt 12 38; Jn 2 18; Acts 2 22). Naturally, therefore, both in the OT and the NT, "signs" are assimilated to the miraculous, and prevalently associated with immediate Divine intervention. The popular belief in this communication between the visible and the invisible worlds has always been, and is now, widespread. So-called "natural" explanations, however ingenious or cogent, fail with the great majority of people to explain anything. Wesley and Spurgeon were as firm believers in the validity of such methods of intercourse between man and God as were Moses and Gideon, Peter and John.

The faith that walks by signs is not by any means to be lightly esteemed. It has been allied with the highest nobility of character and with the most signal achievement. Moses accepted the leadership of his people in response to a succession of signs: e.g. the burning bush, the rod which became a serpent, the leprous hand, etc (Ex 3 and 4); so, too, did Gideon, who was not above making proof of God in the sign of the fleece of wool (Jgs 6 36-40). In the training of the Twelve, Jesus did not disdain the use of signs (Lk 5 11, and often); and the visions by which Peter and Paul were led to the evangelization of the Gentiles were interpreted by them as signs of the Divine purpose (Acts 10 and 16).

The sacramental use of the sign dates from the earliest period, and the character of the sign is as diverse as the occasion. The rainbow furnishes a radiant suggestion of God's overarching love and assurance that the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy the earth (Gen 9 13; cf 4 15); the Feast of Unleavened Bread is a reminder of God's cure in bringing His people out of bondage (Ex 13 3); the Sabbath is an oft-recurring proclamation of God's gracious thought for the well-being of man (Ex 31 13; Ezk 20 12); the brazen serpent, an early foreshadowing of the cross, perpetuates the imperishable promise of forgiveness and redemption (Nu 21 9); circumcision is made the seal of the special covenant under which Israel became a people set apart (Gen 17 11); baptism, the Christian equivalent of circumcision, becomes the sign and seal of the dedicated life and the mark of those avowedly seeking to share in the blessedness of the Kingdom of God (Lk 3 12-14; Acts 2 41, and often); bread and wine, a symbol of the spiritual manna by which soul and body are preserved unto everlasting life, is the hallowed memorial of the Lord's death until His coming again (Lk 22 14-20; 1 Cor 11 23-28). Most common of all were the local altars and mounds consecrated in simple and sincere fashion to a belief in God's ruling and overruling providence (Josh 4 1-10).

Signs were offered in proof of the Divine commission of prophet (Isa 20 3) and apostle (2 Cor 12 12), and of the Messiah Himself (Jn 20 30; Acts 2 22); and they were submitted in demonstration of the Divine character of their message (2 K 20 9; Jn 20 26, Acts 38 1). And in baptism the child to be born of a young woman (Isa 7 10-16; of Lk 2 12) is to certify the prophet's pledge of a deliverer for a captive people. See IMMANUEL.

With increase of faith the necessity for signs will gradually decrease. Jesus hints at this (Jn 4 48), as does also Paul (1 Cor 1 22). Nevertheless "signs" in the sense of displays of miraculous powers, are to accompany the faith of believers (Mk 16 17 5), use in and forthwith characterize the dispensation of the Holy Spirit, and mark the consummation of the ages (Rev 15 1). SILAS, sī'lass (Σίλας, Silas, probably contraction for Σίλανως, Silanous; the Heb equivalents suggested are שִׁלֶּהַ, silēh, "Tertius," or שִׁלֹא, silōă, "asked" [Zahn]). The Silas of Acts is generally identified with the Silvanus of the Eph. His identification with Titus has also been suggested, based on 2 Cor 1: 19: 8: 23, but this is very improbable (cf Knowling, Expositor's Gr Text, II, 326). Silas, who was probably a Levite (cf Acts 6: 37), accompanied Paul during the greater part of his 2d missionary journey (Acts 15-18). At the meeting of the Christian community under James at Jeru, which decided that circumcision should not be obligatory in the case of Gentile believers, Silas and Judas were appointed along with Paul and Barnabas to convey to the churches in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia the epistle informing them of this decision. As "leading men among the brethren" at Jeru, and therefore more officially representative of the Jeru church than Paul and Barnabas, Silas and Judas were further commissioned to confirm the contents of the letter by "word of mouth." On arrival at Antioch, the ep. was delivered, and Judas and Silas, "being themselves also prophets, exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed them." Their mission being thus completed, the four were "dispersed in peace from the brethren unto those that had sent them" (Acts 15: 42), "unto the antiochian churches." (.5) (Acts 15: 22-25).

Different readings now render the immediate moves of Silas somewhat obscure; ver 33 would imply that he returned to Jeru. But some texts proceed in ver 34 in the line of his"appointing Silas to abide therestill," and others add "and Judas alone proceeded." Or, the first half is accepted by 35. The principal texts however reject the whole verse and are followed in this by RV. It is held by some that he remained in Antioch till chosen by Paul (ver 40). Others maintain that he returned to Jeru where John Mark then was (cf Acts 13: 13); and that either during the interval of "some days" (Acts 15: 36), when the events described in Gal 2: 11-12 (Wend), he returned to Antioch along with Peter, or that he and John Mark were summoned thither by Paul and Barnabas, subsequent to their departure. However, see Knowling, Expositor's Gr Text, II, 330, 332-35.)

Upon Barnabas' separation from Paul, Silas was chosen by Paul in his place, and the two missionaries, "after being commended by the brethren [at Antioch] to the grace of the Lord," proceeded on their journey (Acts 15: 37-39). Travelling through Asia, Syria, Cilicia, Galatia, Phrygia and Mysia, where they delivered the decree of the Jeru council and strengthened the churches, and were joined by Timothy, they eventually reached Troas (Acts 16: 14-16). Their indications are that at this city Luke also became one of their party (cf also the apocryphal "Acts of St. Paul," where this is definitely stated; Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 544). Upon the call of the Macedonian, the missionary band set sail for Greece, and after touching at Samothrace, they landed at Neapolis (Acts 16: 9-11). At Philippi, Lydia, a seller of purple, was converted, and with her they made her abode; but the exorcism of an evil spirit from a sorceress brought upon Silas and Paul the enmity of her masters, whose source of gain was thereby being charged before the magistrates with causing a breach of the peace and preaching false doctrine, their garments were rent off them and they were scourged and imprisoned. In no way dismayed, they prayed and sang hymns to God, and an earthquake in the middle of the night secured them a miraculous release. The magistrates, on learning that the two prisoners whom they had so maltreated were Rom citizens, came in person and besought them to depart out of the city (Acts 16: 12-19). After a short visit to the house of Lydia, where they held an interview with the brethren, they departed for Thessalonica, leaving Luke behind (cf Knowling, op. cit., 354-55). There they made many converts, esp. among the Greeks, but upon the house of Jason, their host, being attacked by hostile Jews, they were compelled to escape by night to Berea (16: 40—17: 10). There they received a better hearing from the Jews, but the enmity of the Thessalonian Jews still pursued them, and Paul was conducted for safety to Akiem (Iam 17: 13), and that they were overtaken by his two followers (18: 5). Knowling (op. cit., 363-64) suggests that they may have actually met at Athens, and that Timothy was then sent to Thessalonica (cf 1 Thess 3: 12), and Silas to Philippi (cf Phil 4: 13). By the time they came together again at Corinth. The arrival of Silas and Timothy at that city is probably referred to in 2 Cor 11: 9. It is implied in Acts 18: 18 that Silas did not leave Corinth at the same time as Paul, but no further definite reference is made to him in the narrative of the 2d missionary journey.

Assuming his identity with Silvanus, he is mentioned along with Paul and Timothy in 2 Cor 1: 19 as having preached Christ among the Corinthians (cf Acts 18: 5). In 1 Thessalonians, he is one of the same three send greetings to the church at Thessalonica (cf Acts 17: 1—9). In 1 Pet 5: 12 he is mentioned as a "faithful brother" and the bearer of that letter to the churches of the Dispersion (cf Acts 16: 40). But this latter text assigns He to the authorship of Silas is untenable.

SILENCE, sī' lens: Five Heb roots, with various derivatives, and two Gr words are thus tr. The word is used lit. for dumbness, interrupted speech, as in Lam 2: 10; Ps 32: 3; Ecc 3: 7; Am 5: 13; Acts 16: 12; 1 Cor 14: 28; 1 Tim 2: 11,12 AV (ARV "quietness"); Rev 8: 1, or figuratively of the unanswerers of the believer (Ps 33: 1; 30: 22; Jer 8: 14); of awe in the presence of the Divine majesty (Isa 41: 1; Zec 2: 13), or of death (1 S 2: 9; Ps 94: 17; 116: 17).

later used of cotton and silk): The only undoubted reference to silk in the Bible is the passage cited from Rev, where it is mentioned among the merchandise of Babylon. Sērōkon, "silk," is from Sř, the Gr name of China, when Chinese silk was first obtained. The equivalent Lat sericum occurs frequently in classical authors, and is found in the Vulg (Est 8 15) for būç, "fine linen." For būç, bassus, and sshēh EV has nearly always "fine linen," but for sshēh in Prov 31 22, AV has "silk," and in Gen 41 42 and Ex 25 4, AV's has "silk" and RV's has "cotton." See LINEN; FINE.

There can be little doubt of the correctness of EV "silk" for meshi in Exk 16 10, "I gathered thee about with fine linen [šēhah], and covered thee with silk [meshi]," and in the similar passage, Ezk 16 13.

Silk is produced by all Lepidoptera, butterflies and moths, but it is of great economic importance only in the Chinese silkworm, Bombyx mori, whose larva, a yellowish-white caterpillar from 2 to 3 in. long, feeds on the leaves of the mulberry (Morus). A pair of large glands on the two sides of the stomach secrete a viscous fluid, which is conveyed by ducts to an orifice under the mouth. On issuing into the air, the fine stream is hardened into the silk fiber, which the caterpillar spins into a cocoon. Within the cocoon the caterpillar is presently transformed into the chrysalis or pupa. The cocoons from which silk is to be spun are subjected to heat which kills the pupae and prevents them from being transformed into the perfect insects or moths, which would otherwise damage the cocoons as they made their exit.

The raising of silkworms, and the spinning and weaving of silk are now important industries in Syria, though the insect was unknown in Bible times. It was introduced to the Mediterranean region from China centuries after Christ. Coarse silk is produced from the Chinese oak silk-moth, Saturnia pernici, and from the Japanese oak silk-moth, Saturnia yama-mak. The silkworm moth of Syria and Pal is Saturnia pyri, from which silk has also been spun, but not commercially. See, further, WEAVING.

ALFRED ÉLY DAY

SILLA, sił'a (N.2, sil'a; B, Ṭallā, Ga'id, A, Γαλλάδης, Gaiddád): Josiah was assassinated by his servants "at the house of Millo" on the way that he "goeth down to Silla." (2 K 12 20). Wherever Beth-millo stood, Silla was evidently in the valley below it; but nothing is known of what it was or where it stood.

SILOAM, si-lō'am, si-lō'äm, SILOAH, si-lō'a, SHELAI, shē'la, SHILÔAH, shi-lō'a: (1) הַשִּׁלֹחַ, mā ha-shilōh (šilôh or shillôh) is a passive form and means "sent" or "conducted," "the waters of [the] Shiloh." (Isa 8 6). (2) הַשִּׁלֹא, bērēkhāth ha-shelâ, "the pool of [the] Shelah." (AV "Siloah") (Neh 3 15). (3) מִנְּהַל שִׁלֹא, mīnḥāl shilōa, "the hills of Siloam." (Isa 8 6). (4) מִנְּהַל שִׁלֹא, mīnḥâl shilōa, "the tower of Siloam" (Lk 13 4).

Although the name is chiefly used in the OT and Jos as the name of certain "waters," the surviving name today, Silvan, is that of a fairly prosperous village which extends along the steep east side of the Kidron valley from a little N. of the "Virgin's Fountain" as far as Bvr Eyyâb. The greater part of the village, the older and better built section, belongs to Moslem fellahin who cultivate the well-watered gardens in the valley and on the hill slopes opposite, but a southern part has recently been built in an extremely primitive manner by Yemeni Jews, immigrants from South Arabia, and still farther S., in the commencement of the Wady en Nâr, is the wretched settlement of the lepers. How long the site of Siloam has been occupied it is impossible to say. The village is mentioned in the 9th cent. in the Arab Muktadius. The numerous rock cuttings, steps, houses, caves, etc., some of which have at times served as chapels, show that the site has been much inhabited in the past, and at one period at least by hermits. The mention of "those eighteen, upon whom the tower in Siloam fell, and killed them!" (Lk 13 4) certainly suggests that there was a settlement there in NT times, although some writers consider that this may have reference to some tower on the city walls near the Pool of Siloam.

Opposite to the main part of Siloâh is the "Virgin's Fount," ancient Gihon (q.v.), whose waters are practically monopolized by the villagers. It is the waters of this spring which are referred to in the Aqueduct Isa 8 6b. "Forasmuch as these people have refused the waters of Shiloah that go softly, ... now therefore, behold, the Lord bringeth up upon them the waters of the River."
Siloam, the explicit statement of Jos (Bl, V, iv, 1) that the fountain of Siloam, which he says was a plentiful spring of sweet water, was at the mouth of the Tyropoön would make us sure.

A little below this pool, at the very mouth of el-Wad, is a dry pool, now a vegetable garden, known as Birket el Hamra, "the red pool." For many years the sewage of Jerusalem found its way to this spot, but when in 1604 an ancient city sewer was rediscovered (see PEFS, 1904, 392-94), the sewage was diverted and the pool to the east which was sold with this property surrounded it with a wall. Although this is no longer a pool, there is no doubt but that it was once a pool because the great and massive dam which Bliss excavated here (see JERUSALEM, VI, 5) had clearly been made original in order to support a large concrete aqueduct which was constructed from Gihon along the side of the Kidron valley before Hezekiah’s great tunnel. If this is correct (and excavations are needed here to confirm this theory), then this may be the “lower pool” referred to in Isa 22 9, the waters of which Hezekiah stopped, and perhaps, too, that described in the same passage as the “old pool.”

The earliest known Heb inscription of any length was accidentally discovered near the lower end of the Siloam aqueduct in 1880, and reported by Dr. Schick. It was found upon Siloam a rock-smoothed surface about 27 in. square, some 15 ft. from the mouth of the aqueduct; it was about 3 ft. above the bottom of the channel on the east side. The inscription consisted of six large letters of Heb, and has been traced by Professor Sayce as follows:

(1) Behold the excavation. Now this is the history of the tunnel: while the excavators were still lifting up
(2) The pick toward each other, and while there were yet three cubits* to be broken through, the voice of the one called
(3) This prophet, for there was an [? ] access in the rock on the west. They rose up . . . they struck on the west of the
(4) Excavation; the excavators struck, each to meet the other, pick to pick. And there flowed
(5) The waters from their outlet to the pool for a thousand, two hundred cubits
(6) Of a cubit, was the height of the rock over the head of the excavators . . .

It is only a roughly scratched inscription of the nature of a graffito; the flowing nature of the writing is fully explained by Dr. Reisner’s recent discovery of the same at Samaria, and a modern judaean view of the Hebrew and ink. It is not an official inscription, and consequently there is no kingly name and no date, but the prevalent view that it was made by the work people who carried Hezekiah’s great work (2 K 20 20) is now further confirmed by the character of the Heb in the crescents which Reisner dates as of the time of Ahub.

Unfortunately this priceless monument of antiquity was violently removed from its place by some miscreants. The fragments have been collected and are now placed together in the Constantinople museum. Fortunately several excellent “squeezes” as well as transcriptions were made before the inscription was broken up, so that the damage done is to be regretted rather on sentimental than on literary grounds. SILVER, sil'ver (σιλβή, silβή; ἀργυρόν, argyron, ἀργυρός, argyros): Silver was known in the earliest historic times. Specimens of early Egypt and Bab silver work testify to the skill of the ancient silversmiths. In Pal, silver objects have been found antedating the occupation of the land by the Hebrews. This metal was used for making all kinds of ornamental objects. In the mound of Gezer were found bowls, vases, ladles, balsam-pins, rings and bracelets of silver. The rings and settings for scarabs or seals were commonly of this metal. The first mention of silver in the Bible is in Gen 13:2, where it says that Abraham was rich in cattle, in silver and gold. At that time it was commonly used in exchange in the form of bars or other shapes. Coins of that metal were of a much later date (Gen 20:16; 23:15; 24:53; 37:28, etc.). booty was collected in silver (Jos 6:19); tribute was paid in the same (1 K 15:19). It was also used for jewelry (Gen 44:2). The Children of Israel systematically despooled the Egyptians of their silver before the exodus (Ex 3:22; 11:2; 12:35, etc.). Ex 20:23 implies that idols were made of it. It was largely used in the fittings of the tabernacle (Ex 26:8) and later of the temple (2 Ch 2:7). It is likely that the ancient supply of silver came from the mountains of Asia Minor where it is still found in abundance associated with lead as argentiferous galena, and with copper sulphide. The Turkish government mines this silver on shares with the natives. The Samiitt bowls, vases, ladles, and caskets were unusually worked. Later Phoenians shipped quantities of it from Greece and Spain. The Arabian sources are doubtful (2 Ch 9:14). Although silver does not tarnish readily in the air, it does corrode badly in the limestone soil of Pal and Syria. This probably partly accounts for the small number of objects of this metal found. On the site of the ancient jewellers’ shops of Tyre the writer found objects of gold, bronze, lead, iron, but none of silver.

Figurative: Silver is to be as stones in Jerus (1 K 10:27) typified great abundance (cf Job 3:15; 22:25; 27:16; also Isa 60:17; Zec 9:3). The trying of men’s hearts was compared to the refining of silver (Ps 66:10; Isa 48:10). Jeh’s words were as pure as silver refined seven times (Ps 12:6). The gaining of understanding is better than the gaining of silver (Prov 3:14; of 8:19; 10:19; 16:16; 22:11). Silver become cross denoted deterioration (Isa 1:22; Jer 6:30). Breast and arms of silver was interpreted by Daniel to mean the interior kingdom to follow Nebuchadnezzar’s (Dan 2:32, 39).

In the NT, reference should be made esp. to Acts 19:24; Jas 5:3; Rev 18:12. James A. Patch

SILVERLING, sil’vér-ling (σκῦρον, ἑλέφθ keoph [Isa 7:23]): ‘A thousand of silver’ means a thousand shekels. See Piece of Silver.

SILVERSMITH, sil’vér-smith (ἄγρυκόποσ, argurókôpoś): Mentioned only once (Acts 19:24), where reference is made to Demetrius, a leading member of the silversmiths’ guild of Ephesus.

SIMALCUE, si-mal-ku’ē: AV = RV IMALCUE (q.v.).

SIMEON, sim’ē-on (σήμεων, shámōn; Σημέων, Simeón, Simeon): the Heb root is from šmâ, šâmâr, “to hear” (Gen 29:33); some modern scholars [Hitzig, W. R. Smith, Stade] derive it from Arâb, simâ, “the offspring of the hyena and female wolf?”

In Gen 29:33; 30:18-21; 35:23, Simeon is given as full brother to Reuben, Levi, Judah, Issachar and Zebulun, the son of Leah; and in Gen 46:29 Simeon is the brother of Levi and Dinah. He was let as a hostage in Egypt by orders of Joseph (Gen 42:24; 43:23).

In the “blessing” of the dying Jacob, Simeon and Levi are linked together:

1. The Patriarch: “Simeon and Levi are brethren, Violent avengers of their oxen and their asses;”

Biblical: Unto their assembly, my glory, he not thou united;

Data: For in their anger they slew a man, in their self-will they killed an ox.

Curst be their anger, for it was fierce; And their wrath, for it was cruel:

Will divide them in Jacob, And scatter them in Israel” (Gen 49:5-7).

Whatever view may be taken of the events of Gen 34:25 (and some would see in it “a tradition of the settlement of Jacob which belongs to a cycle quite independent of the descent into Egypt and the Exodus”), it is clear that we have here a reference to it and the suggestion that the subsequent history of the tribe, and its eventual absorption in Judah, was the result of violence. In the same way the priestly Levites became distributed throughout the other tribes without any tribal inheritance of their own (Dt 18:1; Josh 13:14). From the mention (Gen 46:10; Ex 6:15) of Shaul as being the son of a Canaanite woman, it may be supposed that the tribe was a pastoral one partly furnished with silver.

The “blessing of Moses” (Dt 33) is not mentioned at all in the Heb text, although in some MSS of LXX the latter half of ver 6 is made to apply to him: “Let Simeon be a small company.” The history of the tribe is scanty and raises many problems. Of the many theories advanced to meet them it cannot be said that any one answers all difficulties.

In the wilderness of Sinai the Simeonites camped beside the Reubenites (Nu 2:12; 10:19); it was Simeon, a member of one of the leading families of this tribe, who was slain in battle (Nu 21:23).

2. The Tribe in Scripture 26:14). The statistics in Nu 1:22f, where the Simeonites are given as 59,300, compared with the 20 census (Nu 26:14), where the numbers are 22,200, indicate a diminishing tribe. Some have connected this with the sin of Zinzi.

At the recital of the land at Mt. Gerizim, Simeon is mentioned last among those that are to come up to give the blessings (Dt 27:12). In the conquest of Canaan “Judah said unto Simeon his brother, Come up with me into my lot, that we may fight against the Canaanites; and I likewise will go with thee into thy lot.” So Simeon went with himself” (Jgs 1:3; cf ver 17). Many scholars find in Gen 34 a tribal attempt on the part of the Simeonites to gain possession of Shechem; if this is so, Judah did not assist, and the utter failure may have been a cause of Simeon’s subsequent dependence upon, and final absorption in, Judah.

In Jgs 4 and 5 Simeon is never mentioned. In the settlement of the land there is no account of how Simeon established himself in his territory (except the scanty reference in Jgs 1:5), but “their inheritance was apportioned among the midst of the inheritance of the children of Judah” (Josh 19:1); this is accounted for (ver 9), “for the portion of the children of Judah was too much for them.” Nevertheless we find there the very cities which are apportioned to Simeon, allotted to Judah (Josh 15:21-22; Neh 11:29). It is suggested (in 1 Ch 4:31) that the independent possession of these cities ceased in the time of David. David sent spoil to several Simeonite towns (1 S 30:26), and in 1 Ch 12:29, etc. it is ros: 34:24, etc. Simeonite warriors came to David in Hebron. In 1 Ch 27:16 we have mention of a ruler of the Simeonites, Shophathiah, son of Maacah.

SIMEONITES, sim'ē-ōn'ī-tes. See Simeon.

SIMILITUDE, si-mil'i-ā-tud: In AV means either "an exact facsimile" (Ps 106 20 AV, RV "likeness"; Rom 6 14, etc), or else "the form itself" (Nu 12 8; Dt 4 12.15.16 for "form" [so RV]); cf "likeness." ERV has retained the word in 2 Ch 4 3; Dn 10 16 (ERV "likeness"), while the AV and RV have used "form." It has been supposed by many authorities that the name Sh'm/N occurs in the list of places plundered by Thothmes III (see Petrie, Hist., XI, 104; also Hommel, Assyrian Inscriptions, 208; Sayce, Early Heb Traditions, 392). In the 7th cent. we have a doubtful reference in an inscription of Esar-haddon relating his Egyptian campaign when a city Ap-kū is mentioned as in the country of Shu-me-n(a), which may possibly be a reference to Simeon. The survival of the name so late, if true, is strange, in the light of what we gather from the Bible about the tribe. (For discussion of both of these inscriptions, with references to the lit., see BB, coll. 4238-30.)

The city of Simeon as given in Josh 19 2-6 and 1 Ch 4 32.31 are (the names in parentheses are variations in the latter reference):

Ashan (1 Ch 6 17) is the only city not assigned to the priests. It is written wrongly as "Ain" in Josh 21 16. All the above cities, with certain variations in form, and with the exception of Etam in 1 Ch 4 32, which is probably a mistake, occur in the list of the cities of Judah (Josh 15 26-32.42). Ziklag is mentioned (1 S 27 6) as being the private property of the kings of Judah from the days of David, who received it from Achiab, king of Gath.

For the situation of these cities, so far as is known, see under their names. It is clear that they were all situated in the southwestern part of Pal, and that Simeon had no definite territorial boundaries, but isolated cities, with their villages, among those of the people of Judah.

ificance of Simon's administration consists in this, that he completed the work of Jonathan and left the Jewish people absolutely independent of Syria" (Schürer).

See MACCABEUS, II, 4.

(4) Simon high priest, son of Onias I, whom he succeeded c 300 BC. He was one of the last of the Great Synagogue, and to him is attributed the saying, "On three things the world depends—the Law, worship and the showing of kindness.
According to Jos (Ant, XII, i, 5) this Simon was called "the dust" (aEkeidikios), "on account of his piety and his benevolent disposition toward his countrymen."

Many authorities (Herzfeld, Derenbourg, Stanley, Cheyne) assert that Jos is wrong in attaching this epitaph to Simon I instead of Simon II. Schürer is not sure on this question. But the Talmud passage which Derenbourg cites means the opposite of what Benjamin, viz. it is intended to show how splendid and holy were the days of Simon (ha-cadik) compared with the later days. Besides, Jos is more likely to have known the truth on this matter than these later authorities.
The same uncertainty obtains as to whether the eulogium in Sir 50 1 ff of "the great priest" refers to Simon I or Simon II. Schürer and others refer it to Simon II. It is more likely to refer to the Simon I who was famous as "the Just," and consequently to Simon I. Besides we know little of the achievements of Simon II to entitle him to such praise. The building operations mentioned would suit the time of Simon I better, as Ptolemy captivated himself with a probably destroyed detached temple. The Talmud states that this Simon (and not Jaddua) mot Alexander the Great.

(5) Simon II, high priest, son of Onias II and grandson of Simon I and father of Onias III, flourished about the end of the 3rd cent. BC, and was succeeded by his son Onias III c 198 BC. Jos says that this Simon in the conflict of the sons of Joseph sided with the elder sons against Hyrcanus the dinner-jar. Schürer (probably incorrectly) thinks that he is the Simon praised in Sir 50 1 ff. See (2) above (3 Macce 2 1; Jos, Ant, XII, iv, 10).

(4) Simon, a Benjamite, guardian of the temple, who, having quarreled with the high priest Onia III, inaugurated Appolonius of the untold sums of money in the temple treasury. Appolonius laid the matter before the king Seleucus IV, who sent Heliodorus to remove the money. An apparnyr prevented Heliodorus from accomplishing his task (2 Macce 3 4 ff). It is further reported, that Simon consetrated his attention on Onias. He is spoken of as brother of the renegade Menelaus (4 23). Of his end we know nothing.

(5) Simon Chossameus (B [and Suet], ὁ καθήμενος, Chossameus, A, Ἀκοσμάως, C, Ἀκοσμάως, O, Ἀκοσμάως, who had married "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 32). Simon apparently is "Shimeon" (shim'ôn) of the sons of Harim (Ezr 10 31); Chossameus is probably a corrupt standing in the place of, but not resembling, any of the three names: Benjamin, Malluch, Shamraiah, which Eed emits from the Ezr list.

form of Heb שמעון, šim'ôn). Gesenius gives the meaning of the Heb word as "hearing with acceptance"; it is formed from שמע, šā'ma, "to hear":

1. Simon, a Magician
2. Simon and the Apostles
(1) Simon and Philip
(2) Simon and Peter and John
3. The Magicians and the Gospel
4. Testimony of Early Christian Writers
5. Sources of Legendary History
6. Traditions of His Death
7. The Simonians
8. Was Simon the Originator of Gnosticism?

The name or term "Magus" is not given to him in the NT; but it is used to designate or particularize him on account of the inci-

1. Simon, baptized and "dared" recorded in Acts 8 9-24, for a. a Magician, though the word "Magus" does not occur; yet in ver 9 the present participle magoi (magus) is used, and is tr. both in AV and in RV,

"used sorcery." Simon accordingly was a sorcerer, he "bewitched" the people of Samaria (AV). In ver 11 it is also said that "of long time he had amazed" them "with his sorceries" (magieia).

b. The "claim", given to Simon; he carried the claim that he was a "great one"; and this claim was acknowledged by the Samaritans, for previous to the introduction of the gospel into Samaria, "they all gave heed [to him], "from the least to the greatest, saying, This man is that power of God which is called Great" (10).

(1) It so happened, however, that Philip the deacon and evangelist went down from Jerus to Samaria, and "proclaimed unto them the Christ" (ver 5); and as the result of the proclamation of the gospel, the Apostles many were gathered into the Christian church. Many miracles also were performed by Philip, sick persons cured, and demons cast out, and Simon fell under the influence of all these things, both of the preaching and of the "signs." So great was the impression now made upon Simon that he "believed" (ver 13). This means, at least, that he saw that Philip was able in the name of Jesus Christ to display powers greater than anything he himself was acquainted with: Philip's power was greater by far than Simon's. He therefore came forward as one of the new converts, and was baptized. After his baptism he continued with Philip. The signs which accompany the works of the gospel to this city did not cease, and Simon seeing them "was amazed." The word denoting Simon's amazement at the "signs" brought by Philip is the same as that used to express how the people of Samaria had been amazed at Simon’s sorceries. It is an indication of the nature of the faith which he possessed in the gospel—wondering amazement at a new phenomenon not yet understood, not repentance or trust in Christ.

(2) As having reached Jerusalem, the events which had occurred in Samaria, the apostles sent Peter and John to establish the work there. These two apostles prayed that they might receive the Holy Ghost, which they had not yet received. And when they had laid their hands upon the converts, the Spirit was given to them. At this early period in the history of the church the Holy Ghost was bestowed in a visible manner which showed itself in such miraculous gifts as are described in Acts 2. Simon saw what had taken place, and, instead of joining the company of those who had truly repented and trusted Christ, he came forward with the same amazement as he had previously shown, and offered money to Peter and John, if they would impart to him the power of giving the Holy Ghost to others. Peter instantly rebuked this bold and ungodly request, and did so with such sternness as to cause Simon to ask that the judgment threatened by the apostle might not fall upon him.

It is not strange to find the gospel brought into direct conflict with magicians, for in the 1st and 2d cent. there were a multitude of such persons who pretended to possess supernatural powers, and which they and the Gospel flattered the sinful inclinations of the human heart, and fell in with men’s current ways of thinking, and required no self-renunciation at all. For these reasons the magicians found a ready belief on the part of many. The emperor Tiberius, in his later years, had a host of magicians in constant attendance upon him. Elymas, with whom Paul came in contact in Cyprus “endeavored a multitude of the multitude of a statue, was dug up in the Tiber at the spot described by Tacitus; and on it were seen the words Semonti Secundus, the Sabine, 545. It seems probable that Justin was mistaken in what he said about a statue having been erected in honor of Simon Magus. It is incredible that the folly should ever be carried to such an extent as that a statue should be erected, and it seems probable that a decree was “calling Simon Magus among the dei Romani” (Neander, History of Church History, 188). This shows the source of the error into which Justin had fallen.

There are many stories told by some of the early Christian writers regarding Simon Magus, which are of such a nature as to be incredible. Some of them are improbable in the extreme and border on the impossible.

(3) Jerome, who proceeds to quote from writings of Simon, represents him as employing these words in reference to himself: “I am the Word of God. I am the Emperor. I am all there is of God.” (Mansel, The Gnostic Heretics, 82). Tertullian (Mansel, I., 82) writes regarding him: “Simon, having purchased a certain woman named Helen, who had been a prostitute in the city of Tyre, carried her about with him, and said that she was his first conception, or that she was destined to the conception of all things, by whom, in the beginning, he conceived the thought of making for the angels and men. Thus this conception proceeded forth from him, and knowing her father’s wishes, she descended to the lower world, and produced the spirits and powers of this world, which were to be the models that this world was made. But after she had produced them, she was reached by the chief angel, and they were unwilling to be considered the offspring of any other being: for he himself was entirely unknown by Helen; but his descent by conception was detected by those powers and angels which were put forth from her, and suffered every insult from them that she might not return upward to her father: and this went so far that she was even confined within a human body, and for ages passed into another female body, as it were, when she was born into another. He said also that she was that Helen, on whose account the Trojan war was fought. . . .” Furthermore, we find that the supreme source of their prophecies under the inspiration of those angels who had obtained the word of Simon and Magus Paul, was a prudent man” (Acts 13, 7 AV). Elymas was one of those magicians, and he endeavored to turn away the deputy from the faith. Luke expressly calls this man “magus,” Elymas the magus (Acts 13, 8 c.).

(1) The story of Simon Magus does not close with what is narrated in the Acts, for the early Christian writers have much to say in regard to him. The martyr, himself a Samaritan, states that Simon Magus was a “Samaritan from the village called Gittus.” Justin Martyr states that, in the reign of Claudius Caesar, Simon was worshipped as a god at Rome on account of his magical powers, and that a statue had been erected to him, on the island in the river Tiber, with the inscription Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, “To Simon the sacred god.” Curiously enough, in the year 1574, a stone which appears to be part of the pedestal of a statue, was dug up in the Tiber at the spot described by Tacitus; and on it were seen the words Semonti Secundus, the Sabine, 545. It seems probable that Justin was mistaken in what he said about a statue having been erected in honor of Simon Magus. It is incredible that the folly should ever be carried to such an extent as that a statue should be erected, and it seems probable that a decree was “calling Simon Magus among the dei Romani” (Neander, History of Church History, 188). This shows the source of the error into which Justin had fallen.

lasts for three days, Simon maintaining that there are two gods, and that the God of the O.T. is an imperfect being. Simon Magus withdraws to Tyre and then to Sidon. Peter follows Simon from place to place, countering his sorceries, and instructing the people. At Laodicea a second disputation takes place between the apostle and Simon on the same subjects.

The Homilies are not a Christian protest against Gnosticism, but merely that of one gnostic school or sect against another, the Ebionite against the Marcionite. The Deity of Christ is denied, and He is regarded as one of the Jewish prophets.

In the legends Simon is represented as constantly opposing Peter, who ultimately discredit and vanquishes him. These legends occur in more forms than one, the earlier form selecting Antioch as the place where Simon was discomfited by the apostle and where he also died; the later tradition chooses Rome for these events.

One tradition tells how the magician ordered his followers to bury him in a grave, promising that if this were done, he would rise again on the third day. They did as he wished and buried him; but this time death was the end of him, for he did not rise again.

Simon is said to have met his death at Rome, after an especially renowned altercation with Peter. During this final controversy with the apostle, Simon had raised himself in the air by the help of evil spirits, and in answer to the prayer of Peter and Paul he was dashed to the ground and killed.

According to another form of this tradition, Simon proposed to give the Roman emperor a proof of his power by flying off to God. He succeeded, it is said, in flying for a certain distance over Rome, but in answer to the prayer of Peter he fell and broke one of his legs. This tradition accounts for his end by saying that the people stoned him to death.

The Simonians, the Simonians or followers of Simon, were an eclectic sect, who, in one time, to have adopted tenets and opinions derived from paganism, at another, from Judaism and the beliefs of the Samaritans, and at another still, from Christianity. Sometimes they seem to have been ascetics; at others they are wild soffers at moral law. They regarded Simon Magus as their Christ, or at least as a form of Christ, the redeemer of the world, who had manifested Himself also in Jesus. The Simonians were one of the minor gnostic sects and were carried away both from the doctrine and from the ethical spirit of the Christian faith.

Simon denies that the followers of Simon were Christians in any sense. The words of Origen are, "It escapes the notice of Celsus that the Simonians do not in any way acknowledge Jesus as the Son of God, but they call Simon the Power of God." In the time of Origen the followers of Simon had dwindled in number to such a degree that he writes, "I do not think it possible to find that all the followers of Simon in the whole world are more than thirty: and perhaps I have said more than there really are." (Contr. Cel., 1.27, quoted by Alford, G.T. Book 8, Acts 8)

Irenaeus also has much to say regarding Simon and his followers. He makes the legendary Simon, identical with the magician of Acts 8, makes him also the third to the list of the twelve, and says that it was from him that Gnosticism sprang. The account which he gives of the Simonians shows that by the time Irenaeus lived, their system had decayed into Gnosticism; but this fact does not justify Irenaeus in the assertion that Simon of Acts 8 is the originator of the gnostic system. The early Christian writers took this view, and regarded Simon Magus as the founder of Gnosticism. Perhaps they were right, "but from the very little authentic information we possess, it is impossible to ascertain how far he was identified with their tenets" (Alford, N.T. II, 50).

It may be that there is a substratum of fact, of such a nature that future investigation and discovery will justify these early Christian writers in their judgment, and will show that Simon Magus is not to be overlooked as one of the sources from which Gnosticism sprang. The exact origin of Gnosticism is certainly difficult to trace, but there is little or no indication that it arose from the incidents narrated in Acts 8. It cannot be denied that a connection is possible, and may have existed between the two, that is between Simon Magus and some of the gnostic here-sies; but the facts of history show widespread tendencies at work, during and even before the Apostolic age, which aptly account for the rise of Gnosticism. These are found e.g. in the Alexandrian philosophy, and in the tenets of the false teachers at Colossae and in other places. These philosophical and theosophical ideas commingled with the influences of Zoroaster, of Persia, and of Buddhism from India, and these tendencies and influences, taken in conjunction, were the sources of the various heresies known by the name of Gnosticism. See Gnosticism.

SIMON PETER. See Peter, Simon.

SIMON THE CANAANITE, OR CANANAEN, OR ZEALOT (Σίμων Καναναῖος, Simon Kananaotos; ΣΠΕ, kananaios; the Jerosaus A.D. 6; Acts 1:13; Origen): One of the Twelve Apostles. This Simon was also named "the Canaanite" (Mt. 10:4; Mk. 3:18 AV) or "the Canaanite" (Mt. 10:4; Mk. 3:18 RV) or "Zealotes" (Lk. 6:15; Acts 1:13 AV) or "the Zealot" (Lk. 6:15; Acts 1:13 RV).

He was one of the Twelve Apostles. He was a Galilean, to whom the designation "Cananeean" is regarded as of political rather than of geographical significance (cf. St. Luke's rendering). The Zealots were a faction, headed by Judas of Galilee, who, "in the days of the enrolment" (cf. Acts 5:37; Lk. 2:1.2) bitterly opposed the threatened increase of taxation at the census of Quirinus, and would have hastened by the sword the fulfillment of Messianic prophecy.

Simon has been identified with Simon the brother of Jesus (Mk. 6:3; Mt. 13:55), but there are also reasons in favor of identifying him with Nathanael.

Thus (1) all the arguments adduced in favor of the Bartholomew-Nathanael identification (see Nathanael) can equally be applied to that of Simon-Nathanael, except the second. But the second is of no account, since the Philip-Bartholomew connection in the Synoptists occurs merely in the apostolic lists, while in St. John it is narrative. Further, in the Synoptists, Philip is connected in the narrative, not with Bartholomew but with Andrew.

(2) The identity is definitely stated in the Genealogies of the Twelve Apostles (see Nathanael). Simon is the "preaching of Simon, son of Cleopas" (cf. Budge, II, 70) in the genealogy (Mt. 1:13) because Simon was the father of Cleopas, who was the husband of Mary, mother of James the Less and of John the son of Zebedee (Heb. III, xi, 32; IV, xxii) also refers to a Simon who succeeded James as bishop of Jerusalem and suffered martyrdom under Trajan under (see Heschong, pp. 325-328). It is therefore a case: Simon a son of Cleopas.
A fairly exact definition of sin based on Bib. data would be that sin is the transgression of the law of God (1 Jn 3 4). Ordinarilysin is defined simply as “the transgression of the law,” but the idea of God is so completely the essential conception of sin in the entire Bib. revelation that we can best define sin as disobedience to the law of God. It will be seen that primarily sin is an act, but from the very beginning it has been known that acts have effects, not only in the outward world of things and persons, but also upon the inner life.

2. Affects the Inner Life

Hence, we reach the special exception, not only that sin is profoundly inner in its consequences, but that its effects reach outward also to the system in which practically involves the race. Around these various aspects of doctrine differing systems of theology have sprung up.

Students of all schools are agreed that we have in the OT story of the fall of Adam an eternally true account of the way sin comes into the world (Gen 3 1–6). The question is the full not so much as to the literal historic matter-of-factness of the narrative, as to its essentially psychological truthfulness. The essential thought of the narrative it that both Adam and Eve disobeyed an express command of God. The seductiveness of temptation is nowhere more forcefully stated than in this narrative. The fruit of the tree is pleasant to look upon; it is good to eat; it is to be desired to make one wise; moreover, the tempter moves upon the woman by the method of the half truth (see Adam in the OT).

God had said that disobedience to the command would bring death; the tempter urged that disobedience should lead to life, implying that the command of God had meant that death would immediately follow the eating of the forbidden fruit. In the story the various avenues of approach of sin to the human heart are graphically suggested, but after the seduction of evil has thus been set forth, the fact remains that both transgressors knew they were transgressing (Gen 3 24). Of course, the story is told in simple, naïve fashion, but its pers-
5. Freedom of Man

This is a concept implicit in the idea of freedom of choice and the possibility of having a direct relationship with God. It has been interpreted in different ways over time, with some theologians and philosophers believing in a free will and others in predestination. The Bible acknowledges the existence of evil and the temptation of man, but it also highlights the importance of moral and spiritual choices.

6. Transgression against Light

Transgression against light is related to the idea of conscience and awareness of right and wrong. According to the Bible, transgressions are often a result of a lack of understanding or knowledge of the will of God. The conscience is a moral warning system within the individual, reminding them of what is right and what is wrong. It is through this conscience that the knowledge of good and evil is imparted to man (Gen 3:5).

7. Inwardness of the Moral Law

The moral law is inward, as it is a reflection of the moral law, and the conscience. The Bible speaks of the conscience as a reflection of the moral law, which is a reflection of the will of God. The conscience is a warning system that functions as a mirror to the moral law.

Sin

God who looks chiefly at the heart and judges men by the inner motive.

(3) Jesus.—In the teaching of Jesus the emphasis upon the inner spirit as the essential factor in the moral life came to its climax. Jesus honored the Law, but he pushed the keeping of the Law back from the mere performance of externals to the inner stirrings of motives. It is not merely the actual commission of adultery, for example, that is sin: it is the lustful desire which leads to the evil glance; it is not merely the actual killing of the man that is murder; it is the spirit of hatred which makes the thought of murder welcome (Mt 5:21-27). Paul caught the spirit of Jesus and carried the thought of Jesus out into more elaborate and formal statements. There is a law of the inner life with which man should bind himself, and this law is the law of Christ's life itself (Rom 8:1-4). While both Jesus and Paul recognized the place of the formal codes in the moral life of individuals and societies, they sought a great service for righteousness in setting on high the obligations upon the inner spirit. The follower of Christ is to guard the inmost thoughts of his heart. The commandments are not always precepts which can be given articulated statement; they are rather instincts and intuitions and glimmers must be followed, even when we cannot give them full statement.

From this standpoint we are able to discern something of the force of the Bib. teaching as to whether sin is to be looked upon as negative or positive, as the absence of goodness or as the mere absence of goodness.

8. Sin as negative

Positive Force

The man who sins is one who does not keep the Law. This, however, is hardly the full Bib. conception. Of course, the man who does not keep the Law is a sinner, but the idea of transgression is very often that of a positive refusal to keep the commandment and a breaking of the commandment. Two courses are set before men, one good, the other evil. The evil course is, in a sense, something positive in itself. The evil man does not stand still; he moves as truly as the good man moves; he becomes a positive force for evil. In all our discussions we must keep clearly in mind the truth that evil is not something existing in and apart from man. Biblical Scriptures deal with evil men, and the evil men are as positive as their natures permit them to be. In this sense of the word sin does run a course of positive destruction. In the thought, e.g., of the writer who made necessary the Flood, we have a positive state of evil contaminating almost the whole world (Gen 6:11). It would be absurd to characterize the world in the midst of which Noah lived as merely a negative world. The world was positively set toward evil. And so, in later writings, Paul's thought of Rom society is of a world of sinful men moving with increasing velocity toward the destruction of themselves and of all around them through doing evil. It is impossible to believe that Rom 1 conceives of sin merely in negative terms. We repeat, we do not do full justice to the Bib. conception when we speak of sin merely in negative terms. If we may be permitted to use a present-day illustration, we may say that in the Bib. thought sinful men are like the destructive forces in the world of Nature which must be removed before there can be peace and health for human life. For example, science today has much to say concerning gaseous forces which affect human life. A large part of modern scientific effort has been to rid the world of these gasses, or at least to cleanse human surroundings from their contaminating touch. The man who sterilizes the human environment so that these forces cannot touch men does in one sense a merely negative work; in another sense, however, his work makes possible the positive development of the forces which make for health.

It is from this thought of the positiveness of sin that we are to approach the problem of the hereditary transmission of evil. The

9. Heredity Bib. teaching has often been misinterpreted at this point. Apart from certain passages, esp. those of St. Paul, which set forth the practically universal contamination of sin (e.g. Rom 5:18, etc.), there is nothing in the Scriptures to suggest the idea that men are born into the world under a weight of guilt. We hold fast to the idea of God as a God of justice and love. There is no way of reconciling these attributes with the condemnation of human souls before they have themselves transgressed. Of course much theological teaching moves on the assumption that the tendencies to evil are so great that the souls will necessarily transgress, but we must keep clearly in mind the difference between a tendency to evil and the actual commission of evil. Modern scientific research reinforces the conception that the children of sinful parents, whose sins have been such as to impress their lives throughout, will very soon manifest symptoms of evil tendency. Even in this case, however, we must distinguish between the psychological and moral. The child may be given a wrong tendency from birth, not only by hereditary transmission, but by the imitation of sinful parents; yet the question of personal responsibility is altogether another matter. Modern society has come to recognize something of the force of this distinction. In dealing with extreme cases of this kind, the question of the personal guilt of the child is often disregarded in our literature. The sum total of experience round about the child an environment that will correct the abnormal tendency. But there can be little gainsaying the fact that the presence of sin in the life of the parent may go as far as to mark the life of the child with the sinful tendency.

The positive force of sinful life also appears in the effect of sin upon the environment of men. It is not necessary for us to believe that all the physical universe was cursed in one and all of its beginning. Scriptures deal with evil men, and the evil men are as positive as their natures permit them to be. In this sense of the word sin does run a course of positive destruction. In the thought, e.g., of the writer who made necessary the Flood, we have a positive state of evil contaminating almost the whole world (Gen 6:11). It would be absurd to characterize the world in the midst of which Noah lived as merely a negative world. The world was positively set toward evil. And so, in later writings, Paul's thought of Rom society is of a world of sinful men moving with increasing velocity toward the destruction of themselves and of all around them through doing evil. It is impossible to believe that Rom 1 conceives of sin merely in negative terms. We repeat, we do not do full justice to the Bib. conception when we speak of sin merely in negative terms. If we may be permitted to use a present-day illustration, we may say that in the Bib. thought sinful men are like the destructive forces in the world of Nature which must be removed before there can be peace and health for human life. For example, science today has much to say concerning gaseous forces which affect human life. A large part of modern scientific effort has been to rid the world of these gasses, or at least to cleanse human surroundings from their contaminating touch. The man who sterilizes the human environment so that these forces cannot forces. No one can deny that evil men can use physical forces for evil purposes, and that evil men can make bad social forces, but both these forces, can be used for good as well as for evil. "The whole creation groans 'laboring in pain' waiting for the redemption at the hands of the sons of God (Rom 8 19-23).

In the thought of Jesus, righteousness is life. Jesus came that men might have life (Jn 10 10).

11. Redemption

It must follow therefore that in His thought sin is death, or rather it is the positive course of transgression which makes toward death (Jn 5 24).

But man is to cease to do evil and to learn to do well. He is to face about and walk in a different direction; he is to be born from above (Jn 3 3), and surrender himself to the forces which beat upon him from above rather than to those which urge upon him from below (Rom 12 2). From the realization of the positive both of sin and of righteousness, we see the need of a positive force which is to bring men from sin to righteousness (Jn 3 3-8).

Of course, in what we have said of the positive nature of sin we would not deny that there are multitudes of men whose evil consists in their passive attitude; the consequence is repentance. Multitudes of men may not be lost, in the sense that they are breaking the more obvious of the commandments. They are lost, in the sense that they are drifting about, or that they are existing in a condition of inertia, with no great insight into any spiritual ideals. But the problem even here is to find a force strong enough and positive enough to bring such persons to themselves and to God. In any case the Scriptures lay stress upon the seriousness of the problem constituted by sin. The Bible is occupied on redemption. Repentance from sin is thought of as carrying with it redemption from all other calamities. If the kingdom of God and of His righteousness can be seized, all other things will follow with the seizure (Mt 6 33).

12. Life in Christ

The work of Christ is set before us as chiefly a work of redemption from sin. A keen student once observed that almost all failures to take an adequate view of the person of Christ can be traced to a failure to realize adequately the seriousness of sin. The problem of sin is a problem of something that is lost. A life set toward sin is a problem which may well tax the resources of the Almighty. Lives cannot be transformed merely by precept. The only effective force is the force of a Divine life which will reach and change human lives (see Redeemer).

We are thus in a position to see something of the positivity of the life that must be in Christ if He is to be a Saviour from sin. That positive must be powerful enough to make men feel that in some real sense God Himself has come to their rescue (Rom 8 32-39). For the problem of salvation from sin is manifold. Sin long persisted in begets evil habits, and the habits must be broken. Sin lays the conscience under a load of distress, for the only need of a sense of forgiveness. Sin blinds and paralyzes the faculties to such a degree that only the mightiest of tonic forces can bring back health and strength. And the problem is often more serious than this. The presence of evil in the world, the seriousness in the sight of a Holy God to be Himself, because of His very holiness, must be under stumbinous obligation to aid us to the utmost for the redemption of men. Out of the thought of the disturbance which sin makes in the heart of God, we see something of the reason for the doctrine that in the cross of Christ God was discharging a debt to Himself and to the whole world; for the insistence also that in the cross there is opened up a fountain of life, which, if accepted by sinful men, will heal and restore them.

It is with this seriousness of sin before us that we must think of forgiveness from sin. We can understand the reality of sin, it must be forgiven.

13. Repentance

It is given only on condition that men seek forgiveness in the name of the highest manifestation of holiness which they have known. For those who have heard the preaching of the cross and have seen something of the real meaning of that preaching, the way to forgiveness is in the name of the cross. In the name of a holiness which men would make their own, if they could; in the name of an ideal of holy love which men of themselves cannot reach, but which they forever strive after, they seek forgiveness. But the forgiveness is to be taken seriously. In both the OT and NT repentance is not merely a changed attitude of mind. It is an attitude which shows its sincerity by willingness to do everything possible to undo the evil which the sinner has wrought (Lk 19 8).

If there is any consequence of the sinner's own sin which the sinner can himself make right, the sinner must in himself genuinely repent and make that consequence right. In one sense forgiveness is not altogether something done once for all. The seductiveness of sin is so great that there is need of humble and continuous watching. While anything like a morbid introspection is unscriptural, constant alertness to keep to the straight and narrow path is everywhere enjoined as an obligation (Gal 6 1).

The forgiveness is in the Scriptures which will warrant the idea that forgiveness is to be conceived of in such fashion as would teach that the consequences of sin are easily forgiven and quickly eliminated. Change in the attitude of a sinner necessarily means change in the attitude of God. The sinner and God, however, are persons, and the Scriptures always speak of the problem of sin after a completely personal fashion. The changed attitude affects the personal standing of the sinner in the sight of God. But God is the person who creates and carries on a moral universe. In carrying on that universe He must keep personal relations with Himself, and of the things that he must do, in their proper place as the constitutional principles of the universe. While the father welcomes back the prodigal to the restored personal relations with himself, he cannot, in the full sense, blot out the fact that the prodigal has sinned against the rights of the universe. Personal forgiveness may be complete, but the elimination of the consequences of the evil life is possible only through the long lines of healing work at work. The man who has sinned against his body can find restoration from the consequences of the sin only in the forces which make for bodily healing. So also with the mind and will. The mind which has thought evil must be cured of its tendency to think evil. To be sure the curative processes may come almost instantly through the upheaval of a great experience; but not, is the long consideration that the processes may have to work through long years (see Sanctification). The will which has been given to sin may feel the stirring of sin after the life of forgiveness has begun. All this is a manifestation, not only of the power of sin, but of the constitutional morality of the universe. Forgiveness must not be interpreted in such terms as to make the transgression of the Law of God in any sense a light or trivial offence. But, on the other hand, we must not set any limit to the work of the cross of God. With the removal of the power which makes for evil the possibility of development in real human experience is before the life (see Forgiveness). The word of the Master is that He came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly” (Jn 10 10). Sin is serious, because it thwarts life. Sin is given so large a place in the thought of the Bib. writers simply because it blocks the channel of that movement toward the fullest life which the Scriptures teach is the aim of God in placing men in the world. God conceived of as the Father in Heaven. Sin has a deeply disturbing effect in restraining the relations between the Father and the sons and of preventing the proper development of the life of the sons. SIN, sin (太阳城, gin; “clay or mud”), Σένων, Seneä, τὰν, Tana; A city of Egypt mentioned only in Ezek. 30:15,16. This seems to be a pure Sem name. The ancient Egypt name, if the place ever had one such, is unknown. Pelusium (or Pelusiac, Pelusian) also meant “the clayey or muddy town.” The Pelusine mouth of the Nile was “the muddy mouth.” and the modern Arab name of this mouth has the same significance. These facts make it practically certain that the Vulg is correct in identifying S. with Pelusium. But although Pelusium appears very frequently in ancient history, its exact location is still not entirely certain. The list of cities mentioned in Ezek in connection with S. furnishes no clue to its location. From other historical notices it seems to have been a frontier city. Rameses II built a wall from S. to Pelopoli, probably by the aid of Heb slaves (Diodorus Siculus, cf. Budge, Hist of Egypt, V, 90), to protect the eastern frontier. S. was a meeting-place of Egypt with her enemies who came to attack her, many great battles being fought at or near this place. Sennerchir and Cambyses both fought Egypt near Pelusium (Herod. ii.141; iii.10-13). Antiochus IV defeated the Egyptians here (Budge, VIII, 23), and the Romans under Gabinius defeated the Egyptians in the same neighborhood. Pelusium was also accessible from the sea, or very near a seaport, for Pompey after the disaster at Pharsalia fled into Egypt, sailing for Pelusium. These historical notices of Pelusium make its usual identification with the ruins near el-Kantara, a station on the Suez Canal 29 miles S. of Port Said, most probable. “S., the stronghold of Egypt,” in the words of Ezek (30:15), would thus refer to its inaccessibility because of swamps which served as impassable moats. The wall on the S. and the sea on the N. also protected it on either flank. M. G. KYLE

SINA, sîn: In Acts 7:38 AV, RV “Sinai” (q.v.).

SINAI, sînî, sînî-ê (太阳城, ginêy; A, Σινά, Sinâ, B, Σίνα, Scind): The name comes probably from a root meaning “to shine,” which occurs in Syr., and which in Nab is found in the name Sinai for “the moon.” The old explanation, “clayey,” is inappropriate to any place in the Sinaitic desert, though it might apply to Sin (Ezek 30:15,16) or Pelusium; even there, however, the applicability is doubtful. The desert of Sin (Ex 16:1; 17:1; Nu 33:11 f) lay between Sinai and the Gulf of Suez, and may have been named from the “glare” of its white chalk. But at Sinai “the glory of Jeh was like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the eyes of the children of Israel” (Ex 24:17); and, indeed, the glory of the Lord still dyes the crags of Jebel Musa (the “mountain of Moses”) with fiery red, reflected from its red granite and pink gneiss rocks, long after the shadows have fallen on the plain beneath. Sinai is mentioned, as a desert and a mountain, in 35 passages of the OT. In 17 passages the same desert and mountain are called “Horeb,” or “the waste.” This term is chiefly used in Dt, though Sinai also occurs (Dt 33:2). In the other books of the Pent, Sinai is the usual name, though Horeb also occurs (Ex 3:1; 17:6; 33:6), applying both to the “Mount of God” and to the desert of Rephidim, some 20 miles to the N.W. The indications of position, in various passages of the Pent, favor the identification with the traditional site, which has become generally accepted by all these explorers who have carefully considered the subject, though two other theories may need notice. Moses fled to the land of Midian (or “empty land”), which lay E. of the Sinaitic peninsula
(Nu 22:47; 26:31), and when he wandered with his flocks to Horeb (Ex 3:1) he is said to have reached the west side of the desert. In another note (Dt 1:2) we read that the distance was "eleven days' journey from Horeb by the way of Mount Seir unto Kadesh-barnea" or Petra (see WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL), the distance being about 145 miles, or 14 miles of daily march, though Israel—with its flocks, women and children—made 16 marches between these points. Sinai again is described as being distant from Egypt "three days' journey into the wilderness" (Ex 5:3), the actual route being 117 miles, which Israel accomplished in 10 journeys. But, for Arabs not encumbered with families and herds, this distance could still be covered by an average march of 39 miles daily, on riding camels, or even, if necessary, on foot. These distances will not, however, allow of our placing Sinai farther E. than Jebel Mısra. Lofty mountains, in all parts of the world, have always been sacred and regarded as the mysterious abode of God; and Jos says that Sinai is "the highest of all the mountains thereabout," and again is "the highest of all the mountains that are in that country, and is not only very difficult to be ascended by men, on account of its vast altitude, but because of the sharpness of its precipices: nay, indeed, it cannot be looked at without pain of the eyes, and besides this it was terrible and inaccessible, on account of the rumor that passed about, that God dwelt there" (Ant. II. xii, 1; III. v. 1). Evidently in his time Sinai was supposed to be one of the peaks of the great granitic block called et Tih—a term applying to any lofty mountain. This block has its highest peak in Jebel Kāturā (so named from a legend of St. Catherine of Egypt), rising 8,550 ft. above the sea. N.E. of this is Jebel Mısra (7,370 ft.), which, though less high, is more conspicuous because of the open plain called er Rūḩah ("the wide") to its N.W. This plain is about 4 miles long and has a width of over a mile, so that it forms, as Dr. E. Robinson (Bib. Res., 1838, i, 89) seems to have been the first to note, a natural camp at the foot of the mountain, large enough for the probable numbers (see Exouos, 3) of Israel.

Jebel Mısra has two main tops, that to the S.E. being crowned by a chapel. The other, divided by gorges into three precipitous crags, has the Convent to its N., and is called Rū fís-Safūkh, or "the willow top." N. of the Convent is the lower top of Jebel el Deir ("mountain of the monastery"). These heights were accurately determined by Royal Engineer surveyors in 1868 (Sir C. Wilson, Ordnance Survey Jebel Mısra of Sinai); and, though it is impossible to say which of the peaks Moses ascended, yet they are all much higher than any mountains in the Sinaitic desert, or in Midian. The highest tops in the Tih desert to the N. are not much over 4,000 ft. Those in Midian, E. of Elath, rise only to 4,200 ft. Even Jebel Serbāl, 20 miles W. of Sinai—a ridge with many crags, running 3 miles in length—is at its highest only 6,750 ft. above the sea. Horeb is not recorded to have been visited by any of the Hebrews after Moses, excepting by Elijah (1 K 19:8) in a time of storm. In favor of the traditional site it may also be observed that clouds suddenly formed, or lasting for days (Ex 14:15), are apt to cap very lofty mountains. The Hebrews reached Sinai about the end of May (Ex 19:1). and, on the 3d day, "there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount" (ver 16). Such storms occur as a rule in the Sinaiite desert only in December and January, but thunderstorms are not unknown in Pal even in May.

A constant tradition fixing the site is traceable back to the 4th cent. AD. Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s.v. "Choreb") place Horeb near Paran, which in their time was Evidence placed (Onom. s.v. "Raphidim") in Wady Feiran. Anchorites lived at Paran, and at Sinai at least as early as 365 AD, and neighborhood of Jebel Masa would, I think, bear comparison with many mountain districts where the peoples take no regard to its supply of water. There is also no other district in the Peninsula which affords such excellent pasturage.

This is important, as Israel encamped near Sinai from the end of May till April of the next year. There is also a well on the lower slope of Jebel Masa itself, where the ascent begins.

Another theory, put forward by Mr. Baker Greene (The Heb Mountain from Egypt, and Sinai, by Dr. Sayce (Higher Criticism, 1894, 268).

7. Greene's Theory

Mr. Greene supposed Elaha (Ex 15 27) to be Elath (Dt 3 8), now 'Ajlun at the head of the Gulf of Akaba. Sinai was thus a Gulf before was some unknown mountain in Midian. But in this case Israel would in 4 days (see Ex 15 22-23-27) have traveled a distance of 200 miles to reach Edin, which cannot but be regarded as quite impossible for the Hebrews when accompanied by women, children, flocks and herds.

SINCERE, sin'-sr. SINCERITY, sin-ser'-ti (םֶשֶן, śêmēn; ἀπόφρασις, apōfrasís, ἀλήθεια, elikhreieia): "Sincerity" occurs once in the OT as the tr of śêmēn (complete, "entire," "sincere," etc (Josh 24 14; the same word is tr "sincerity" (Jes 9 16,19, RV "uprightly"). Four different words are rendered "sincere," "sincerely," "sincerity," in the NT: αδοξα, "without guile," "unadulterated," "desire the more pure milk of the word" (1 Pet 2 2 AV, RV "the spiritual") ARV "Gr, belonging to the reason;" of Rom 12 1, "ERV's "reasonable") "milk which is without guile, with no other purpose but to nourish and benefit the soul (Alford); ἀγνός, "without blame," "pure," "preach Christ... not sincerely" (Phil 1 17); ἀφθονία, "without corruption" (Eph 6, 24 AV, "that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, ARV "with a love incorruptible," m "in incorruption.") See Rom 2 7; ERV "uncorrupted" ARV "uncorruptible... sincerity," RV "uncorrupted") ; γνάθος, "not spurious" (2 Cor 8 8); elikhreieis, lit., judged of in the sunlight, hence, "clear," "manifest" (Phil 1 10); elikhreia, with same meaning, is tr "sincerity" (1 Cor 5 6; 2 Cor 1 12; 2 17).

RV has "sincerity" for "pure" (2 Pet 3 1), "sincerely" for "clearly" (Job 33 3).

In Wind 7 25 we have elikhreies in the description of Wisdom as a "pure influence," RV "clear influence."

SINEW, sin'w (םנ, qith [Job 10 11, etc];

The tendons and sinews of the body are uniformly (7 t) thus called. "Therefore the children of Israel eat not the sinew of the hip which is upon the hollow of the thigh: unto this day: because he touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh in the sinew of the hip" (Gen 32 32). In the poetical description of Behemoth (hippopotamus) it is said: "He moveth his tail like a cedar: the sinews of his thighs are knit together" (Job 40 17). The prophet Ezekiel saw in his vision (37 6.8) that the dry bones were gathered together, that they were covered with sinews, flesh and skin, and that they were revived by the spirit of the Lord. In figurative language the neck of the ox or ox-steer is compared to an "iron sinew" (Isa 48 4). AV "my sinews take no rest" (확'_DELETED_ 17) has been corrected by RV into "the pains that gnaw me take no rest," but the earlier version has been retained in the margin.

SINGERS, sing'erz, SINGING, singing: Singing seems to have become a regular profession at a quite early date among the Hebrews. David had his troupe of singing men and singing women" at Jerusalem (2 S 19 35), and no doubt Solomon did to their numbers. Isa 25 16 suggests that it was not uncommon for foreign female minstrels of questionable character to be heard making "sweet melody," singing songs along the streets and highways of Judaea. Nor was the worship of the temple left to the usually incompetent and inconstant leadership of laymen. The elaborate regulations drawn up for the constitution of the temple orchestra and chorus are referred to under Musac (q.v.). It has been inferred from Ezr 2 65 that women were included among the temple singers, but this is erroneous, as the musicians there mentioned were all classed as priests, to be evil, festivals, etc. The temple choir consisted exclusively of Levites, one essential qualification of an active member of that order being a good voice.

Of the vocal method of the Hebrews we know nothing. Wellhausen imagines that he can detect one of the singers, in the portrayal of an Assyrian band, compressing his throat in order to produce a vibrato; and it is quite possible that in other respects as well as this, ancient and modern oriental vocalization resembled each other. But that is about all that can be said.

On the other hand, we cannot repeat too often that we are quite unable to identify any intervals, scales, or keys having been used by ancient Israel. Even those who hold that the early church took the Gregorian "tones" from the synagogue, confess that it was "certainly not without considerable modifications." And, of course, there was not the slightest affinity between the Heb and the Anglican chant. See Music; Praise; Song; Temple.

SINGING, sin'g-l. EYE: Mt 6 22 f. || Lk 11 34: "If therefore thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light; but if it be double, thy whole body shall be full of darkness." "Single" and "evil" here represent ἀρετής, haploïs, and πονερός, ponéros. Poneros elsewhere in the NT means "wicked"; haplous occurs only here in the NT, but is very common in ordinary Gr and always has the meaning "simple." But in view of the context, most commentators take haplous here as meaning "normal," "healthy," and ponérōs as "diseased," so rendering "Just as physical enlighten- ment depends on the condition of the eye, so spiritual enlightenment depend on the condition of the heart." This is natural enough, but it is not satisfactory, as it gives to haplous a unique sense and to ponēros a sense unique in the 73 NT examples of the word. Moreover, the single eye is found in Mt 20 15; Mk 7 22, where it means "jealousy" or "covetousness." With ponēros= "covetous," haplous would= "generous"; and this rendition gives excellent sense in Mt, where the further context deals with love of money. Yet in Lk it is meaningless, where the context is of a different sort, a fact perhaps indicating that Lk has placed the saying in a bad context. Or the Gr tr of Christ's words used by Matthew and Luke may have taken the moral terms haplous and ponēros to translate physical terms ("healthy" and "diseased") employed in the original Aramaic.

The Syriac version of Lk 11 36 may perhaps contain a trace of an older rendering. See Jülicher, Die Gleichnisse Jesu, I, 98-108.

SINGULAR, sin'g-ler: "Pertaining to the single person," "individual," and so sometimes "unusual," "remarkable." So Wisd 14 18, AV "the singular diligence of the artificer" (φιλοσοφία, philosofía, "love of honor," RV "ambition"). In Lk 27 2 by AV "when a man shall have a singular vow," and RV seems to have understood a "personal" or "private" vow. RV has "accomplish a vow," with in "make a special vow." Cf the same phrase (γαθήνθ [γαθήθ] neither) used of the Nazirite vow in Nu 6 2.

SINFIM, sî'nîm, sin'tîm, LAND OF (אֲרֵכָא יַעַנְתָּא, ʼereq sīnīm; יָעַנְתָּא פַּרֵס, ʼyānīn Pesār): The name occurs in Isaiah's prophecy of the return of the people from distant lands: "Lo, these shall come from far: and, lo, these from the north and from the west, and these from the land of Sinim" (49 22). The land is clearly far off, and it must be sought either in the S. or in the E. LXX points to an eastern country. Many scholars have favored identification with China, the classical Sinae. It seems improbable that Jews had already found their way to China; but from very early times trade relations were established with the Parthian-Parthian way of Arabia and the Pers Gulf; and the name may have been used by the prophet simply as suggesting extreme remoteness. Against this view are Dillmann (Comm. on Isa), Duhm, Cheyne and others. Some have suggested places in the S.: e.g. Sin (Peleusim, Ezk 30 15) and Syene (Cheyne, Intro to Isa, 275). But these seem to be too near.

In harmony with his reconstruction of Bib. history, Cheyne finally concludes that the reference here is to the return from a captivity in S. Arabia (S., RV s.v.). While no certain decision is possible, probability points to the E., and China cannot be quite ruled out. See art. "China," Enc Brit., 1850.

SINITES, sî'ntîs (קִנְיָם, qînîyām): A Cypriote people mentioned in Gen 10 17; 1 Ch 1 12. The identification is uncertain. Jerome mentions a ruined city Sin, near Arka, at the foot of Lebanon.

SINLESSNESS, sin'les-nēs: The 15th Anglican article ("Of Christ Alone without Sin") may be quoted as a true summary of Scripture teaching on sinlessness: "Christ in the truth of our nature was made like unto us in all things, sin only excepted, from which He was clearly [prourus] void, both in His flesh and in His spirit. . . . Sin, as Saint John saith, was not in Him. But all we the rest, though baptised, and born again in Christ, yet offend in many things; and, if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves."

Here the sinlessness of the Incarnate Son is affirmed. It are not only an elaborate effort to show that this is the affirmation of 1. Christ. Scripture. It is not only, as we are Sinless reminded above, definitely taught there. Yet more is it implied in the mysterious and essentially human condition of the Lord's evidently total immunity from the "sense of sin," His freedom from inward discord or imperfection, from the slightest discontent with self. It is not too much to say that this representation is self-evident of its truth. Had it been the invention of worshipping disciples, we may say with confidence that they (supposed thus capable of "free handling") would have been certain to betray some moral aberrations in their por- trature of their Master. They must have failed to put before us the profound ethical paradox of the person who, on the one hand, enjoys penitence and (with a tenderness infinitely deep) loves the penitent, and, on the other hand, is never for a moment penitent himself, and who all the while has proved, from the first, a supreme moral and spiritual magnet, "drawing all men to him." Meanwhile the Scripture represents the sinlessness of the Incarnate Lord as no mere automatic or effortless condition. He is sensitive to temptation, to a degree which makes it easy to us to actual experience (we are not here considering the matter sub specie aeternitatis), lies in the perfect fidelity to the Father of a will, exercised under human conditions, filled absolutely with the Holy Spirit, willingly received.
On the other hand, "we the rest," contemplated as true believers, are warned by the general teaching of Scripture never to affirm sinlessness as our condition. There are passages in 2. Saints Not Sinless (Jn 3:9, 5:19) which affirm of the regenerate man that he "sinnoch not." But it seems obvious to remark that such words, taken without context and balance, would prove too much; they would make the smallest sinner of sin a tremendous evidence against the person's regeneration at all. It would seem that such words practically mean that sin and the regenerate character are diametrical opposites, so that sinning is out of character, not in the man as such, but in the Christian as such. And the practical result is an unconquerable aversion and opposition in the regenerate will toward all known sin, and a readiness as sensitive as possible for confession of failure. Meanwhile such passages as 1 Jn are, to the unbiased reader, an urgent warning of the peril of affirming our perfect purity of will and character. But then, on the other hand, Scripture abounds in both precepts and promises bearing on the fact that in Christ and by the power of His Spirit, received by faith into a watchful soul, our weakness can be seen and transformed that a moral purification and emancipation is possible for the weakest Christian, which, compared with the best efforts of unregenerate nature, is a "more than conqueror" over evil (see e.g. 2 Cor 12:9, 16; Gal 2:20; Eph 6:16; Jude ver 24). SINNERS, sin'ers (ἱνερτίς, ἱνερτία; ἀμαρτυρολός, ἀμαρτυρολία), "devoted to sin," "erring one": In the NT, in addition to its ordinary significance of one that sins (Lk 5:8; 13:2; Rom 6:19; 1 Tim 1:15; He 7:27), the term is applied to those who lived in disregard of ceremonial prescription (Mt 9:10–11; Mk 2:15; Lk 5:30; Gal 2:15); to those stained with certain definite vices or crimes, as the publicans (Lk 15:2; 18:13; 19:7); to the heathen (Mt 26:45; Gal 2:15; cf Tob 13:6; 1 Mac 1:34; 2 Mac 2:48, 62); to the preeminently sinful (Mt 6:38; Jn 9:24, 31; Gal 2:17; 1 Tim 1:9; Jude ver 15). It was the Jewish term for a woman of ill-name (Lk 7:37; cf Mt 21:32, where it is stated that such had come even to the temple (Jer 8:21) also). For the general bibl. conception of the term, see SINNERS.

Sion, sión (Σιών, Σίων; Σιφών, Σιφών), (1) A name given to Mt. Hermon in Dt 4:48. The name may mean "promontory" or "peak," and may have denoted the highest or snow-capped horn of the mountain as seen from the S. It may, however, be a scribal error for Sirion, the name by which the mountain was known to the Zidonians. Siry takes it in this sense, which, however, may be a correction of the Heb. It is possible that this name, like Senir, may have applied to some distinct part of the Hermon Range. (2) Mt. Sion; see ZION.

SIPHOMOTH, sip'omoth, sip'moth (סיפםות, סיפםות [Ginsburg], סיפםות, סיפםות [Botz]; סיפאן, סיפאן). One of the titles to which David presents from Ziklag (1 S 30:28). It occurs between Aroer and Eshtemoa, so it must have been somewhere in Southern Judah. The site has not been recovered. Zabdi the Shiphiite (1 Ch 27:27) may quite probably have been a native of this place.

SIPPAI, sip'ia, sip'ia. See SAPIE.

SIR, sîr: In the OT this word in Gen 43:20 AV (אֶשִּׁירָה) is changed in RV into "my lord." In the NT the word sometimes represents ἱερός, ἱερός, as in Acts 7:26; 14:15; 19:25, etc; more frequently σάμχος, σάμχος, "lord," as in Mt 13:27; 21:30; 27:36; Jn 4 11.15.19.40 (RVRm "lord"); 20:15. In Rev 7:14, RV renders "my lord."
II. Canonicity. — Though older than both Dale and Est, this book was never admitted into the Jewish Canon. There are numerous quotations from it, however, in Talmud and Midrash, and Ben Sira is simply a list in Zunz, Die Gottesdienstlichen Vorträge, 101 ff.; Delitzsch, Zur Geschichte der jüd. Poëtie, 204 ff.; Schechter, JQR, III, 882–706; Cowley and Neubauer, The Original Heb of a Portion of Eccles., xxix–xxx. It is not referred to explicitly in Scripture, yet it is always cited by Jewish and Christian writers with respect and perhaps sometimes as Scripture. It forms a part of the Vulgate of the Trinité Council and therefore of the Romanist Canon; but the Protestant churches have never received it in canonical estimation, though the bulk of modern Protestant scholars set a much higher value upon it than they do upon many books in the Protestant Canon (Ch, Est, etc.). It was accepted as of canonical rank by Augustine and by the Councils of Hippo (1st canon, 315) and Carthage (287), yet it is not omitted from the lists of accepted books given by Melito (c. 150 AD), Origen, in the Apost. Canons and in the list of the Councils of Laodicea (334 and 351). Jerome writes in Libri Sacri, "Let the church read these two books [Wisdom and Sir] for the instruction of the people, not for establishing the authority of the dogmas of the church."

It suffered in the respect of many because it was not usually connected with a great name; cf. the so-called "Old Testament of the Peshitta." It is referred to frequently in the Ep. of Jas (1:2–4; cf. Sir 2:1–5; Jas 1:5–6; cf. Sir 1:12; 41:22; 51:13 ff.; Jas 1:8 "doubly minded"; cf. Sir 1:28, etc.). The book is often cited in the works of the Fathers ( Clem. Alex., Origen, Augustine, etc.) and in the Apos. Const. with the formula that introduces Scripture passages: "The Scriptures says," etc. The Reformers valued Sir highly, and parts of it have been incorporated into the Anglican Prayer-book.

III. Contents. — It is quite impossible in the book as a whole to determine the thought of its author, for the mind moves lightly from topic to topic, recurring frequently to the same theme and repeating not seldom the same idea. It is, however, too much to say with Sonntag (De Jesu Sirecideae, etc.) that the book is a Farrago of sayings with no connection, or with Berthold that the "work is but a rhapsody," for the whole is informed and controlled by one master thought, the supreme value to everyone of Wisdom. By this last the writer means the Jewish religion as conceived by enlightened Jews toward the beginning of the 2d cent. BC, and as reflected in the Law of Moses (see 24:23–31), and in a less degree in the books of the Prophets and in the other writings (see Prologue). The book follows the lines of the canonical Book of Prov, and is made up of short pithy sayings with no connection, of a kind largely conjured up in the mind of the author, but in part composed, and all informed and governed by the dominant note of the book: true Wisdom, the chief end of man. Most of the book is poetical in form, and even in the prose parts the parallelism of Heb poetry is found. Many unsuccessful attempts have been made to trace a definite continuous line of reasoning in the book, but the vital differences in the schemes proposed suggest what an examination of the book itself confirms, that the compiler and author put his materials together with less regard to logical connection, though he never loses sight of his main theme — Wisdom the chief thing.

Kethborn (Enzyklop., 50 ff.) divides the book into three parts (chs 1–21, 22–49, 50–50), and maintains that at first each of these was a separate work, united subsequently in one collection. The three parts are:

1. Religious Observances (1–15). The Hebrew preface (1:1–7) sets forth the object of the book, which is to show that the works of God's children are how they live in the world (Wisdom 1:1–7); that there are three parts of the work, and that the solution to the problem is to be found in the works of God's children. The work is divided into three, Schütz into twelve, Fritzsche (Enzyklop., xxix, 169, 170), and Ryssel (op. cit., 240) into seven. Ebersheim (op. cit., 204) writes, "We can trace three main divisions in the book, the first part (1:1–11) is about the divine power; the second part (12–18) is about the wise; the third part (19–21) is about the foolish."

2. Religious Teachings (16–35). The book is divided into sections, each section of which contains a number of sayings. The sections are divided into three parts, each part containing a number of sections. The sections are: (i) The power of wisdom (16–20); (ii) The power of knowledge (21–26); (iii) The power of understanding (27–35).

3. Religious Exhortations (36–49). The book is divided into sections, each section of which contains a number of sayings. The sections are divided into three parts, each part containing a number of sections. The sections are: (i) The power of wisdom (36–40); (ii) The power of knowledge (41–42); (iii) The power of understanding (43–49).

IV. Teaching. — In general it may be said that the principles enunciated in this book agree with those of the Wisdom school of Palestinian Judaism about 200 BC, though there is not a word in the book about a Messianic hope or the setting up of a Messianic kingdom. None of the views characteristic of Alexandrian Judaism and absent from the teaching of Palestinian Judaism are to be found in this book, though some of them at least are represented in Wiel (see Wisnom of Solomon, 161, Excur.). The chief exponents of the Alexandrian school are Philo, I, 18 ff. (On the immortality of the soul) and Deane (Ezpos, II, v, 334 ff.) and others have shown. The outstanding features of Alexandrianism are the allegorical interpretation of the Scriptures, its conception of the mystical view of the world, and its acceptance of the doctrine of mediating powers between man and God and its adoption of purely Gt ideas. None of these can be traced in Sir. The Hebrews never developed a theoretical or speculative theology or philosophy; all their teaching was gathered out of their experience of the duties that men owed to God and to one another; the hopes that they cherished and the fears by which they were animated. This is the only philosophy which the Bible and the so-called Apoc teach, and it is seen at its highest point in the so-called Wisdom Literature (qv.). The main lines of the teaching of Sir may be set out as follows, under the three heads of religion, morals, and manners.

(1) God. — The view of God given in this book agrees generally with that put forth by the later Jewish theologians, who, from the 1st century BC, onwards, regarded the God of this book as the God of the OT prophets. God is present everywhere (16:17–29); He created the world (16:1–26); He made man intelligent and supreme over all flesh. The expressions used are no doubt modeled on Gen 1, and it may fairly be inferred that creation out of nothing is meant. Wisn, on the other hand, teaches that the Alexandrian doctrine (half) is eternal and that the Creator's work consisted of fashioning, adapting, and beautifying. The world is a creature of God, not (as in Philo, etc) an emanation from Him. Yet is He compassionate and forgiving (17:24 f). His works are past finding out (18:2 f); but His compassion is upon all flesh (18:13), i.e. upon those who accept His chastening and seek to do His will (18:14). In 43:27 God is said to be "the all" (τὸ ἀναλλότριον), which signifies that He pervades and is the ground of everything. It is not Alexanderian pantheism that is taught. Gfrörer and others take a contrary view.

(2) Revelation.—In harmony with other products of the "Wisdom Men," Sir sets aside upon natural men their revealed in the instincts, reason and conscience of man as well as by the sun, moon, stars, etc. Yet Sir gives far more prominence than Prov to the idea that the Divine Will is specially made known in the Law of Moses (24:22; 45:1-4). We do not meet once with the word "law" in Ecc, nor law in the technical sense (Law of Moses) in either Job, Wis or Prov. In the last-named it is simply one of many synonyms denoting "Wisdom." In Sir the word occurs over 20 times, not, however, always, even in the "Wisdom" (70 of verses). It is used, in the sense of the "five books" (Pent). It generally includes in its connotation also "the prophecies and the rest of the books" (Prologue); see 32 (LXX 35) 24; 33 (LXX 36) 1-3. The passage to the wrong exercise of man's free will. Men can, if they like, keep the commandments, and when they break from them they are themselves alone to be blamed (15:14-17). Yet it was through a woman (Eve) that sin entered the world and by death (25:24; cf 1 Tim 2:14). See Rom 5 12 where "one man," strictly "human being" (ver 14, "Adam"), is made the first cause of sin. But nowhere in Sir is the doctrine of original sin taught.

(4) Predestination.—Notwithstanding the prominence given to "free will" (see [3], above), Sir teaches the doctrine of predestination, for God has determined that some men should be high and some low, some blessed and others cursed (35:10 f). Thus the whole of Ecc 21:27 (it occurs nowhere else in the Apoc) denotes one's own wicked heart, as the parallelism shows.

(5) Salvation.—There is no salvation except by way of good works on man's part (14:16 f) and forgiveness on God's (17:24-32). The only atonement is through one's own good works (6:5 f), honoring parents (32:14 f), almsgiving, etc (3:30; 17:19 f). There is no objective atonement ("expiation," "atone-ment," etc) for the "sins" (the Gr. ἁμαρτίαι, κακίστακαταί) in the great LXX text for the Heb "טב, kipper, "to atone").

(6) Sacrifice.—The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to God (34:18 f), though He Himself appointed sacrifices and first-fruits (45:20 f), and when the righteous offer sacrifices to God they are accepted and remembered in the time to come (35:1-12).

(8) Feasts.—Festivals as well as seasons are ordained by God to be observed by man (39 [LXX 36] 8 f; cf Gen 1:14).

(9) Prayer.—The duty of prayer is often pointed out (37:15, etc), the necessary preparation defined (17:25; 18:20-23), and its successful issue promised (35:17). There must be no vain repetitions (7:14; cf Mt 6:7), nor should there be an unheartedness in the matter (5:10; cf Jas 1:6). Men are to pray in sickness (38:9), but all the same the physician should be consulted and his advice followed (39:12 f). Sir nowhere more clearly expresses his belief in angels or uses language which implies such a belief. For "an angel [πῶς ἄγγελοι, ὁ ἄγγελος] destroyed them" the Heb of the original passage (2 K 19:35) has ἄγγελος, μπαγγέλαιον, "plague," and so the Syr, though the LXX (followed by the Vulg) has "angel."

(11) Eschatology.—Nowhere in this book is the doctrine of a future life taught, and the whole teaching of the book leaves no place for such a doctrine. Men will not indeed reward or punish according to their conduct, but to this world (see 2:10 f; 9:12; 11:26 f). The retribution is, however, not confined to the individuals in their lifetime; it extends to their children and involves their own glorious or inglorious name after death (see 15:8; 40:13; 41:11-13). A passage concerning Gehenna (7:17) is undoubtedly spurious and is lacking in the Syr, Ethiopic, etc. Since the book is silent as to a future life, it is of necessity silent on the question of a resurrection. Nothing is hinted as to a life beyond the grave, even in 41:1-4, where the author deprecates the fear of death. In these matters Sir agrees with the Pent and the prophetic and poetical books of the OT (Psalms, Job, etc), none of which give any intimation of a life beyond the grave and nothing is said of the Messianic hope which must have been entertained largely by Palestinian Jews living in the author's time, though in 36 (LXX 33) 1-17 the writer prays for the restoration of Israel and Jesus, i.e. R. H. Charles "Eschatics Eschatologica," 65), for the bringing in of the Messianic kingdom.

(12) Sirach's doctrine of Wisdom.—For a general discussion of the rise and development of the concept of Wisdom in the OT and in the Apoc see Palestinian Literature, the last section of which what the word implies in Sir is all that can here be attempted. It is in chs 1 and 24 that Ben Sira's doctrine is chiefly contained.

Wisdom is from God: He created it and it must therefore have a separate existence. Yet it is dependent on Him. It is omnipresent, though it dwells in a peculiar sense with all flesh. The root and beginning of Wisdom, its fulness and crown, are the fear of God (1:16.18.21); so that only the obedient and pious possess it (1:10.26); indeed Wisdom is identified with the fear of the Lord and the observance of the Law (19:20); it is even made one with the Law of Moses (24:23), i.e. it consists of practical principles, of precepts regulating the life.

In this doctrine of Wisdom we have a parallelism, principles of reason and Jewish particularism as the teaching of the revealed Law. We have the first in 24:21; the second in 24:23-34. Have we in this chapter, as in Prov, nothing outside the teaching of the Palestinian Judaism? Gfrörer (II, 18 f) denies this, maintaining that the whole of ch 24 was written by an Alexandrian Jew and adopted unchanged by Ben Sira. But what is there in this chapter which an orthodox, well-informed Palestinian Jew of Ben Sira's time might not well have written? It is quite another question whether this whole conception of Wisdom in the so-called Wisdom books is not due, in some measure, to Gr, though not Alexandrian, influence, unless indeed the Gr influence came by way of Alexandria. In the philosophy of Socrates, and in a less exclusive sense in that of Plato and Aristotle, the good man is the wise man. Cheyne (Job and Sol, 190) goes probably too far when he says, "By Gr philosophy Sirach, as far as we can see, was wholly uninfluenced."

The ethical principle of Sir is not Deism or individual utilitarianism, as is that of Prov and the OT generally, though in the Ps and Morals in the prophetic writings gratitude to God for the love He has shown and the kind acts He has performed has been an endless appeal to grace. Moreover, the individual point of view is reached only in the late parts of the OT. In the older OT books, as in Plato, etc.
it is the state that constitutes the unit, not the individual human being. The rewards and penalties of conduct, good or bad, belong law forbade the taking of money by any form (see Century Bible, "Ezra," etc., 198). "A slip on a pavement is better than a slip with the tongue," so guard thy mouth (20 18); "He that is wise in words shall advance himself; and one that is prudent will please great men" (20 27). The writer has the common untrained mind, that of the ploughman, carpenter and the like, has little capacity for dealing with problems of the intellect (38 24-34).

V. Literary Form.—The bulk of the book is poetic in form, abounding in that parallelism which characterizes Heb poetry, though it is less antithetic and regular than in Prov. No definite author has been claimed for this presentation, though Bickell, Margoliouth and others maintain the contrary (see Poetry, Hebrew). Even in the prose parts parallelism is found. The only strophic arrangement is that suggested by similarity of subject-matter.

Bickell (Zeitschr. f. katholische Theol., 1882) tr 51 1-20 back into Hebrew, though it is antithetic poetic prose, and Taylor supports this view by an examination of the lately discovered fragments of the Heb text (see Theol. Woch., vol. 1, 1885, p. 435). After 51 12 of the Gr and other versions, the Heb text has a ps 13 of 15; the Ps 136; but the Heb Vg of 51 1-20 does not favor Bickell's view, nor does the ps, found only in the Heb, lend much support to what either Bickell or Taylor says.

VI. Author.—The proper name of the author was Jesus (Jesus, Gr Ιωσήβ), the family name being Ben Sirah. The full name would be therefore "Jesus Ben Sira." The full name would be "Jesus of the Talmud and other Jewish writings.

Sirach he is known as "Ben Sira," lit. "son [or descendant?] of Sira." Who Sira was is unknown. No other book in the Apoc gives the name of the author as the author. In the best Gr MSS (BNA) of 50 27, the author's name appears as Ιωσήβ όν Σερηκ "Ελεαζώρ ὁ ἕρωαντος Σερηκ Ελεαζόρ από Ηνεκολομετούς, "Jesus the son of Sirach [son of Eleazar the Jerusalemite]." In the last two words S has by a copist's error, δ ἐλεάζωρ δ Ἡσιάκος, ο ἱερεύς ὁ ἑρωολομετούς, "the Solomon-like priest." The Heb text of 50 27 and 50 30 gives the following genealogy: Simeon son of Jesus, son of Sirach, son of Sira, son of Sirach, son and not of Sira, and so he is called by Saadia; see HDB (Nestle) and EB, II, 1165 (Toyn). We know nothing of Ben Sira beyond what can be gathered from the book itself. He was a resident in Pal (24 10 f), an orthodox Jew, well read in at least Jewish lit., a shrewd observer of life, with a philosophical bent, though true to the national faith. He had traveled far and seen much (34 11 f). His interests were too general and his outlook too wide to allow of his being either a priest or a scribe.

Many suppositions have been put forward as to the author's identity:

1. Jesus, the person of the temple
2. Simeon, the son of Jesus
3. The writer of the temple to the author.

(1) That the author was a priest: so in cod. S (50 27).
In 7 29 12 ff there are numerous references to sacrifices in the book. In 45 6-26 he has a long passage praising the professional leper of the temple. Yet on the whole Ben Sira does not write any passages in that form. (2) That he was a high priest: so Synegloss (Chron. ed Dindorf, 1 525) through a misunderstanding of a passage in Eusebius. But the teaching and temper of the book make this supposition more improbable than the last.

(3) That he was a physician: an inference drawn from 31 14 ff and other references to a professional of the body (10 10). But this is a very small foundation on which to build so great an edifice.

(4) That he was one of the 72 translators (LXX): so Lapide (Comm.), Calmet, Goldschayer, a wholly unsubstantiated hypothesis.

(5) No one of course believes that Solomon wrote the book, though many of the early Fathers held that he was the author of the five Wisdom Books, Prov, Eccl, Cant, Sir and Wisd.

VII. Unity and Integrity.—There is on the whole, such a uniformity in the style and teaching of the book that most scholars agree in ascribing the whole book (except the Prologue, which is the work of the translator) to one hand. This does not mean that he composed every line; he must have adopted current sayings, written and oral, and this will account for the apparent contradictions, as about becoming surety (29 14), and refusing to be surety (16 5; 29 18); and in 29 15 the Ps 136; but the Heb Vg of 51 1-20 does not favor Bickell's view, nor does the ps, found only in the Heb, lend much support to what either Bickell or Taylor says.

40 1–11), etc. But in these seeming opposites we have probably no more than complementary principles, the whole making up the complete truth. Nothing is more manifest in the book than the all-pervading thought of one dominant mind. Some have denied the genuineness of ch 51, but the evidence is at least inductive. There is nothing in this chapter inconsistent with the rest of the book.

In the recently discovered fragments of Heb text there is a statement that is lost in the Gr text and is of the kind EV which seems a copy of Ps 136. It is absent from the YSS and is not in the MSS. But in the Heb and Gr texts there are undoubted additions and omissions. There are, in the Gr, frequent glosses by Christian editors that are other changes (by the translators) in the direction of the Alexandrian Judaism; see Speaker’s Apostles and Paul.

VIII. Date.—In the book itself there is one mark of definite date (50.1), and in the Prologue there is another. Unfortunately both are ambiguous. In the Prologue the translator, whose grandfather is called (or even ancestor) Gr πρέσβειος, πρέσβης wrote the book (the younger Sirachides, as he is called), says that he reached Egypt, where he found and tr this book in the reign of Euergetes, king of Egypt. But there were two Grb kings called Euergetes, viz. Ptolemy Euergetes, or Euergetes I (247–222 BC), and Ptolemy VII Physcon, or Euergetes II (218–198 BC). Sirachides mentions the greater ones whose names he praises, Simon the high priest, son of Onias, who is named last in the list and lived probably near the time of the elder Sirachides. But there were two high priests named Simon and each of them was a son of Onias, viz. Simon I, son of Onias I (c. 310–290 BC), and Simon II, son of Onias II (c. 218–198 BC). Scholars differ as to which Euergetes is meant in the Prologue and which Simon in 50.1.

The conclusions to which the evidence has brought the present writer are these: (1) that Simon I (d. 290 BC) is the high priest meant; (2) that Ptolemy VII Physcon (218–198 BC) is the Euergetes meant.

1. Most Probable Views

(1) In favor of the first proposition are the following:

(a) The book must have been written some time after the death of Simon, for in the meantime an artificial fame had gathered around the name, and the very allusion to him as a hero of the past makes it clear that he had been long dead. Assuming that Simon I wrote in the 3rd cent. BC, as seems likely, it is a reasonable conclusion that the original Heb work was composed somewhat later than 250 BC. If Simon II is the man intended, the book could hardly have been composed before 150 BC, an impossible date; see below.

(b) In the list of great men in chs 44–50 the praises of Simon (50.1 f.) are sung after those of Nehemiah (49.13), suggesting that the space of time between them was not very great.

(c) The “Simon the Just” of Jos was certainly Simon I, he being so called, this Jewish historian says (Ant, XII, ii, 5), on account of his piety and kindness.

(d) It is probable that the “Simon the Just” of the Mischna (Abb 1.2) is also Simon I, though this is not certain. It is said of him that he was one of the last members of the great synagogue and in the Talm he is the hero of many glorifying legends. The so-called great synagogue never really existed, but the data assigned to it in which tradition shows that Simon I is Simon I that is thought of.

(e) In the Syr VS (Pesh) 60.23 reads thus: “Let it [peace] be established with Simon the Just,” etc. Some MSS have “Simon the Kind.” This text may of course be wrong; but Graetz and Eilersheim say that its insertion by the translators given to Simon I by Jos (op. cit.), the Mish and by Jewish tradition generally.

(f) The only references to Simon II in Jewish history and tradition depict him in an unfavorable light. In 2 Macc 9:8–18 he is the artist to whom the temple was given to Simon I by Jos (op. cit.), the Mish and by Jewish tradition generally.

(g) The high priest Simon is said (50.1–13) to have repaired the temple and fortified the city. Eilersheim says that the temple and city stood in need of what is here described in the time of Simon I, but not at the time of Simon II. Ptolemy VII Physcon (247–222 BC) in his wars with Demetrius destroyed many fortifications in Pal to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy, among which Acco, Joppa, Gaza are named, and it is natural to think that the capital and its sanctuary were included. This is, however, but a priori reasoning, and Degen- bourg argues that Simon II must be meant, since according to Jos (Ant, XII, iii, 3) Antiochus the Great (223–187 BC) wrote a letter in which he undertakes to bring back the city and temple of Jerusalem which had been destroyed. This is not, however, to say that Simon II or anyone else did, at that time, restore either.

(h) Of the numerous errors in the Gr text some at least seem due to the fact that the VS in that language was made so long after the composition of the original Heb that the sense of several Heb words had become lost among the Alexandrian Jews. If we assume that the Simon of ch 50 was Simon I (d. 290 BC), we must next ask what the Heb version was like about 250 BC; if we further assume that the Euergetes of the Prologue was Ptolemy VII (d. 198 BC), there is a reasonable space of time to allow the sense of the Heb to be lost in many instances (see Halévy, Rev. Sem., July, 1899). It must be admitted that there is no decisive evidence on one side or the other, but the balance weighs in favor of Simon I in the opinion of the present writer.

(2) That the Euergetes of the Prologue in whose reign the translation was made must have been Ptolemy VII Physcon, or Euergetes II, seems proved by the translator’s statement that he came to Egypt in the 38th year, tē τοῦ Ἐυρέγετον βασιλέα, επί τοῦ Ἐυρέγετον βασιλέα, i.e. almost certainly of the reign of Euergetes II. Simon I was the betrayer of the temple. Did Sirachides have for giving his own age? Now Euergetes I reigned but 25 years, but Euergetes II (Physcon) reigned in all 54 years, from 170 to 145 BC as regent with his father, and from 145 to 116 BC as sole monarch. If we accept this interpretation of the above words, the question is settled. Westcott, however (DB, 1863, I, 479, n. c), says “the words can only mean that the translator in his 38th year came to Egypt during the reign of Euergetes.” The other rendering adopted by Eichhorn is, he adds, “absolutely set at variance with the grammatical structure of the sentence.” In the second ed of DB (1898) this note has become expunged, and the article as edited by D. S. Margoliouth (I, 541) teaches the contrary view, which is now accepted by nearly all scholars (Schürer, etc.). We may therefore assume that the original Heb book was composed about 240–200 BC, or some 50 or more years after the death of Simon I, and that the translation was made about 150 BC, if the younger Sirachides came to Cyprus in 132 BC, and he gives us to understand in the Prologue that he tr the Heb work of his grandfather almost immediately after reaching that country. If Simon II (d. 198 BC) is meant in ch 50, we are compelled to assume for Simon I a date for the Heb of 145–130 BC in order to allow time for the growth of the halo of legend which had gathered about Simon. The translation must, in that case, have been completed some 20 years after the composition of the Heb, a conclusion which the evidence opposes. The teaching of the book belongs to 200 BC, or slightly earlier. The doctrine of the resurrection taught in Dn 165 BC is ignored in Sir, as it has not yet become a Jewish doctrine.

1. That the Eusebius of the Prologue and the Simon of ch 50 are in both cases the first so called. So Hug, Scholz, Wet, Kol, Ebersheim (Spokesman's Art and many others). The book was accordingly written after 250 BC, perhaps some 200 years later, and its translation was made some time after 220 BC, say 200 BC.

2. That Eusebius II (d. 116 BC) and Eusebius III are the very persons referred to. So Eichhorn, De Wette, Ewald. Franz Delitz, Hisig, Schürer.

3. Hitzig (Psalms, 1836, II, 118) made the original work a product of the Maccabean period—an impossible supposition, for the book says nothing at all about the Maccabees. Moreover, the priestly house of Zadok is praised in this book (chs 50, etc). It was held in little respect during the time of the Maccabean wars, owing to the sympathy it showed toward the Hellenizing party.

IX. Original Languages.—Even before the discovery of the substantial fragments of what is probably the original Heb text of this book, the scholarly world had reached the conclusion that Sir was composed in Hebrew in Heb. (1) The fact of a Heb original is definitely stated in the Prologue.

(2) Jerome (Proef, in vers. Libri Soli) says that he had seen the Heb original—the same text probably that underlies the fragments recently published, though we cannot be sure of this. (3) Citations apparently from the same Heb text are made not seldom in Talmudic and rabbinic literature. (4) There are some word-play in the text which is in the Gr are lost, but which reappear in the discovered Heb text, e.g., (43 8) ἀὰρ κατὰ τὸ δόμα αὐτῆς ἑτούν ἐκατορματίζει (read ἐκατορματίζειν), ἡ μήν κατὰ τὸ δόμα αὐτῆς ετέιν αὐτομανείν (read αὐτομανείν), “the moon according to its name reneweth itself”; the Heb words for “moon” and “renew itself” come from one root, as we said in English—what of course is not English “the moon moons itself.” There are other cases where mistakes and omissions in the Gr are explained by a reference to the newly found Heb text.

The strongly supported conjecture of former years that the book was composed in Heb was turned into a practical certainty through the discovery of the Heb text, but it is clear that the Heb is not that of the Gr. There are other cases where mistakes and omissions in the Gr are explained by a reference to the newly found Heb text.

(1) He refers to words in Heb which in that language are senseless, and he endeavors to show that they are disguised Pers words. As a matter of fact, he misuses the copies of the text which are wholly wrong or the word is indecipherable.

(2) There do appear to be Pers glosses, but they are not of the original text, and there can be no reasonable doubt that they are due to a Pers reader or copyist.

(3) There are many cases in which the Heb can be proved to be a better and older text than the Gr or Sir (see König, Expos T, XI, 170 f).

(4) As regards the character of the language, it may be said that in syntax it agrees in the main with the classical Heb of the OT, but its vocabulary links it with the latest OT books. Thus we have the use of the “waw-consecutive” with the imperfect (43 23; 44 9.23; 45 21, etc) and with the perfect (42 1.8.11), though the use of the simple waw with both tenses occurs also. This mixed usage is exactly what we find us in the latest part of the OT (Ecc, Est, etc). As regards vocabulary, the word הָפַךְ, הָפַךְ, has the sense of “thing,” “matter,” in 20 9, as in Ecc 3 1; 5 7; 8 6. In general it may be said that the Heb is that of early post-Bib times.

Margoliouth holds that the extant Heb VS is no older than the 11th cent., which is impossible. The mistake is due to confounding the age of the MSS with that of the VS they contain.

(5) It is nevertheless admitted that in some cases the Syr or the Gr or both together preserve an older and correcter text than the Heb, but this because the latter has sometimes been miscopied and intentionally changed.

(6) The numerous Hebraisms in the Gr VS which in the Heb have their original expression point to the same conclusion—that this Heb text is the original form.

Margoliouth has been answered by Smend (TLZ, 1889, col. 506), König (Expos T, X, 1890-1900), Nöddke (ZATW, XX, 81-94), and by many others. Bickell (Zeitschrift für katholische Theol., III, 387 ff) holds also that the Heb Sir extant is a tr from the Gr or Syr or both.

X. Versions.—The LXX tr was made from the Heb direct; it is fairly correct, though in all the extant MSS the text is very corrupt in several places. (1) The text occurs in the uncials B S C and part of A fairly free from glosses, though abounding in obvious errors. (2) The text is found in a much purer form in cod. V and also in Sin and part of A. All extant Gr MSS except the late cursive 248 seem to go back to one original MS, since in all of them the two sections 30 25—33 15 and 33 16—36 11 have changed places, so that 33 16—36 11 follows 30 24 and 30 25—33 15 comes after 36 11. Most scholars accept the explanation of Fritzke (Exeg. Handbuch zu den Pesh. V, 211) that the two versions (of which these two parts (of similar size) were written got mixed, the worse one being put first. On the other hand, the cursive 248 (14th cent.) has these sections in their proper order, and the same is true of the Syr, Pesh., etc. The Sept vs. the Complutensian Polyglot (which follows throughout 248 and not the uncials) and EV which is made from this Polyglot. The superiority of 248 to the older MS (B S A C V) is seen in other parts of the Gr text. In the other Gr MSS, 3 25 is omitted, as it is by Edersheim and most commentators before the discovery of the Heb text. But this last supports 248 in retaining the verse, and it is now generally kept. In 43 23 “islands” is properly rendered by Vulg, Syr, 23 and the Heb, but older Gr MS read “Jesus, who in the latest part of Dn’s life Jesus planted them” (in the Heb text the last word is replaced by “and Jesus planted them”). The other MSS have a text which yields no sense in 43 26: EV “By reason of him his end hath successes.” The Gr of 248 and the Heb give this sense: “The angel is equipped for his task,” etc.

The Syr (Pesh) VS is now almost universally acknowledged to have been made from the Heb, of which, on the whole, it is a faithful rendering. In some places, however, it agrees with the LXX against the Heb, probably under the influence of the inaccurate idea that the Gr text is the original one. In the VS the two sections 30 25—33 5 and 33 16—36 11 are in proper order, as in the Heb, a fresh proof that the Syr is not tr from the Gr.

The Vulg agrees with the Old Lat which follows the LXVX closely. Lapidus, Sabatier and Bengel tried to argue that the Syr was based on the lost original Heb, but the evidence they supply falls far short of proof, and recently discovered Heb fragments show that they were wrong. The two sections transposed in the LXV (except 248) are also transposed in the Lat, showing that the latter is based on the Gr text.

The Lat text of both Sir and Wis according to the cod. Amiant is given by Lagarde in his Mittheilungen, I, 234–35. This closely follows the Gr text.

AV follows the cursives and often repeats their errors. RV tries to impress the reader with the uniqueness of the Heb text, and thus often departs from the Heb.

4. English

3 19 is retained by AV but omitted by RV. For the latter clause of the verse ("mysteries are revealed unto the meek"), AV is supported by cod. 214, while the Heb and RV both read. Both should be corrected by the Heb in 7 26 and 38 1. 15.

For fuller details concerning VSS see Speaker's Apoc, II, 23–32 (Edersheim); Kautzsch, Die Apok. des AT, I, 242 ff (Ryswell), and the art. by Nestle in 1906, I 43.

LITERATURE. In addition to books mentioned under Apoc and in the course of the present art., note the following:

(1) The text of the Heb fragments: For accounts of the discovery and decipherments of these see HDB, IV, 540 ff (Nestle); Bible Polyglotte (Vulgate), V. 4 A: R. Schürer, GJV, III, 221 ff. The text of the Heb as yet known is given in the following: R. Strack, Die Spruche Jesu, etc. (with notes and glossary), Leipzig, 1903; Isaac Levi, The Heb Text of Ecceziasitiques (with notes and commentary), Leiden, 1898; Julius L. 314, S. C. Smend, The Weissheit des Jesus Sirach, Heb and Deutsch (with notes and glossary), Berlin, 1906. The Heb appears also in the Bible Polyglotte, ed F. Vigouroux, with the LXX, Vulg and a French translation in 6 columns. (No other Polyglot has appeared since the discovery of this Heb.)

There are texts in Heb, Syr, Gr and Eng., and also useful notes and tables in The Original Heb of Sir 39 15–49 11, byCowles and Neubauer, Oxford, 1897. Still later and fuller is The Wisdom of Ben Sira in Heb and Eng., with notes on the Heb by Schechter and Taylor, Cambridge, 1899.

(2) Commentaries: The works of Fritzsch (1858), who notes the evidence of the Syr and ignores the Heb idiom in the book, and of Bissell (1880) and Ederhein (1901) are of no importance for the study of the Heb fragments. The last-named shows both learning and ingenuity in tracking the Heb idiom and in explaining difficult words; but the following odd are not based upon the Heb. They take full note of the Heb text as far as discovered:

J. C. Gall, L'ancien et le nouveau Jesu-Sira traduit et commenté, Paris, 1898, 1901; Ryswell in Kautzsch's Apok. des AT, I, 290–473, exceedingly valuable, esp. for the text and introduction, but he takes account of the Heb fragments published by Cowles and Neubauer only in this book. His treatment of the Heb parts published after he wrote, see further articles by him in Stud. u. Krit., 1908, 180 ff; Knabenhaur, Commentarii in Ecclesiasticum, Paris, 1902; Peters, Der jüngst wieder aufgefundene hebräische Text des Buches Ecclesiasticus, 1902 (cf the notice by Smend, TIL, II, 1903, 72–77); Smend, Die Weissheit des Jesus Sirach erläutert und erneuert in der modernen Sprache, Berlin, 1906. One account is, of course, the Apok. of Dr. R. Strack, which is a full edition of the text of the Sira (cf his Apok. des AT, I, 290–473) and is printed in the Schweizer dictionary, series 2.

The New Oxford Apoc (Intro and Notes), ed. by R. H. Charles (1913), contains a full intro and comm. J. H. Hart has published separately a critical edition of cod. 248, in which he collates the principal authorities, MS and printed.

Of the Dict. articles those in HDB (Nestle, strong in the critical, but weak and defective on the historical and exegetical side); ER (C. H. Toy, sound and well balanced); see also Jew Enc (Israel Levi) and Enc Brit (W. Bancroft), who supply detailed registers. The literature see HDB (Nestle); Jew Enc, "Sirach" (Israel Levi); and esp. Schürer, GJV, III, 219 ff.

SIRACH, THE ALPHABET OF: Usually called the Alphabet of Ben Sira. The compilation so designated consists of two lists of proverbs, 22 in A, 29 in B, arranged according to each case its alphabet acrostics. Each of these proverbs is followed by a haggadah comm., with legends and tales, many of them indecent. Some of the proverbs in the Alphabet are probably genuine compositions by Ben Sira and are quoted as such in the Talm., but in their present form the Alphabets are at least as late as the 11th cent. AD.

LITERATURE.—The only complete copy of the text known is in the British Museum, the copy in the Bodleian being defective. Steinheil in his editor's preface (1854) states that he has only a portion of this last with critical notes (Alphabeticum Syriacitcs, Berlin, 1854). Cowley and Neubauer (The Original Heb of a Portion of Erasrus), besides giving a general account of this work, add a tr into Eng. of the Aram. proverbs. George (Ben Sira, The Alphabet of), Dr. Louis Ginsberg (New York) also gives a tr of the 22 Aram. proverbs with useful remarks after each. The work is known in Yiddish (often, Judaeo-Spanish, Fr. and Ger., but never, so far, completely into English.

SITH, sīth: An Anglo-Saxon word meaning "afterward, "since" (Ezk 35 6 AV and ERV, ARV "since").

SITHRI, sīthīʾ (ʾīṣēthīʾ, sīthīʾ): A grandson of Kohath (Ex 6 22).

SITNAH, sītīnā (ʾīṣīnāh, "hated," "hostility"); ʾāḵārīa, echītīra): The name of the second of the two wells dug by the herdsmen of Isaac, the cause of further "envy" with the herdsmen of Gerer (Gen 26 21, in "That is, "Envy"). The site is unknown, but Palaeo (P Ekh, 15) provides an echo of the name in Sheshet or Ruhebeh, the name of a small valley near Ruhebeh. See REHOBOTH.

SITTING, sītīng (ʾīṣūn, yāshābāh, "to sit down or still," "sitting," "to brood, "latch"; ʾāḏēphō, kathēzkōmai, "to sit down," āḏēphōn, and, kēnōmēi, "to lie back," "recline"). The favorite position of Job (Mal 3:2, Mt 9 9; 28 55 [cf 5 1; Lk 4 20; 5 3]; Mk 14 18; Lk 18 35; Jn 2 14, etc).

"In Ps people sit at all kinds of work: the carpenter saws, planes, and hews with his hand-axe, sitting upon the ground or upon the plank he is planing. The washerwoman sits by the tub, and, in a word, no one stands where it is possible to sit... On the low shop-counter the tumbled saloonmen squat in the midst of the gay wares" (L, II, 144, 275; III, 72, 75).

Figurative: (1) To sit with denotes intimate fellowship (Ps 1 1; 26 5; Lk 13 29; Rev 3 21); (2) to sit in the dust indicates poverty and contempt (Isa 47 1, "writhe, ignorance of things" [4 16] and trouble (Mic 7 8); (3) to sit on thrones denotes authority, judgment, and glory (Mt 19 28).

SIVAN, sīvān, sīvān, (7) sīvān: AV Sisamai): A Judahite, of the descendants of the daughter of Sheshan and Jarha, his Egyg servant (1 Ch 2 40). Commentators have compared the name to סים, sīm, a Phoen god (cf Rudolph Kittel, Comm. ad loc.; BDB, s.v.).

SISMAI, sīmāʾ (ʾīṣēmāʾ, sīmāy; AV Sisamai): A Judahite, of the descendants of the daughter of Sheshan and Jarha, his Egyg servant (1 Ch 2 40). Commentators have compared the name to סים, sīm, a Phoen god (cf Rudolph Kittel, Comm. ad loc.; BDB, s.v.).

SISTERS, sīstērz (ʾīṣērēz, ʿāḏōthēz): Used repeatedly in the OT of a female (1) having the same parents as another; or (2) having one parent in common, with another, half-sister (Gen 20 12; Lev 18 9), and also (3) of a female belonging to the same family or clan as another, so akinswoman (Gen 24 60; Job 42 11); (4) also of a woman of the same country (Nu 25 18). 5 (Figuratively, the two kingdoms, Israel and Judah, are sisters (Ezk 23 7 ff). 6 Confederate cities are conceived of as sisters (Ezk 16 45 ff). 7 ʿāḏōth is used of objects which go in pairs, as curtains, each ‘coupled to its sister’ (Ex 26 36), and of wings in pairs (Ezk 1 8; 3 13); (8) of virtues or conditions, with which one is closely associated "say unto wisdom, thou art my sister" (Prov 7 4; cf Job 17 14); (9) of a lover concerning his wife, as a term of endearment (Cant 4 9 ff; 5 11; 8 8). In the NT, ἀδελφός, adelphē, used (1) in sense of physical blood kinship (Mt 12 50; 13 56; 19 28; Lk 10 39 ff; 14 26; Jn 11 f f; 19 25; Acts 23 16); (2) of fellow-members in Christ: "Phoebe, our sister" (Rom 16 1; see also 1 Cor 7 15; 1 Tim 5 1; Jas 2 13); (3) possibly, of a church, "thy elect sister" (2 Jn ver 13). Literal: The word 'šar' designates the skin of both men and animals, the latter both raw and in tanned condition: 'Jeh God made for Adam and for his wife coats of skin [šar], and clothed them' (Gen 3 21). 'She put the skins [šar] of the kids of the goats upon her, and upon the satchel of the mouth of his neck' (27 16); 'Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots?' (Jer 13 23). The Heb geolah is found in the sense of human skin: "I have sewed sackcloth upon my skin, and have laid my horn in the dust" (Job 18 15).

Figurative: To escape by the skin of the teeth' is a narrow expression (Job 19 20). Satan says in his calumny of Job: "Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life' (2 4). The idea here is, that a man will endure or do the worst, even as it were the flaying of his body, to save his life. The RV has replaced 'skin' as the tr of the Heb bsdr by 'flesh': "My bones cleave to my flesh" (Ps 102 5). "The bars of his skin" is a poetical expression for "the members of his body" in Job 13 13 m, where the text interprets rather than translates the animal.

Skins served for purposes of clothing from an early date (Gen 3 21). In later days they were the raiment of prophets and hermits (Zec 13 4; He 11 37). LXX translates ἔπιπαντα, 'o'dereth, 'the mantle' of Elijah (1 K 19 13 19; 2 K 2 8 13 f); with rab'v, or 'sheepskin, the word in the LXX is being derived from these passages. It is not unlikely that the raiment of John the Baptist made of camel's hair' and the 'leather girdle about his loins' are identical with the rough garb of OT prophets. The skins of cattle were largely employed for technical uses: 'rams' skins and badgers' skins' are esp. mentioned in the construction of the tabernacle as material for the waterproof covering of the roof (Ex 25 5; Nu 4 8 10 f).

RV, rejecting the tr 'badgers'skins,' substitutes 'sealskins' and adds 'porpoise skins' in the margin. There is little doubt that the rendering of the AV is indeed incorrect. The Heb name of the animal (b̄b̄k̄t̄) is the same as the Arab بَكَبَكَة b̄k̄k̄; which means the dolphin and the 'sea-cow' or halibut of the Red Sea, of which genus there are two species even now extant (H. tabernacul. Kjns, and H. Helgricli Ehr.). It is probable that the Hebrew words have been confounded throughout time with marine animal's seals, porpoises, dolphins and halibutes, under the same expression. See SEALSkins.

In Ezk 16 10 we find these skins mentioned as materials for elegant robes, and as the Arabs of the Red Sea littoral use the same material in the manufacture of sandals. A quaint use was made of skins in the making of skin bottles, the kurbeh or kirbeh of modern Arabia. We find a great variety of Heb expressions, which possibly designated special varieties, all of which were rendered כֶּבֶת, b̄k̄k̄, in LXX and the NT (ἡμεθ, h̄meθ, ἱμάθ, ἵμαθ, πόδα, nōdā, nōdāh, nōbēl, nōbēlē, nōbēlēh, nōbēlēh, πόλις, πόλις, πόλις, nōbēlēh, πόλις, b̄k̄b̄k̄, b̄k̄b̄k̄, b̄k̄b̄k̄, b̄k̄b̄k̄, b̄k̄b̄k̄). RV has rendered the Gr χιλβος in the NT by 'wine skin' (Mt 9 17; Mc 2 22; Lk 5 37) with the marginal addition 'that is, skins used as bottles.' These skin bottles were made with the skins of goats, sheep, oxen or buffaloes; the former had more or less the shape of the figures of the animals, the holes of the extremities being closed by tying or sewing, and the neck of the skin being closed by a tap or a plug, while the larger ones were sewn together in various shapes. As a rule only the inside of the skin was tanned, the skin turned inside out, and the fluid or semi-fluid filled in, e.g. water, milk, butter, cheese. The hairy inside was not considered as in any way injurious to the contents. Only in the case of wine- and oil-skins was it thought advantageous to tan the skins inside and out.

SLANDER, slân'dér (substan. ṣâbêb, ṣâbêb; 'slander'; ḫâdâbâs, ḫâdâbâs; 'slanderer'; yb. 271, rûgâd, 'to sink about' as a talebearer. ṣâbêb, ṣâbêb, 'to use the tongue,' 'to slanderer;' ḫâdâbâs, ḫâdâbâs, 'to caluminate,' 'to slanderer;' and other words): Slander (etymologically a doublet of 'scandal,' from OFr. ecaudade, Lat scandalum, 'stumbling-block') is an accusation maliciously uttered, with the purpose or effect of damaging the reputation of another. As a rule it is a false charge (Mt 5 11); but it may be a truth circulated insidiously and with a hostile purpose (e.g. Dn 3 8, 'brought accusation against,' where LXX has ḫâdâbâs, 'slanderer;' Lk 16 1, the same Gr word). Warnings, condemnations and complaints in reference to this sin are very frequent, both in the OT and NT. Mischievous 'tale-bearing' or 'whispering' is condemned (Lev 19 16; Ezk 22 9). There are repeated warnings against evil-speaking (as in Ps 34 13; Prov 15 1; Eph 4 31; Col 3 8; Jas 4 11; 1 Pet 3 10), which is the cause of such sin with strife between man and man (Prov 16 27 30), and which recoils on the speaker himself to his destruction (Ps 105 10; 140 11). Esp. is false witness, which is 'slander carried into a court of justice,' to be condemned and punished (Ex 20 16;

6. The NT Conception

Literature

The origin of the term "slave" is traced to the Ger. sklave, meaning a captive of the Slavonic race who had been forced into servitude (cf Slav; Fr. esclave, Dutch slab, Swedish slaf, Spanish esclavo). The word "slave" occurs only in Jer 2 14 and in Rev 18 13, where it is suggested by the context and not expressed in the original languages (Heb יִתְחָלָת בָּרִית, "one born in the bond"); Gr * slaves, "body"). However, the Heb word *בָּרִית, in the OT and the Gr word ἡδος, doulos, in the NT more properly might have been trd "slave" instead of "servant" or "bondservant," understanding though that the slavery of Judaism was not the cruel system of Greece, Rome and later nations. The principal term for the servant under free service, the slave, obligatory, restricted service.

Scripture statement rather than philological study must form the basis of this article. We shall notice how slaves could be secured, sold and redeemed; also their rights and their masters' rights; confining the study to OT Scripture, noting in conclusion the NT conception. The word "slave" in this art. refers to the Heb slave unless otherwise designated.

Slaves might be acquired in the following ways, viz.:

1. Bought.—There are many instances of buying slaves (Lev 25 39 ff). Heb slavery broke into the ranks of every human relationship: a father could sell his daughter (Ex 21 7; Neh 5 5); a widow's children might be sold to pay their father's debt (2 K 2 11); a man could sell himself (Lev 25 39:47); a woman could sell herself (Dt 15 12.13.17), etc. Prices paid were somewhat indefinite. According to Ex 21 29 thirty shekels was a standard price, but Lev 27 3–7 gives a scale of from 3 to 50 shekels according to age and sex, with a provision for an appeal to the priest in case of undue price (ver 3). The price set is the price set for a young man (ver 5), and this corresponds with the sum paid for Joseph (Gen 27 28).

But in 2 Mace 8 the price on the average is 90 for a talent, i.e. 40 shekels each. The ransom of an entire talent for a single man (1 K 20 39) means that the sum paid (far more than that of a slave) was set on this particular captive.

There were certain limitations on the right of sale (Ex 21 7 ff).

(2) Exchange.—Slaves, i.e. non-Heb slaves, might be traded for other slaves, or provision of slaves.

(3) Satisfaction of debt.—It is probable that a debtor, reduced to extremity, could offer himself in payment of his debt (Lev 25 39), though this was forbidden in the Törath Kehunah, cf 'Ogar Yisrael, vii.292. That a creditor could sell into slavery a debtor or any of his family, or make them his own slaves, has some foundation in the statement of the poor widow whose pathetic cry reached the ears of the prophet Elisha: "Thy servant my husband is dead; . . . . and the creditor is come to take unto him my two children to be bondmen" (2 K 4 1).

(4) Gift.—The non-Heb slave, and possibly the Heb slave, could be acquired as a gift (Gen 29 24).

(5) Inheritance.—Children could inherit non-Heb slaves as their own possession.

(6) Voluntary surrender.—In the case of a slave's release in the seventh year there was allowed a willing choice of indefinite slavery. The ceremony at such a time is interesting: "Then his master shall bring him unto the judges [m], and shall bring him to the door, or unto the door-post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl; and he shall serve him for ever" (Ex 21 6). A pierced ear probably meant obedience to the master's voice. History, however, does not record a single instance in which such a case occurred.

(7) Arrest.—"If the thief be found breaking in, . . . . he shall make restitution: if he have nothing, then he shall be sold for his theft" (Ex 22 2.5).

(8) Birth.—The children of slaves, born within the master's house of a wife given to the slave there, became slaves, and could be held, even if the father went free (Ex 21 4; cf Lev 25 51).

(9) Capture in war.—Thousands of men, women and children were taken in war as captives and reduced, sometimes, to menial slavery. Such slavery, however, was more humane than wholesale butchery according to the customs of earlier times (Nu 31 7–35). Males were usually slain and females kept for slavery and concubinage (Dt 20 11.14). Captive slaves and bought slaves, "from nations round about," forced moral ruin into Israel's early civilization. See Siege, 3.

The two principal sources of slave supply were poverty in peace and plunder in war.

The Hebrews themselves were held as captive slaves at various times by (1) Phoenicians (the greatest slave traders of ancient times), (2) Phils, (3) Syrians (2 K as War 5 2 ff), (4) Egyptians, and (5) Romans. Captives There must have been thousands subjected to severest slavery. See also Egypt; Israel; Pharaoh; Servant, etc.

The freedom of slaves was possible in the following ways:

(1) By redemption.—Manumission by the consent of Slaves Hebrews. The slave's freedom might be bought, the price depending on (a) the nearest to the seventh year or the Jubilee year, (b) the first purchase price, and (c) personal consideration, as was the legal authority of the one in bondage. A slave could be redeemed as follows:
the practice of slavery in the ancient Near East. The article discusses the laws and rights of slaves, including their treatment, the duration of their service, and the conditions under which they could be freed. It also examines the relationship between masters and slaves, highlighting the power imbalance and the role of law in regulating this relationship. The article concludes with a reflection on the historical and ethical implications of slavery, emphasizing the importance of understanding its complex dynamics and the impact it had on society.
pation other than in the Sabbathal and Jubilee years was evidently the right of masters; (6) to circumscribe slaves, both Jew and Gentile, within his own household (Gen 17:13-22:7); (7) to sell, give away, or trade slaves (Gen 29:24). According to Tórah Kóháním a Hev servant could be sold only under certain conditions (See 1, [1]); (8) to own male and female slaves, though not unto death (Ex 21:20); (9) to marry a slave himself, or give his female slaves in marriage to others (1 Ch 2:35); (10) to marry to a daughter of a slave (1 Ch 2:34 f); (11) to purchase slaves in foreign markets (Lev 25:44); (12) to keep the persons so purchased as a slave; the right way slave from a foreign master (Dt 23:15-16). See 3, [5]; (13) to enslave or sell a caught thief (Gen 44:8-33; Ex 22:3); (14) to hold, in perpetuity, non-Heb slaves (Lev 25:46); (15) to seek advice of slaves (1 S 15:14). The reference here is open to doubt. See 4, [6]; (16) to demand service (Gen 14:14; 24).

Throughout OT times the rights of both slaves and masters varied, and in general the above may be considered the model. In later times Zedekiah, covenanted with the Hebrews never again to enslave their own brothers, but they broke the covenant (Jer 34:8).

There were slaves during NT times. The church issued no edict sweeping away this custom of the old Judaism, but the gospel of Christ with its warm, penetrating love-Conception message mitigated the harshness of ancient times and melted cruelty into kindness. The equality, justice and love of Christ's teachings changed the whole attitude of man to man and man to servant. This spirit of brotherhood quickened the conscience of the age, leaped the walls of Judaism, and penetrated the remoter regions. The great apostle proclaimed this truth: "There can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, . . . ye all are one in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:28). The Christian slaves and masters are both exhort in Paul's letters to live godly lives and make Christ-like their relations on the one to the other—obedience to masters and forbearance with slaves. "Bondservants [m], be obedient unto your masters, . . . as bondservants [m] of Christ. And . . . ye masters, . . . forbear threatening: their Master is in heaven, and there is no respect of persons with him" (Eph 6:5-9).

Christ was a reformer, but not an anarchist. His gospel was dynamic but not dynamic. It was even, electric with power, but permeated with love. Christian life and teaching were against Judaistic slavery, Rom slavery and any form of human slavery. The love of His gospel and the light of His life were destined, in time, to make human emancipation earth-wide and human brotherhood as universal as His own benign presence.

SLAYING, slâyng (by spear, dart, or sword). See PENISHMENTS.

SLEEP, slēp: Represents many words in Heb and Gr. For the noun the most common are ðrûth, šēnâth, and ðros, húnos; for the vb., ðwûf, ðyâkên, ðwûf, ðâkîkhûb, and kæthèdôs, kæthèdôs. The figuratives use for death (Dt 31:16, etc) and sluggishness (Eph 5:14, etc) are very obvious. See DREAMS.

SLEEP, DEEP (םי, târdêmâh, vb. ד, ráthâm, from a root meaning "to be dead"): The vb. ráthâm has no further meaning than "to be fast asleep" (Jgs 4:21; Jon 1:5), but AV used "deep sleep" as a tr only in Dnl 8:18; 10:9, where a sleep supernaturally caused (a "trance") is meant (of "dead sleep" in Ps 76:6). RV's insertion of "deep sleep" in place of AV's "fast asleep" in Jgs 4:21 is consequently unfortunate. The noun târdêmâh has the same meaning of "trance" in Gen 21:15; 22:12; 1 S 4:11; Job 4:14; Ps 33:19; 19:15; Is 29:10, it is used figuratively of torpor. In Acts 20:9 (hûnos bathâs), heavy natural sleep is meant.

SLEEVES, slēvz (Gen 37:3). See DRESS.

SLEIGHT, slít: No connection with "slight," but from the same root as "sly" and so = "cunning." So in Eph 4:14, "sleight of men," for σύπλεγμα, κυβέλα, "dice-playing" (of "cubegs"); "gamblers' tricks," "trickery."

SLIME, Slim, SLIME PITS, slim'pits (םי, hênâr; LXV ðfôpôlôs, ðsphôlos; Vulg: bitumen; RVm: "bitumen"); cf Arab. `hımûr, "bitumen"; and cf ðrûm, hómoer, "clay," "mortar"): In the account of the ark in Gen 6:14, ðfôp, kôphâr (LXX ðfôpôlôs, ðsphôlos; Vulg: bitumen; cf Arab. `hımûr, "clay"), "pitch") does not necessarily denote vegetable pitch, but may well mean bitumen. The same may be said of ðfôf, zepkETH, "pitch" (cf Arab. târît, "pitch") in Ex 2:3 and Isa 34:9. The word "slime" occurs in the following passages: "And they had brick for stone, and slime had they for mortar" (Gen 11:3); "Now the vale of Siddim was full of slime pits" (Gen 14:10, m "bitumen pits"); "She took for him an ark of têlûa, and daubed it with slime and with pitch" (Ex 2:3).

Bitumen is a hydrocarbon allied to petroleum and natural gas. It is a lustrous black solid, breaking with a conchoidal fracture, burning with a yellow flame, and melting when ignited. It is probably derived from natural gas and petroleum by processes of oxidation and evaporation, and its occurrence may be taken as a sign that other hydrocarbons are or have been present in the strata. It is found in small lumps and larger masses in the cretaceous limestone on the west side of the Dead Sea, and there is reason to believe that considerable quantities of it rise to the surface of the Dead Sea during earthquakes. In ancient times it was exported to Egypt to be used in embalming mummies. Important mines of it exist at Hebron near Mt. Hermon and in North Syria. Springs of liquid bituminous matter exist in Mesopotamia, where according to Herodotus and other classical writers it was used as mortar with sun-dried bricks. Various conjectures have been made as to the part played by bitumen in the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. Diodorus Siculus calls the Dead Sea láthos ðfôlîlîs, láthos asphálathîs, "lake of asphalt." See SIDON; CITIES OF THE PLAIN.

SMYRNA, smō'rēnà (Σμύρνα, Smyrna): Smyrna, a large ancient city on the western coast of Asia Minor, at the head of a gulf which reaches 30 miles inland, was originally peopled by the Asiatics known as the Lelages. The city seems to have been taken from the Lelages by the Aeolian Greeks about 1100 BC; there still remain traces of the cyclopean masonry of that early time. In 688 BC it passed into the possession of the Ionian Greeks and was made one of the cities of the Ionian confederacy, but in 627 BC it was taken by the Lydians. During the years 301 to 281 BC, Lysimachus entirely rebuilt it on a new site to the S.W. of the earlier cities, and surrounded it by a wall. Standing, as it did, upon a good harbor, at the head of one of the chief highways to the interior, it early became a great trading-center and the chief port for the export trade. In Roman times, Smyrna was considered the most brilliant city of Asia Minor, successfully rivaling Pergamos and Ephesus. Its streets were wide and paved. Its system of coinage was old, and now about the city coins of every period are found. It was celebrated for its schools of science and medicine, and for its handsome buildings. Among them was the Homarium, for Smyrna was one of several places which claimed to be the birthplace of the poet. On the slope of Mt. Pagus was a theater which seated 20,000 spectators. In the year 23 AD a temple was built in honor of Tiberius and his mother Julia, and the Golden Street, connecting the temples of Zeus and Cybele, is said to have been the best in any ancient city. Smyrna early became a Christian city, for there was one of the Seven Churches of the Book of Rev (2:8–11). There Polycarp, the Bishop of Smyrna, was martyred though without the sanction of the Roman government. It seems that the Jews of Smyrna were more antagonistic than were the Romans to the spread of Christianity, for it is said that even on Saturday, their sacred day, they brought wood for the fire in which Polycarp was burned. His grave is still shown in a cemetery there. Like many other cities of Asia Minor, Smyrna suffered frequently, esp. during the years 178–80 AD, from earthquakes, but it always escaped entire destruction. During the Middle Ages the city was the scene of many struggles, the most fierce of which was directed by Tunur against the Christians. Tradition relates that there he built a tower, using as stones the heads of a thousand captives which he put to death, yet Smyrna was the last of the Christian cities to hold out against the Mohammedans; in 1424 it fell into SLOPES, slōps. See Asedoth-Pisgah.

SLOW, slo: Chiefly for τάχω, 'erekh, lit. "long," in the phrase "slow to anger" (Neh 9:17, etc.). In Ex 4:10; Lk 24:25; Jas 1:19, for τάχω, kàbdhēth; πέποι, πράδας, both meaning "heavy," " sluggish," while Sir 35 uses "be slow" for ἀκρώ, ὀκτή, "hesitate." In addition, AV uses "slow" for ἄργος, ἄνευ, "inactive," in Wisd 15:15, "slow to go" (RV "helpless for walking"), and in Tit 1:12, "slow bellies" (RV "idle gluttons"). In Sir 61:24, AV has "be slow" for διονομα, διεκτέο, "be lacking" (so RV).
the hands of the Turks. It was the discovery of America and the resulting discovery of a sea route to India which ruined the Smyrna trade.

Modern Smyrna is still the largest city in Asia Minor, with a population of about 250,000, of whom half are Greek and less than one-fourth are Mohammedans. Its modern name, Izmir, is a Turkish corruption of the ancient name. Even under the Turkish government the city is progressive, and is the capital of the Aitim vilayet, and therefore the home of a governor. Several railroads follow the courses of the ancient routes into the distant interior. In its harbor ships from all parts of the world may be seen. The ancient harbor of Paul's time has been filled in, and there the modern bazaars stand. The old stadium has been destroyed to make room for modern buildings, and a large part of the ancient city lies buried, and the 40 mosques of which the city boasts. The better of the modern buildings, belonging to the government and occupied by the foreign consuls, stand along the modern quay. Traces of the ancient walls are still to be found. One of Mt. Pagus is the Ephesian gate, and the Black-gate, as the Turks call it, is near the railroad station. The castle upon Mt. Pagus, 460 ft. above the sea, dates from Byzantine times. The prosperity of Smyrna is due, not only to the harbor and the port of entry to the interior, but partly to the perfect climate of spring and autumn—the winters are cold and the summers are hot; and also to the fertility of the surrounding country. Figs, grapes, vакона, olives, sponges, cotton and turquoise are among the chief articles of trade. See also CHURCHES, SEVEN.

SNAIL, snail (יוֹרֵשׁ, homet, RV “sand-lizard,” LXX ὑποπτα, σαῦρα, “lizard” [Lev 11 30]; [2] הַשָּׁבַרְלָל, ὕποπτος, κέρως, “wax” [Ps 88 8]): (1) Homet is 5th in the list of unclean “creeping things” in Lev 11 30, and occurs nowhere else. “Snail” is not warranted by LXX or Vulg. RV has “sand-lizard.” It may be the skink or a species of Lacerta. See LIZARD. (2) Shabbiral is tr’ “snail” in Ps 88 8: “Let them be as a snail which melteth and is not found; let them be as the mire next to the ‘snail’ which is ‘slag.’” Gesenius derives shabbelal from bedal, “to pour”; of Arab. balla, “to wet,” instancing מָכָא, lemax, “snail,” or “slag,” from מָכָה, lehbo, “to pour.” While LXX has κέρως, “wax,” Talm (.Minimum) gives מִשְׁלָה, “mire.” The trinary explanation of the passage, which is not very satisfying, is that the snail leaves a trail of mucus (i.e. it melts) as it moves along. This does not in any way cause the snail to waste away, because its glands are continually manufacturing fresh mucous. Large species of snail, Helix aspersa and Helix pomatia, are collected and eaten, boiled, by the Christians of Syria and Palestine, esp. in Lent. The Jews and Moslems declare them to be unclean and do not eat them.

SNARE, snár (תְּסַנְּא, pah; ἡδογία, págois, but σπερχόμενος, bróchois, in 1 Cor 7 35): Over half a dozen Heb words are used to indicate different methods of taking birds and animals, of which the snare (תְּסַנְּא, pah) is mentioned oftener than any other. It was a noose of hair or small bird, of wire for large birds or smaller animals. The snares were set in a favorable location and grain scattered to attract the attention of feathered creatures. They accepted the bire of good feeding and walked into the snare, not suspecting danger. For this reason the snare became particularly applicable in describing a tempting bire offered by men to lead their fellows into trouble, and the list of references is almost, all of the same nature. See Ex 10 7; 1 S 15 21; 28 Ps 11 6; 18 5; “snare” is used symbolically of anything that may kill: 91 3; 124 7; 140 5; 141 9; Prov 7 23; 13 14; 18 7; 20 23; 22 25; 29 25; Ecc 9 12. “But this is a people robbed and plundered; they are all of them smitten in holes, and they are hid in prisons; because they are for a prey, and none delivereth; for a spoil, and none saith, Restore” (Isa 42 22). Here it is specified that the snare was in a hole so covered as to conceal it. Jer 18 22 clearly indicates that the digging of a pit for a man was customary, and also the hiding of the snare for the feet. North American Indians in setting a snare usually figure on catching the bird around the neck. Jer 50 24, “I have laid a snare for thee”; Hos 9 9, “A Fowler’s snare is in all his ways”; Am 9 5 seems to indicate that the snare was set for the feet: Lk 21 34, “But take heed to yourselves, lest haply . . . that day come on you suddenly as a snare”; Rom 11 9, “Let their table be made a snare, and a trap”; 1 Cor 7 35, “not that I may cast a snare upon you”; 1 Tim 3 7, “the snare of the devil”; also 6 9, “But they that are minded to be rich fall into a temptation and a snare and many foolish and hurtful lusts, such as drown men in destruction and perdition.” See Gin; Net; Trap.

SNEEZE, sñez (עַנָּשׁ, zōrēr, Pā‘el-form עַנָּשָׁר, zǎresar): (1) “The child sneezed seven times, and the child opened his eyes” (2 K 4 35). “Sneezing,” better “snorting,” is found in the description of Leviathan (the crocodile): “His sneezings [נַפּוּץ], añtohlith flash forth light, and his eyes are like the eyelids of the morning” (Job 41 18 [Heb 10]). See NORSING.

SNOW, sñan (תַּגָּר, shelegh, יַגְּר, elagh [Dnl 7 9]; שָׁגָר, chōn): (1) Snow is not uncommon in the winter in Jerusalem, but it never reaches any depth and in many years it is not seen at all. Usually disappears, for the most part, as soon as the sun appears, though it may “hide itself” for a time in the gorge cut by a stream (Job 6 16). On lower levels than Jerusalem there is never sufficient to cover the ground, though Mandell日电“gives 10 ft. for snow” as the average fall in the air. Even at sea-level there is occasionally a sufficient fall of hail to cover the ground. A very exceptional snowfall is related in 1 Macc 13 22 at Adora (near Hebron). It was heavy enough to prevent the movement of troops. (2) The tops of the mountains of Lebanon is white with snow for most of the year, and snow may be found in large banks in the valleys and the northern slopes at any time in the summer. Mt. Hermon, 9,200 ft. high, has long streaks of snow in the valleys all through the summer. (3) The snow of the mountains is the source of the water of the springs which last throughout the drought of summer. In case the snow fails there is sure to be a lack of water in the fountains: “Shall the snow of Lebanon fail . . . or shall the cold waters that flow down from afar be dried up?” (Jer 18 14). (4) Large quantities of snow are stored in caves in the mountains in winter and are brought down to the cities in summer to be used in place of ice for cooling drinks and refrigerating purposes. (5) God’s power over the elements of Nature is often brought out in the OT: “For he saith to the snow, Fall thou on the earth!” (Job 37 6); but man cannot fathom the works of God: “Hast thou entered the treasures of the snow?” (Job 38 22). The “snowy” pit was customary, and the “fear of snow” (Prov 31 21) are figurative uses describing winter and cold. “Snow in summer" (Prov 26:1) would be most out of place, yet it might be most refreshing to the tired workmen in the time of harvest.

(6) Snow is the symbol of purity and cleanliness, giving us some of our most beautiful passages of Scripture: “Wash me and I shall be whiter than snow” (Ps 51:7); "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow" (Isa 1:18). Carrying the figure a step further, snow-water might be expected to have a special value for cleansing: "If I wash myself with snow-water" (Job 9:30). The most common use in Scripture is to denote whiteness in color and implying purity as well: “His rainment was white as snow” (Dan 7:9; Mt 28:3; Mk 9:5; Rev 1:14).

(7) The whiteness of leprosy is compared to snow (Ex 4:6; Nu 12:10; 2 K 5:27).

SNUFFERS, snuf'ters. SNUFF DISHES, snuf'dishes (םֵיתָה, melkhayim, מַחַי, mahḥoth): These two utensils are three mentioned in connection with the wilderness tabernacle (Ex 35:38; 37:23; Nu 4:9). ARV prefers to read “snuffers and snuffdishes” in place of “tongs and snuffdishes” (cf. 2 Ch 4:22), the connection between the two utensils indicated by the fact that both are said to belong to the seven lamps, and were to be made out of the talent of gold which was specified as the weight of the whole (Ex 25:37–39).

The seven-branched candlestick which stood in the holy place of both tabernacle and temple was surmounted, in each of its arms, by a removable lamp in which olive oil was burnt. From the requirement of keeping these lights brilliantly burning throughout each night of the year, arose the need for snuffers and snuffdishes. By the former, the burnt portions of the wick were removed; in the latter they were deposited previous to removal. The lamps may have required to be trimmed as often as every half-hour. For this purpose a priest would enter the outer chamber "accomplishing the services" (He 9:6).

In the time of Solomon's Temple another word than melkhayim was used to describe this utensil. It is מֵיתָה, mēzammərōth, from a vb. meaning "to prune" or "trim," and is found in 1 K 7:50; 2 K 12:13; 26:14; 2 Ch 4:22; Jer 52:18. In 4 of these passages, the Eng. text reads, "its snuffers and the basins": the 5th is merely a summary of things taken to Babylon (2 K 25.14). In this constant later association of "basins" and "snuffers" it is seen that the basins referred to were used for the reception of the cast-off portions of the wicks of the seven lamps, and took the place of the snuffdishes of an earlier age. See TONGS.

SO, sō (סוח, soḥ), although the Heb might be pointed סוח, sōḥ, Assyr šihū, LXX σώχει, Sōgh, Sōd, Sōh; Manetho, Σωχής, Seuchōs; Lat Scewchus; Herod. [ii. 137 ff]. Saβbakkōn, Sabbakin): In all probability the "Sabaeo" of Herodotus, the Shabaka, who founded the Ethiopian dynasty, the XXVth of Egypt kings. His date is given as 715–707 BC (Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt, III, 281 ff), but we may suppose that before his accession to the throne he was entitled to be designated king, as being actually regent. To this So, Hoshen, king of Israel, made an appeal for assistance to enable him to throw off the yoke of the Assyry Shalmaneser IV (2 K 17:3 ff). But Hoshea's submission to So brought him no advantage, for Shalmaneser came up throughout all the land and laid siege to Samaria. Not long after the fall of Samaria So ventured upon an eastern campaign, and was defeated by Sargon, the successor of Shalmaneser, in the battle of Raphia in 720 BC.

SOAP, sōp (םִפָלַס, bōrith; AV sope): Bōrith is a derivative of "בָּר, "purity," hence something which cleanses or makes pure. Soap in the modern sense, as referring to a salt of a fatty acid, for example, that produced by treating olive oil with caustic soda, was probably unknown in OT times. Even today there are districts in the interior of Syria where soap is never used. Cooking utensils, clothes, even the body are cleansed with ashes. The ashes of the household fires are carefully saved for this purpose. The cleansing material referred to in Jer 2:22 (cf. LXX ad loc., where bōrith is rendered by σάλα, pola = "gruss") and Mal 3:2 was probably the vegetable lye called in Arab. el kalī (the origin of Eng. alkali). This material, which is a mixture of crude sodium and potassium carbonates, is sold in the market in the form of greyish lumps. It is produced by burning the desert plants and adding enough water to the ashes to agglomerate them. Before the discovery of Leblanc's process large quantities of kalī were exported from Syria to Europe.

For washing clothes the women sprinkle the powdered kalī over the wet garments and then place them on a flat stone and pound them with a wooden paddle. For washing the body, oil is first smeared over the skin and then kalī rubbed on and the whole slimy mixture rinsed off with water. Kalī was also used anciently as a flux in refining precious metals (cf. Mal 3:2). At the present time many Syrian soap-makers prefer the kalī to the imported caustic soda for soap-making.

In Sus (ver 17) is a curious reference to "washing balls" (ἐμύλματα). JAMES A. PATCH

SOBER, sō'ber. SOBERITY, sō-bris'-ti. SOBERNESS, sō'b-rne'-ss (Gr adj. σοβρής, and its related nouns, σοβρειναι, σοβροινης; vbs. σοβρονεο, and σοβρονωσ, "of sound mind," "self-possessed," "without excesses of any kind," "moderate and discreet"): In Mk 6:15; Lk 8:35, "sane," said of one out of whom demons had just been cast. In the Pastoral Epistles, this virtue is esp. recommended to certain classes, because of extravagances characterizing particular periods of life, that had to be guarded against, viz. to aged men, with reference to the querulousness of old age (Tit 2:2); to young men, with reference to their sensual views of life, and their tendency to disregard consequences (Tit 2:6); enjoined upon young women, with reference to extravagance in dress and speech (Tit 2:5; 1 Tim 2:9); and, in a similar manner, commended to ministers, because of the importance of their judgment and conduct, as teachers and exemplars (1 Tim 3:2). "Words of soberness" (Acts 26:25) are contrasted with the "mania," "madness," that Festus had just declared to be the explanation of Paul's eloquence (ver 24).

In a few passages, the Gr vb. νεφάλω, and its derivative adj. νεφάλιος are used in the same sense. The word originally had a physical meaning, as opposed to drunkenness, and is thus used in 1 Thess 5:6, 8, as the foundation of the deeper meaning. Used metaphorically also in the Pastoral Ep. and 1 Pet. as "sober-minded." Eliott, on 1 Tim 3:2, distinguishes between the two words by regarding σοβρήνω as pointing to the outward exhibition of the inward virtue implied in νεφάλιος.
